Glandulosity. s. Collection of glands.

In the upper parts of worms are found certain white and oval glandulosity.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Glandulous. adj. Pertaining to, subsisting in, or having the nature of, glands.

The beaver's lungs are no testicles, or parts official unto generation, but glandulous substances, that hold the nature of emunctories.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Such constitutions must be subject to glandulous tumours and ruptures of the lymphatics. —A Ruhnnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Glar. v. n. [same root as Glade.]

1. Shine so as to distress the eye.

He is every where above conceits of epigrammatic wit, and gross hyperboles: he maintains majesty in the midst of plainness; he shines but glars not; and is stately without ambition.—Dryden.

The court of Cæsar stands reveal'd to sight;

The cavern glars with new admitted light.

—Id., Translation of the Æneid.

Beholds this man in a false glaring light,
Which conquest and success have thrown upon him.

—Addison, Cato.

2. Look with fierce piercing eyes.

Thou hast no speculation in those eyes,
Which thou dost glare with.

—Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.

Look you, how pale he glares! 'Id., Hamlet', iii. 4.
Now friends no more, nor walking hand in hand;
But when they met, they made a surly stand;
And glar'd like angry lions at a feast's end,
And wish'd that every lock might be their last.

—Dryden, Polamon and Arcite.

'One as melancholic as a cat,' answered Mockey, and glar'd upon me as if he would have looked through me.—Man in the Moon: 1000. (Nares by H. & W.)

Glar. v. a. Shoot such splendour as the eye cannot bear.

One spirit in their rull'd, and every eye
Glar'd lightning, and shot forth pernicious fire
Among th' accurst, that wither'd all their strength.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 815.

Glar. s.

1. Overpowering lustre; splendour, such as dazzles the eye.

Eight months the winter dures;

The glare it is so great,

As it is May before he turns

His ground to sow his wheat.

—Tarleton, (Nares by H. & W.)

The frame of burnish'd steel that cast a glare,
From far, and secur'd to thaw the freezing air.

—Dryden, Fables.

I have grieved to see a person of quality gazing by me in her chair at two o'clock in the morning, and looking like a spectre amidst a glare of Bau-beaux.—Addison, Grandison.

Here in a grove, shelter'd close from air,
And secur'd in shades from day's detested glare,
She sighs for ever. —Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iv.

2. Fierce piercing look.

About them round

A lion now he stalks with fiery glare.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 401.

Glarious. adj. Glairy.

There is a glarous liquor contained in the bowels of infants, and many other animals, when they are born, which it is necessary to carry off. —Girgory, Comparative View of the State and Faculties of Man, p. 23: 1767.

Glaring. part. adj.

1. Shining so as to distress the eye.

After great light, if you come suddenly into the dark, or, contrariwise, out of the dark into a glaring light, the eye is dazzled for a time, and the sight confused.—Bacon.

His glaring eyes with anger's venom swell,
And like the brand of foul Alecto flame.

—Fairfax.

2. Conspicuous; notorious: (as, 'a glaring fault').

Glaringly. adv. In a glaring manner;
patently; evidently; notoriously.

I know not whether the brick-dust men in their marl liversies, and the tallow-chandlers in their sky-coloured frocks, are not so glaringly offensive for a royal eye to bear! —The Student, ii. 220.

Glar. s. Glairy mucus. Rare.

For the party that is incumber'd in the breast with any kind of flemme or glar, take the powder of betonic and drink it with warm water; it voideth and purgeth the flemme wondrously, and doth away
the glar or flemme. —Girard, Herball.

Glass. s. [A.S. glæs.]

1. Transparent, or partially transparent, brittle substance so called.

The word glass cometh from the Belgick and High Dutch: glæs, from the verb 'glansen,' which signifies amongst them to shine; or perhaps from 'glacies' in the Latin, which is ice, whose colour it resembles.—Pritchard, On Driv'up.

Glass is thought so compact and firm a body that it is indurated by art or nature, and is also of so close a texture that the subtlest ethereal spirits cannot invade it. —Boyle.

Shards of granulated rain, by sudden burst
Dispelous numerous bowels, fragments of steel
And stones, and glass, and nitrous grain adust.

—A. Phillips.

Glass is a transparent solid formed by the fusion of siliceous and alkaline matters. . . . Chance undoubtedly had a principal share in the invention of this curious fabrication, but there were circumstances in the most ancient arts likely to lead to it;
such as the fusing and vitrifying heats required for the formation of pottery, and for the extraction of metals from their ores. Pliny ascribes the origin of glass to the following accident. A merchant-ship laden with natron, being driven upon the coast at the mouth of the river Belus, in tempestuous weather, the crew were compelled to seek their victuals ashore, and having placed lumps of the natron upon the sand, as supports to the kettles, found to their surprise masses of transparent stone among the cinders. The sand of this small stream of Galilee, which runs from the Mount Carmel, was in consequence supposed to possess a peculiar virtue for making glass, and continued for ages to be sought after for that purpose.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Except on subjects for which there has been constructed a scientific terminology, it is natural to prefer giving to a new object a name which at least expresses its resemblance to something already known. . . . In this manner the name of a species often becomes the name of a genus; as salt, for example, or oil; the former of which words originally denoted only the muriate of soda, the latter, as its etymology indicates, only olive oil; but which now denote large and diversified classes of substances resembling these in some of their qualities, and comprise only those common qualities, instead of the whole of the distinctive properties of olive oil and sea salt. The words glass and soap are used by modern chemists in a similar manner, to denote genera of which the substances vulgarly so called are single species. And it often happens, as in those instances, that the term keeps its special signification in addition to its more general one, and becomes ambiguous, that is, two names instead of one.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, b. iv. ch. v. § 3.

2. Vessels, instruments, and articles made of glass.

a. Mirror, i.e. looking-glass.

I'll see no more,

And yet the eighth appears, who bears a glass,

Which shows me many more.

—Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

The glass s, and the fine line, and the hoods, and the veils.—Laurel, iii. 23.

He spreads his subtle nets from sight,
With twinkling glasses to betray
The larks that in the meadows light.

—Dryden, Translation from Horace.

b. Hour-glass; measure of time; destined time of a man's life.

Were my wife's liver

Infected as her life, she would not live

The running of one glass.

—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

No more his royal self did live, no more his nobles sonne.

The golden Mælager now, their glasses all were run.

—Chapman.

c. Drinking-glass, whence quantity contained therein; draught.

To this last costly treaty,

That swallow'd so much treasure, and like a glass

Dud break't th' rinsing.

—Shakespeare, Henry VIII, i. 1.

When thy heart

Dilates with fervent joys, and eager soul

Prouds to pursue the sparkling glass, be sure

'Tis time to shun it. —J. Phillips, Cypher, b. ii.

While a man thinks one glass more will not make him drunk, that one glass hath dighted him from well discerning his present condition. —Jacques Top-tor, Rule and Exercise of Holy Living.

The first glass may pass for health, the second for good humour, the third for our friends; but the fourth is for our enemies. —Sir W. Temple.

c. Perspective-glass.

The moon whose orb

Through optick glass the Tuscan artist views.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 287.

Like those who survey the moon by glasses, I tell of a shining world above, but not relate the glories of the place. —Dryden.

d. Weather-glass.

A state weather-glass, that, by the rising and falling of a certain magical liquor, presages all changes and revolutions in government, as the common glass does those of the weather. —Zacher, no. 214.

Used adjectively.

And these glass eyes;

And, like a seamy politician, seem

To see the things thou dost not.

—Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 6.

Glass bottles are more fit for this second lining than those of wood.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Glass. v. a.

1. See us in a glass; represent, as in a glass or mirror. Rare.

He thinks I am partaker of thy passion,

And in this case do glass mine own debility.

—Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, b. ii.

2. Case in glass.

He thought all his senses were lock'd in his eye,

As jewels in crystal for some prince to buy;

Who tendering their own worth, from whence they were glaz'd,

Did point out to buy them, along as you pass.

—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, ii. 1.

3. Glaze.

I have observed little grains of silver to lie hid in the small cavities, perhaps glaz'd over by a vitri-fying heat, in crucibles wherein silver has been long kept in fusion.—Boyle.

Glassblower. s. One employed in glass-blowing. See Glassblowing.

Glassblowing. part. pref. Process by which glass is formed into bottles, &c., by means of a mould on the outside, and a tube by which, when in a plastic condition, it (the semifluid glass) is inflated from within.

This is the second process in glass-blowing, . . . the glass-blower takes the metal from the gatherer. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Glassen. adj. Made of glass. Obsolete.

He that no more for aye, crumps, pabies, can
Now use the bones, we see doth live a man
To take the bone up for him; and pursues
The dice with glassen eyes to the glad views
Of what he throws. — B. Jonson, An Epistle to a Friend. (Rich.)

Glassful. s. As much as is usually taken at once in a glass.

Glassgazing. adj. Fimical; often contemplating him-elf in a mirror.

Glasshouse. s.

1. House where glass is manufactured.

I remember to have met with an old Roman mosaic, composed of little pieces of clay half vitrified, and prepared at the glasshouse. — Adrian, Travels in Italy.

2. House built of glass, as the Crystal Palace, or a greenhouse; in which case it is often two words.

Glassmetal. s. Glass in fusion.

Let proof be made of the incorporating of copper or brass with glassmetal. — Jacobi, Physical Repository.

Glasswort. s. Native plant so called of the genus Salicornia.

Glasswort hath an apetalous flower, wanting the embayment; for the stamina, or chives, and the embryos grow on the extreme part of the leaves; these embryos afterward become pods or bladders, which, or the most part contain one seed. The inhabitants near the sea-coast cut the plants up toward the latter end of summer; and, having dried them in the sun, they burn them for their ashes, which are used in making of glass and soap. These herbs are by the country people called kelp. From the ashes of these plants is extracted the salt called sal kali, or alkali, by the chemists. — Miller.

For the blue glass we use the purest of the finest sand, and the ashes of chalk, or glasswort; and for the clearer or green sort, the ashes of brack or other plants. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The salt-wort or glass-wort (salicornia) grows freely on most of the shores. — Asted, The Channel Islands, p. 177.

Glassy. adj.

1. Made of glass; vitreous.

In the valley near mount Carmel in Judea there is a sand, which, of all others, hath most affinity with glass; inasmuch as other minerals laid in it turn to a glassy substance. — Bacon.

2. Resembling glass, as in smoothness, or lustre, or brittleness.

Man! proud man!
Drest in a little brief authority,
Most ignorant of what he's most assur'd,
His glassy essence, like an angry ape,
Plays such fantastic tricks before high heaven
As makes the angels weep.

There is a willow grows aslant a brook,
That shows his hoar leaves in the glassy stream. — Id., Hamlet, iv. 7.

Whose womb produc'd the glassy ice? Who bred
The hoary frosts that fall on Winter's head? — G. Sandys.

Death stood all fixed in his glassy eye;
His hands were withered, and his veins were dry. — Byron, H. Bruce Melodica.

The memory must retain the sensation or perception to which the technical term or degree of the scale refers. Thus with regard to colour, as we have said already, when we find such terms as tin-white or pinchbeck-brown, the metallic colour so denoted ought to occur at once to our recollection without delay or search. . . . Thus glassy lustre, fatty lustre, adamantine lustre, denote certain kinds of shining in minerals, which appearances we should endeavour in vain to describe by periphrasis; and which the terms, if considered as terms in common language, would by no means clearly discriminate; for who, in common language, would say that coal has a fatty lustre? But these terms, in their conventional sense, are perfectly definite; and when the eye is once familiarized with this application of them, are easily and clearly intelligible. — Whagell, Noctum Organum Remoratus.

Glaucoma. s. [Gr. γλαύωμα, from γλαυρός = grey, or sea-green.] Disease of the eye, originally identified with the cataract, but in reality seated in the hyaline membrane and aqueous matter, its effect being to give a greyish-green colour to the eye.

The glaucoma is no other disease than the cataract. — Sharp.

The difference has been eagerly contended for between a glaucoma and a cataract, though indeed latterly the contest has been less violent. — The Student, i. 341: 17. n.

Glauceous. adj. [Lat. glauceus; Gr. γλαυρός.] Grey, or blue.

The kisk glides over a bottom covered with mosses or coloured stones, that reflect through the pure water thin glauceous green, or sapphireine. — Pennant, Voyage to the Hebrides.

Glave, or Glave. s. [the i is superfluous; being wanted for neither the derivation, with that of the first element in Glavmore, nor for showing that the a is long, which is done by the final e.] Sword.

He . . . lying both his hands upon his glave.

With dreadful strokes let drive at him so sore.

Spenser, Faerie Queen, iv. 7. 28.

Achilles pressing through the Phrygian glaves.

Spenser, Epica on Hercules's Labors.

Two hundred Greeks came next in sight well try'd.

Not surely arm'd in steel or iron strong.

But each a glave had pendant by his side. — Fairfax.

Behold from yonder hill the foe appears,

Bows, bills, glaves, arrows, shields, and spears,

Like a dark wood he comes.

When zeal, with aged clubs and glaves,

Gave chase to rochets and white slaves. — Butler, Hudibras.

Gláver. v. n. [?] Flatter; wheedle.

The writer of that glavering glass upon Pope Bonifacius' bull. — Fulke, Against Allen, p. 512: 1564.

Some slavish, glavering, flattering parasite, or hanger-on. — South, Sermons, vi. 110.

Kindness have their distempers, intermissions, and paroxysms, as well as natural bodies; and a glavering council is as dangerous as a wheedling priest, or a flattering physician. — Sir R. L. Edrington.

Gláverer. s. One who glavers; flatterer.

These glavurers gone, my selfe to rest I laid,

And doubting nothing, soundly fell asleep.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 407.

Glavering. verbal abs. Flattering.

He knew how tender and delicate he princes' ears, corrupt with glorious glavering of flatterers. — Joye, Exposition of Daniel, ch. iii. (Rich.)

Glávmore. s. (generally pronounced claymore.) [Gaelic, claidheamh = sword,

more = great.] Large two-handed sword, formerly much used by the highlanders of Scotland.

Their arms were anciently the glavmore, or great two-handed sword, and afterwards the two-edged sword and target. — Johnson, Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Glaze. v. a.

1. Furnish with windows of glass.

Let there be two delicate cabinets doubly paved, richly hang'd, and glaz'd with crystalline glass. — Bacon, Essays.

2. Overlay with something shining and pellucid.

Borrow's eye, glaz'd with blinding tears,

Divides one thing entire to many objects.

The reason of one man operates on that of another in all true oratory; wherein though with other ornaments he may glaze and brandish the weapons, yet it is sound reason that carries the stroke home. — Grege, Orationes Sacre.

White, with other strong colours, with which we paint that which we intend to glaze, are the life, the spirit, and the lustre of it. — Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

What is this? his eyes are heavy: think not they are glaz'd with wine.

Go to him: it is thy duty: kiss him: take his hand in thine. — Tenneyson, Locksley Hall.

3. In Pottery.

This set me to study how to order my fire, so as to make it burn some pots. I had no notion of a kiln, such as the potters burn in, or of glazing them with lead, though I had some lead to do it with; but I placed three large plinths and two or three pots in a pile, one on another, and placed my fire-wood all round it, with a great heap of embers under them. — Defoe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

4. In Cookery.

To glaze or ice pastry. The fine yellow glaze appropriate to meat pies is given with beaten yolk of egg, which should be laid on with a paste brush, or a small bunch of feathers; if a lighter colour be wished for, whisk the whole of the egg together, or mix a little milk with the yolk. . . . This glazing answers also very well, though it takes a slight colour, if used before the pastry is baked. — Miss Acton, Modern Cookery, p. 335.

Glaze. s.

1. In Pottery.

The early Chinese glazes do not appear to be known. — Catalogue of Specimens.

2. In Cookery.

Glaze is merely strong clear gravy or jelly boiled quickly down to the consistency of thin cream; but this reduction must be carefully managed, that the glaze may be brought to the proper point without being burned. . . . Any kind of stock may be boiled down to glaze. — Eliza Acton, Modern Cookery, p. vi.

Glazen. adj. Glossy: (as the first element of a compound).

Old glazen-eyes,

He hath not reach'd his despair yet. — B. Jonson, Volpone.

Glázier. s. One whose trade is to make glass windows.

Into rabbits, the several pieces of glasswork are set, and fastened by the glázier. — Mozon, Mechanic of Exeter.

The dext'rous glazier strong returns the bound,
And jingling saules on the penthouse sound. — Gay, Trivia.

Gladiowes. s. See Gladiolus.

Gleam. v. n. [See Glimmer.] Shine with sudden convection.

Observant of approaching day,

The muck-eyed morn appears, mother of dews,

At first faint gleaming in the dappled east. — Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

Gleam. s. Sudden shoot of light; lustre; brightness.

Then was the fair Dodonian tree far seen
Upon seven hills to spread his gladsome gleam;
And competitors beset with his green,
Along the banks of the Ausonian stream. — Spenser.

At just a gleam

Of dawning light turn'd thitherward in haste

His travel'd steps. — Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 420.

Mine is a gleam of bliss, too hot to last;

Wat'ry it shines, and will be soon o'ercast. — Dryden, Innocence.

In the clear azure gleam the flocks are seen.

And floating forests paint the waves with green. — Pope, Windsor Forest.

Gleaming. part. adj. Shining with a gleam.

The field of iron cast a gleaming brown.

Milton, Paradise Regained, iii. 326.

Gleaming. verbal abs. Gleam.

Farewell, ye gleaming of departed peace!

Shine out your last! — Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Gleamy. adj. Flashing; darting sudden conceptions of light.

In brazen arms, that cast a gleamy ray,

Swift through the town the warrior bends his way. — Pope.

Gleam. v. a. [Fr. glaner, from galerie = handful.]

1. Gather what the gatherers of the harvest leave behind.

And she went, and came and gleamed in the field

after the reapers. — Ruth, ii. 3.

Cheap conquest for his following friends remain'd;

He reap'd the field, and they but only gleam'd. — Dryden.

The precept of not gathering their land clean, but that something should be left to the poor to gleam, was a secondary offering to God himself. — Newton, Comparison to the Fasts and Festivals of the Church of England.

He went, by hard necessity compell'd,

To gleam Palamoun's fields. — Thomson, Seasons, Autumn.

2. Gather anything thinly scattered.

Gather

So much as from occasions you may gleam,

If aught, to us unknown, affects him thus. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 2.

That goodness

Of gleaming all the land's wealth into one,

Into your own hands, card-nail, by extortion. — Id., Henry VIII. iii. 2.

They gleamed of him in the highways five thousand men. — Judge, xx. 46.

But Argive chiefs, and Agamemnon's train,
When his resplendent arms flash'd through the shady plain,
Pled from his well-known sword with wonted fear;
As when his thundering word and pointed spear
Drove headlong to their ships, and gleam'd the routed rear.
In the knowledge of bodies we must be content to glean what we can from particular experiments;
since we cannot, from a discovery of their real essence, grasp at a time whole shelves, and in bundles comprehend the nature and properties of whole species together.—Locke.

Glean. s.

1. Collection made laboriously by slow degrees.

Plains, meads, and orchards all the day he piles;
The gleams of yellow thyme distend his thighs:
He spoils the sifflon.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

2. See extract. Rare.

A gleane or heap of corn commonly gathered together and bound by handfuls.—Withal, Dictionary, p. 67: 1608.

Gleaner. s. One who gleams.

1. One who gathers after the reapers.
For still the world prevail'd, and its dread laugh,
Which scarce the firm philosopher can scorn,
Should his heart own a gleamer in the fold.
Thomson, Seasons, Autumn.

2. One who gathers anything slowly and laboriously.

An ordinary coffee-house gleaner in the city is an arant statesman.—Locke.

Gleaning. verbal abs. Act of gleaming or thing gleamed.

There shall be as the slinking of an olive-tree, and as the gleaming grapes when the vintage is done.—Isaiah, xiv. 13.

The orphan and widow are members of the same common family, and have a right to be supported out of the incomes of it, as the poor Jews had to gather the gleavings of the rich man's harvest.—Bishop Atterbury.

Glebe. s. [Lat. gleba.]

1. Turf; soil; ground.

This, like the moory plots, delights in sedge; bowers;
The grassy earlands loves, and oft attir'd with flowers
Of rank and mellow glebe.
Dryden.

Mark well the flow'ring almonds in the wood;
If od'rous blossoms the bearing branches load,
The glebe will answer to the sylvan roset.
Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, b. 1.

Showering vegetation lie,
Till the glad summons of a genial ray
Unbinds the glebe, and calls them out to day.
Garth.

2. Land possessed as part of the revenue of an ecclesiastical benefice.

The ordinary living or revenue of a parsonage is of three sorts: the one in land, commonly called the glebe; another in tithes, which is a set part of our goods rendered to God; the third, in other offerings bestowed upon God and his church by the people.—Spelman.

A tithess clope on a parson's glebe land, which is a frehold, cannot be tried in a spiritual court.—Atkyns, Purgeon Juris Canonici.

Many parishes have not an inch of glebe.—Swift.

3. Earthly concretion or mass of particles.

The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fusible in the fire, comestible again by cold into brittle glebe, or crystals, soluble in water so as to disappear.—Arbuthnot, Explanation of Chymical Terms, (Orel MS.)

Gleby. adj. Turfy: (perhaps in the following passage fat or fruitful, if it has indeed any definite English meaning, and is not a loosely adopted Latinism).

Pervious fertility! the malignant seeds
In an ill hour, and by a fatal hand,
Noddy diffus'd o'er virtuous gleby land,
With rising wide amidst the corn appear,
And choke the hopes and harvest of the year.
Prior, Solomon, b. 1.

Glede. s. [generally referred to glide; though doubtfully.] Kite, i.e. bird so called.

You shall not eat the glede, the kite, and the vulture.—Deuteronomy, xiv. 13.

Not a glead, not a vulture, not a falcon, not an eagle, not any bird of prey or rapine.—Bishop Hall, Beauty of the Church.

Glee. s. [A.S. glig.]

1. Joy; merriment; gaiety.

She marcheth home, and by her takes the knight,
Whom all the people follow with great glee.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Many wayfarers make themselves glee, by vowing

G L E E

the inhabitants; who again foreswore not to thigne them with perfume.—Caron, Surrey of Cornwall.
Is Blouselinda dead? Farewell my glee!
No happiness is now reserv'd for me.
Gay, Pastoral.

2. Song, sung in parts; species of catch.

Airs of the most modern cast, fitted into divisions or even loaded with parts as much in sequence as in a catch or a glee.—Mason, On Church Music, p. 220.

Who has not seen the advertisements proposing a reward to him, who should produce the best catch, canon, or glee.—Bishop Percy, Reliquia of Ancient Poetry, Essay on the English Minstrel.

Gleed. s. [German, gluth = glowing.] Burning or live coal; hot ember.

In heart he brent as any glee.

Lydgate, History of Troy.

Fair Ilum fall in burning red glees down,
And from the soil great Troy, Neptune's town,
Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, ii. 3.

When I stir up these embers to the bottom, there are found some living glees, which do both contain fire, and are apt to propagate it.—Bishop Hall, Occasional Meditations.

Gleeful. adj. Gay; merry; cheerful.

My lovely Anon, wherefore look'st thou sad,
When every thing doth make a gleeful boast?
Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, ii. 3.

Nor lacks he gleeful tales, whilst round the nut-brown bowl doth trot.

Warner, Albion's England.

Gleek. v. n. Sneer; gibe; make sarcastic jests.

Now where's the Bastard's braves, and Charles his gleeks?
What, all a moor? Id., Henry VI. Part I., iii. 2.

Here June, here; but stay, I do spy
A pretty gleek coming from Fallow's eye.
Ben Jonson and Fletcher, Maid in the Mill.

Gleek. s. [? from German, glück = luck.]

Game of cards so called.

Let her hear up to-day.

A lady once requesting a gentleman to play at gleeks, was refused, but civilly, and upon three reasons; the first whereof, madam, said the gentleman, is, I have no money. Her ladyship knew that was so material and sufficient, that she desired him to keep the two other reasons to himself.—Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 14.

Gleeman. s. Minstrel.

Black-bridge . . . a roynge musicyan, called of the Britons gode of gleman.—Babyon, Chronicle, fol. xxiii.: 1535.

The Anglo-Naxon harpers and gleemen were the immediate successors and imitators of the Scandinavian scalds.—Bishop Percy, Reliquia of Ancient Poetry, Essay on the English Minstrel.

Their national love of verse and music still so strongly predominated, that in the place of their old scalds a new rank of poets arose, called gleemen or harpers.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, vol. i. diss. 1.

Gleesome. adj. Full of glee or merriment; joyous.

Gleesome hunters, pleas'd with their sport,
With sacrifices due have thank'd me for't.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastoral.

Gleet. s. [?] In Medicine. Glairy discharge

from a wound or mucous surface; at present limited to discharges from the urethra, in which case it is the name of a disease rather than the discharge itself.

A hard dry eschar, without either matter or gleet.—Wise, Surgery.

Gleet. v. n.

1. Drip or ooze with a thin sanious liquor.

His thumb being inflamed and swelled, I made an incision into it to the bone; this not only bled, but gleeted a few drops.—Wise, Surgery.

2. Run slowly.

Vapours raised by the sun make clouds, which are carried up and down the atmosphere, till they hit against the mountainous places of the globe, and by this concussion are condensed, and so gleet down the caverns of these mountains, whose inner parts, being hollow, afford them a basin.—Cuvier, Philosophical Principles of Natural Religion.

Gleety. adj. Ichory; thinly sanious.

If the flesh lose its ruddiness, and the matter

G L I D

change to be thin and glidy, you may suspect it corrupting.—Wise, Surgery.

Glen. s. [Cornish, glyn; Gaelic, gleann.]

Valley; dale; depression between two hills.
From me his madd'ning mind is start,
And woe the widow's daughter of the glen.
Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar.

Can silent glens have charms for thee?
The lowly eol, and russet gown? Bishop Percy.
Tough glens, and sudden waterfalls.

T. Warton.

Glib. adj. [Provincial German, glippen = slip; glibberig = slippery.]

1. Smooth; slippery; so formed as to be easily moved.

Liquid bodies have nothing to sustain their parts, nor any thing to cement them: the parts being glib and continually in motion, fall off from one another, which way so ever gravity inclines them.—T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Habakkuk brought him a smooth strong rope, compactly twisted together, with a noose that slid as glib as a bishcatcher's gin.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

2. Smooth; voluble.

I want that glib and oily art
To speak and purpose not, since what I well intend,
I'll do't before I speak.

Id., King Lear, i. 1.

Used adverbially.

There was never so much glib nonsense put together in well sounding English.—Locke.

Now Curll his shop-train rubbish drams;
Three genuine tomes of Swift's remains:
And then, to make them pass the glib,
Revis'd by Tibbald, Moore, and Alder.

Swift, On the Death of Dr. Swift.

And Molly and I have thrust in our nose
To peep at the Captain all in his fine clothes;
Dear madam, be sure he's a fine spoken man;
Do but hear on the clergy how glib his tongue runs.

Id., The Grand Question Debated.

Glib. s. See extracts.

The Irish have for e Scythians mantles and long glbes; which is ick curled bush of hair hanging down over the eyes, and monstrously disguising them.—Spencer, Faerie Queene, iv. 8, 12.

In Tyrcounell the hair of the (the Irish) head grows so long and curled, that they wear horse-headed, and are called glbes: the women, glbians.—Gaule, History of England, p. 151: 1648.

Whom when she saw in wretched weeds disguis'd,
With hairy glb deform'd, and meagre face, . . .
She knew him not.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, iv. 8, 12.

Glib. v. n.

1. Castrate.

I'll geld them all: fourteen they shall not see,
To bring false generations: they are coheirs,
And I had rather glib myself than they Should not produce fair issue.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

2. Make smooth or glib.

There is a drunken liberty of the tongue, which, being once glibbed with intoxicating liquor, runs wild through heaven and earth.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 26.

I undertook that office, and the tongue
Of all his flattering prophets glib'd with lies
To his destruction.

Glibbin. s. See Glib, s.

Glibly. adv. In a glib manner.

Wine so choice, or so delicious, that it went down glibly.—Bishop Patrick, Paraphrase and Commentary on the Old Testament, Ecclesiastes, vii. 9.

Many who would startle at an oath, whose stomachs as well as consciences recoil at an obscenity, do yet slide glibly into a detraction.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Glibness. s. Attribute suggested by Glib; smoothness; slipperiness.

A polish'd bee-like glibness doth unfold
The rock.—Chapman, Translation of the Odyssey.

The tongue is the most ready for motion of any member, needs not so much as the flexure of a joint, and by access of humours acquires a glibness too, the more to facilitate its moving.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Glidder. adj. See extract.

(Glidder = Slippery, (Halliwell). Ben Jonson speaks of a gallop-pole being well glidder'd, i.e. glazed. Provincial Danish, glidder, slippery; glidder, to smooth a wall plastered with clay. Scotch, glidder, glidder, unctuous, slippery; to glid, to work with the hands in something liquid, oily, and viscous. Provincial English, glid, the slimy substance in a hawk's panure. French, glide, the froth of an ope, phlegm or silt which a hawk throws out at her beak after her casting; glidder, slimy, funny, siltly. (Cograve.) Platt Deutsch, glit, slippery; English, glet, a slimy discharge.—Wadsworth, Dictionary of English Slang.)

GLIDE. v. n. [A.S. glidan.]

1. Flow gently and silently.

By east, among the dusty valleys, glide
The silver streams of Jordan's crystal flood.
Fairfax, Translation of Tasso.
Broke by the jutting land on either side,
In double streams the briny waters glide.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

2. Pass on without change of step; move smoothly, with an approach to sliding.

All things are beheld as in a hasty motion, where the objects only glide before the eye and disappear.
Dryden.

GLIDE. s. Passing or motion; act of one who glides.

About his neck
A green and gilded snake had wreath'd itself,
Who, with her head nimbly in threats, approach'd
The opening of his mouth; but suddenly
Seeing Orlando, it unlink'd itself,
And with indenting glides did slip away
Into a bush. Shakespeare, As you like it, iv. 3.

GLIDE. s. One who, or that which, glides.

The glance into my heart did glide;
Hie, hie, this glider;
Therewith my soul was sharply gride,
Such wounds soon waver wither.

GLIME. s. See extract.

[Glime.—Glime, plum. Glime or rowme, reuma; plume of knyttyne; or byndynge toechelers, lumes, gluten; glumys or guglupyn, vincis, invisco, (Promptorium Parvulorum). Viscus, glime or lyme. (Ortus in Way). Northern English, glime, the mucus from the nostrils of cattle. (Hallivell). Related to glime, as Dutch glidderig to slidderig, slippery; glippen, to escape, to English slip; glide, to slide; Scotch glid to Swedish glida, to slide. Probably the radical glime is the slippery of a viscous liquid.—Webster's Dictionary of English Etymology.]

GLIMMER. v. n. [German, glimmen.] Shine faintly and unsteadily.

The west yet glimmers with some streaks of day.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 3.
For there no twilight of the sun's dull ray
Glimmers upon the pure and native day. Courtly.

GLIMMER. s. Faint, weak, and unsteady light.

Yet hath my night of life some memory,
My waning lamps some fading glimmer left.
Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, v. 1.

GLIMMER. s. [direct from German, glimmer.] In Mineralogy. Mica.

The lesser masses that are lodged in sparry and stony bodies, dispersedly, from their shining and glimmering, were an inducement to the writers of fables to give those bodies the name of mica and glimmer.—Woodward, Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth.

Stones which are composed of plates, that are generally plain and parallel, and that are flexible and elastic; tale, cat's-paw, or glimmer, of which there are three sorts, the yellow or golden, the white or silvery, and the black.—Ibid.

Glimmering. part. adj. Shining with a glimmer.

Off in glimmering bowers and glades
He met her. Milton, Il Penseroso, 27.
Off by the winds, extinct the signal lies;
Or smother'd in the glimmering socket dies.
Gay, Trivia.

Glimmering. verbal abst. Faint, unsteady, or imperfect light; faint view or notion.

On the way the baggage post boy, who had been at court, got a glimmering glow they were. Sir II. Walton.
See'st thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild,
The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid flames
Gusts pale and dreadful? Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 130.

The pagan priesthood was always in the Druids; and there was a considerable glimmering of the Jewish rites in it, though much corrupted. Swift.
I cannot see a glimmering of distinction. Burke, On the Popery Laws.

GLIMSE. s. [Provincial German, glumsen—spark.]

1. Quick transitory light, or lustre.

There no dear glimpse of the sun's lovely face
Strikes through the solid darkness of the place.
Croley.

Such vast room in nature,
Only to shine, yet scarce to contribute
Each orb a glimpse of light, convey'd so far
Down to this habitable, which returns
Light back to them. Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 164.

In all his lineaments, though in his face
The glimpse of his Father's glory shine.

My thoughtless youth was wing'd with vain desires;

My manhood, long misled by wand'ring fires,
Follow'd false lights; and when their glimpse was gone,
My pride struck out new spangles of her own. Dryden.

If I, celestial sire, in ought
Have serv'd thy will, or gratified thy thought,
One glimpse of glory to my issue give;
Grac'd for the little time he has to live. Id., Fables.

Thousands of things, which now either wholly escape our apprehensions, or which our shortsighted reason having not some faint glimpse of, we, in the dark, grope after.—Locke.

2. Short transitory view; foretaste; inkling.

O friends! I hear the tread of nimble feet
Hasting th' way, and now by glimpse discern Ithuriel, and Zephon, through the shade.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 800.

Some God punisheth exemplarily in this world, that we might have a taste or glimpse of his present justice. Hakewell.

A man used to such sort of reflections, even as much as one glimpse as would require a long discourse to lay before another, and make out in one entire and gradual deduction. Locke.

What should I do! while here I was enchain'd,
No glimpse of godlike liberty remain'd.
Dryden, Translation of Virgil's Eclogues.

If, while this weary'd flesh draws fleeting breath,
Not satisfy'd with life, afraid of death,
It imply be thy will that I should know
Glimpse of d-light, or pause from anxious woe;
From now, from instant now, great Sire, dispel
The clouds that press my soul. Prior, Solomon, h. i.

But no, alas! we've never seen
One glimpse of summer's ray;
But still there came some cloud between
And chased it all away. Moore, National Airs.

3. Exhibition of a faint resemblance.

No man hath a virtue that he hath not a glimpse of.—Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

GLIMPE. v. n. Appear by glimpses.

Deformed shadows glimping in his sight.
Drayton, Baron's Wars, ii. 40.

GLISTEN. v. n. [A.S. glistenan.] Shine; sparkle with light.

How unpolished sever this diamond be, yet if it do but glister, 'tis too precious to be cast away.—Hammond, Works, iv. 20.

... ladies' eyes glistered with pleasure.—Richardson, Pamela.

GLISTER. v. n. [akin to Glitter.] Shine; be bright.

... he wars flame most in summer, and the helmets glister brightest in the fairest sunshine.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

You were more the eye and talk
Of the court to-day, than all Else that glister'd in Whitehall.
II. Jonson, Underwoods.

When the sun shone upon the shields of gold and brass, the mountains glistered therewith, and shined like lamps of fire.—1 Macabees, vi. 30.

GLISTER. s. Lustre; glitter.

As fair Aurora in her morning ray,
Look'd with the ruddy glister of her love,
Is fair Samella. R. Greene, Arcadia: 1610.

GLISTER. s. [from Gr. κλύστηρ.] Clyster.

Now enters glush, with new state airs,
His lordship's premier minister;
And who, in all profound affairs,
Is held as needful as his glister. Swift.

Choler is the natural glister, or one excretion whereby nature excludeth another; which descending daily unto the bowels, estimulates those parts, and excites them unto expulsion.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

GLITTER. v. n. [Norse, glitra.]

1. Shine; exhibit lustre; gleam.
Before the battle joins, from afar,
The field yet glitters with the pomp of war. Dryden.

Scarce hadst thou time t'unsleath thy conqu'ring blade;
It did but glitter, and the rebels fled. Granville.

2. Be specious; be striking.

GLITTER. s. [?] Lustre; bright show; splendour.

With what permissive glory since his fall
Was left him, or false glitter.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 430.

Flourish not too much upon the glitter of fortune, for fear there should be too much alloy in it.—Catber, Essay on Pride.

Take away this measure from our dress and habits, and all is turned into such paint and glitter, and ridiculous ornaments, as are a real shame to the wearer.—Law.

It is the imperative duty of the historian to dwell upon the fate, while he discloses with impartial fairness, and marks with just reprobation, the acts of such men; to the end that their great success, as it is called, may not mislead others, and conceal behind the glitter of worldly prosperity the base material with which the structure of their fortune is built up.—Lord Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Lord Loughborough.

GLITTERING. part. adj. Exhibiting glitter or lustre.

On the one hand set the most glittering temptations to disorder, and on the other the dismal effects of it.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

In glittering scenes, o'er her own heart, severe;
In crowds collected; and in courts sincere. Young.

GLITTERING. verbal abs. Lustre; gleam.

Steel glasses are more rependence than the like plates of brass, and so is the glittering of a blade.—Bacon.

GLOAMING. s. [A.S. glomung.—see Gloom, Glum, Glumpy.]

1. Twilight.

Where now the bats their wavering wings extend
Soon as the glomung spreads her waning shade,
The choir did oft their mingling vapours blend,
Or mutin orisons to Mary paid.

As glomung, the Scottish word for twilight, is far more poetical, and has been recommended by many eminent literary men, particularly by Dr. Moore in his letters to Burns, I have ventured to use it on account of its harmony.—Byron, Hours of Idleness, Elegy on Newton Auld y. and wife.

2. Gloominess of mind or spirit.

Woman, pluck up your heart, and leave off all this glomung.—Gammer Gurton's Needle.

GLOAT. v. n. See Glout.

1. Look covertly.

She lurks in midst of all her denne, and streaks
From out a ghastly whirlpool all her weeks,
Where (gliding round her rock) to fish she falls.

2. Look with admiration, eagerness, or desire.

Teach every grace to smile in your behalf,
And her deluding eyes to gloat for you.
Rare, Jane Shore.

Some praise his sleeves; and others glat
Upon his rich embroidery'd coat. Clay, Fables.

GLOATING. part. adj. Looking greedily.

When presently she gloat espies
And well she markt his gloating eyes,
How under every hat he pries,
In seeking still to find them. Dryden, Nymphidia, 465. (Ord MS.)

GLOBE. s. [Lat. globus.]

1. Sphere; ball; round body; body of which every part of the surface is at the same distance from the centre.

2. The Earth, or planet, we dwell on.

The south, whose fortune the vast globe obey'd,
Finding his royal enemy betray'd,
Went as he fell. Shapton.

Where God declares his intention to give dominion, he meant that he would make a species of creatures that should have dominion over the other species of this terrestrial globe.—Locke.

3. In Geography. Sphere on which the various regions of the earth are geographically depicted, or on which the constellations are laid down according to their places in the heavens, the former giving a terrestrial, the latter a celestial, globe.

The astrologer who spells the stars
Mistakes his globe; and in his brighter eye
Interprets heaven's physiognomy. Cleveland.

But raise thy thought from globe, nor think to find Such figures there as are in globe design'd. Crook.

4. Body of soldiers drawn into a circle.

Him round
A globe of fiery seraphim enclos'd,
With bright imblazonry, and horrent arms.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 511.

Common as the first element of a compound, or with an adjectival construction, e.g. globe-shaped, globe amaranth.

GLOBE. v. n. Gather in, or as in, a globe.

Although I have given it the name of a liquid thing, yet it is not incontinent to bound itself, as humid things are, but hath in it a most restraining and powerful abstinence to start back, and globe itself upward from the mixture of any unguacious and unbecoming motion, or any soil wherewith it may peril to stain itself.—Milton, Remains of Church Government urged against Prelacy, li. 3.

globe. adj. [Lat. globosus.] Having the shape or character of a globe; spherical; round: (used substantively in the first extract).

Regions, to which
All thy dominion, Adam, is no more
Than what this garden is to all the earth,
And all the sea, from one entire globe
Stretch'd into longitude.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 750.
Globe, and every magnitude of stars.
Ibid. vii. 350.

Globesity. s. Globular character; sphericity.

Why the same eclipse of the sun, which is seen to them that live more easterly, when the sun is elevated six degrees above the horizon, should be seen to them that live one degree more westerly, where the sun is but five degrees above the horizon, and so lower and lower proportionably, till at last it appears not at all: an account can be given, but the globesity of the earth.—Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Globous. adj. Spherical; round.

Having reduced [it] into a globous form.—Gregory, Pothamus, p. 282: 1650.
Wide over all the plain, and wider far
Than all this globous earth in plain outspread,
Such are the courts of God!

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 618.
The frozen instruments of death discharge
Horrible flames, and turbid streaming clouds;
Large globous irons fly, of dreadful hiss,
Singing the air. Philips.

Globular. adj. Having the form of a globe (large or small); round; spherical.

The figure of the atoms of all visible fluids seemeth to be globular, there being no other figure so well fitted to the making of fluidity.—Grav, Cosmologia Sacra.

Such a small particle of matter as is of a globular or spherical figure; as the red particles of the blood, which swim in a transparent serum, and are easily discovered by the microscope. These will attract one another when they come within a due distance, and unite like the spheres of quicksilver.—Quincy.

Globule. s. [Lat. globulus, diminutive of globus.] Small globe.

The hailstones have opaque globules of snow in their centre, to intercept the light within the hail.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Blood consists of red globules, swimming in a thin liquor called serum: the red globules are elastic, and will break; the vessels which admit the smaller globule, cannot admit the greater without a disease.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliment.

Globulous. adj. Having the character of a globe, or the form of a sphere; round.

The whiteness of such globulous particles proceeds from the air included in the froth.—Boyle.

Globy. adj. Orbicular; round. Rare.

Your hair, whose globy rings
He flying curls, and crisps with his wings.

R. Johnson, Klogg.
One of the highest arts that human contemplation circumspectly can make from the globy sea —Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Devils.

Glomerate. v. n. [Lat. glomeratus, pass. part. of glomerare; glomus = mass or ball, as of cotton or wool; glomeratio, -onis.] Gather itself into a ball or sphere.

Glomerating. part. adj. Forming a glomeration: (in the extract, meandering).

A river which, from Caucasus, after many glomerating dances, increases Indus. Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 65.

Glomeration. s. Act of forming into a ball or sphere; body so formed.

The rainbow consisteth of a glomeration of small drops, which cannot fall but from the air that is very low.—Bacon.

Gloom. s. See Glum.

1. Imperfect darkness; obscurity; shade; shadow.

Glowing embers through the room,
Toss'd light to counterlight a gloom.

Milton, Il Penseroso, 70.
Is this the seat,
That we must change for heaven? This mournful gloom,
For that celestial light? Id., Paradise Lost, l. 248.
The still night; not now, as men are full,
Wholesome, and cool, and mild; but with black air
Accompanied: with damp, and dreadful gloom.
Ibid. l. 546.

Now warm in love, now with'ring in my bloom,
Lost in a convent's solitary gloom.
Pope, Eliza to Abclard.

2. Cloudiness of aspect; heaviness of mind; sullenness. See Glum.

Gloom. v. n. Show itself gloomily.

Here while the proud their long-drawn pomps display,
There the black gillet glooms beside the way.

Giddamith, Inverted Village.
Gloom. v. a. Fill with gloom; invest with a character of gloominess. Rare.

A night that glooms us in the moonless ray,
And wraps our thoughts at languets in the shroud.

Verap, Night Thoughts, ii.
Good heaven! what sorrows gloom'd that parting day,
That call'd them from their native walks away.

Giddamith, Inverted Village.
Glooming. part. adj. Showing itself gloomily.

His glistering armour much like a shade,
A little glooming light much like a shade.

Through dreadful shades of ever glooming night.
Spanish Tragedy: 1603.

Gloomily. adv. In a gloomy manner.

See, he comes: how gloomily he looks! Dryden.

Gloominess. s. Attribute suggested by gloomy.

1. Want of light; obscurity; imperfect light; dimness.

A day of darkness and gloominess, a day of clouds and thick darkness.—Zephaniah, l. 10.

2. Want of cheerfulness; cloudiness of look; heaviness of mind; melancholy.

Neelot spreads gloominess upon their humour,
And makes them grow sullen and unconvertible.—Collier, Of the Spectator.

The gloominess in which sometimes the minds of the best men are involved, very often stands in need of such little incitements to mirth and laughter as are apt to disperse melancholy.—Addison.

Gloomy. adj.

1. Obscure; imperfectly illuminated; almost dark; dismal for want of light.

These were from without
The growing miseries, which Adam saw
Already in part, though hid in gloomy shade,
To sorrow stand on.—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 714.

Deep in a cavern dwells the dreary god,
Whose gloomy mansion nor the rising sun,
Nor setting visits, nor the lightsome moon.

Dryden, Fables.
The surface of the earth is clearer or gloomier,
Just as the sun is bright or more overcast.—Lyons, Letters.

2. Sullen; melancholy; cloudy of look; heavy of heart: (first element of a compound in the extract).

And you, ye hopeless gloomy-minded tribe,
You who, unconscious of those nobler flights
That reach impatient at immortal life,
Amidst the prime endearing privilege
Of being dare contend.

The moon, On Sir Isaac Newton.
Gloriable. adj. Capable of being boasted of, or gloried in. Rare.

John, of all we read, was the most confident of his own integrity, which indeed was rare and gloriable.—Pittam, Records, xvii. (Ord MS.)

Gloriation. s. Boast; triumph. Rare.

Suspicion, perverseness, despondency, triumph or gloriation.—Dr. H. More, Conjecturae Cabalisticæ, p. 211.

How were the Jews puffed up with that vain gloriation, that they were the sons of Abraham.—Bishop Hall, Remarks, p. 141.

Gloried. adj. Illustrious; honourable; decorated with glory; dignified with honours.

Old respect,
As I suppose, towards your once gloried friend,
My son, now captive, hath bath inform'd
Your younger feet, while mine cast back with age Came lagging after. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 338.

Glorification. s. Act of giving glory.

At opening your eyes, enter upon the day with thanksgiving for the preservation of you the last night, with the glorification of God for the works of the creation.—Jerry Taylor.

Glorify. v. a.

1. Procure honour or praise to anyone.

Two such silver currents, when they join,
Do glorify the banks that bound them in.

Justice is their virtue: that alone
Makes them sit sure, and glorifies the throne.
Daniel.

2. Pay honour or praise in worship.

God is glorified when such his excellency, above all things, is with due admiration acknowledged.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

3. Praise; honour; extol.

Whomsoever they find to be most licentious of life, desperate in all parts of disobedience and rebellious disposition, him they set up and glorify.—Spenser, Faerie of the State of Ireland.

No ray mist yet the elixir got,
But glorifies his pregnant pot,
If by the way to him befall,
Some odoriferous thing, or medicinal. Donne.

4. Exalt to glory in heaven; raise to celestial beatitude.

If God be glorified in him, God shall also glorify him in himself, and shall straightway glorify him.—John, xiii. 32.

When he justified them he also glorified.—Romans, viii. 30.

Glorious. adj.

1. Noble; illustrious; excellent.

Let them know that thou art Lord, the only God, and glorious above the whole world.—Daniel, iii. 22.

Let us remember we are 'tato's friends,
And set like men who claim that glorious title.
Addison, Cato.

2. Boastful; proud; haughty; ostentatious. Obsolete.

Glorious followers, who make themselves as trumpets of the commendation of those they follow, taint business for want of secrecy.—Bacon.

They that are glorious must needs be factious, for all bravery stands upon comparisons.—Id.

We have not Received into our bosom and our grace
A glorious lazy drone, grown fat with feeding
On others' toil, but an industrious bee.
Mansinger, Great Duke of Florence.

Gloriously. adv. In a glorious manner.

1. Nobly; splendidly; illustriously.

He hath triumphed gloriously.—Esther, vi. 1.
They inspire with those celestial flames, which shine so gloriously in their works.—Dryden, Translation of Dufresnoy's Art of Painting.

Great wits sometimes may gloriously offend,
And rise to faults true critics dare not mend.
Pope, Essay on Criticism.

2. Ostentatiously; boastingly. Obsolete.

I protest to you, sir, I speak it not gloriously, nor out of affection.—B. Jonson, Every Man out of his Humour.

Gloriousness. s. Attribute suggested by glorious.

The perfection of his [man's] sovereignty over the creatures, the gloriousness and beauty, and much of the beauty of his body.—Sir M. Hale, Originations of Mankind, 313. (Ord MS.)

Glorify. s. [Lat. gloria.]

1. Praise paid in adoration.

Glorify God in the highest.—Luke, ii. 14.

2. Glorious state.

Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterwards receive me into thy glory.—Psalms, lxxiii. 24.

Then enter into glory, and resume
His seat at God's right hand, exalted high

Milton, Paradise Lost, xli. 456.
It is hardly possible for you to bewitch and intrude God to make any one happy in the highest enjoyments of his glory to all eternity, and yet be troubled to see him enjoy the much smaller gifts of God, in this short and low state of human life.

Love.

3. Honour; praise; fame; renown; celebrity.

Think it no glory to swell in tyranny.—Sir P. Sidney.

And with that word and warning soon was light,
Each soldier longing for near coming glory.—Fairfax.

Israel's bright sceptre far less glory brings;
There have been fewer friends on earth than kings.
Cowley, Davids.

Your sex's glory 'tis to shine unknown;
Of all applause, be fonder of your own. Young.

4. Splendour; magnificence.

Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these.—Matthew, vi. 29.

Aristotle says, that should a man under ground converse with works of art, and be afterwards brought up into the open day, and see the several glories of the heaven and earth, he would pronounce them the works of God.—Addison, Spectator.

5. Lustre; brightness.

Now sleeping flocks on their soft fleeces lie;
The moon, serene in glory, mounts the sky.

Pope, Pastoral, Winter.
From opening skies may streaming glories shine,
And mix'd embrace those with a lowly mine.
Id., Eliza to Abclard.

6. Circle of rays which surrounds the heads of saints in pictures.

It is not a converting but a crowning grace, such an one as irradiates, and puts a circle of glory about the head of him upon whom it descends.—South, Sermons.

A smile plays with a surprising agreeableness in the eye, breaks out with the brightest distinction, and sits like a glory upon the countenance.—Collier, Of the Asper.

7. Pride; boastfulness; arrogance.

By the vain glory of men they entered into the world, and therefore shall they come shortly to an end.—Wisdom, xiv. 14.

On death-beds none in conscious glory lie, Since of the doctor in the mode they die. Young.

8. Generous pride.

The success of those wars was too notable to be unknown to your ears, to which all worthy fame hath glory to come unto.—Sir P. Sidney.

Glory. v. n. Boust in; be proud of.

With like judgement glorifying when he had happened to do a thing well, as when he had performed some notable mischief.—Sir P. Sidney.

Let them look they glory not in mischief, Nor build their evils on the graves of great men; For then my guiltless blood must cry against them. Shakspeare, Henry VIII. ii. 1.

For they were wont, in the pride of their own proceedings, to glory, that whereas Luther did but blow away the roof, and Zuinglius batter but the walls of popish superstition, the last and hardest work of all remained, which was to raze up the very ground and foundation of popery.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

If others may glory in their birth, why may not we, whose parents were called by God to attend on him at his altar?—Bishop Atterbury.

No one is out of the reach of misfortune; no one therefore should glory in his prosperity.—Richardson, Clarissa.

Glorifying. verbal abs. Boasting.

Your glorifying is not good. 1. Corinthians, v. 6.

Glosser. s. Glosser; commentator.

Sophisters, and doctors, and legends, and glossers.—Bishop of Winchester, Sermons, sign. C. v. 157.

Gloss. s. [from Norse glossa—brightness.]

Superficial lustre.

His iron coat all over grown with rust, Was underneath enveloped with gold, Whose glittering gloss darken'd with filthy dust. Spenser, Faerie Queene.

The doubt will be whether it will polish so well; for steel glosses are more resplendent than plates of brass.—Bacon.

Weeds that the wind did toss The virgins wore; the youths, woven coats, that cast a faint dim gloss, Like that of oil. Chapman, Translation of the Hebr.

It was the colour of devotion, giving a lustre to reverence, and a gloss to humility.—South, Sermons.

Groves, fields, and meadows, are at any season pleasant to look upon; but never so much as in the opening of the spring, when they are all new and fresh, with their first gloss upon them.—Addison, Spectator.

Gloss. s. [from Gr. γλῶσσα—tongue. See last extract.]

1. Scholium; comment.

They never hear sentence which mentioneth the word or scripture, but forthwith their glosses upon it are the word preached, the scripture explained, or delivered unto us in sermons.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

If thou all souls, both good and bad, do teach, With general laws, that souls can never die, 'Tis not man's flitting glass, but nature's speech, Which, like God's oracles, can never lie. Sir J. Davenant, Immortality of the Soul.

Indulgences, cov'nants, articles, they draw, Like as the birds themselves, and hawer far Than civil codes with all their glosses are. Pope, Satire of Donne.

The gloss which your sister or you have put upon it, does not strike me as correct.—Lamb, Letter to Burton.

A gloss, γλῶσσα, properly meant a word from a foreign language, or an obsolete or poetical word, or whatever requires explanation. It was afterwards used for the interpretation itself. . . . In the twelfth century it was extended from a single word to an entire expository sentence. The first glosses were interlinear; they were afterwards placed in the margin, and extended finally in some instances to a sort of running commentary on an entire book. These were called an apparatus. . . . About the same time [A.D. 1280] Accursius of Florence undertook his celebrated work, a collection of glosses, which in the century that had elapsed from the time of Irenaeus, had grown to an enormous extent, and were, of course, not always consistent. . . . Thus was compiled his Corpus Juris Civilis unum, commonly called Glossa or Glossa Ordinaria.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, §§ 69-70.

2. Interpretation artfully specious; specious representation. In some, perhaps in most cases, the exact origin is ambiguous; inasmuch as speciousness applies to glosses of both kinds.

Poor painters off with silly poets join.

To fill the world with straws but vain conceit:

One brims the stuff, the other stamps the coin,

Which breeds nought else but glosses of deceit. Sir P. Sidney.

It is no part of my secret meaning to draw you hereby into hatred, or to set upon the face of this cause any fairer gloss than the naked truth doth afford.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Gloss. v. n. With a disparaging sense, i.e. add as a gloss infringing on the import of the text, though, at the same time, explaining, or affecting to explain, it.

Of a beautiful countenance; or, had beautiful eyes; . . . as Conradus Pellicanus homo glossa.—Bishop Patrick, Paraphrase and Commentaries on the Old Testament, 1 Samuel, xvi. 12.

Her equals first observ'd her growing zeal, And laughing gloss'd, that Abra serv'd so well. Prior, Solomon.

Gloss. v. a.

1. Explain by comment.

In parliament then, large as his fields, he draws

Assurances, big as gloss'd civil laws. Boone, Poems, p. 124.

2. Palliate by specious exposition or representation.

Do I not reason wholly on your conduct?

You have the heart to gloss the foulest cause. A. Philips, Briton.

3. Embellish with superficial lustre.

But thou, who lately of the common strain, Wert one of us, if still thou dost retain The same ill habits, the same follies too, Gloss'd over only with a paintlike show,

Then I resume the freedom which I gave,

Still thou art bound to view, and still a slave. Dequien, Translation of Persius.

Glossarial. adj. Relating to, connected with, or consisting in, a glossary.

In the glossarial index of former editions, the reader has merely been presented with a long list of words, and references to the passages where they occur, often with very different meanings; and is thus called upon to read over many volumes, in order to form a glossary for himself. Boswell, Antiquarian to Edition of Shakspeare, (Rich.)

Glossarist. s.

1. One who writes a gloss or commentary.

The glossarist I take to be Philip de Berzennio, a prior at Padua, who wrote a most elaborate moralisation on Ota.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, ii. 169.

2. One who writes a dictionary of obscure or antiquated words.

Mr. J. Kersey . . . with laudable industry has collected almost all the old words, I believe, which are to be found either in Speight or Skinner, and has generally with much fidelity copied the interpretations assigned to them by those two glossarists.—Tyrrhill, Vindication of the Royley Controversy, p. 162.

Glossary. s. Dictionary of obscure or antiquated words.

According to Varro, when 'delubrum' was applied to a place, it signified such a one, 'in quo dei simulacrum dedicatum est,' and also in the old glossarium.—Bishop Millington.

I could add another word to the glossary.—Baker.

(For another example see extract under Glossarial.)

Glossator. s. Writer of glosses; commentator.

The Jewish doctors understood the text better than Gratian, or John Semeca his glossator.—Bishop Barlow, Sermons, p. 294.

The reason why the assertion of a single judge does not prove the existence of judicial acts, is because his office is to pronounce judgement, and not to become an evidence; but why may not the same be said of two judges? Therefore, in this respect the glossator's opinion must be false.—Agilto, Parergon Juris Canonici.

All this is related by Aldred, the Saxon glossator, at the end of St. John's Gospel.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, vol. i. diss. i.

Glosser. s. Scholiast; commentator.

Neither the glossers upon the Aleron, nor the most authentic legend of his life, take any notice thereof.—L. Addison, Life of Ashmole, p. 62.

'Interpretation,' says Savigny, 'was considered the first and most important object of glossers, as it was of oral instructors. . . . It may be reckoned a characteristic merit of many glossers that they keep the attention fixed on the immediate subject of explanation. . . . Nor did the glossers, by any means, slight the importance of laying a sound critical basis for interpretation; but, on the contrary, laboured earnestly in the revision and correction of the text. . . . Savigny defends his favourite glossers in the best manner he can; . . . but, without much acquaintance with the ancient glossers, one may presume to think that, in explaining the Pandects, . . . their deficiencies . . . must require a perpetual exercise of our lenity and patience. . . . The glossers became the sole authorities, so that it grew into a maxim, No one can go wrong who follows a gloss, and some add a gloss was worth a hundred texts.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, §§ 71, 72.

Glossiness. s. Attribute suggested by Glossy; smooth polish; superficial lustre.

Their surfaces had a smoothness and glossiness much surpassing whatever I had observed in marine or common salt.—Boyle.

Glossing. verbal abs. Dealing in glosses, comments, or interpretation.

In this the paradise, in description whereof so much glossing and deceiving eloquence hath been spent.—Hooker, Sermons.

Glossist. s. Writer of glosses. Rare.

It was raised by inconsiderate glossists from the mistake of this text.—Milton, Trichardian.

Glossographer. s. Scholiast; commentator.

The like whereto is found also in the canon law, and noted by the glossographer.—Haywood, Answer to Indemum, ch. 1.

Some [words] I believe may pass the ablest glossographer now living.—T. Houn, Ancient Tenants, pref.

Glossology. s. The most useful signification which could be given to this word, would be the details of the number, connexion, relations, and condition of the languages of the earth; in which case it might supplant the barbarous term Linguistic. If this is best expressed by Glossography, limited to the purely descriptive part, whilst glossology applies to the forces which change language (and the division is not too late to be made) rather than their formal relations, both words might be used. If so, the two would nearly be complementary to one another as equivalents to Comparative Philology; to which, as taken alone, glossology is the nearer approximation.

Dezobrie and others use the term glossology instead of 'terminology,' to avoid the blench of a word compounded of two parts taken from different languages. The convenience of treating the termination 'ology' (and a few other parts of compounds) as not restricted to Greek combinations, is so great, that I shall venture, in these cases, to disregard this philological scruple. Wherry, History of Scientific Ideas, vol. ii. p. 109, note: ed. 1848.

An conspicuous examples of this class, we may take geology, glossology, or comparative philology, and comparative archaeology.—Ibid. b. x. ch. i.

Glossy. adj.

1. Shining; smoothly polished.

There came towards us a person of place; he had on him a gown with wide sleeves, of a kind of water cambit, of an excellent azure colour, far more glossy than ours.—Baron.

The rest entire

Shone with a glossy scarf. Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 61.

His surcoat was a bearskin on his back;

2. Specious.

That Lord Chesterfield must have been mortified by the lofty contempt, and polite yet keen satire, with which Johnson exhibited him to himself in this letter, it is impossible to doubt. He, however, with that glossy duplicity which was his constant study, affected to be quite unconcerned.—Boswell, Life of Johnson.

GloTTis. s. [Gr. γλῶττις.] In Anatomy. Cleft or chink in the larynx, serving for the formation of the voice: (it is in the form of a little tongue).

The gloTTis, . . . reckoned among the cartilages before mentioned, . . . is the principal instrument of modulation.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 142.

In the second stage the tongue is carried still further backwards, and the larynx is drawn forwards under its roots, so that the epiglottis is pressed down over the rima glottidis.—Carpenter, Principles of Human Physiology.

The tongue of the parrot is more fleshy than in most birds. These structures, concomitant with the single glottis and pair of vocal folds in the lower or true larynx, relate to the glottis, so remarkable in these singular birds, of imitative human speech.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates, etc. 22.

Gloat, v. n. [from the root of gloat.] Look sullen.

She lurks in midst of all her den, and streaks from out a ghastly whirlpool all her necks. Where, gloating round her rock, to fish she falls. Chapman, Translation of the Odyssey.
That feast of love and heavenly-admitted friendship, the web of illud grace, became the subject of horror and gloating admiration, parented about like a dreadful idol.—Milton, Of Reformation in England, b. i.
Gloating with sullen spleen, the fury shook her clotted locks, and blindest with each look. Garth.

Gloat, v. a. Gaze; view attentively.
His majesty . . . knew full well . . . that whosoever attempted any thing for the publick, (especially if it pertained to religion, and to the opening and clearing of the Word of God,) the same setteth himself upon a stage to be gloated upon by every evil eye.—Translators of the Bible to the Reader, 1611.

Gloat, v. a. Angry glance; sullen look.
First came the poets of each land, and took their place in order, learned Virgil struck in for the first, Ben Jonson cast a gloat, And swore a mighty oath he'd pluck him out. Copie of a Letter, etc., 1611. (Nares by H. & W.)

Glove, s. [A.S. glofe; Norse, gluft.] Cover of the hands.
They flow about like chaff 't the wind; For hodie some left their masks behind, Some could not stay their gloves to find. Dryden.
White gloves were on his hands, and on his head A wreath of laurel. Dryden.

Glove, v. a. Cover as with a glove.
My limbs, Waken'd with grief, before now enured with grief, Are thrice themselves; hence, therefore, thou new crutch; A scaly maim'det now, with joints of steel, Must glove this hand. Shakespeare, Henry IV, Part II, l. 1.
The next he prays on is her palm, That alms'ner of transpiring balm; So soft, 'tis not but once renew'd, Tender as 'twere a jolly glove. Charlton.

Glover, s. One whose trade is to make or sell gloves.
Does he not wear a great round beard like a glover's paring knife?—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, l. 1.

Glow, v. n. [A.S. glowum.]
1. Be heated so as to shine without flame.
But silence silence husheth not my fire, But told it flames, and hidden it does glow, I will reveal what ye so much desire. Spenser, Faerie Queen.

His coolly eyes, That o'er the ties and mists of the war Have glow'd like pilot's stars, now bend, now turn Their office upon a new way. Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, l. 1.

2. Burn with vehement heat.
Nor would you find it easy to compose The melted steels, when from their nostrils flows The scorching fire that in their entrails glows. Addison, Translation from Ovid.

3. Feel a glow, or heat of body.
Did not his temples glow In the same sultry winds and scorching heats? Addison, Cato.

4. Exhibit a strong bright colour.
To whom the angel, with a smile that glow'd Celestial rays red, love's proper hue, Answer'd; let it suffice thee that thou know'st Us happy, and, without awe, no happiness. Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 618.
Glad in a gown that glows with Tyrian rays. Dryden.

From the mingled strength of shade and light, A new creation rises to my sight: Such heav'nly dyes from his aerial flow, So warm with life his blended colours glow, Alike the soft variety I'm lost. Addison.
Like th' ethereal glow'd the green expanse. Savage.

Here clearer stars glow round the frozen pole. Id.

5. Feel passion of mind, or activity of fancy.

GLOZ

For'd compliments and formal bows Will show thee just above necklet; The fire with which thy lover glows, Will settle into cold respect. Prior.

6. Rage or burn as a passion.
A fire which every windy passion blows; With pride it mounts, and with revenge it glows. Dryden.
When crept into need veins, Love slowly burns, and long remains; It glows, and with a sullen heat, Like fire in logs, it warms us long. Shadwell.

Glow, v. a. Suffuse with a glow; flush. Id.

On each side her blood pretty dimpled boys, like smiling Cupids, With divers colour'd fans, whose wind did seem To glow the delicate cheeks which they did cool. Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 2.

Glow, s. Heat or sign of heat: (often figuratively applied to the colour of health, passion, or enthusiasm).
The pale complexion of true love, And the red glow of scorn and proud disdain. Shakespeare, As you like it, iii. 4.

A waving glow his flowing body display, Blushing in bright diversities of day. Pope.
Such as suppose that the great stile might happily be blunted with the argument, that the simple, grave, and majestic dignity of Bolshole could unite with the glow and bustle of a Pauls, or Tintoret, are totally mistaken. Sir J. Rylands.

Glowbird, s. Glowworm. Obsolete.
Glowed and lye, une ver que reuit do myt.—Reliquie.
Ver on muscule l'insulte de nuit. A glow'd, a glow worm or light worm. Nomenclator, (Nares by H. & W.)

Glowing, part. adj. Having the character of that which glows.

Kunigund, wife to the emperor Henry II., to show her innocence, did take seven glow-up trees, one after another, in her bare hands, and had thereby no harm.—Halswell, Apophagy.
Did Simeon's zeal my glow-up breast inspire To weary tortures, and rejoice in fire. Prior.

Glowing, verbal abs. Act or condition of that which glows.

You strive in vain To hide your th'oughts from him who knew too well The inward glow-ings of a heart in love. Addison, Cato.

Glowingly, adv. In a glowing manner.
A little steep there may be to say him; he would grow too dark else; a small eclipse to shadow him; but out he must break glowingly again, and with a greater lustre.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Wit without Money.

Glowworm, s. Female insect so called, itself wingless, but which, by secreting a phosphoric light, enables the winged male to find it.

The honey bees steal from the humble bee, And for night-tapers crop their waxen thighs, And light them at the fiery glow-worm's eyes. Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, Night's Dream, iii. 1.
The glowworm shows the morn to be near, And 'gins to pale his intellectual fire. Id., Hamlet, l. 5.

A great light draweth a smaller that it cannot be seen; as the sun that of the glowworm.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The man who first upon the ground A glowworm spy'd, supposing he had found A moving diamond, a breathing stone, For life it beat, and like those jewels shone, He held it dear, till by the springing day Inform'd, he threw the worthless worm away. Waller.

Glow, v. n. [Gloss, in a disparaging sense.]

1. Flatter; wheedle; insinuate; fawn.
Man will hearken to his glazing lies, And easily transgress. Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 33.

So glow'd the tempter, and his prison turn'd: Into the heart of Eve his words made way. Id., l. 519.

2. Comment: (Gloss the commoner and better word).

Which Salique land the French unjustly glaze To be the realm of France. Shakespeare, Henry V, l. 2.

Now to plain dealing: lay these glazes by. Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 3.

2. Specious show; gloss. Obsolete.
Precious couches full off are shak'd with a fever. If then a bodily evil in a bodily glaze be not hidden, shall such morning dews be an ome to the heat of a love's first—Sir P. Sidney.

GLUI

{GLOTT
GLUIUM

Glözer, s. One who glazes.

Yet must I take so once and smooth, as (though I were a glözer.—Gammer Gurton's Needle: 1651.
I may not use the glözer's trade; I cannot say the glözer is white. But needs must call a spade a spade. Gifford, Poise of Gillflowers: 1840.

Glözing, part. adj. Flattering.

For he could well his glözing speeches frame. Spenser, Faerie Queen, iii. 4. 14.
A false glözing parasite would call his foolhardiness valour, and then he may go on boldly, because blindly, and by mistaking himself for a lion, come to perish like an ass. North, Sermon.

Now for a glözing speech.

For protestations, specious marks of friendship. A. Phillips.

Glözing, verbal abs. Specious representation.
Your woody *glözing*s and time-serving colludings with the state are but like watermen on the Thames, looking one way, rowing another way.—Bishop Montagu, Appeal to Caesar, p. 15.

Glözinum, s. [artificial formation from the Greek γλῆς sweet; the -um showing that it is the name of a metal; its commonest congener is glucina, i.e. the oxide of glucinum.] In Chemistry. Metal so called. Glözinum, the metallic base of the earth glucina, (was) discovered by Vauquelin in 1798, and (has been) hitherto only found in a few rare minerals. The metal, which is of a dark grey colour, was first obtained in 1828, by Wohler.—Becham and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Glue, s. [Fr. glu; Lat. glutin.]
Water, and all liquors, do lastly receive dry and more terrestrial bodies proportionally; and dry bodies, on the other side, drink in waters and liquors: so that, as it was well said by one of the ancients of earthly and watery substances, one is a glue to another.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The driest and most transparent glue is the best. —Morgan.
The flowers of grains, mixed with water, will make a sort of glue.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Glue, v. a.
1. Join by means of glue, or with anything of a gluey nature.

Whoso teacheth a fool is as one that glueth a potsherd together. Ecclesiasticus, xiii. 7.
The custom of crowning the Holy Virgin is so much in vogue among the Italians, that one often sees in their churches a little tinzel crown, or a circle of stars, glued to the canvass over the head of the figure. Addison, Travels in Italy.

2. Join as if by means of glue; unite.
The nobleness of your heart will glue the hearts of your people to you.—Archbishop Linds, Sermons, p. 225.

She curl'd a gown, that else had come; And pausing view'd the present in the tomb; Then to the heart ador'd devoutly glue'd Her lips, and raising it, her speech renew'd. Dryden.

The parts of all homogeneous hard bodies which fully touch one another stick together very strongly; and for explaining how this may be, some have invented hooked atoms, which is begging the question; and others tell us their bodies are glued together by rest; that is by an occult quality, or rather by nothing.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

I hear thee, view thee, gaze o'er all thy charms, And round thy phantom glue my clasping arms. Pope, Essay to Criticism.

Mrs. Tabitha did not fail to compliment him on his modesty, in waving the merit of his anecdote, that it was the less necessary to him, as he had such a considerable fund of his own. She now began to glue herself to his favour with the grossest adulation. She expatiated upon the antiquity and virtues of the Scottish nation, upon their valour, probity, learning, and politeness.—Smollett, Adventures of Humphrey Clinker.

Gluey, adj. Having the character of glue.
They being no natural stones hewn out of the rock, but artificially made of pure sand by some gluey and unctuous matter knit and incorporated together.—Halswell, Apophagy, p. 207.

It is called balsamick mixture, because it is a gluey synonymous matter.—Hartree, Discourse of Consumption.

With gluey wax some new foundations lay Of virgin curls. Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.
Whatever is the composition of the vapour, it it have but one quality of being very gluey or viscid, and it will mechanically solve all the phenomena of the grotto.—Addison.

A kind of pitch, which is described by authors as a very gluey thing.—Bishop Patrick, Psephisms and Commentaries on the Old Testament, Genesis, xi. 3.

Glühish, adj. Somewhat gluey. Rare; barbarous.

A cambium or glutish moisture.—Dr. H. More, Immortality of the Soul, b. ii. ch. xvi.

Glum. adj. Sullen; stubbornly grave.

Some when they hear a story, look glum, and cry, Well, what then?—Guardian.
And not only Athens alone, but so austere and glum a generation as those of Sparta.—Romer, On Tragedy, p. 3: 1078. (Nares by H. & W.)

'Did he not say, when he took lust on Saturday, and I was far gone, fuddled, that if he were justice of peace he would have in the stocks for a fopery? See how glum the old nippers look.'—Has he heard the news, think you, messmates?—Sala, The Ship-Chandler.

Glum. s. Sullenness of aspect; frown. Rare.

She looked haughty, and gave on me a glum;
There was among them no word then but mum.

Stetson, Poems, p. 41.

Glummish. adj. Somewhat glum.

But of the course was set, tyme wore away apace,
And Boreas' breath was blacke, and glummish chill
Which caused me to seek a warmer place,
Underneath a rocke, on the other side the hill.

Golden Mirror, 1580. (Nares by H. & W.)

Glummy. adj. Dark; dismal for want of light. Rare.

Such casual blasts may happen, as are meet to be feared, when the weather waxeth darke and glummy.
—Knight, Trial of Truth, fol. 27: 1580.

Glump. v. n. Show, by manner, sullenness; be sullen.

To glump is still used in familiar language for sitting sullen and out of humour.—Wedgewood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Glumpy. adj. Sullen.

He was glumpy enough when I called.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Glut. v. a. [Lat. glutiv = swallow; Gr. γλῦζω; Fr. engloutir.]

1. Swallow; devour.

Till cramm'd and gorg'd, rich burst
With suck'd and glutted offal.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 632.

2. Cloy; fill beyond sufficiency; sate; disgust.

The ambassador, making his oration, did so magnify the king and queen, as was enough to glut the hearers.—Bacon.

Nor hath the book of creation in the Scripture . . . given us any hint for such a resolution, that some should be born to riot, and others to furnish, some to be glutted, and others to starve. . . . some to reign in Paradise for ever, others to be thrown over the wall as out of the Adamic's store, to pine and freeze among thorns and briars.—Hammond, Sermons, xi.

3. Feast or delight even to satiety.

While by thee raised, I ruin all my foes,
Death laid, and with his carnage glut the grave.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 238.

His faithful heart, a bloody sacrifice,
Torn from his breast, to glut the tyrant's eyes.

Dryden.

A sylvan scene, which, rising by degrees,
Leads up the eye below, nor gluts the sight
With one full prospect; but invites by many,
To view at last the whole.

Id.

4. Overfill; load.

He attributes the ill success of either party to their glutting the market, and retelling too much of a bad commodity at once.—Arbuthnot, Art of Politics.

5. Saturate.

The menstruum, being already glutted, could not act powerfully enough to dissolve it.—Boyle.

Glut. s.

1. That which is gorged or swallowed.

Their devilish glut, chain'd thunderbolts, and hail
Of iron globes.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 388.

2. Plenty even to loathing and satiety.

Shall be deceiv'd his glut; and with us two
Be forc'd to satisfy his ravenous maw.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 980.

Let him but set the one in balance against the other, and he shall find himself miserably even in the very glut of his delights. Sir R. C. Calverley.

A glut of study and retirement in the first part of my life, cast me into this; and this will throw me again into study and retirement.—Pope, Letter to Swift.

3. More than enough; overmuch.

If you pour a glut of water upon a bottle, it receives little of it.—R. Johnson, Discoveries.

4. Anything that fills up a passage.

The water some suppose to pass from the bottom of the sea to the heads of springs, through certain subterranean conduits or channels, until they were by some glut, stop, or other means arrested in their passage.—Woodward.

Gluten. s. [Lat.] Glutinous matter of certain vegetables.

Gluten exists in many plants, and occasionally in other parts of vegetables; but it is a characteristic ingredient in wheat, which wheat flour its peculiar toughness and tenacity which particularly fits it for the manufacture of bread, and for viscid pastes such as macaroni and vermicelli. There is generally more gluten in the wheat of warm climates than of cold.—Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Glutinative. adj. Acting as glue.

The rosters of cambray brauzed and laid to in a manner of a plaster doth heal all fresh and greivous wounds; and are so glutinative, that it will solder or glue together meate that is chapt in pieces wetting in a pot, and make it in one lump.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 661. (Ord MS.)

Glutinous. adj. Gluey; viscous; tenacious.

The cause of all vivification is a gentle and proportionable heat, working upon a glutinous and yielding substance; for the heat doth bring forth spirit in that substance, and the substance being glutinous, produeth two effects: the one, that the spirit is detained, and cannot break forth, thither, that the matter, being gentle and yielding, is driven forwards by the motion of the spirits, after some swelling, into shape and members.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.
Next this marble venom'd seat,
Swar'd with gums of glutinous heat.

Milton, Comus, 202.

Nourishment too viscid and glutinous to be subdued by the vital force.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Glutinousness. s. Attribute suggested by glutinous; viscosity; tenacity.

There is a resistance in fluids, which may arise from their elasticity, glutinousness, and the friction of their parts.—Cheyne.

Glutton. s. One who indulges in excess of eating; one who gorges or stuffs himself with food; voracious person; (the glutton looks chiefly to the quantity, the epicure and gourmand to the quality, of the food).
The Chinese eat horse flesh at this day, and some gluttons have used to have eatlesh baked.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.
Through Mace's gutlet she runs down,
While the vile glutton dines alone;
And, void of modesty and thought,
She follows Libo's endless drought.

Prior, Alma, canto ii.

If a glutton was to say in excuse of his gluttony, that he only eats such things as it is lawful to eat, he would make as good an excuse for himself as the greedy, voracious, ambitious tradesman, that should say, he only deals in lawful business. True.

Gluttons in murder, wanton to destroy.

Granville.

2. Animal so called; Gulo; see also Wolverine.

The glutton had also been placed in the genus of bears by Linnaeus; but they approach more to the martins by their teeth, as well as by their entire constitution and character, resembling the bears only in their plantigrade character. . . . The most celebrated species is the glutton of the north. . . . As large as our lumber, with a beautiful fur of a deep maroon, with a dark sordid blot on the back, but sometimes of paler tinge. It inhabits the coldest countries of the north, is esteemed to be remarkably cruel, does not sleep during the winter, and contrives to master the largest animals by leaping downwards on them from a tree. Its voracity has been ridiculously exaggerated by some writers. . . . It is probable that the rat. . . . should be placed at the end of the gluttons and grisons. . . . The polecats approach the grisons and gluttons.—Translation of Cuvier's Regne Animal.

3. One never so satisfied as to be persuaded to leave off; applied to fightingmen who will take any amount of beating. Slang.

Glutton. v. a. Load; glut; overfill. Rare.

Then after all your fooling, fat, and wine,
Glutton'd at last, return at home to pine.

Loecler, Lucinda Pathoma, p. 81.

Gluttonise. v. n. Play the glutton; be luxurious.

And again, of reptile Slugs Salmagundi . . . the material demons do strangely gluttonise upon the nibbours and blood of mortals.—Halliwel, Melamprosa, p. 102: 1681.

Gluttonous. adj. Given to gluttony.

When they would smile and fawn upon his debts,
And take down the interest in their glutinous maws.

Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iii. 4.

The exceeding luxuriousness of this gluttonous age, wherein we press nature with over-richly burdens, and finding her strength defective, we take the work out of her hands, and commit it to the artificial help of strong waters.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Well observe
The rule of not too much, by temperance taught In what thou eat'st and drink'st; seeking from thence
Due nourishment, not gluttonous delight.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 330.

Gluttony. s. Excess of eating; luxury of the table.

Gluttony, a vice in a great fortune, a curse in a small.—Holiday.

Their sumptuous gluttonies and gorgeous feasts,
On citron tables or Atlantick stone.

Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 114.

Well may they fear some miserable end,
Whom gluttony and want at once attend.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

The inhabitants of cold moist countries are generally more fat than those of warm and dry; but the most common cause is too great a quantity of food, and too small a quantity of motion; in plain English, gluttony and laziness.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Gly. v. n. See extract.

[To Gly, tity, tity. To squirt. Glyre, glyere or glyey eye, limus, strabo. (Promptorium Parvulorum).]

'The elder sister [Leah] he forsoke,

For she glyed with the babe.

(Cursor Mundi in Halliwell.)

She had sore eyes. 'Such speech becometh a king no more than glaze eyes doth his face.' (Pierres Cabala in Nares.) Scotch, to glye, glye, to glye, to glye, to glye. 'There's a time to glye and a time to look even.' 'That was glyed,' it stands obliquely. North English, glye, glye, crooked; to glye, to look askant. (Jamieson.) Greek, γλῶσσο, slippery; γλῶσσο, to cast a side glance. Platt Deutsch, gliden, gliden, to slip or slide.—Wedgewood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Glycerine. s. [Gr. γλυκερός = sweet.] In Chemistry. See extract.

Little was known of the true nature of fats previous to the admirable researches of Chevreul, who showed them to be compounds of peculiar acids with a base termed glycerine, and that common soaps are the same acids combined with either soda or potassa. The three principal acids which thus occur are the stearic, the margaric, and the oleic acids; and the stearate, the margarate, and the oleate of glycerine are generally termed stearine, margarine, and choline. . . . This substance, glycerine, under the name of the sweet principle of oils, was discovered by Scheele, and more fully examined by Chevreul. Glycerine, when pure, is a thick unctuous substance, . . . sweet, unobtrusive, soluble in all proportions in water and alcohol, but is soluble neither.—Brande, Manual of Chemistry, pp. 129: 1875: 1878.

Glyptodon. s. [Gr. γλυπτός = carved + δόνη, -τόνη = tooth.] Gigantic fossil of a genus akin to that of the Armadillos so called.

The dermal bones which form the carapace of the Armadillo have the same reticulate-striate interior structure as the carpal, tarsal, or other bones of the endoskeleton not excavated by a medullary cavity. This is well demonstrated in the dermal bones of the great extinct glyptodon. Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

Glyptographic. adj. [Gr. γλυπτός = carved or engraved, either in the way of sculpture or engraving.] Describing the methods of engraving figures on precious stones.

A particularly valuable part of this introduction is the glyptographic bibliography.—British Critic, vol. x. Oct. 1797.

Glyptography. s. Description of the art of engraving upon gemms.

The general progenitors are followed by the author's introduction to glyptography, (l'étude des pierres gravées), in which he shows himself to be a person who has not derived his information merely from the descriptions given by others, and from books of prints, but from the actual contemplation of the originals themselves.—British Critic, vol. x. Oct. 1797.

Gnar. v. n. [German, knarren.] Growl; murmur; snarl.

He ran to rear his bristles strong,
And felly gnar, until day's enemy
Did him appear.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Gnarl. v. n. Knot, the knots being large, as those of a tree of distorted, or disordered, growth: (in the extract it stands incorrectly for gnar).

Thus is the shepherd beaten from thy side,
And wolves are gnarling who shall smite thee first.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II., iii. 1.

Gnarled. part. adj. Distorted in large woody knots.

Thou rather with thy sharp and sulph'rous bolt
Split'st the unweakenable and gnarled oak,
Than the soft myrtle.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 2.

Hard by a poplar shook always,
All silver-green with gnarled bark;
For leagues no other tree did mark
The level waste, the founding gray.

Wasson, Mariana.

Gnarly. adj. Gnarled.

But Tom saw that she was a very tall woman, as tall as her sister; but, instead of being gnarly, and horny, and scaly, and prickly, like her, she was a most nice, soft, fat, smooth, pusey, cuddly, delicious creature who ever nursed a baby. — Kingsley, The Water-babies.

Gnarring. part. adj. Growling; murmuring.

The gnarring porter durst not whine for doubt;
Still wore the furies while their sovereign spoke.

Poet.

Gnash. v. a. [Low German, knasschen.]

Strike together: clash.

Launch not with him, lest thou have sorrow with him,
And lest thou gnash thy teeth in the end. — Ere-chonchian, xxx. 10.

His great front teeth he still did grind,
And grimly gnash, threatening revenge in vain.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Gnash. v. n. Collide, or dash together, the teeth: (often a sign of rage, pain, or despair).

He shall gnash with his teeth, and twist away. — Psalms, cxli. 10.

They gnashed upon me with their teeth. Id., xxxv. 16.

They him laid
gnashing for mischief, and despite and shame,
To find himself not matchless.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 239.

Gnashing. verbal abs. Collision of the teeth in rage or pain.

Let her taste of most terrible punishments, sorrowful plagues, waylimes, and gnashing of teeth.
Rile, Discourse on the Revolution, pt. iii. 1250.
There shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. — Matthew, viii. 12.

Gnat. s. [A.S.] Small two-winged insect so called of the genus Culex.

Her whip of cricket's bone, the lash of film;
Her wasps, a small grey-coated gnat.

Ye blind guides, which strain at a gnat and swallow a camel. — Mt. Matthew, xxiii. 24.

Gnathological. s. Flattering, after the manner of Gnatho the parasite in one of Terence's plays.

To attend others bathing or anointing, to observe his hour, whether he goes early or late, is gnathological. — Translation of Plutarch's Morals, iii. 300. (Ord 318.)

Gnattling. s. Little gnat.

But if some man more lately than the rest,
Shall dare attack these gnattlings in their nest,
At once they rise with impudence of rage,
Whet their small stings and buzz about the stage.

Chapman, The Rival.

Gnat-snapper. s. Gnat-snapper.

The little gnat-snapper (worthy prince's boards),
And the green parrot, fainter of our words,
Wait on the phlegm, and admire her tunes,
And gaze themselves in her blew-colored plumes.

Sylvestre, Du Barbot. (Nares by H. and W.)

Gnat-snapper. s. Bird so called, probably the Italian becardine.

They deny that any bird is to be eaten whole, but only the gnat-snapper. — Hall's Will, Appendix.

Gnaw. v. a. past part. gnawed and gnawn.

[A.S. gnucan.] Wear anything down (as a squirrel wears a nut, or a dog a bone) with the teeth, chiefly the incisors: (gnawing differs from biting by taking a smaller hold of the object attacked, and from chewing by its rasping action). Applied to corrosive, and more figuratively still, to immaterial agents, such as envy, calumny, destruction, and the like.

Also, why gnaw you so your nether lip?
Some bloody passion shakes your very frame.

Gnawing with my teeth my bonds unloose,
I mind my freedom. — Id., Comedy of Errors, v. 1.
They gnawed their tongues for pain. — Revelation, xvi. 10.

A knowing fellow that would gnaw a man like to a vermin, with his hellish brain.
And many an honest soul, even quick had slain.

Chapman.

Like rotten fruit I fall, worn like a cloth,
Gnawed into rags by the devouring moth. — Southey.
He comely fell, and dying gnawed the ground.

Dryden.

An Oubite wretch (by headlong haste betrayed,
And falling down i' the rout) in prisoner made;
Whose flesh torn off by hunks, the ravenous foe
In morsels cut, to make it farther go,
His bones clean pick'd, his very bones they gnaw.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, sat. xv.
To you such scab'd harsh fruit is given, as raw
Young soldiers at their exercises gnaw.

Id., sat. v.

A lion, hampered in a net, called to a mouse to help him out of the snare: the mouse gnawed the threads to pieces, and set the lion at liberty. — Sir R. L. Estrange.

Gnaw. v. n. Practice gnawing.

I might well, like the Spanish gnaw upon the chain that ties me; but I should sooner war my teeth than procure liberty. — Sir P. Shallop.

See the hell of having a false woman: my bed shall be abused, my coffers ransacked, my reputation gnawed at. — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

I thought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks,
A thousand men that fishes gnaw'd upon.

Gnawer. s. One who, or that which, gnaws.

Plautus calls him [the backbiter] 'mucronarius,' a mouse (that is the gnawer, or eater up.) of one's good name. — Bishop Andrews, Lectures on the Decalogus, p. 507: ed. 1659.

Gnawing. part. adj. Having the character of that which gnaws.

The gnawing pain in the region of the stomach is much more obstinate. — Capitani, Dictionary of Practical Medicine, Dyspepsia.

Gneiss. s. [probably Polish; names like the old Polish metropolis (see Gnesna, in German, Gnesen) being common, and probably taken from the physical structure of the locality. This need not necessarily be gneiss, in strict mineralogical sense of the term, but some rock like it.] In Geology. See extract.

The word gneiss is of Saxon (i.e. not Anglo-Saxon, but Saxon of the present kingdom of Saxony) origin, and since the time of Werner it has been understood to apply to a crystalline compound of quartz, felspar, and mica, distinctly stratified and very widely distributed wherever granite occurs, but more especially abundant in Scotland and the Scandinavian range, and in Bohemia, Silesia, and the metalliferous mountains of Saxony. — Analyst, Geology, ch. xvi.

Gnoff. s. [?] Churl. Rare.

The clumsy gnoff, that toys and moyles,
And delueth in the downe,
If haply he a suttie be,
So sent for into towne.

Draut, Translation of Horace, sat. l. (Rich.)

Gnome. s. [?] Imaginary being in the Rosicrucian mythology, of a gloomy character, and connected with the earth rather than the air or fire.

The gnave pricks sinks downward to a gnome,
In search of mischief still on earth to roam.

Pop. Rape of the Lock.

The laughers came out, that the gnomes and sylphs, disguised like ravens, had shot him, as a punishment for revealing the secrets of the catalog; a crime not to be pardoned by these jealous spirits. — J. Walton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

According to Paracelsus, all things are alive, eat, drink, and excrete; even minerals and fluids. According to him and his school, besides material and immaterial beings, there are elementary spirits which hold an intermediate place, sylphs, nymphs, gnomes, salamanders, &c., by whose agency various processes of enchantment may be achieved, and things apparently supernatural explained. Thus this spiritualist scheme dealt with a world of its own by means of fanciful inventions and mystical visions, instead of making any step in the study of nature. — Worth, History of Scientific Ideas, ii. 175: ed. 1858.

Gnome. s. [from Gr. νόμος = opinion.] Sententious, or apophthegmatic, saying.

Gnoms [is] a saying pertaining to the manners and common practices of men, which delivered, by an apte brevity, what in this our life ought to be done or not done. — Præchan, Garden of Eloquence, sign. V. iii: 1577.

Gnomic. adj. Having the character of a gnome; sententious; apophthegmatic.

Solon is, in fact, the earliest known author who can properly be classed under the title of a gnomic poet. The term gnomic appears to have been originally invented, as it was exclusively employed, to denote a school of classic poetry, the object of which was to inculcate moral doctrines rather than express emotional emotions; to enforce maxims of worldly wisdom than more immediate bearings on objects of special interest to the author or his public. The characteristic, consequently, of the gnomic style was a sententious gravity, savouring often more of philosophy than poetry. It is true that by reference to this definition, portions of the works of various preceding poets, of Archilochus, for example, or Tyrtaeus, might rank as gnomic. There is, however, this distinction between the cases, that in the poems of those authors, the purely ethic or didactic element is not only comparatively limited, but altogether subordinate to the general scope and tendency of their muse; in Tyrtaeus, for instance, to martial and political enthusiasm; in Archilochus, to satire and sarcasm. The elegies of Solon, Xenophanes, Theognis, on the other hand, are, for the most part, essentially of the gnomic order, while all may be said to partake more or less of the same character. — W. Dyer, Critical History of the Language and Literature of ancient Greece, b. iii. ch. vi. § 7.

Gnomic. adj. [from gnome, νόμος.] Sententious; containing maxims or reflections.

Adding this excellent, gnomic, and canonlike conclusion. — Conf. r. c. at Hampton Court, p. 41: 1603.

Gnomic. adj. [from gnomon.] Having a gnomon: (gnomonic or gnomonic the more accurate forms).

He may have given him a dial furnished with a magnetic needle, rather than an ordinary gnomonic dial. — Boyle, Works, v. 427. (Rich.)

Gnomology. s. [Gr. νόμος = word, principle.] Collection of maxims and reflections.

Which art of powerful reclinable wisest men have also taught in their ethical precepts and gnomologies. — Milton, Trichordon.

Gnomon. s. [Gr. νόμος.] Hand or pin of a dial.

The gnomon of every dial is supposed to represent the axis of the world, and therefore the two ends or extremities thereof must directly answer to the north and south pole. — Id.

There were from great antiquity sun-dials, by the shadow of a style or gnomon, denoting the hours of the day. — Sir. T. Browne.

Gnomonic. adj. Connected with, relating to, or constituted by, a gnomon.

The gnomonic projection is also called the horolographic projection, because it is the foundation of dialling. — Chambers.

Suppose that a countryman, on a clear day, brought into the garden of some famous mathematician, should there see one of those curious gnomonic instruments that shew at once the place of the sun in the zodiac, his declination from the equator, the day of the month, and the length of the day, &c. — Boyle, Works, v. 388. (Rich.)

Gnomonics. s. Principles of dialling.

Man may enjoy the world above him, by applying to his wiser creatures that are, by vast removal, out of his reach: as the sun, by making it afford him the elevations of the pole, and the azimuths, sun-dials of all sorts enough to make up an art called gnomonics. — Boyle, Works, vi. 770. (Rich.)

Gnomonist. s. Dialler.

The sun enables the gnomonist to make accurate dials, to know exactly how the time passes. — Boyle, Works, vi. 118. (Rich.)

Gnu. s. In Zoology. See extract.

Although the gnu or gno, here considered as the type of the genus, was hitherto classed with the antelope, it appears that zoologists felt the necessity of moving it into one more nearly allied to the Bos. . . The word gnu is of Hottentot derivation; the Dutch colonists name it wilde-beest, or wild cattle, or ox. . . The kokona (Catoblepas taurina) is found in the latter country, but not in the same place with the gnu. . . The brindled gnu (Catoblepas Gorgon) is a third species, which, however, . . . may be a mere variety of the last. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

Among the more interesting species may be pointed out the water-buck and sable antelope; the oryx, which, when seen in profile, probably suggested the unicorn mentioned by the ancients; the blighbok, hartbeest, and man-nyle of South Africa; the large-eyed gazelle, so often referred to by eastern poets; the springbok, so called from its springing bounds, when the white fur of its back opens like a sheet; the gnu, which, at first seems a compound of horse, buffalo, and antelope; the man-nyle, with its curious cheek-purses; the wild antelope, with their short horns often concealed amongst a bush of hairs; the chickens of India, with its four horns. — Guide to the British Museum.

Go. v. s. (The preterite, at the present time, is wanting; its place being supplied by went, the preterite of wend = turn. In the earlier stages of the language it was yode. Past participial gone.) [The first point which commands notice in this anomalous verb is its abbreviated form. In German the infinitive is geh-en, in which the h represents an earlier g or k. The language which best shows this is the Danish, wherein gaæ is the present, gik the preterite, form. The close connection between g (or k) and its nasalized form -ng is well known; the German preterite of geh-en being gieng, or ging. By these preliminaries the identity of go and gung is made clear. The same, also, tell us that the word is as anomalous in other languages as in our own. In the old preterite the irregularity is double. (1) There is substitution of g for g, giving yode. (2) There is the combination of a preterite in -d, with a participle in -u; gode (= goed), gune (= goun) gun; the spelling with a final e being in both cases objectionable.]

Its chief meaning is best exhibited by contrasting it with Come. Both denote motion, or change of place. This may be considered (1) in respect to its direction, (2) in respect to its manner generally.

(1) In the way of direction, the motion denoted by come is to, or towards, the speaker, and involves what is called the terminus in quem. The motion denoted by go is from the speaker, and involves the notion of the terminus a quo. Contrast come hither with go thither.

* Stand not upon the order of your going,
But go at once. (Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.)
"Colchester oysters are put into pits; where the sea goth and cometh."—(Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.)

(2) In respect to the character of the movement denoted by go, we may safely say, that in the ordinary English of the present time, it has no special limitations, i.e. that, when used alone, it does not mean one kind of motion more than another. True, we say the bird flies, the hare runs, the fish swims (rather than goes) away; but this is because the character of their several modes of motion are well defined, and definitely named. We may also say that a man is going to France when he is sailing, or going to London when he is riding. In Danish, however, the latter expression would be inaccurate, since gaue implies the notion of being on foot, i.e. = walk. "Traces of a limitation of this kind are to be found in English."

* You know that love
Will creep in service where it cannot go.
(Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 2.)
"And must I go to him? Then must run to him; for thou hast staid so long that going will scarce serve the turn."—(Ibid., iii. 1.)

The same also appears in such expressions as 'he can neither stand nor go,' of which the meaning is 'move himself,' rather than 'be conveyed, away.' In 'Rise, let us be going' (Matthew, xxvi. 17),

the meaning may be either walking, or simply moving.

Lastly, go, like come, is thoroughly and preeminently a neuter or intransitive verb, the construction in such expressions as go that way, go an errand, being adverbial, just as truly as go is one. For this see Come. For combinations like go it, see It indefinite and postpositive.

Though these preliminaries carry us over a large space of ground, the details that still stand over are numerous, the headings in the previous editions amounting to more than fifty. In most of these, however, the word that determines the import is not so much the verb under notice as the word with which it is combined.

1. Applied to immaterial operations and objects.

We will not hearken to the king's words to go from our religion.—1 Maccabees, ii. 22.

Dare any of you, having a matter against another, go to law before the unjust, and not before the saints?—1 Corinthians, vi. 1.

They look upon men and matters with an evil eye; and are best pleased when things go backward, which is the worst property of a servant of a prince or state.—Bacon.

If I had unwarily too far engaged myself for the present publishing it, truly I should have kept it by me till I had once again gone over it.—Sir K. Digby, On the Soul, dedication.

Thus I have gone through the speculative consideration of the Divine Providence.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

I hope, by going over all these particulars, you may receive some tolerable satisfaction about this great subject.—South, Ser.

All goes to ruin, they themselves contrive
To rob the honey, and subvert the hive.

Depden, Translation of the Georgics.

If we go over the laws of Christianity, we shall find that, excepting a few particulars, they enjoy the same things, only they have made our duty more clear and certain.—Archbishop Tillotson, Sermons.

In their primary qualities we can go but a very little way.—Locke.

I go over some parts of this argument again, and enlarge a little more upon them.—Id.

They are not able all their life-time to reckon, or regularly go over any moderate series of numbers.—Id.

Landed men, by their providence and good husbandry, accommodating their expenses to their income, keep themselves from going backwards in the world.—Id.

Cato, we all go into your opinion. Addison.
Because this atheist goes mechanically to work, he will not offer to affirm that all the parts of the embryo could, according to his explication, be formed at a time.—Beattie.

2. Pass: (the two words, pass and go, being nearly convertible).

Because a fellow of my acquaintance set forth her pretence in verse, I will only repeat them, and spare my own tongue, since she goes for a woman.—Sir P. Sidney.

A kind imagination makes a bold man have vicious and enterprize in his air and motion; it stamps value upon his face, and tells the people he is to for so much.—Collier.

It has the greatest town in the island that goes under the name of Ano-Caprea, and is in several places covered with a very fruitful soil.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

(Clipping should be finally stopped, and the money which remains should go according to its true value.—Locke.

Sometimes run, or take a direction, is the nearer synonym.

Athenians, know
Against right reason all your counsels go;
is not fair, not profitable that,
Nor 't'other question proper for debate.

Dryden, Translation of Persius.

3. Be rated one with another; be considered with regard to greater or less worth.

I think, as the world goes, he was a good sort of man enough.—Arbuthnot.

4. Contribute; conduce; concur; be an ingredient.

The medicines which go to the ointments are so strong, that if they were used inwardly, they would kill those that use them.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

More parts of the greater wheels go to the making our part of their liars.—Glanville, Scopia Scintilla.

There goes a great many qualifications to the complementing this relation: there is no small share of honour and conscience and sufficiency required.—Collier.

I give the sex their revenge, by laying together the many various characters that prevail in the male world, and shewing the different ingredients that go to the making up of such different humours and constitutions.—Addison.

Something better and greater than high birth and quality must go towards acquiring those demonstrations of public esteem and love.—Swift, Letter to Pope.

Fall out or terminate; succeed.

Your strong possession much more than your right,
Or else it must go wrong with you and me.

Shakespeare, King John, i. 1.

Howe'er the business goes, you have made fault
I th' boldness of your speech.

Id., Winter's Tale, iii. 2.

I will send to thy father, and they shall declare unto him how things go with thee.—Job, x. 8.

In many armies, if the matter should be tried by duel between two champions, the victory shall go on the one side; and yet, if it be tried by the grom, it would go on the other side.—Bacon.

It has been the constant observation of all, that if a minister had a cause depending in the court, it was ten to one but it went against him.—South, Sermons.

At the time of the prince's landing, the father, easily foreseeing how things would go, went over, like many others, to the prince.—Norfolk.

Whether the cause goes for me or against me, you must pay me the reward.—Watts, Logic.

6. Be in any state: (with it).

It shall go ill with him that is left in his tailor's naile.—Job, xx. 24.

He called his name Beriah, because it went evil with his house.—1 Chronicles, vii. 23.

7. Proceed in train or consequence.

How goes the night, boy?

The moon is down: I have not heard the clock;
And she goes down at twelve.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.

I had hope,
When violence was enow'd, and war on earth,
All would have then gone well.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 779.

Duration in itself is to be considered as going on in one constant, equal, uniform course.—Locke.

8. Pass, or be loosed; not be retained.

Then he lets me go,
And, with his head over his shoulder turn'd
He seem'd to find his way without his eye.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 1.

Let go the hand of that arch heretic.

Id., King John, iii. 1.

9. Reach or be extended to any degree.

His amorous expressions go no farther than virtue may allow.—Dryden, Translation from Theophrastus, p. 4.

It is not one number that either directs or takes notice of these: it goes a great way barely to permit them.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

'Tis a rule that goes a great way in the government of a sober man's life, not to put anything to hazard that may be secured by industry, consideration, or circumspection.—Id.

Considering the cheapness, so much money might go farther than a sum ten times greater could do now.—Bishop Wilkins.

Whose flesh, torn off by lumps, the rav'nous fow
In morsels cut, to make it further go.

Id., Translation of Juvenal.

I had another reason to decline it, that ever uses to go far with me upon all new inventions or experiments; which is, that the best trial of them is by time, and observing whether they live or no.—Sir W. Temple.

Whichever appears against their prevailing vice goes for nothing, being either not applied, or passing for blind and slender.

"Can another man perceive that I am conscious of any thing, when I perceive it not myself? No man's knowledge here can go beyond his experience.—Locke.

10. Move by mechanism.

This pope is decrepit, and the bell goeth for him.—Idem.

Clocks will go as they are set; but man,
Irregular man's never constant, never certain.

Idem.

'Tis with our judgments as our watches: none
Go just alike, yet each believes his own.

Idem.

11. Advance.

Of living creatures some go a longer time in the womb, and some shorter: women go commonly nine months, the cow and the ewe about six months.—Bacon.

12. Fare, which not only is a near synonym, but is used as its equivalent in several provincial dialects: make shift, in which case the import is determined by the adjunct rather than the simple verb.

Every goldsmith, eager to engross to himself as much as he could, was content to pay high for it, rather than go without.—Locke.

'Tis they must have; but if they speak for this stuff, or that colour, they should be sure to go without it.—Id.

13. Pass away; depart; be lost: (such being the notion implied in the extract).

When our merchants have brought them, if our commodities will not be enough, our money must go to pay for them.—Locke.

Coinciding with away.

Turn not children going, till you have given them all the satisfaction they are capable of.—Locke.

Coinciding with about.

No extraordinary example, in so degenerate an age, deserves for the rarity, and, I was going to say, for the incredibility of it, the attention of all that knew him, and considered his worth.—Locke.

Used participially. Decline; tend towards death or ruin.

He is far gone, and, truly, in my youth,
I suffer'd much extremity for love.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 2.

Idiomatically with several words of allied meaning, halloo, halloo, &c. He in a state of compact or partnership.

As a lion was bestirring an ox that he had newly plucked down, a robber passing by cried out to him, 'Half share!' 'You should go your own way, says the lion, if you were not so forward to be your own carrier.—Sir R. L. Edrington.

There was a hunting match agreed upon betwixt a lion, an ox, and a fox, and they were to go equal shares in the booty.—Id.

Go about. Attempt, engage in, or employ one's self on, anything; set (i.e. set one's self) about is a nearly equivalent term. With business the combination often implies an ungracious command; go about your business, be sent about one's business, being phrases which are less connected with the notion of employment on anything that interests the person who receives, than that of departure from the presence of him who gives, the order.

O dear father,
It is thy business that I go about.

Some men, from a false persuasion that they can reform their lives, and root out their old vicious habits, never so much as attempt, endeavour, or go about it.—South, Sermon.

Either my book is plainly enough written to be rightly understood by those who peruse it with attention and indifference, or else I have writ mine so obscurely that it is in vain to go about to mend it.—Locke.

They never go about, as in former times, to hide or palliate their vices; but expose them freely to view.—Swift.

Go aside. Err; deviate from the right; go astray.

If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him.—Numbers, v. 12.

Go between. Interpose; mediate; act as a go-between.

I did go between them, as I said; but more than that, he loved her; for, indeed, he was mad for her.—Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, v. 2.

Go by.

a. Pass away. Johnson writes 'pass away unnoticed'; the notion, however, of unobservance seems to lie chiefly in the word let.

Do not you come your tardy son to chide,
That laps'd in time and passion, lets go by
Th' important acting of your dread command?—Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 4.

So much the more our career's evanescent,
Which lets go by some sixteen years, and makes her
As she liv'd now.—Id., Winter's Tale, v. 2.

What's that to us? The time goes by; away.—Id., Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

b. Be regulated.

In argument with men a woman ever
Goes by the worse, whatever be her wit.—Milton, Samson Agonistes, 903.

He's sure to go by the worse that contends with An adversary that is too mighty for him.—Sir R. L. Edrington.

'Tis not to be supposed, that by searching one can positively judge of the size and form of a stone; and indeed the frequency of the fits, and violence of the symptoms, are a better rule to go by.—Shuter, Surgery.

Go down. Generally applied to the credibility or incredibility of statements; take in, swallow, and other similar metaphors from the throat being equivalents.

Nothing so ridiculous, nothing so impossible, but it goes down whole with him for truth and earnest.—Sir R. L. Edrington.

Folly will not easily go down in its own natural form with discerning judges.—Dryden.

If he be hungry, bread will go down.—Locke.
Ministers are so wise to leave their proceedings to be accounted for by reasoners at a distance, who often mould them into the systems that do not only go down very well in the coffee-house, but are supplies for pamphlets in the present age.—Swift.

Go in and out. Be free of entry to any place; be at liberty.

He shall go in and out, and find pasture.—John, x. 9.

Go off.

a. Die; go out of life; decess.

I would the friends we miss were safe arriv'd:
Some must go off; and yet, by these I see,
So great a day as this is chiefly bought.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 7.

In this manner he sent off, not like a man that departed out of life, but one that returned to his abode.—Tatler.

b. Explode: (as guns, crackers, and other firearms and combustibles).

c. Succeed: (as 'The affair went off well,' 'badly,' or 'indifferently').

d. Run away; elope.

Go on.

a. Make attack: (the difference between this and the senses of the next heading depends upon the second on).

Bold Othello,
Whose valour I have turn'd into his poison,
And praised so to daring, as he would Go on upon the gods.—B. Jonson, Catiline's Conspiracy.

b. Proceed.

He found it a great way to keep that peace, but was fain to go on in his story.—Sir P. Sidney.
He that desires only that the work of God and religion shall go on, is pleased with it, whoever is the instrument.—Jeremy Taylor.

I have escaped many threats of ill fits by these notions; if they go on, the only positive I have dealt with is wool from the belly of a fat sheep.—Sir W. Temple.

Go on cheerfully in the glorious course you have undertaken.—Addison.

When we find that design impracticable, we should not have gone on in so expensive a management of it.—Swift.

Many clergymen write in so diminutive a manner, with such frequent blots and interlineations, that they are hardly able to go on without perpetual hesitations.—Id., extraordinary epistles.

I wish you health to go on with that noble work.—Bishop Berkeley.

Go over. Change sides; betake one's self to another party.

In the change of religion, men of ordinary understandings don't so much consider the principles as the practice of those to whom they go over.—Addison, Tracts in Italy.

Power, which, according to the old maxim, was used to follow, is now gone over to money.—Swift.

Go out.

a. Go upon any expedition.

You need not have prick'd me: there are other men fitter to go out than I.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iii. 2.

b. Be extinguished ('s a light).

Think'st thou the fiery fever will go out,
With titles blown from adulteration?
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 1.

Spirit of wine burned till it go out of itself, will burn no more.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The care of a state, or an army, ought to be as constant as the chymist's fire, to make any great production; and if it goes out for an hour, perhaps the whole operation fails.—Sir W. Temple.
My blood runs cold, my heart forgets to heave,
And life itself goes out at thy displeasure.—Addison, Cato.

And at her felt approach and sweet night,
Art after art goes out, and all is night.—Pope, Dunciad.

c. Proceed formally to an academical degree.

'Now heaven be praised, Sir, thy Thy all-devot'd young arrows and thy bow Thou hast plac'd so well about these woods, that now
Thou art gone out thy art-master.—Sir R. Edrington, Translation of Guarini's Pastor Fido, p. 146.

Go through.

a. Suffer; undergo.

I tell thee that it is absolutely necessary for the common good that thou shouldst go through this operation.—Arbuthnot.

b. Perform thoroughly; execute: (with with).

Finding Pyrochles every way able to go through with that kind of life, he was as desirous for his sake as for his own to enter into it.—Sir P. Sidney.

If you can as well go through with the statue here of that land, I will think you have not lost all your time here.—Spenser.

He much feared the earl of Arundel had not steadiness of mind enough to go through with such an undertaking.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

The amazing difficulty and greatness of his account will rather terrify than inform him, and keep him from setting heartily about such a task as he deserves ever to go through with it.—South, Sermons.

Go upon. Take as a principle.

This supposition I have gone upon through those papers.—Addison.

Go to: (imperative used as an interjection). Come, come, take the right course.

They said to one another, Go to, let us make brick, &c. And they said, Go to, let us build us a city and tower, whose top may reach unto heaven.—Genesis, xi. 3, 4.

One went in, and told his lord, saying, Thus and thus said the maid that is of the land of Israel. And the king of Syria said, Go to, go, and I will send a letter unto the king of Israel.—2 Kings, v. 4, 5.

Go to now, ye that say, To-day or to-morrow we will go into such a city, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain; whereas ye know not what shall be on the morrow.—James, iv. 13, 14.

Go to then, O thou far renowned son of great Apollo; show thy famous might in medicine.—Spenser.

Go to go to, then art a foolish fellow;
Let me be clear of thee.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iv. 1.

My favour is not to be dealt with words like these:
Go to; you'll teach your tongue another tale.

The extracts and explanation are those of the previous editions. At present the combination is rare; and as, perhaps, no living person has used it, except as an archaism, the exact sense of it, especially in respect to the metaphor involved in it, is uncer-tain. The editor thinks that, if he used it himself, it would be rather as an equivalent to the colloquial or slang term, shut up (as a door, or lid) — cease, leave off, rather than with anything suggested by a word as opposite as come, come.

Go-by. s. Slip; act of evasion.

Except an apprentice is instructed how to adulterate and varnish, and give you the go-by upon occasion, his master may be cheated with neglect.—Collier, Essay on Trade.

What will you give to have the quarters-free,
The squint and wadding go-by of his grace?
Oldham, Satire in Imitation of the Third of Juvenal.

Was it a matter of delicacy to which it was expedient for the time to give the go-by? Then Lord Palmerston gave it the go-by in the light and easy way in which men of the world dismiss questions which it is inconvenient to treat at length.—Saturday Review, February 10, 1865.

Goad. s. [A.S. gād; whence also Gad, with its several meanings; wand, staff, or rod being the primitive one.] Rod, stick, or prick for driving.

How can he get wisdom that holdeth the plough, and that cherisheth in the goad, that driveth oxen, and is occupied in their labours, and whose talk is of bullocks?—Ecclesiastes, xxxviii. 23.

On in his harden'd hand a goad he bears.—Pope.
Goad. e. a. Drive with, or as with, a goad; urge or stimulate excessively.

Most dangerous
Is that temptation, that doth goad us on
To sin in doing virtue.—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 2.

Goaded with most sharp occasions,
Which lay nice manners by, I had you to
The use of your own virtues.—Id., All's well that ends well, v. 1.

Of all that locates the various proverbs,
Stung with delight, I goaded on by them.—Dryden.
He was born with a sweet and generous temper; but he had been goaded and baited into savageness which was not natural to him, and which amazed and shocked those who knew him best.—Alcock, Critical and Historical Essays, The Earl of Chatham.

Goalsman. s. Driver with a goad.

What processions have we not seen? Corpus Christi and Legendre waiting in his gay; bones of Vulture with bullock-chariots and goads in Roman costume; bands of Chateaux-Vieux and Saint-Louis; Guyton funerals, Rousseau shroud-burners, and the baptism of Pétion-National-Like.—Chateaubriand, The French Revolution, pt. ii. b. v. ch. 21.

Goal. s. [Fr. gaulle + long pole set up to mark the bounds of the race.]

1. Landmark set up to bound a race; point marked out to which racers run.

As at the Olympian games, or Pythian fields,
Part went for their steeds, or shorn the goal
With rapid wheels.—Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 330.
And the slope sun his upward beam
Sheds against the dusky pole,
Facing toward the other goal.—Id., Comus, 18.

2. Starting post.
Hast thou beheld, when from the goal they start,
The youthful charioteers with heaving heart
Rush to the race?
Dryden, Translation of the Eclogues.

3. Final purpose; end to which a design tends.

GODD

Goddess. s. Female god.

Hear, nature, hear; dear goddess, hear.

ly vow was earthly, thou a heavenly love.

Id. Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 3.
I long have waited in the temple nich,
built to the gracious goddess Clemency;
but reverence to the power,
When the daughter of Jupiter presented herself among a crowd of goddesses, she was distinguished by her graceful stature and superior beauty.—Ad- dimus.

Goddessship. s. Rank, state, condition, or quality, of a goddess.

Appear'st thou not to Paris in this guise?
Or to more deeply blest Anchises? or,
In all thy perfect goddessship, when I see
Before thee thy own vanquish'd Lord of War?

Egmont, Child Harold, iv. 51.

Godfather. s. Sponsor at the font for baptism; male sponsor.

He had a son by her, and the king did him the honour as to stand godfather to his child.—Dacon,
History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Confirmation, a profitable usage of the church, transcribed from the apostles, consists in the child's undertaking in his own name the baptismal vow;
and, that he may more solemnly enter this obligation, bringing some godfather with him, not now,
as in baptism, as his procurator.—Hudnutt.

Godfather. v. n. Provide with a godfather; name. Rare.

Georgia has cost the nation very great sums of money; whereas the colonies which have had the fortune of not being godfathered by the board of trade, never cost the nation a shilling, except what has been properly spent in losing them.—Burke, On Economic Reform, ii. 240. (Ord MS.)

Godhead. s.

1. Godship; deity; divinity; divine nature; (it is used both of idols and of the true God).

The Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, is all one; the glory equal, the majesty co-eternal.—Book of Common Prayer, Ath- anasian Creed.

Be content;

Your low-laid son our godhead will uplift.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, v. 1.

At the holy mount of heaven's high-seated throne, the imperial throne of Godhead, fix'd for ever firm and sure,

The filial pow'r arriv'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 548.

So may thy godhead be confest,
So the returning year be blest.

Prior.

2. Deity in person; god or goddess.

Forasmuch then as we are the offspring of God, we ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and man's device.—Acts, vii. 29.

Adoring first the genius of the place,
The nymphs and native godheads yet unknown.

Druid's Translation of the Eneid.

Goddess. adj. Wanting, or destitute of, sense of duty to God; atheistical; wicked; irreligious; impious.

Of these two sorts of men, both goddesses, the one has utterly no knowledge of God, and the other studies how to persuade themselves that there is no such thing to be known.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

My lords, he made me say, that you may know
How much he scorns, and (as good princes ought) Defies base, indirect, and goddess treacheries.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Love's Comedy.

For faults not his, for guilt and crimes
Of goddess-men, and of rebellious times,
Him his ungrateful country sent,
Their best Camillus, into banishment.

Druid.

Goddessness. s. Attribute suggested by Godless; state of being wicked.

The sinner gives himself over to a wild and loose prophane; to a lawless course of goddessness.—
Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 87.

Godlike. adj. Like a divinity; (i.e. applied to objects that resemble a god — idol — would scarcely be called Godlike).

Musing and much revolving in his breast,
How best the mighty work he might begin
Of saviour to mankind, and which way first Publish his godlike office now mature.

That prince shall be so wise and godlike, as, by established laws of liberty, to secure protection and encouragement to the honest industry of mankind.
—Locke.

Godly. adv. Godly (adv.), of which it is the fuller and more truly adverbial form.

GODS

Enjoining them upon the severest penalties to live godly, holily, and righteously in this present world.—H. Wharton, Sermons, l. 114: 1697.

Godliness. s. Attribute suggested by Godly; piety towards God; general observation of the duties prescribed by religion.

Add to your faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, and to temperance patience, and to patience godliness, and to godliness brotherly kindness. 2 Peter, i. 3-7.

Virtue and godliness of life are required at the hands of the minister of God.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Godling. s. Little divinity; diminutive god. Contemptuous.

The puny godlings of inferior race,
Whose humble statues are content with brass.

Druid's Translation of Juvenal.

Godly. adj.

1. Pious towards God.

Grant, O most merciful Father, for his sake, that we may hereafter live a godly, righteous, and sober life.—Book of Common Prayer.

2. Good; righteous; religious.

Help, Lord, for the godly man ceaseth, for the faithful fail among the children of men.—Psalm, xl. 1.

Godly. adv. [See Godlily.] Piously; righteously.

The apostle St. Paul teacheth, that every one which will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Godmother. s. Female sponsor in baptism.

There shall be for every male child to be baptized two godfathers and one godmother; and for every female, two godmothers and one godfather.—Book of Common Prayer, rubric.

The duchess of Norfolk, godmother, bearing the child (the princess Elizabeth, richly habited in a mantle, the marchioness of Dorset, the other godmother, and ladies.—Shakespeare, King Henry VIII.
v. 4, stage direction.

Godsend. s. [The participial construction is what we expect, i.e. a benefit sent from God. The true origin, however, is the imperative, or precative combination, as in 'God send us relief, good gifts,' or the like.] Piece of luck.

He saw, unseen, the happy girl unfold the valentine, dance about, clasp her hands, as one after one the prettiest beauties unfolded themselves. She danced about, not with light love, or foolish expectations, for she had no lover; or, if she had, none she knew that could have created those bright images which delighted her. It was more like some fairy present:
a God-send, as our familiar pious ancestors termed a benefit received where the benefactor was unknown.—Lamb, Essays of Elia, Valentine's Day.

Godship. s. Rank or character of a god; deity; divinity.

Discoursing largely on this theme,
O'er hills and dales their godships came.

Prior.

Venus . . .

Trudg'd it away to Jove's high court,
And there his godship did entrust

Swift.

Godsmith. s.

1. Maker of gods (in the sense of idols).

Gods they had tried of every shape and size,
That goddesses could produce, or priests devise.

Druid's Translation of Achitophel.

2. Divine maker. As the maker of armour for a mortal, Vulcan was a God smith; as a deity was an armourer, he was a smith god. In each case the combination gives two words rather than a compound.

Æneas was actually wounded, in the twelfth of the Eneid, though he had the same god-smith to forge his arms as had Achilles.—Id., On the Eneid.
(Ord MS.)

Godson. s. Male godchild.

What, did my father's godson seek your life?

He whom my father nam'd? your Elder?

God-speed. [two words rather than a compound; the construction being that of the imperative mood, with a predicative sense; as in God-be-with you. For confusion with Good see Good-bye and Good-speed.]

God's-penny. s. [The s belonging to the possessive case of God, makes this two words in an ordinary construction. The accent, however, makes it a compound.] Earnest money; fastening penny.

GOGG

{GODDESS
{GODLILY

Come, strike me luck with earnest, and draw the writings.—There's a God's penny for thee.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Scornful Lady.

Goddward. adv. In the direction of God; (in the following extract the to is tautological; ward, in itself, being sufficient to indicate direction).

And such trust have we through Christ to God-ward.—2 Corinthians, iii. 4.

Goddwards. adj. Godward.

What the eye of a bat is to the sun, the same is all human understanding to Godwards.—Housell, Let- ters, ii. 11.

Goddwit. s. [?] Native grallatorial bird of the genus Limosa.

My foot-boy shall eat pheasants, calver'd salmon,
Knobs, humpys, y'birds, R. Junco, Alchemist,
Nor ortolans nor godwits crown'd his board.

Carley.

Goel. adj. [Danish, gule yellow.] Yellow. Rare.

In March at the furthest, dry season or wet,
Hep-cords so well chosen let skilful go set;
The goel'er and younger, the better I love;
Well gutted and jared, the better they prove.

Tanner, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Goer. s. One who, or that which, goes.

1. In the way of ordinary gait or movement.

The earl was so far from being a good dancer, that he was no graceful goer.—See H. W. W.

2. With special application to a horse, either in respect to action or pace.

Is the rough French horse brought to the door?
They say he is a lurch goer. I shall soon try his mettle.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Captain Revenge.

3. Foot. Rare.

A double mantle, cast
Athwart his shoulders, his faire goer's grace'd

With fitted shoes.—Chapman.

4. In the following extracts the specification of the import lies in the adverb; (compare the last two with Gabetween).

I would they were in Africa both together,
Myself by with a needle, that I might prick
The goer's back.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, i. 2.

Such a man

Might be a copy to these younger times;

Which, follow'd well, would now demonstrate them
But goer's backward.

Id., All's well that ends well, i. 2.

Let all pitiful goer-betweens be called to the world's end after my name, call them all Pandars.—Id.,

Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

Nothing could hurt either of us so much as the intervening officious impertinence of those goers between us, who in England pretend to intimacies with you, and in Ireland to intimacies with me.—
Pope, Letter to Swift.

Goety. s. [Gr. γοητρία = enchantment, magic, sleight of hand.] Magic. Rare; accentuation unascertained.

Porphyry and some others did distinguish these two sorts, so as to condemn indeed the grosser, which they call'd magic or goety.—Hudnutt, Me-
temorology, p. 51: 1681.

Goiz. s. [?] In Husbandry. Mow, or cock. Rare.

He was in his labour stacking up a goiz of corn.—
For, cited by Wood, Athol's Outhouse, i. 32.

Gog. s. [?] Haste; desire to go.

You have put me into such a gog of going, I would not stay for all the world.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Without Money.

Goggle. v. n. [?] Stare in a goggling manner; strain or roll the eyes.

Infant'd all over with discease,
To be seen by her in such a place,
Which made him hang his head and scowl,
And wink and goggle like an owl.

Rutter, Hudibras.

Smallbones . . . sprang up the ladder with one bound, his hair flying in every direction, his eyes goggling, and his mouth wide open; biting his hands over his head, and pausing as if for breath, he had exclaimed with a solemn, sepulchral voice, 'By all the devils in hell, he's come again!'—Margaret,
North's gog, vol. ii. ch. ii.

Goggle. v. a. Give a goggling character to an eye or the expression of a face.

Goggle. s.

1. Stare; bold or strained look.

Others will have such a divided face between a devout goggle and an inviting glance, that the in-natural mixture will make the best look to be at that time ridiculous.—Lord Halifax.

2. In the plural only, both blinds for horses that are apt to take fright and glasses worn by persons to defend the eyes from dust or the heat of the sun; sometimes applied, ludicrously, to spectacles.

3. In the plural. Goggle-eyed person; stupid starrer.

Do ye stare goggles? I hope to make winter boots of thy hide yet.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Knight of Malta.

Goggle. adj. Staring; having full eyes.

Frowning he enters . . .
And louting on me with the goggle eye.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 427.

Given him admonition to forsake his sawcy glavering grace, and his goggle eye.—B. Jonson, Poetaster.
That rolls one goggle eye in its vast brow,
Like a grin Cyclop.

Sir E. Panhaze, Translation of Guarini's Pastor Fido, p. 113.

Goggle-eyed. adj. Having eyes ready to start, as it were, out of the head.

They are deformed, unnatural, or lame; and very unseemly to look upon, except to men that be goggle-eyed themselves.—Archam, Schoolmaster.

Every lover admires his mistress, though she be very deformed, . . . bald, goggle-eyed, black-eyed, or with staring eyes, heavy, dull, hollow-eyed, black or yellow about the eyes, or squint-eyed.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 324.

Goggled. part. adj. Prominent; staring.

Fely faced, with long black hair, goggled eyes, wide-mouthed.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Traveled into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 64.

Goggling. part. adj. Goggle.

A huge gaunt stiffe and starke,
All fouls of limbe and leere,
Two goggling eyes like fire.

Bishop Percy, Reliques of Ancient Poetry, Sir Gualter.

Such sight have they that see with goggling eyes.
Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, b. ii.
Nor sighs, nor groans, nor goggling eyes did want.
Dryden.

Göing. verbal abs.

1. Act of walking.

When nobles are their tailors' tutors,
No hereticks burnt, but wenches suitors,
Then comes the time, who lives to see't,
That going shall be us'd with feet.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 2.

2. Departure.

Thy going is not lonely; with thee goes
Thy husband; him to follow thou art bound.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 290.

3. Pace.

The next day I pursued my journey, rattled through Chertonia . . . reached Gloucester by half-past three, and found myself housed at the Angel at Abernenny a little before nine, having done ninety-three miles in eleven hours and a half, which, in these parts, I call a good pace.
Theodore Hook, Gills et Gurney, vol. ii. ch. ii.

4. Preceding; series of conduct: (plural with on, as goings-on).

His eyes are upon the ways of man, and he seeth all his goings.—Job, xxxiv. 21.

5. Pregnancy.

The time of death has a far greater latitude than that of our birth; most women coming, according to their reckoning, within the compass of a fortnight; that is, the twentieth part of their going.—Greer, Common-place Society.

Götre. s. [Fr.] Wen in the neck; hypertrophied form of the thyroid gland; swelling under the neck.

Most of them [the batmans] have a götre, or swelling, under the throat.—Translation of Currier's Règne Animal.

Gold. s. [A.S.]

1. Metal so called.

Gold hath three natures: greatness of weight, closeness of parts, fixation, pliancy or softness, manumity from rust, and the colour or tincture of yellow.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Money.

The old man's god, his gold, has won upon her.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Little Thief.

3. Flower. Goldilocks.

The crimson damask flower, the blue-bottle, and gold, which, though extem'd but weeks, yet for their dainty hours
And for their scant not ill, they for this purpose use.
Dryden, Poliphilus, song 13.

Goldbeater. s. [beater, perhaps, is from the German arbeits=labour, work, as much as from the English beat.] One who prepares gold for gilding and similar applications by reducing it to a foil or leaf.

Our goldbeaters . . . scruple not to employ colored gold; and that the mint-masters are wont to alloy with copper or silver, to make the coin more stiff, and less subject to be wasted by attrition.—Dryden.

Goldbeater's skin [is] the intestinum rectum of an ox, which goldbeaters lay between the leaves of their metal while they beat it, whereby the membrane is reduced thin, and made fit to apply to cuts or small fresh wounds, as is now the common practice.—Quincy.

When your gillyflowers blow, if they break the pot, open it with a penknife at each division, as low as the flower has burst it, and bind it about with a narrow slip of goldbeater's skin, which moisten with your tongue, and it will stick together.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Golden. adj.

1. Made of gold.

The golden lance that Nebuchadnezzar the king bath set up.—Booth, iii. 5.

2. Shining; bright; splendid; resplendent.

A kiss the golden sun gives not.
To these fresh morning drops upon the rose:
As thy eye-beams, when their fresh rays have smote
The night of dew that on my cheeks down flows.
Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, iv. 3. verses.

To her hand yoke you must bow after bow.
However she shines all golden to you now.—Dryden.

And see the guardian anrels of the east,
Reclining soft on many a golden cloud.—Rome.

3. Yellow; of the colour of gold.

Gold a russeting lath a gold-coloured coat under a russet hair, and its flesh of a yellow colour.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

4. Excellent; valuable.

I have bought
Golden opinions from all sorts of people,
Which would be worn now in their newest gloss,
Not cast aside so soon.—Shakespeare, Much Ado, i. 7.
That verse which they commonly call golden, has two substantives and two adjectives, with a verb betwixt them to keep the peace.—Dryden.
Thence arises that golden rule, of dealing with others as we would have others deal with us.—Watts, Logic.

5. Happy; resembling the age of gold.

Many young gentlemen flock to him every day, and feed the time carelessly, as they did in the golden world.—Shakespeare, As you like it, i. 1.

Golden number. Number which shows the year of the moon's cycle.

This was invented, long before our Saviour's nativity, by Meton the Athenian, from whence it was styled the Metonic cycle: till afterwards it changed its name, being either from its great usefulness in ascertaining the moon's age, or else from its being written in letters of gold, called the golden number: though sometimes, for the first of these reasons, it is called the cycle of the moon.—Whately, Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer.

Golden-eye. s. Duck so called; Anas clangula (whence the epithet in the extract).

Here dull and hopeless he'd lie down and trace
How sibbony crabs had serv'd their crooked race;
Or sadly listen to the tune!

Of fishing gull or changing golden-eye;
What tune the sea-birds to the marsh would come,
And the loud bittern, from its bulrush home,
Gave from the salt-ditch side the hollow hoan.
Croft, The Baronage.

Goldenly. adv. In a golden manner.

My brother Jacques he keeps at school, and report speaks goldenly of his profit.—Shakespeare, As you like it, i. 1.

Goldfinch. s. Native songbird so called (Fringilla Carduelis).

Of singing birds they have linnets, goldfinches, rubrocks, Canary-birds, blackbirds, thrushes, and divers of others.—Croft.

A goldfinch there I saw, with gaudy pride
Of painted plumes, that hopp'd from side to side.
Dryden.

Goldfinder. s. One who finds gold: (often used figuratively, and applied to nightmen, privies being also called goldmines).

As our gold-finders, they have the honour in the night and darkness to thrive in stench and excrement.—Pelham, Reasoner. (Ord. M.).

With the accent on the second syllable.

His empty paunch that he might fill,
He suck'd his vitals thro' a quill,
Untouch'd it pass'd between his grinders,
Or't had been happy for goldfinder.—Swift.

Goldfish. s. Golden-coloured fish, akin to the carp, so called (Cyprinus auratus).

I have examined the development of the opercular bone in young gold-fish and carp, and I find that it is effected in precisely the same manner as that of the frontal and parietal bones.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

Goldfoil. s. Foil of gold.

Of the same earth or stone he maketh sack cloth, royes, and leaves of goldfoil, as no man would dream to have come of so gross a matter.—Tract, new of Christian Religion, 13d. (Ord. M.).

Goldilocks. s. Native plant so called, commonly identified with the Ranunculus acris (aurum=gold + coma=hair), but more probably a translation of Chrysocoma (χρυσός=gold + κόμη=hair); and, if so, more appropriate to the Chrysocoma Linsyria.

Fair ox-eye, goldilocks, and columbine.—R. Jonson.

Goldproof. adj. Proof against the influence, or able to resist the temptation, of gold.

This is most strange: Art thou goldproof?
Thine's for them.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Maid's Tragedy.

Goldsmith. s. Worker in gold; dealer in articles made of gold; before the establishment of banks the word was nearly synonymous with dealer in money.

Neither chain nor goldsmith came to me,
Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

They [bankers] were a tribe that had risen and grown up in Cromwell's time, and never were heard of before the late troubles, till when the whole trade of money had passed through the hands of the scrivener: they were for the most part goldsmiths, men known to be so rich, and of so good reputation, that all the money of the kingdom would be trusted or deposited in their hands.—Lord Clarendon, Life, iii. 597.

The goldsmith or scrivener, who takes all your fortune to dispose of, when he has beforehand resolved to break the following day, does surely deserve the gallows.—Swift.

Borrowed 500l. of a goldsmith upon my ticket.—Spectator, no. 14.

Gold. s. [German direct, halbe; Swedish, kulf=club.] At present, Scotch (rather than English) game so called.

Gold was a fashionable game among the nobility at the commencement of the seventeenth century, and it was one of the exercises with which prince Henry, eldest son to James the first, occasionally amused himself.—Strutt, Sports and Pastimes of the People of England.

Gold and foot-ball appear to have been prohibited in Scotland by king James the second in 1457.—Brown, Observations on popular Antiquities.

In one of the caricatures of this period, Lord Sandwich is represented with a bat in his hand: in allusion we are told to his fondness for cricket; but it is a curved piece of wood, much more resembling that with which golf is played. And the same peculiarly-shaped instrument is put into the hand of a cricket-loving lady in a print of 1778 (Miss Vickie and Miss Trigger). What is the date of the last used.
Electric Review, January, 1860, p. 232.

Goll. s. [?] Hand; paw; claw. Obsol.

They set hands, and Moses put her golden goll among them; and blind fortune, that saw not the colour of them, gave her the pre-eminence.—Sir P. Sidney.

• Make 'em hold up their spread golls.—B. Jonson, Poetaster.

Wish her
To wash her hands in bran or flour;
And do you, in like manner, wear
Your dirty goll.—Colton, Virgil Translated, b. iv.

Golrós. adj. [Gaelic, go leoir; the ordinary spelling with -a (galore) being exceptional.] Enough. Slang.

Golshoes. s. [?] Overshoes.

I can assure you that the dirt of our streets is not quite over his shoes, so that he can walk dry. If he would wear golshoes, as I do, he would have no cause of complaint.—Meridian, To Mrs. Walsingham, Sept. xix. 227. (Ord. M.).

To all this must be added, the vast skill that is required in tendering a visit with approved and modish accuracy; that it be done punctually . . . that the golshoes be left in their true and proper place . . . that the footboy be expert in observing his tutored distance!—Richard, Grandeur and Rummage of the Contempt of the Clergy inquired into, p. 124.

Gom. s. [A.S. guma.] Person. Obsol.

Say you, sir?
I'll try your ladyship, faith. Lady, well met.—
I do not think so, sir.—A scornful groom. The Widow.

Gondola. s. [Italian.] Venetian barge.

He saw did swim
Along the shore, as swift as glances of eye,
A little puntling, bedecked trim
With boughs and arbours woven cunningly.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

In a gondola were seen together Lorenzo and his amorous Jessica.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 8.

As with gondolas and men, his Good excellences, the duke of Venice,
Wills out, and gives the gulph a ring.
Prior.
Died over was a gondola for four
You should not, I'll describe it you exactly;
'Tis a long covered boat that's common here,
Carved at the prow, built lightly, but compactly.
Row'd by two rowers, each call'd 'gondolier.'
It glides along the water looking blackly,
Just like a coffin clapt in a canoe,
Where none can make out what you say or do.

Hymn, Beppo, 10.

Gondolier, s. Rower of a gondola.

Your fair daughter,
Transported with no worse nor better guard,
But with a knave of hire, a gondolier,
To the gross cluys of a lascivious Moor.
Shakespeare, Othello, I. 1.
In Venice Tasso's echoes are no more,
And silent rows the soulless gondolier.
Hymn, Childs Harold, iv. 3.
Then rest thee here, my gondolier,
Hush! hush! for up I go,
To climb you light balcony's height
While thou keep'st watch below.
O did we take for heaven above
But half the pains that we Take night and day for woman's love.
What angels we should be! Mumse, National Air.

Gonfalon, s. [Italian, gonfalone.] Ensign: standard.

Ten thousand thousand emigens high advanc'd,
Standards and gonfalons, 'twixt wind and rear,
Stream in the air. Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 588.

Gonfalonier, s. Chief standard-bearer.

Had she not [Florence] her private councils des-tining, her great council resolving, and her manifesting? Was not the rotation, too, provided for by the annual election of her gonfalonier?
Bishop Wren, Monarchy, (Lancelot, ch. x.) 1650.

Gong, s. [?] Draught; privacy; jakes.

And all this persecution was for Arrino, which died at Constantinople full shamefully. For as he went to church, with his clients and much pride, there fell upon him an appetite for to go to a sewer;
and with his isew went all the gutters out of his womb down into the gong. Cyprian, Chr. of England, anno 322.

Gong, s. [from the Chinese.] Metal tam- bourine so called.

The Chinese believe that during eclipses of the sun and moon these celestial bodies are attacked by a great serpent, to drive away which they strike their gongs or brass drums. Dance, Illustrations of Shakspeare, p. 29.

Cymbals, gongs, and the tautum of the Chinese are made with an alloy of one hundred of copper and about twenty-five of tin. Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Goniometer, s. [Gr. gonia = ang., per -measure.] Instrument for measuring the angles of crystals.

The goniometer is indispensable to the mineralists. Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Gonorrhea, s. [Gr. gonor = semen, rho = flow.] In Medicine. Clap.

Ruddy mummy or stone mummy grows on the top of hissing rocks; they powder and boil it in milk and then give it to stop gonorrhoeas. Woodward.

Good, adj. [A.S.] (has neither Comparative nor Superlative degree; better and best being from a wholly different root.)

1. Deserving of approbation generally: (op- posed to bad).

God saw every thing that he had made, and beheld it was very good. Genesis, i. 31.
A universe of death! which God by curse
Created evil; for evil only good.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 623.

2. Proper; fit for, adapted or conducive to, any particular object, the substantive to which it applies being a means to an end: (common in construction with verbs and verbal abstracts, as good to work with, good to eat, good for cutting).

Amongst a man's peers a man shall be sure of familiarity, and therefore it is good a little to keep state: amongst a man's inferiors one shall be sure of reverence, and therefore it is good a little to be familiar. Bacon.

If you think good, give Martin leave. Id.
The water of Nilus is sweeter than other waters in taste, and it is excellent good for the stone and hypochondrick melancholy. Id., Natural and Ex- perimental History.

Of herbs and plants some are good to eat raw; as lettuce, endive, and purslane. Id.
It was a good time to comply with the importunity of the gentlemen of Essex. Lord Clarendon, His- tory of the Grand Rebellion.

A man first builds a country seat,
Then fluds the walls and good to eat. Prior.
We discipline betimes these other creatures we would make useful and good for somewhat. Locke.
Good, gentle friend, how went the day?—
that I am called at trumpet's sound,
And good when goblets dance the round,
Though gentle never was joined till now
With rugged Bertram's breast and brow.
Nor W. Scott, Robby, i. 12-13.

3. Sound; not false; not fallacious; valid.

He is resolved now to show how slight the propositions were which Luther let go for good. Bishop Atterbury.

4. Unimpaired; undamaged.

He also bartered away plenty, that would have rotted in a week, for ricks, that would last good for his eating a whole year. Locke.

5. Adequate; considerable.

The plant having a great stalk and top, doth prey upon the grass a good way about, by drawing the juice of the earth from it. Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

A good while ago that made choice that the Gentles by my mouth should hear the word. Acts.

We may suppose a great many deers of little-ness and lightness in these crinths per many of them might flut in the air. A while like exclamations before they fell down. T. Bucer,
Theory of the Earth.

They held a good share of civil and military employments during the whole time of the usurpation.
Swift.

6. Having adequate commercial means; able to fulfil engagements.

Antonio is a good man ... my meaning, in saying that he is a good man, is to have you understand me that he is sufficient. Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

I'm call'd for now in haste by master Meercraft,
To trust master Fitz-batted, a good man:
I have enquir'd him; eighteen hundred a year.
H. Johnson, Devil in an Ass.

7. Kind; favourable; loving; well disposed; polite: (as in 'You are very good;' with which 'very kind' is almost convertible).

But the men were very good unto us, and we were not hurt. Samuel, xiv. 15.
Truly good is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart. Psalm, lxxviii.

8. To be relied or depended upon for any special purpose.

I could not make out why my charming widow had asked him, I now found out he was a
... and these three sang and nothing more popular in those times: Moore's 'O Lady fair'
Theodore Hook, Gilted Gipsy, vol. ii. ch. iv.

9. Epletic, or with a power of adding strength to the noun which it precede.

Love no man in good earnest, nor no further in sport neither, than with safety of a pure bush thou may'st in honour come off again. Shakspeare, As you like it, i. 2.

10. Ludicrous.

As for all other good women that love to do but little work, how handsome it is to loose themselves in the sunshine, they that have been but a while
State of Ireland.

Why look where he comes; and my good man too; he's as far from jealousy as I am from giving him cause. Shakspeare, Merry Wives of Windsor,
ii. 1.

She had left the good man at home, and brought away her gallant. Addison, Spectator.

With as both before and after. Equivalent to; no worse than.

Therefore sprang there even of one, and him as good as dead, so many as the stars of the sky in multitude. Hebrews, xi. 12.

He sharply reproved them as men of no courage, which, being many times as good as in possession of the victory, had most cowardly turned their backs upon their enemies. Katharine, History of the Turks.
The master will be as good as his word, for his own business. Sir R. L. Edgemoor.
If they had held their royalties by that title, either they must have been but one sovereign over them all, or else every father of a family had been as good a prince, and had as good a claim to royalty as these.
Locke.

With make.

a. Give validity to anything; establish;
maintain.

There died upon the place all the chieftains, all making good the light without any ground given. Bacon,
History of the Reign of Henry VII.

I farther will maintain
Upon his bad life to make all this good.

To make good this explication of the article, it will be necessary to prove that the church, which our Saviour founded and the apostles gathered, was to receive a constant and perpetual accession. Bishop

Payson, Exposition of the Creed.
These propositions I shall endeavour to make good.
Bishop Smalridge.

While she so far extends her grace,
She makes a but good the promise of her face. Wall. r.

b. Supply.

Every distinct being has somewhat peculiar to itself, to make good in one circumstance what it wants in another. Sir R. L. Edgemoor.
He without fear a dangerous war pursues;
As he our made him first the danger choose,
So still he makes it good as virtue's score. Dryden.

With smooth. Really; serious-ly.

What, must I hold a candle to my shame?
They in themselves, good smooth, are too too light.
Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 6.

With time.

a. Not too fast.

In good time, replies another, you have heard them dispute against a vacuum in the schools. Col- lier, On Human Reason.

b. Opportunely.

Eye, what a Sag is Hastings, that he comes not
To tell us whether they will come or no. —
And in good time here comes the swarting lord.

Good, s.

1. That which contributes to happiness or virtue: (as opposed to bad, an element in misery or vice).

Nature in man's heart her laws doth pen,
Prescribing truth to wit, and good to will.
Sir J. Barrow, On necessity of the Soul.

The lessening or escaping of evil is to be reckoned under the notion of good: the lessening or loss of good is to be reckoned under the notion of evil. Bishop Whitkin.

... of us is man be
To know both good and ... his facts or else degraded fruit, but let him boast
His knowledge of good best, and evil not.
Happier had it sufficed him to have known good by itself, and evil not at all.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 84.

Love with fear the only good,
Mereful over all his works, with good.
Still overcoming evil. Thid, xii. 564.

God is also in sleep, and dreams advise,
Which he hath sent propitions, some great good Presaging. Thid, xii. 612.

Not only carnal good from evil does not justify;
but no good, no not a purposed good, can make evil
good. Whitkin.

By good, I question not but good, morally so called,
'bonum honestum' ought, chiefly at least, to be understood: and that the good of profit or pleasure, the 'bonum utile,' or 'jocundum,' hardly come into any account here. South, Sermons.

Nor holds this earth a more deserving knight
For virtue, valour, and for noble blood,
Truth, honour, all that is compriz'd in good. Dryden.

This caution will have also this good in it, that it will put them upon considering, and teach them
the necessity of examining more than they do. Locke.

Good is what is apt to cause or increase pleasure, or diminish pain in us; or else to procure or preserve us the possession of any other good, or absence of any evil. Id.

2. Result of laudable moral qualities or ac- tions.

Depart from evil and do good. Psalm, xxiv. 11.

3. Advancement; advantage; prosperity.

If he had employ'd
Those excellent gifts of fortune and of nature
Unto the good, not ruin, of the state.
H. Johnson, Catiline's Conspiracy.

Refuse to leave thy destin'd charge too soon,
And for the church's good defer thy own. Prior.

4. Goods.

Moreover, because I have set my affection to the house of my God, I hate of mine own proper good, of gold and silver, which I have given to the house of my God, over and above all that I have prepared for the holy house, even three thousand talents of gold. 1 Chronicles, xxi. 3.

For any good. On any account.

Sir Thomas More hearing one tell a monstrous lie, said I would not for any good hear him say his word, least it should seeme a lie. Caply, W's
Fits and Fancies: 1611. (Cares by H. & W.)

For good and all. Completely; in earnest; wholly.

No, no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no, no,
I'll not kiss till I kiss you for good and all.
Newest Academy of Compliments.
(Cares by H. & W.)

The good woman never died after this, till she came to die for good and all. Sir R. L. Edgemoor.
Now though this was exceeding kind in her, yet,
as my good woman said to her, unless she resolved to keep me for good and all, she would do the little gentleman more harm than good.—Paradise Lost, Phaedra, 1722. (Surrey by H. & W.)

I missed the fit for good and all, though I did not recover my full strength for some weeks after.—De Witt, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

Good now. Phrase recommending patience.

Good now, sit down.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 1. Good now, good now, how your devotions jump with mine.—Dryden, Spanish Friar.

In our good. Gratiuity.

Let me play the lion too: I will roar, that I will do any man's heart good to hear me.—Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, i. 2.

He was 'd indifferently twist doing them neither good nor harm.—Id., Coriolanus, ii. 2.

Good. r. a. Improve; mature. Rare.

A fruitful hill not by nature, but by grace; nature was like itself in it, in the world: God hath taken it from the barren downs, and goodly it.—Bishop Hall, Past Sermons, 1624.

The husbandman looks not for a crop in the wild desert; but where he hath goodly, and plowed, and sowed, and sown, why should he not look for an harvest?—Id., Reveries, p. 121.

Good. adv. Well.

The pilot must intend some port before he steers his course, or he had as good leave his vessel to the direction of the winds, and the government of the waves. South, sermons.

Without good nature and gratitude, men had as good live in a wilderness as in a society.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

Good speed. Two words rather than a compound: its elements, supposing there is no confusion, being good, and speed.

In the first extract the construction is that of a verb, and good speed=wish me good speed. In the second the combination is that of an ordinary substantive and adjective. The instance, however, of Good-bye—God-be-ri-ge, suggests, the likelihood of the true form being Godspeed, though of course both are possible.

And so good-sp of me.

Reveries and Fletcher, Maid of the Mill.

I know, down I must; Mid-Plato, The Witch.

Good-bye. [God be w' (with) ye.]

Say, bid, good-bye. Take leave.

When I was a young girl we used to console the Lizzies, and Thimas, and Sophies, who had good-bye to their teens without getting married, by telling them that they were only waiting for Mr. Right to come, and that he would be sure to come some day.—H. A. Salt, Dutch Pictures, The late Mr. D.

Goodfellow. s. As an element in the name Robin Goodfellow, this is a compound rather than two words. Otherwise, it is two words rather than a compound.

Goodfellow. r. a. Call by the name of, or welcome us, a good fellow, or boon companion.

Let me rather be disliked for not being a beast, than be good-fellowed for a huz for being one. Some laugh at me for being sober; and I laugh at them for being drunk. Elfrida, Reveries, i. 84.

Goodhumoured. part. pref. [In the previous editions the accent is on the second syllable (good-hūmoured), in which case the result is two words rather than a true compound. The pronunciation, however, here indicated, is by no means uncommon. Hence, the true view of the combination is that it gives two forms; (1) a pair of words, and (2) a compound. The latter only has its place in a dictionary. Hence, good-hūmoured, good-hūmoured, good-mūnners, good-mūrron, good-nūture, good-nūturedly, good-sēuse, good-will, all of which are to be found in the previous editions, are omitted.] Having a good humour.

Give a glass to each goodhumoured fellow. Old Song.

Gooding. s. See extract.

To go a gooding, is a custom observed in several parts of England on St. Thomas's day by women only, who ask alms, and in return for them wish all that is good, such as a happy new year, &c., to their benefactors, sometimes presenting them also with a sprig of ever-green. In some parts of Surrey and Kent the custom is thus kept up; and in other counties gooding is the word, among the poor, for collecting before Christmas what may enable them to keep the festival.—Tidd.

Goodliness. s. Attribute suggested by Goodly; beauty.

She sang this song with a voice no less beautiful to his ears, than her goodliness was full of harmony to his eyes.—Sir P. Sidney.

The stateliness of houses, the goodliness of trees, when we behold them, delighteth the eye.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Goodly. adj. Having the real or approximate attribute of goodness; often applied to outward appearance; well-favoured; fine looking; showy; excellent.

A prince of a goodly aspect, and the more goodly by a grave majesty, whose with his mind did deck his outward grace.—Sir P. Sidney.

Rebekah took goodly raiment of her eldest son Esau, and put them upon Jacob. Genesis, xviii. 12.

England was a peaceable kingdom, and but lately joined to the mild and goodly government of the Confessor.—Spenser.

We have many goodly days to see.

Shakespeare, Richard III., iv. 1. There are other points of faith where with religion is now of late time infamed, as transubstantiation, purgatory, the pope's primacy, a whole dozen of these goodly articles hath the Tridentine Council created in this decayed age of the world, lest the fathers of Italy should seem to come short of the apostles, and the pope of Christ.—Bishop Hall, No. 10, good house (Ord MS.).

Not four score working in the field, My horse and I, we there behold A goodly fruit, which, tempting me, Walter.

How full of ornament is all I view In all its parts; and seems as beautiful as new: O goodly orderd work! O power divine! Of these I am, and what I am is time! Dryden.

His eldest born, a goodly youth to view, Even'd the rest in shape and outward show; Fair tail, his limbs with due proportion join'd, But of a heavy, dull, decrepitate mind.

Id., Cæsar and Iphigenia. Round as a globe, and liquor'd every clank, Goodly and great he sat behind his link. Id., Abraham and Achitophel.

Used adverbially.

There Anna, like a virgin queen most bright, Both flourish in all beauty excellent; And to her guests with boundless banquet dight, Attire her goodly well for health and for delight. Spenser, Enchiridion.

Goodlihead. s. Grace; goodness. Obsolete.

For this, and many more such outrage, Craving your goodlihead to assuage, The rancorous rage of his night. Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, February.

Goodman. s.

1. Master of the house; husband: (oft two words).

The goodman of this house was Dolon knight. Spenser, Enchiridion, v. 6, 32.

Let us sober ourselves with boxes: for the goodman is not at home. Piercy, vi. 19.

of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up.—Matthew, xiv. 12.

The goodman himself must draw the liquor. Piercy, Pilgrimage, p. 222: 1617.

The vow she made unto her goodman.—Barton, A History of Melancthon, p. 622.

When the goodman mends his armour, And trims his helmet's plume; When the goodwife's shuttle merrily Goes flashing through the loom; With weeping and with laughter, Still is the story told, How well Horatius kept the bridge, In the brave days of old. Mansley, Lays of Ancient Rome, Horatius.

2. As an appellation or humble title: (rarely two words).

How now, what's the matter? part.— With you, goodman buy, if you please; come, I'll flesh ye. Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

Nay, hear you, goodman deliver. Id., Hamlet, v. 1. But see the sun-beams bright to labour warn, And gild the thatch of goodman Hodge's barn. Gay, Pastorals.

Old goodman Dobson of the green, Remembers he the trees has seen. Sir, Bancroft and Philimon.

Goodnatured. adj. For its use as a compound rather than two words, see Goodhumoured. In the Goodnatured Man, the title of a comedy by Goldsmith, the accent is on the first syllable, i.e. is that of a compound.

Goodness. s. Attribute suggested by Good.

If for anything he loved greatness, it was because therein he might exercise his goodness.—Sir P. Sidney.

There is in all things an appetite or desire, whereby they incline to something which they may be; all which perfections are contained under the general name of goodness.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

All made very particular relations of the strength of the Scots army, the excellent discipline that was observed in it, and the goodness of the men.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

Nobody can say that tobacco of the same good nature is rising in respect of itself: one pound of the same goodness will never exchange for a pound and a quarter of the same goodness.—Locke.

Goods. s.

1. Movables in the way of furniture.

That giv'st to such a guest, As my poor self, of all thy goods the best. Chapman.

2. Personal or movable estate in the way of chattels.

That a writ be set against you, To forfeit all your goods, lands, tenements, Castles, and whatsoever. Shakespeare, Henry VIII., iii. 2.

This hinders nothing the proceedings of the civil courts, which respect the temporal punishment upon body and goods.—Locke.

3. Wares; freight; merchandise.

Her majesty, when the goods of our English merchants were attached by the duke of Alva, resorted likewise the goods of the Low Dutch to her in England.—Sir W. Raleigh, Excerpt.

Seller, that scorn'd all power and laws of men, Goods with their owners hurrying to their den. Waller.

The delivery of goods at the place of destination is, in general, necessary to entitle the owner to freight. McCulloch, Dictionary of Commerce, v. 1.

Freightage is paid for that part of the goods which is delivered when part has been either thrown overboard or taken by the enemy. Id.

Goodtempered. adj. For its use as a compound rather than two words, see Goodhumoured.

Goodwife. s. Mistress of a family or house. Obsolete.

Which is an ordinary passion amongst our goodwives; if their husband tarry out a day longer than his appointed time, or break his hour, they take on presently with sighs and tears; he is either pained or dead!—Barton, Autobiography of Melancthon, p. 161.

By this had clummiest the village cocke Hidden the good-wife for her maids to knocke. W. Browne.

It serves the maiden female crew, The ladies and the good wives too. Sir J. Suckling. (See, also, under Good man.)

Goodwoman. s. [probably two words.]

Goodwife. Obsolete.

She who neglected her kitchen-garden (for that was still the goodwoman's province) was never reputed a tolerable housewife. Keeling, Antiquary.

Goodly, good-woman, gossip, I must, forsooth, Or dame, the sole additions she did bear. Shakespeare, Schoolmaster.

Goody. s. Abbreviation of Goodwife.

Kill, goody sheep, then said the fox, and so; Unto the king so rash you may not go. Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.

Swarm'd on a rotten stick the bees I spy'd, Which erst I saw when goody Dobson dy'd. Gay, Pastorals.

Plain goody would no longer down; 'Twas undam in her govern down. Sir, Bancroft and Philimon.

Goody-goodies. s. Sweetmeats.

When there are little masters and misses in a house, they are usually great impediments to the diversion of the servants; the only remedy is to bribe them with goody-goodies, that they may not tell tales to papa and mamma.—Brief, Advice to Servants, (Ord MS.).

Goodyship. s. Rank or denomination of Goody. Rare.

The more shame for her goodyship, To give so near a friend the slip. Batter, Andronicus.

Goose. s. pl. geese. [A.S. gūs.]

1. Native bird, both wild and domesticated, so called, of the genus Anser.

Since I plucked geese, played truant, and whipped top, I knew not what it was to be beaten till lately. Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 1.

For watchful dogs, nor the more watchful geese, Disturb with mighty noise the merest peace. Dryden.

2. Tailor's iron.

Come in, tailor: here you may roast your goose.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 3.

Cook one's goose. Do for one. Your goose is cooked = you are done for, in the sense of 'Your business is settled.' Colloquial or slang. The following refinement upon the ordinary interpretation (whatever that may be) is held by others besides the editor. To cook a goose is to roast a martyr. Such is the hypothesis. That the h and g are interchanged with one another in certain Slavonic dialects in and on the confines of Bohemia is well known. Hence, the name of Huss, the martyr, would reach the Germans of Saxony and Silesia under the form of Guss (Goose). That a goose is found in many of the engravings of Luther is also well known; as is the fact that its import is to suggest the fate of Huss or Guss. The same explanation applies to the Goose and Gridiron, as the sign of an inn.

Gooseberry. s. [German, krausbeere, kräusbeere.] Native fruit so called (Ribes grossularia).

August has upon his arm a basket of all manner of ripe fruits; as pears, plums, apples, gooseberries.—Poëchan.

Goosecap. s. Simpleton.
Why what a goosecap wouldst thou make me!
—Beaumont and Fletcher, Beggars Bush.

Goosecorn. s. Coarse kind of native rush so called.

Goosecorn, from its growth on commons where geese feed, and the grain-like appearance of its capsules.—Dr. A. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Goosefoot. s. Native plant of the genus Chenopodium (Gr. χην = goose + πῦς, πῶς = foot), which it translates.
Goosefoot or swanbane.—Cole, Adam in Eden, ch. ccc.

Goosefoot, from the shape of the leaf.—Dr. A. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Goosegrass. s. [second element grass; perhaps grease.] Native plant so called. Its application is very uncertain. The Potentilla anserina is certainly connected with the goose; partly from the colour of its leaves being like that of the dung of the goose, and partly from its growth on the sides of ponds where the soil has been trodden by geese. Gooseweed, however, is the common name for this; Silverweed the best. The goosegrass of the extract, or the goosegrass that has been connected with the tansy, is Goosetongue, which even now may be found in gardens, cultivated, like tansy, as an herb. The plant, however, to which it is most commonly attached is the Galium Aparine, Gooseshare, or Cleavers; wherein, however, its application is probably the most inaccurate. It seems to be a corruption of crosswort; a term which applies generally to the Galiums. From the Galium Aparine it seems to have been extended to the Asperugo procumbens. It is not wanted as a name; all the plants (with the exception of the last named, which is rare, and to which it is not very suitable) having other names more appropriate. As a synonym to Cleavers (which is a good word) it should be erased in works on the English Flora.

Goosegrass, or wild tansy, is a weed that strong clays are very subject to.—Nortimer, Husbandry.

Goosequill. s. Quill from a goose's wing.
The legs [of a Guevi antelope] did not exceed the thickness of a large goose-quill.—Swainson, History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 272.

Often two words: (in the following it means pen).

Oh, Nature's noblest work, my grey goose quill, Slave of my thoughts, obedient to my will!
—Byron, English Birds and Scotch Riverwrens.

Goosery. s.

1. Collection of geese.
2. Silliness, as that of a goose.

There will not want divers plain and solid men, that have learned by the experience of a good conscience what it is to be well taught, who will soon look through and through both the lofty nakedness of your latinating barbarian, and the flimsy goosery of your neat sermon actor.—Milton, Apology for Smectymnus. (Rich.)

Gooseshare. s. See extract; also Harif.

It is also called in English goss-hairiff, goos-share, gooseshare, cleavers (or clivers) because they cleave close to garments; and in some country they call the seed bygarlick.—Cole, Adam in Eden, cxxxvii.

Goosetongue. s. Native plant so called; sneezewort (Achillea ptarmica).

Goosetongue, from its finely serrated leaves.—Dr. A. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Gopher. s. [Hebrew.] Found only in the passage given as extract and left untranslated.
Make thou an ark of gopher wood.—Genesis, vi. 14.

Gopher. s. [?] In Zoology. Species of turtle so called (Testudo Polyphemus).

Thus in the vegetable-feeding gopher the pancreas is  $\frac{1}{10}$  of the total weight of the animal; whilst in the carnivorous snapper it is  $\frac{1}{20}$  of the total weight of the animal.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Gorbally. s. [see Correll.] Big belly; person who has one.

The belching gorbally hath well nigh killed me.—Brewer, Comedy of Lingua, v. 1.

Gorbellied. adj. Bearing a gorbally.

Hang ye, gorbellied knaves, are you undone? No, ye fat chuffs, I would your store were here.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. ii. 2.

Gord. s. [?] Probably, according to Malone (note on first extract), false dice, their falseness being effected by making a cavity in them; fullams, on the contrary, being made false by loading with lead.
Let vultures peep thy guts, for gord and fullam holds.

Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 3.
What more should I say of false dice, of fullams, high men, low men, gord, and bricked dice, graners, domies, contraries.—Greene, Art of Juggling, 1612.
A bale of gord, with as many high men as low men for passage.—Decker, Bellman of London, 1610.
The dry bones can reach at nothing now, but gord and ninepins.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Seemly Lady.

Gordian. adj. [from Gordius, a Phrygian husbandman, made king by the oracle of Apollo; who is said to have then tied up his utensils of husbandry in his temple, in a knot so intricate that no one could find out where it began or ended. It was pretended that whoever should loose this knot should be king of all Asia. Alexander the Great, without staying to untie it, cut it with his sword. The Latin word Gordianus, or Gordian knot, was hence adopted to express any difficult matter; and the cutting, as opposed to the undoing, of it, its summary, though doubtfully legitimate solution.] Intricate; difficult.
Turn him to any cause of policy,
The Gordian knot of it he will unloose
Familiar as his garter. —Shakespeare, Henry V. I. 1.
As slippery as the Gordian knot was hard.
—Id., Cymbeline, ii. 2.
The binding knot of the late Gordian conspiracy.
—Proceedings against Garnet, &c., sign. S. 3.
Strange power of home, with how strong-twisted arms,
And Gordian-twined knot, dost thou enchain me!
—P. Fletcher, Boast.
What power, what force, what mighty spell, if not
Your learned hands, can loose this Gordian knot?
—Milton, Vacation Exercise, 69.
Close the serpent's eye.

Innuating, wove of Gordian twine
His braided train. —Id., Paradise Lost, iv. 347.
Morals reformed, health preserved, industry invigorated, instruction diffused, public burdens lightened, economy seated as it were upon a rock, the gordian knot of the Poor-laws not cut but untied, all by a simple idea in architecture.—J. Bentham, Panopticon, or the Inspecting House, prof.

Gore. s. [A.S. gor = wet filth.]

1. Blood effused from the body.

A grisly wound,
From which forth gush'd a stream of gore-blood thick.

Gorge. v. a. [Fr. gorge.]
1. Throat.
There were birds also made so finely, that they did not only deceive the sight with their figures, but the hearing with their songs, which the watry instruments did make their gorge deliver.—Sir P. Sidney.
And now how abhorred in my imagination it is!
My gorge rises at it.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 1.
Her delicate tenderness will find itself abused, begin to heave the gorge, diarrhetic and abhor the Moor.—Id., Othello, ii. 1.
This mighty sail-winged monster, that menaces to swallow up the land, unless her bottomless gorge may be stilled with the blood of the king's daughter, of the church.—Milton, Reasons of Church Government urged against Prelacy, b. ii.

2. That which is gorged or swallowed.
And all the way, much like a brutish beast,
He spewed up his gorge, that all did him detest.
—Spenser, Faerie Queen.

3. Meal given to hawks.
No lure will cause her stoop, she bears full gorge.
—Watson, Sonnets.
Because the vultures had but small pickings, shall we therefore go and sling them a full gorge?—Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

4. In Topography. Narrow passage between rocks.
It is situated on both banks of the Narenta in a gorge which opens out in two small plains at its north and south extremities.—G. Arbuthnot, Herazgovina, ch. vii.

Gorge. v. a.
1. Fill up to the throat; glut; satiate.
Being with his presence glutted, gorge'd, and full.
—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 2.
He that makes his generation weary,
To gorge his appetite. —Id., King Lear, i. 1.
Gorge with my blood thy barbarous appetite.
—Dryden.
I desire that they will not gorge the lion either
with nonsense or obscenity.—Adams.
The plant, gorge'd with death, and wine and blood,
Lay stretch'd at length, and snoring in his den. —Id.

That all her goodly garment stain'd around,
And into a deep sanguine dy'd the gray ground.

—Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Another's crimes the youth unhappy bore,
Glutting his father's eyes with guileless gore.

Dryden, Translation of the Aeneid.
Their veins, after forty days' burial, extended with blood, being opened with a lance, have yielded a gorge as plentiful, fresh, and thick, as that which issues from the vessels of young and sanguine persons.—Sir P. Rycaut, Present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 278.

Blood clotted or congealed.

'The bloody fact
Will be aveng'd; though here thou see him die,
Rolling in dust and gore.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 428.
His horrid beard and knotted tresses stood Stiff with his gorge, and all his wounds ran blood.

—Sir J. Denham.

3. Dirt; mud.

As a snowe waloweth in the stynkyng gorge pytie, or in the puddell. —Bishop Fisher, Festus, p. 16.

Gore. v. a. [A.S. gár = spear, javelin.]

1. Stab; pierce.

Oh, let no noble eye profane a tear
For me, if I be gor'd with Snowbray's spear.
—Shakespeare, Richard II. i. 3.

No weaker lion's by a stronger slain;
Nor from his larger tusks the forest bear
Communion takes his brother swine to gor.

—Tate, Translation of Juvenal.
For arms his men long pikes and jav'lins bore,
And poles with pointed steel their foes in battle gor.

—Dryden.

2. Pierce with a horn.

Some time'd, some gor'd, some trampling down he kill'd.
He idly butting, feigns
His rival gor'd in every knotty trunk.

—Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Gore. s. [Dutch, gheere.] Corner-shaped piece let into a garment; skirt; lap.

How my bird so fayre,
That was wont to repayre,
And go in as my spare,
And creep in at my gor
Of my gor before,
Flyckerynge with his wings.

—Skelton, Phylip Sparowe, 355. (ed. Dyce.)

As the first element in a compound.

Gore [is] any edging sewed upon cloth to strengthen it, according to Skinner; but rather a slip of cloth or linen, inserted in order to bind a garment in any particular place. A gor-cut was in the time of queen Elizabeth, a gown or petticoat so cut, as to be very broad at the bottom, and narrow at the upper end.—Tait.

Gorge. s. [Fr. gorge.]

1. Throat.

There were birds also made so finely, that they did not only deceive the sight with their figures, but the hearing with their songs, which the watry instruments did make their gorge deliver.—Sir P. Sidney.

And now how abhorred in my imagination it is!
My gorge rises at it.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 1.
Her delicate tenderness will find itself abused, begin to heave the gorge, diarrhetic and abhor the Moor.—Id., Othello, ii. 1.

This mighty sail-winged monster, that menaces to swallow up the land, unless her bottomless gorge may be stilled with the blood of the king's daughter, of the church.—Milton, Reasons of Church Government urged against Prelacy, b. ii.

2. That which is gorged or swallowed.

And all the way, much like a brutish beast,
He spewed up his gorge, that all did him detest.
—Spenser, Faerie Queen.

3. Meal given to hawks.

No lure will cause her stoop, she bears full gorge.
—Watson, Sonnets.
Because the vultures had but small pickings, shall we therefore go and sling them a full gorge?—Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

4. In Topography. Narrow passage between rocks.

It is situated on both banks of the Narenta in a gorge which opens out in two small plains at its north and south extremities.—G. Arbuthnot, Herazgovina, ch. vii.

Gorge. v. a.

1. Fill up to the throat; glut; satiate.

Being with his presence glutted, gorge'd, and full.
—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 2.

He that makes his generation weary,
To gorge his appetite. —Id., King Lear, i. 1.
Gorge with my blood thy barbarous appetite.
—Dryden.

I desire that they will not gorge the lion either
with nonsense or obscenity.—Adams.
The plant, gorge'd with death, and wine and blood,
Lay stretch'd at length, and snoring in his den. —Id.

Nor would his slaughter'd army now have lain
On Afric's sands, discur'd with their wounds,
To gorge the wolves and vultures of Numidia.

Adrian, Cato.

This celebrated writer informs us, that the Mohammedans refuse to eat pork on account of a singular circumstance which happened to their prophet. It appears that Mohammed, having on one occasion gorged himself with food and drink till he was in a state of insensibility, fell asleep on a dunghill, and, in this disgraceful condition, was seen by a litter of pigs. The pigs attacked the fallen prophet, and suffocated him to death; for which reason his followers abominate pigs, and refuse to partake of their flesh.—Huckler, History of Civilization in England, vol. I. ch. vi.

2. Swallow: (as, 'The fish has gorged the hook').

Gorge. v. n. Feed to satiety.

The very parasites that draw together all the fowls of prey and ravin in the land, to come and gorge upon the church.—Milton, Animadversions upon a Defence of the Unholy Remonstrances.

Gorgonian. adj. [N.Fr. gorgian, gourgian.] Fine; splendid; glittering in various colours; showy; magnificent.

The houses he curiously builded after a gorgian and gorgian style.—Robinson, Translation of Sir T. More's Utopia, ii. 2: 1551.

With gorgian wings, the marks of swiftness away,
The two contending princes make their way.

Dryden, Translation of Virgil.

Can we see the gorgian billows of such an earthly Jerusalem, and the doom impending, without tears?—Glendon, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. 2.

Gorgeously. adv. In a gorgeously manner; splendidly; magnificently; finely.

They which are gorgeously apparelled, and live delicately, are in kings' courts.—Luke, vii. 25: translation of 1578.

Most precious stones, gorgeously and cunningly set in divers manners.—Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, b. I. Crown'd with unborder'd banks, and gorgeously array'd.

With all th' enamell'd flowers of many a goodly mead.
Dryden, Polydorus, book 3.

The duke, one solemn day, gorgeously clad in a suit all overspread with diamonds, lost one of them of good value.—Sir H. Wotton, Life of the Duke of Buckingham.

Gorgeousness. s. Attribute suggested by Gorgeous; splendour; show; magnificence.

In that day shall the Lord take away the gorgeousness of their apparel.—Knights, Trial of Truth: 1560.

What gorgeousness of shew with the vulgar and simple, what multitude of ceremonies with the superstitious!—Sir B. Sandys, State of Religion.

Gorget. s.

1. Piece of armour that defends the throat.

He with a paley fumbling on his gorget,
Shakes in and out the river.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, I. 3.

He did oftentimes spend the night in the church alone praying, his headpiece, gorget, and pauldrons lying by him.—Knollys, History of the Turks.

See how his gorget peers above his gown,
To tell the people in what danger he was.

B. Jonson, Cellina's Conspiracy.

About his neck a threefold gorget,
As rough as trobled leathern target.

Butler, Hudibras.

2. See extract.

[Gorget was formerly used for that part of the female dress called a ruff. It is in our old lexicography, and is so used by Cleveand in his poems; but is now obsolete; though Dr. Johnson explains neckerchief by gorget.—Todd.]

3. In Surgery. Instrument used in the operation of cutting for the stone.

Gorget are of two kinds, cutting and blunt. The cutting gorget is a kind of knife furnished with a beak which runs in the groove of the staff, so that the gorget being pushed along it divides the neck of the bladder and the prostate gland. The blunt gorget is merely a sort of large directory for guiding the forceps in the bladder. The gorget is now seldom used: the cutting one being superseded by a simple knife, and the blunt one by the use of the finger.—Hooper, Medical Dictionary.

Gorgon. s. [Lat. Gorgon, from Greek Γοργών, -ών.] Fabulous deity with snaky hairs, of which the sight turned beholders to stone; anything ugly or horrid.

Gorgons, and hydrae, and chimærae dire.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 628.

Why didst thou not encounter man for man,
And try the virtue of that gorgon face
To slay me into statue?

Dryden.

I really came here to buy up all your stock; but 1092

that gorgon, Lady de Courcy, captured me, and my ransom has sent me here free, but a beggar.—Diaries the younger, The Young Duke, b. I. ch. ii.

Gorgonian. adj. Having the power of the Gorgon to terrify or strike with horror.

Gorgonian scolds, and harpies.

B. Jonson, Epigrams, 134.

Medusa with gorgonian terror guards
The ford.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 611.

Gorilla. s. [An African word preserved in the Greek translation or abstract of the Periplus of Hanno, in the plural form γορίλλαι; these being large apes of the Western Coast of Africa. Word for word gorilla and drill are probably the same. Animal for animal, the Gorilla of the Carthaginians was probably the chimpanzee.] Large anthropoid ape (the largest of the class) so called, native of equatorial Western Africa, especially the districts on the Gaboon; Troglodytes Gorilla.

In the gorilla the dorso-lumbar vertebrae, as in the chimpanzee, are seventeen in number, the thirteenth dorsal answering to the first lumbar in man. . . . The whole series of true vertebrae in the gorilla form but one curvature, which is slightly concave forward, especially in the dorsal region. . . . In the gorilla the scapula is broader than in the chimpanzee, but differs from that of man in the more oblique course of the spine, which gives greater extent to the superior costa. . . . The clavicle is thicker than that of man. . . . The humerus, though surpassing in length that of man, is thicker and stronger in all its ridges and processes; especially at the lower extremity, the transverse diameter of which surpasses that of the upper extremity of the bone in a greater degree than in man. . . . The medullary artery enters the fore part of the shaft, but leaves the middle of the bone in the gorilla than in man: in both the course of the canal is towards the elbow-joint. . . . The difference from the chimpanzee, most significant of their relative position in the quadrumanous series, presented by the antibrachium of the gorilla, is its inferiority of length compared with the humerus. The bones of the wrist agree in number and relative position with those of man; but the differences of shape and proportion give a greater breadth to the carpal segment in proportion to its length, in the gorilla. . . . The heel in the gorilla makes a more decided backward projection than in the chimpanzee; the heelbone is relatively thicker, deeper, more expanded vertically at its hind end, besides being fully as long as in the chimpanzee. Among all the tailless apes the calcaneum in the manning and other gibbons least resembles in its shape or proportional size that of man. Although the foot be articulated to the leg with a slight inversion of the sole, it is more nearly plantigrade in the gorilla than in the chimpanzee. The orang separates far, and the gibbon farther, from the human type in the inverted position of the foot.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Goring. verbal abs. Puncture; prick.

His horses' flanks and sides are for'd to feel
The clinking lash, and goring of the steel.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Gormand. s. Older, yet more English, form of Gourmand.

The gormand's paunch is fed.—Marton, Scourge of Villany, i. 4: 1590.

That great gormand, fat Apicius.—B. Jonson, Sejanus.

Many are made gormands and gluttons by custom, that were not so by nature.—Locke.

Gormandize. v. n. Feed greedily.

Gormandizer. s. One who gormandizes.

Not fit that you should be the sheriff's tasters;
It were enough, you being such gormandizers,
To make the sheriffs, henceforth, turn arrant misers.

Cleveland, Poems, &c. p. 113.

Gormandizing. part. adj. Feeding as a gormandizer.

No scene of it must pass without an eating and gormandizing parasite.—Hales, Sermon at the end of his Remains, p. 23.

Gormandizing. verbal abs. Gluttonous habit, as that of a gormandizer.

Make less thy body, hence, and more thy grace;
Leave gormandizing.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. v. 3.

He that censures the good fellow, commonly makes no conscience of gluttony and gormandizing at home.—Howell, Letters, ii. 2.

Gorrel. s. [A.S. gôr.] As the first element of a compound. Paunch. Obsolete.

Gorrel-bellied Bacchus, gnat-like,
Bestial a strong-beer barrell.

Old Song of Tom of Bodiam.

Gorrelled. adj. Stuffed as a paunch.

For why, their cogn will buy the wine,
And cause a running barrell;
But, if you're drunk, your wits are sunk,
And gorrelled guts will quarrel.

Old Ballad, Back for my Money.

(Notes by H. & W.)

Gorse. s. [see Holly.] Native plant so called; furze; Ulex europæus.

And for fair corn-ground are our fields sureley'd
With worthless gorse.

Kyd, Tragedy of Cornelia: 1594.

I see thee breathing on the barren moor,
That seems to bloom, although so bleak before;
There if beneath the gorse the primrose springs,
Or the pied daisy smiles below the ling,
They shall new charms, at thy command, disclose.

Crabbe, Birth of Flattery.

There is heather in some abundance, both in Jersey and Guernsey, but it is choked and concealed by the larger growth of gorse.—Assted, The Channel Islands, p. 104.

Gory. adj. Covered with gore; consisting in gore.

When two bears with rankling malice met,
Their gory sides the fresh wounds fiercely fret.

Sponser.

Thou canst not say, I did it: never shake
Thy gory locks at me. Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.
The obligation of our blood forbids
A gory emulation 'twixt us twain.

Id., Troilus and Cressida, iv. 2.

Goshawk. s. [A.S. gos-hufoc.] Species of falcon so called; Astur pumbarius.

Such dread his awful visage on them cast;
So seem poor doves at goshawk's sight affright.

Poet's.

Here are also species of hawks, and sundry other birds; as, goshawks, lanners, hobbies, &c.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 343.

The goshawk is at once distinguished from the falcon by the hole or fission instead of the sharp tooth on the cutting edge of the mandible. . . . The goshawk has also been separated generally from the sparrow hawk, on account of its stronger and shorter tarsus, which is covered with feathers on the upper part; and by the want of the clungium in the middle toe. . . . Inferior in powers to the falcons, though equal in size to the largest of them, the goshawk is yet the best of the short-winged hawks; but its habits as well as its mode of flying at its game are very different. . . . The goshawk was formerly . . . flown at larks, rabbits, pheasants, grouse, and partridges.—Harrell, British Birds.

Gosling. s. Young goose; goose not yet full grown.

Why do you go nodding and wagging so like a fool, as if you were huddled? says the goose to her gosling.—Sir E. L'Estrange.

Nature hath instructed even a brood of goslings to stick together, while the kite is hovering over their heads.—Swift.

Gospel. s. [A.S. godspel.]

1. See extract.

What the word εὐαγγέλιον in Greek, which we render gospel, signifies among authors, is ordinarily known, viz. from εὖ and ἀγγέλλω, good news, or good tidings. Thus the angel speaks of the birth of Christ, Εὐαγγελίζομαι ὑμῖν χαρὰ μεγάλη, I bring you good tidings of great joy, i. e. very joyful good tidings. Only in the sacred use of it, there seems to be a metonymy, or figure very ordinary, whereby the history of that good news, the birth, and life, and resurrection of Christ, which all put together is that joyful news or good tidings. . . . And so this word gospel, or by euphony gospel, in Wicliffe's translation, and ever since, notes these good tidings delivered; as first by an angel; and after that, by the apostles by word of mouth; so here in writing, by way of history also; and in brief signifies that blessed story of the birth, life, actions, precepts, and promises, death and resurrection of Christ, which, of all other stories in the world, we Christians ought to look on with most joy, as an εὐαγγέλιον or good word, i. e. a gospel.—Hammond, Paraphrases and Annotations on the New Testament, annot. 1.

2. The New Testament as the especial book of the Christian creed.

Thus may the gospel to the rising sun
Be spread, and flourish where it first began.

Waller.

All the decrees whereof Scripture treateth are conditionate, receiving Christ as the gospel offers him, as Lord and Saviour; the former, as well as the latter, being the condition of scripture-election, and the rejecting, or not receiving him thus, the condition of the scripture-reprobation.—Hammond.

How is a good Christian animated and cheered by a steadfast belief of the promises of the gospel!—Benbow.

This [gospel] is intimated as one of the words which is practically ambiguous, from its different applications, even though not employed (as it sometimes is) in different senses. Conformably to its etymological meaning of good-tidings, it is used to signify (and that especially and exclusively) the welcome intelligence of salvation to man, as preached by our Lord and his followers. But it was afterwards transitively applied to each of the four histories of our Lord's life, published by those who are called the Evangelists. And the term is often used to express collectively the gospel-doctrines; i.e. the instructions given men how to save themselves of the offer of salvation; and preaching the gospel is accordingly often used to include not only the proclaiming of the good tidings, but the teaching of what is to be believed and done, in consequence. This ambiguity is one source of some important theological errors; many supposing that gospel truth is to be found exclusively, or chiefly, in the gospels; to the neglect of the other sacred writings.—Whately, Logic, Ambiguous Terms, appendix.

3. Rule as that of divine revelation; divinity; theology.

Help us to save free consciences from the paw
Of hireling wolves, whose gospel is their maw.
Milton, Sonnet to Cromwell.

4. General doctrine.

The propounders of this political gospel are in hopes their abstract principle would be overlooked.
—Harbs.

Gospel. v. a. Teach the Gospel; fill with the principles of Christianity. Rare.

«Are you so gospell'd
To pray for this good man, and for his sons,
Whose heavy hand hath bow'd you to the grave?
Shakespeare, Merchant, iii. 1.

Gospelary. adj. Theological. Rare.

Let any man judge, how well these gospelary principles of our presbyterians agree with the practice and doctrine of the holy apostles.—The Clerk in his Chamber, p. 8: 1679.

Gospeler. s.

1. Historian of the acts of Christ; i.e. evangelist, which word it translates: (used in this sense by the reformers of the school of Wycliffe, but when applied to one whose faith was founded upon the Scriptures direct, rather than upon the current interpretations of them and to the advocates of private judgement as opposed to the authoritative interpretation of the Church, invested with a disparaging import; though, in many cases, this lies in some adjective with which it is combined); Bible Christian.

Our new gospelers do spurne and kicke against it.—Martin, Marriage of Priests, sign. Q. iii. b: 1554.

What, is Juvenius become so tame,
To be a new gospeller?

Old Morality of Lady Juvenius.

That as well the catholicks with the gospellers, as they again with the catholicks, be and remain in true and unfeigned peace.—Acord of Ulm, Sir H.
Wotton's Remains, 1633: 1620.

How much have we declined from that zeal and love, which our Fathers bore to the Reformation!
There were two things that were visible in the practices of those who first embraced it among us: the one was a great pleasure they took in reading the Scriptures, from whence they were in derision called gospellers.—Bishop Burnet, First Sermon: 1689.

These gospellers have had their golden days,
Have trodden down our holy Roman faith.
Brown, Jane Shore.

2. One who reads the Gospel at the altar.

These be my gospellers,
These be my preachers,
These be my quakers. Skelton, Poems, p. 113.
The principal minister using a decent cope and being assisted with the gospeller and epistler.—
Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, &c.

Gospelize. v. a. Form according to the gospel. Rare.

This command, thus gospelized to us, hath the same force with that whereon Kara grounded the plain necessity of divorcing.—Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

Goss. s. Same as Gorse, of which it is an inaccurate form.

Old-like, they my lowing followed, through Tooth'd briars, sharp fures, prickling goss, and thorns. Shakespeare, Twelfth, iv. 1.

Gossamer. s. [see extract from Wedgwood.]

Light filmy threads either floating in the air, or stretched from blade to blade along the grass: (common in summer). They are the delicate webs of either spiders or moths. Such is the true gossamer. Less properly it is applied to the fine floating dust, especially that which is seen along the line of a ray of light in a partially darkened room; as, also, to the small scutes (farina or dust) of the wings of the Lepidoptera, i.e. the moths and butterflies.

A lover may bestride the gossamers
That idle in the wanton summer air,
And yet not fall; so light is vanity.

Four nimble quarts the horses were,
Their harnesses of gossamers, Dragon, Nymphidia.
The filmy gossamer now flits no more,
Nor haleyouts back on the short sunny shore.

Dryden, Translation of Virgil.
[Gossamer.—Properly God-summer. German, der Sommer, fiengel. . . . . r-fiden (summer-travels), Marion fiden, Unser lieben Frauen fiden, from the legend that the gossamer is the remnant of our Lady's winding-sheet, which fell away in fragments when she was taken up to heaven. It is this divine origin which is indicated by the first syllable of the English term. In like manner the Lady-cow is in Brittany la petite vache du bon Dieu, in German Marion-kühe, or Gottes kuhlin.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Gossamer. adj. Having the character of, consisting of, or abounding in, gossamer;
light; filmy; unsubstantial.

Filmy, gawzy, gossamer lines,
With lucid language, and most dark designs.
Parasite of Literature, pt. i. ver. 85.

Gossip. s. [A.S. God sib—relationship.]
Relation in the way of sponsorship in baptism;
in its fullest import embracing the Godfather, the Godmother, and the Godchild, limited, however, for the most part to the mother.

1. One who answers for the child in baptism.

Our christian ancestors, understanding a spiritual alliance to grow between the parents and such as undertook for the child at baptism, called each other by the name of god-sib, which is as much as to say, that they were sib together, that is, of kin together through God. The child, in like manner, called such his God-fathers, or God-mothers.—Ver-steegan, Reformation of decayed Intelligence.
Go to a gossip's feast, and go with me;
After so long grief, such nativity.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, v. 1.
At the christening of George, Duke of Clarence, who was born in the castle of Dublin, he made both the earl of Kildare and the earl of Ormond his gossips.—Sir J. Davies, Diaconus on the State of Ireland.

2. From either the actual bond between gossips, or the feasting and good neighbourhood which christenings caused, come the following secondary meanings.

a. Friend or neighbour.

One mother, whereas my foulhardy child
Did come too near, and with his talons play'd,
Half dead through fear, my little babe reviv'd,
And to her gossips ran in counsel say:
How can I tell?

Spenser, Faerie Queene.
A woman said to her neighbour, Alas, gossip, what should we now do at church, since all our saints are taken away?—Homily, Of Place and Times of Prayer.
During the time which elapsed between this dissolution and the meeting of the next parliament, took place the celebrated negotiation respecting the Infants. The would-be despot was unmercifully brought down. The would-be Solomon was ridiculously over-reached. Stevenie, in spite of the begging and sobbing of his dear dad and gossip, carried off by Charles in triumph to Madrid. The sweet lads, as James called them, came back safe, but without their errand. The great master of king-craft, in looking for a Spanish match, had found a Spanish war.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden.

b. Tippling companion.

And sometimes lurk I in a gossip's bowl,
In very likeness of a roasted crab,
And when she drinks, against her lips I bob.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 1.

c. Tatler; idle talker; news-monger.

To do the office of a neighbour,
And be a gossip at his labour. Bentley, Hudibras.
'Tis sung in every street,
The common chat of gossips when they meet.

Dryden.
First, whispering gossips were in parties seen;
Then louder scandal walked the village green;
Next babbling folly told the growing ill,
And busy Malice dropt it at the mill.
Crabbe, The Parish Register.

d. Tattle of gossip.

'I wonder who will be their Master of the Horse,' said the great noble, loving gossip though he despised the gossiper.—Diurnal the younger, Coningsby, b. ii. ch. iv.

Gossip. v. n. Chat; prate; be merry.

Go to a gossip's feast, and go with me, . . .
—With all my heart, I'll gossip at this feast.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, v. 1.
His mother was a votress of my order,
And, in the spleen'd Indian air by night,
Full often hath she gossiped idly my side.

Id., Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 2.
Such swarms of men that had renounced their virility, and led an idle life, &c., went gossipping and gossipping up and down, telling odd stories to the people, as old wives and nurses do to children.—*Dr.
H. More, Exposition of the Seven Churches*, pref.

Gossiper. s. One who gossips.

(For example see under Gossip, s. 2. d.)

Gossipping. part. adj. Having the character of a gossip, or of one who gossips.

He gives himself up to an idle gossipping conversation.—Lawe.

Gossipping. verbal abs. Going about to collect or report mere tattle; meeting of gossips.

Nor met with fortune other than at feasts,
Full warm of blood, of mirth, of gossipping.

Shakespeare, King John, v. 2.
Let not customary sluggishness make us unwieldy for any thing but gossipping.—Bishop Rainbolt,
Sermons, p. 46: 1633.

'Tis possible to go into a masculine company, where 'twill be as hard to elude in a word as at a female gossipping.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue, p. 73.

The market and exchange must be left to their own ways of talking, and gossippings must be robbed of their ancient privilege.—Locke.

Gossipped. s. [A.S. rede = counsel.]

Gossipped or compaternity, by the canon law, is a spiritual affinity; and the juror that was gossiped to either of the parties might, in former times, have been challenged as not indifferent.—Sir J. Davies,
Diaconus on the State of Ireland.

Gossoin. s. [Gaelic.] Lad, a low attendant formerly in the wealthy families of Ireland. Irish rather than English.

In most Irish families there used to be a barefooted gossain, who was slave to the cook and the butler, and who in fact, without wages, did all the hard work of the house. Gossains were always employed as messengers.—*Miss Edgeworth, Castle
Rackrent*, p. 53.

Goth. s. In its historical and ethnological sense a proper rather than a common name, signifying that portion of the so-called barbarians who overthrew the Roman empire, especially those under Alaric and Theodoric, and those who were the most closely connected with the Vandals.
Hence, barbarous; barbarian; uncivilized person; enemy to the fine arts; one destitute of taste: (Vandal being used in the same sense).

I look upon these writers as Goths in poetry.—
Addison, Spectator, no. 62.

What do you think of the late extraordinary event in Spain? Could you have ever imagined, that those ignorant Goths would have dared to banish the Jesuits?—Lord Chesterfield.

Gothamite. s. Gothamite.

As the scholars in their tales, even so the Romanish writers have no defective in uttering of their meaning: rining the same speech of Christ, that they have merited, like to the former Gothamites, to be dismissed with laughter for speaking so foolishly.
—Bishop Morton, Discharge of the Five Inquiries against the Bishop of Durham, p. 123: 1653.

Gothamite. s. Man of Gotham, a village in Nottinghamshire noted for the real or supposed simplicity of its inhabitants, who were sometimes called the 'Wise men of Gotham.'

These were dimards, fools, gothamites.—Lamb,
Curious Fragments.

Gothic. adj. Relating to, connected with, or derived from, the Goths.

a. In a bad sense.

We are to have no manner of relief for Gothique ornaments, as being in effect so many monsters, which barbarous ages have produced.—Dryden,
Translation of De Prouvo's Art of Painting.
(Ord MS.)

All that has nothing of the ancient gusto is called a barbarous or Gothique manner, which is not condemned by any rule, but only follows a wretched 1683.

fancy which has nothing in it that is noble.—Id.
Observations on De Proucy's Art of Painting.
(Orl. MS.)

When do you dine, Emilia? At the old Gothic hour of four o'clock, I suppose.—Emilia Wyndham, ch. xxi.

3. Import good or indifferent: (generally applied to Architecture; in which case it is a proper, rather than a common, name).

York minister I look upon to be the criterion, according to which the beauties or defects of every Gothic church are to be estimated.—Swinburne, Tour through Spain, let. 44.

There is nothing in this city [Sienna] so extraordinary as the cathedral, which . . . can only be looked upon as one of the master-pieces of Gothic architecture.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

The old foundation—but it is not clear when it was laid, you care not for the year; On this, as parts decay'd by time and storms, Arise these varied disproportion'd forms: Yes Gothic, all the learn'd who visit us (And our small wonders) have decided thus: 'You ruin Gothic arch, 'That Gothic door.' So have they said: of proof you'll need no more.

Crabbe, The Borough.
The name of Gothic has ascended from its primal meaning, that of utter contempt, to the highest honour; it is become conventional for the architecture of the middle ages, and commands a kind of traditional reverence. Perhaps Teutonic, or at least Transalpine, might be a more fit appellation. It was born, and reached its maturity and perfection north of the Alps. Gothic, properly so called, is a stranger and an alien in Italy.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. ii.

Gothicism. s.

1. Gothic idiom.

This peculiarity Mr. Sibbald, the chronicler of the Scottish poetry, in his zeal for Gothicism, has endeavoured to derive from an unknown character (O) in the Gothic Gospels of Ulphilas, which were written in the fourth century.—Chalmers, On the Language of Sir David Lindsay.

2. Conformity to Gothic architecture.

I am glad you enter into the spirit of Strawberry Castle, it has a purity and propriety of Gothicism in it.—Gray, Letters.

3. State of barbarians, after the manner of the Goths.

Night, Gothicism, confusion, and absolute Chaos are come again.—Shenstone.

Gothicism. v. a. Bring back to barbarism. The language and manners of the higher ranks are not gothified.—Strutt, Queen-Hoo Hall.

Gouge. s. [Fr.] Chisel having a round edge, for the cutting of such wood as is to be rounded or hollowed.

Gouge or semicircular chisels have been found in Iceland.—Festrook, Cyclopædia of Antiquities.

Gouge. v. a. Scoop out as with a gouge.

I will save in cork,
In my meek stop'ling, 'bove three thousand pound,
Within that term; by gouging of 'em out
Just to the size of my bottles, and not allieping.

B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass.

Goutjeers. s. [?] Venereal disease. Obsolete.
The goutjeers shall devour them, flesh and fell.

Shakespeare, King Lear, v. 2.

Gould. s. Flower so called; probably the same as gowan=daisy; which is Scotch rather than English.

Pinks, goulds, king-cups, and sweet sops-in-wine.

B. Jonson, Masques.

Gould. s. [short for Gouldard's extract.] Preparation of lead, so called from M. Gouldard, the inventor of it, used as a cooling application for inflammations, bruises, sprains, and the like.

Gouldard's extract [is] a matured solution of acetate of lead.—Hooper, Medical Dictionary.

There is also a Gouldard's Cerate.

Gourd. s. [Fr. gourda.] Cucurbitaceous plant so called: (i.e. one akin to the cucumbers, melons, and pumpkins).

But I will haste, and from each bough and brake,
Each plant, and juiciest gourd, will pluck such choies
To entertain our angel-guest.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 324.

Gourd seeds abound so much in oil, that a sweet and pleasant one may be drawn from them by expression: they are of the four greater cold seeds, and are used in emulsions.—Sir J. Hill, Medicina Medica.

Gourmand. s. [French.] One devoted to good living.

This gourmand meritorious whole becometh to his prunch.—Bishop Hall, St. Paul's Combat.

With difficulty I return to what remains of this ignoble task, for the diabolical I have to change a period more with the fifth and venom of this gourmand, swelled into a confuter.—Milton, Colasterion.
I am no gourmand: I require no dainties: I should despise the board of Helicopolis, except for its long sitting.—Lamb, Essays of Elia, Elia on Appetite.

It was sent me over from France by the celebrated gourmand Maréchal de —.—Sir E. B. Lytton, Pelham.

We have no princes and no ambassadors, no duke who is a gourmand, no earl who is a jockey, no man-murving mothers, no flirting daughters, no gambling sons, for your entertainment.—Disraeli the younger, The Young Duke, b. ii. ch. viii.

Used adjectively.

There was a goodly 'soupe & la bonne femme,'

Though God knows whence it came from; there was too

A turbot for relief of those who cram,
Relieved with 'dindon & la Perleaux';

There also was -- the dinner that I am!

How shall I get this gourmand stanza through?—
'Soupe & la Beauveau,' whose relief was dory,

Relieved itself by pork, for greater glory.
Byron, Don Juan, xv. 63.

Gourmandise. s. Gluttony; voraciousness.

A tierce forth out of the wood did rise,
That with fell claws, full of fierce gourmandise,
And greedy month wide gaping like hell gate,
Did run at Pastorell, her to surprise.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, lv. 10, 34.

Lacedemon, whence gourmandise, drunkenness, luxury, dissipation, avarice, envy, and ambition were banished.—Summary of De Bortas, pt. ii. p. 54: 1021.

Gourmandise. v. n. Play the glutton.

Singers also are proverbially prone to gourmandize; and though the Bird of Paradise unfortunately possessed the smallest mouth in all Singingland, it is astonishing how she pecked! But they talked as well as fringed, and were really gay.—Disraeli the younger, The Young Duke.

Gout. s. [Fr. goutte.] Malady so called.

The gout is a disease which may affect any membranous part, but commonly those which are at the greatest distance from the heart or the brain, where the motion of the fluids is the lowest, the resistance, friction, and stricture of the solid parts the greatest, and the sensation of pain, by the dilatation of the nervous fibres, extreme.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

One that's sick of th' gout, had rather Groan so in periphrasis, than be cur'd
By the sure physician death.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, v. 4.

This very reverend lecher, quite worn out
With rheumatism, and crippled with his gout,
Forgets what he in youthful times has done,
And swings his own view in his son.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Gout. s. [Fr. goutte=drop in its primary sense.] Drop. Rare.

I saw then still;
And on thy blade and dudgeon gouts of blood,
Which was not so before.

Shakespeare, Marbeth, ii. 1.

Goutish. adj. Having a tendency to the gout: (Gouty commoner).

The dice are for the end of a drum amongst soldiers, the tables for goutish and apoplectic persons to make them move their joints.—Drammond, Epistle 20. (Ord MS.)

Goutwort. s. Native plant so called; Egopodium podagraria (from aîk, aiyê=goat, + πούς, poûc=foot, and podagra=gout, respectively). Though the details are obscure, the confusion between goat and gout is evident. Goutweed is another, perhaps the commoner, form, though both are rare, except in botanical synonymies.

Egopodium podagra, goutweed, goutweed . . . [is] sedative, and was formerly used to mitigate the pains of gout and to relieve piles, but is now not employed. In its earlier state it is tender and succulent.—Hooper, Medical Dictionary.

Gouty. adj.

1. Afflicted or diseased with the gout.

The sickly ladie, and the goutie peers,
Still would I haunt, that love their life so deare.
Bishop Hall, Satires, ii. 4.

Knave upon his gouty joints appear,
And chalk is in his crippled fingers found,
Dryden, Translation of Pericles.

2. Relating to the gout.

There are likewise other causes of blood-spitting; one is the settlement of a gouty matter in the substance of the lungs.—Sir E. Blackmore.

3. Swollen.

This humour in historians hath made the body of ancient history in some parts so gouty and monstrous.—Spenser, On Prodiges, p. 103.

Gove. v. n. [?] Put in a gove, goff, or mow. Obsolete.

Lead safe, carry home, follow time being fair,
Gove just in the barn, it is out of despair.

Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Góvra. v. a. [Fr. gouverner; Lat. gubernare.]

1. Rule as a chief magistrate.

This inconvenience is more hard to be redressed in the governor than the governed; as a malady in a vital part is more incurable than in an external.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

[They] govern ill the nations under yoke,
Feeling their provinces, exhausted all
By lust and rapine.

Slaves to our passions we become, and then
It grows impossible to govern men.
Waller.

2. Regulate; influence; direct.

I am at present against war, though it puts the power into my hands, and though such turbulent and naughty spirits as you are, govern all things in times of peace.—Sir W. Davenant.

The chief point, which he is to carry always in his eye, and by which he is to govern all his counsels, designs, and actions.—Bishop A. Herbert.

3. Manage; restrain.

Go after her, she's desperate: govern her.
Shakespeare, King Lear, v. 3.

4. In Grammar. Have force with regard to syntax: (as, 'amo governs the accusative case').

Listen, children, unto me,
And let this your lesson be,
In our language evermore
Words that govern go before.

Manger, French Grammar.

5. Pilot; regulate the motions of a ship.

Góvra. v. n. Keep superiority; behave with haughtiness.

Your wicked atoms may be working now
To give bad counsel, that you still may govern.
Dryden.

Góvra. adj. Submissive to authority; subject to rule; obedient; manageable.

The flexibility of the former part of a man's age, not yet grown up to be headstrong, makes it more governable and safe.—Locke.

Góvra. s.

1. Government; rule; management.

Jonathan took the governance upon him at that time, and ran up instead of his brother Judas.—1 Maccabees, ix. 31.

2. Control, as that of a guardian.

Me he knew not, neither his own ill,
Till through wise handling, and fair governance,
I him recured to a better will.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

What! shall king Henry be a pupil still,
Under the surly Glouster's governance!
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II, i. 2.

3. Behaviour; manners. Obsolete.

He liketh is to fall into m'achance
That is regardless of his governance.
Spenser, Malapropos.

Góvra. s. Lady who has the care of young girls of quality; female governor in the sense of tutor.

I saw Envy there drest up in a widow's veil, and the very picture of the governante of one of your noblemen's houses.—Sir E. L. Strange, Translation of Quevedo's Vision, p. 24.

Since it has been a fashionable thing for the master to resign up his concerns to the steward, and the lady here to the governante, it has gone ill with most great families, whilst these officers serve themselves instead of those who employ them, raise fortunes on their patron's ruins, and divide the spoil of the family.—Ladies' Calling, pt. ii. sect. 2, § 2. (Ord MS.)

Góvra. s.

1. Female invested with authority.

The moon, the governess of floods,
Pale in her anger, watches all the air,
That rheumatic diseases do abound.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 2.

2. Tutress; woman that has the care of young ladies.

He presented himself unto her, falling down upon both his knees, and holding up his hands, as the old governess of Danes is painted, when she suddenly saw the golden shower.—Sir P. Sidney.

His three younger children were taken from the governess in whose hands he put them.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

3. Tutress; instructress; directress.

Great affliction that covers governess of the life of man brings upon those souls the saddest op.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

Góvernment. s.

1. Form of a community with respect to the disposition of the supreme authority.

There seem to be but two general kinds of government in the world: the one exercised according to the arbitrary commands and will of some single person; and the other according to certain orders or laws introduced by agreement or custom, and not to be changed without the consent of many.—Sir W. Temple.

No government can do any act to limit itself: the supreme legislative power cannot make itself not to be absolute.—Locke.

2. Established state of legal authority.

There they shall find
Their government, and their great senate chime
Through the twelve tribes, to rule by laws ordain'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 223.

While he survives, in concord and content
The common life, by no divisions rent;
But the great monarch's death dissolves the government.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

Every one knows, who has considered the nature of government, that there must be in each particular form of it an absolute unlimited power.—Addison.

Where any one person or body of men seize into their hands the power in the last resort, there is properly no longer a government, but what Aristotle and his followers call the abuse or corruption of one.—Hobbs.

3. Administration of public affairs.

Safety and equal government are things
Which subjects make as happy as their kings.

Those governments which curb not evils, cause;
And a rich knave's a libel on our laws.
Waller, Young.

Used adjectively.

The king not only wrested government boroughs from the minister, in order to nominate his own friends, but even encouraged opposition to such ministers as he conceived not to be in his interest.—T. Erskine May, Constitutional History of England, ch. i.

4. Regularity of behaviour; restraint; self-restraint; self-government. Obsolete.

You needs must learn, lord, to amend this fault;
Though sometimes it shows greatness, courage,
blood,

Yet oftentimes it doth present harsh rage,
Defect of manners, want of government,
Pride, haughtiness, opinion, and disdain.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 1.
'Tis government that makes them seem divine;
The want thereof makes 'hem abominable.
Id., Henry VI. Part III. i. 4.

5. Management of the limbs or body. Obsolete.

Shot many a dart at me with fierce intent;
But I them warded all with wary government.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Thy eyes' windows fall,
Like death, when he shuts up the day of life;
Each part depriv'd of supple government,
Shall stiff and stark, and cold appear, like death.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iv. 1.

6. In Grammar. Influence of one word in determining the case of the second; especially of nouns, verbs, and prepositions; as man's hat, strike him, with us. Here the form taken by man's, him, and us, are determined by the government, or regimen, of the word with which they are associated.

Góvernmentál. adj. Connected with, indicated, initiated, or pursued by, government.

Lord Palmerston has issued the following circular to members of the House of Commons understood to be favourable to the governmental policy.—The Times Newspaper, January 23, 1854.

Góvernör. s.

1. One who has the supreme direction.

It must be confessed, that of Christ, working as a creator and a governor of the world by providence, all are partakers.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

They best in us a great idea and veneration of the mighty author and governor of such stupendous bodies, and excite and elevate our minds to his adoration and praise.—Bentley.

2. One who is invested with supreme authority in a state.

For the kingdom is the Lord's, and he is the governor among the nations.—Psalms, xlii. 23.

The magistrate cannot urge obedience upon such potent grounds as the minister, if so disposed, can urge disobedience; as, for instance, if my governor should command me to do a thing, or I must die, or forfeit my estate; and the minister steps in and tells me that I offend God, and ruin my soul, if I obey that command, 'tis easy to see a greater force in this persuasion.—South, Sermons.

3. One who rules any place with delegated and temporary authority.

To you, lord governor,
Remains the guise of this hellish villain.
Shakespeare, Othello, v. 2.

4. Tutor; one who has care of a young man.

To Kitham will I, where the young king is,
Being ordain'd his special governor;
And for his safety there I'll best devise.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. i. 1.

The great work of a governor is to fashion the carriage, and form the mind; to settle in his pupil good habits, and the principles of virtue and wisdom.—Locke.

During the minority of kings, the election of bishops, and other affairs of the church, must be left in the hands of their governors and courtiers.—Locke.

Sir Wyndham Knatchbull, and a worthy clergyman, his governor, are under such ridiculous persecutions, merely for their civilities to me, that I heartily pray none of my friends and relations may travel hitherto.—Lady M. W. Montague, letter, April 11.

Sir Wyndham Knatchbull and his governor, M. de Vigner, are at length parted.—Id., May 22, 1769.

5. Slang for father.
6. Pilot; regulator; manager.

Behold also the ships, which though they be so great, and are driven of fierce winds, yet they are turned about with a very small helm, whithersoever the governor bleseth.—James, iii. 4.

Gowk. s. [Provincial and Scottish, gowk = cuckoo; whence the secondary meaning is supposed to be derived, and from that gucky.] Simpleton.

Such giddy-headed gowks.—Dalrymple, Memoirs, p. 27: 1799.

Gowk. v. a. Make a fool of anyone; puzzle.

Nay, look how the man stands as he were gowked.—B. Jonson, Magnetic Lady, iii. 4. (Nares by H. & W.)

Gown. s. [Low Lat. gonna.] Long upper garment.

a. Generally.

They make garments either short, as cloaks, or, as gowns, long to the ground.—Abbot, Description of the World.

In length of train descends her sweeping gown,
And by her graceful walk the queen of love is known.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

b. Woman's.

I despise your new gown, till I see you dressed in it.—Pope.

Yet not superior to her sex's cares,
The mode she fixes by the gown she wears;
Of silks and chins she's the last appeal;
In these great points she leads the commonweal.

Young.

c. Man's.

The benefices themselves are so mean in Irish counties, that they will not yield any competent maintenance for any honest minister, scarcely to buy him a gown.—Spencer, View of the State of Ireland.

Girl in his Galin gown the hero met.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

d. As worn by members of certain peaceful professions, such as divinity, medicine, and law; hence dress of peace. When this is the case the phrase is often a Latinism; toga having the same import: cedant arma togæ (i.e. the gown of the orator).

He Mars depos'd, and arms to gowns made yield;
Successful councils did him soon approve
As fit for close intrigues as open field.

Dryden, On the Death of Oliver Cromwell.

Gowned. adj. Dressed in a gown.

A noble crew about them waited round
Of sage and sober peers, all gravely gowned.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

We'll again to Rome, and with the terror
Of our approach make earthquakes in the hearts
Of her gowned senators.

Nabbes, Hannibal and Scipio: 1637.

(Nares by H. & W.)

Well might the gowned Romans fear when Pompey fled.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermon, p. 215: 1651.

In velvet white as snow the troop was gowned,
The swam with sparkling emeralds set around.

Dryden.

Gównman. s. One whose proper habit is a gown; member of the university, as opposed to Townsman: (Gownsmen now commoner).

Let him with pedants
Pore out his life amongst the lay gownsmen.
Keats.

Thus will that whole bench, in an age or two, be composed of mean, fawning gownsmen, dependants upon the court for a morsel of bread.—Swift.

These were all the gownsmen that I knew above eighty years old in Oxford.—Bishop Lloyd, To Dr. Charles, A Short Letter, l. 208: 1710.

If townsmen by our influence are so enlightened, what must we gownsmen be ourselves.—The Student, l. 65: 1750.

To a person unacquainted with our universities, the distance between the gownsmen and the townsmen, as they are called—the trading part of the latter especially—is carried to an excess that would appear harsh and incredible.—C. Lamb, Essays of Elia, Poor Relations.

Góward. s. Goosekeeper.

A person called a gozard, i.e. gooseherd, attends the flock, and, twice a day, drives the whole to water, then brings them back again to their limitations, helping those that live in the upper stories to their nests without even misplace a single bird.—Pennant, British Zoology, The Graylag Goose. (Rich.)

Grábble. v. n. Grope.

My blood chills about my heart at the thought of these rogues, with their bloody hands grabbling in my ribs, and pulling out my very entrails.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Grace. s. [Lat. plural, gratiae.] The three Graces, in Greek Xárites, were three female deities supposed by the ancients to embody, represent, or confer beauty. Any one of the Gratiae spoken of singly would give a singular number; the plural, however, is the commoner.

1. As a proper, rather than a common, term.

This forehead, where your verse has mid
The loves delighted, and the graces play'd. Prior.

2. That which, whether a natural gift or the result of art, sets off anything to advantage; embellishment; beauty.

Where justice grows, there grows the greater grace.

The which doth quench the brand of hellish smart.

Spenser.

It doth grieve me, that things of principal excellency should be thus bitten at by men whom God hath endued with graces, both of wit and learning, for better purposes.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Her purple habit sits with such a grace

On her smooth shoulders, and so suits her face.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

The charming Lausus, full of youthful fire,
To Turnus only second in the grace.

Of manly men, and features of the face. Ibid.

To write and speak correctly gives a grace, and gains a favourable attention to what one has to say.

—Locke.

With a sparing use of ornament, hardly indulging more in figures, or even in figurative expression, than the most severe examples of ancient chasteness allowed—with little variety of style, hardly any of the graces of manner—he no sooner rose than he carried away every hearer, and kept the attention fixed and undragging till it pleased him to let it go.—Lord Bringham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Mr. Pitt.

Grace. s. [Fr.; Lat. gratia.]

1. Favour; kindness.

If the highest love in no base person may aspire to grace, then may I hope your beauty will not be without pity. Sir P. Sidney.

Or early, or all, may win a lady's grace;

Then either of you knights may well deserve

A princess born. Dryden, Palamon and Arcite.

With good; generally plural, though only, when used in this sense, we may be in a person's good graces; we do such or such things with a good grace.

Demand delivery of her heart,

Her goods, and chattels, and good graces,

And person, up to his embraces. Butler, Hudibras.

He knows that, as a go-between, he shall find his account in being in the good graces of a man of wealth.—Tutler, no. 225.

2. In Theology.

In simplicity and godly sincerity, not with fleshly wisdom, but by the grace of God, we have had our conversation in the world.—1 Corinthians, i. 12.

Prevenient grace descending had remov'd
The stony from their hearts, and made new flesh
Regenerate grow instead.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 2.

Within the church, in the public profession and external communion thereof, are contained persons truly good and sanctified, and hereafter saved; and together with them other persons void of all saving grace, and hereafter to be damned.—Bishop Pearson.

3. Pardon; mercy.

Noble pity held
His hand a while, and to their choice gave space
Which they would prove, his valour or his grace.
Waller

Flow and sue for grace,
With suppliant knees.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 111.

4. Favour conferred.

I should therefore esteem it great favour and grace.
Would you be so kind as to go in my place.
Prior, The Thief and the Cordelier.

5. Privilege.

But to return and view the cheerful skies, . . .
To few great Jupiter imparts this grace.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

6. Behaviour, considered as decent and becoming, or the contrary: (with good or bad).

The same words in Philoela's mouth, as from one woman to another, no as there were no other body by, might have had a better grace, and perchance have found a gentler receipt.—Sir P. Sidney.
Have I reason of good grace in what I do?—Sir W. Temple.

7. Title of a duke or archbishop; formerly of the king, meaning the same as Your Goodness, or Your Clemency.

Here come I from our princely general
To know your griefs; to tell you from his grace,
That he will give you audience.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 1.
High and mighty king, your grace, and those your nobles here present, may be pleased to bow your ears.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

According to the usual proceedings of your grace, and of the court, with delinquents which are overtaken with error in simplicity, there was yielded unto him a deliberate, patient, and full hearing, together with a satisfactory answer to all his main objections.—White.

8. In Academic language. Resolution of the legislative body of either the university at large, or some particular portion of it, such as a college or hall. In the extract it seems to mean degree, right, or privilege thereby conferred.

He received all the graces and degrees, the procuratorship and the doctorship could be obtained there.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Airs and graces. Affectation.

Old Sir Pitt . . . chuckled at her airs and graces, and would laugh by the hour together at her assumption, of dignity and imitations of genteel life.—Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

Grace. s. [from gratias, the same word as gratin, except that it is in the accusative plural, and is translated by thanks; gratias tibi agimus = we give thee thanks.] Short prayer or thanksgiving said before or after meals.

Your soldiers use him as the grace 'fore meat,
Their talk at table, and their thanks at end.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 7.
Our excess of modesty makes us unamused in all the exercises of piety and devotion. This humour prevails upon us daily; inasmuch, that at many willow'd tables the master of the house is so very modest a man that he has not the confidence to say grace at his own table.—Addison, Spectator, no. 454.

While grace is saying after meat, do you and your brethren take the chairs from behind the company.—Swift.

Then cheerful healths, your mistress shall have place;
And what is more rare, a poet shall say grace. Pope.

Grace. v. a.

1. Adorn; dignify; embellish; recommend; decorate.

This they study, this they practice, this they grace with a wanton superfluity of wit.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Rich crowns were on their royal scutcheons plac'd,
With sapphires, diamonds, and with rubies grac'd.
Dryden, Palamon and Arcite.

By both his parents of descent divine;
Great Jove and Phœbus grac'd his noble line. Pope.

2. Honour by an act of favour.

He writes
How happily he lives, how well-belov'd,
And daily graced by the emperor.

Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, l. 1, 2.
Praise it your highness
To grace us with your royal company.

Id., Macbeth, iii. 4.
He might at his pleasure grace or disgrace whom he would in court.—Kneller, History of the Turks.
When the guests withdrew,
Their courteous host, saluting all the crew,
Regards pass'd her o'er, nor grac'd with kind adieu. Dryden.

Dispose all honours to the sword and gown,
Grace with a nod, and ruin with a frown.

3. Supply with grace, in the theological sense of the term.

Grace the disobedient.—Bishop Hall, Works, ii. 50.
Grace-cup. s. Cup or health drunk after grace.

The grace-cup serv'd, the cloth away,
Jove thought it time to shew his play. Prior.

Graced. part. adj. Endowed with grace.
Hare, or rhetorical, unless in combination with a qualifying word such as well, ill.

1. Beautiful; graceful.

He saw this gentleman, one of the properest and best graced men that ever I saw, being of a middle age and a mean stature.—Sir P. Sidney.

2. Virtuous; regular; chaste.

Epicurian and lust
Make it more like a tavern or a brothel,
Than a grac'd palace. Shakespeare, King Lear, l. 4.

Gracious. adj.

1. Full of grace and virtue.

You have a holy father,
A gracious gentleman, against whose person,
No sacred as it is, I have done sin.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 1.

2. Beautiful with dignity.

Amid the troops, and like the leading god,
High o'er the rest in arms, the gracious Turnus rode.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Matchless his pen, victorious his lance;
Bold in the lists, and gracious in the dance. Pope.
Yet gracious ease, and sweetness void of pride,
Might hide her faults, if belles had faults to hide.

Id.
Gracful to sight, and elegant to thought,
The great are vanquish'd, and the wise are taught.
Young.

Graciously. adv. In a graceful manner; with pleasing dignity.

Through nature and through art she rang'd,
And graciously her subject chang'd.

Swift, Cadenus and Vanessa.
Walking is the mode or manner of man, or of a beast; but walking graciously implies a manner or mode superadded to that action.—Watts, Logic.

Graciously. s. Attribute suggested by Graceful.

Petrarch's Tuscan graciously,
Or Theban Pindar's lofty strain.

Hakewell, Apology, p. 250.
If hearers are amas'd from whence
Proceeds that fund of wit and sense,
Which, though her modesty would shroud,
Breaks like the sun behind a cloud;
While graciously its art conceals,
And yet through every motion steals.

Graceless. adj. Void of grace.

This graceless man, for furtherance of his guile,
Did court the handmaid of my lady dear. Spenser.
In all manner of graceless and hopeless characters, some are lost for want of advice, and others for want of heed.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

Furnished for offences he crossed the way
Betwixt the graceless villain and his prey. Dryden.

Gracelessly. adv. In a graceless manner.

The French, in his whole language, hath not one word that hath his recent in the last syllable saving two, called antepenultimus; and little more hath the Spanish; and therefore very gracelessly may they use dactyls. — Sir P. Sidney, Defence of Poetry.

Gracelessness. s. Attribute suggested by Graceless.

It were too homely to run over what has been before said of our adversary's insolency and unmanerliness, impudency and gracelessness against the Scriptures.—Dr. Favours, Antiquity's Triumph over Novelty, p. 165: 1619.

Graces. As in Good graces. See Grace from Gratia.

Gracious. adj.

1. Merciful; benevolent.

Common sense and reason could not but tell them that the good and gracious God could not be pleased, nor consequently worshipped, with any thing barbarous or cruel.—South, Sermons.

To be good and gracious, and a lover of knowledge, are two of the most suitable things.—Dr. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Favourable; kind.

And the Lord was gracious unto them, and had compassion on them.—2 Kings, xlii. 25.
Unbann'd Ulysses' house,
In which I find receipt of gracious.

Chapman, Translation of the Odyssey.
From now reveal
A gracious beam of light; from now inspire
My tongue to sing, my hand to touch the lyre. Prior.

3. Acceptable; favoured.

Doctrine is much more profitable and gracious by example than by rule.—Spenser.
He made us gracious before the kings of Persia, so that they gave us food.—Esther, viii. 80.

Gurion, who was now general of the horse, was no more gracious to prince Rupert than Wilmet had been.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

4. Good; excellent.

Kings are no less unhappy, their issues not being gracious, than they are in losing them when they have approved their virtues.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 1.

The grievous abuse which hath been of councils, should rather cause men to study how so gracious a thing may again be reduced to that first perfection.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

5. Becoming; pleasing. Obsolete.

There was not such a gracious creature born.
Shakespeare, King John, iii. 4.

Our women's names are more gracious than their Rutilia, that is, red head.—Caution.

Ballust's expression would be shorter and more compact; Cleora's more gracious and flowing.—Bishop Hurd.

Graciously. adv. In a gracious manner.

His testimony he graciously confirm'd, that it was the best of all my tragedies.—Dryden.
He heard my vows, and graciously decreed
My grounds to be restor'd, my former flocks to feed.

Id., Translation of Virgil.

If her majesty would but graciously be pleased to think a hardship of this nature worthy her royal consideration.—Swift.

Graciousness. s. Attribute suggested by Gracious.

1. Mercy; merciful and kind condescension.

Their enemies shall laugh, when themselves shall have cause to weep, unless the graciousness of God stir up some worthy princes of renown, and reputation, with both sides to interpose their wisdom.—Sir R. Sandys, State of Religion.

The graciousness and temper of this answer made no impression on them.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

The University of Cambridge was received at St. James's with comparative coldness. The answers to the addresses of Oxford were all graciousness and warmth.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, The Earl of Chatham.

2. Possession of graces or good qualities.

The acts derive their graciousness from the habits.
—Bishop Barlow, Remains, p. 437.

3. Pleasing manner.

He possessed some violence of graciousness and attraction which books had not taught.—Johnson, Rambler, no. 147.

Gradation. s. [Lat. gradatio, -onis; gradus = step.]

1. Regular progress from one degree to another.

The desire of more and more rises by a natural gradation to most, and after that to all.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

The law of continuity is this:—that a quantity cannot pass from one amount to another by any change of conditions, without passing through all intermediate magnitudes according to the intermediate conditions. This law may often be employed to disprove distinctions which have no real foundation. The method of gradation consists in taking a number of stages of a property in question, intermediate between two extreme cases which appear to be different. This method is employed to determine whether the extreme cases are really distinct or not. The method of gradation, applied to decide the question, whether the existing ecological phenomena arise from existing causes, leads to this result:—The phenomena do appear to arise from existing causes, but that the action of existing causes may, in past times, have transgressed, in any extent, their recorded limits of intensity.—Whewell, Novum Organum renovatum, Aphorisms, 48–51.

And as, between those relative positions in which the coexistence of two objects can be known only by a slight turn of the head, and those in which it can be known only by turning the head half round, there is also a series of imperceptible transitions; it follows that the coexistence of two dots lying close together, and that of two objects lying respectively behind and before the observer, are known in modes which, however apparently different, are united by insensible gradations, and must be principally the same.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology, p. 304.

2. Regular advance step by step.

From thence,
By cold gradation, and well balanc'd form,
We shall proceed with Angelo.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iv. 3.
The painter yet elegantly expresseth to us the several gradations by which men at last come to this horrid degree of impiety.—Archbishop Tillotson.

3. Order; sequence; series.

"In the course of service;
Preferment goes by letter and affection,
Not, as of old, graduation, where each second Blood heir to th' first." Shakespeare, Othello, I. 1.

4. Regular process of argument.

Certain it is, by a direct gradation of consequences from this principle of merit, that the obligation to gratitude flows from, and is enjoined by, the first dictates of nature.—South, Sermons.

Gradatory. adj. Proceeding step by step.

Could we have seen his [Machiavelli's] crimes darkening on their progress, till they attain the direct extent of human depravity; could this gradatory apostasy have been shewn us; could the noble and useful moral, which results, have been thus forcibly impressed upon our minds, without a violation of those senseless unities [of time and place]!—Seward,
Lectures, iii. 243.

Grade. s. Rank; degree.

I had seen Indians of all grades, ages, and classes;
I do not mean the savage tribes of American Indians, but Indians, so called from having resided in our different settlements in the east, although British born. I have seen the yellow-checked civilian, and the well-browned soldier of half a century's standing, and these in all their varieties; but Mr. Nubley, who received me at the door of his hospitable house, was unlike any thing I had ever seen.—Theodore Hook,
Gilbert Gurney, vol. iii. ch. iii.

The fourth grade is identical with the variety of general insanity about to be noticed, under the head of Fatuity, or annihilation of the powers of mind.
The slighter forms or grades of dementia, or incoherency and imbecility, are evinced by a loss of control over the ideas, and of the faculty of attention.—Cap-land, Dictionary of Practical Medicine, Insanity.

Over grammar-schools, the clergy possessed an authority fully equal to that which they had in the universities. They also appointed and removed, at their own pleasure, teachers of every grade, from village schoolmasters to tutors in private families.—Buckle,
History of Civilization in England, vol. ii.
ch. vi.

Gradient. adj. Walking; moving by steps.

Amongst these gradient automata, that iron spider is especially remarkable, which, being but of an ordinary business, did creep up and down as if it had been alive.—Wilkins.

Gradient. s. Proportionate ascent or descent of a plane, chiefly on railway lines.

Tables have been drawn up to show the lengths of equivalent horizontal lines to gradients from 1 in 80 to 1 in 1500.—Cressy, Encyclopedia of Civil Engineering, b. ii. ch. xxx.

Grādual. adj. Proceeding by degrees; advancing step by step; from one stage to another.

Nobler birth
Of creatures animate with grādual life,
Of growth, sense, reason, all mimm'd up in man.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 111.
Men still suppose a grādual natural process of things; so that, from great, things and persons should grow greater, till at length, by many steps and ascents, they came to be at greatest.—South.

Grādual. s. Order of steps. Obsolete.

Before the grādual prostrate they ador'd,
The pavement kiss'd, and thus the saint implor'd.
Dryden.

Grāduality. s. Proceeding, procession, or progression, by degrees.

This some ascribe unto the mixture of the elements, others to the grāduality of opacity and light.—*Sir
T. Browne*.

We do not call the seedling the cause of the full grown tree; the invariable antecedent it certainly is, and we know very imperfectly on what other antecedents the sequence is contingent, but we are convinced that it is contingent on something; because the homogeneity of the antecedent with the consequent, the close resemblance of the seedling to the tree in all respects except magnitude, and the grāduality of the growth, so exactly resembling the progressively accretive effect produced by the long action of some one cause, leave no possibility of doubting that the seedling and the tree are two terms in a series of that description, the first term of which is yet to seek.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, b. iii. ch. xv. § 3.

Grādually. adv. In a gradual manner.

1. By degrees; in regular progression.

When the moon passes over the fixed stars, and eclipses them, your light vanishes; not grādually, like that of the planets, but all at once.—*Sir I.
Newton, On Opticks*.

The Author of our being weans us grādually from our fondness of life the nearer we approach towards the end of it.—Swift.

Human creatures are able to bear air of much greater density in diving, and of much less upon the tops of mountains, provided the changes be made grādualy.—A. B. Smith.

2. In degree.

Human reason doth not only grādualy, but specially differ from the fantastick reason of brutes.
—Cressy.

Grāduate. v. a.

1. Invest with a degree in the university.

John Trygonwell, grāduate a doctor and dubbed a knight, did good service.—Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

Concerning columns and their adjuncts, architects make such a noise as if the terms of architecture, friars, and cornices were enough to grāduate a master of this art.—Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

2. Mark with degrees; the commonest application being to the thermometer; an application within the term centigrade (hundred + degree) is conveyed by the name.

The places were marked where the spirits stood at the severest cold and greatest heat, and according to these observations he grāduate his thermometers.
—Berham.

The stem should be grāduate in inches and tenths on one side, and in centimeters and millimeters on the other, so that either the English or the French measure may be used. . . . The gradation, of course, should commence from the fixed arm. Each arm should also be grāduate in the same manner, the gradation starting from the stem. With this simple craneometer all the measurements in the first column may be very quickly taken.—G. Hank, On a Systematic Mode of Craneometry: Transactions of the Ethnological Society.

3. Raise to a higher place in the scale of metals.

The tincture was capable to transmute or graduate as much silver as equalled in weight that gold.—
Boyle.

4. Heighten; improve.

Not only vitriol is a cause of blackness, but the salts of natural bodies; and dyers advance and graduate their colours with salts.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.

Grāduate. v. n.1. Take an academical degree; become a graduate: (as, 'He *grāduate*d at Oxford').

2. Proceed regularly, or by degrees.

A grand light falls beautifully on the principal figure, but it does not grāduate sufficiently into distant parts of the cave.—Gilpin.

Grāduate. s. One who has taken an aca-demical degree as opposed to an undergraduate.

I know the arts
And sciences do not directlier make
A graduate in our universities,
Than an habitual gravity prefers
A man in court. . . . B. Jonson, Magnetick Lady.
An oath taken by Oxford grāduates [was] that they should not profess at Stamford.—Selden, On Drayton's Polyglottion, song 8.
Of grāduates I dislike the learned rout,
And choose a female doctor for the gout. Araratton.

Grāduate ship. s. State of a graduate.

An English concordance, and a topical folio, the gatherings and savings of a sober graduate ship.—
Milton, Areopagitica.

Grāduation. s.1. Regular progression by succession of degrees.

The grāduation of the parts of the universe is likewise necessary to the perfection of the whole.—Cressy, Cosmologia Sacra.

2. Marking with degrees.

(For example see under Grāduate, v. a. 2.)

3. Improvement; exaltation of qualities.

Of greater repugnancy unto reason is that which he delivers concerning its grāduation, that heated in fire, and often extinguished in oil of mars or iron, the lunestone acquires an ability to extract a nail fastened in a wall.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.

4. Act of conferring academical degrees.

The ministers are now reconciled to distinction;
and as it must always happen that some will excel others, have thought grāduation a proper testimony of uncommon abilities or acquisitions.—Johnson,
Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Grāduator. s. Instrument, consisting of a tube and other details of apparatus, used in vinegar-making.

These tubes serve to allow the air that enters by the eight circumferential tubes to circulate freely through the grāduator.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Grāf. s. [Dutch, gracht.] Ditch; moat.

Though the fortifications were not regular, yet the walls were good, the grāf broad and deep.—
Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Grāf. s. Same as Graft.

God gave unto man all kinds of seeds and grāfs of life.—Sir W. Raleigh.

'Tis usual now an inmate grāf to see
With insolence invade a foreign tree. Dryden.
Now the clef and rift inserted grāfs receives. Pope.

Grāf. v. a. Graft.

And they also, if they abide not still in unbelief, shall be *grāf*ed in; for God is able to grāf them in again.—Romans, xi. 23.
Now let me grāf my pears, and prune the vine. Dryden.

Grāf. v. n. Practise incision.

To have fruit in greater plenty the way is to grāf, not only upon young stocks, but upon divers boughs of an old tree; for they will bear great numbers of fruit; whereas, if you grāf but upon one stock, the tree can bear but few.—Incon.

Grāfing. verbal use. Grafting.

In March is good grāfing the skilful do know,
So long as the wind in the east do not blow:
From now being changed, till past be the prime,
For grāfing and cropping is very good time.
*Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good
Husbandry*.

Graft. s. Scion. [see last extract.]

It is likely, that as in fruit-trees the grāf maketh a greater fruit, so in trees that bear no fruit it will make the greater leaves. Incon, Natural and Experimental History.
If you cover the top with clay and horse-dung, in the same manner as you do a grāf, it will help to heal the sooner.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

We two have grown,
From birth on my side, boyhood upon his,
Inseparably together, as two grāfs
Out of the self-same stock; y'are shared alike
The sun and shower and all that Heaven hath sent us. H. Taylor, Philip van Artevelde, iv. 3.

[Graft, Graft.—French greffe, a slip or shoot of a tree for grafting; Dutch greffe, a cutting either for grafting or setting in the ground, also a style for writing.
From Latin graphium, a style, or pointed instrument for writing on waxen tablets. (Graphium vel scriptorium, greff.) (Glossary of Etymology.) In like manner Spanish injerto, a sprig or shoot of a vine, from Latin macro; Modern Greek, εεργαμα, a graft, εεργω, to graft, from εεργω, anything pointed.
Grafting was often called the penning of trees.—
Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Graft. v. a.

1. Implant as a scion.

With his pruning hook disjoin
Unbearing branches from their head, Dryden.
And grāf more happy in their stead.
His growth is but a wild and fruitless plant;
I'll cut his barren branches to the stock,
And grāf you on to bear. Id., Jon Sebastian.

2. Impregnate with an adscititious branch.

You are three
That Rome should dole on; yet, by the faith of men, We've some old crab-trees here at home, that will not
Be *grāf*ed to your relish.
Shakespeare, Christopher Columbus, II. 1.
The noble tale doth want her proper limb;
Her royal stock grāf with ignoble plants.
Id., Richard III: III. 7.

3. Join one thing so as to receive support from another.

This resolution against any peace with Spain is a new incident *grāf*ed upon the original quarrel, by the intrigues of a faction among us.—Swift.
May one kind grave unite each impious name,
And grāf my love immortal on thy fame.
Pope, Epistle to Abolard.

Grāfter. s. One who grafts.

Or that the grāfter and waterer be nothing . . .
without whose work there should be no increase.—
Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner,
p. 378.

I am informed, by the trials of the most skilful grāfters of these parts, that a man shall seldom fail of having cherry-borne by his graft the same year in which the incision is made.—Boyle.

Grail. s. [Fr. grêle.] Small particles of any kind.

Hereof this gentle knight unweeting was;
And, lying down upon the sandy grail,
Dronk of the stream as clear as crystal glass.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

The bottom yellow, like the golden grayle,
That bright Pegasus washeth with his streams.
Id., Vision of Belshazzar.

Grail. s. [Lat. graduale.] This, and the preceding, are the only words which, as being common rather than proper names, have place in a dictionary. The Saint or Holy Grail; Grail, or Grayle, or the dish out of which our Lord was believed to have eaten at the Last Supper, and in which Joseph of Arimathea was supposed to have caught his blood, the origin of the numerous romances connected with the Quest or Seeking of the same, is a proper name.] Book containing some of the offices of the Roman church.

Among the books they found there, were one hundred psalters, as many graspals, and forty missals, which undoubtedly belonged to the choir of the church.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, vol. i. dim. 2.

Grain. s. [Lat. granum.]

1. Single seed of corn.

His reasons are as two grains of wheat hid in two bushels of chaff.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, i. 1.

Many of the ears, being six inches long, had sixty grains in them, and none less than forty.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Specially applied, in the plural, to the husks of malted barley after having been exhausted by brewing, and opposed to malt, of which the grains are the refuse.

Give them grains their fill,
Husks, draff, to drink and will.

B. Jonson, New Inn.

2. Corn.

As it chills, the woodsman
Upon the alme and ooze scatters his grain,
And shortly comes to harvest.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 7.
Pales no longer swell'd the treading grain,
Nor Phoebus fed his ozen on the plain.

Dryden, Pastorals.

'Tis a rich soil, I grant you; but oftener covered
With weeds than grain.—Culter, On Fame.

3. Kind of grain.

As to the other grains, it is to be observed, as the wheat ripened very late, the barley got the start of it, and was ripe first.—Barke.

4. Any minute particle; any single body.

Thou exist'st on many thousand grains
That issue out of dust.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

By intelligence

And proofs as clear as fountains in July, when
We see each grain of gravel. Id., Henry VIII. i. 1.

5. Smallest weight, of which in physic twenty make a scruple, and in troy weight twenty-four make a pennyweight; and so named because it is supposed of equal weight with a grain of corn.

Unity is a precious diamond, whose grains as they double, twice double in their value. Holday.

They began at a known body, a barley-corn, the weight whereof is therefore called a grain; which arithm, being multiplied, to scruples, drachmas, ounces, and pounds.—Holder.

The trial being made betwixt lead and lead, weighing severally seven drachms, in the air; the balance in the water weigheth only four drachms and forty-one grains, and almost of the weight in the air two drachms and nineteen grains; the balance kept the same depth in the water.—Bacon.

His brain

Outweigh'd his rage but half a grain.

Butler, Hudibras.

6. Anything proverbially small.

For the whole world before thee is as a little grain of the balance.—Wisdome, xl. 24.

It is a sincerely pliable, ductile temper, that neglects not to make use of any grain of grace.—Marmont.

The ungrateful person lives to himself, and subsists by the good nature of others, of which he himself has not the least grain.—South, Sermons.

Grain of allowance. Something indulged or remitted; something above or under the exact weight. See, also, Salt.

He whose very best actions must be seen with grains of allowance, cannot be too mild, moderate, and forgiving.—Addams.

Grain. s. [from Norse gren—branch, in which sense it is provincial.]

1. Direction of the fibres of wood, or other fibrous matter.

Knots, by the conflux of meeting sap,
Infect the sound pine, and divert his grain
Tortive and errant from his course of growth.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

2. Body of the wood as modified by the fibres.

The beech, the swimming alder, and the plane,
Hard box, and linden of a softer grain. Dryden.

3. Body considered with respect to the form or direction of the constituent particles.

The tooth of a sea-horse, in the midst of the solid parts, contains a curved grain not to be found in ivory.—Sir T. Browne.

Stones of a constitution so compact, and a grain so fine, that they bear a fine polish.—Woodward.

A grain-staff is a quarter staff with a pair of short staves at the end, which they call grains.—Bay, East and South Country Words.

The boatwain struck with a pair of grains out of the cabin window a most beautiful fish, about ten pounds weight.—White, Journal, p. 32.

Grain. s. [from Spanish grano.] See last extract.

1. Dyed or stained substance.

How the red roses flush up in her cheeks,
And the pure snow with gaudy vermill stain,
Like crimson dy'd in grain. Spenser, Epithalamion.
Come, pendive nun, devout and pure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,
Flowing with majestic train.

Milton, Il Penseroso, 32.

2. Temper; disposition; inclination; humour from the direction of fibres.

Your minds, pre-occupied with what
You rather must do than with what you should do,
Made you against the grain to voice his counsel.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, ii. 3.

3. Heart; bottom.

The one being tractable and mild, the other stiff and impatient of a superior, they lived but in running concord, as brothers glued together, but not united in grain.—Hayward.

4. Flesh.

Whose grain [of the salmon] doth rise in flakes,
with fatness interlarded.
Drayton, Polyolbion, song 28. (Ord MS.)

5. Form of the surface, with regard to roughness and smoothness.

The smaller the particles of cutting substances are, the smaller will be the scratches by which they continually fret and wear away the glass until it be polished; but be they never so small, they can wear away the glass no otherwise than by grating and scratching it, and breaking the protuberances; and therefore polish it no otherwise than by bringing its roughness to a very fine grain, so that the scratches and frettings of the surface become too small to be visible.—Sir J. Newton, On Opticks.

[The term grain is a translation of Greek zoonos, given to the insect from its resemblance to a seed or kernel, whence the colour dyed with it was called zoonos, or in Latin coeruleus, as from kerma, the oriental name of the insect, Italian carminio, crimson. The term grana is applied in Spanish as well to the dye itself as to the cloth dyed with it, and also metaphorically to the fresh red colour of the lips and cheeks. Hence probably the grain of wood or of leather, the ornamental appearance of the surface dependent on the course of the fibres. The grain of leather is the shining side, in French grain, or fleur de cuir; fleur in the sense of brilliancy, lustre. The Spanish tez is explained by Neumann grain, shining surface, bloom of the human face. No doubt the term may have its origin in the finer or comest grains of which stone is composed, and the expression may have been transferred from stone to wood and leather, but the former explanation appears to me most probable.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Grain. v. a. [from Lat. granum.] Dye in grain.

Grain. v. a. [from Norse gren.] See Grain-ing.

Grained. part. adj. Dyed in grain.

Thou turn'st mine eyes into my very soul;
And there I see such black and grained spots,
As will not leave their tint.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 4.

Graining. s. [?] Local and rare native fish so called, akin to the dace.

In the Mersey, near Warrington, and in the river Alit which runs by Septon, Lancashire, into the Mersey near Formby, a fish called the graining is taken, which in some reports resembles the dace, yet is a distinct and new species.—Pennant, Tour in Scotland, pp. 11, 12.

The graining is also shortly characterized by Shaw, in his General Zoology. . . . One of the streams which produce the graining rises in Knowley Park. . . . Several streams in the township of Burton Wood and Bankey. . . . and others in or near the township of Knowley, produce the graining in considerable numbers. . . . The first dorsal fin-ray in the graining is short, the second ray the longest.—Yarrell, British Fishes.

Graining. s. Painting so as to imitate the grain of wood, especially oak; 'painting and graining,' painter and grainer, being common notions.

Graining. s. [from Lat. granum.] Roughening as a granulation.

It is called by some the unmill'd guinea, as having no graining upon the rim.—Loake.

Grains. See Grain, s.

Grallatorial. adj. [Lat. gralla = stilt.] In Zoology. Belonging to the order Grallatores, = stilted birds, i.e. birds with legs for wading, as the crane, &c. See Wader.

We have frequently demonstrated in another work, that the racial types throughout ornithology always contain birds which seem to have an instinctive disposition towards domestication; and we may observe that all grallatorial types, however sociably they live among themselves, are yet so remarkably different from the former, that they appear to shun the very approach of man,—never, from choice, coming near his dwellings. . . . The swiftest running birds . . . are the typical grallatores, for they only make use of their wings when suddenly disturbed; they are in continual motion, and their pace is always a swift run.—Huxington, On the Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, §§ 311, 312.

terj. [Fr. grand = great + merci = thanks.] Obsolete expression of obligation.

Graceray, Mammon, said the gentle knight,
For so great grace. Spenser, Faerie Queene.
We have our several palms for several occasions, without graceray to your liturgy.—Milton, Animadversions upon a Defence of the Humble Remonstrance.

Madam, quoth he, graceray for your care.
Dryden, The Cuck and the Fox.

Gramineous. adj. In Botany. Having the character of a grass.

The opinion [of] the great Swedish naturalist, that the true hard was a gramineous plant, and a species of Andropogon.—Sir W. Jones, On the Spokenard of the Ancients.

Graminivorous. adj. [Lat. voro = devour.]

Grass-eating; living upon grass.

The ancients were voracious chiefly in the direction of brutes, among which the graminivorous kind have a party-coloured choroid.—Sharpe, Surgery.

Grammar. s. [Fr. grammaire.]

1. Science of speaking correctly; art which teaches the relations of words to each other.

To be accurate in the grammar and idioms of the tongue, and then as a rhetorician to make all their graces serve his eloquence.—Bishop Fell, Life of Hammond.

We make a countryman dumb, whom we will not allow to speak but by the rules of grammar.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

2. Propriety or justness of speech; speech according to grammar.

'Varium et mutabile semper femina,' is the sharpest satire that ever was made on woman; for the adjectives are neuter, and 'animal' must be understood to make them grammar.—Dryden.

3. Book that treats of the various relations of words to one another.

To speak and write without absurdity the language of one's country, is commendable in persons of all stations, and to some indispensably necessary; and to this purpose, I would recommend above all things the having a grammar of our mother tongue first taught in our schools, which would facilitate our youths learning their Latin and Greek grammars.—Trotter, no. 234.

Used adjectively.

Men, speaking language according to the grammar rules of that language, do yet speak improperly of things.—Locke.

Grammar. v. a. Discourse according to the rules of grammar: (its import in the extract turns on the grammatical term decline). Rare.

I'll grammar with you,
And make a trial how I can decline you.

Bromont and Fletcher, Laws of Candy.

Grammar-school. s. Endowed school for grammatical teaching.

Thou hast most traitorously corrupted the youth of the realm in erecting a grammar-school.—Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 1.

The ordinary way of learning Latin in a grammar-school I cannot encourage.—Locke.

Grammarians. s. One who studies, investigates, or teaches grammar.

Many disputes the ambiguous nature of letters hath created among the grammarians.—Holder, Elements of Speech.

They who have called him the torture of grammarians, might also have called him the plague of translators.—Dryden.

Grammatic. adj. Grammatical: (this latter being the commoner form).

They having but newly left those grammatic fairs and shallow, where they stuck unarmingly to learn a few words with lamentable construction.—Milton, Tractate on Education.

We conclude, therefore, that what was thus inspired was the terms, and that grammatical con-gruently in the use of them, which is dependent thereon.—Warburton, Lectures on Grace.

Grammatical. adj. Belonging to, conveyed by the rules of, grammar.

The beauty of virtue still being not before their eyes, and that taught them with far more diligent care than grammatical rules.—Sir P. Sidney.

They seldom know more than the grammatical construction unless born with a poetical genius.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Poetry.

I shall take the number of consonants, not from the grammatical alphabets of any language, but from the diversity of sounds framed by single articulations with appulse.—Maddox.

Grammatically. adv. In a grammatical manner; according to the rules or science of grammar.

When a sentence is distinguished into the nouns, the verbs, pronouns, adverbs, and other particles of speech which compose it, then it is said to be analysed grammatically.—Watts.

Grammaticaster. s. Mean verbal pedant; low grammarian. Rare.

He tells them true, my noble neophyte; my little grammaticaster, he does.—B. Jonson, Preface.

There would not then be so many fustian and unworthy preachers in divinity, so many petty loggers in law, so many quack-salvers in physick, so many grammaticasters in country schools.—Sir W. Petty, Advice to a Friend, p. 23, 1694.

I have not varied language with the doubts, the remarks, and eternal triflings of the French grammaticasters.—Rymcr.

Grammatication. s. Rule, or refinement, of a grammarian. Rare.

A language of a philosophical institution, or a real character, would be by much the most easy; as being free from all anomaly, equivocalness, redundancy, and unnecessary grammatications.—Dalquarno, Didascalophos, p. 52, 1690.

Grammaticoise. v. n. Act the grammarian. Rare.

Grammaticoisng pedantically, and criticising spuriously upon a few Greek particles.—Bishop Ward, On the Myths of the Gospel, p. 44, 1673.

Grammaticoise. v. a. Render grammatical.

I always wish, Shakespeare had Latin enough to grammaticoise his English.—Johnson, in Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Grammatist. s. Sorry or spurious grammarian; grammaticaster. Rare.

The grammatist has misled the grammarian, and both of them the philosopher.—H. Tucker, Diversions of Purley, l. 328.

Grampus. s. [P.] Cetaceous animal so called (Phocæna Oren).

(Give me leave to name what fish we took; dolphins, porpoise, grampus, which Mr. Sands thinks is the right dolphin, from also being of that opinion.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa &c. l. the Great Asia, p. 384.

The grampus is the largest of the dolphins, being from twenty to twenty-five feet in length, and a most cruel enemy to the whale. The grampus attacks the latter in troops, harass it until it opens its mouth, and then they devour the tongue.—Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

Many fabulous or exaggerated stories have been universally propagated respecting the grampus. It has been considered as not only the most formidable enemy of the larger whales, attacking them in numerous bands, with the utmost fury, and worrying them even to death, but it has been accused of pursuing the common whale for a purpose which would indicate a gastronomic taste worthy of Heliosphalus himself. It is said to harass its huge victim till in its terror and agony it opens its mouth; when the grampus darts upon the tongue and tears and devours the delicious morsel. The truth appears to be, as far as credible testimony can be obtained, that the grampus is extremely voracious. Hunter found . . . a portion of a porpoise in the stomach of one which he examined.—Bell, History of British Quadrupeds, including the Cetææ.

Granary. s. [Lat. granarium.] Storehouse for threshed corn.

Ants, by their labour and industry, contrive that corn will keep as dry in their nests as in our granaries.—Addison.

Grand. adj. [Fr., from Lat. grandis.]

1. Great; illustrious; high in power or dignity.

God had planted, that is, made to grow the trees of life and knowledge, plants only proper and becoming the paradise and garden of a grand Lord.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

VOL. I.

2. Great; splendid; magnificent.

A voice has flown
To re-enclose a grand design. Young.
There is generally in nature something more grand and august than what we meet with in the curia of art.—Addison, Spectator, no. 414.

3. Principal; chief: (hence, in composition, grand-juror, grand-master, grand-signior, and the like).

What cause
Mov'd our grand parents, in that happy state,
Favour'd of heav'n so highly, to fall off
From their Creator. Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 28.

4. Eminent; superior: (very frequently in an ill sense).

Our grand foe Satan.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 1033.
So climb this first grand thief into God's fold.
Ibid. iv. 102.

5. Noble; sublime; lofty; conceived or expressed with great dignity.

Among colours, such as are soft or cheerful (except perhaps a strong red which is cheerful) are unfit to produce grand images.—Burke, On the Sublime and Beautiful, § 10.

6. It is used to signify ascent or descent of consanguinity.

Grándam. s. [grand and dam; hence, when properly sounded, with two d's. Grannam, however, a pronunciation in the other extreme, is common.]

1. Grandmother.

I meeting him, will tell him that my lady
Was fairer than his grándam, and as chaste
As may be in the world.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, l. 3.
We have our forefathers and great grándames
all before us, as they were in Chaucer's days.—Dryden.

The tygress heart belies my angel face;
Too well thou shew'st thy pedigree from stone;
Thy grándame's was the first by Pyrrha thrown.
Ibid.

2. Old withered woman.

The women
Cry'd, one and all, the suppliant should have right,
And to the grándame has adjudg'd the knight.
Dryden, The Wife of Bath's Tale.

Spelt and sounded without any d at all.

Her mother goodwy' Polish has confest'd it
To grannam keep, the nurse, how they did change
The children in their cradles.

B. Jonson, Magnetic Lady.
(Ghosts never walk till after midnight, if I may believe my grannam.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Lovers Progress.

I stripped again, as well to find what ailed me, as to satisfy my grannam's farther curiosity.—Tutler, no. 15.

Off my kind grannam told me, Tim, take warning.
Gay.

Grándchild. s. Child (son or daughter) of a child (son or daughter); member of a second generation.

Augustus Cæsar, out of indignation against his daughters and Agrippa his grándchild, would say that they were not his seed, but imposthumes broken from him.—Ravens.

These hymns may work on future wits, and so
May great grándchildren of thy praise grow.
Donne.

He hoped his majesty did believe, that he would never make the least scruple to obey the gránd-child of king James.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

He 'scaping, with his gods and reliques fled,
And tow'rd the shore his little grándchild led.
Sir J. Denham, The Destruction of Troy.

There is something very absurd in this. Grandfather is properly the great or greater father; but the case seems to be just the contrary with gránd-child, who is the little or less child. The French therefore express it much more sensibly than we do,
by petit fils.—Pepper.

Gránddaughter. s. Female grándchild.

This gránddaughter of a man, who will be an everlasting glory to the nation, has now for some years with her husband kept a little chandler's or grocer's shop for their subsistence.—Bishop Newton, Life of Milton.

Grándé. s. Man of great rank, power, or dignity; great man; magnate: (which last word it nearly translates).

In a great person, right worshipsful sir, a right honourable grándé, 'tis not a venal sin; no, not a peccadillo!—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, to the reader.

In this mercy-seat, it is observable, three grándies are met together; blessing, joy, and hope; and yet there is no strife for precedence.—Archbishop Laud, Sermons, p. 43.

They had some sharper and some milder differences, which might easily happen in such an interview of grándies, both vehement on the parts which they sway'd.—Sir H. Wotton.

When a prince or grándie manifests a liking to such a thing, men generally set about to make themselves considerable for such things.—South.

Some parts of the Spanish monarchy are rather for ornament than strength: they furnish out vice-royalties for the grándies, and posts of honour for the noble families.—Addison.

In the effulgence of his ordinary language he surpassed the Macedonian grándie; in their exquisite elegance the effeminate princes of Cyprus and Phenicia.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lix.

His elevation was even with scarcely less satisfaction by the bigoted grándies of Castile than by the English Whigs.—Maccarty, History of England, ch. x.

On one point, it was announced, his [George III.'s] mind was unalterably made up. Under no circumstances whatever should those Whig grándies, who had enervated his predecessor and endeavored to enervate himself, be restored to power.—Id., Critical and Historical Essays, The Earl of Chatham.

Grándeship. s. Rank or estate of a grán-dee; lordship.

I think the conde de Altamira has no less than nineteen grándeships centred in his person.—Swinburne, Travels through Spain, let. 42.

Grándour. s.

1. State; splendour of appearance; magnificence.

As a magistrate or great officer, he looks himself from all approaches by the multiplied formalities of attendance, by the distance of ceremony and grán-deur.—South, Sermons.

2. Greatness, as opposed to minuteness.

Let a man try to conceive the different bulk of an animal, which in twenty, from another, which is a hundred times less than a mile; or to compare, in his thoughts, a length of a thousand diameters of the earth with that of a million; and he will quickly find that he has no different measures in his mind adjusted to such extraordinary degrees of grándour or minuteness.—Addison, Spectator, no. 420.

3. Elevation of sentiment, language, or mien.

To want little is true grándour; and very few things are great to a great mind.—Tutler, no. 170.

Grándevity. s. [Lat. cærum = age, life.] Great age; length of life.

Dr. More for his function and grándevity takes hundreds Mr. Baxter so respectfully, and forbears all such juvenilities as he had used towards Eugenius.
—Annotations on the Discovery of Truth, p. 183: 1683.

Grándfather. s. Parent's father; father of my father or mother; next above my father or mother in the scale of ascent.

One was saying that his great grándfather, and grándfather, and father died at sea: said another that he had heard him. An' I were as you, I would never come at sea. Why, with us, whose did your great grándfather, and grándfather, and father die? He answered, Where but in their beds? He answered,
An' I were as you, I would never come in bed.—Bacon.

Our grándchildren will see a few rag hung up in Westminster-hall, which cost an hundred millions, whereof they are paying the arrears, and boast that their grándfathers were rich and great.—Swift.

Grándloquence. s. [Lat. loquor = speak.]
High, lofty, or big speaking.

The prophet has promised them with such magnificent words, and enthusiastic grándloquence.—
Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 271.

Grándity. s. Grátiness; grándeur; magnificence. An old word.

Our poets excel in grándity and gravity, smoothness and property, in quickness and brevity.—
C Camden, Remains.

Grándly. adv. In a grand manner; sublimely; loftily.

I now saw what I never saw before, a prodigious sea, with immense billows, coming upon a vessel, so as that it seemed hardly possible to escape. There was something grándly horrible in the sight.—
Bonelli, Tour to the Hebrides, p. 342.

Grándmother. s. Parents' mother; mother of my father or mother.

Thy grándmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice.—
1 Timothy, l. 5.

Grándness. s. Attribute suggested by Grand; greatness.

In order to prove to any one the grándness of this fabrick of the world, one need only to bid him consider the sun.—Wolaston, Religion of Nature, § v. 14.

Grandsire. s.*1. Grandfather.

Think 't thou that I will leave my kingly throne,
Wherein my grandsire and my father sat!

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. l. 1.

Thy grandsire, and his brother, to whom fame Gave, from two conquer'd parts o' th' world, their name.

Sir J. Denham.

The wreath his grandsire knew to reap
By active toil and military sweat.

Prior.

2. Any ancestor, poetically.

Why should a man, whose blood is warm within,
Sit like his grandsire, cut in alabaster?

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, l. 1.

Above the portal, carv'd in cedar wood,
I see'd in their ranks, their godlike grandsires stood.

Dryden.

No mimic ancient wits at best,
As apes our grandsires in their doublets dress.

Pope.

Gránsón. s. Son of a son or daughter.

Almighty Jove augment your wealthy store,
Give much to you, and to his gránsóns more.

Dryden.

(Grandfathers in private families are not much observed to have great influence on their gránsóns, and, I believe, they have much less among princes.)

—Swift.

Grange. s. [Fr. grange; from Lat. granum, grain, corn.]*1. Granary.

It thought it was the sound
Of riot and ill-manag'd merriment,
Such as the jocular flute, or gamewome pipe,
Mirs up among the house unletter'd hind;
When for their teeming flocks, and granges full,
In wanton dance they praise the bounteous Pan.

Milton, Comus, 171.

2. Farm: (generally a farm with a house at a distance from neighbours).

At the moated grange resides this dejected Mariam. Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

One, when he had got the inheritance of an unlucky old grange, would needs sell it; and, to draw buyers, proclaimed the virtues of it: nothing ever thrived on it, said he; . . . the trees were all blasted, the swine died of the mares, the cattle of the murrain, and the sheep of the rot; nothing was ever reared there, not a duckling or a goose. —B. Jonson, Discourses.

It is only the poor grange,
The patrimony which my father left me,
I would be tenant to.

Brannum and Fletcher, The Prophets.

If the church was of their own foundation, they might chuse, the incumbent being deceased, whether they would put any other therein; unless, perhaps, the said church had people belonging to it; for then they must still maintain a curate: and of this sort were their granges and priories. —Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

A grange implies some one particular house immediately inferior in rank to a hall, situated at a small distance from the town or village from which it takes its name; as Hornby Grange, Blackwell Grange, and is in the neighbourhood simply called the Grange. Originally, perhaps, these buildings were the lord's granary or storehouse, and the residence of his chief butler. —Ritson.

A grange, in its original signification, meant a farmhouse of a monastery (from grana gerendo), from which it was always at some little distance.
One of the monks was usually appointed to inspect the accounts of the farm. He was called the prior of the grange—in barbarous Latin, 'grangarius.' —Maline.

Used adjectively.

Till my return I would have thee stay at our little grange-house in the country. —Tarlton, News out of Purpury. (Malone.)

Grange. v. a. Farm, in the way of revenue or taxes; barter; make a profit out of anything.

The ruffianry (brokerage) of causes I am daily more and more acquainted with, and see the manner of dealing which cometh of the Queen's straitness to give these women, whereby they presume thus to grange and truck causes. —Birch, Memoirs of Queen Elizabeth. (Rich.)

Gránito. s. [Italian, granito = grained.] In Mineralogy and Geology. Stone, or rock, so called.

Granite [is] a stone composed of separate and very large concretions, rudely compacted together; of great hardness, giving fire with steel; not fermenting with acids, and imperfectly calceivable in a great fire.
The hard white grains with black spots, commonly called moor-stone, forms a very firm, and though rude, yet beautifully variegated mass. It is found in immense strata in Ireland, but not used there.
In Cornwall it is found in prodigious masses, and brought to London, for the steps of public buildings. Hard red granite, variegated with black and white now called oriental granite, is valuable for 1090.

its extreme hardness and beauty, and capable of a most elegant polish. —Sir J. Hill, On Porphyry.
Alabaster, marble of diverse colours, both simple and mixed, the opulites, porphyry, and the granite.
—Woodward.

There are still great pillars of granite, and other fragments of this ancient temple. —Addison, Travels in Italy.

Granite is a compound rock essentially composed of quartz, felspar, and mica, each in granular crystals. . . . Some of the granites of Cornwall and the Ibomund readily resolve themselves into a white kaolin or argillaceous matter, from which pottery and porcelain are made. —Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Granític. adj. Consisting of, or connected with, granite.

That granite and granitic rocks . . . are of igneous origin there can be no doubt. —Ansted, Geology,
ch. xiv.

Granítical. adj. Same as Granitic.

Viewed at a distance, this enormous mass of stone has the appearance of a human figure; and its piramidal form has given rise to a variety of fables. On approaching it, we find that it consists of several ledges of granite piled one upon another in the rudest manner. If, however, we bow down to this granítical god, we shall meet deities at every step.
—Polschke, History of Devonshire, vol. i. pt. 1.

Granivorous. adj. [Lat. voro = devour.]

Eating grain; living upon grain.

Granivorous birds, as a crane, upon the first peck of their bill, can distinguish the qualities of hard bodies, which the sense of men discerns not without mastication. —Sir T. Browne.

Panick affords a soft demulcent nourishment, both for granivorous birds and mankind. —Arbutnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Gránam. s. See Grandam.*Grant. v. a. [see last extract.]*1. Admit that which is not yet proved; allow; yield; concede.

They gather out of Scripture general rules to be followed in making laws; and so, in effect, they plainly grant, that we ourselves may lawfully make laws for the church. —Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

I take it for granted, that though the Greek word which we translate saints be in itself as applicable to things as persons, yet in this article it signifieth not holy things, but holy ones. —Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed.

Grant that the fates have firm'd, by their decree,
The Trojan race to reign in Italy.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Suppose, when yet I grant not, thy desire
A moment older than my rival fire,
Can chance of seeing first thy title prove?

Id., Palamon and Arcite.

If he be one indifferent as to the present rebellion, they may take it for granted his complaint is the rage of a disappointed man. —Addison, Freocholder.

2. Bestow something which cannot be claimed of right.

The God of Israel grant thee thy petition that thou hast asked of him. —1 Samuel, l. 17.

Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life. —Acts, xiii. 48.

Didst thou not kill this king?—I grant so.—
Dost grant me, beheading? Then God grant me too,
Thou may'st be damned for that wicked deed.

Shakespeare, Richard III. l. 2.

He heard, and granted half his prayer;
The rest the winds dispersed. —Pope.

[Grant.—Much difficulty is thrown on the etymology of this word by the concurrence of forms which can hardly be traced to a common origin. From Latin gratus is formed Italian grato, Provençal grat, French gré, will, liking, consent, and thence Italian gratire, approbatio, French gréer, French gréer, aggréer, English agree, to approve, allow, give consent to. In Middle Latin gratus, or gratulus, was used as a substantive; 'gratus meus, without my consent. . . . The insertion of the nasal converted gratum into gratum, in the same sense. . . . Facere gratum and facere gratulum, or gratificare, are found indifferently in the sense of making satisfaction.
. . . . We have next the verb gratare, gratulare, gratificare, French gréer, in the sense of doing an agreeable thing, bestowing a gift, making over an interest, agreeing to an arrangement. . . . If the foregoing forms had stood by themselves, the derivation from gratus would not have been doubtful, but parallel with these are found gratum, . . . granagium, . . . French granier, granter, granier, to promise, engage for, to bind oneself; crâncie, crâncie, crant, crant, assurance, contract, engagement, obligation. Now it is hardly possible that grant could be converted by mere corruption into grat, crant, the doubt is in the old French being an almost certain sign of the loss of a d, as in auge from auge, canche from canche, baser, baser, from basera. On this principle French crâncie would be the equivalent of a Latin crâncie, trunk, consistence, assurance. . . . Ego bi archiepiscopus scripto Raymundum in fide et crâncie mea loco sacra-mentum. (Chart. A. D. 1167, in Carp.) (Old French crânc, believing. 'Nire si cum o'tet voire et s'un some crant' (Roquefort.) The Breton crant, the root of crant, Latin crant, to believe, is used in the sense of assurance, obligation, security, crant, crant, caution, grant, (Legonide.) The pronunciation of the north of France, which regularly changes an initial g into er (converting gras, craps, grand-dieu, into eras, eraps, erand-dieu = Hecar) would leave so little difference between crant, to confer an advantage, from gratus, and crant, to assure, from credere (both used with equal frequency in legal instruments in the act of transferring a right), that it is not surprising if the two were confounded.

We find accordingly the g of gratus united with the as of crant, and gratus, grantare, used in the sense of crantare. 'Super istas pactiones omnes semper nominati Domino de Legnaso granteverunt (engage, pledge themselves) quod tenebant, &c.' Framula omnia et singula immobilia tenere et soliditer adimplere promiserunt et granteverunt. — Wagwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Grant. s.*1. Act of granting or bestowing; thing granted; gift; boon.

Courtiers justle for a grant,
And when they break their friendship plead their want.

Dryden.

2. In Law.

All the land is the queen's, unless there be some grant of any part thereof, to be shewed from her majesty. —Spencer, View of the State of Ireland.

Grant [is] a gift in writing of such a thing as can-notably be passed or conveyed by word only; as rent, reversions, services, advowsons in gross, common in gross, tithes, &c., or made by such persons as cannot give but by deed, as the king, and all bodies politic; which distinction he often in speech neglected, and then is taken generally for every gift whatsoever, made of any thing by any person; and he that granteth it is named the grantor, and he to whom it is made the grantee. A thing is said to be in grant which cannot be assigned without deed. — Covent.

Not only the laws of this kingdom, but of other places, and the Roman laws, provide that the prince should not be deprived in his grants. —Ducanet.

It was indeed an unfortunate grant, a grant which could not be brought to light without much trouble and much scandal. —Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxv.

3. Concession; admission of something in dispute.

But of this so large a grant, we are content not to take advantage. —Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

This grant destroys all you have urg'd before.

Dryden.

Grántable. adj. Capable of being granted; that may be granted.

The office of the bishop's chancellor was grántable for life. —Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

I will inquire therefore in what cases dispensations are grántable, and by whom. —Bishop of London's (Sherlock) Charge, p. 6: 1750.

Gránted. s. One to whom any grant is made.

To smooth the way for popery in Mary's time, the grantees were confirmed by the pope in the possession of the abbey-lands. —Swift.

Grántor. s. One by whom a grant is made.

A 'duplex querela' shall not be granted under pain of suspension of the grantor from the execution of his office. —Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Gránular. adj. Consisting of, formed by, having a likeness to, grain.

Some granular marbles are flexible in their slabs, or, at least, become so by being dried at the fire. *—
Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.*

Gránulary. adj. Small and compact; resembling a small grain or seed.

Small-coal, with sulphur and nitre, proportionably mixed, tempered, and formed into granular bodies, do make up that powder which is in use for guns. *—
Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.*

Gránulate. v. a. Be formed into small grains.

The juice of grapes, inspissated by heat, granulate into sugar. —Bishop Sprat.

Gránulate. v. a.*1. Break into small masses or granules.

Most of the Scheemits silver ore holds some gold, which they separate by melting the silver, then granulating it. —E. Browne, Travels in Europe,
p. 16.

Raise into small asperities.

I have observed, in many birds, the gullet, before its entrance into the gizzard, to be much dilated, and thick w, or as it were granulated with a multitude of glandules, each whereof was provided with its excretory vessel. —Bay.

Granulation. s.*1. See extract.

Granulation [is] the act of pouring melted metal into cold water, so as it may granulate or congeal into small grains; it is generally done through a colander, or a birchen broom. Gunpowder and some salts are likewise said to be granulated, from their resemblance to grain or seed. — Quincy.

Granulation . . . is effected by pouring [metals], in a melted state, through an iron cullender pierced with small holes into a body of water; or directly upon a bundle of twigs immersed in water. In this way copper is granulated into bean shot, and silver alloys are granulated preparatory to refining. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

2. In Surgery. Act of shooting or breaking in small masses.

Tents in wounds, by retarding the growth of the little granulations of the flesh, in process of time harden them, and in that manner produce a fistula. — Sharp, Surgery.

Nature is supposed to be active in bringing parts as nearly as possible to their original state . . . and after having . . . formed just . . . with about forming a new matter upon surfaces in which there has been a breach of continuity. This process is called granulating or incrustation, and the substance formed is called granulations. The colour of healthy granulations is a deep florid red. — Hopper, Medical Dictionary.

Granule, s. Small grain.

With an excellent microscope, where the naked eye did see but a green powder, the assisted eye could discern particular granules, some blue, and some yellow. — Boyle, Experiments and Considerations touching Colours.

Grape, s. [Fr. grappe.] Fruit of the vine, growing in clusters; fruit from which wine is expressed.

And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger. — Leviticus, xix. 10.

Anacreon, for thy sake
I of the grape no mention make;
Ere my Anacreon by thee fell,
Cursed plant, I lov'd thee well.

Cowley.

Grapeless, adj. Wanting grapes; wanting the strength and flavour of the grape.

The entertainment consisted of cold fish, lean chickens, rusty hauns, raw venison, and grapeless wines. — Jungus.

Grapstone, s. Stone or seed contained in the grape.

When obedient nature knows his will,
A fly, a grapestone, or a hair can kill.

Prior.

Grapple, v. [Gr. γράφω = write, describe.] 1. Descriptive.

He can
Find all our atoms from a point to a span;
Our closest cracks and corners; and can trace
Each line, as it were graphick, in the face.

B. Jonson, Underwoods.

2. Relating to engraving.

Availing himself of his poetical talent, and his facility in the graphick art. — T. Walton, History of English Poetry, ii. 57.

Graphical, adj. Same as Graphic.

Write with a needle, or bodkin, or knife, or the like, when the fruit or trees are young; for as they grow, so the letters will grow more large and graphick. — Huon, Natural and Experimental History.

In this so graphical a description of the Son of God, couched in all the power and majesty of his Father, the attitude is most observable: 'His right foot was on the sea, and his left on the earth.' — Warburton, Sermons, xx.

Graphically, adv. In a graphic manner.

After it, succeeded their third dance; than which a more numerous composition could not be seen; graphically disposed into letters, and honouring the name of the most sweet and ingenious prince, Charles duke of York. — B. Jonson, Mucius at Court.

Very rhetorical delineations follow their miseries by this invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, graphically as in a map described. — Bishop Richardson, On the Old Testament, p. 418.

The hyena odorata, or civet cat, is delivered and graphically described by Castellan. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Graphite, s. Black lead, as used for pencils; plumbago, for which it is the mineralogical term; and to which it is preferable, inasmuch as plumbago suggests an affinity to lead (plumbum), which in graphite has no existence; its affinities, as may be seen in the extracts, being in a wholly different direction.

Graphite . . . consists of carbon in a peculiar state of aggregation with an extremely minute and apparently accidental impregnation of iron. Graphite, called also plumbago and black lead, occurs in gneiss, mica-slate, and their subordinate clay-slates and limestone; . . . also in the transition state, as at Horridale in Cumberland, where the most precious deposit exists both in reference to extent and quality for making pencils. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Carbon presents itself in the three unlike conditions of diamond, graphite, and charcoal. — Herbert Spencer, Data of Biology, ch. l. § 1.

Graphometer, s. [Gr. μέτρον = measure.] Surveying instrument.

As for the bearings and distances, they are very different from those I have given, which answered in every part, almost as exactly as if I had surveyed a field with a graphometer. — Drummond, Travels, p. 244: 1743.

Grapple, s. [Fr. grappil, grappin.] Grapple of a ship; small anchor, often with four flukes, belonging to a little vessel.

The canoe was fixed to a grapple in the middle of the harbour. — Auson, Voyage round the World, b. ii. ch. xiii.

Grapple, v. s.

1. Contend by seizing each other, as wrestlers.

Your grace and I
Must grapple upon even terms no more.

Hamlet and Fletcher, Maid's Tragedy.

They must be also practised in all the locks and grips of wrestling, as used may often be in fight to tug or grapple, and to close. — Milton, Tractate on Education.

Living virtue, all achievements past,
Meets envy, still to grapple with at last.
Does he think that he can grapple with divine vengeance, and endure the everlasting burnings? — South, Sermons.

2. Contest in close fight.

I'll in my standard bear the arms of York,
To grapple with the house of Lancaster.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. l. 1.

Grapple, v. a.

1. Fasten; fix; join indissolubly.

Grapple your minds to sterrenge of the navy,
And leave your England as dead midnight still.

Shakespeare, Henry V. iii. chorus.

Grapples you to the heart and love of us.
Id., Macbeth, iii. 1.

For hipparchus, vessels for the transporting of horse, we are indebted to the Salaminitas; for grappling hooks to Anacharsis. — Heglyn.

Grapple, s.

1. Contest hand to hand, in which the combatants seize each other; wrestler's hold.

As when earth's son, Anteus, strove
With Jove's Alcides, and of foil'd, still rose
Fresh from his fall, and deeper grapple join'd,
Throttled at length in the air, expir'd and fell.

Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 555.

Know mine the stronger demon, fear'd the grapple,
And, looking round him, found this nook of fate,
To skulk behind my sword?

Dryden, Don Sebastian.

2. Close fight.

In the grapple I boarded them; on the instant they got clear of our ship, so I alone became their prisoner. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 6. letter.

It is a remarkable circumstance that one of the letters of Hastings to Dr. Johnson bears date a very few hours after the death of Sumner. While the whole settlement was in commotion, . . . the conqueror in that deadly grapple sat down, with characteristic self-possession, to write about the Tour to the Hebrides, Jones's Persian Grammar, and the history, traditions, arts, and natural productions of India. — Morant, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

3. Iron instrument by which one ship fastens on another.

But Cymon soon his crooked grapples cast,
Which with tenacious hold his foes embaynd.

Dryden, Cymon and Iphigenia.

Grapplement, s. Close fight; hostile embrace. Rare.

They catching hold of him, as down he lent,
Him backward overthrow, and down him stay'd
With their rude hands and grisly grapplement.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Grappling, part. adj. Catching as a grapple.

Sometimes, from fighting squadrons of each fleet,
Two grappling Atlas on the ocean meet,
And English fires with Belgian flames contend.

Dryden.

Anteus here and stern Alcides strive,
And both the grappling status seem to live.

Addison.

Grappling, verbal abs. Grapple; tackle connected therewith: (often used either adjectively, or as the first element of a compound; e.g. grappling-iron).

I came to an anchor; for I had made me a kind of an anchor with a piece of broken grappling which I put out of the ship. — De Foe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

Grappy, adj.

1. Full of clusters of grapes.

The grappy clusters spread
On his fair brows, and dangle on his head.

Addison, Translation from Onid.

2. Made of, connected with, the grape.

And on the marble altar's polish'd frame
Pours forth the grappy stream.

Ong, Translation from Onid.

Graster, s. See Grazier.

Grasp, v. a. [root of grip; compare clip, clasp.]

1. Hold in the hand; gripe.

O fool that I am, that thought I could grasp water and bind the wind! — Nir P. Sidney.

In his right hand

Grasping ten thousand thunders, which he sent Before him, such as in their souls infla'd Plagues.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 835.

Kings, by grasping more than they could hold,
First made their subjects, by oppression, bold.

Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

Doom, as they please, my empire not to stand,
I'll grasp my sceptre not to stand.

Dryden, Indian Emperor.

2. Seize; catch at.

For what are men who grasp at praise sublime,
But bubbles on the rapid stream of time?

Young.

Grasp, v. s.

1. Catch; endeavour to seize; try at.

So endless and exorbitant are the desires of men, that they will grasp at all, and can form no scheme of perfect happiness without less. — Swift.

2. Struggle; strive; grapple.

See, his face is black and full of blood;
His hands abroad display'd, as one that grasps
And tugs'd for life.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iii. 2.

3. Gripe; encroach.

Like a miser, 'midst his store,
Who grasps and grasps till he can hold no more.

Dryden.

Grasp, s.

1. Gripe or seizure of the hand.

Nor wanted in his grasp
What seem'd both spear and shield.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 940.

This hand and sword have been acquainted well;
It should have come before into my grasp.

To kill the ravisher. — Dryden, Don Sebastian.

The left arm is a little defaced, though one may see it held something in its grasp formerly. — Addison, Tracts in Italy.

2. Possession; hold; power of seizing.

I would not be the villain that thou think'st
For the whole space that's in the tyrant's grasp,
And the rich East to boot.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

Within the direful grasp
Of savage hunger, or of savage heat.

Milton, Comus, 357.

They looked upon it as their own, and had it even within their grasp. — Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

Grasping, verbal abs. Seizure; attempt to seize or snatch: (though, in this sense, the notion of trying is suggested, or at least strengthened, by the preposition at).

This grasping of the militia of the kingdom into their own hands, was desired the summer before. — Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

Grasping, part. adj. Covetous; rapacious, which last term it nearly translates.

He was grasping both in his ambition and his avarice. — Hallam, View of the State of Europe during the Middle Ages.

Grass, s. [A.S. gæs.]

1. Herb so called.

Ye are grown fat as the heifer at grass, and below as bulls. — Jeremiah, l. 11.

2. Season when the grass begins to grow; spring: (common in Husbandry, as applied to the age of horses, 'two years old next grass').

You'll be no more your former you;
But for a blooming nymph will pass,
Just fifteen, coming summer's grass.

Swift.

3. In Botany. The grasses translate the Latin Gramineæ, or Graminaceæ, the name of a large class which contains, besides the common grasses of the grazier, the corns or grains (wheat, barley, maize, the bamboos, and sugarcane). In Husbandry: the 'artificial grasses' (clover, lucerne, &c.) are no true grasses in the botanical sense of the term.

As the first element of a compound.

The beef being young, and only grass fed, was thin, light, and moist, and not of a substance to endure the salt.—Sir W. Temple.

Grass of Parnassus. Native plant so called, Parnassia pulstris.

This plant is called parnassia from mount Parnassus, where it was supposed to grow; and because the cattle feed on it, it obtained the name of grass, though the plant has no resemblance to the grass kind.—Miller.

Grass-green. adj.

1. (Greaf with grass.

He is dead and gone, lady,
He is dead and gone;
At his head a grass-green turf,
At his heels a stone.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 5, song.

He hid him to the fatal place,
Where Margaret's body lay;
And stretch'd him on the grass-green turf,
That wrapt her breathless clay.

Mallet, William and Margaret.

2. Green as grass: (in this case two words rather than a compound).

Apple-green did not mean the colour of any green apple casually taken; but a certain definite colour which the student was to bear in mind, whether or not he had ever seen an apple of that exact hue. The words were not a description, but a record of the colour: the memory was to retain a sensation, not a name. The imperfection of the system (arising from its arbitrary firm) was its incompleteness; however well it served for the reference of the colours which it did contain, it was applicable to no others, and thus though Werner's enumeration extended to more than a hundred colours, there occur in nature a still greater number which cannot be exactly described by means of it. In such cases the unclassified colour is, by the Wernerians, defined by stating it as intermediate between two others: thus we have an object described as between emerald-green and grass-green. . . . It is not always between contiguous members of the series that the undescribed colour is found. If we place emerald-green between apple-green and grass-green, we may yet have a colour intermediate between emerald-green and leaf-green; and, in fact, the Wernerian series of colours is destitute of a principle of self-arrangement and gradation; and is thus necessarily and incurably imperfect.—Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas, vol. I. p. 343: ed. 1868.

Grassgrown. adj. Grown over with grass.

Desolating Famine, who delights
In grass-grown cities, and in desert fields.

Thomson, Liberty, pt. iv.

Desolation o'er the grass-grown street
Expands his raven wings.

Akenside, Pleasures of Imagination, b. ii.

If a friend my grass-green threshold find,
O, how my lonely cot resounds with glad!

Sheddine, Blegy, b. vii.

Grasshopper. s. Insect so called, of the genus Tettix.

Grasshoppers eat up the green of whole countries.

—Bacon.

While cicada is rendered a grasshopper, we commonly think that which is so called among us to be the true cicada; wherein, as we have elsewhere declared, there is a great mistake: for we have not the cicada in England, and indeed no proper word for that animal, which the French name 'cigale'; that which we commonly call a grasshopper, and the French 'saute-herbe', being one kind of locust, so rendered in the plague of Egypt, and in old Saxon named 'gashop'.—Sir T. Browne, Miscellaneous, p. 109

Where silver lakes, with verdant shadows crown'd,
Disperse a grateful chillness all around;
The grasshopper avoids th' untainted air,
Nor in the midst of summer ventures there.

Addison.

Used adjectively, as in the name of the Sylvia (Salicaria) locustella.

The grasshopper warbler, so called from its very peculiar and almost incessant cricket-like note, is a visitor from the south, which comes to this country for the summer, and is first to be heard and occasionally seen about the middle of April, and leaves us again in September. . . . The grasshopper warbler is found within a few miles north of London, and also in Surrey. . . . Besides the counties immediately round London, the grasshopper warbler has been observed to visit Hampshire, Wiltshire, Devonshire, Cornwall, and Wales.—Yarrell, British Birds

Grass-plot. s. Small level covered with short grass.

Here on this grass-plot, in this very place,
Come and sport. Shakespeare, Tempest, iv. 1.

The part of your garden next your house should be a parterre for flowers, or grass-plots bordered with flowers.—Nir W. Temple.

They are much valued by our modern planters, to adorn their walks and grass-plots.—Mortimer.

Grass-week. s. See extract.

Parochial perambulations on Holy Thursday were derived from the Terminia; to which perambulations were added rogations or litanies for the good of the harvest. . . . The three preceding days were to be passed in fasting. This rogation week was called in the Inns of Court, grass-week, because the commons then consisted chiefly of salads and vegetables.—Fusbroke, Cyclopaedia of Antiquities.

Grassation. s. [Lat. grasulatio, -onis; grasor, preterite part. grasatus = range or move about in a furious or madmanlike manner.] Ranging about to do wrong or act violently.

If in view there be a perpetual grassation, there must be in virtue a perpetual vigilance.—Folltham, Recluse, ii. 2.

Grassless. adj. Wanting grass.

The wintry snow had covered all their greens,
Nought else upon the grassless ground but winter's waste was seen.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 356.

Grassy. adj. Covered with grass; abundant with grass.

Ne did he leave the mountains bare unseen,
Nor the rank grassy fields delights unfurrow'd.

Risks of grassy turf

Their table was, and money was had round.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 391.

The most in fields, like hurried bands, lie down,
To down obnoxious, on the grassy floor.

Dryden.

Grate. s. [from Italian, grata.] Partition made with bars placed near to one another, or crossing each other: such as are in cloisters or prisons.

I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, and your coach-fellow, Nym; or else you had looked through the grate, like a peevish of balloons.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Out at a little grate his eyes he cast
Upon those boarding hills, and open plain.

Daniel.

A fan has on it a nunnery of lively black-eyed vestals, who are endeavouring to creep out at the grate.—Addison.

Specially applied to the range of bars within which fires are made.

My dear is of opinion that an old-fashioned grate consumes coals, but gives no heat.—Spectator.

Grate. v. a. [from Fr. grater and gratter.]

1. Rub or wear anything by the attrition of a rough body.

Throat the fiend his gnashing teeth did grate.

Spenser.

Blind oblivion swallow'd cities up,
And mighty states characterless are grated
To dusky nothing.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iii. 2.

If the particles of the putty were not made to stick fast in the pitch, they would, by rolling up and down, grate and fret the object metal, and fill it full of little holes.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

2. Offend by anything harsh or vexatious.

Therent enraged, soon began upstart,
Grinding his teeth, and grating his great heart.

Spenser.

They have been partial in the gospel, called and chosen out those softer and more gentle dictates which should less grate and disturb them.—Dr. II. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

This habit of writing and discouraging, wherein I unfortunately differ from almost the whole kingdom, and am apt to grate the ears of more than I could wish, was acquired during my apprenticeship in London.—Swift.

3. Form a sound by collision of asperities or hard bodies.

On a sudden open fly,
With impetuous recoil and jarring sound,
The infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook
Of Erebus. Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 878.

Grate. v. n.

1. Rub hard so as to injure or offend; offend, as by oppression or importunity.

Wherein have you been galled by the king?
What peer hath been suborn'd to grate on you,
That you should read this lawless bloody book
Of forg'd rebellion with a new divine!

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 1.

I have grated upon my good friends for three reprieves for you, . . . or else you had looked through the grate.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Paradoxical is of great use; but the faculty must be so tenderly managed as not to grate upon the truth and reason of things.—Sir E. L'Estrange.

This grated harder upon the hearts of men.—South, Sermons.

I never heard him make the least complaint, in a case that would have grated sorely on some men's patience, and have filled their lives with discontent.—Locke.

2. Make a harsh noise as that of a rough body drawn over another.

We are not so nice as to cast away a sharp knife, because the edge of it may sometimes grate.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Grate. adj. [from Lat. gratus = pleasant.] Grateful (in second sense). Rare.

It becomes grate and delicious enough by custom.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 311.

Grateful. adj.

1. Having a due sense of benefits; willing to acknowledge and to repay benefits.

A grateful mind
By owing owes not, but still pays.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 88.

When some degree of health was given, he exerted all his strength in a return of grateful recognition to the author of it.—Bishop Hall, Life of Hammond.

Years of service past
From grateful souls exact reward at last.

Dryden, Fables.

2. Pleasing; acceptable; delightful; delicious.

Windsor is ingrate at first, is made grateful by custom; but Windsor is so pleasing at first, groweth quickly to mislike.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

New golden fruits on loaded branches shine,
And grateful clusters swell with floods of wine.

Pope.

Gratefully. adv. In a grateful manner.

Blessings beforehand, ties of gratefulness.

The sound of glory ringing in our ears. Herbert.

I am pitch'd so high.

To such a growth of full prosperities,

That to conceal my fortunes were an injury

To gratefulness, and those more liberal favours

By whom my glories prosper.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Fair Maid of the Inn.

He [Fenton] died poor, but honest; leaving no debts, or legacies, except of a few pounds to Mr. Trumbull and my lady, in token of respect, gratefulness, and mutual esteem.—Pope, Letter to Broome.

Grater. s. Kind of coarse file with which soft bodies are rubbed to powder.

Tender handed touch a nettle,
And it stings you for your pains;
Grasp it like a man of mettle,
And it soft as silk remains.
So it is with common natures,
Treat them gently, they rebel;
But be rough as nutmeg-graters,
And the rogues obey you well.

A. Hill.

Gratification. s.

1. Act of pleasing.

They are incapable of any design above the present gratification of their passions.—South, Sermons.

2. Pleasure; delight.

How hardly is his will brought to change all its desires and aversions, and to renounce those gratifications in which he has long been used to place his happiness!—Bogers.

3. Reward; recompense.

Calling drunkenness, good fellowship; pride, comeliness; rage, valour; bribery, gratification.—

GRAT

Bishop Morton, A Discharge of the Fies Imputations against the Bishop of Durham, p. 253; 1633.

Gratifier. s. One who gratifies or delights. Baachus, Orca, and other eminent persons amongst the heathens, who were great gratifiers of the natural life of man.—Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 109.

Gratify. v. a.

1. Indulge; please by compliance. You stand between the country and the court, Nor gratify where'er the great desire, Nor grudging give what public needs require. Dryden.
2. Delight; please; humour; soothe. But pride stood ready to prevent the blow, For who would die to gratify a foe? The captive generals to his ear are led; The joyful citizens' tumultuous tide Echoing his glory, gratify his pride. Prior, Solomon.

A palled appetite is humorous, and must be gratified with maces rather than food.—Tatler.

At once they gratify their scent and taste, While frequent cups prolong the rich rapt. Pope, Rape of the Lock.

Gratifying. part. adj. Causing gratification. A thousand little impertinencies are very gratifying to curiosity, though not improving to the understanding.—Addison.

Grating. part. adj. [from Grate, from Fr. gratter.] Causing a sense of harsh rubbing, rasping, or attrition; often extended to immaterial objects, with the sense of rough, wounding, lacerating. Just recruitment and hard usage could not unwillingly word; and, grating as it is, Take it, for 'tis thy due. Dryden, Don Sebastian.

The grating shock of wrathful iron arms. Shakespeare, Richard II. l. 3.

Grating. s. Grate, in the sense of partition made by bars. Pull up the grating, and leave the kennel open, said Italy.—Thodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Grating. verbal abs. [Grate, from Fr. gratter.] Feeling or sound as of harsh attrition. The contrary is harshness, such as is grating, and some other sounds.—Hobbes, Of Human Nature, ch. vii. (Rich.)

Gratia. adv. [Latin.] For nothing; without a recompense. When cura was given them gratia, you repin'd. Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.

I scorned to take my dearest at Utrecht or Leyden, though offered it gratia by those universities.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Would they indeed, who hold such pay in scorn, Put on the maul when they tread the corn? Would they all, gratia, watch, and tend the fold, Nor take one fleece to keep them from the cold? Crabbe, The Thorough, Religious Sects.

But since (perhaps my feelings are too nice) I cannot purchase fame at such a price, I'll labour gratia as a grueler's wheel, And, blunt myself, give edge to others' steel. Byron, Hints from Horace.

The young lion, born of tolerable bulk, suckled until much bigger, and fed until half-grown, is enabled by the power and organization which he thus gets gratia to catch and kill animals of size enough to give him the large supply of nutriment needed to meet his large expenditure, and yet leave a large surplus for growth.—Herbert Spencer, The Inductions of Biology.

Gratitude. s.

1. Duty to benefactors. Forbid That our renowned Rome, whose gratitude Tow'ards her deserving children is enroll'd, Should now eat up her own! Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.
2. Desire to return benefits. The debt immense of endless gratitude. Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 22.

Gratitude is properly a virtue, disposing the mind to an inward sense and an outward acknowledgment of a benefit received, together with a readiness to return the same, or the like.—South, Sermons.

Gratuitous. adj.

1. Voluntary; granted without claim or merit. We mistake the gratuitous blessings of heaven for the fruits of our own industry.—Sir R. L'Estrange.
2. Asserted without proof. The second motive they had to introduce this gratuitous declaration of atoms, the same poet gives us.—Eng.

Gratuitously. adv. In a gratuitous manner.

GRAV

I would know whence came this obliquity of direction, which they gratuitously lack to matter; this is to ascribe will and choice to these particles.—Chagne, Philosophical Principles.

Gratuity. s. Present or acknowledgment; free gift. He used every year to present us with his almanack, upon the score of some little gratuity we gave him.—Swift.

Gratulate. v. a. [Lat. gratulus, preterite part. of gratulari.]

1. Congratulate; salute with declarations of joy. To gratify the good Andronicus, And gratulate his safe return to Rome, The people will accept whom he admires. Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, l. 2.

Whither away No farther than the Tower; and, as I guess, Upon the like devotion as yourselves, To gratulate the gentle princes there. Id., Richard III. iv. 1.

Envy itself cannot but gratulate the church of England that is so furnished with learned bishops.—Sir J. Harrington.

Since nature could behold so dire a crime, I gratulate at least my native clime, That such a land, which such a monster bore, So far is distant from our Thracian shore. Dryden, Fables.

2. Declare joy for; mention with expressions of joy. Yet give thy jealous subjects leave to doubt, Who this thy weaps from rumour gratulate, No less than if from peril; and devout, Do less thy care unto thy after state. B. Jonson.
3. Reward. A thanks to every one; and to gratulate So great a service done at my desire, Ye shall have many floods fuller and higher Than you have wish'd for. Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, l. 2.

I could not chide but gratulate your honest endeavours with this remembrance.—Heywood, Apology for Actors.

Gratulations. s. Salutations made by expressing joy; expression of joy. They are the first gratulations wherewith our Lord and Saviour was joyfully received at his entrance into the world, by such as in their hearts, arms, and bowels embraced him.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The earth Gave signs of gratulation, and such hill. Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 513.

Your enjoyment, according to the standard of a Christian desire, require no addition: I shall turn my wishes into gratulations, and congratulating their fulness, only wish their continuance.—South, Sermons.

Gratulatory. adj.

1. Congratulatory; expressing congratulation. After a short preamble gratulatory, and signifying his majesty's summons.—Conference at Hampton Court, p. 23; 1603.

There is a gratulatory gift, when one sendeth to another to testify their love and joy.—Willet, Treatise of Solomon's Marriage, p. 31.

- 2. Expressing thanks. They make a gratulatory oration unto God, for that he has been pleased to assist and accept their services.—L. Addison, Account of the present State of the Jews, p. 125.

Formerly he had disowned any propitiatory sacrifice, content with gratulatory, after the Protestant way.—Waterland, Charge on the Eucharist, p. 54.

Gravamen. s. [Latin.] Point of pressure; pressure. In such odious things, it is not safe nor charitable to extend the gravamen and punishment beyond the instance the apostles make, or their exact parallels.—Jeremy Taylor, Liberty of Prophecy, (Ord. 18.)

The great gravamen too of these charges against him [Lord Mandelstam] is his leaning towards the Americans, of whom the furious shallow and conceited writer [Junius] was a bitter and intemperate opponent, as he was a bigoted advocate of the mother-country's tyranny.—Lord Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Lord Mansfield.

Grave. s. [German, grab.]

1. Place in the ground in which the dead are buried. Now it is the time of night, That the graves, all yawning wide, Every one led forth his spirit, In the church-way path to glide. Shakespeare, Midsummer-night's Dream, v. 1.

Thou wilt not leave me in the lathsome grave. Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 347.

GRAV

To walk upon the graves of our dead masters, Is our own security. Sir J. Denham, Sophy.

A flood of waters would overwhelm all these fragments which the earth broke into, and bury in one common grave all the inhabitants of the earth.—J. Barrow, Theory of the Earth.

They were wont once a year to meet at the graves of the martyrs: there solemnly to recite their sufferings and triumphs, to praise these virtues, to blow God for their pious examples, for their holy lives and their happy deaths.—Kelton, Companion to the Fast and Festival of the Church of England.

Grave. v. a. preterite graved; past part. graven.

1. Dig. He hath graven and digged up a pit.—Book of Common Prayer, Psalm, vii. 16.
2. Curve a figure or inscription in any hard substance. Cornice with busy sculptures graven. Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 716.

Thy sum of duty let two words contain a (1) may they graven in thy heart remain, He humble and be just. Prior, Solomon.

- 3. Curve or form. What prodeth the graven image, that the maker thereof hath graven it?—Hebrews, ii. 19.
- 4. Copy paintings upon wood or metal, in order to be impressed on paper. The gravers can and ought to imitate the bodies of the colours by the degrees of the lights and shadows: 'tis impossible to give much strength to what they grave, after the works of the schools, without imitating in some sort the colour of the objects.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

Grave. v. a. [from gravee = burying-place.] Bury. (Obsolete.) There's more gold: Do you damn others, and let this damn you: And dithen grave you all! Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

Grave. v. n. [Fr. graver.] Write or delineate on hard substances. Thou shalt make a plate of pure gold, and grave upon it.—Exodus, xxviii. 36.

Grave. adj. [Fr.]

1. Solemn; serious; sober; not gay; not light or trifling. To the more mature, A glass that fatur'd them; and to the grave, A child that guided dotards. Shakespeare, Cymbeline, l. 1.

We should have else desired Your good advice, which still hath been both grave And prosperous, in this day's council. Id., Macbeth, iii. 1.

That grave awfulness, as in your best breed of masters, or elegance and prebience, as in your lesser down, are marks of beauty.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

Even the grave and serious characters are distinguished by their several sorts of gravity.—Dryden, Fables, pref.

Youth on silent wings is flown; Graver years come rolling on. Prior.

Seized, and tied down to judge, how wretched I, Who can't be silent, and who will not lie: To laugh, were want of goodness and of grace, And to be grave, exceeds all power of face. Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

Fully painting humour, grave himself, Calls laughter forth. Thomson.

They have as much reason to pretend to, and as much necessity to aspire after, the highest accomplishments of a Christian and solid virtue, as the gravest and wisest among Christian philosophers.—Luce.

- 2. Of weight; not futile; credible. Rare. The Roman state was of all others the most celebrated for their virtue, as the gravest of their own writers, and of strangers, do bear their witness. Girce, Cosmologia Sacra.
- 3. Not showy; not tawdry: (as 'a grave suit of clothes').
- 4. Not sharp of sound; not acute. All persons have musical ears sufficiently delicate to understand and to imitate the modulations corresponding to various emotions in speaking; which modulations depend upon the succession of acuter and graver tones.—Whewell, Novum Organum renovatum.

Accent, in the Greek names and usage, seems to have regarded the tone of the voice; the acute accent raising the voice, in some syllables, to a higher, i.e. more acute pitch or tone, and the grave depressing it lower, and both having some emphasis, i.e. more vigorous pronunciation.—Holder.

Grave-clothes. s. Dress of the dead. But of such subtle substances and unsmooth, That like a ghost he seem'd, whose grave-clothes were unbound. Spenser.

Gravy. s. [?] Natural juice of cooked meat.

Meat we love half raw, with the blood trickling down from it, delicately terming it the gravy, which in truth looks more like an inhorrent or raw bloody matter.—Marvey, Discourse of Consumption.

Used adjectivally.

There may be a stronger broth made of vegetables than of any gravy soup.—Arbutnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Gray. See Grey.

Graying. s. Native fish so called, Coregonus thymallus, Umber.

The graying lives in such rivers as the trout does, and is usually taken with the same baits, and after the same manner: he is of a fine shape, his flesh white, and his teeth, those little ones that he has, are in his throat. He is not so general a fish as the trout, nor so good to eat.—Walton, Angler.

Graying are never found in streams that run from glaciers—at least near the source; and they are killed by cold or heat. I once put some graying from the Teme, in September, with some trout, into a confined water rising from a spring in the yard at Downton; the graying all died, but the trout lived. And in the hot summer of 1825, great numbers of large graying died in the Avon below Ringwood, without doubt killed by the heat in July.—Sir H. Darg, Edmonia, Seventh Day.

The graying, though abundant in some streams, is a very local fish. Similar in many respects to the trout in its habits and wants, there are numbers of rivers abounding with trout that do not produce the graying. . . . Three grayings, weighing together twelve pounds, were caught . . . in the Avon near Ringwood. A graying of four and a half pounds weight has been killed in the Test, and one of five pounds is recorded to have been caught near Shrewsbury. . . . The term 'Thymallus' is said to have been bestowed upon this fish on account of the peculiar odour it emits when fresh from the water, which is said to resemble that of thyme; and from its agreeable odour as well as smell, St. Ambrose is recorded to have called the graying the flower of fishes. To be eaten in perfection it cannot be dressed too soon. The name graying is supposed to be a modification of the word 'gray-line,' in reference to the dusky longitudinal bars along the body.—Yarrell, British Fishes.

I wind about, and in and out,
With here a blossom sailing,
And here and there a lusty trout,
And here and there a graying.

Tennyson, The Brook.

Graze. v. n.

1. Eat, feed on, grass.

The greatest of my pride is to see my ewen graze, and my lambs suck.—Shakespeare, As you like it, iii. 2.

Graze where you will, you shall not house with me.

Id., Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

Attend their stately steps, and slowly graze along.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

2. Supply grass.

The sowers must be kept so as the water may not stay too long in the spring; for then the ground continueth the wet, whereby it will never graze to purpose that year.—Bacon.

Graze. v. n. [from Lat. grassar = graze.]

As every state 'ay next to the other that was oppressed, so the fire perpetually grazed.—Bacon, Considerations on War with Spain.

Graze. v. n. [from Fr. razer.] Touch, or shave lightly; often as a weapon strikes a body, from which it glances with a slight deviation, leaving a very superficial wound. 'Graze the skin,' and 'raise the skin,' are sometimes confounded in conversation.

Graze. v. n. Pass so as to graze.

A bullet grazes on any place, when it gently turns up the surface of what it strikes upon.

Covent, Interpreter, in voce Grass-Heath.

Piero'd Talon's saberdun, and grazing
Upon his shoulder, in the passing,
Lodg'd in Maciano's brass halberd,
Who straight a surgeon cried, a surgeon!

Bulwer, Hudibras, l. 33.

Graze. v. a.

1. Tend grazing cattle; set cattle to feed on grass.

Jacob gras'd his uncle Laban's sheep.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, l. 3.

O happy man, with he, that lo! I see Grazing his cattle in those pleasant folds,
If he but know his good.

Daniel, Civil Wars.

2. Feed upon.

I was at first as other beasts, that graze
The triddden herb, of abject thoughts and low.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 371.

Their steeds around,
Free from their harness, graze the flow'ry ground.

Dryden.

Some graze their land till Christmas, and some longer.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

This Neptune gave him, when he gave to keep His scaly flocks that graze the wat'ry deep.

Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

The lambs with wolves shall graze, the verdant mead.

Pope, Messiah.

3. Supply with grass.

He hath a house and barn in repair, and a field or two to graze his cows, with a garden and orchard.

Swift.

4. Strike lightly.

Whom solid virtue

The shot of accident, nor dart of chance,
Could neither graze, nor pierce.

Shakespeare, Othello, iv. 1.

We still say, the skin is grazed, or slightly hurt.—Covent, Interpreter, in voce Grass-Heath.

Graser. s. One who grazes or feeds on grass.

His flock daily crops

Their verdant dinner from the mow's turf
Sufficient: after then the cackling geese,
Close grazer, finds wherewith to ease her want.

J. Philips, Cyder.

Grazier. s. One who feeds, or breeds, cattle: (as opposed to a farmer whose business is more particularly the cultivation of crops, dealing with arable, rather than grass, land).

All graziers prefer their cattle from meaner pastures to better.—Bacon.

Gentle peace, which filled the husbandman's barns, the grazier's folds, and the tradesman's shop.

Flavel.

His confusion increased when he found the alderman's father to be a grazier.—Spectator.

Of agriculture, the desolation made in the country by emigrating graziers, and the great yearly importation of corn from England, are innumerable instances under what discouragement it lies.—Swift.

Spelt with s.

He was by turns a fiddler and a farmer, a grazier and a poet, with equal success.—T. Walton, History of English Poetry, iii. 209.

Grazing. part. adj. Herbivorous; graminivorous.

The kangaroo appearing to stand by themselves, as being grazing animals. Mexican, On the Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 345.

Grease. s. [Fr. graisse.]

1. Soft part of the fat; oily or unctuous part of animals.

Grease, that's sweaten

From the murth'r's gibbet, throw
Into the flame.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

To take out a spot of grease they use a coal upon brown paper.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

A girle, foul with grease, binds his obscene attire.

Dryden.

Thou hop'st, with sacrifice of oxen slain,
To compass wealth, and bribe the god of gain
To give thee flocks and herds, with large increase;
Fool! to expect them from a bullock's grease.

Id., Translation of Juvenal.

2. In Horsemanship. Ailment so called, consisting of a swelling, puffiness, and irritation of the legs, which happens to a horse after a journey, or by standing long in the stable.

Grease. v. a.

2. Bribe; corrupt with presents.

Greased. part. adj. Paid; bribed.

Envy met the store

Of the greas'd advocate that grinds the poor.

Dryden, Translation of Persius.

Greasily. adv. In a greasy manner.

1. With an appearance as if smeared with grease.

His sweetly neck did shine right greasily.

2. Grossly; indelicately.

You talk greasily, your lips grow foul.

Shakespeare, Love's Labour's lost, iv. 1.

Greasiness. s. Attribute suggested by Greasy; oiliness; fatness.

Upon the most of these stones, after they are cut, there appears always, as it were, a kind of greasiness or unctuousness.—Boyle.

Greasy. adj.

1. Oily; fat; unctuous.

The fragments, scraps, the bits and greasy reliques
Of her orecreant faith.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, v. 2.

2. Smeared with grease.

Even the lewd rabble

Govern'd their roaring throats, and grumbled pity:
I could have hugg'd the greasy rogues; they pleas'd me.

Shakespeare, Venice Preserved.

Buy sheep, and see that they be big-boned, and have a soft, greasy, well curled close wool.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. Fat of body; bulky. Contemptuous.

Let's consult together against this greasy knight.

Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

4. Gross; indelicate; indecent.

Thruste cells, when greasy Arctine,
For his rank sex, is surmised divine.

Marston, Scourge of Villany.

Great. adj. [from A.S. grip.] Familiar as one on good terms; reconciled; friendly; intimate.

Those that would not censure or speak ill of a man immediately, will talk more boldly of those that are great with them, and thereby wound their honour.—Bacon.

Say it were a substantial one; suppose now I were well with a woman of your own acquaintance, that under pretence of frequent visits to you, should only come to carry on an affair with me? Suppose now my Lady Gravens and I were great? Chamber, The Careless Husband.

To be perpetually running over the whole town, nay, the whole kingdom too, in pursuit of your amours! Did not I discover that you were great with madamelle, my own woman? Did not you contract a shameful familiarity with Mrs. Freeman?—G. Colman, The Jealous Wife, l. 1.

Great. adj. [A.S. great.]

1. Large: (as opposed to small).

a. Applied to material bulk.

And God created the great whales.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 301.

A dungeon horrible, on all sides round,
As one great furnace flamm'd.

Ibid. l. 61.

The tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great ammiral.

Ibid. l. 292.

b. Applied to number, or rather mass formed by aggregation.

Judas, one of the twelve, came, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves.—Matthew, xvi. 47.

All these cities were fenced with high walls, gates and bars, besides unwall'd towns a great many.—Deuteronomy, iii. 2.

c. Applied to mass; whence, figuratively, weighty, important.

Her favours to thee, and the great oath take
With which the blessed gods assurance make.

Chapman.

Many
Have broke their backs with laying manors on them,
For this great journey.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. l. 1.

What is low raise and support,
That to the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal Providence,
And vindicate the ways of God to men.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 23.

2. Having any quality in a higher degree.

There were they in great fear.—Psalms, xiv. 5.

Their power was great.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 284.

3. Having number or bulk, relative or comparative.

The idea of so much is positive and clear: the idea of greater is also clear, but it is but a comparative idea.—Locke.

4. Considerable in extent or duration.

Thou hast spoken of thy servant's house for a great while to come.—2 Samuel, vii. 14.

5. Chief; principal.

Hear the king's pleasure, cardinal, who commands
you
To render up the great seal promptly.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2.

6. Venerable; adorning; awful.

Thou first art wont God's great authentick will,
Interpreter, through highest heaven to bring.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 650.

7. Wonderful; marvellous.

Great things, and full of wonder in our ears,
Far differing from this world, thou hast revealed,
Divine interpreter! by favour sent Down from the empyrean, to forewarn.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 70.

8. Having rank, power, or influence: (when with man, it nearly equals, or translates, Magnate and Grandee).

Should serve so long so many a greedygut.—Sylvestre, Du Bartas, 161.

Greek, adj. and s. Connected with, or relating to, the Greeks; Greek language.

(With this sense it is a proper rather than a common name; it becomes, however, a common rather than a proper one in such phrases as the following, where it means unintelligible).

This goes is Greek to me; either it hangs not well together, or I am very dull of understanding.—Gualoign, Supplices, (Orel M.).

Green, adj. [Dutch, groen.]

1. Having a colour formed commonly by the composition of blue and yellow, giving the colour of the leaves of trees or herbs.

The general colour of plants is green, which is a colour that no flower is of: there is a greenish primrose, but it is pale, and wears a green.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

There are writers of great distinction, who have made it an argument for Providence, that the whole earth is covered with green, rather than with any other colour, as being such a mixture of light and shade, that it comforts and strengthens the eye, instead of weakening or grieving it. For this reason several painters have a green cloth hanging near them, to ease the eye upon, after too great an application to their colouring.—Addison, Spectator, no. 367.

2. Flourishing; fresh; undecayed: (from trees in spring).

If I have any whom said a green old age, I have Virgil's authority; 'sed cruda deo viridiaque senectus'.—Dryden.

In youth his habits had been temperate; and his temperance had his proper reward, a singularly green and vigorous old age.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xiv.

4. Not dry.

If a spark of error have thus far prevailed, falling even where the wood was green, and farthest off from any inclination unto furious attempts; must not the peril thereof be greater in men, whose minds are of themselves as dry fuel, yet before-hand unto tumults?—Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity, dedication.

Being an olive tree
Which late he fell'd; and being green, must be Made lighter for his manage.—Chapman.

Of fragility the cause is an impotency to be extended, and therefore stone is more fragile than metal, and so dry wood is more fragile than green.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

5. Not roasted; half raw.

Under this head we may rank those words which signify different ideas, by a sort of an unaccountable far fetched analogy, or distant resemblance, that fancy has introduced between one thing and another; as when we say the meat is green when it is half roasted.—Watts, Logic.

6. Unripe; immature; young; because fruits are green before they are ripe.

My salad days,
When I was green in judgement, cold in blood!—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, i. v.

7. Inexperienced. Slang.

And this glare, and heat, and noise—this congeries of individuals without sympathy, and dishes without flavour—this is society! What an effect without a cause! A man must be very green, indeed, to stand this for two seasons. One cannot help thinking, that one consequence of the increased intelligence of the present day will be a great change in the habits of our intercourse.—Diarride the younger, The Young Duke, h. iii. ch. vii.

8. Chlorotic. See Green-sickness.

Was the hope drunk
Wherein you drest yourself? Hath it slept since?
And wakes it now to look so green and pale
At what it did so freely?—Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 7.

A green goose is so named either as a young bird, or from the green tinge of its down.

If you would sit green geese, shut them up when they are about a month old.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Let us but consider the two colours of yellow and blue; if they are mingled together in any considerable proportion, they make a green.—Watts, Logic.

2. Grassy plain.

For this down-trodden equity, we tread
In warlike march these greens before your town.—Shakespeare, King John, ii. 1.

O'er the smooth enamel'd green,
The young Emilia, fairer to be seen
Than the fair lily on the flow'ry green.—Dryden, Palamon and Arville.

Killed a young roe; and lamed another, so that I catch'd it, and led it home in a strine: when I had it home, I bound and splintered up its leg, which was broke. I took such care of it that it lived; and the leg grew well, and as strong as ever: but, by nursing it so long, it grew tame, and fed on the little green at my door, and would not go away.—De Vos, Life and Adventures of Robin Hood.

And hark! the riots of the green begin,
That sprang at first from yonder noisy inn.—Grubbe, The Village.

Green, v. a. Make green. Rare.

Great spring before
Green'd all the year; and fruits and blossoms bluish'd
In social sweetness on the self-same bough.—Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Greenbone, s. Two kinds of British fish are so called, from the colour of their bones when boiled; Zoarces viviparus and Esoc Belone; the former being also called vivi-parous blenny; eelpout; guffer; tanglake; the latter garfish, and garpike.

When boiled the bones of this fish are green, and hence the name of greenbone.—Tarrell, British Fishes, Zoarces viviparus.

4. Inexperience.

Greenroom. s. Waiting or retiring room for the actors engaged in a piece, while off the stage, painted green in order to relieve the eye from the glare of the stagelights.

Had she consulted me, she should have made Her moral play a speaking masquerade, Warm'd up each bustling scene, and in her rage Have emptied all the green-room on the stage.

Goldsmith, Epilogue to The Sister.
The Friday came; and for the first time in my life I found myself in the green-room of a theatre—it was literally a green-room into which light was admitted by a thing like a cucumber-frame at one end of it. It was faded, and round the walls ran a bench covered with faded green stuff, whereupon the dramatic personae deposited themselves until called to go on the stage; a looking-glass under the sky-light, and a large bottle of water and a tumbler on the chimney-piece, completed the furniture of this classic apartment.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney, vol. i. ch. ii.

Greens. s. pl.

1. Potherbs, more especially coleworts.

By the name of most kind husband.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.

6. Meet, as those do who go to pay congratulations. Rare.

Your haste Is now urg'd on you.—We will greet the time.

Greet. v. a. Meet and salute.

There greet in silence, as the dead are wont, And sleep in peace.

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, i. 2.

Such was that face on which I dwell with joy, Ere Greece assembled stem'd the tide to Troy; But parting then for that detested shore,

Our eyes, unhaply I never greeted more.

Pope, Translation of the Odyssey.

Greeting. verbal abs. Salutation at meeting, or compliments at a distance.

I from him Give you all greetings, that a king, as friend, Can send his brother.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 1.

Now, Thomas Mowbray, do I turn to thee, And mark my greeting well; for what I speak, My body shall make good.

Id., Richard II. i. 1.

Greffier. s. [Fr. greffier; Lat. graphiararius; from Gr. γράφω = write.] Recorder; registrar.

A short but memorable story the greffier of that town, though of different religion, reported to more ears than ours.—Bishop Hall, Epistles, Dec. 1, ep. 5.

Gregarian. adj. Belonging to the common sort; ordinary. Rare.

The Gregarian soldiers and grooms of the army is well affected to him.—Howell, Letters, iii. 1; 1644.

Gregarious. adj. [Lat. grex, gregis = flock.] Going in flocks or herds, like sheep or partridges.

No birds of prey are gregarious.—Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Without intelligence, man is not social, he is only gregarious.—Johnson, Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Grikes and Gregarians here their meetings hold, Convivial wets, and bucks alert and bold;

A kind of masons, but without their sign; The bonds of union—pleasure, song, and wine:

Man, a gregarious creature, loves to fly Where he the trackings of the herd can spy;

Still to be one with many he desires.

Although it leads him through the thorns and briars.

Crabbe, The Borough, Clubs and Social Meetings.

The natural habits of the antelope next claim our attention. The groups with spiral and lyrate horns are mostly gregarious, frequenting the open plains, and often preferring the most barren tracts. . . .

Though violent and timid by nature, the gregarious species have the same curiosity which deer and sheep evince at the sight of strange objects.—Savannaux, Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 234.

If the habits of bees, which Virgil describes in his fourth Georgic, had been true of the Italian bees in his own time, they would be true of bees at the present time. But, being, though a gregarious and (as they have been called) a political, are not a progressive animal.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, q. v.

Gregariousness. s. Attribute suggested by Gregarious.

That marked gregariousness in human genius had taken place among the poets and orators of Rome, which had previously taken place among the poets, orators, and artists of Greece.—De Quincy, Style.

Grenade. s. [Fr.; from Lat. pomum granatum = pomegranate.] Iron case, filled with powder and bits of iron, from its shape and contents suggesting the likeness to a pomegranate.

A grenade [is] a little hollow globe or ball of iron, or other metal, about two inches and a half in diameter, which, being filled with fine powder, is set on fire by means of a small fuse fastened to the touch-hole; as soon as it is kindled, the case flies into many shatters, much to the damage of all that stand near.—Harris.

Grenadier. s. Originally a foot-soldier, whose business was to throw grenades. It now, with the definite article and in the plural number, denotes a certain regiment, as, The Grenadiers, or with the construction adjectival, Grenadier guards.

Peace always the shepherd's fear Of wearing cap of grenadier. Gay, Pastorals.

Grenade. s. [Spanish.] Same as Grenade.

Yet to express a Scot, in play that prize, Not all those mouth grenades can suffice.

Cleaveland.
You may as well try to quench a flaming grenade with a shell of fair water as hope to succeed.—Watts.

Grey. adj. [A.S. græg.]

1. White with a mixture of black.

This ancient ruffian, sir, whose life I spare'd, At suit of his grey beard.

Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

They left me then, when the grey hooded even, Like a sad votariat in palmer's weed,

Rose from the hindmost wheels of Phobus' wain.

Milton, Comus, 188.

These gray and dun colours may be also produced by mixing white and black, and by consequence differ from perfect whiteness, not in species of colour, but only in degrees of luminousness.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

2. Greyheaded.

Our green youth copies what grey sinners act, When venerable age commands the fact.

Dryden.

The grey mare is the better horse. The wife is master of the husband.

Right, Sir John, for I see, if the gray mare's the better horse, I lose the silly.—O'Keefe, Fontainebleau, ii. 2.

Grey. s.

1. Colour so called.

I'll say you gray is not the morning's eye; 'Tis but the pale reflex of Cynthia's brow.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

Down sunk the sun, the closing hour of day Came onward, mantled o'er with dusky gray.

Parnell, The Hermit.

2. Horse of a grey colour.

His English grey carried him many miles from the field, while Scherwin, though wounded in two places, manfully upheld the day.—Mackenzie, Critical and Historical Essays, Frederic the Great.

3. In the plural. Regiment so named.

Youngling, thou canst not love so dear as I.—Graybeard, thy love doth reverse.

Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, ii. 1.

Have I in conquest stretcht mine arm so far, To be afraid to tell greybeards the truth?

Id., Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

A dull relation of the acts of graybeards to a young prince might grow tedious.—Sir J. Harrington, Brief View of the State of the Church of England, p. 35.

Gréy. s. Trumpet-fly.

We drove afield, and both together heard What time the gréyfly winds her sultry horn.

Milton, Lycidas, 27.

Greyheaded. adj. Aged (as shown by the changed colour of the hair).

Many years later greyheaded old pensioners who crept about the arched and alleys of Chelsea Hospital used to relate how he charged at the head of Galway's horse, how he dismounted four times to put heart into the infantry, how he rallied one corps which seemed to be shrinking: 'That is not the way to fight, gentlemen. You must stand close up to them. Thus, gentlemen, thus.'—Mackenzie, History of England, ch. x.

Greyhound. s. [Norse, grey-hund.]

First, may a trusty greyhound transform himself into a tiger?

Sir P. Sidney.

[The etymology of this name is uncertain. Some have supposed it to be derived from Græcus, Grecian, because it was possibly first used by Greeks. This derivation is more probable than the Dutch greyhound, from grypen, to gripe, or Calus fanciful one, 'quod precipue græcus sit inter canes.' Perhaps, after all, the most simple and obvious is the true one, from the prevailing colour of the ancient breed of this dog.—Bell, History of British Quadrupeds.]

GREY

Greyish. adj. Approaching to a grey colour.
On either side did shine a greyish eye.
Warner, Alden's England.

Grey-lag. s. In Ornithology. See extract.

Under the term wild goose, four or five species are frequently included, and the grey-lag goose, the first on our list, has not always been so well defined or represented as to exhibit the true specific characters that distinguish it from the bean goose and white-fronted goose, with which the grey-lag is most frequently confounded. The present species is considered to be the origin from which our valuable domestic race is derived. . . . It will be observed that I have resumed the old name of grey-lag goose, believing that the term lag, as applied to this goose, is either a modification of the English word lake, the Latin lacus, or, perhaps, an abbreviation of the Italian lago, from which latter country it is even probable that we might have originally obtained this our domesticated race.—Larrell, British Birds.

Grise. s. [N.Fr. gris = pig.] Young of any animal, especially a pig.

I am lord of other geese! this fine smooth-brown's cut, the young grise of a gray;
Two tynis uarsh, and the forest gay.
B. Jonson, Earl Shepherd, II. 2.

Grise. v. n. Make way by cutting.
His peasant spear he thrust with silent way,
That through his thigh the mortal steel did drive.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Grisein. adj. [Fr. gris de lin = grey of flax.]
His love fades, like my grisein petticoat.
Kilgrew, Parson's Wedding.

Grisein. s. Colour so called.
The ladies dress'd in rich gowns were seen,
Of Florence satin, flower'd with white and green,
And for a shade betwixt the bloomy grisein.
Dryden, Fables.

Grisein. s. [Swedish, gräddda = broil; gräddpanna = frying-pan.] Portable grate on which meat is laid to be broiled upon the fire.

He had added two bars to the grideiron.—Spectator.

Grise. s. [Fr. grief; Lat. gravis.]
1. Sorrow; trouble for something past.

I will instruct my sorrows to be proud;
For grief in proud, and makes his owner stout.
Shakespeare, King John, III. 1.

Wringing of the hands, knocking the breast, are but the ceremonies of sorrow, the pomp and ostentation of an effeminate grief, which speak not so much the greatness of the misery as the smallness of the mind. South, Sermons.

The mother was so afflicted at the loss of a fine boy, who was her only son, that she died for grief of it. Addison.

2. Grievance.
The king hath sent to know
The nature of your griefs, and whereupon
You conjure from the breast of civil peace
Such bold hostility? Shakespeare, Henry IV. v. 3.

3. Bodily pain. Osholete.
He being at that time gripped sore, and having grief in his lowerst belly.—Treatise of Sundry Diseases, 1591.

Can honour set to a leg? No. Or an arm? No. Or take away the grief of a wound? No. Honour has no skill in surgery then? No.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 1.

Griefful. adj. Full of sorrow or grief. Obsolete.
The day renews my griefful plaint.
Beckville, Tragedy of Gorboduc, 1561.

Which when she sees with glancing griefful eyes,
Her heart does quake.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 40.

Grieflike. adj. Pierced with grief. Rare.
A discontented friend, grieflike
With his unkindness. Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 1.

Grievance. s. State of uneasiness; cause of such; just or real ground of complaint.
What remedy can be found against grievances, but to bring religion into countenance, and encourage those who, from the hope of future reward, and dread of future punishment, will be moved to justice and integrity?—Swift.

Grieve. v. a.
1. Afflict; hurt; vex.
For he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men.—Luke, III. 33.

Forty years long was I grieved with this generation.—Psalm, xcv. 10.

2. Lament.
The beholders believed his [lord Stafford's] words, and grieved his destiny.—Barbary, Memoire, p. 112.

Grieve. v. n.
Do not you grieve at this.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. v. 3.

GRIL

How didst thou grieve then, Adam, to behold
The end of all thy offspring end so sad.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 761.

With equal mind what happens let us bear;
Nor joy nor grief too much for things beyond our care.
Dryden, Fables.

Griever. s. One who grieves.
A griever and quencher of the Spirit, a more perfect piece of atheism.—Hammond, Works, iv. 514.

Grievingly. adv. An one who grieves.
Grievingly, I think,
The peace between the French and us not values
The cost that did conclude it.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. I. 1.

Grievous. adj. Affictive; painful; hard to be borne.
To the flesh, as the apostle himself granteth, all affliction is naturally grievous.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Correction is grievous unto him that forsaketh the way, and he that hateth rebuke, reproof shall die.—Proverbs, xv. 10.

He durst not disclose, but sent grievous complaints to the parliament of the usage he was forced to submit to.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

To own a great but grievous truth, though they quicken and sharpen the invention, they corrupt the temper.—Watts.

It was a grievous fault,
And grievously hath Caesar answer'd it.
Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, III. 2.

Used adverbially.
He cannot come, my lord; he's grievous sick.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 1.

Grievously. adv. In a grievous manner.
Wide was the wound, and a large lukewarm flood,
Roll as the room, thence gush'd grievously.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Grittus, perceiving how grievously the matter was taken, with the danger he was in, began to doubt.—Kneller, History of the Turks.

I use how a number of souls are, for want of right information, oftentimes grievously vexed.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Whoever reads the Odyssy with an eye to the final, expecting to find it of the same character, or of the same sort of spirit, will be grievously deceived, and err against the first principle of criticism, which is to consider the nature of the piece, and the interest of its author.—Lyope, Preface to the Translation of the Odyssy. (Ord M.)

Before the Revolution one of his heterodox treatises had been grievously mutilated by Le Strange, and at last suppressed by orders from Le Strange's superior, the bishop of London.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xix.

Grievousness. s. Attribute suggested by Grievous.

They flail from the sword, from the drawn sword and from the bent bow, and from the grievousness of war.—Isaiah, xli. 15.

Deferring of time, or grievousness of sinners, do not prejudice his grace.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 700.

Griffin. s. [Lat. gryps; Gr. γρῑψ.]
1. Fabled animal with the head and paws of the lion, and the wings of the eagle.

Of all bearings among those winged creatures, the griffin is the most ancient.—Poacham, On Blazoning.

Aristus, a poet of Proconessus, affirmed, that near the one-eyed nations griffins defended the mines of gold.—Mir T. Brown.

2. Freshman in the East Indian Service. Slang.

Griffinlike. adj. Resembling the rapacity of a griffin.
Citations and processes to be served by a corporality of griffinlike promoters and apparitors.—Milton, Of Reformation in England, b. I.

Grig. s. [Lat. gryps; Gr. γρῑψ.]
1. Small eel.

There be several sorts or kind of eels; as the silver eel; and green or greenish eel, with which the river of Thames abounds; and those are called grigs.—J. Walton, Complete Angler, ch. xlii.

2. Merry little body.
Hard in her heart as flint or stone,
She laughs to see me pale;
And merry as a grig is grown,
And brisk as bottle-ale.
Gay, A New Song of New Smiles.

Tom was a merry little grig,
Fiddled and danced to his own jet;
Good-natured, but a little silly,
Irresolute and shally shilly.
Swift.

By the blood of the Mirabals, I thought I had never lived till then: I grew as merry as a grig, and laughed at every word that was spoken.—Goldsmith, Essays, vi.

Grill. v. a. [Fr. griller.] Broil on a gridiron.

GRIM

GREYER
GRIMALKEN

And now I'll tell you what I'll do, Mr. Corporal; I will prepare it myself; and then, Mr. Vandyperken shall have it grilled for his breakfast, and then he shall not eat it, but leave it for Smalbones, and then Smalbones shall pretend to eat it, but put it in his pocket, and then . . . he shall bring it on shore, and give it to the dog here in the yard, so that he shall kill the dog himself, by wishing to kill others.—Murray, Smalbones.

Grilled. part. adj. Broiled on a gridiron.
It is a day of launching without an object, and luncheon without an appetite; of hopes and fears; confidence and dejection; of bravado bets and secret hedges; and, about midnight, of furious suppers, of grilled bones, brandy-and-water, and reekless—Diarrhi the younger, Ominally, b. v. ch. iv.

Grilly. v. a. Harass: (as we now say 'to rust a man,' for 'to tease him').
For while we wrangle here and jar,
We are grilled all at Temple-bar.
Butler, Hudibras.

Grille. s. [?] See extract.
(One . . . that weighed only fifteen ounces . . . is the smallest specimen I have ever seen that had been once to salt water. These small-sized fish, when under two pounds weight, are called by larger of the London fishermen salmon-pearl; when larger grilles. These fish breed during the winter; they return from the sea with the ova enlarged; the ova in a grille being of nearly the same comparative size as those observed in a salmon. The young mature only a much smaller number. . . . The growth of the salmon from the state of the smolt to that of the grille has been shown to be very rapid.—Larrell, British Fishes, Salmon.

Grim. adj. [A.S. grim.]
1. Having a countenance of terror; horrible; hideous; frightful.
The innocent prey in haste he does forsake,
Which quit from death, yet quakes in every limb,
With change of fear to see the lion look so grim.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Bound in those gloomy caves with adamantine chains,
Thou hast a grim appearance, and thy face
Bears a command in't.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 3.

Here we have him in the grimmer draw of a revengeful judge.—South, Sermons, viii. 201.

Whether it would not be the grim dispensation that ever befell him, to be thrust out of the world with his sins about his ears.—Ibid., ix. 183.

Their swartly looks would darken all our plains,
Doubling the native horror of the war,
And making death more grim. Addison, Cato.

2. Ugly; ill-looking.
Strait stood up to him
Divine Ulysses; who with looks exceeding grave
And grim,
This better check gave. Chapman.

Grimace. s. [Fr.]
1. Distortion of the countenance from habit, affection, or insolence.
He had not spar'd to show his piques,
Against th' haranguer's politicks,
With smart remarks of loving faces,
And annotations of grimaces. Butler, Hudibras.

The favourable opinion and good want of men cause oftentimes at a very easy rate, and by a few despicable looks and affected whims, set off with some odd declensional postures and grimaces, and such other little arts of dissimulation, cunning men will do wonders.—South, Sermons.

The buffon ape, with grimaces and gambols, carried it from the whole field.—Riv. E. L. Estrange.

The French nation is addicted to grimace.—Spontator.

2. Air of affectation.
Vire in a vizari, to avoid grimaces,
Allows all freedom, but to see the face. Granville.

Grimalkin. s. [The ordinary analysis of this word—a word which has been specially illustrated by more than one industrial writer, is gr = gray, and mal-kin = diminutive of mall; to which root is given the sense it has in the provincial term mawkin = scarecrow. Hence, the details of the transition being obscure, it is brought to denote, as a proper rather than a common name, cat.

That cat is both the current and the early meaning of the word is beyond doubt. It is suggested, however, that its true import was not very clear to those who first used it. It meant, not so much the cat in general, but the cat that played a part in the orgies of witches—

'I come, Grimalkin.—Paddock calls—Anon.
Fair in foul and foul is fair,
Hover through the fog and filthy air.'
(Shakespeare, Macbeth, l. 1.)

To the phraseology descriptive of matters of this kind, it is likely that the German language, through the numerous itinerant showmen, mountebanks, and players of the time of Queen Elizabeth, contributed. If so, a witches' song, in which some word like the one under notice was, at the same time, both prominent and misunderstood, might supply it; the connection between the witches and the cuts doing the rest. Such a song, beginning with the words Graue wölken (=grey clouds) in the form of a compound (Grauewölken), is to be found in at least one of the existing German dialects. See Ferminich, p. 3, for an East Frisian Hexenlied.] Gray little woman; name of an old cat.

Grimalkin, to domestic vermin sworn
An everlasting foe, with watchful eye
Lies nightly brooding o'er a chinky gap,
Prowling her fell claws, to thoughtless mice
Sure ruin.
J. Phillips, Splendid Shilling.

Grime. s. [?] Dirt, blackish in colour, and originally of a powdery consistence, deeply insinuated; sullyng blackness not easily cleansed.

Swart, like my shoe, but her face nothing so clean Kept for why? she swears: a man may go over
Shore in the grime of it.—Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, iii. 2.

Gallow is the word by which they denote black grime of burnt coals or wood.—Woodward, On Fossils.

Grime. v. a. Make grimy.

My face I'll grime with filth,
Blanket my loins, elf all my hair in knots,
Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 3.

Grimly. adj. Having a frightful or hideous look.

When it was grown to dark midnight,
And all were fast asleep,
In came Margaret's grimly ghost,
And stood at William's feet.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Knight of the Burning Castle.

Grimly. adv. In a grim manner; horribly; hideously; terribly.

We've landed in ill time: the skies look grimly,
And threaten present blusters.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iii. 3.

So Pluto, seiz'd of Proserpine, convey'd
To hell's tremendous gloom the afflicted maid:
Thence grimly snail'd, pleas'd with the beautiful prize,
Nor envy'd Jove his sunshine and his skies.
Addison, Cato.

Grimness. s. Attribute suggested by Grim; horror; frightfulness of visage.

The grimness of her visage discombed, yet will it be fearful enough.—Bishop King, Thanksgiving Sermon, p. 28: 1619.

Grimmer. s. [?] Stern, unsociable person; curmudgeon.

Even Tiberius Caesar, who otherwise was known
As a grimmer, and the most unsociable and melancholic man in the world, required in that manner to be served and washed well unto, whosoever he served.—Holland, Translation of Pliny, vol. ii. p. 207. (Trench.)

Grimy. adj. Dirty; cloudy.

Mines of grimy coal low-ld.
Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, st. 73.

Grim. v. a. Show, set, or snap, by grinning.

They neither could defend, nor can pursue;
But grin'd their teeth, and cast a helpless view.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Grim. v. n. [A.S. griman.] Snap the teeth together and withdraw the lips either in anger or in mirth.

Death, death! oh, amiable, lovely death!
Come grin on me, and I will think thou smil'st.
Shakespeare, King John, iii. 4.
For what valour were I, when a cur doth grin,
For one to trust his hand between his teeth,
When he might spurn him with his foot away?
Id., Henry VI. Part III. i. 4.

It was no unpleasant entertainment to me to see the various methods with which they have attacked me; some with piteous moans and outcries, others grinning, and only showing their teeth.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

A lion's hide he wears;
About his shoulders hangs the shaggy skin;
The tooth and snapping jaws scream grim.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Fools grin on fools, and Stoliclita support,
Without one sigh, the pleasures of a court. Young.
In reality, active, the manner or mode in which the grin displays itself being chiefly shown. To 'grin horribly a ghastly smile,' 'to grin the teeth' (except when confused with Grind), is a construction akin to that of 'walk a mile.'

Grin. s.

1. Act of closing the teeth as in snapping and showing them, or by drawing back the lips as in laughter.

He laughs at him; in's face too—
O you mistake him; 'twas a humble grin,
The fawning joy of courtiers and of fools. Dryden.
The muskies were so drawn together on each side of his face, that he showed twenty teeth at a grin.—Addison.

2. Catchtrap, as a snaretrap, or any smaller one, on the principle of snapping and closing when a certain part is touched.

The grin shall take him by the heel, and the robber shall prevail against him.—Job, xviii. 9.

Grind. v. a. preterite ground; past part. ground. [A.S. grindan.]

1. Reduce anything to powder by friction; comminute, or pulverise, by attrition.

And whosoever shall fall on this stone, shall be broken; but on whosoever it shall fall, it will grind him to powder.—Matthew, xxi. 44.

What relation or affinity is there between a minute body and cognition, any more than the greatest? Is a small drop of rain any wiser than the ocean? Or do we grind inanimate corn into living and rational man?—Hutley, Sermons.

2. Comminute by the teeth or grinders.

Pierce famine is your lot for this misdeed,
Reduc'd to grind the platen on which you feed.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

3. Sharpen or smooth by rubbing on something hard.

Meeting with Time, Slack thing, said I,
Thy sithe is dull; what it, for shame:
No marvel, sir, he did reply,
If it at length deserve some blame;
But where one man would have me grind it,
Twenty to one too sharp do find it.
Against a stump his tusk the monster grinds,
And in the sharpen'd edge new vigorous finds.
Dryden, Fables.

4. Rub one against another.

That the stomach in animals grinds the substances which it receives, is evident from the dissection of animals, which have swallowed metals, which have been found polished on the side next the stomach.—Arbutnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

5. Harass; oppress.

Some merchants and tradesmen, under colour of furnishing the colony with necessities, may not grind them so as shall always keep them in poverty.—Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

Another way the Spaniards have taken to grind the Neapolitans, and yet to take off the odium from themselves.—Addison.

We too shall, in our turn, be outstripped, and in our turn be envied. It may well be, in the twentieth century, that the peasant of Dorsetshire may think himself miserably paid with twenty shillings a week; that the carpenter at Greenwich may receive ten shillings a day; . . . that numerous comforts and luxuries which are now unknown, or confined to a few, may be within the reach of every diligent and thrifty working man. And yet it may then be the mode to assert that the increase of wealth and the progress of science have benefited the few at the expense of the many, and to talk of the reign of Queen Victoria as the time when England was truly merry England, when all classes were bound together by brotherly sympathy, when the rich did not grind the faces of the poor, and when the poor did not envy the splendour of the rich.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. iii.

Grind. v. n. Perform the act of grinding; move a mill.

Fetter'd they send thee
Into the common prison, there to grind
Among the slaves and wretches.
Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1161.

Grinder. s.

1. One who grinds; one who works in a mill.

Those manacles put upon him were exceedingly inconvenient for a grinder in a mill.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 118.

2. Instrument of grinding.

Now exhort
Thy hands to exercise the pointed steel
On the hard rock, and give a wheely form
To the expected grinder.
J. Phillips, Cyder.

3. Molar, or grinding, tooth.

The teeth are in men of three kinds; sharp, as the fore-teeth; broad, as the back-teeth, which we call the molar-teeth, or grinders; and pointed teeth, or canines, which are between both.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Nature is at a great deal of labour to transmute vegetable into animal substances; therefore herbivorous animals, which do not ruminate, have strong grinders, and chew much.—Arbutnot.

The Ruminantia are, perhaps, the most natural and best determined of all the classes of quadrupeds, since they appear to be altogether constructed on the same model; the canines alone presenting us with some trifling variations from the common structure. The first and most striking character is the absence of cutting or incisive teeth in the upper jaw, their place being supplied by hard tubercles; but in the lower jaw there are almost always eight; between these latter and the grinders there is generally an empty space, which, in a few genera only, is occupied by one or two canine teeth. The grinders, of which there are almost always six on each side of both jaws, have their crowns marked with two double creases, of which the convexity is turned inward in the upper teeth, and outward in the lower.—Stevenson, Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 247.

4. Teeth.

One, who at sight of supper, open'd wide
His jaws before, and whetted grinders tried.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Dear Dr. Johnson loved a hog of pork,
And on it often would his grinders work;
A veal-pie, too, with currants stuffed and plums,
Was monstrous grateful to the Doctor's gums.
Peter Pindar (Dr. Wolcott), Bazzy and Pizzio.

Grinding. part. adj. HARASSING.

Not knowing 'twas my labour, I complain
Of sudden shootings and of grinding pain,
My throes came thicker, and my cries increased.
Dryden.

You would have other sons of presents bishops of England, instead of men appointed to that sacred office solely because they were the needy sons of a fictitious aristocracy; men of gross ignorance, profligate habits, and grinding extortion, who have disgraced the episcopal throne, and profaned the altar.—Disraeli, The Younger, Coningsby, b. vii. ch. ii.

Grinding. verbal abs. Act, or process, by which anything is ground.

He that will have a rake out of the wheat, must needs tarry the grinding.—Shakespeare, Titus and Coriolanus, l. 1.

Harsh wounds, as of a saw when it is sharpened, and grinding of one stone against another, make a shivering or horror in the body, and set the teeth on edge.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Grindstone. s. Grindstone (perhaps, as a provincial term, the former is the commoner).

Such a light and metal'd dance
Saw you never yet in France;
And by the lead-men for the nonce,
That turn round like grindstones.
B. Jonson.

Grindstone. s. Stone on which edged instruments are sharpened.

Literature is the grindstone to sharpen the coarser, and to whet their natural faculties.—Hammond, On Fundamentals.

Smiths that make hinges brighten them, yet seldom file them; but grind them on a grindstone till bright.—Mason, Mechanical Exercises.

I found two or three bags of nails and spikes, a great screw-jack, a dozen or two of hakebois; and, above all, that most useful thing called a grindstone.—De Foe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

Grinner. s. One who grins.

The frightfulst grinner
Bo the winner.
Addison, Spectator, no. 173.

Grinning. part. adj. Showing a grin.

I like not such grinning honour as Sir Walter hath: give me life, which if I can save, so; if not, honour comes unlook'd for, and there's an end.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 3.

Madness, we fancy, gave an ill-tim'd birth
To grinning laughter and to frantic mirth. Prior.

Grip. s. [Dutch, grippel.] Little ditch or trench.

In every variety of soil ploughed in the forms just described for winter, care should be taken to have plenty of channels, or grips, as they are usually termed in Scotland, cut in the hollowest places, so as the surface-water may find them at every point by which to escape into the nearest ditch.—Stephens, Book of the Farm.

Grip, or Gripe. s. [Gr. γριψ.] Griffin.
Like a white hind under the grays' sharp claws.
Shakespeare, Rape of Lucrece.

gripe. v. a. [Dutch, grijpen; German, greifen.]

1. Hold with the fingers closed; grasp; press with the fingers; hold hard.

He that speaks doth gripe the hearer's wrist,
Whilst he that hears makes fearful action
With wrinkled brows. Shakespeare, King John, iv. 1.

2. Catch eagerly; seize.

You took occasion to be quickly woo'd,
To gripe the gentle way into your hands.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 1.

3. Pinch; press; squeeze; nip; afflict.

Griels gripe me so, I pin'd away, and died.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 202.
Grief gripe my heart when I think that the Mars of men received his death's blow from a pen-maker, a pedagogue. Stefford, Niobe, p. 115: 1611.

4. Cause a colicky pain.

Thus full of colic to the den she went,
Grip'd all the way, and longing for a vent. Dryden.

5. Tighten. Such is the meaning in the following extract, provided the word be treated as an active or transitive verb; inasmuch as the hand, in the ordinary sense of the term, is the gripping rather than the gripped object. The construction, however, may also be considered as neuter, in which case to gripe a hand = tighten a hand. Putting anything in the condition of that which grips is in the same predicament with 'walk a mile,' 'live a year,' and the like.

Unlucky Wretched! thy unfeeling master,
The more thou ticklest, gripes his hand the faster.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 203.

Gripe. v. n.

1. Pinch; catch at money meanly.

It is mean revenue, by being scattered in the worst of times, growing upon him; when others that had great ones, by gripping, made them less, and grew stark beggars. Bishop Hall.

2. In Navigation. When a ship runs her head too much into the wind, she is said to gripe.

Gripe. s.

1. Grasp; hold; seizure of the hand or paw.

Therefore still on high
He over him did hold his cruel claws,
Threatning with greedy gripe: to do him dy.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

They put a barren sceptre in my gripe,
Thence to be wrench'd with an unfeeling hand.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 1.

2. Squeeze; pressure.

Kid with this thought, at once he strain'd the breast;
'Tis true, the harden'd breast rebelds the gripe,
And the cold lips return a kiss unripe.
Dryden, Fables.

3. Oppression; crushing power.

O I take my cause
Out of the gripes of cruel men, and give it
To a most noble judge, the king my master.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. v. 2.

4. Affliction; pinching distress.

Fru from the gripes of sorrow every one.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, l. 3.
Adam, at the news,
Heart-struck with chilling gripe of sorrow stood,
That all his senses bound!

Canst thou bear cold and hunger? Can these limbs,
Fram'd for the tender offices of love,
Endure the gripes of starving poverty?

Cut off from all supplies, and even destitute of fuel, they soon began to experience the sharpest
gripes of cold and hunger. Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lvi.

There were instances in which men of the most venerable dignity, persecuted without a cause by extortioners, died of rage and shame in the gripes of the vile algorithms of luxury. Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

5. Pain in bowels like that of the colic.

In the jaundice the cholera is wanting; and the latter have a great sourness and gripes, with windiness. Floyer.

6. In Naval language.

Gripen is the name of a machine formed by an assembly of ropes, hooks, and chisel eyes; and used to secure the boats upon the deck of a ship at sea. Chambers.

Griper. s. Oppressor; usurer; extortioner.

Others pretend real, and yet are professed usurers,
griper, monsters of men, and harpies. Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy.

Gripping. part. adj. Having the character of that which grips; catching, or holding,
as in a gripe.

He wind'd the shining bough with gripping hold,
And rent away with ease the lining gold.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.
The minister and his agents answered that Westminster Hall was open; that, if any man had been illegally imprisoned, he had only to bring his action; that juries were quite sufficiently disposed to listen to any person who pretended to have been oppressed by cruel and gripping men in power; and that, as none of the prisoners whose wrongs were so pathetically described had ventured to resort to this obvious and easy mode of obtaining redress, it might fairly be inferred that nothing had been done which could not be justified. Macaulay, History of England, ch. 22.

Gripping. verbal ab.

1. Pinching; nipping.

Many people would, with reason, prefer the gripping of an hungry belly to those dishes which are a feast to others. Locke.

Manna, by the heat, figure, texture, and motion of its parts, has a power to produce the symptoms of sickness, and sometimes of acute pains or gripings in us. Id.

A certain position of countenance, . . . gave undoubted intelligence to what degree or proportion the spirit agitated the inward mass. For, after certain gripings, the wind and vapours, issuing forth,
... distorted the mouth, bloated the cheeks,
and gave the eyes a terrible kind of relieve. Swift, Tale of a Tub, § 8.

2. Distress; affliction.

Whether all the fictitious pleasures of sin can compensate for the acute tortures and gripings of mind. Killingbeck, Sermons, p. 361: 1730.

Grippingly. adv. In a gripping manner.

Clysters help, but the medicine stop in the guts, and work grippingly. Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Gripplle. adj.

1. Greedy; covetous; unfeeling; oppressive.

He gnash'd his teeth, to see
Those heaps of gold with gripplle covetise.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, l. 4, 31.

It is easy to observe, that none are so gripplle and hard-hearted as the children. Bishop Hall, Balm of Gilead.

The insatiate slave . . .
That thrusts his gripplle hand into her golden maw.
Dryden, Polydorus, song 3.

The gripplle wretch, who will bestow nothing on his poor brother for God's sake, is evidently an infidel, having none at all or very heathenish notions of God. Barrow, Works, l. 434.

To bestow ought in good earnest on the magistrate, we know your classic friendship is too gripplle;
for ye are always beginning. Milton, Articles of Peace between the Earl of Ormond and the Irish.

2. Grasping fast; tenacious.

On his shield he gripplle hold did lay,
And held the same so hard, that by no wile
He could him force to loose.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, vi. 4, 6.

Gripplle-minded. adj. Gripplle.

O Cyrus, how many close-handed, gripplle-minded Christians shall once be choked in judgement with the example of thy just munificence! Bishop Hall, Karubabel and Ezra. (Ord M.)

Grippleness. s. Attribute suggested by

Gripplle; covetousness. Rare.

Ace is not a more common plea than unjust: The young man pretends it for his wanton and inordinate lust; the old, for his grippleness, tediousness, loquacity; all wrongfully, and not without foul abuse. Bishop Hall, Temptations Repelled, iii. § 10.

Gris-amber. s. [two words.] Used by Milton for ambergris.

Bests of chase, or fowl of game,
In pesty built, or from the spit, or boild,
Gris-amber steam'd.
Milton, Paradise Regained, ii. 344.

Grise. s. Little pig. See extracts.

[This etymology (Irish Gaelic grispin = roast meat) may apply to a bird-eaten when dressed, as well as a griskin; and therefore, notwithstanding Lye's endeavour to support it by adding that grispin may be from gris, fire, the etymology must be sought elsewhere; and there can be no question that it is from gris, grise, or grice, a swine. Todd, under Griskin.]

As we have occasion to show that there is no authority in the Lancaster Chronicle for one specimen of early verse cited thence by Ritson, we may here insert a couplet therein given under the year 1244, which has generally escaped attention. A Norfolk peasant, by name William, had left his father's house, and set out to seek his fortune with no other companion or possession but a little pig (porcellus), whence the people used to call him Willy

Grise, but having in this way, wandering in France, met a rich widow, whom he wooed and wed, he became in the end a great man in the country. Still he piously remembered his early life of poverty and vagrancy, and among the other ornaments of one of the apartments of his fine house, to which he used to retire every day for an hour's meditation, he had himself pictured leading the pig as he used to do with a string, with this superscription in his native tongue:

Willie Grise, Willie Grise.

Thinece gwa't thou was, and gwa't thou es.
Grise, which is of frequent occurrence in Piers Plowman, and continued in use in England at least down to the middle of the 16th century, is still the common word for pig in Scotland. Craik, History of the English Language and Literature.

That gris is the root of griskin is clear.
Its own affinities are less evident. It, perhaps, is from the Fr. gris, grey, and meant in the first instance, a badger.

Grise. s. See Greese.

Let me speak like yourself; and lay a sentence,
Which as a grise or sheep, may help these letters
Into your favour. Shakespeare, Othello, l. 3

Grisette. s. [Fr.] In the last edition, the word being one of Todd's additions, the definition is 'wife or daughter of a tradesman.' This seems to have been taken from Boyer (Dictionnaire Royal François-Anglois et Anglois-François, 1753), in which the entry is—

Grisette, s. f. (jeune fille ou femme de basse condition) a tradesman's daughter or wife, a plain girl or scullery. Some use the word grized. The Julie Grisette, a pretty plain girl.

In the Dictionary of the Academy (5th edition) two meanings are given to the word—

Grisette, un habit d'étoffe grise de peu de valeur que portent les filles du commun. Grisette, se dit aussi d'une jeune fille ou d'une jeune femme de médiocre condition.

Bescherelle, adopting this, adds, 'Plus or-dinairement jeune ouvrière coquette et galante.' He further remarks that whilst in Paris the term always conveys a disparaging meaning, in Gascony it merely means the daughter of an artisan in general.

The unfavourable import of the word can scarcely be so recent as Boyer and Todd suggest. The well-known lines of Swift beginning,

Queen of wit and beauty, Betty,
Never shall the muse forget yg, &c., with the coarse banter, are addressed to Betty the Grisette.

In the Complement to the Dictionary of the Academy, a third meaning is given;
grisette being the names of several birds and butterflies.

When I am away, every body runs away with you, and carries you among the grisettes, or whitest they will. Johnson, To Mrs. Thrale, March 19, 1777.
(Ord M.)

Used adjectivally.

But her person what d'ye think of that?—Pretty and agreeable.—A little grisette thing.—O. Caldwell and J. Garrick, The Claudine Marriage, li. 2.

Griskin. s. [diminutive of grise.] Defined by Johnson as the vertebrae of a hog broiled; upon which Todd remarks that the cookery does not confer the name, and that it may mean flesh, raw, fried, or roasted.
That it is used in certain districts for a chine is true; but the editor believes that its original meaning was sucking-pig, this being the one suggested by the derivation. Then it seems to have been confounded with brisket, and taken for a part of the full-grown animal, instead of a dish of about the same size, consisting of the whole of the half-grown one. See Grise.

Grisly. adj. [A.S. grisdlic, from agrisan = frighten; terrify.—see Grizzly.] Dreadful; horrible; hideous; frightful; terrible.

His grisly locks, long grown and unbound.
Disordered hung about his shoulders round.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Where I was wont to seek the honey bee,
The gristly toothed grown there might I see.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.
My gristly countenance made others fly;
None durst come near, for fear of sudden death.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. l. 4.
The gristly face of a convicting countenance.—Bishop
Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xii.
Back stepp'd those two fair angels, half amaz'd
So sudden to behold the gristly king;
Yet thus, unmov'd with fear, ascent him soon.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 281.
Close up each other laid, they press'd the ground,
Their manly bosoms pierc'd with many a gristly wound.—Dryden.
In vision thou shalt see his gristly face;
The king of terrors, raging in thy race.
Id., State of Innocence.
The heinousness of fight
Is chang'd, and war appears a gristly sight.
Id., Fables.

Grison. s. [Fr.] Animal so called, Gulo vittatus.
(For extracts see Glutton and Huxon.)

Grist. s.
1. Corn to be ground.
Get grist to the mill to have plenty in store,
Least miller lack water.
Twiss, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.
; provision.
Thief religion and devotion is but as the motion of a wind-mill driven with the wind, that maketh grist no longer than the wind bloweth upon it.—Galster, Misc., 253. (Ord. M.)
Matter, as wise logicians say,
Cannot without a form subsist;
And form, say I, as well as they,
Must fail, if matter brings no grist.—Swift.

Grist to the mill. Profit; gain.
The computation of decesses, in all matrimonial causes, is wont to be made according to the rules of that law, because it brings grist to the mill.—Agliffe, Parergon Juris Criminis.

Gristle. s. [A.S.] Cartilage.
No living creatures that have shells very hard, as oysters, crabs, lobsters, and especially the tortoise, have bones within them, but only little gristles.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.
Least the asperity or hardness of cartilages should hurt the oesophagus or gullet, which is tender and of a skinny substance, or hinder the swallowing of our meat, therefore the annular gristles of the windpipe are not made round, or entire circles; but where the gullet touches the windpipe, there, to fill up the circle, is only a soft membrane, which may easily give way to the dilatation of the gullet.—Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Gristly. adj. Cartilaginous; made of gristle.
At last they split out pieces of their lungs; it may be small gristly bits, that are eaten off from the lung-pipes.—Harvey.
She has made the back-bone of several vertebrae, as being made fit to bend, more tough, and less in danger of breaking, than if they were all one intire bone without these gristly junctures.—Dr. H. Norr, Antidote against Atheism.
They have a louder and stronger note than other birds of the same bigness; which have only a gristly windpipe.—Grew.

Grit. s. [A.S. greut.] Sand; rough hard particles.
Nilvian hole, crackling a little betwixt the teeth, yet without the least particle of grit, feels as smooth as soap.—Grew.
The sturdy pear-tree here
Will rise luxuriant, and with toughest root
Pierce the obstructing grit and rustic marble.
J. Philips, Cyder.

Grits are fossils found in minute masses, forming together a kind of powder; the several particles of which are of no determinate shape, but seem the rudely broken fragments of larger masses; not to be dissolved or dissolved by water, but retaining their figure, and not cohering into a mass. One sort is a fine dull looking, grey grit, which, if wetted with saltwater into mortar or paste, dries almost immediately, and concretes into a hard stony mass, such as is not easily afterwards dissolved by water.
This is the Pulvis Puteolanus of the ancients, mixed among their cements used in buildings sunk into the sea; and in France and Italy an ingredient in their harder plasters, under the name of pozzolana.
It is common on the sides of hills in Italy. Another species, which is a coarse, beautifully green, dull grit, is the Chrysocolla of the ancients, which they used in soldering gold, long supposed a lost fossil.
It serves the purpose of soldering metals better than borax. The ferruginous black glittering grit, is the black shining sand employed to throw over wrecks, found on the shores of Italy.—Sir J. Hill,
On Fossils.

Gristiness. s. Attribute suggested by Gritty.
In Fuller's earth he could find no sand by the microscope, nor any gristiness.—Mortimer, Mus- cadry.

Griststone. s. Grit.
This gigantic statue of hard griststone had formerly been broken in half across the waist, and the upper part thrown to the ground, either by a shock of an earthquake, or the ruler abbot of Persian seal against the Egyptian religion; and for some centuries past the musical notes had issued from the broken fragments.—Sharpe, History of Egypt, ch. xiii.

Grits. s. See Groats.
Gritty. adj. Full of hard particles; consisting of grit.

I could not discern the unevenness of the surface of the powder, nor the little shadows let fall from the gritty particles thereof.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Grizzle. s. [Fr. gris.] Mixture of white and black; grey.

O thou dissembling cub! what wilt thou be,
When time hath sow'd a grizzle on thy eye?
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, v. 1.

Grizzle. v. a. Make greyish.

Grizzled. part. adj. Interspersed with grey: (when applied to hair sometimes ambiguo- us, as liable to be confuted with Grisly).
In the fourth chariot, grizzled and bay horses.—
Zerkiah, vi. 2.
To the boy Caesar send this grizzled head.
Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 2.

His beard was grizzled!—No.
It was as I have seen it in his life, Id., Hamlet, l. 2.
A mable silvered.

His hair just grizzled,
As in a green old age.—Dryden and Lee, Cyprius.
Those grizzled locks, which nature did provide
In plentiful growth their new' cars to hide.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Grisly. adj. Somewhat grey.
Living creatures generally do change their hair with age, turning to be grey and white; as is seen in men, though some earlier, some later; in horses they are clapp'd, and turn white; and in old squirrels, that turn grisly.—Bacon.

Groan. v. n. [Dutch, groonen.] Breathe deeply from the chest, the sound being made sonant in the larynx, of a grave dull pitch, as in pain or agony.

Many an heir
Of these fair edifices, for my war,
Have I heard groan and drop.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 4.

Men groan from out of the city, and the soul of the wounded crieth out.—Job, xiv. 12.
Repenting and groaning for anguish of spirit.—
Wadsworth, v. 3.
Nothing can so peculiarly gratify the noble dispositions of humanity, as for one man to see another so much himself as to sigh his groan and groan his pains.—South, Sermons.

Groan. s.
1. Breathe expired with noise and difficulty, from pain, faintness, or weariness.

Also poor country.
Where sighs and groans, and shrieks that rend the
air.
Are made, not mark'd! Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 2.
I led to slaughter, and to slaughter leave;
And ev'n from hence their dying groans receive.
Dryden.
Hence aching bosoms wear a visage pny,
And stifled groans frequent the hall and play.
Young.

2. Any hoarse dead sound.
Such sheets of fire, such bursts of horrid thunder,
Such groans of roaring wind and rain, I never Remember to have heard.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 2.

Groanful. adj. Sad; agonizing.
Adown he keel'd it with no palmar wreat,
That back again it did aloft rebound,
And gave against his mother earth a groanful sound.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Groaning. verbal abs. Lamentation; complaint on account of agony or pain.

To hear the groaning of the prisoner.—Psalms,
cl. 20.
He shall groan before him with the groanings of a deadly wounded man.—Kekkol, xxx. 24.

Groat. s.
1. Piece of money valued at fourpence, first coined by Edward III.

To give five pence, groats, or shillings, to five poor men.—Fulke, Against Allen, p. 408: 1860.
Our piece of four-pence being formerly groat (even as groat as a shilling now is, because then twenty pence, or five groats weighed an ounce), is called a grut.—Butler, English Grammar: 1633.
It often costs them two pence or a groat, before they can convey them [letters] to my hands.—Zu- ler, no. 164.

In allusion to their spurious groats, some Tory wit had fixed on demagogue, who hypocritically affected zeal against Popery, the nickname of Birmingham.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. iii.
2. Small sum in general.

My mother was wont
To call them woolen vassals, things created
To buy and sell with groats.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 2.
I dare lay a groat,
A tertian ague is at least your lot.
Jorden, The Cock and the Fox.

Imagine a person of quality to marry a woman much his inferior, and without a groat to her fortune.—Swift.

Groats. s. [German direct, grütze; so that the final s in both grits and groats belongs to the singular as well as the plural number. Of the two forms the one in i (grits) most nearly approaches the German original in sound, and as being, in the way of spelling, a simpler form, is preferable.
(On labels, however, and in lists, the form in -oa- is the commoner.) Oats as prepared for gruel, by having the hull or shell taken off, so as to leave only the meal; as in 'Kinden groats,' or groats brought from Emden, in East Friesland.

Grocer. s. [See extract.] Dealer in groceries. See Grocery.

A grocer is a man who buys and sells tea, sugar,
and plums and spices for gain.—Watts, Logic.
But still the odour of your brain shall prove
The grocer's care, and brave the rage of Jove.

Garth.
Grocers were formerly those who engrossed merchandise. It is now a particular and well-known trade; and the custom duties for grocery wares and drugs are particularly ascertained by statutes.—
Jacob, Law Dictionary.

This should be written groesser, from groas, a large quantity; a grocer originally being one who sold by wholesale; or from 'groasus,' a fig, which their present state seems to favour.—Johnson.
The merchants, called grocers, were accused of engrossing merchandise of all kind. . . . Our lexicographers of more than two centuries ago describe the grocers as those 'who sell by the great'.—
Todd.

Grocery. s. Grocers' ware.
His troops being now in a country where they were not expected, met with many cart-loads of wine, grocery, and tobacco.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Indignant female patriots, partly supplied with bread, rush now to the shops, declaring that they will have groceries. Groceries enough: sugar-barrels rolled forth into the street, patriot citizenesses wheeling it out at a just rate of elevenpence a pound;
likewise coffee-chests, soap-chests, nay cinnamon and clove-chests, with aquavite and other forms of alcohol,—at a just rate, which some do not pay, the pale-faced grocer silently wringing his hands! What help!—Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. iii. b. iii.
ch. i.

Grog. s. Spirit and water, as served to sail-ers. ? So called from the nickname of an admiral who wore a program coat.

We stopped serving grog, except on Saturday nights.—Cook and King's Voyage.

Groggy. adj. Overtaken, or influenced, by grog, or its exhilarating equivalents. Col- loquial, originally nautical.

Grogram. s. [Fr. grosgrain.] Kind of stuff so called, with large woof and a rough pile.

Corset they're neatly clothed; I of this mind am.
Your only wearing is your groggram.—Donne.
He shall be the groggram at the rate I told him.
B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.
I'll give you a new gown,
A new silk groggram gown.
Id., Magnetick Lady.

Natolia affords great store of chamelots and gro- gerams.—Sandys.

Whether alum doth intricate the hairs of wool, and hair-stuff, as groggrams.—Sir W. Petty, in Bishop Sprat's History of the Royal Society, p. 200.
The natural sweetness and innocence of her behaviour shot me through and through, and did more execution upon me in groggram than the greatest beauty in town had ever done in broad-day.—Addison, Spectator.

Plain goodly would no longer down;
Twas madam in her groggram gown.
Swift, Achilles and Deucali.

Groin. s. [N.F. groine = snout of a hog.]

1. Part next above the thigh.

Antipheus, a son of Priam, threw His lance at Ajax through the crevice, which went by him, and flew
On Laocœus, who Ulysses' friend: his groins it smote.
Chapman.

The fatal dart arrives,
And through the border of his buckler drives;
Pass'd through and pierc'd his groin; the deadly wound
Cast from his chariot, roll'd him on the ground.
Irrden.

The victor proceeded, according to the old savage custom, to tear off his armour: but as he bent over the body, Neoptolemus, collecting his failing strength, pierced him [Kumenus] in the groin: yet with a hand already unnerved, so that the wound did not prove fatal.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. ivii.

2. In Architecture.

Groins [are] a species of cross passages arched above, so that the hollow of the one arch may cut through the solid into the hollow of the other arch, and leave a void at their mutual intersection. It is evident that the first construction of groins must have been subsequent to that of simple vaulting, and that the idea must have originated in the formation of cross-arched passages.—Rees, Cyclopaedia.

Groin. v. a. Construct with groins.

Groined. adj. Constructed with groins.

Domes and groined arches, such as we have in the Pantheon and in the Baths of Caracalla, perhaps they invented; certainly they practised them on a small scale.—Whewell.

Groswell. s. [?] Native plant so called of the genus Lithospermum.

It is called in English gromell, pearly plant, and Jerusalem. . . . To this kind may be added those nine sorts: 1. Great upright gromel; 2. The greater creeping gromel; 3. Small wild gromel; 4. Umbelliferous gromel; 5. Small gromel with tufted tops like the alkane; 6. Small corn gromel, of the smaller Germans or sparrowwort; 7. French gromel with flaxen leaves; 8. Job's tears.—Coles, Adam in Eden, cxxxv.

Groom. s. [N.F. gromme.] See extract.

1. Boy; waiter; servant.

Then called she a groom, that forth him led Into a gently lodge. Spenser, Faerie Queen.
From Egypt's king ambassadors they come;
Thence many a squire attends, and many a groom.
Fairfax.

Think then, my soul! that death is but a groom
Which brings a taper to the outward room. Jonson.
In the time of Edward VI. lived Sternhold, whom king Henry his father had made groom of his chamber, for turning of certain of David's psalms into verses.—Peacham.

Amid the fold he rages, nor the sheep
Their shepherds, nor the grooms their bulls can keep. Dryden.

Would'st thou be touch'd
By the presuming hands of saucy grooms?

Groom [is] the name of a servant in some inferior place; generally applied to servants in stables;
but it hath a special signification, extending to the Groom of the Chamber, Groom of the Stole, &c., which last is a great officer of the king's household, whose precinct is properly the king's bed-chamber,
where the lord chamberlain hath nothing to do.
Stole signifies a robe of honour. [The] groom-porter [is] an officer or superintendent over the royal gaming-tables; in Latin he is called 'Aulis Regius Janitor Primarius.'—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

2. Young man.

I presume for to intrust this groom,
And silly maid, from danger to redeem. Fairfax.

Thou that art
The prime of our young grooms, even the top
Of all our lusty shepherds. Fletcher, Faithful Shepherdess.

3. Man newly married.

By this the brides are wak'd, their grooms are dressed;
All Rhodes is summon'd to the nuptial feast.
Irrden, Cymon and Iphigenia.

Groove. v. a. Cut hollow.

Of the box every joint was well groov'd.—Swift.

Groove. s. [Dutch, groeve.]

1. Deep cavern, or hollow in mines.

He might, to avoid idleness, work in a groove or mine-pit therabouts, which at that time was little esteemed.—Boyle.

2. Channel or hollow cut with a tool.

The screw-plate is a kind of steel well tempered, with several holes in it, each less than other; and in those holes are threads grooved inwards, which grooves fit the respective taps that belong to them.
—Mason, Mechanical Exercises.

Grope. v. n. [?] Feel where one cannot see.

My eye-gown near about me, in the dark
Grop'd I, to find out them. Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 1.

We grope for the wall like the blind, and we grope as if we had no eyes.—Isaiah, lix. 10.

They meet with darkness in the clearest light;
And grope at noon, as if invol'd with night.

A boy was groping for eels, and laid his hand upon a snake.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

This, no doubt, is better for men than that they should in the dark grope after knowledge; as St.
Paul tells us all nations did after God.—Locke.

He heard us in our course,
And with his outstretch'd arms around him gropp'd.
Addison.

O truth divine! enlighten'd by thy ray,
I grope and guess no more, but see thy way.
Arbutnot.

Grope. v. a. Discover, or attempt to discover, by groping.

How vigilant to grope men's thoughts, and to pick out somewhat whereof they might complain.—
Sir J. Heyward.

They have left our endeavours to grope them out by twilight, and by darkness almost to discover that, whose evidence is evidenced by light.—Sir T.
Browne, Vulgar Errors.

But Strephon, cautious, never meant
The bottom of the pan to grope. Swift.

Grosbeak. s. [Fr. grosbec; often with the French pronunciation; hawfinch being, probably, the common and more truly English term; the bird itself, however, is by no means common.] Native bird so called (Coccothraustes vulgaris); hawfinch.

The beak is hardest in those birds which tear their prey, as eagles and falcons; in those which bruise hard seeds and fruits, as parrots and grosbeaks; and in those which pierce the barks of trees, as woodpeckers, in the larger species of which the beak absolutely acquires the density of ivory.—
Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Gross. adj.

1. Great; big; bulky.

There are two gross volumes concerning the power of popes.—Baker, On Learning.

As opposed to thin.

His stature was of just height and all proportionate dimensions, avoiding the extremes of gross and meagre.—Bishop Fell.

With so and as, meaning 'the size of.' Rare.
The crows and choughs, that wing the midway
air,
Shew scarce so gross as beetles.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 6.

2. Shameful; unseemly; enormous.

He ripely considered how gross a thing it were for men of his quality, wise and grave men, to live with such a multitude, and to be tenants at will under them.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
They can say that in doctrine, in discipline, in prayers, and in sacraments, the church of Rome hath very foul and gross corruptions.—Ibid.

So far hath the natural understanding, even of sundry whole nations, been darkened, that they have not discerned, no, not gross iniquity to be sin.
—Ibid.

There is a vain and imprudent use of their estates, which, though it does not destroy like gross sins, yet disorders the heart, and supports it in sensuality and dulness.—Lar.

3. Intellectually coarse; palpable; impure;
unrefined.

To all sense 'tis gross
You love my son: invention is admi'd,
Against the proclamation of thy passion,
To say thou dost not.

Shakespeare, Tit's well that ends well, 1. 3.
Belial came last, than whom a spirit more lewd
Fell not from heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 400.
Is not religion so perfectly good in itself, above all, in its Author, that, without the gross of un-suality, we cannot but admire it?—Bishop Sprat.

But she dares never bend the present hour,
So gross the cheat, it is beyond her pow'r. Young.

4. Dense; not refined; not attenuated; not pure.

It is manifest that when the eye standeth in the finer medium, and the object is in the grosser, things shew greater; but contrariwise, when the eye is placed in the grosser medium, and the object in the finer.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Light fumes are merry, grosser fumes are sad;
Both are the reasonable soul run mad.
Dryden, Fables.

Or suck the mists in grosser air below,
Or dip their plumes in the painted bow.
Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto ii.

5. Stupid; dull.

If she doth then the subtle sense excel,
How gross are they that drown her in the blood?
Sir J. Davies, Immortality of the Soul.

And, in clear dream and solemn vision,
Tell her of things that no gross ear can hear.

Milton, Comus, 47.
Some men give more light and knowledge by the bare stating of the question with perspicuity and justness, than others by talking of it in gross confusion for whole hours together.—Watts.

6. Coarse; rough; not delicate.

Fine and delicate sculptures were helped with nearness, and gross with distance.—Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

7. Whole; having no deduction or abatement: (as, 'the gross sum'; 'the gross price').

8. Large; aggregate.

Another part in squadrons and gross bands,
On bold adventure to discover wide
That dismal world, if any clime perhaps Might yield them easier habitation, bend
Four ways their flying march.
Milton, Paradise Lost, li. 570.

9. Heavy; oppressive.

Curs'd be the wit which cruelty refines,
Or to his father's rod the scorpion joins;
Your finger is more gross than the great monarch's loins.
Dryden, Ind and Panther, pt. III.

Gross. s. [Fr. gros.]

1. Main body; main force.

The Belgians hop'd, that with disorder'd haste
The deep cut heels upon the sands might run;
Or, if with caution leisurely were past,
Their numerous gross might crush us one by one.

Dryden, Annus Mirabilis.
Remember, son,
You are a general: other wars require you;
For we the Roman gross begin to move.

Id., King Arthur.
The gross of the people can have no other pro-priet in changes and revolutions than of publick blessings.—Addison.

Several casuists are of opinion, that, in a battle,
you should discharge upon the gross of the enemy, without levelling your piece at any particular person.—Id., Freeholder.

2. Bulk; whole not divided into its several parts.

You see the united design of many persons to make up one figure: after they have separated themselves in many petty divisions, they rejoin one by one into a gross.—Dryden.

3. Chief part; main mass.

Comets, out of question, have likewise power and effect over the gross and mass of things.—Bacon,
Essays.

The articulate sounds are more confused, though the gross of the sound be greater.—Id., Natural and Experimental History.

a. In gross.

Certain general inducements are used to make palatable your cause in gross.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

It is indeed highly your interest to maintain the present House of Commons. Having sold the nation to you in gross, they will undoubtedly protect you in the detail; for while they patronise your crimes, they feel for their own.—Junius, lct. 40.

b. In Law.

In gross [is] absolute, entire, not dependent on another; as anciently a villain in gross was such a servile person as was not appendant or annexed to the lord or manor, nor to go with the tenure as appurtenant to it; but was like the other personal goods and chattels of his lord, at his lord's pleasure and disposal; so also, adwoman in gross differs from adwoman appendant, being distinct from the manor.
... Gross is such as is neither appendant nor appurtenant to land, but is annexed to a man's person; being granted to him and his heirs by deed; or it may be claimed by prescriptive right, or by the parson of a church, or the like corporation sole.
This is a separate inheritance, entirely distinct from any landed property.—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

Gross. s. [from Fr. grosse.] Number of twelve dozen.

It is made up only of that simple idea of an unite repeated; and repetitions of this kind, joined together, make those distinct simple modes of a dozen,
a gross, and a million.—Locke.

Gross-headed. adj. Stupid; dull; thickskulled.

This was it, to pluck out of the heads of his admirers the conceits that all who are not prelatist are gross-headed, thick-witted, illiterate, shallow.— Milton, Apology for Smectymnus.

Grossly. adv. In a gross manner.

1. Bulkily; in bulky parts; coarsely.

The case did again appear with a linen hanging thereon, so grossly impregnated, as it promised to be delivered of a most happy burthen: both case and linen bent themselves on me, and in them I found another paper and a hand

Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iv. 13.
2. Without subtilty; without art; without delicacy; without refinement; coarsely;
palpably.

Such kind of ceremonies as have been so grossly and shamefully abused in the church of Rome, where they remain, are scandalous.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

What I have said has been forced from me, by seeing a noble sort of poetry so happily restored by one man, and so grossly copied by almost all the rest.—Dryden.

If I speak of light and rays as endued with colours, I would be understood to speak not philosophically and properly, but grossly, and according to such conceptions as vulgar people would be apt to frame.—Sir J. Newton, On Opticks.

While it is so difficult to learn the springs and motives of some facts, it is no wonder they should be so grossly misrepresented to the publick by curious inquisitive heads.—Swift.

But this sort of plea will not hold in any shape.
Compassion to an offender, who has grossly violated the laws, is in effect a cruelty to the peaceable subject who has observed them.—Letters of Junius,
let. 45.

Grossness. s. Attribute suggested by GROSS.

1. Coarseness; not subtilty; thickness; spissitude; density; greyness of parts.

The cause of the epilepsy from the stomach is the grossness of the vapours which rise and enter into the cells of the brain.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

From envy'd wit, like Sol eclips'd, was known
Th' opposing body's grossness, not its own. Pope.

2. Ineligible fatness; unwieldy corpulence.

Wise men, that be over fat and fleshy, go to sojourns abroad at the temperate diet of some sober man; and so, by little and little, eat away the gross-ness that is in them.—Ascham.

3. Want of refinement; want of delicacy; intellectual coarseness.

I was three or four times in the thought they were not fairies; and yet the guiltiness of my mind drove the grossness of the foppery into a received belief that they were fairies.—*Shakespeare, Merry
Wives of Windsor*, v. 1.

Whatever beauties it may want, 'tis free at least from the grossness of those faults I mentioned.—Dryden.

What a grossness is there in the mind of that man, who thinks to reach a lady's heart by wounding her ears.—Richardson, Clarissa.

Grot. s. [Fr. grotte.] Cave; place of concealment; cavern for coolness and pleasure.

There is another grotto, or cavern, lying low underneath; it is contrived into the fashion of a cross, and here some of the Holy Innocents lie buried.—Gregory, Pastoral, p. 108; 1050.

God hath appointed a day wherein he will judge the secrets of men, that sin may not be the more secure for being close, but that it may be feared and shunned in gods as well as in most publick places.
—Calanville, Sermon, p. 513.

My lord had many grotto about his house, cut in the sandy sides of hills, wherein he delighted to sit and discourse.—Anbry, Anecdotes, ii. 475.

In the remotest wood and lonely grot,
Certain to meet that worst of evils, thought. Prior.

Awful seen the Egyptian grot. Pope.

Grottesque. adj. Distorted of figure; unnatural; wildly formed: (in two of the extracts as an Italian rather than an English word).

By rare artificers carved into story and grotesque work.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 132.

The champion head
Of a steep wilderness, whose hairy sides
With thicket overgrown, grotesque and wild,
Access deny'd. Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 134.

An hideous figure of their faces they drew.
Nor lines, nor looks, nor shadow, nor colours true,
And this grotesque design expos'd to publick view.
—Dryden.

There is yet a lower sort of poetry and painting, which is out of nature; for a farve is that in poetry which grotesque is in a picture: the persons and actions of a farve are all unnatural, and the manners false, that is, inconsistent with the characters of mankind; grotesque painting is the just resemblance of this.—*Id., Translation of Du Fresnoy's
Art of Painting*.

Palladian walls, Venetian domes,
Grotesco roof, and stucco floors. Pope.

Grottesque. s. Wild design of a painter or engraver, or carver.

Painters... sometimes do serve themselves of instances that have no existence in nature. . . . What indeed was more common and familiar among the Romans themselves than the picture and statue of Terminus, even one of their deities; which yet, if we well consider, is but a piece of grotesque.—*Sir H.
Wotton, Elements of Architecture*.

Farce is that in poetry, which grotesque is in a picture.—*Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's
Art of Painting*.

All the designs I have chance to meet of the temptations of St. Antony, were rather a sort of wild grotesques, than any thing capable of producing a serious passion.—Burke, On the Sublime and Beautiful.

Grottesquely. adv. In a wild, fantastical manner.

Death has despoiled the jester of his habiliments, and grotesquely decorated himself therewith.—Explanation of Holbein's Dance of Death, p. 10.

Grotto. s. [Italian.] Same as Grotto.

Let it be turned to a grotto, or place of shade.

Bacon, Essays, p. 285; 1052.

She turned into another walk, which led to a grotto.—Moral State of England, p. 163; 1070.

Grotto. s. Cavern or cave made for coolness; cavern generally.

Their careless chiefs to the cool grottoes run.

The bow'ns of kings, to shade them from the sun.
—Dryden.

This was found at the entry of the grotto in the Peak.—Woodward, On Fossils.

And many a summer flower is there,

And many a shade that love might share,

And many a grotto, meant for rest,
That holds the pirate for a guest.
—Byron, The Gleaner.

But the manor house was a ruin; and the grounds round it had, during many years, been utterly neglected. Hastings proceeded to build, to plant, to form a sheet of water, to excavate a grotto; and, before he was dismissed from the bar of the House of Lords, he had expended more than forty thousand pounds in adorning his seat. —Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Ground. s. [A.S. grund.]

1. Foundation; bottom.

Israel shall go on dry ground through the sea.—
Exodus, xiv. 16.

Man to till the ground

None was, and from the earth a dewy mist

Went up, and water'd all the ground.

And yet so nimbly he would bound,

As if he scorn'd to touch the ground.
—Butler, Hudibras.

Ground [is] the earth considered as superficially extended, and therefore related to tillage, travel, habitation, or almost any action. The main mass of terrene matter is never called the ground. We never distinguish the terraqueous globe into ground and water, but into earth, or land, and water; again, we never say under earth, but under ground.—Johnson.

2. Earth as distinguished from air or water.

I have made the earth, the man and the beast that are upon the ground.—Jeremiah, xxvii. 3.

There was dew upon all the ground.—Judges, vi.
40.

They sum'd their pens, and, soaring th' air sublime,

With clang despid'd the ground.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 421.

Too late young Turpin the delusion found;

Far on the sea, still making from the ground.

Dryden, Translation of the Esaid.

3. Land; country; region; territory.

With these came they, who from the lord'ring
floor

Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts
Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names

Of Isidim and Ashtaroth.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 419.

The water breaks its bounds,

And overflows the level grounds.
—Butler, Hudibras.

4. Estate; possession.

Unweary still within these narrow bounds,

Thy next design is on thy neighbour's grounds:

His crop invites to full perfection grown;

Thy own seems thin, because it is thy own.
—Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

The rains o'erflow'd my ground,

And my best Flanders mare was drown'd. Prior.

5. Floor.

Dawn was fallen on his face to the ground.—
1 Samuel, v. 4.

6. Dregs; lees; faeces; that which settles at the bottom of liquors. Generally plural.

Some insist upon having had particular success in stopping gangrenes, from the use of the grounds of strong beer, mixed up with bread or oatmeal.—
Sharp, Surgery.

7. First stratum of paint upon which the figures are afterwards painted.

We see the limner to begin with a rude draught, and the painter to lay his grounds with darksome colours.—Hakewill.

When solid bodies, sensible to the feeling and dark, are placed on light and transparent grounds,

as, for example, the heavens, the clouds and waters and every other thing which is in motion, and void of different objects; they ought to be more rough, and more distinguishable than that with which they are encompassed.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

8. Fundamental substance.

Over his head

A well wrought heav'n of silk and gold was spread.

Azure the ground, the sun in gold shone bright.
—Chapman.

Indeed it was but just that the finest line in nature should be drawn upon the most durable ground.—Pope.

Then wrought into the soul, let virtues shine.

The ground eternal, as the work divine. Young.

9. In Music. Plain song; tune on which descants are raised.

Get a prayer-book in your hand,

And stand between two churelmen, good my lord;

For on that ground I'll build a holy descent.
—Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 7.

10. First hint; first traces of an invention;
that which gives occasion to the rest.

Though jealousy of state th' invention found,

Yet love relin'd upon the former ground;

That way the tyrant had resolv'd to fly,

Pursuing hate, now serv'd to bring two lovers nigh.
—Dryden.

11. First principles of knowledge.

Here statesmen, or of them they which can read,

May of their occupation find the grammar. Pompey.

The grounds are already laid whereby that is unquestionably resolved; for having granted that God gives sufficient grace, yet when he co-operates most effectually, he doth it not irresistibly.—Newton.

After evening repasts, till bed-time, their thoughts will be best taken up in the easy grounds of religion, and the story of scripture.—Milton, Tractate on Education.

12. Fundamental cause; true reason; original principle.

He desired the steward to tell him particularly the ground and event of this accident.—*Sir P.
Sidney*.

Making happiness the ground of his unhappiness,

and good news the argument of his sorrow.—Id.

The use and benefit of good laws all that live under them may enjoy with delight and comfort, albeit the grounds and first original causes from whence they have sprung be unknown.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Nor did either of them ever think fit to make any particular relation of the grounds of their proceedings, or the causes of their misadventures.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Sound judgment is the ground of writing well.
—Rasselas.

Love once given from her, and plac'd in you,

Would leave no ground I ever would be true.
—Dryden.

Upon that prince's death, although the grounds of our quarrel with France had received no manner of addition, yet this lord thought fit to alter his sentiments.—Swift.

13. Field or place of action.

How was thy end deceived when these men rose;

And ev'n with theirs thine act thy death did bring.

O hasten'd at the least upon this ground. Daniel.

14. Foil.

Like bright metal on a millen ground,

My reformation glittering o' my fault,

Shall show more grossly and attract more eyes,

Than that which hath no foil to set it off.
—Shakespeare, Henry IV. part I. l. 2.

15. Pit of a theatre. See Grounding.

The understanding gentlemen o' the ground here asked my judgment.—B. Jonson, Bartholomew Fair.

In the following the idiomatic element lies in the verb rather than in the noun.

At length the left wing of the Arcadians began to lose ground.—Sir P. Sidney.

Evening mist,

Rise from the river, o'er the marsh glides,

And gathers ground fast at the labourer's heels,

Homeward returning.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 655.

I have known so many great examples of this cure, and heard of its being so familiar in Austria, that I wonder it has gained no more ground in other places.
—Sir H. Temple.

The squirrel is perpetually turning the wheel in her cage: she runs space, and warms herself with her continual motion, and gets no ground.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

Even whilst we speak our conqueror comes on,
And gathers ground upon us every moment.
—Addison, Cato.

Superiors think it a detraction from their merit to see another get ground upon them, and undertake them in the pursuits of glory.—Id., Spectator.

Ground. v. a.

1. Place or set in the ground.

And friendship which a faint affection breeds
Without regard of good, like ill groundless weeds.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, iv. 4.1.

2. Fix on the ground: (as, to ground arms).
When the fawn are thus discharged, the word of command in course is to ground their fawn.—Addison, Spectator, no. 102.

3. Found, as upon cause, reason, or principle.

Wisdom groundeth her laws upon an infallible rule of comparison.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
If your own actions on your will you ground,
Mine shall hereafter know no other bound.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.

Some eminent spirit, having signalized his valour, becomes to have influence on the people, to grow their leader in warlike expeditions; and this is grounded upon the principles of nature and common reason, which, where prudence and courage are required, rather incite us to fly to a single person than a multitude.—Swift.

4. Settle in first principles or rudiments of knowledge.

Being rooted and grounded in love.—Ephesians,
iii. 17.

5. Run aground.

Thy gentle river boasts its pigmy boat,
Urg'd on by pains, half ground'd, half afloat:
While at her stern an anchor takes his stand,
And marks the fish he purposes to land;
From that clear space, where in the cheerful ray
Of the warm sun, the scaly people play.
Crabbe, The Borough.

Used adjectively, or as the first element of a compound.

A lance of tough ground-ash the Trojan threw,
Rough in the rind, and knotted as it grew.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Some cut the young ash off about an inch above the ground, which causes them to make very large straight shoots, which they call ground-ash.—Mur-timer, Husbandry.

If the planting of oaks were more in use for underwoods, it would spoil the cooper's trade for the making of hoops either of hazel or ash; because one hoop made of the young shoots of a ground-ash, would outlast six of the best ash.—Ibid.

- Groun-ivy. s. [two words.] Native plant akin to the mints, thymes, &c.; Glechoma hederacea; alchoof or tumhoof.

Alchoof or groun-ivy is, in my opinion, of the most excellent use and virtue of any plants among us.—Sir W. Temple.

- Groundage. s. Custom or tribute paid for the standing of a ship in port.

It is ordinary to take custom for anchorage, groundage, &c.—Nigelman.

- Groundbait. s. Bait laid on the ground rather than the hook, to assemble fish.

Take the depth of the place where you mean after to cast your ground-bait, and to fish.—L. Walton,
Complete Angler.

- Groundedly. adv. Upon firm principles;
upon good grounds.

Whether he performed his former promise—that can I not groundedly tell.—Bale, in Leland's New Year's Gift, 1611.

He hath given the first hint of speaking groundedly, and to the purpose, upon this subject.—Glanville.

- Groundless. adj. Wanting ground.

We have great reason to look upon the high pretensions which the Roman church makes to miracles as groundless, and to reject her vain and fabulous accounts of them.—Bishop Atterbury.

The party who distinguish themselves by their zeal for the present establishment should be careful to discover such a reverence for religion, as may show how groundless that reverence is which is cast upon them of being avers to our national worship.
—Frederick.

- Groundlessly. adv. In a groundless manner; without reason; without cause; without just reason.

This principle of feignedly or groundlessly contesting.—Dr. H. More, Auditors against Idolatry,
ch. ii.

- Groundlessness. s. Attribute suggested by Groundless; want of just reason.

I shall close up this chapter with remarking the groundlessness of that tradition, which makes Ma-homed to be put into an iron chest, that, by the force of loadstones, hangs in the air.—L. Addison,
Life of Mahomed, p. 81.

- Groundling. s.

1. Contemptuous term for one on the low level of the ground: (specially applied to those in the pit of a theatre.)

It offends me to the soul, to hear a robustious
Vol. I.

perrivig-pated fellow tear a pandon to letters, to very raps, to split the ears of the groundlings.—
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 2.

We think may deserve to be senators;
And there we must stop before you thick-skinn'd tanners.
For we are born three stories high: no base ones,
None of your groundlings, maister.

Beaumont and Fletcher, The Prophetess.

2. Native fish so called of the genus Cobitis:
(limited in Yarrell to the Cobitis taenia;
perhaps unnecessary, as all the English loaches are equally, in the matter of habit,
groundlings).

It is called groundling from its habit of lurking under stones in search of larvæ and insects.—Yar-rell, British Fishes.

- Groundly. adv. Upon principles; solidly;
not superficially. Rare.

A man, groundly learned already, may take much profit himself, in using by epitome to draw other men's works, for his own memory sake, into shorter room.—Ascham.

- Groundpine. s. Native plant so called; Ajuga chamaepitys (Gr. χαμαι = on the ground + πι. π. = pine).

The whole plant has a very singular smell, resembling that of resin; whence its name ground-pine.
It grows on dry and barren hills, and in some places on the ditch banks by road-sides.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

- Groundplate. s. In Architecture. See extract.

Ground-plate [is] the outermost piece of timber lying on or near the ground, and framed into one another with mortises and tenons. In these also are mortises made to receive the tenons of the joists, the summer, and girders; and sometimes the trimmers for the stair-case and chimney way, and the binding joist.—Harris.

In the architectural schemes there should be a true delineation. If it be a timber-building, of the several sizes of the groundplates, breast-summer, and beam.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

- Groundplot. s.

1. Ground on which any building is placed.

Wretched Gynecia, where can't thou find any small ground-plot for hope to dwell upon?—*Sir P.
Niches.*

A ground-plot square five hives of bees contains;
Emblems of industry and virtuous gains.—Macle.

2. Ichnography of a building.

Men skilled in architecture might do what we did not attempt; they might probably form an exact ground-plot of this venerable edifice.—Johanna,
Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

- Groundrent. s. Rent paid for the privilege of building on another man's ground.

A foot in front, and thirty-three five sevenths deep, would bring in a ground-rent of five pounds.
—Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

The site was neither granted him nor given;
'Twas nature's, and the ground-rent due to Heaven's.
Macle.

- Groundroom. s. Room on the level with the ground.

I beseeched him hereafter to meditate in a ground-room; for that otherwise it would be impossible for an artist of any other kind to live near him.—Tatler.

- Groundsel. s. [A.S. grunde-sæwige, grundesawilie.] Native plant so called, of the genus Senecio.

It is called in English groundsell and grunsell.
... Groundsell hath mixed faculties: it rooteth and mildeweth, and withal digesteth, as Paulus Ægineta writeth.—Cole, Adam in Eden.

- Used adjectively.

Groundsell leaves, laid to with fine powder of frankincense, heals wounded sinews.—Barret, Alterative, 1560.

- Groundsill. s. [A.S. sil = threshold.]

The window-frame hath every one of its lights rabbetted on its outside about half an inch into the frame; and all these rabbets, but that on the ground-sill, are grooved square; but the rabbet on the ground-sill is levelled downwards, that rain or snow may the freer fall off.—Mozum, Mechanical Exercises.

- Used adjectively.

Next came one
Who mourn'd in earnest, when the captive ark
Maim'd his brute image, head and hands lopp'd off
In his own temple, on the ground's edge,
Where he fell flat, and sham'd his worshippers.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 487.

- Groundwork. s.

1. Ground; first stratum; first part of the whole; that to which the rest is additional.

A way there is in heav'n's expanded plain,
Which, when the skies are clear, is seen below,
And mortals by the name of milky way;
The groundwork is of stars.—Dryden, Fables.

2. First part of an undertaking; funda-mentals.

The main skill and groundwork will be to temper them such lectures and explanations, upon every opportunity, as may lead and draw them in willing obedience.—Milton, Tractate on Education.

3. First principle; of rational reason.

The groundwork thereof is nevertheless true and certain, however they through ignorance disguise the same, or through vanity.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

The mortar is the first business of the port, as being the groundwork of his instruction.—Dryden.

- Group. s. [Fr. groupe.] Assemblage of two or more figures which have some apparent relation to each other in painting or sculpture; cluster; collection; number througled together.

In a picture, besides the principal figures which compose it, and are placed in the midst of it, there are less groups or knots of figures disposed at proper distances, which are parts of the piece, and seem to carry on the same design in a more inferior manner.
—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

I cannot doubt but the poet had in view the picture of Zetes, in the famous group of figures which represents the two brothers blinding Dirce at the horns of a mad bull.—Addison.

You should try your graving tools
On this odious group of fools.

Swift.

- Group. v. a. Arrange in a group.

The difficulty lies in drawing and disposing, or, as the painters term it, in grouping such a multitude of different objects.—Prior.

- Grouse. s. [?] Native gallinaceous bird so called of the genus Tetrao.

The 'squires in scorn will fly the house
For better game, and lo, k for grouse.

Swift.

- Grout. s. [A.S. grut.]

1. Groats; grills.

King Hardicanute, 'midst Danes and Saxons staid,
Carous'd in nut-brown ale, and din'd on grout:
Which dish its pristine honour still retains,
And when each prince is crown'd in splendour reigns.—King.

2. Wort.

Sweet grout, or whig, his bottle had, as much as it might hold.—Warner, Alcides's England.
Sweet honey some condense, some purge the grout.—Dryden.

- Grove. s. Small wood, or place set with trees.

I look'd towards Birnam, and ayon methought
The wood began to move:
Within this three mile way you see it coming;
I say a moving grove.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 2.
Fortunate fields and groves, and flow'ry vales;
Thrice happy dells! Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 569.
Banish'd from courts and love,
Abandon'd truth seeks shelter in the grove.

Graville.

- Grövel. v. a. [The import of the l has been well investigated by Mr. Morris in a paper in the Transactions of the Philological Society; and he gives good reasons for believing that the verb is a secondary growth; being formed upon what appears to be (but which is not) its participle, viz. the word groveling, as it is at present commonly, though improperly spelt; but which is really, groveling. Meanwhile, groveling itself is an adverb, belonging to the class which in Scotch contains aloelins, blindlins, siderlins, and many other words, but which in English, is generally limited to the word Darkling. This class Mr. Morris enlarges by the addition of endlong, headlong, footling, and middling.
The creation of a verb out of a form so participial as the one under notice is easily conceived. For a further development of this doctrine the reader is referred to the paper itself, which is both critical and suggestive.] Lie prone; creep low on the ground.

What see'st thou there? king Henry's diadem,
Inch'd with all the honours of the world!
If so, gaze on, and grovel on thy face,
Until thy head be circled with the same.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. l. 2.

Now they lie
Groveling and prostrate on you lake of fire,
As we crouch, surrounded and amazed;
No wonder, fallen from such pernicious height.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 230.
Because thou hast done this, thou art accursed.
Above all cattle, each beast of the field;
Upon thy belly groveling thou shalt go.
Ibid. x. 177.

Let us then conclude that all painters ought to require this part of excellence: not to do it, is to want courage, and not dare to show themselves 'tis to creep and grovel on the ground.—Dryden, Translation of De Prouy's Art of Painting.

He [the emperor Frederic II.] was not superior,
It is manifest, to some of the superstitions of his time; he is accused of studying the influence of the stars, but it may have been astrology aspiring (under Arabic teaching) to astronomy, rather than astronomy groveling down to astrology.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. v.

The sturgeons . . . were designed to be the scavengers of the great rivers; they swim low, grovel along the bottom, feeding, in shoals, on the decomposing animal and vegetable substances which are hurried down with the debris of the continents drained by those rapid currents. . . . These fishes are, therefore, duly weighted by a ballast of dense dermal osseous plates, not scattered at random over their surface, but regularly arranged, as the seaman knows how ballast should be, in orderly series along the middle and at the sides of the body.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

Groveler. s. Person of a low, mean, groveling disposition.

The man of a towering ambition, or a well regulated taste, has fewer objects to envy or to covet than the groveler.—Shenstone.

Groveling. part. adj.

I must disclaim whate'er he can express;
His groveling sense will show my passion less.
Dryden.

Several thoughts may be natural which are low and groveling.—Addison, Spectator.

It seems certain, that, according to the natural progress of human thought, the ignorant multitude must first entertain some groveling and familiar notion of superior powers, before they stretch their conception to that perfect being who bestowed order on the whole frame of nature.—Hume, Natural History of Religion.

Grow. v. n. [A.S. growan.] preterite grew, past part. grown.

1. Develop in the way of vegetation; increase in bulk; develop; issue.

He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man.—Psalms, civ. 14.

Bones, after full growth, continue at a stay: as for nails, they grow continually.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Then their numbers swell,
And grow upon us.—Sir J. Denham.

Divisions grow upon us, by neglect of practice duties: as every age degenerated from primitive piety, they advanced in nice enquiries.—*Dr. H.
More, Decay of Christian Piety.*

Those towers of oak, o'er fertile plains might go,
And visit mountains where they once did grow.
Waller.

Children, like tender osiers, take the bow;
And as they first are fashion'd, always grow.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

The general idea given by this word is procession or passage from one state to another. It is always change, but not always increase; for a thing may grow less, as well as grow greater.—Johnson.

2. Improve; make progress.

Grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ.—2 Peter, iii. 18.

Verse, or the other harmony of prose, I have so long studied and practised, that they are grown into a habit, and become familiar to me.—Dryden, Fables, pref.

The trespasses of people are grown up to heaven,
and their sins are got beyond all restraints of law and authority.—Ezra, Sermons.

3. Come forward.

It was now the beginning of October, and winter began to grow fast on: great rain, with terrible thunder and lightning, and mighty tempests, then fell abundantly.—Kneller, History of the Turks.

4. Be changed from one state to another;
become either better or worse; turn.

Scipio Nasica feared lest, if the dread of that enemy were taken away, the Romans would grow either to idleness or civil dissension.—Abbot.

Delos, by being reckoned a sacred place, grew to be a free port, where nations warring traded, as in a neutral country.—Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

5. Proceed as from a cause or reason.

What will grow out of such errors, as masked under the cloak of divine authority, impossible it is in that ever the wit of man should imagine, till time have brought forth the fruits of them.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Shall we set light by that custom of reading, from whence so precious a benefit has grown?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Take heed now that ye fall not to do this: why should damage grow to the hurt of the king?—
Jer., iv. 22.

Hence grows that necessary distinction of the saints on earth and the saints in heaven: the first belonging to the militant, the second to the triumphant church.—Bishop Pearson.

The want of trade in Ireland proceeds from the want of people; and this is not grown from any ill qualities of the climate or air, but chiefly from so many wars.—Sir W. Temple.

6. Accrue; be forthcoming.

Ev'n just the sum that I do owe to you,
Is growing to me by Antipholia.
Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, iv. 1.

7. Adhere; stick together.

Honour and policy, like unsever'd friends,
I th' war do grow together.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 2.

The frog's mouth grows up, and he continues so for at least six months without eating.—J. Walton, Complete Angler.

In burnings and scaldings the fingers would many times grow together, the chin would grow to the breast, and the arms to the sides, were they not hindered.—Wicman, Surgery.

8. Swell.

Mariners are used to the tumbling and rolling of ships from side to side, when the sea is never so little grown.—Sir W. Raleigh.

9. Advance.

Nature, as it grows again towards earth,
Is fashioned for the journey, dull and heavy.
Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, ii. 2.

The king by this time was grown to such an height of reputation for cunning and policy, that every accident and event that went well was laid and imputed to his foresight.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

After they grow to rest upon number, rather competent than vast, they grow to advantages of place, cunning diversions and the like; and they grow more skilful in the ordering of their battles.—Id., Essays.

Hence, hence, and to some barbarous climate fly,
Which only brutes in human form does yield,
And man grows wild in nature's common field.
Dryden.

The nymph grew pale, and in a mortal fright,
Spent with the labour of so long a flight.
Id.

But when to ripened manhood he shall grow,
The greedy sailor shall the sea forego.
Id., Translation of Virgil.

We may trade and be busy, and grow poor by it,
unless we regulate our expenses.—Locke.

With up.

Now the prince groweth up fast to be a man, and is of a sweet and excellent disposition.—Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

The main thing to be considered, in every action of a child, is how it will become him when he is bigger, and whether it will lead him when he is grown up.—Locke.

We are brought into the world children, ignorant and impotent; and we grow up in vanity and folly.
—Archbishop Wake.

Grow. v. a. Cause to grow; raise by culture.

This will cause him to put out of his heart all envy, hatred, and malice, and grow in the same all amity, friendship, and concord.—Archbishop Cranmer, On the Sacraments, b. i. ch. xv. 1550.

They grow some very good tobacco.—Campbell.

The best wheat in England is grown in this neighbourhood.—Entick.

The true reason of the scarcity of corn is the failure of the harvest; and the cause of exportation is the like failure in other countries, where they grow less, and where they are therefore always nearer to the danger of want.—Dr. Johnson, On Corn. (Ord M.A.)

Grower. s. One who grows; increaser.

It will grow to a great bigness, being the quickest grower of any kind of elm.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Growing. verbal abs.

1. Vegetation.

It is not the growing of fruit that nourisheth man;
but it is thy word that preserveth them.—Wisdom,
xvi. 22.

2. Progression of time.

Your patience this allowing,
I turn my plow; and give my sown such growing
As you had slept between.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. chorus.

Growl. v. n. [Dutch. grollen.]

1. Snarl or murmur like an angry cur.

Dogs in this country are of the size of common mastiffs, and by nature never bark, but growl when they are provoked.—Bliss, Voyage to Hudson's Bay.

2. Murmur; grumble.

Othello, neighbours . . . how he would roar about a foolish handkerchief; and then he would growl so manfully.—Gag.

Growl. v. a. Signify or express by growl-
ing.

Aloud he bays, with bristling hair,
And thus in secret growls his fear.
Gay, Fables, The Squire and his Cur.

Growl. s. Murmur of an angry cur; figuratively, of an enraged or discontented person.

Grown. part. adj. Arrived at full growth or stature: (generally preceded by an adverb, as, well, ill, full, and the like).

I saw lately a pair of China shoes, which I was told were for a grown woman, that would scarce have been big enough for one of our little girls.—
Locke.

This is now so grown a vice, and has so great supports, that I know not whether it do not put in for the name of a virtue.—Id.

Growth. s.

1. Vegetation; vegetable life; increase of vegetation.

Deep in the palace, of long growth there stood
A laurel's trunk, a venerable wood.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Those trees that have the slowest growth, are, for that reason, of the longest continuance.—Bishop Atterbury.

2. Product; production; thing produced;
act of producing.

Forbidding every bleak unkindly fog
To touch the prosperous growth of this tall wood.
Waller.

Our little world, the image of the great,
Or her own growth hath all that nature craves,
And all that's rare, as tribute from the wise.
Waller.

The trade of a country arises from the native growth of the soil or man.—Sir W. Temple.

I had thought, for the honour of our nation, that the knight's tale was of English growth, and Chamber's own.—Dryden.

3. Increase in number, bulk, or frequency.

What I have tried, or thought, or heard upon this subject, may go a great way in preventing the growth of this disease, where it is but new.—*Sir W.
Temple.*

4. Increase of stature; advance to maturity.

They say my son of York
Has almost overtaken him in his growth.
Shakespeare, Richard III. ii. 4.

The stag, now conscious of his fatal growth,
At once indulgent to his fear and sloth,
To some dark covert his retreat had made.

Though an animal arrives at its full growth at a certain age, perhaps it never comes to its full bulk till the last period of life.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

If parents should be daily calling upon God in a solemn deliberate manner, stirring and extending their intercessions, as the state and growth of their children required, such devotion would have a mighty influence upon the rest of their lives.—Law.

5. Improvement; advancement.

It griev'd David's religious mind to consider the growth of his own estate and dignity, the affairs of religion continuing still in the former manner.—
Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Growthead. s. Idle lazy fellow; blockhead.

He.
Though sleeping one hour refresheth his song,
Yet trust not such growthead for sleeping too long,
Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Growtmold. s. [second element, noddle = head.] Same as Growthead. Rate.

That same dwarf's a pretty boy, but the squire's a growtmold.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Knight of the Burning Pestle.

Grab. v. a. Dig up; destroy by digging;
root out of the ground; eradicate by throwing up out of the soil.

A foolish heir caused all the bushes and hedges about his vineyard to be grabbed up.—*Sir E. E.
Strange.*

Forest land
From whence the surly ploughman grabs the wood.
Dryden.

As for the thick woods, which not only Virgil but Homer mentions, they are most of them grabbed up, since the promiscuity has been cultivated and inhabited.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

The mutilated defenders of liberty again defied the vengeance of the Star Chamber, came back with undiminished resolution to the place of their glorious infamy, and manfully presented the stumps of their ears to be grabbed out by the hangman's knife.—
Ibid., Lord Nugent's Memorials of Hampden.

Grab. v. n. Work as a grab.

Those who know his [Lord Temple's] habits

GRUB

tracked him as men track a mole. It was his nature to grub underground. Whenever a heap of dirt was flung up it might well be suspected that he was at work.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, The Earl of Chatham.

Grub. s. [P]

1. Small worm that eats holes in bodies.

There is a difference between a grub and a butterfly, and yet your butterfly was a grub.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 4.

New creatures rise,
A moving mass at first, and short of thighs;
Till shooting out with legs, and imp'd with wings,
The grubs proceed to bees with pointed stings.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

Off unobscured, invades the vital core;
Pernicious toant! and her secret cave
Shinapses hourly, preying on the pulp Consumes.
J. Phillips, Cyder.

2. Figuratively, as a term of contempt.

Short thick man; dwarf.
John Romane, a short clownish grub, would bear the whole carcass of an ox, yet never tugged with him.—Cervin.

Grubbing. verbal abs. Act of one who grubs.

The grubbing up of woods and trees may be very needful, upon the account of their unthriftness.—Mortimer.

Here there is no room for controversy. No grubbing among old state-papers will ever bring to light any document which will shake these facts.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Sir William Temple.

Grubble. v. a. Feel in the dark.

Thou hast a colour;
Now let me roll and grubble thee;
Blind men say white feels smooth, and black feels rough;
Thou hast a rugged skin; I do not like thee.
Dryden.

Grubble. v. n. Grub.

He looked at the fish, then at the fiddle, still grubbling in his pockets.—Spectator, no. 444.

Grubstreet. s. See extract from Johnson.

The first part, though calculated only for the meridian of grubstreet, was yet taken notice of by the better sort.—Arbuthnot.

I'd sooner ballads write, and grubstreet lays.
Gay.

Grubstreet, originally the name of a street near Moorfields in London, much inhabited by writers of small histories, dictionaries, and temporary poems; whence any mean production is called grubstreet.

Χαῖρ ἱστορίᾳ, μετ' ἀρθῶν, μετ' ἄλλῃς κῆρυξι,
'Αεναῖος ἰδίῳ ὀδῶν ἐκταταῖς.—Johnson.

Swift has coined the adjective Grubman.

In consequence of those momentous truths, the grubman may have always chosen to convey their precepts and their arts, shut up within the vehicles of types and fables.—Swift, Tale of a Tub, introd. (Ord M.).

Grudge. v. a.

1. Envy; see any advantage of another with discontent.

What means this banishing me from your counsel? Do you love your sorrow so well as to grudge me part of it?—Sir P. Sidney.

He struggles into birth, and cries for aid;
Then helpless in his mother's lap is laid;
He creeps, he walks; and, issuing into man,
Grudges their life from whence his own began.
Dryden.

Do not, as some men, run upon the tilt, and taste of the sediments of a grudging uncommunicative disposition.—Spectator.

Let us consider the inexhausted treasures of the ocean; and though some have grudged the great share that it takes of the surface of the earth, yet we shall propose this too, as a conspicuous mark and character of the wisdom of God.—Bentley.

I have often heard the Presbyterians say they did not grudge us our employment.—Swift.

2. Give or take unwillingly.

Let me at least a funeral marriage crave,
Nor grudge my cold embraces in the grave.
Dryden, Aurengzebe.

They have grudged those contributions, which have set our country at the head of all the governments of Europe.—Addison.

Grudge. v. n.

1. Murmur; repine.

They knew the force of that dreadful curse, whereunto idolatry maketh subject; nor is there cause why the guilty sustaining the same should grudge or complain of injustice.—Houder, Ecclesiastical Policy.

We do not grudge or repine at our portion, but are contented with those circumstances which the providence of God hath made to be our lot.—Nelson.

2. Be unwilling; be reluctant.

GRUD

You steer betwixt the country and the court,
Nor grately what's the great design,
Nor grudging give what publick needs require.
Dryden, Fables.

3. Be envious.

Grudge not one against another, brethren, lest ye be condemned.—James, v. 9.

4. Feel compunction; grieve. Obsolete.

We . . . grudge in our conscience, when we remember our crimes.—Bishop Fisher, Paulus, p. 32.

Spelt with sch: (in the extracts it may be for the sake of the rhyme; under the other entries, however, connected with the word, the same spelling occurs in prose).

The poor at the enclosure duth grutch,
Because of abuses that fall,
Lest some men should have but too much,
And some again nothing at all.
Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

But what we're born for we must bear,
Our frail condition it is such,
That what to all may happen here,
It's chance to me, I must not grutch.
B. Jonson.

Grudge. s.

1. Old quarrel; inveterate malevolence; sullen malice.

Many countries about her were full of wars, which, for old grudges to Corinth, were thought still would conclude there.—Sir P. Sidney.

2. Anger; ill-will.

The god of wit, to shew his grudge,
Clapt his ears upon the judge.
Phorion met his end with the playful composition, and gentle equanimity of Socrates. He endeavoured to cheer his fellow-sufferers, and as the strongest proof of friendship, permitted Nicias to drink the hemlock before him. When he was asked if he had any message for his son Phocion: 'Only,' he said, 'not to bear a grudge against the Athenians.'—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lvii.

Spelt with sch.

In it he melted leaden bull-dogs,
To shoot at fowls, and sometimes pullets;
To whom he bore no ill a grutch,
He ne'er gave quarter to any such.
Butler, Hudibras.

3. Unwillingness to benefit.

Those to whom you have
With grudge preferred me.
B. Jonson, Catiline's Conspiracy.

Grudge. v. a. Bestow, or part with, anything unwillingly: (spelt with sch).

He that entertains an apostle in the name of an apostle, and gratches the expenses of his diet, is neither charitable nor hospitable.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Deditantism, l. 403. (Ord M.).

Grudge. s. One who grudges; murmurer; envious or discontented person.

Slanderrers, railers, grudgers, persecutors, find faults.—Translation of Buccalini, p. 43: 1623.

Grudging. verbal abs.

Discontent; envy at the prosperity of others.

The murmurs, and the grudgings, that lie fostering in many men's hearts.—South, Sermons, viii. 77.

2. Reluctance; unwillingness.

Use hospitality to one another without grudging.
—1 Peter, iv. 9.

Many times they go with as great grudging to serve in his majesty's ships, as if it were to be slaves in the galleys.—Sir W. Raleigh.

3. Secret wish or desire.

Ev'n in the most severe advice he gave,
He had a grudging still to be a knave.
Dryden, The Medal.

4. Afterpain; reminiscence of a disease; less properly, symptom in general.

The smart or swelling of the sting of conscience is as sensible and lively a prognostick of the worm which never duth, as heaviness of spirit, or grudging, are of fevers or other diseases.—Dr. Jackson, Works, iii. 323.

My Dolabella,
Hast thou not still some grudgings of thy fever?
Dryden.

Grudgingly. adv. In a grudging manner; unwillingly; malignantly; reluctantly.

Every man according as he purpurcheth in his heart, so let him him give; not grudgingly, or of necessity; for God loveth a cheerful giver.—2 Corinthians, ix. 7.

Like harpies they could scent a pious board;
Then to be sure they never fail'd their lord:
The rest was form, and bare attendance paid;
Then drank and eat, and grudgingly obey'd.
Dryden.

Grudgingly. s. [N.Fr. grugeons. Colgrave and Sherwood write it grudgingly; Johnson

GRUM

enters it Grugeons; Todd Grudgeons, connecting it with the verb gruger, esgruger = crumble, or break into small pieces.] Coarse meal; part of the corn which remains after the fine meal has passed the sieve.

You that can deal with grudging and coarse flour.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Maid in the Mill.

Gruel. s. [Fr.] Food made by boiling oatmeal or pearl barley in water.

Finer of birth-strangled babe,
Ditch-deliver'd by a drab;
Make the gruel thick and slab.
Shakespeare Macbeth, iv. 1.

Was ever Tartar fiercer or cruel
Upon the strength of water gruel? Prior, Alma.
Gruel made of grain, broths, malt-drink not much hopped, pomegranate, and in general whatever re-fresheth.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Gruff. adj. [German, gruf, gruff]. Sour of aspect; harsh of manners.

Around the bend, in hideous order, sat
Foul howling Infamy and bold Debauch,
Gruff Discontent, through ignorance misled.
Garth.

They had no tithe of honour among them, but as denoted some bodily strength or perfection, as, such an one the tall, such an one the stocky, such an one the gruff.—Addison, Spectator, no. 434.
Zeno himself, the father of Stoicism, as gruff as he looked, might have enlarged our writer's catalogue for some very free thoughts.—Bentley, Philoleuthens Lipsianus, § 49.

Gruffy. adv. In a gruff manner; harshly; ruggedly; roughly.

The form of Mars high on a chariot stood,
All sheath'd in arms, and gruffy could the god.
Dryden, Fables.

First, can ye drink well?—
Cheerly, cheerly.
A gallon each man of you?—
Nearly, nearly.

Next, can ye swear well?—
Gruffy, gruffy.
Handle a Frenchman?—
Roughly, roughly. Sheridan, St. Patrick's Day.

Gram. adj. Sour; surly; severe.

I found Sir Thomas Lee, who was very gram; and we had very little discourse.—Lord Clarendon, Diary, p. 282.

Sick looked sour and gram, and would not open his mouth.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Grumble. v. n. [Dutch, grummelen.]

1. Murmur with discontent.

A bridegroom,
A grumbling groom, and that the girl shall find.
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 2.

Thou grumbled and rail'd every hour on Achilles, and thou art as full of envy at his greatness as Cer-berus is at Prometheus's beauty.—Id., Troilus and Cressida, ii. 1.

Th' accurs'd Philistian stands on th' other side,
Grumbling aloud, and smiles 'twixt rage and pride.
Conley, Incidents.

Suitors, all but one, will depart grumbling, because they miss of what they think their due.—South, Sermons.

Providence has allotted man a competency: all beyond it is superfluous; and there will be grumbling without end, if we reckon that we want this, because we have it not.—St. 2. L. Esrange.

I'Avare, not using half his store,
Still grumbles that he has no more.
Prior, Alma, canto iii.

2. Growl; gnarl.

The lion, though he sees the toils are set,
Yet, pinch'd with raging hunger, scours away;
Hunts in the face of danger all the day;
At night, with sullen pleasure, grumbles o'er his prey.
Dryden.

3. Make a hoarse rattle.

Didst thou never see a drum? Canst thou make this grumble?—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Pilgrim.

Thou grumbling thunder, join thy voice.
Motown.

Like a storm
That gathers black upon the frowning sky,
And grumbles in the wind. Keats, Royal Concert.

Vapours foul
Dash on the mountain's brow, and shake the woods
That grumbling wave below.
Thomson, Seasons, Winter.

Grumbler. s. One that grumbles; murmur; discontented man.

The half-pence are good half-pence, and I will stand by it: if I made them of silver, it would be the same thing to the grumbler.—Swift.

All at once the grumbling had ceased, the grumblers had crowded to sign loyal addresses to the warrior, had formed associations in support of his authority, had appeared in arms at the head of the

GRUMBLING, GRUM

millie, crying God save King William.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. 127.
Grumbling, verbal abs. Act of one who grumbles; murmuring through discontent; grudge.

I have grum'd
 Without or grudge or grumbings.
Shakespeare, Tempest, l. 2.
 (See also second extract under Grumbler).

Grumbly, adv. In a grumbling manner.
 They speak good German at the court, and in the city; but the common and country people seem to speak grumbly.—R. Browne, Travels in Europe, p. 155.

Grume, s. [Lat. grumus.] Clot.
Grume, a thick viscid consistence of a fluid; as the white of an egg, or clotted like cold blood.—Quincy.

Grumous, adj. Thick; clotted.
 The blood, when let, was black, grumous, the red part without a due consistence, the serum saline, and of a yellowish green.—Ardenhauf, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Grumousness, s. Attribute suggested by Grumous; thickness of a coagulated liquor.

The cause may be referred either to the constitution of the serum, or grumousness of the blood.—Wismann, Surgery.

Grumpy, adj. Querulous; complaining; low-spirited, or melancholic, as one who has suffered an injury.

To-night, . . . there was a special general meeting of the Grumpy Club, in which everybody was to say the gayest things with the gravest face, and every laugh carried a forfeit. Lucian . . . told a tale for which he was famous, of 'the very respectable county family who had been established in the shire for several generations, but who (it was a fact) had been ever distinguished by the strange and humiliating peculiarity of being born with sheep's tails.' The remarkable circumstances under which Lucian Gay had become acquainted with this fact; the traditional mysteries by which the family in question had succeeded for generations in keeping it secret; the devoted measures to which the chief of the family had recourse to stop for ever the rumour when it first became prevalent; and finally the origin and result of the legend; were details which Lucian Gay, with the most useful countenance, loved to expend upon the attentive and expanding intelligence of a new member of the Grumpy Club.—Herrick the younger, Coningsby.

Grunt, v. n.

1. Make a noise like that of a hog.
 And neigh, and bark, and grunt, and roar, and burn.
 Like horse, hound, hog, bear, fire, at every turn.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, iii. 1.
 The brinded boars may slumber undismay'd.
 Or grunt secure beneath the chestnut shade. Tickell.

2. Groan.
 Those persons, I warrant, as well pleased shall be all.
 As wood-knolls shall grunt at the rubbings on the gall.
Defence of Peace, To the Duke: 1633.

Who would fardels bear,
 To grunt and sweat under a weary life?
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 1.

Grunt, s.

1. Noise of a hog.
 Swine's snorts, swine's bodies, took they, bristles, grunts.
Chapman.
 Can cow and calf, and family of hogs,
 In panic horror of pursuing dogs;
 With many a deary grunt and doleful squeak,
 Poor swine, as if their pretty hearts would break.
Dryden, Fables, The Cuck and the Fox.
 From hence were heard
 The grunts of bristled boars, and groans of bears,
 And herds of howling wolves.
Id., Translation of the Iliad.

2. Groan.
 Round about I heard of dying men the grunts.
Turberville, Translation from Ovid, Hypocentra to Lycens.

Grunting, part. adj. Uttering grunts.
 The wailing quon to louder notes doth rise,
 To her full pipes the grunting lark replies:
 The grunting hogs alarm the neighbours round.
Swift.

Grunting, verbal abs. Act of one who grunts.

Lament, ye swine! in gruntings spend your grief.
Gay.
 Johnson grown old, Johnson in the fulness of his fame and in the enjoyment of a competent fortune, is better known to us than any other man in history. Every thing about him, his coat, his wig, his figure, his face, . . . his gruntings, his puffings, his vigorous, acute, and ready eloquence, his majestic wit, his vehemence, . . . his queer inmates, old Mr. Levett and blind Mrs. Williams, the cat Hodge and the negro Frank, all are as familiar to us as the objects by which we have been surrounded from childhood.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Croker's Edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Gruntle, v. n. Grunt.
 Pensive in mood they wallow all alone,
 And snore and gruntle, to each other's moan.
Duke of Buckingham, Echoes, l. 1.

Gry, s. [Gr yot, a rare and colloquial or slang term for particle or minim, in the way of either matter or speech.] Small measure.

A gry is one tenth of a line, a line one tenth of an inch.—Locke.

Gryphon, s. Griffin, of which it is the Greek form. Rhetorical.

As when a gryphon in the wilderness
 Pursues an Arimaspian.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ll. 943.

Guaiacum, s. [?] Medicinal wood so called; see extract from Ure.

Guaiacum is attendant and apertent. It is excellent in many chronic cases, and was once famous for curing the venereal disease, which it still does singly in warmer climates, but with us we find it insufficient. We have a resin of it, improperly called gum guaiacum.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.
 The acid spirit in tur-water possesses the virtues, in an eminent degree, of that of guaiacum, and other medicinal woods.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 47.

Form guiac.

Guine is a resin which exudes from the trunk of the Guaiacum officinale, a tree which grows in the West India islands, and comes to us in large greenish-brown, semi-transparent lumps, having a conchoidal or splintery fracture, brittle and easy to pulverize. . . . It is soluble in alkaline lyes, in alcohol, incompletely in ether, still less so in oil of turpentine, and not at all in fat oils.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Guán, s. [?] Gallinaceous bird, native of South America, of the genus Penelope, so called.

A calcaneal arsanoid is wedged into the outer and back part of the ankle-joint in the apteryx, and plays upon the back part of the tibial trochlea in the turkey, guan, curassow, and some other rasures.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Guano, s. [?] See extract.

Guano is a substance of a dark yellow colour, of a strong ambrosial smell, which blackens in the fire, with the exhalation of an ammoniacal odour; soluble with effervescence in hot nitric acid. When this solution is evaporated to dryness it assumes a fine red colour, evincing the presence of uric acid. Guano is found upon the coasts of Peru, in the islands of Chinche, near Pisco, and several other places more to the south, the accumulation of the excrements of innumerable flocks of birds, especially herons and flamingos, which inhabit these islands.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Guaranté, s. Stipulation, or stipulator, for any undertaking or engagement.

God, the great guarantee for the peace of mankind, whom laws cannot secure it, may think it the concern of his providence.—South, Sermons.

A prince distinguished by being a patron of Protestants, and guarantee of the Westphalian treaty.—Addison, Present State of the War.

An oath is a promise made to God, and God is our superior, superior to kings; and he is also the guarantee and avenger of all breach of faith and injustice.—Lecky.

Amaph-ul-Dowlah had already extorted considerable sums from his mother. She had at length appealed to the English; and the English had interfered. A solemn compact had been made, by which she consented to give her son some pecuniary assistance, and he in his turn promised never to commit any further invasion of her rights. This compact was formally guaranteed by the government of Bengal. But times had changed; money was wanted; and the power which had given the guarantee was not ashamed to indicate the spoiler to exchequer such that even he shrunk from them.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Spelt with -y. In this the accent is often on the first syllable, guadranty.

It was made in contradiction to the engagements that the crown of England had taken, when King William gave his guaranty to the treaty of Travend-hall.—Lord Bolingbroke.

Guaranté, v. a. Undertake to secure the performance of any articles.

Public treaties made under the sanction, and some of them guaranteed by the sovereign powers of other nations.—Burke, On French Affairs.

Spelt with -y. France hath always profited skilfully of its having guaranteed the treaty of Munster.—Lord Chesterfield.

GUAR

Guard, v. a. [Fr. garder.]

1. Watch by way of defence and security.

Who by stealth
 Had from his wakeful custody purloin'd
 The guarded gold. Milton, Paradise Lost, ll. 943.

2. Protect; defend.
 Naked the graces guarded you from all Dangers abroad, and now your thunder shall.

Your pow'r you never use, but for defence.
 To guard your own or others' innocences. Dryden.
 The part of Genoa is very ill guarded against the storm.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

3. Preserve by caution.
 One would take care to guard one's self against this particular imperfection, because it is that which our nature very strongly inclines us to.—Addison, Spectator.

4. Provide against objections.
 Homer has guarded every circumstance with as much caution as if he had been aware of the objection.—Brownie, On the Odyssey.

5. Adorn with lists, laces, or ornamental borders.

Give him a livery
 More guarded than his fellows.
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ll. 2.

In a long motley coat, guarded with yellow.
Id., Henry VIII., prologue.

Guard, v. n. Be in a state of caution or defence.

There are cases in which a man must guard, if he intends to keep fair with the world, and turn the penny.—Cutler.

To guard against such mistakes, it is necessary to acquaint ourselves a little with words.—Watts, Logic.

Guard, s.

1. One whose business is to watch by way of defence or prevention.

The guard have them, and brought them back into the guard-chamber.—1 Kings, xiv. 24.

With the Regiment so called. (pl.)
 An officer of the guards, not then on duty, takes part in the affair, applies to the lieutenant commanding the tilt-yard guard, and urges him to turn out his guard to relieve a general officer. The lieutenant declines interfering in person, but stands at a distance, and suffers the business to be done. The officer takes upon himself to order out the guard. In a moment they are in arms, quit their guard, march, rescue the general, and drive away the sheriff's officers, who in vain represent their right to the prisoner, and the nature of the arrest. The soldiers first conduct the general into the guard-room, then escort him to a place of safety, with bayonets fixed, and in all the forms of military triumph.—Junius, let. 45.

2. Body of guards.

Up into heaven, from Paradise, in haste
 The angelic guards ascended, mute and sad,
 For man. Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 17.
 They mis'd courts, guards, a gay and numerous train,
 Our judges, like our laws, were rude and plain.

With lifted hands, and gazing eyes,
 His guards beheld him soaring through the skies.
Dryden.

They, usurping arbitrary power, had their guards and spies after the practice of tyrants.—Swift.

3. State of caution; state of vigilance.

The great alteration which he made in the state ecclesiastical, caused him to stand upon his guard at home. Sir J. Davies.
 Temerity puts a man off his guard.—Sir E. D'Erving.

It is wisdom to keep ourselves upon a guard.—Id.
 Now he stood collected and prepar'd;
 For malice and revenge had put him on his guard.
Dryden.

(There are) cooped in close by the strict guards of those whose interest it is to keep them ignorant.—Locke.

Men are always upon their guard against an appearance of design.—Bishop Smalridge.

4. Check; limitation; anticipation of objection; caution of expression.

They have expressed themselves with as few guards and restrictions as I.—Bishop Atterbury.
 He must be trusted to his own conduct, since there cannot always be a guard upon him, except what you put into his own mind by good principles.—Locke.

5. Ornamental hem, lace, or border.

He put the ophod on him, which he girded with the guarded pearls of the ophod.—Leviticus, viii. 7: translation of 1878.
 The guards are but slightly basted on.
Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, l. 1.

6. Part of the hilt of a sword.
7. In Fencing. Posture to defend the body from the sword of the opponent.
8. Anything that protects or guards something else; as, a guard that keeps dress from dirt, a safe-guard, as it in some places is called.

Guardable. adj. Capable of being protected.
This house was guardable without battery.—Sir E. Williams, Account of the Low-Countries, p. 68: 1618.

Pacheco and his men quitted Zirikken, some seven days before, as a place not guardable.—Ibid., p. 70.

Guardage. s. State of wardship. Obsolete.
A maid so tender, fair and happy,
Run from her guardage to the sooty bosom
Of such a thing as thou. Shakespeare, Othello, l. 2.

Guardant. part. adj. Rare.
1. Exercising the authority of a guardian.
You shall perceive that a Jack guardant cannot office me from my son Coriolanus.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 2.

2. In Heruldry. Having the face turned towards the spectator: (as, 'a leopard guardant').

Guardant. s. Guardian; protector. Obsolete.

My angry guardant stood alone,
Tendering my ruin, and myself of none.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. iv. 7.

Guardedly. adv. In a guarded manner; cautiously.

It obliquely pointed out the true object of their resentment; but this so guardedly, that it was impossible to make any serious charge against the author.—Sheridan, Life of Swift, p. 210.

Guarder. s. One who guards.
The unnamed guarder softly wept.

Nautica, Revenantes, p. 16.
Pages, chambermaids, and guarders.—Beaumont and Fletcher, The Noble Gentleman.

Guardful. adj. Wary; cautious.
I meanwhile
Watch with a guardful eye those murderous motions.
A. Hill.

Guardian. s.
1. One that has the care of an orphan; one who is to supply the want of parents.

I am sorry for her, as I have just cause, being her uncle and her guardian.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 3.

When perjur'd guardians, proud with impious gains,

Choke up the streets, too narrow for their trains!

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Horus, with two other of the guardians, thought it their duty to take care of the interest of the three girls.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

2. One to whom the care and preservation of anything is committed.

I gave you all,
Made you my guardians, my depositaries;
But kept a reservation to be followed
With such a man. Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 4.

It then becomes the common concern of all that have truth at heart, and more especially of those who are the appointed guardians of the Christian faith, to be upon the watch against seducers.—Waterland.

The guardian of the spiritualties [is] he to whom the spiritual jurisdiction of any diocese is committed, during the vacancy of the see. He may be either guardian in law, or jure magistratus, as the archbishop is of any diocese within his province; or guardian by delegation, as he whom the archbishop or vicar-general doth for the time depute.—Cucell.

3. Repository or storehouse. Obsolete.

Where is Duncan's body?—Carried to Colmekill,
The sacred storehouse of his predecessors,
And guardian of their bones.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 4.

Guardian. adj. Performing the office of a kind protector or superintendent.

My charming patroness protects me unawares, like my guardian angel; and shows my gratitude like a fairy, who is beautiful by stealth, and conceals the giver, when she bestows the gift.—Dryden, Cleonice, dedication.

Meanwhile Minerva, in her guardian care,
Shoots from the starry vaults through fields of air.
Pope.

Thus shall mankind his guardian care engage,
The promise'd father of the future age. Id., Messiah.

Guardianess. s. Female guardian.

I have plac'd a trusty watchful guardianess,
For fear some poor curd steal her.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Wit at several Weapons.

Guardianship. s. Office of a guardian.

The curate stretched his patent for the cure of souls, to a kind of guardianship over goods and children. Sir R. L. Estrange.

This holds true, not only in losses and indignities offered to ourselves, but also in the case of trust, when they are offered to others who are committed to our care and guardianship.—Ketticell.

There was in the first who established the popular state in Athens, assigning to himself the guardianship of the laws, and chief command in war. Swift.

He also begged them to undertake the guardianship of his son.—Shirpe, History of Egypt, ch. ix.

When, Hastings became governor, Mahommed Ben Khan had held power seven years. An infant son of Meer Jaffer was now nabob; and the guardianship of the young prince's person had been confided to the minister.—Macanlay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Guardless. adj. Without defence.

So on the guardless herd, their keeper slain,
Rushes a tyrant, in the Libyan plain.

A rich land, guardless and undefended, must needs have been a double incitement.—South, Sermons.

Guardship. s. Care; protection.

How blest am I, by such a man led!
Under whose wise and careful guardship
I now despise fatigue and hardship. Swift.

Guardsmen. s. Common soldier, or officer, belonging to the guards.

There was Jack Jargon, the gigantic guardsmen;
And General Fireface, famous in the field,
A great tactician, and no less a swordsmen,
Who ate, last war, more Yankees than he kill'd.

Dryden, Don Juan, xlii. 83.

About this time a steep-climb in the west of England had attracted considerable attention. This sport was then of recent introduction in England, and is, in fact, an importation of Irish growth, although it has flourished in our soil. A young guardsmen who was then a guest at the castle, and who had been in garrison in Ireland, had some experience of this pastime in the Kildare country, and he proposed that they should have a steep-climb at Coningsby.—Diarract the younger, Coningsby, b. iv. ch. xiv.

Guarish. v. a. [Fr. guérir, pres. part. guérissant.—henl.] Heal. Rare.

Daily she dress'd him, and did the best
His grievous hurt to guarish.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Guava. s. Indian fruit so called; known chiefly in England as made into jelly; hence, it is generally used adjectivally.

This [jelly] when well made with fine, full-flavoured, scarlet strawberries, is a very delicious preserve, and is by many persons preferred to guava jelly, which it generally resembles.—Eliza Acton, Modern Cookery.

Gubernation. s. [Lat. gubernatio, -onis; gubernare = govern.] Government; superintendency; superior direction.

Perhaps there is little or nothing in the government of the kingdom of nature and grace, but what is transacted by the man Jesus, inhabited by the divine power and wisdom, and employed as a medium or conscious instrument of this extensive gubernation.—Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

Gubernative. adj. Governing; ruling.

He talked to him of real and gubernative wisdom.
—Bishop Hacket, Life of Archbishop Williams, p. 39: 1623.

Gudgeon. s. [Fr. goujon, gouvion; Lat. gobio.]

1. Native fish so called; Cyprinus gobio.

'Tis true, no turbot's dignity my barms;
But gudgeons, founders, what my Thames affords.
Pope, Imitations of Horace.

2. Credulous person; one easily cheated; simpleton. This application is generally deduced from the ease with which a gudgeon is caught, it being supposed to bite more freely than most other fishes. That it bites freely is true; but neither its voracity nor its credulity is sufficiently marked to pass into a proverb.

The following extract, like the others, is taken from the previous editions.

This he did to draw you in, like so many gudgeons, to swallow his false arguments.—Swift.

Here, the gudgeon is the swallower, not the thing swallowed; the dupe, not the bait.

In the following, however, the view is reversed, and the gudgeon is the thing swallowed.

Such as Gregory or Bede were, who being honest, and without credulity, and trusting others, swallowed many a gudgeon.—Fleissner, Antiquity's Triumph over Novelty, p. 93: 1619.

Such a man would not swallow that gudgeon of a British consul.—Bishop Lloyd, History of Church Government in Great Britain, pref.: 1681.

The same is the case in the following French examples, both from Wedgwood, 'cha passe come un gouvion,' from the proverb (= 'that goes down as a gudgeon,' or 'that is easily swallowed'), and faire avaler des gouvions (= 'make gudgeons be swallowed,' or 'make a lie believed').

Of gudgeons, however, having been swallowed with particular ease there is no very good evidence; though there is a good deal in favour of the loach having been so treated. The loach is said, in most notices, to have been not unfrequently tossed off in touts, or swallowed in a glass of wine, by the gullies of the Elizabethan period. It is suggested, then, that the gudgeon, when suggestive of credulity, is the loach. How much the two fishes have in common is well known. Both keep on the ground; both are marked or mottled; both have a beard or wattles. Moreover, in the zoological nomenclature, while the gudgeon is a gobio, the loach is a cobitis.

3. Iron pin on which a wheel turns.

Many times the iron gudgeons grow hot for want of greasing.—History of making Gunpowder, in Bishop Sprat's History of the Royal Society, p. 261.

Guider-rose. s. [? Gutter-rose; gutter, gutter, or guttere being a synonym of the closely allied Viburnum opulus.] Native flowering-tree so called, Viburnum lantana.

Here the ivy-leaved bell-flower, and not far from it the common enchanter's nightshade, the silver weed, and the water-aven, and by the guiders that now and then towered the water, the guiders-rose, and the white birch, overgrowing the thicket with its emerald leaves and luxuriant flowers.—Sir E. B. Lytton, Eugene Aram, b. i. ch. iii.

Guerdon. s. [Fr.] Reward; recompense.

Rhetorical; archaic.

But to the virgin comes, who all this while Amazed stands herself so mock'd to see,
By him who has the guerdon of his guile,
For so misjudging her true knight to be.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.
He shall, by thy reverend hand, at once receive
The just guerdon of all his former villainies.—Knolles, History of the Turks.

Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
But the fair guerdon when we hope to find,
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
Comes the blind fury with the abhorred shears,
And cuts the thin-paned life.

Milton, Lycidas, 71.
They were sure of being able, for a time at least, to indulge in pillage and murder, and to practise, without restraint, those excesses which they regarded as the chief guerdon of a soldier's career.
—Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. iv.

Guerdon. v. a. Reward. Rhetorical.

We vow to guerdon it with such due grace,
As shall become our bounty, and thy place.
B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Guerdonable. adj. Worthy of reward. Rare.

Finding it as well guerdonable, as grateful, to publish their libels.—Sir G. Buck, History of Richard III. p. 73.

Guerrilla. s. [Spanish.] Little war.

It spoke of nothing but brilliant actions, wonderful achievements; the great captain and his astonishing enterprises; of all the romantic incidents of that most romantic war, in that most romantic country; of mountains, valleys, splendid monasteries, secluded nuns, restless guerrillas, rushing streams, and fervid suns.—Emilia W. Goddard, ch. 2.

Guess. v. n. [Dutch, ghissen.] Conjecture.

He that, by reason of his swift motions, can inform himself of all places and preparations, should he not very often guess rightly of things to come, where God pleaseth not to give impediment?—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

There issue swarming bands
Of ambush'd men, whom, by their arms and dress,
To be Timonians enemies I guess.

Dryden, Indian Emperor.
The same author ventures to guess at the parstouful fate which would attend the Roman government.—Swift.

One may guess by Plato's writings, that his meaning, as to the inferior deities, was, that they who would have them might, and they who would not might let them alone; but that himself had a right opinion concerning the true God.—Bishop Middleton.

Guess. v. a. Hit upon by accident; determine rightly of anything without certain direction of the judgement.

If Xerxes was able to call every common soldier by his name in his army, it may be guessed he got not this wonderful ability by learning his lemons by heart.—L. v. 1.

Guess. s. Conjecture.

The enemy's in view; draw up your powers: Here is the guess of their true strength and force.

A poet must confess His art's, like physics, but a happy guess.—Dryden.

It is a wrong way of proceeding to venture a guess upon a fact, upon uncertain guesses, before a due examination.—Locke.

This problem yet, this offspring of a guess, Let us for once a child of truth confess. Prior.

No man is blest by accident, or guess;

True wisdom is the price of happiness. Young.

Guesser. s. One who guesses; one who judges without certain knowledge.

It is the opinion of divers good guessers, that the last fit will not be more violent than advantageous.

—Pope.

If fortune should please him to take such a crotchet,

(To then I apply, great Smalley's successor),

To give thee lawn sleeves, a mitre and rochet,

Whom would'st thou resemble? I leave thee a guesser. Swift.

Guessive. adj. Conjectural. Rare.

In boasts, in birds, in dreams, and all aviary omens, they are only the guessive interpretations of dim-eyed man.—Philham, Remotes, scvi. (Ord MS.)

Guesswork. s. Random or haphazard conjecture.

Then you've —'s Tour,—

No great things, to be sure,—

You could hardly begin with a less work;

For the pompous rascallion,

Who don't speak Italian

Nor French, must have scribbled by guesswork.

Byron, Epistle to Mr. Murray.

Guessingly. adv. After the manner of a guess; conjecturally; uncertainly.

I have a letter guessingly set down.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 7.

Guest. s. [A. S. gæst, gest.]

1. One entertained in the house or at the table of another.

They all murmured, saying, that he was gone to be guest with a man that is a sinner.—Luke, xii. 7.

He thinks a father

Is, at the nuptial of his son, a guest

That best becomes the table.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Tell my royal guest

I add to his commands my own request.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

2. Stranger; one who comes newly to reside.

O dearest, dearest! how fit a guest am I for you,

since my heart can people you with wild ravens beside, which in you are wanting!—Sir P. Sidney.

These happy smiles

That play'd on her right lip, seem'd not to know

What guests were in her eye; which parted thence

As pearls from diamonds dropt.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 3.

Guest. v. n. Be entertained in the house or at the table of another.

A young man at that time guested in her father's house.—Heywood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 479: 1635.

Guest. v. a. Entertain as a guest. Rare.

O hosts, what know you, whether, charitable,

When you suppose to feed men at your table,

You guest God's angels in men's habit hid?

Nyctander, Translation of the Parables.

Guestchamber. s. Chamber of entertainment.

Where is the guestchamber, where I shall eat the paviour with my disciples?—Mark, xiv. 14.

Guestrite. s. Offices due to a guest.

Ulysses so dear

A gift extort'd it, that he would not leave

In his black fleet that guest-rite to the war.

Chapman.

Guestwise. adv. In the manner of a guest.

My heart with her, but as guest-wise, sojourn'd.

Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 2.

Guise. s. [?] See extract.

The smallest species in the guise, or plummy antep of Shaw and the old writers of the Linnaean school. The size of the body in the stuffed specimens scarcely exceeded that of the Norway rat. The specimen in question stood under a bell glass, and, according to Major Smith, could not be more than eight inches high at the shoulder, while the legs did not exceed the thickness of a large goose-quill. In its native country this little creature is said to be prodigiously active. It seems common in Guinea, but will not survive the voyage.—Swainson, On the Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds.

Guise. s. [?] One of the synonyms for the viviparous blenny, Zoarces viviparus; eel, pout, tanglake, and greenbone being others.

Guidable. adj. Capable of being guide.

Rare.

A submissive and guidable spirit, a disposition easy to all.—Bishop Sprat, Sermon before the King, p. 11: 1676.

Guidance. s. Direction; government.

They charge me with neglecting the guidance of wiser men.—Spenser.

As to those who lived under the guidance of reason alone, without the assistance of supernatural light, it is highly probable that miracles, or a message from the dead, would persuade them.—Bishop Atterbury.

A prince ought not to be under the guidance or influence of either faction, because he declines from his office of presiding over it while to be the head of a party.—Swift.

He thus addressed the bi-hops of Christendom.

After declaring that God had created two great lights for the guidance of mankind, the priests of the empire.—He, in name only Pope, had us the best that arose out of the sea, whose name was Blasphemus, spotted as the panther, &c.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. iv.

Guide. v. a. [Fr. guider.]

1. Direct in a way.

When the Spirit of truth is come, he will guide you into all truth.—John, xvi. 13.

The new light served to guide them to their neighbours' culfers.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Whoever has a faithful friend to guide him in the dark passages of life, may carry his eyes in another man's hand, and yet see never the worse.—South, Sermons.

2. Influence.

Upon these, or such like secular maxims, when nothing but the interest of this world *guide*s men, they many times conclude that the slightest wrongs are not to be put up.—Kettwell.

3. Govern by counsel; instruct.

For thy name's sake lead me and guide me.—Psalm, xxi. 3.

4. Regulate; superintend.

Women neglect that which St. Paul assigns them as their proper business, the guiding of the house.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Guide. s.

1. One who directs another in his way.

Thou gavest them a burning pillar of fire to be a guide of the unknown journey.—Wisdom, xviii. 3.

Can knowledge have no bound, but must advance so far to make us wish for ignorance?

And rather in the dark to grope our way,

Than led by a false guide to err by day?

Sir J. Denham.

2. One who directs another in his conduct.

While yet but young, his father dy'd,

And left him to an happy guide. Waller.

3. Director; regulator.

Who the guide of nature, but only the (god of nature)? In him we live, move, and are. Those things which nature is said to do, are by divine art performed, using nature as an instrument; nor is there any such knowledge divine in nature herself working, but in the guide of nature's work.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Some truths are not by reason to be tried,

But we have more experience for our guide.

Dryden, Fables.

Guideless. adj. Having no guide; wanting a governor or superintendent.

Thus leave this guideless realm an open prey

To endless storms, and waste of civil war.

Sackville, Gorboduc, v. 2: 1561.

Th' ambitious Swede, like restless billows tost,

Though in his life he blood and ruin breath'd,

To his now guideless kingdom peace bequest'd.

Dryden.

Guidepost. s. Post, where two or more roads meet, directing the traveller which to follow.

Great men are the guideposts and marks in the state.—Burke, Speech on American Taxation.

Guider. s. Director; regulator; guide.

Our guider cometh to the Roman camp conduct us.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, I. 7.

That person that, being provoked by excessive pain, thrust his dagger into his body, and thereby, instead of reaching his vitals, opened an imposthume, the unknown cause of all his pain, and so stabled himself into perfect health and ease, surely had great reason to acknowledge chance for his chirurgeon, and providence for the guider of his hand.—South, Sermons.

Guidress. s. Female guider. Rare.

In earth alone he be thy guidress.

Carthus, Pilgrimage of the Soul, 1482.

Ah! feeble and blind guidress of the world,

What pleasure hast thou in my misery?

Tragedy of Solimano and Perseda, 1200.

Guidon. s. [Fr.] Emblazoned standard. Obsolete.

On the east wall hangs his target, coat of arms and crest, and near unto them a guidon of the Order of the Bath.—Ashmole, History of Berkshire, ii. 377.

Guile. s.

1. Society; corporation; fraternity or company, combined together by orders and laws made among themselves.

In woollen cloth it appears, by those ancient guile that were settled in England for this manufacture, that this kingdom greatly flourished in that art.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

As when the long-eared milky mothers wait

At some sick miser's triple-boiled gate,

For their defrauded absent heirs they make

A moan so loud that all the guile awake.

Pope, Dunciad.

[The primary meaning [of guile] is a guile, then the company assembled, and the same transference of signification will be observed in the word company itself, which signifying in the first instance a number of persons eating together has come to be applied to an association for any purpose, and in the case of the City Companies to the very associations which were formerly denominated guile.—Webster, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Guilhall. s.

The room was large and wyde,

As it seems guile or solemn temple were.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, ii. 7, 43.

Guilable. adj. Liable to tax. Rare.

By the discretion of the sheriffs, and bailiff, and other ministers, in places guilable.—Spelman.

Guilder. s. Coin so called.

It was idle, they said, to talk about the poor Hussars, or the poor guilders. The bill was evidently meant for the benefit, not of French protestants or German protestants, but of Dutchmen, who would be protestants, papists, or guilders for a head, and who would, no doubt, be as ready to sign the declaration against transubstantiation in England as to trample on the cross in Japan.—Mansel, History of England, ch. 22.

Guilhall. s. Hall in which a corporation usually assembles; townhall: (two words; also a proper, rather than a common, name).

The mayor towards guilhall hies him in all post.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 5.

Guile. s. [N. Fr. guille.] Deceitful cunning; insidious artifice; mischievous subtily.

With fawning words he courted her awhile,

And looking lovely, and oft sighing sore,

Her constant heart did court with divers guile;

But words and looks, and signs she did abuse.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Behold an Israelite indeed, in whom is no guile.—John, i. 47.

When I have most need to employ a friend,

Deep, hollow, treacherous, and full of guile,

He be to me! this do I beg of heav'n.

When I am cold in zeal to you or yours.

Shakespeare, Richard III. ii. 1.

We may, with more successful hope, resolve

To wage by force or guile eternal war.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 126.

Nor thou his malice and false guile contain:

Subtle he needs must be who could seduce

Angels. Ibid, ix. 306.

Guile. v. a.

1. Deceive. Rare.

For who wiles not that woman's subtilties

Can guile Argus? Spenser, Faerie Queene, iii. 9, 7.

2. Disguise. Rare.

Is it repentance,

Or only a fair show to guile his mischief?

Beaumont and Fletcher, The Pilgrim.

Guilful. adj. Willy; insidious; mischievously artful.

The way not to be inveigled by them that are so guilful thorough skill, is thoroughly to be instructed in that which maketh skilful against guile.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Without expense at all,

By guilful fair words, peace may be obtain'd.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. l. 1.

2. Crime; offence.

Close pent up guilt
Rive your concealing continents, and ask
These dreadful summoners grace.

Guilt-stak. adj. Sickened, or stricken by the sense of guilt.

Then we live indeed,
When we can go to rest without alarm
Given every minute to a guilt-stick conscience
To keep us waking, and rise in the morning
Secure in being innocent.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Customs of the Country.

Guiltily. adv. In a guilty manner; without innocence; without clearness of conscience.

Bloody and guilty; guiltily awake,
And in a bloody battle end thy days;
Think on lord Hastings, and despair, and die.
Shakespeare, Richard III. v. 3.
The satire should be like the porcupine,
That shoots sharp quills out in each angry line,
And wounds the blinding cheek, and fiery eye,
Of him that hears, and reads guiltily.
Bishop Hall, Satires, v. 3.

This leprous soul, that attends guiltily, but yet comfortably, your determination upon it. — Donner, Devotions, p. 215.

Guiltiness. s. Attribute suggested by Guilty; state of being guilty; wickedness; consciousness of crime.

He thought his slight rather to proceed of a fearful guiltiness than of an humble faithfulness. — Sir P. Sidney.

The last was I that felt thy tyranny;
O, in the battle think on Buckingham,
And die in terror of thy guiltiness.
Shakespeare, Richard III. v. 3.

Guiltless. adj.

1. Innocent; free from crime or guilt.

I am in this commanded to deliver
The noble duke of Clarence to your hands;
I will not reason what is meant hereby,
Because I will be guiltless of the meaning.
Shakespeare, Richard III. i. 4.

Then shall the man be guiltless from iniquity, and this woman shall bear her iniquity. — Numbers, v. 31.

Thou, who dost all thou wishest at thy will,
And never wishest aught but what is right,
Preserve this guiltless blood they seek to spill;
Thine be my kingdom. Fairfax.

Guiltless of greatness, thus he always pray'd,
Nor knew nor wish'd he, that those vows he made
On his own head should be at last repaid. Dryden.

The teeming earth yet guiltless of the plough,
And unprovoked did fruitful stores allow. Id.

Thou know'st how guiltless first I met thy flame,
When love approach'd me under friendship's name.
Pope, Eloisa to Abelard.

2. Having, or having had, no experience of anything; unconscious.

Such gardening tools as Art yet rude,
Guiltless of fire, had form'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 301.

This bush of yellow beard, this length of hair,
Which from my birth inviolate I wear,
Guiltless of steel, and from the razor free,
Shall fall a plenteous crop, reserv'd for thee.
Dryden, Fables.

Heifers guiltless of the yoke.
Pope, Translation of the Iliad.

Guiltlessness. s. Attribute suggested by Guiltless; innocence; freedom from crime.

A good number, trusting to their number more than to their value, and valuing money higher than equity, felt that guiltlessness is not always with ease oppressed. — Sir P. Sidney.

Guiltily. adj.

1. Justly chargeable with a crime; not innocent.

We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul when he besought us, and we would not hear. — Genesis, xlii. 21.

How that the guilty kindred of the queen
Look'd pale, when they did hear of Clarence's death?
Shakespeare, Richard III. ii. 1.

With mortal hatred I pursu'd his life;
Nor he, nor you, were guilty of the strife;
Nor I, but as I lov'd; yet all combin'd,
Your beauty and my impotence of mind. Dryden.

2. Wicked; corrupt.

All the tumult of a guilty world,
Tost by ungenerous passion, sinks away. Thomson.

3. Conscious.

I'll give out all he does is dictated from other men, and wear it too, if thou'lt hat me; and that I know the time and place where he stole it, though my soul be guilty of no such thing. — B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Guiltily-like. adj. Like a guilty person.

Construction in the following extract adverbial. It should be remembered that the preeminently adverbial affix -ly is only the word like in an abbreviated form.

Caslo, my lord! No sure I cannot think it,
That he would steal away on guiltily-like
Serving you eating. Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 3.

Guinea. s. [see extract.] Gold coin valued at one and twenty shillings.

They [the ships belonging to the African company] brought home such store of gold that administered the first occasion for the coining of these pieces, which from thence had the denomination of guineas; and what was afterwards made of the same species, was coined of the gold that was brought from that coast by the royal company. — Lord Clarendon, Life, ii. 556.

By the word gold I must be understood to design a particular piece of matter; that is, the last guinea that was coined. Lewis.

Ladies, whose love is constant as the wind;
Cits, who prefer a guinea to mankind. Young.

Guineadropper. s. One who cheats by dropping guineas.

Who now the guineadropper's bait regards,
Trick'd by the sharper's die, or juggler's cards. Gay.

Guineapig. s. Animal so called; cavy, Cavia aperea.

The name by which this stupid, defenceless, and very harmless little animal is commonly known, is founded upon an error of which I have in vain endeavoured to trace the origin; for I do not find in any author by whom it is mentioned any allusion to its being a native of Guinea. The country from which it truly derives its origin is the southern part of the South American continent. . . . It is not even used as food, nor is its fur of any value; and the only pretended use to which it is put is to banish rats from the place, these animals being supposed, but certainly without any reason, to have a particular antipathy to the guineapig and to leave in disgust the cellar or stable in which it is kept. . . . The guineapig is proved to have possessed from a very early period the same colours as now distinguish it; for P. M. Cuvier states that in the original figures of Aldrovandus, which he had examined, and which were painted within half a century of the discovery of America, appear the same white, red, and black patches. It must, therefore, have been previously domesticated by the natives. — Bell, British Quadrupeds.

Guise. s. [Fr.]

1. Manner; mien; habit; cast of behaviour.

His own sire, and master of his guise,
Did often tremble at his horrid view. Spenser.

Thus women know, and thus they use the guise,
To enchant the valiant, and beguile the wise. Fairfax.

They stand a horrid front
Of dreadful length, and dazzling arms, in guise
Of warriors old, with order'd spear and shield,
Awaiting what command their mighty chief
Had to impose. Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 663.

Back, shepherds, back;
Here be without duck or nod,
Other trippings to be trod,
Of lighter toes and such court guise,
As Mercury did first devise. Id., Comus, 656.

Their external shapes are notoriously accommodated to that law or guise of life that nature has designed them. — Dr. H. More.

2. Practice; custom; property.

I have drunk wine past my usual guise;
Strong wine commands the fool, and moves the wise. Chapman.

This would not be slept;
Guise must be kept. B. Jonson.

The swain reply'd, It never was our guise
To slight the poor, or aught humane despise. Pope.

3. External appearance; dress.

When I was very young, nothing was so much talked of as rickets among children, and consumptions among young people; after these the spleen came in play, and then the cure, which was the general complaint, and both were thought to appear in many various guises. — Sir W. Temple.

The Hugonots were engaged in a civil war, by the specious pretences of some, who, under the guise of religion, sacrificed so many thousands to their own ambition. — Swift.

Guitar. s. [Fr.; and, in slightly varied forms, Italian, Spanish, and Portuguese.

Lat. cithara; whence cittern, gittern, and other collateral forms now obsolete. For its more remote affinities see second extract.]

Salads and eggs, and lighter fare,
Tune the Italian spark's guitar. Prior.

The sheela has six strings, and is of the same species with the hitar; whence our guitar, from

Dryden, Translation of the Fiesk.

Guilefully. adv. In a guileful manner; insidiously; treacherously.

He cannot be excused, in that he caused not his friends to restore the money which they had guilefully borrowed. — Hakewill, Apology, p. 311.
To whom the tempter guilefully reply'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 653.

Guileless. adj. Free from guile or deceit; void of insidiousness; simply honest.

And the plain ox,
That harmless, honest, guileless animal,
I char'd the guileless daughters of the plain,
Nor dropp'd the charm, till Jenny was my prey.
Thomson, Seasons, Spring.
Shenstone, Elegies, xxi.

Guiler. s. Deceiver; one who betrays into danger by insidious practices.

But he was wary wise in all his way,
And well perceived his deceitful sleight;
No suffered that his safety to betray;
So goodly did beguile the guiler of the prey.

Guillemot. s. [Fr.] Native natatorial bird so called, akin to the divers and auks, of the genus Uria.

The common guillemot is one of the best known of the species, and may be seen in the tide-way of the open sea all round our coast at any season. . . . The thick-billed guillemot, . . . Brunnick's guillemot, is at once distinguished, at any season of the year, from our common guillemot, by the shortness, stoutness, angularity, and greater depth of its bill. . . . Examples of ringed guillemots have been taken in Lincolnshire, Yorkshire, and Durham, on the east coast, and in Cornwall and Wales in the south. . . . The black guillemot, a well-known species, is smaller in size than the common guillemot, and more confined to the northern parts of the British Islands. — Yarrell, British Birds.

The radius and ulna are present in all birds, and co-extended between the joints of the elbow and wrist. The antibrachium, so formed, is short where flight is abrogated; it is but one-third the length of the humerus, e.g. in the ostrich: it is rather shorter in guillemots, divers, and gannets; is about equal in length in gallinæ, psophia, carinaria; but exceeds the length in most birds of flight. — Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrata.

Guillotine. s. [from the name of the inventor.] French machine for decapitation.

A bloody ruffian, who, whilst he is receiving their homage, is measuring them with his eye, and sitting to their side the slider of his guillotine. — Burke, Thoughts on a Regicide Peace.

Yes; to my country's justice I appeal,
Nor dread the press, the guillotine, nor wheel.

Mathias, Paraphrase of Literature, pt. ii.

He mounted the scaffold, where the rude old guillotine of Scotland, called the Maiden, awaited him, and addressed the people in a speech, tinged with the peculiar phraseology of his sect, but breathing the spirit of serene piety. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. v.

[Guillotine, the well-known implement said to be invented by Dr. Guillotin in the French Revolution . . . was but the revival of a mode of execution formerly in use in Germany. Crusius, in his Swabian Chron. translated by Moser, 1733, says: 'Formerly beheading was not done in Germany with a sword, but with an oaken plank on which was a sharp iron. This plank was like a flogging-bench, had on both sides upright slides (grund-leisten), on which the plank was; under that a sharp cutting iron. When the poor man was bound on the bench, as if for flogging, the executioner (truckenschere) let fall the plank which hung by a cord, which with the iron struck off his head.' — Wadwood, Dictionary of Etymology.]

Guillotine. v. a. De-capitate by the guillotine.

Had you been guillotined by Robespierre? — Bishop Watson, A apology for the Bible, let. vii.

Guilt. s. [A.S. gildan = pay, guilt being that on which a payment, fine, or penalty, is due.]

1. State of a man justly charged with crime; contrary to innocence.

It was neither guilt of crime, nor reason of state, that could quench the envy that was upon the king for this execution. — Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

When these two are taken away, the possibility of guilt, and the possibility of innocence, what restraint can the belief of the creed lay upon any man? — Hammond, On Fundamentals.

GUITAR; GUIT

the Spanish guitarra, seems to have been borrowed; as it was a favourite instrument with the Arabian conquerors of Spain. — Richardson, On the Language, &c. of Eastern Nations, ch. iii. sec. 6. These are slights which we quiet men . . . occasionally enjoy, but which your noisy fellows, who think that women never want to be alone—a sad mistake—and consequently must be always breaking or stringing a guitar, or cutting a pencil, . . . or doing any other of the thousand acts of mischief, are delirious from. — Disraeli the younger, The Young Duke, b. iii. ch. v.

Guitar. v. n. Play on the guitar.

Guitarring. verbal abs. Playing on the guitar.

But the Carnival's coming,
Oh Thomas Moore!

The Carnival's coming,
Oh Thomas Moore!

Masking and humming,
Fiddling and drumming,

Guitarring and strumming,
Oh Thomas Moore!

Hyron, To Thomas Moore.

Gulch. v. n. Swallow voraciously; belch.

[Gulp, gulch (verbs). . . gulch, a gully or swallow; river (noun) all from a representation of the sound made in swallowing liquid.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Gulch. s.

1. Gluttony.

Then you'll know us, you'll see us then, you will,
gulch, you will.—B. Jonson, Poetaster.

You muddy gulches, dar'st look me in the face?—
Good Appetitus!—Peace, you fat lawson.—Brucor, Comedy of Lingua.

2. Act of devouring.

Then he has me most cruelly upon the hip, and brings me over with a most deadly gulch.—Richard, Grounds of Continuance of the Clerys, p. 31.

Gules. adj. [N.Fr. gules.] In Heraldry. Red.

Follow thy drum;
With man's blood paint the ground: gules, gules;
Religious canons, civil laws are cruel;
Then what should war be?

Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

He whose subtle arms,
Black as his purpose, did the night resemble,
When he lay couched in the ominous horse,
Hath now this dread and black complexion smear'd
With heraldry more dismal: head to foot,
Now he is total gules; hurriedly track'd!

With blood of fathers, mothers' daughters, sons.
Id., Hamlet, ii. 2.

Come, sons of honour,
True virtue's heirs; thus hatch'd with Britain's blood.

Let's march to rest, and set in gules like suns.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Bonduca.

Gulf. s. [see extract from Wedgwood.]

1. Bay; opening into land.

The Venetian admiral withdrew himself farther off from the island Corfu, into the gulf of the Adriatic.—Kneller, History of the Turks.

2. Abyss; unmeasurable depth.

Thence turning back, in silence soft they stole,
And brought the heavy crew with easy pace
To yawning gulf of deep Avernus' hole.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

The sea could not be much narrower than it is, without great loss to the world; and must we now have an ocean of mere flats and shallows, to the utter ruin of navigation, for fear our heads should turn dizzy at the imagination of gazing abysses and unathomable gulfs?—Kebley.

3. Whirlpool; sucking eddy.

England his approaches makes as fierce
As waters to the sucking of a gulf.

Shakespeare, Henry V. ii. 4.

4. Anything insatiable, as the mouth or stomach.

Skull of dragon, tooth of wolf,
Witch's mumbo; maw and gulf
Of the ravenous salt sea shark.
Root of henlock, digg'd i' th' dark.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

[Gulf.—Italian golfo, a gulf or arm of the sea, a pit, deep hole, whirlpool. (Florio). French golfe, a whirlpool or bottomless pit, also a bosom or gulf of the sea between two capes. (Goussier). The German meerbusen, Latin sinus, bosom, gulf, would point to a derivation from Greek kolos, of exactly the same meaning with Latin sinus. But the sense of whirlpool, abyss, must be from Dutch golpen, golpen, English gulp, to swallow; Old Dutch golpe, gurgis, vorage, (Kilian). The truth appears to be that here, as in so many other cases where we are puzzled between two derivations, they may both be traced to a common origin.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Gulph. adj. Full of gulfs or whirlpools.

Whom had seen them on the gulphic flood,
to would have thought some Delos now againe.

GULL

Some towns, some cities, or some desert wood,
Or some new unknown world from shores of Spain
Launched off to sea.—

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 516.

Rivers arise; whether that be the son
Of utmost Tweed, or Ouse, or gully Dun.

Milton, Vacation Exercise, vi.

Gullist. s. [Lat. gula = throat; -ist being a Greek rather than a Latin termination, so that the word is hybrid.] Glutton. Rare.

The gluttonous society of our swelling gullist, argues the necessity of their offending by forgetfulness.—Fuller, Honour of Chastity, p. 12: 1652.

Gull. s. [Welsh, gryllan; Breton, guelan; Gaelic, fuilleann.]

1. Seabird so called of the genus Larus.

I do fear,

When every feather sticks in his own wing,
Lord Timon will be left a naked gull,
Which flashes now a phoenix.

Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, ii. 1.

The prominent angle at the symphysis of the upper mandible, the extent of the palatine mandibular bone between the toes, indicate a degree of connection with the gulls; and [Robin's] gull . . . by its slightly forked tail exhibits one point of resemblance to the greater number of the terns. Like the tern, too, some of the smaller gulls assume during the breeding season a dark-coloured head. . . . The black-headed gull is abundant on various parts of our coast. . . . The early describers of this species (Larus tridactylus) seem not to have been aware that the gull named the Tarrack was only the young state of that which had been previously called the Kittiwake. . . . Colonel Montagu was certainly mistaken in considering the Kittiwake a rare bird on our southern coast. This gull is decidedly a rock breeder, and very common in the breeding season on all the rocky parts of the coast of Hampshire, Dorsetshire, Devonshire, and part of Cornwall.—Farrell, British Birds.

2. Stupid animal; one easily cheated. See last extract.

Being fed by us you wad us so,
As that ungentle gull, the cuckoo's bird,
Cath the sparrow.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 1.

Why have you suffer'd me to be imprison'd,
Kept in a dark house, visited by the priest,
And made the most notorious geck and gull
That e'er invocation play'd on?

Id., Twelfth Night, v. 1.

His very touching might that is learned, soaks it,
and lays him still more and more open, a conspicuous gull.—Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

That palfrey story is untrue,
And forg'd to cheat such gulls as you.

Bulwer, Hudibras.

[To gull, to deceive, defraud. A metaphor from the helplessness of a young unfledged bird, on the same principle that the French gull, a nestling, is applied to a simpleton; a novice, unwise, and inexperienced gull. (Adage).] The meaning of gull is simply unfledged bird, in which sense it is still used in Cheshire.

As that ungentle gull the cuckoo's bird.

(Hen. IV.)

It is especially applied to a roosting in the South of England. Probably from Danish gult, Swedish gult, yellow, from the yellow colour of the down, or perhaps of the beak, as in French bec jaune, properly yellow beak, a young bird with yellow skin at the base of the beak, metaphorically a novice, a simple inexperienced ass, a mimic. (Cotgrave). Italian pippione, a plover (properly a young bird, from pippare, to peep or pip), metaphorically a silly gull, one that is soon caught and tricked. (Florio). Hence a judged, a dupe at cards.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

3. Cheat; fraud; trick.

I should think this a gull, but that the white-bearded fellow speaks it. Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 3.

Either they have these excellencies they are praised for, or they have not; if they have not, 'tis an apparent cheat and gull.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Gull. v. a. Trick; cheat; defraud; deceive.

If I do not gull him into a way word, and make him a common recreation, do not think I have wit enough to lie straight in my bed.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, ii. 2.

Yet love these wretches did remove, and move
Thee to gull things own together for my love. Donne.

He would have gull'd him with a trick,
But Mart was too too politic. Bulwer, Hudibras.

They are not to be gull'd twice with the same trick.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

The Roman people were grossly gull'd twice or thrice over, and as often enslaved in one century, and under the same pretences of reformation.—Dryden.

For this advantage age from youth has won,
As not to be out-riden, though out-run;

GULP

By fortune he was now to Venus trind,
And with stern Mars in Capricorn was join'd;
'T' him disposing in his own abode,
He sooth'd the goddess, while he gull'd the god.

Dryden.

This was a peculiarly satisfactory interview to both parties. Mr. Vandyperken was overjoyed at the corporal's explanation, and the corporal was equally delighted at having so easily gull'd his superior.—Morrey, Starleggers, vol. ii. ch. iii.

Gullcatcher. s. Catcher of gulls: (common with gull in its second sense).

Here comes my noble gullcatcher.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, ii. 2.

Gulley. s. Cheat; imposture.

Leo Decimus, that scoffing pope, took an extraordinary delight in humouring of silly fellows, and to put gulley upon them.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 119.

There hath been not long since, within the compass of these twenty years, a merry gulley put upon the world, concerning a guild of men, who style themselves The Brethren of the Rosie Cross.—Hale, Golden Remains, p. 282.

There never was no gross gulley in the world as this.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 402.

Ha, ha! good gulley; he does it well I faith.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Wit at several Weapons.

Gulley, wherewith poor mortals are befooled and cheated.—Bishop Hall, Discourse of Truth, § 2.

Gullet. s. [N.Fr. goulet.]

1. Throat; passage through which the food passes; meat-pipe; oesophagus.

It might be his doom,
One day to sing,
With gullet in string.

Sir J. Denham.

Many have the gullet or feeding channel which have no lungs or windpipe; as fishes which have gills, whereby the heart is refrigerated; for such thereof as have lungs and respiration are not without wizen, as whales and cetaceous animals.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Nature has various tender muscles plac'd,
By which the artful gullet is embur'd.

Sir R. Blackmore.

The liquor in the stomach is a compound of that which is separated from its inward coat, the spittle which is swallowed, and the liquor which distils from the gullet.—Arbuthnot.

2. Small stream or lake. Obsolete.

The Euxine sea and the Mediterranean, small gullets, if compared with the ocean.—Heylyn.

A deep, unpassable gullet of water, without bridge, ford, or ferry.—Feller, History of the Holy War, p. 233.

Gullish. adj. Foolish; stupid; absurd.

They have most part some gullish humour or other, by which they are led: one is an epicure, an atheist; a second, a gamester; a third, a whore-master; fit subjects all for a misir to work upon.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, To the reader.

Gullishness. s. Attribute suggested by Gullish; foolishness; stupidity.

To the end his prince might never awaken or rouse himself from out his drowsy and shameful lethargy, and by opening his eyes, come to the knowledge of his own stolidity, idiotism, and gullishness, and so discover others' treacherous ambition, he had filled his court with flatterers.—Translation of Boccaccio, p. 16: 1624.

Gulp. s. [Fr. goulotte.] Rushing water-course.

The violent rain which had fallen in the night had suddenly brought down such torrents of water through the hollow or gully where they had taken up their station, that they were in the utmost danger of being swept away before it.—Lauchessworth, Voyages.

Gulosity. s. Greediness; gluttony; voracity.

They are very temperate, seldom offending in ebriety, nor erring in gulosity, or superfluity of meals.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Gulp. v. a. [Dutch, golpen.] Swallow eagerly; suck down without intermission.

He loosens the fish, gulps it down, and so soon as ever the morsel was gone wipes his mouth.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

I see the double flagon charge their hand;
See them puff off the froth, and gulp again.

While with dry tongue I lick my lips in vain. Gay.

Gulp. s. As much as can be swallowed at once.

In deep aspirations we take more large gulps of air to cool our heart, overcharged with love and sorrow.—Dr. H. More.

As oft as he can catch a gulp of air
And peep above the sea, he names the fair.

Dryden, Fables.

This unsettled my poor girl, who was about to swallow her whole glass of wine and water at a gulp, and accompany her exasperated mother, when Gulp interrupting mid, 'When she is tired of our wine and she will go. Sit still, Harriet—finish your wine and water—if you are not sleepy, stay where you are.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Gum. s. [Fr. gomme; Lat. gummi; Gr. ῥημν.] Vegetable secretion so called. See extract from Quincy.

One whose eyes
Albeit unused to the melting rain,
Drop tears as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum. Shakespeare, Othello, v. 3.
He ripens spices, fruit, and precious gum,
Which from remotest regions hither come. Waller.

Her maiden train,
Who bore the vests that holy rites require,
Incense, and od'rous gums, and cover'd fire.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, b. iii.
Gum [is] a vegetable substance differing from a resin, in being more viscid and less friable, and generally dissolving in aqueous menstrua; whereas resins, being more sulphurous, require a spirituous solvent.—Quincy.

Gum. v. a.

1. Close with gum; smear with gum.

The eyelids are apt to be gummed together with a viscous humour.—Wiseeman, Surgery.

2. Adorn with gums or essences.

Bleaching their hands at midnight, gumming and bridling their beards.—Rafanous, Discreetia.
Wearing of well set, curled, gummed, braided, and powdered hair, according as the fashions vary.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Modesty, p. 78.
No scandalous ad' ladies powdering, curling, and gumming their hair.—Ibid., p. 178.

Gum. s. [German, gum, pl. gūmen.] Skin covering the sockets of the teeth; the sockets themselves.

I would, while it was smiling in my face,
Have pluck'd my nipple from its boneless gums.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 7.

Gumminess. s. Attribute suggested by Gummy; state of being gummy; accumulation of gum.

The tendons are involved with a great gumminess and collection of matter.—Wiseeman, Surgery.

Gumminess. s. Nature of gum; gumminess. Rare.

Sugar and honey make windy liquors, and the elastic fermenting particles are detained by their innate gumminess.—Playfer.

Gumminess. s. Having the nature of gum. Rare.

Observations concerning English amber, and relations about the amber of Prussia, prove that amber is not a gumminess or resinous substance drawn out of trees by the sun's heat, but a natural fossil.—Woodward, Natural History.

Gummy. adj.

1. Consisting of gum; of the nature of gum.

From the utmost end of the head branches there smeth out a gummy juice, which hangeth downward like a cord.—Sir W. Raleigh.
Nor all the gummy stores Arabia yields.

Dryden, Translation of Virgil.

2. Productive of gum.

The clouds
Tine the slant lightning; whose thwart flame, driv'n down,
Kindles the gummy bark of fir and pine.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 1074.

3. Overgrown with gum.

The yawning youth, scarce half awake, essays
His lazy limbs and drowsy head to raise;
Then rubs his gummy eyes, and scrubs his pate.

Dryden.

4. Thick; heavy; clumsy; stuffy; puffy. Slang.

A little gummy in the leg, I suppose.—Colman the younger, The Poor Gentleman.

Gumption. s. [?] Sense.

He has no gumption; i. e. he sets about the work awkwardly.—Peppes.

But in a grand tragic scene

I'm nothing;

It would create a kind of loathing

To see me act Hamlet;

There'd be many a damn let

Fig

As my presumption

If I should try.

Being a fellow of no gumption.

Laub, Letter to Astoria.

One does not have gumption till one has been properly cheated.—Sir E. B. Lytton, Eugene Aram, b. i. ch. ix.

Gum. s. [see last extract.] General name for firearms; instrument from which shot is discharged by the sudden expansion of air, generally caused by the ignition of gunpowder.

These dread curses, like the sun 'gainst glass,
Or like an overcharged gun, recoil
And turn upon thyself.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II., iii. 2.

The emperor, smiling, said that never emperor was yet slain with a gun.—Kneller, History of the Turks.

The bullet flying, makes the gun recoil.

Cleveland.

In vain the dart or glitt'ring sword we shun,
Condemn'd to perish by the slaught'ring gun.

Grassville.

[Much difficulty is thrown on the derivation of this word [gun] by the double uncertainty as to the period at which gunpowder was first used in European warfare, and the original meaning of the word itself. No doubt gun is frequently latinized by the names of the old instruments of the catapult kind. . . . Catapulta, by those who write in Latin, is used for fire-arms at a much later period, and down to the present day. Carabina, catapulta equitris (Bligotian); karrabry, catapulta de collo pendula (Danikovsky.) Again we find gun used by Chaucer in translating mangonneau, where undoubtedly the engine intended in the original are of the ancient kind.

Dedans ceste tour a pierrière
Et enquis de moines manières;
Vous pulsiez bien les mangonneaux
Voir parloir les creneaux.
And eke within the castle were Springalds, gonnes, bows and archers.
But we must not look for scientific accuracy in a passage of this kind, and the name of any destructive engine of war would serve the purpose of the poet as well as another. For the same reason we cannot form a decisive conclusion as to the original meaning of the term from the passage where guns are mentioned in King Alisaunder.

Two othe into the walle stygh
And the knyghts men with gonnes sleigh.—Spenser.
On the other hand it is certain that Chaucer uses the word in the modern sense in the House of Fame.

Swift as a pellet out of a gunne
When fire is in the powder runne.—B. III.

And the specific meaning of the term is distinctly pointed out by Arderne, a surgeon of the time of Edward III. cited by Way, who in describing different kinds of sewe volant, after a receipt for the composition of gunpowder (with the exception of the corning) proceeds: 'Cet poudre vault a gettre pelotes de fer, ou de plomb, ou d'arayne, ou un instrument que l'on appelle gonne.' (Promptorium Parvulorum, Notes.) I have little doubt then that the term gun was originally applied to a fire tube or to the missile which it discharged, as in the Avowing of King Arthur.

There came fiane a gunne
And lemet as the leyn.
As the names of the old engines were constantly applied to the new (expanding, musket, caliver, pebrouel), it may well have happened that the name of the new was sometimes incorrectly applied to the old.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Blow great guns. Blow violently.

Look at that black cloud, no bigger than one's hand, to the southward. I tell you that before we are two hours older there will be a hurricane, and it will blow great guns.—Bala, Dutch Pictures, The Ship-Chandler.

Gun. v. n. Shoot with a gun.

There is less danger in't than gunning, Sanchez.—Benjamin and Fletcher, Kule a Wife and have a Wife.

Gunboat. s. Vessel armed with one piece of artillery (or more), of comparatively light draft, for rivers and coasting.

Practically, it [the civilization of China] is the highest that Asia ever produced, although bearing no just comparison, owing to difference of race, with the civilisations of Europe, ancient or modern. This was made plain enough when, some months ago, a few gun-boats, belonging to two European nations, with a population between them hardly equal to that of a single province of China, ran up a Chinese river, and dictated a treaty that violated the laws of an empire which had undergone little change for three thousand years—which had witnessed the rise, decline, and fall of the Assyrian, Egyptian, Persian, Roman, and Arabian empires.—J. Crawfurd, On the Civilization of Man, in Transactions of the Ethnological Society.

Gunnel. s. See Gunwale.

One would think that the ballast of the ship was shifted with us, and that our constitution had the gunnel under water.—Burke, Speech on the Reform of Representation.

Gunner. s. 1. Cannoneer; he whose employment is to manage the artillery in a ship.

The nimble gunner
With lynx-eye now the devilish cannon touches,
And down goes all before him.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iii. chorus.

Gunnery. s. Science of artillery; art of managing cannon.

He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress or a nursery.

Byron, Don Juan, l. 28.

Gunpowder. s. Powder put into guns to be fired.

Gunpowder consisteth of three ingredients, salt-petre, small-coal, and brimstone.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.
Burning by gunpowder frequently happens at sea.—Wiseeman.

Gunroom. s. Place, on board a ship, where arms are deposited.

Pray Heaven that old rogue Coupler hath not sent us to fetch milk out of the gunroom.—Sir John Vanbrugh, The Relapse, iii. 3.

Gunsight. s. Reach or range of a gun; space to which a shot can be thrown.

Those who are come over to the royal party are supposed to be out of gunsight.—Dryden.
Lansburg retired to a spot which was out of gunsight, and summoned a few of his chief officers to a consultation.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. 22.

Construction adjectival.
The symptoms I have translated to gunsight wounds.—Wiseeman.

Gunnsmith. s. Man whose trade is to make guns.

It is of particular esteem with the gunsmiths for stocks.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Gunsstick. s. Runner or stick with which the charge is driven into a gun; ramrod.

Even a gunsstick flying into fuge. Stewart.

Gunsstock. s. Wood to which the barrel of a gun is fixed.

The timber is used for bows, pullies, screws, mills, and gunsstocks.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Gunstone. s. Cannon bullet, or ball, formerly made of stone.

Tell the pleasant prince, this mock of his
Hath turn'd his ball to gunstones; and his soul
Shall stand more charged for the wasteful vengeance
That shall fly with them. Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 2.

That I could shoot mine eyes at him, like gunstones.—B. Jonson, Volpone.

Gunwale. s. See extract.

The gunwale or gunnel of a ship [is] that piece of timber which reaches on either side of the ship from the half deck to the forecabin, being the uppermost bend which finisheth the upper works of the hull in that part, and wherein they put the stanchions which support the waste-trees; and this is called the gunwale, whether there be guns in the ship or no; and the lower part of any port, where any ordnance are, is also termed the gunwale.—Morris.

Moths made fast a cable to her stern, and towed her off, but he could get her no further than a shoal, called Stubborn, when she sunk; and soon after he had worked the Nyeborg up to the landing-place, that vessel sunk to her gunwale.—Suthey, Life of Nelson.

And now the keel just cuts the cover'd sand,
Now to the gunwale stretches every hand.

Crabbe, The Borough.

Used adjectivally.
Her owner ring'd her and he knows her worth,
And seen her, fearless, gunwale-deep go forth;
Dreadons he views his sea, by lagoon cur'd,
When inch-high billows vex the watery world. Ibid.

Gurge. s. [Lat. gurgis.] Whirlpool; gulf

Rhetorical; rare.

GURG

They slow the principal gunners, and carried away their artillery.—Hayward.

There on his knee (behind a box tree shrinking)
A skilful gunner, with his left eye winking, Levels directly at an oak hard by,
Whereon a hundred growling culvers cry:
Down falls the cock, up from the touch-pan flies
A ruddy flash that in a moment dyes;
Off goes the gun, and through the forest rings
The thundering bullet, born on fiery wings.

Spencer, Translation of De Barlas. (Ord MS.)

At the beginning of October, two Turkish gunners came off to the Hastings, and giving information to Captain Lawrence that two hundred barrels of powder were stored in the castle, and that a train was laid from the town to the centre of the magazine proposed that we should send a party under their guidance to cut it off.—Yung, Naval History of England.

2. One who shoots; one who uses a gun to kill game.

I had rather
Have anger'd all the gods, than that blind gunner.
Ben Jonson and Fletcher, Cupid's Revenge.

Gunnery. s. Science of artillery; art of managing cannon.

He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress or a nursery.

Byron, Don Juan, l. 28.

Gunpowder. s. Powder put into guns to be fired.

Gunpowder consisteth of three ingredients, salt-petre, small-coal, and brimstone.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The symptoms I have translated to gunsight wounds.—Wiseeman.

Gunnsmith. s. Man whose trade is to make guns.

It is of particular esteem with the gunsmiths for stocks.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Gunsstick. s. Runner or stick with which the charge is driven into a gun; ramrod.

Even a gunsstick flying into fuge. Stewart.

Gunsstock. s. Wood to which the barrel of a gun is fixed.

The timber is used for bows, pullies, screws, mills, and gunsstocks.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Gunstone. s. Cannon bullet, or ball, formerly made of stone.

Tell the pleasant prince, this mock of his
Hath turn'd his ball to gunstones; and his soul
Shall stand more charged for the wasteful vengeance
That shall fly with them. Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 2.

That I could shoot mine eyes at him, like gunstones.—B. Jonson, Volpone.

Her owner ring'd her and he knows her worth,
And seen her, fearless, gunwale-deep go forth;
Dreadons he views his sea, by lagoon cur'd,
When inch-high billows vex the watery world. Ibid.

Gurge. s. [Lat. gurgis.] Whirlpool; gulf

Rhetorical; rare.

Marching from Eden he shall find
The plain, wherein a black bituminous gurge,
Boils out from under ground.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 40.

Gurge. v. a. Swallow up. Rare.

Gurgoons. s. See Grudgings.

Out of this is the context of the brain, usually called gurgens or pollard, taken—Harrison, De- scription of England, prefixed to Holinshead.

Gurging. part. adj. Swallowing up. Rare.
In gurgling gulfs of these such surging seas.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 227.

Gurgle. v. n. Fall or gush with noise, as water from a bottle.

Gurging. part. adj. Sounding or flowing as that which gurgles.

Then when a fountain's gurgling waters play,
They rush to land, and end in frisks the day. Pope.
Pure gurgling rills the lonely desert trace,
And waste their music on the savage race.

Gurgoyls. s. [N.Fr.] In Architecture.
Ornamented stone spout in churches.

Gargyles of men's figure, atlantes, atlantes, gar- gyle of women's figure, cariatides vel status mu*liercs*.—Withal, Dictionary, p. 163: ed. 1808. (Nares
by H. & W.)

Gargoyles appear to have been first introduced with the early English style; during the prevalence of which they were usually made with a very considerable projection; subsequently they were often much less prominent.—Glossary of Architecture.

Garnard. s. [Fr. gournauld.] Native saltwater fish so called, of the genus Trigla.
Gurnet is a common but inaccurate form.

If I be not ashamed of my soldiers, I'm a sowed
gurnet.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iv. 2.

Cuvier's second family of the Acanthopterygii contains those genera, the species of which have their cheeks defended by indurated plates, which are sometimes spinous. Of the first genus of this family, Trigla, the garnards, the British coast produces nine species, three of which are common, the others of rarer occurrence. They are chiefly caught by the trawl-net, used in deep water; as the gar- narde mostly swim near the bottom, and are incautious of life after they have been taken from the sea. . . . The red garnard [Trigla cuculus] is very common on the English coast. . . . The piper [Trigla lyra] . . . is supposed to have gained the name of piper from the sound which it makes when taken in hand from the sea. All the species, however, emit a grunting noise at intervals for a considerable time; which may have probably given origin to the name which distinguishes them by some corruption from the Latin grunnio, or the French grond- er. . . . The grey garnard [Trigla gurnardus] is much more common than either the piper or the strawed garnard.—Jarrell, British Fishes.

The garnard is known to emit a peculiar grunting sound on being removed from the water, to which disagreeable habit it owes its designation.—
Notes and Queries, March 9, 1861.

Gush. v. n. [German, giessen = pour out.]
Break forth in a strong and full stream.

A sea of blood gushed from the gaping wound.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

The covering of this abyss was broken asunder,
and the water gushed out that made the deluge.—
T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Gush. s. Emission of liquor in a large quantity at once; liquor so emitted.

If a lung-vein be lacerated, generally at the first cough a great gush of blood is coughed up.—Mur- res.

Gushing. part. adj.
1. Breaking forth with a gush.

Line after line my gushing eyes o'erflow,
Led through a sad variety of woe. Pope.

(On either hand the gushing waters play,
And down the rough cascade white dashing fall.
Thomson.

2. Ebullient; exuberant; demonstrative: (applied, recently, to the temperament of females).

Rachel Norrrys was a dangerously fascinating brunette. There was more danger for men in the society of this little brown girl, with her ready blood, her killing glances, her arch manner and animated conversation, than in association 'with the biggest, fairest Juno in creation.' . . . Then her temper was warm, impulsive, and energetic. She was quick to resent an injury to others, as she was to confess a fault of her own; passionate, but open as the day; 'a nervous creature, who lived twenty-four months in every twelve.' To add to the atmosphere of danger which surrounded this gushing young person, she is placed at the outset of the story in an odd, not to say false, position. She is a wife in nothing but name.—Saturday Review, February 10, 1866.

Gushingly. adv. In a gushing manner.

Thus to be
Parent of rivers, which flow gushingly,
With many windings, through the vale.
Byron, Childe Harold, iv. 71.

Gusset. s. [Fr. gousset.] Plate in armour before the armpit; corresponding piece in a shirt.

Beam and gusset and band,
Hand and gusset and seam,
Till o'er the buttons I fall asleep,
And sew them on in a dream.
T. Hood, Song of the Shirt.

Gust. s.

1. Sense of tasting; relish.

They fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit
(Shew'd bitter ashes, which th' offended taste
With spattering noise rejected.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 661.

Would he eat to satisfy and not to invite his hunger, and drink to refresh and not to force and oppress himself; his relish would be quick and vigorous, his gust sincere, and his digestion easy.—
Scott, Christian Life, iii. 2.

My sight, and smell, and hearing were employ'd,
And all three senses in full gust enjoy'd. Dryden.

Where love is duty on the female side,
On this more sensual gust, and sound with early rises. Id., Fanny and Arcite.

Old age shall do the work of taking away both the gust and comfort of them.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

We have lost, in a great measure, the gust and relish of true happiness.—Archbishop Tillotson, Ser- mons.

The purer the soil is, the purer will all its faculties and operations be, the less it will retain of corrupted gusts and relishes, the more recollected and undivided will be its powers.—Norris, On the Beauti- fulness, p. 170.

Destroy all creatures for thy sport or gust,
Yet cry, if man's unhappy, God's unjust.
Pope, Essay on Man.

2. Turn of fancy; intellectual taste.

The principal part of painting is to find what nature has made most proper to this art, and a choice of it may be made according to the gust and manner of the ancients.—Dryden.

Gust. s. [from Icelandic gustr.] Sudden rush or blast of wind.

You may as well forbid the mountain pines
To wag their high tops, and to make a noise,
When they are fretted with the gusts of heav'n.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.
Presently come forth swarms and volleys of libels,
which are the gusts of liberty of speech restrained.
—Jaeger, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

As when fierce northern blasts from th' Alps
descend,
From his firm roots with struggling gusts to rend
An aged sturdy oak. Sir J. Denham.

But sillier man, in his mistaken way,
By reason, his false guide, is led astray;
Tossed by a thousand gusts of wavering doubt,
His restless mind still rolls from thought to thought.

Oldham, Eighth Satire of Boileau, imitated.
Part stay for passage, till a gust of wind
Ships o'er their forces in a shining sheet. Dryden.

Pardon a weak discomf'd soul, that swells
With sudden gusts, and sinks as soon in calms,
The sport of passions. Addison, Cato.

Gust. v. a. Taste; have a relish of.

'Tis far gone,
When I shall gust it last. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 1.

The gust of this age gusts nothing high.—Sir R.
L. Estlin, On Beaumont and Fletcher's Plays.

Gustable. adj.

1. To be tasted.

This position informs us of a vulgar error, terming the gall bitter; whereas there is nothing gust- able sweeter.—Harvey.

2. Pleasant to the taste.

A gustable thing, seen or smelt, excites the appete-—Derham.

Gustable. s. Anything that may be tasted;
catable.

The touch acknowledged no gustables,
The taste no fragrant smell.
Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, ii. 2, 4.

Gustation. s. Act of tasting.

The gustation and conveying parts partake of the nerves of gustation, or appertaining unto sense.—
Sir T. Browne.

Gustatory. adj. Consisting in, connected with, constituted by, subservient to, the sense of taste.

The sensations, visual, aural, tactual, olfactory, gustatory, muscular, constantly accompanying the successive phases of these actions, will be all partially aroused at the same time.—Herbert Spencer,
Elements of Psychology, 201.

Gustful. adj. Tasteful; well-tasted.

A famous composition made of divers cordials . . .
which they throw into water to make it more gust- ful.—Howell, Letters, ii. 56: Oct. 1657.

What he dislikes from some dry, insipid sin, is but to make up a Benjamin's mess for some other more gustful.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety, p. 115.

Gustfulness. s. Attribute suggested by
Gustful; relish of anything.

As no man can well enjoy himself, or find sound content in anything, while business or duty be unfinished on his hands, so when he has done his best toward the dispatch of his work, he will then comfortably take his ease and enjoy his pleasure; then his food doth taste savourily; then his divertisments and recreations have a lively gustfulness;

then his sleep is very sound and pleasant.—Barrow,
Sermons, xix.

Gustless. adj. Tasteless; insipid.

No gustless or unsatisfying offal.—Sir T. Browne,
Miscellanies, p. 13.

Gusto. s. [Italian.]

1. Relish of anything; power by which anything excites sensations in the palate.
Pleasant gustos gratify the appetite of the luxurious.—Derham.

2. Intellectual taste; liking.

In reading what I have written, let them bring no particular gusto along with them.—Dryden.

Still with his hirling artists let him praise,
And Folly's praise repay for Wisdom's lack,
Long of their patron's gusto let them tell,
Whose noblest native gusto is to sell.
Byron, The Curse of Minerva.

Gusty. adj.

1. Stormy; tempestuous.

Once upon a raw and gusty day,
The troubled Tyler chiding with his shores.
Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, i. 2.

They are as a gusty wind and sail to a ship; if she steer right, they prosper and further her course; but if wrong, they serve only to strike her against the rocks with more speed and force.—Norris, On the Beatitude, p. 125.

It is still a gusty kind of weather: there is a kind of sickness in the air.—Dryden, History of the League, dedication.

Or whirl'd tempestuous by the gusty wind,
Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

2. Applied to the disposition.

Little 'brown girls' with gusty temperaments seldom do the sensible thing.—Saturday Review,
February 10, 1866.

Gut. s. [German, kütteln, güdeln.]

1. Long pipe reaching with many convolutions from the stomach to the vent.
A viol should have a lay of wire-strings below close to the belly, and then the strings of guts, mounted upon a bridge, that by this means the upper strings stricken should make the lower sound.—
Baron, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Stomach; receptacle of food; proverbially,
And cram'd'them till their guts did ache,
With cawdle, custard, and plum-cake.
Bulwer, Hudibras.

With false weights their servants' guts they cheat,
And pinch their own to cover the deceit.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

3. Gluttony; love of gourmandizing.

Apicius, thou didst on thy guts bestow
Full ninety millions; yet, when this was spent,
Ten millions still remain'd to thee; which thou,
Fearing to suffer thirst and famishment,
In poison'd potion drain'd'st. Macknill, Apology.

4. Passage.

Here we entered into a narrow gut between two steep rocky mountains.—Mausdell, Travels, p. 134.

Gut. v. a.

1. Eviscerate; draw; exenterate.

The fishermen save the most part of their fish:
some are gutted, split, powdered and dried.—
Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

2. Plunder of contents.

In Nero's arbitrary time,
When virtue was a guilt, and wealth a crime,
A troop of cut-throat guards were sent to seize
The rich men's goods, and gut their palaces. Dryden.

Tom Brown of facetious memory, having gutted a proper name of its vowels, used it as freely as he pleased.—Addison.

It was probably done by Uakoko, who gutted
a chapel near Newgrange a few years before.—Arbuth- not, Harzogovius, ch. x.

Guttapercha. s. [Malay.] See extract.

Gutta percha of commerce consists chiefly of a peculiar substance (gutta percha properly so called) mixed with a small quantity of a vegetable acid, caustic (hence the cheesy odour which it sometimes possesses), a resin soluble in ether and in oil of turpentine, and a resin soluble in alcohol. The pure

gutta percha is a hydro-carbon, analogous to caoutchouc. The uses of gutta percha in the arts are most extensive. It is already the subject of numerous patents. It also serves some useful purposes in medicine, surgery, and pharmacy. — Pereira, Elements of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, p. 1628: ed. 1826.

Gutter. s. [Fr. gouttière.] Passage for water.

Rocks rise one above another, and have deep gutters worn in the sides of them by torrents of rain. — Addison, Travels in Italy.

As soon as his debarcation was known, the whole nation was wild with delight. Wherever he appeared thousands thronged round him, shouting and blessing his name. The bells of all England rang joyously: the gutters ran with ale; and, night after night, the sky five miles round London was resounded by innumerable bonfires. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. i.

Used adjectivally, or as the first element in a compound.

These gutter files are in length ten inches and a half. — Macaulay, Mechanical Exercises.

Gutter. v. a. Cut in small hollows. My cheeks are gutter'd with my fretting tears.

First in a place, by nature close, they build A narrow flooring, gutter'd, wall'd, and tiled. — Dryden.

Guttered. part. adj. Cut as in gutters.

Tempests themselves, high seas, and howling winds, The gutter'd rocks, and concentrated sands, Tempted us step by step to clog the gutless keel, As having sense of beauty, do omit Their mortal natures, letting safe go by The divine Desdemona. — Shakespeare, Othello, il. 1.

Guttie. v. n. Gourmandize.

His jolly brother, opposite in sense, Laughs at his thirst; and, lavish of expense, Quaffs, crams, and guttles, in his own defence. — Dryden.

Guttie. v. a. Swallow.

The fool sat in his porridge, to try if they'd him: they did not hiss, and so he guttled them up, and scalded his chops. — Sir R. L. Estlin.

Guttulous. adj. [Lat. gutta = drop.] In the form of a small drop.

Ice is plain upon the surface of the water, but round in hail, which is also a glaciation, and figured in guttulata descent from the air. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Guttural. adj. [Lat. guttur = throat.] Belonging to, or connected with, the throat; formed by or in the throat, in which case it is often used in Phonetics, as applied to certain sounds formed in the throat.

The Hebrews have assigned which letters are labial, which dental, and which guttural. — Brown. In attempting to pronounce the arabic, and some of the vowels spirally, the throat is brought to labour, and makes that which we call a guttural pronunciation. — Holler.

Children are occasionally born with guttural swellings. — Guthrie, Geography, Switzerland. I love the language, that soft bastard Latin, Which melts like kisses from a female mouth, And sounds as if it should be writ on satin, With syllables which breathe of the sweet South, And gentle liquids gliding all so put in, That not a single accent seems uncouth, Like our harsh, northern, whistling, grunting, guttural, Which were obliged to him, and spit, and sputter all. — Egmont, Leppo, 44.

Guttural. s. Guttural sound, articulation, or letter.

He [Cartaret] had . . . acquired considerable influence over the mind of George the First. The other ministers could speak no German. The king could speak no English. All the communication that Walpole held with his colleagues was in very bad Latin. Cartaret discoursed his colleagues by the volubility with which he addressed his Majesty in German. They listened with envy and terror to the mysterious gutturales which might possibly convey suggestions very little in unison with their wishes. — Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Walpole's Letters.

Gutturine. adj. Connected with the throat. Rare.

The bronchocoele, or gutturine tumour, an endemic disease of the nations of those parts, physicians and naturalists attribute to the water they drink, not without good reason; because, may they, it consists of melted snow, which gives it that malignant quality. — Bay, On the Deluge, ch. ii. (Ord MS.)

Guy. s. [guide-rope.] In Navigation. Ropes for moving and steadying certain parts of the ship's tackle.

In the beautiful geometrical web of the garden-spider, many guyes are required to keep it tense, and to prevent it from being blown away by the wind. — Edinburgh Review, June 1822. (Ord MS.)

Guzzie. v. n. Feed immoderately; swallow any liquor greedily.

Well wesson'd bowls the gossip's spirits raise, Who while she guzzles chats the doctor's praise. — Lord Beaumont.

They fell to lapping and guzzling, till they burst themselves. — Sir R. L. Estlin. No more her care shall fill the hollow tray, To sat the guzzling hops with floods of whey. — Guy, Pastorals.

Guzzie. v. a. Swallow with immoderate gust.

The Tylian king Was longest liv'd of any two-legg'd thing, Still guzzling must of wine. — Dryden.

Guzzie. s. Insatiable thing or person. Rare. That senseless, sensual epicure, That sink of fifth, that guzzle most impure. — Marston, Scourge of Villany, il. 7.

Gwyniad. s. [Welsh; from gwyn = white.] Rare and local native fish so called, Coregonus lavaretus; schelly.

The species of the genus Coregonus are numerous in Europe, and several of them are so similar to each other, that, without the power of comparing those of this country with foreign specimens, an appropriation of synonyms is, at least, doubtful. Some authors have even considered the Vendice of Loch-naber as the same with the Povan of Perthshire, the schelly of Clwaster, the gwyniad of Wales, and the Bullen of Ireland; but it will be found that this is not the case, and from recent observation, there is now reason to believe that the Bullen of Ireland is distinct from the two species of Coregonus found in Great Britain. The gwyniad of Wales were very common in Llyn Tegid (Fair Lake) at Bala until the year 1863, when pike were put into the lake, which have very much reduced their number. . . . The gwyniad is very numerous in Clwaster and other large lakes in Cumberland, where, on account of its large scales, it is called the schelly. . . . The poorer classes . . . consider and even call them the Fresh-water herring. . . . The fish is not unlike a herring in appearance, and the Welsh term gwyniad has reference to their silvery white colour. — Tarrell, British Fishes.

Gymnasium. s. [Gr. gymnasion; from gymnōs = naked.] Formerly a place for athletic exercises, in which such as practised them were wholly or nearly naked; any place of exercise; school. In our universities, Cambridge and Oxford; . . . where the worst college is more sight-worthy than the best Dutch gymnasium. — Fuller, Holy State, p. 149: 1634. The word gymnasium does properly signify the place where is sole exercise themselves when stripped. — Gin-e, Cosmologia Sacra. It is to him [the Marquis Wielopolski] that the re-establishment of the Warsaw University and the increase of the number of gymnasiums in the kingdom of Poland from five to thirteen, and the introduction of publicity in law proceedings, are due. — N. Edwards, Polish Captivity, vol. ii. ch. i.

In the Greek form in -on. Italy is the sole gymnasium and library of their knowledge and learning. — Sir P. Heywood, Present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 333.

Gymnastic. adj. Pertaining to athletic exercises; consisting of leaping, wrestling, running, throwing the dart or quoit.

Jamblichus, speaking of the powers which flow from the gods among those which co-operate with nature, mentions only the medicinal and gymnastic as the two principal. — Grew, Camoloyin Sacra. The funeral [of Calanus] was followed, according to ancient Greek usage, by a horse-race, and by gymnastic and musical contests. — Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. li.

Gymnastic. s. Athletic exercise.

The Greeks wisely forbid their servants gymnastics as well as arms; and yet your modern footmen exercise themselves daily, whilst their enervated lords are softly lolling in their chariots. — Arbutnot and Pope.

Exercise — exercise — gymnastics . . . is an important hygienic agent. — Pereira, Principles of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, p. 66: 1859.

Gymnastically. adv. In a gymnastic manner; athletically; fitly for strong exercise.

Such as with agility and vigour are not gymnastically composed, nor actively use those parts. — Sir T. Browne.

Gymnic. adj. Applied to such as practise the athletic or gymnastic exercises.

Have they not sword-players, and every sort Of gymnic artists, wrestlers, riders, runners? — Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1284.

Gymnic. Relating to, connected with, consisting in, the exercises of the gymnasium, or of a gymnastic character. In the exact tract the construction is substantival, and the meaning Gymnastics, the latter being the commoner word.

Theatres and spacious fields allotted for all gymnicks, sports, and honest recreations. — Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy. To the reader.

Gymnical. adj. Pertaining to athletic exercises.

Gymnical exercises at Pitana. — Potter, Antiquities of Greece, vol. ii. ch. 22.

Gymnosophist. s. [Gr. gymnōstēs, from gymnōs = wise.] Philosopher, either actual one of an Indian sect so called, or one who from his carelessness in the matter of clothing was of like character.

How know you what may be showed for the gymnosophists prayers in India? — Brewer of St. Jewel, fol. 34, b.: 1664.

These seven wise men of Greece, those British druids, Indian brahmins, Ethiopian gymnosophists, most of the Persians. — Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy. To the reader.

Thus have most civilisations and sciences come, as some think, from the Indian gymnosophists, into Egypt; from thence into Greece; so into Italy; and thence over the Alps, into these faint north-west parts of the world. — Sir H. Blount, Voyage into the Levant, p. 153: 1659.

Let us straight advance in quest Of this profound gymnosophist.

Butler, Hudibras, pt. ii. canto iii. 'How can any man complain of hunger,' said Peter, 'in a country where such excellent sallads are to be gathered in almost every field? or of thirst, where every river and stream produces such delicious pot-tions? And as for cold and nakedness, they are evils introduced by luxury and custom. A man naturally wants cloaths no more than a horse or any other animal, and there are whole nations who go without them; but these are things, perhaps, which you, who do not know the world, — "You will pardon me, sir," returned Adams, "I have read of the gymnosophists." — A plague of your gymnosophists!' cried Peter. — Fiddling, Adequates of Joseph Andrews.

At Athens . . . at Corinth . . . found Diogenes living in habits of simplicity not unworthy of the eastern gymnosophists, as the Greeks called the sages who exposed themselves almost naked to the inclemency of the Indian sky. — Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lii.

Gynarchy. s. [Gr. gynē = woman, and archē = government.] Female government. See Gynecocracy.

I have always some hopes of change under a gynarchy. — Lord Chesterfield.

Gynæcian. adj. Relating to women.

Modern physicians prescribe fasting and abstinence to all melancholy lovers: as likewise do all gynæcian writers to women. — Forrest, Love Melancholy, p. 33: 1640.

Gynecocracy. s. [Gr. gynē = strength, authority; as the root is gynax, this, notwithstanding the extracts, is the only true form.] Rule of a woman: (in politics chiefly applied to those countries where the succession to the crown is limited by the Salic law to males; in colloquial language used for petticoat government).

Beccanus undertakes a conjecture of the first cause which excluded gynecocracy among them [the French]. — Schlen, On Dragoon's Polgobion. The French exclude gynecocracy, or the government in chief by women. — Biographiana, p. 76.

Gypse. s. Kind of stone.

The soil of Cyprus is for the most part rocky: there are in it many entire hills of tale or gypse. — Pococke, Description of the East, il. 229.

Gypseous. adj. Consisting of gypsum.

Gypseous alabaster may be readily distinguished from the marble, . . . it does not effervesce with acids, and is soft enough to be scratched by the nail. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Gypfine. adj. Same as Gypseous, the latter being the commoner word.

Gypfine stone [is] a name given by some writers to the gypsum, or fossil substance, of which the powder, called plaster of Paris, is made by calcination. — Chemistry.

Gypsum. s. [Lat.] Plaster of Paris; native sulphate of lime.

Gypsum is found in very large quantities in many parts of the globe, forming extensive chains of mountains and hills, as in the neighbourhood of Paris. — Chambers, Cyclopædia.

Gypsum . . . this substance was discovered by Mr. Mayer, a German clergyman of uncommon merit, in the year 1783; it has since been applied with signal success in Germany, Switzerland, France, and America.—Kirwan, On Minerals, p. 98.

The plaster stone of the Paris basin contains about 12 per cent. of carbonate of lime. This body, ground and mixed with water, forms an adhesive mortar much used in building, as it dries very speedily. Works executed with pure gypsum never become so hard as those made with the calcareous kind; and hence it might be proper to add a certain portion of white slaked lime to our calcined gypsum, in order to give the stucco this valuable property. Coloured stuccoes of great solidity are made by adding to a clear solution of gaseous any desired colouring tincture, and mixing in the proper quantity of the calcined calcareous gypsum. The compact, fine-grained gypseous alabaster is often cut into various ornamental figures, such as vases, statuary groups, &c., which take a high polish and look beautiful; but from their softness are easily injured, and require to be kept enclosed within a glass shade.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Gyrations. s. Act of turning anything about. This effluvia attenuate and impel the neighbour air, which returning home, in a gyration, carrieth with it the obvious bodies into the electrick.—Sir T. Browne.

If a burning coal be nimbly moved round in a circle with gyrations, continually repeated, the whole circle will appear like fire; the reason of which is, that the sensation of the coal in the several places of that circle remains impressed on the sensorium, until the coal return again to the same place.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Gyre. s. [Lat. gyrus = circle, rotatory movement, wheel.] Circle described by anything moving in an orbit.

Ne therefore his approved skill to ward,
Or strike, or varien round in warlike gyre,
Remember'd he; no car'd for his safe guard,
But rudely rag'd.
Down the wild haggard tow'r into the sky,
And to the south by thy direction fly?
On eagle in her gyres the cloudous cubane? Saudys.
Ho fashion'd those hauculous orbs, that roll
In gyres about the Arctic pole. Id.
Quick and more quick he spins in riddy gyres,
Then falls, and in much foam his soul expires. Dryden.

Gyre. v. a. Turn round.

With the spiteful Philistim, he [the devil] puts out both the eyes of our apprehension and judgement, that he may gyre us about in the mill of unprofitable wickedness.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 23.

Gyrfalcon. s. See Gerfalcon.

Gyre. s. [Welsh, gyfyn.] Fetter. Archaic.

And knowing this, should I yet stay,
Like such as blow away their lives,
And never will redeem a day,
Enamour'd of their golden gyres? B. Jonson.

A golden gyre, a pleasing wrong.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Wife for a Month.
But Talamon rush'd in, and hap'd to meet
A rising root, that held his fustian's feet;
So down he fell, whom sprawling on the ground,
His brother from the wooden gyres unbound. Dryden.

Two stern-fac'd men went off from Llyn,
Between the fog and mist:
And Eugene Aram walked between,
With gyres upon his wrist.
T. Hood, Dream of Eugene Aram.

Gyre. v. a. Fetter; shackle; enchain; ensnare.

All in irons was my song,
Even now I sit in a gyre of strokes. Byrds Sooner.

With as little a web as this, will I ensnare as great a fly as Cassio. Ay, smile upon her, do. I will gyre thee in thine own courtship.—Shakespeare, Othello,
ii. 1.

H.

HA

HA. interj. Expression of wonder, surprise, sudden question, or sudden exertion; when repeated, of laughter or joyous exultation, according to the tone.

You shall look fairer ere I give or lazar;
What may the golden chest? ha! let me see. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 3.

He saith among the trumpets ha, ha, and he smelleth the battle afar off.—Job, xxxix. 23.

Ha, ha, 'tis what so long I wish'd and vow'd;
Our plots and delusions
Have wrought such confusions,
That the monarch's a slave to the crowd. Dryden.

Ha. s. Utterance of the interjection so sounded: (often in combination with Hum).

Praise her but for this her without-door form, (Which, on my faith, deserves high speech,) and straight

The shrug, the ha, or ha; these petty brands,
That calumny doth use: . . . O, I am out,
That mercy does; for calumny will fear
Virtue itself: . . . these shrugs, these hams, and ha's,
When you have said she's goodly, come between,
Ere you can say she's honest.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 1.
We may be temporal lords ourselves, I take it—
You may be any thing, and leave off to make Long-winded exercises; or suck up
Your ha, and ha, in a tune. B. Jonson, Alchemist.

My solemn hams' and ha's the servants quake at.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Love's Progress.

Hab-hab. Interjection used as a substanti- tive. [two words.] In Landscape Garden- ing. Sunk fence so called.

Having thus far spoken of the fence, as the necessity for its concealment and the general form of its line are concerned, the poem now enters into a more practical discussion of the various kinds that may be resorted to, and the proposed means to render them at once effectual and invisible; and of those, the first that is recommended to our choice is that which is commonly known by the name of the sunk fence; by this the ground which is seen beyond it, provided its manner of cultivation be anything similar, appears so intimately and continuously united with that on which we stand ourselves, that it is almost always with surprise the division is discovered; and hence, as expressive of that passion, is obtained, when first invented, the name of the ha-hab. The mode of constructing this is specified, and is as follows.—Dig deep a trench, and to the base of the side from which you look, and which must be perpendicular and fronted with stone, the opposite side must be gently sloped from the level of the soil; the verdure of this slope must be preserved, and the wall which sustains the neighbouring side must be covered on its top also with the green turf, a little raised above the surface of the soil. This is the strongest manner of constructing the sunk fence; but the greatest strength is not in every instance necessary; it may, indeed, be requisite, in order to restrain the deer, but cattle of a tamer kind will be turned without it; the perpendicularity and the stone front of the nearer bank may, therefore, be here dispensed with, and in their place a slope, and at midway down a row of thorns, defended when young with pointed pales, may be substituted; but this must be kept from surmounting the level of the lawn, and its surface made always parallel to the banks on which it grows.—Mason, English Garden, note.

Habeas corpus. s. [Lat. habeas, being the second person singular of the present tense in the potential mood of habeo (have) — thou mayest have, + corpus = body.] Writ so called, from containing these words.

There is no habeas corpus from death.—Sir M. Saurys, Keats, p. 250: 1634.

Next to personal security, the law of England regards, sacred, and preserves the personal liberty of individuals. This personal liberty consists in the power of locomotion, of changing situation, of removing one's person to whatsoever place one's own inclination may direct, without imprisonment or restraint, unless by due course of law. . . . The language of the great charter is that no freeman shall be taken or imprisoned, but by the lawful judgment of his equals, or by the law of the land. And many subsequent old statutes expressly direct that no man shall be taken or imprisoned by suggestion or petition to the king or his council, unless it be by legal indictment or the process of the common law. By the Petition of Right, 3 Car. 1., it is enacted that no freeman shall be imprisoned or detained without cause shewn, to which he may answer according to law. By 16 Car. 1. c. 10, if any person be restrained of his liberty by order or decree of any illegal court, or by command of the king's majesty in person, or by warrant of the council board, or by any of the privy council; he shall, upon demand of his counsel, have a writ of habeas corpus, to bring his body before the Court of King's Bench or Common Pleas, who shall then determine whether the cause of his commitment be just, and thereupon do as justice shall appear. And by 31 Car. 1. c. 2, commonly called the Habeas Corpus Act, the methods of obtaining this writ are so plainly pointed out and enforced, that so long as this statute remains unimpeached, no subject of England can be long detained in prison, except in those cases in which the law requires and justifies such detention. And lest the act should be evaded by demanding unreasonable bail . . . it is declared, 1 W. & M. st. 2, c. 2, that excessive bail ought not to be required.—Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England, b. 1. ch. 1.

The very intention of our habeas corpus act, namely, the preservation of the liberties of the subject, absolutely requires that act now to be suspended.—Addison, Freeholder, no. 16.

Haberdash. s. Haberdashery. Rare.

They turne out their trash,
And shew their haberdash;
Thor pyldo podlary;
And scold mullery. Papistical Exhortation.

HABI

Haberdash. v. n. Deal or trade as a haberdasher. Rare.

What mean dull wits, in this high measure,
To haberdash?

In earth's base ware, whose greatest treasure
Is dress and trash? Quarles, Emblems.

Haberdashery. s. See last extract.

Because these cunning men are like haberdashers of small wares, it is not amiss to set forth their shop.—Bacon.

A haberdasher, who was the oracle of the coffee-house, declared his opinion.—Addison.

[Haberdashery.—Haberdashers were of two kinds, haberdashers of small wares, sellers of needles, tapes, buttons, &c., and haberdashers of hats. The first of these would be well explained from Old Norse haptask, trumpery, things of trifling value. A poor petty haberdasher (of small wares), mercer, (Sherwood). The haberdasher of hats seems named from some kind of stuff called haperden, of which probably hats were made. 'La claque de haperden, xxi.' (Liber Albus, 225.) 'Les fers de legier d'Espagne, wadmal, mercerie, canovas, fustre, lormerie, peil, haberdasherie, enquireux, et les autres choses ne s'en acoustument par fer, vid.' (Ibid. 231.)—Walshwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Haberdashery. s. Articles made or sold by haberdashers.

You will hardly expect me to go through the tape and thread, and all the other small wares of haberdashery and millinery to be gleaned up among our imports.—Darke, On a Reptile's Peace.

Haberdash. s. [Fr. haberdash; Dutch, abberdash.] Fish so called; Poor John.

His day's fare is turned to a hungry feast of daps and cats, or haberdash and poor John, at the monk.—Nash, Pierce Penitence: 1582.

And warn him not to cast his wanton cyne
On groner bacon, and salt haberdash.

Bishop Hall, Satires.

Habergeon. s. [Fr. haubergeon.] Armour for the neck and breast; neck piece; gorget. See Hauberk.

It shall have a blinding of woven work round about the hole of it, as it were the hole of an habergeon, that it be not rent.—Exodus, xxviii. 22.

And halbert some, and some a habergeon;
So every one in arms was quickly dight. Feifeys.

The shot let fly, and grasing
Upon his shoulder, in the paining,
Lodg'd in Magnano's brass habergeon.

Rutler, Hudibras.

Habile. adj. [Fr.; Lat. habilis.] Qualified; fit for anything. Rare.

God imprinted on her the fairest impress of his most amiable image, and rendered her habile and ready to every good work.—Dr. Walker, Life of Lady Warwick, p. 119: 1674.

Habillement. s. [Fr. habillement.] Dress; clothes; garment.

HABI

He the fairest Una found,
Strange lady, in so strange habilitment,
Teaching the Satyr. Spenser, Faerie Queen.
My riches are these poor habitments,
Of which if you should have disdainful me,
You take the sun and splendour that I have.
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 1.
The clergy should content themselves with wearing gowns and other habitments of Irish drapery.
—Swift.

Habilitate. adj. Qualified; entitled. Rare.
Divers persons in the house of commons were attainted, and thereby not legal, nor habilitate to serve in parliament; being disabled in the highest degree.—Bacon.

Habilitation. s. Qualification. Rare.
Things are but habilitations towards arms; and what is habilitation without intention and act?—
Bacon, Essays, xxi.

Habituity. s. Aptitude. Rare.
Alas, though meaner born,
And of less livelihood and habituity.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Of promptness, and of industry.
Habituity, reality. B. Jonson, Masques at Court.

Habit. s. [Fr.; Lat. habitus.]
1. State of anything: (as, 'habit of body').
2. Dress; accoutrement; garment.

I shifted
Into a madman's rage, I assume a semblance
The very dogs disdain'd; and in this habit
Met I my father. Shakespeare, King Lear, v. 3.
Both the poets being dressed in the same English habit, story compared with story, judgement may be made betwixt them.—Dryden.
Changes there are in veins of wit, like those of habits or other modes.—Sir W. Temple.
There are among the statues several of Venus, in different habits.—Adami, Travels in Italy.
The clergy are the only set of men who wear a distinct habit from others.—Swift.

3. Practice; custom; inveterate use.
He hath a better habit of frowning than the count Palatine.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice,
i. 2.

The last fatal step is, by frequent repetition of the sinful act, to continue and persist in it, till at length it settles into a fixed confirmed habit of sin; which being that which the apostle calls the fulfiling of sin, ends certainly in death; death not only as to merit, but also as to actual infliction.—South, Ser- mons.

No civil bridle have since his death arose,
But faction now by habit does cleave;
And were have that respect for his repose
As winds for haleys when they breed at sea.
Dryden, On the Death of Oliver Cromwell.

Habit is a power or ability in man of doing any thing, when it has been acquired by frequently doing the something.—Locke.

The free of education is so great, that we may mould the minds and manners of the young into what shape we please, and give the impressions of each habit as shall ever afterwards remain.—
Bishop Atterbury.

Habit. v. a. Dress; accoutre; array.
Present yourself and your fair princess
Before a Lion.
She shall be habited as it becomes
The partner of your bed.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Having call'd to his memory Sir George Villiers, and the cloath he used to wear, in which at that time he seemed to be habited, he thought him to be that person.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand
Rebellion.

They habited themselves like those rural deities, and imitated them in their rustic dances.—
Dryden.

Habitable. adj. Capable of being inhabited or dwelt in; capable of sustaining human creatures.

By means of our solitary situation, we know well most part of the habitable world, and are ourselves unknown.—Bacon.
That was her torrid and inflaming time;
This is her habitable tropic climate. Donne.
The torrid zone is now found habitable. Cowley.
Look round the habitable world, how few Know their own good, or, knowing it, pursue.
Dryden.

Habitableness. s. Attribute suggested by
Habitable; capability of being dwelt in.
The cutting of the equinoctial line decides that controversy of the habitableness of the torrid zone.
—Mora.

Those ancient problems of the spherical roundness of the earth, the being of antipodes, and of the habitableness of the torrid zones, are abundantly demonstrated.—Bay.

Habitacle. s. [Fr. habituacle; Lat. habita- culeum.] Dwelling.
He shall finally suppe with me and with him in

Revolutions: 1850.

Habitation. s. Dwelling; abode. Obsolete.
What art thou, man, if man at all thou art,
That here in desert hast thine habitation?
And these rich heaps of wealth dost hide apart
From the world's eye, and from her right umbrage.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Habitant. s. Inhabitant; this latter being the commoner word.

Not to earth are those bright luminaries
Officious; but to thee, earth's habitant.
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 98.

Powers celestial to each other's view
Stand still confest, though distant far they lie,
Or habitants of earth, or sea, or sky. Pope.
Oh Love! no habitant of earth thou art—
An unseen seraph, we believe in thee,
A faith whose martyrs are the broken heart,
But never yet hath seen, nor e'er shall see
The naked eye, thy form, as it should be;
The mind hath made thee, as it peopled heaven,
Even with its own desiring phantasy,
And to a thought such shape and image given,
As haunts the unquench'd soul—parch'd—wearied—
wringing—and riven.
Byron, Childs Harold, iv. 121.

Habitat. s. [Lat. third person singular of ha- bito = inhabit.] The word is taken from Latin works on Zoology and Botany, where it stands before the name of the kind of district where such or such animals or plants are found, as fen, marsh, mountain, and the like.

The naturalists who exclusively employ, in the classification of animals, the marks furnished by the external characters, usually take some notice of the places to which animals resort, denominated the station, or habitat.—Fleming, Philosophical Zo- ology, vol. ii. p. 116. (Ord N.)

Still more significant is that deviation from this shape which occurs among such of the Echinidea as have habitats of a different kind, and, consequently, different habitats. The genus Echinocyanus, Niptanus, Brissus, and Amphidontus, diverge markedly towards a bilateral structure. These creatures are found not on rocky shores but on flat sea-bottoms, and some of them only on bottoms of sand or mud.
—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xiv.

Habitation. s.
1. Occupancy.

Amplitude almost immense, with stars
Numerous, and every star perhaps a world
Of destined habitation.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 620.

For want of habitation and repair,
Dissolve to heaps of ruins. Sir J. Denham.
Rocks and mountains, which in the first ages were high and craggy, and consequently then inconvenient for habitation, were by continual deterration brought to a lower pitch.—Woodward.

2. Place of abode; dwelling.

Wisdom, to the end she might save many, built her house of that nature which is common unto all she made not this for that man her habitation, but dwelt in us.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
God oft descends to visit men
Unseen, and through their habitations walks
To mark their doings.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 63.

Habitator. s. [Lat.] Dweller; inhabitant
Rare.

The sun's presence is more continued unto the northern inhabitants; and the longest day in Cancer, is longer unto us than that in Capricorn unto the southern habitators.—Sir T. Brunsen.

Habited. adj. Reduced to a habit; habitual; inveterate. Rare.

This ancient and habited vice is amongst the Dutch, of late years, much decreased.—Fuller, Holy State, p. 137.

Habitual. adj. Customary; accustomed; established by frequent repetition; inveterate.

Sin, there in power before
Once actual; now in body, and to dwell
Habitual habitant. Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 384.
Art is properly an habitual knowledge of certain rules and maxims.—South, Sermons.
'Tis impossible to become an able artist, without making your art habitual to you.—Dryden.

Habituato. v. a. Accustom; use one's self by frequent repetition: (with to).

Many nobles and gentlemen, disdaining all subjection to a foreign and conquering power, retired into Scotland, Ireland, Denmark; and after the extinction of their hopes, by the suppression of all endeavours in favour of Edgar's right, never returned, but left their families habituato in those countries, choosing if they must live under a foreign dominion, to do it rather abroad, than at home.—Sir W. Temple, In- stitution to the History of England, ii. 304. (Ord

M.)

Men are first corrupted by bad counsel and company, and next they habituato themselves to their vicious practices.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Such as live in a weaker air are habituato to the excesses of a greater muscular strength.—Arbuth-
not.

Habituato. adj. Inveterate; obstinate.
Rare.

The conditions of men's bodies may be either native or habituato.—Sir W. Temple, Of Agreeable Virtues, we. ii. (Ord M.)
All earthly vanities, which any habituato sinner desires.—Hammond, Works, iv. 679.

Habitude. s.
1. Relation; respect; state with regard to something else.

The will of God is like a straight unalterable rule;
but the various comportments of the creature, either thwarting this rule, or holding conformity to it, occasion several habitudes of this rule unto it.—Sir
M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

It results from the very nature of things, as they stand in such a certain habitude, or relation to one another.—South, Sermons.
As by the objective part of perfect happiness we understand that which is best and last, and to which all other things are to be referred; so by the formal part must be understood the best and last habitude of man toward that best object. Norris.
In all the habitudes of life
The friend, the mistress, and the wife;
Variety we still pursue. Swift.

2. Familiarity; converse; frequent intercourse.

His knowledge in the noblest useful arts,
Was such dead authors could not give;
But habituato with those who live. Dryden.

3. Long custom; habit; inveterate use:
(more properly habit).

Mankind is willing to continue in a phrasing error, strengthened by a long habitude.—Dryden.

Thy ear, inured to charitable sounds,
And pitying love, must feel the hateful wounds
Of just obscene, and vulgar rivalry,
The ill-bred question, and the loud reply,
Brought by long habitude from bad to worse;
Must hear the frequent oath, the dirful curse,
Prior, Henry and Emma.

4. Power of doing anything acquired by frequent repetition.

It is impossible to gain an exact habitude, without an infinite number of acts and perpetual practice.—
Dryden.

Habile. adj. [Lat. habilis.] Fit; apt.

As hagar haake, presuming to contend
With hardy fowls above his habile might.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, l. 11, 10.

Habnab. adv. [hap n hup.] At random;
at the mercy of chance; without any rule or certainty of effect.

Philautus determined, habnab, to send his letters.
—Lilly, Epistles, p. 103.
As they came in by habnab, so will I bring them in a reckoning at six and at seven.—Haywood, Fair
Maid of the West.

He circles draws and squares,
With cyphers, astral characters;
Then looks 'em o'er to understand 'em,
Although set down habnab at random.
Buller, Hadibras.

Hack. v. a. [Dutch, hacken.]

1. Cut into small pieces; chop; cut slightly with frequent blows; mangle with unskilful blows.

He put on that armour, whereof there was no one piece wanting, though hacked in some places, be-wraying some flight not long since passed.—Sir P.
Sidney.

What a slave art thou, to hack thy sword as thou last dost, and say it was in fight!—Shakespeare,
Henry IV. Part I. ii. 4.

Richard the second here was hack'd to death.—
Id., Richard II. iii. 2.

But f're with butchers plac'd their priestly stall,
Mock modern faith to murder, hack, and mawl.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 289.

She had the ransacking of the wardrobes of the two defunct ladies, and cut and hacked their posthu-mous flimsy so as to suit her own tastes and figure.
—Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

The partition planned at Leo was therefore the very opposite of the partition of Poland. The partition of Poland was the partition of a nation. It was such a partition as is effected by hacking a living man limb from limb. The partition planned at Leo was the partition of an ill governed empire which was not a nation.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxiv.

2. Speak unready, or with hesitation.
Dismarm them, and let them question; let them 1117

keep their limbs whole, and hack our English.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 1.

Hack. s.

1. Notch; hollow cut.

Look you, what hacks are on his helmet.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

2. Hesitating or faltering speech.

His speaks to this very question with so many hacks and hesitations.—Dr. H. More, Mystery of Guiltiness, p. 270: 1800.

3. Pickaxe; mattock with one end only, and that a broad one.

Hack. s. Short for Hackney.

I am almost suffocated with dust every summer, occasioned by those crowds of practice-boys, who are whipping their hired hacks to death.—Moore.

Two men whose authority on such subjects was held in great esteem, the Duke of Newcastle and Sir John Fenwick, pronounced that the meanest hack ever imported from Tangier would produce a finer progeny than could be expected from the best sire of our native breed. They would not readily have believed that a time would come when the princes and nobles of neighbouring lands would be so eager to obtain horses from England as ever the English had been to obtain horses from Barbary.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. iii.

Johnson came among them the solitary specimen of a just age, the last survivor of the genuine race of Great Street hacks; the last of that generation of authors whose abject misery and whose dissolute manners had furnished inexhaustible matter to the satirical genius of Pope.—Id., Critical and Historical Essays, Croker's Edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Hack. adj. Short for Hackney.

Hack preachers employed in the service of de-faulters and absentees.—Wakefield, Memoirs.

Poor gentlemen! How many of them discoursed of the loves of Selim and Fatima in a cock-loft in Little Britain, their stern landlady having taken away the ladder till the manuscript was completed and the rent paid? How many of these worthy hack writers, scribbled about Haslemere and Grand Cairo for two guineas a sheet in their Fleet or Mint, or Great-street lodgings, the printer's boy dining in the corner?—Sala, The Secret of Muley Mogrebun Bey.

Hackle. v. a.

1. Dress flax.

2. Separate; tear asunder.

Other divisions of the kingdom being hackled and torn to pieces, and separated from all their habitual names.—Barke, Reflections on the Revolution in France.

Hackle. s. Comb for dressing flax.

Some layd to pledges
Their hatchet and their wedge,
Their hackle, and their rib,
Their rock, their spinning wheel.

Milton, Poems, p. 132.

Hackle. s. [?] In Angling. Feathers of the kind described in the first extract; artificial fly so called.

Hackles are a very important article in fly-making; they are the long slender feathers that hang from the head of a cock down his neck.—L. Walton, Complete Angler, ch. v.

We have also a hackle with a purple body, whipt about with a red capon's feather; as also a gold-twist hackle.—Cotton, Angler, ch. viii.

Hackney. s. [Fr. haquenee.]

1. Pacing horse; pud; nag.

He asked, whither with that horse I wolde gon;
And then I told him, it was myne own:
He said, I had stolen hym; and I sayd, naye:
This is, sayd he, my brother's hackney.

Old Morality of Hynde Scorne.

The fatness of the earth doth put in good liking the servicable steede and the miller's hackney.—Knight, Trial of Truth, fol. 12: 1590.

Imuge now to yourself this illustrious cavalier mounted on his hackney.—Bishop Warburton, Letters to Harcl, let. 30.

2. Hired horse; hired horses being usually taught to pace, or recommended as good pacers.

Light and lewd persons were as easily suborned to make an affidavit for money, as post-horses and hackneys are taken to hire.—Baron.

Who, mounted on a broom, the nag
And hackney of a Lapland hag,
In quest of you came hither post.

Butler, Hudibras.

3. Hiring; prostitute.

I labour,
I moid and toll for ye; I am your hackney.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Women Pleased.

She was so notoriously lewd, that she was called an hackney.—Bishop Burnet, History of the Reformation, vol. I. append.

Shall each spurrall'd hackney of the day,
Or each new pension'd sycophant, pretend
To break my windows?

Pope.

Hackney. adj.

1. Worn out, like a hired horse.

Law, like a horse-courier;
Her rules and precepts hung with gawds and rib-bands,
And pamper'd up to earn him that bought her,
When she herself was hackney, lame, and foundered.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Women Pleased.

2. Prostitute; vicious for hire.

Three kingdoms ring
With his accumulative and hackney tongue.
Lord Boscawen.

That is no more than every low
Does from his hackney lady suffer.

Butler, Hudibras.

3. Much used; common; let out for hire.

Slightly trained up in a kind of hypocritical and hackney course of literature.—Milton, Essay of Church Government argued against Priory, b. d.

These notions young students in physics derive from their hackney authors.—Horrey.

After revolving many things in my mind, I could see no other possibility of furnishing myself with the miserable necessities of life, than to retire to a garret near the Temple, and commence hackney writer to the lawyers, for which I was well qualified, being an excellent penman.—Fighting, Adventures of Joseph Andrews.

Hence are a thousand hackney writers fed,
Hence monthly critics earn their daily bread.

Churchill, The Apology.

In the following the word is either the element of a compound, or has a substantival rather than a purely adjectival construction.

By this reckoning, a hackneyman
Should have ten shillings for horsing a gentlewoman.

Where he hath but ten pence of a beggar.

Tragedy of Solomon and Perseda: 1600.

The sweat of learned Jonson's brain,
Or gentle Shakspeare's tender strain,
A hackney coach conveys you to,
In spite of all that rain can do;

And for your eighteen pence you sit
The lord and judge of all fresh wit.

Sir J. Suckling.

A wit can study in the streets...

Not quite so well, however, as one ought;

A hackney coach may chance to spoil a thought.

Pope, Judgment of Horace.

The hackney-coachmen, chairmen, and porters, are the lovers of the hawkier women, fruit-sellers, and milkmaids.—Garrigue, no. 87.

Fielching has really a fund of true humour, and was to be pitied at his first entrance into the world, having no choice, as he said himself, but to be a hackney writer, or a hackney-coachman.—Lady M. W. Montague, Letters.

I went to the door in my own hackney coach.
Goldsmith, Maunch of Vanion.

Hackney. v. a.

1. Practise in one thing; accustom as to the road.

No common hackney'd in the eyes of men.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 2.

2. Carry in a hackney coach.

To her, who, frugal only that her thrift
May feel excesses she can ill afford,
Is hackney'd home unobsequy'd.

Cowper, Task, b. ii.

Hackneyed. part. adj. Worn.

And yet, perchance, the wiser to prefer
A hackney'd plot, than choose a new, and err;
Yet copy not too closely, but record,
More justly, thought for thought than word for word;

Nor trace your prototype through narrow ways,
But only follow where he merits praise.

Byron,Hints from Horace.

Hackster. s. Slasher; squash-buckler; bully; bravo; ruffian.

If some such desperate hackster shall devise
To rouse thine hard-heart from her cowardice.

Bishop Hall, Satire, iv. 4.

Elfrith, second wife to king Edgar, having contrived the death of Edward her son-in-law, murdered him by a company of hacksters and villains, at her appointment at Corfe Castle.—Fuller, Church History, p. 295.

Happy times, when braves and hacksters, the only contented members of his government, were thought the fittest and the faithfullest to defend his person!—Milton, Riconocles, iii.

Hackston. s. [Fr.] Quilted jacket worn under armour.

You may see the very fashion of the Irish horseman in his long hose, riding shoes of costly cordwain, his hackston, and his habersoon.—Spenner, View of the State of Ireland.

But th' other did upon his truncheon smyte
Which hewing quite asunder, farther way
It unke, and on his hagston did lybe,
The which dividing with importune sway
It steeled in his right side, and there the dint did stay.

Id., Murie Queen, il. 8, 39.
[The Black Prince's hagston, composed of quilted cotton, is suspended over his tomb in Canterbury cathedral.—Todd.]

Hadden. s. Heath.

They lay upon the ground covered with skins, as the redskins do on hadden.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 630.

Haddock. s. [Fr. hadot.] Fish of the cod family (Gadidae) so called.

The coast is plentifully stored with pilchards, herrings, and haddocks.—Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

Hade. s. In Mining. Steep descent of a shaft; descent, slope, or declivity in general.

On the lower less, as on the higher hades,
The daintie clover grows.

Dryden, Polydorian, song 13.

Had-i-wist. Combination of three words, rather than a compound, implying vain afterthoughts: (Oh! that I had known).

This blindness is not of the eyes alone,
But of the mind a dunness and a mist:
For when they shift to sit in haughty throne
With hope to rule the scepter as they list,
There's no regard nor fear of had-i-wist.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 160.
Cauley, Remains.

Haft. s. [A.S. haft.] Part of any instrument that is taken into the hand, or by which it is held; handle.

This brandish'd dagger
I'll bury to the haft in her fair breast.

Dryden and Lee, Oedipus.

A needle is a simple body, being only made of steel; but a sword is a compound, because its haft or handle is made of materials different from the blade.—Watts, Logic.

Hag. s. [A.S. hegyes, hageste, hagtes; German, hexe—witch.]

1. Witch.

The very dregs of miracles, in milkpans and grussy dishes, by Robinsodell-fellow, and hags, and fayries, all—might somewhat for the—Id. superstitions. Deating, On the Epistle to the Hebrews ch. ii: 1570.

Out of my door, you witch! you hag, you hag-gaze, you polemic, you ruminant.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 2.

2. Female monster.

Thus spoke th' impatient prince, and made a pause;
His foul hags raised their howls, and clapt their hands:

And all the powers of hell, in full applause,
Flourish'd their snakes, and tost their flaming brands.

Crusoe.

3. Ugly old woman.

There follow'd fast at hand two wicked hags,
With hoary locks all loose, and visage grim.

Spenner, Murie Queen.

Such affections may become the young;

But thou, old hag, of threescore years and three,

Is shewing of thy parts in Greek for thee? Dryden.

4. Appearances of light and fire upon the manes of horses, or men's hair, were formerly called hags.

Hags are said to be made of sweat or some other vapour issuing out of the head; a not unusual sight among us when we ride by night in summer time.—Blount, Glossographia.

Hag. v. a. Harass with vain terror.

That makes them in the dark see visions,
And hag themselves with apparitions.

Butler, Hudibras.

How are superstitious men hagged out of their wits with the fancy of omens, tales, and visions!—Sir R. L. Estrange.

Haggard. adj. [Fr. hagard.]

1. Wild; untamed; difficult to be reclaimed.

As haggard hawk, presuming to contend
With hardy fowl, above his hable might,
His weary pounce all in vain doth spend,
To truss the prey too heavy for his flight.

Spenner, Murie Queen.

Virtue sitteth over the names of her servants, bovearth over them with her wings, and guards them from the kites and buzzards of this haggard age.—Staford, Nibbe, pt. ii. p. 78.

In time, all haggard hawks will stop to hure.

Kyd, Spanish Tragedy.

2. Having an expression of being worn by distress, anxiety, or watchfulness.

Fearful besides of what in fight had pass'd,
His hands and haggard eyes to heav'n he cast.

Dryden.

Where are the conscious looks, the face now pale,
Now flushing red, the down-cast haggard eyes,
Or fast on earth, or slowly rain'd? Smith.

Haggard. s.

1. Anything wild or irreclaimable.

I will be married to a wealthy widow,
Three days hence, which has as long lov'd me
As I have lov'd this proud disdainful haggard.
Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, iv. 2.

2. Species of hawk.

She's too disdainful;
I know her spirits are as any and wild,
As haggards of the rock.
Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 1.
Does the wild haggard tow'r into the sky,
And to the south by thy direction fly?
I enlarge my discourse to the observation of the series, the brancher, the ramish hawk, and the haggard.—J. Walton, Complete Angler.

3. Hag.

Beneath the gloomy covert of an yew,
In a dark grove, the baleful haggard lay,
Breathing black vengeance, and infecting day.
Garth.

Haggard. s. Stack-yard.

When the barn was full, any one might thrash in the haggard.—Hoswell, Letters, ii. 21: 1652.
The remainder of the powder was committed to a vault in the haggard under the corn-stand.—
Bishop of Killadea's Narrative, p. 40.

Haggardly. adv. In a haggard manner;
deformedly; uglily.

For him the rich Arabia sweats her gum;
And precious oils from distant India come;
How haggardly now she looks at home.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Haggd. adj. ? Haggard; ? haglike.

A haggd carrion of a wolf, and a jolly sort of dog with good flesh upon his back, fell into company together.—Sir R. L. Estlin.
The ghastly prudes with haggd face
Already had condemn'd the mimic.
Gray, Long Story.

Haggish. adj. Of it: nature of a hag; deformed; horrid.

But on us both did haggish age steal on,
And wore us out of act.
Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, i. 2.

Haggie. v. a. Cut; chop; mangle: (always in a bad sense).

Suffolk first died, and York all haggled o'er
Comes to him where in force he lay under o'er.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 6.
Haggie. v. n. Be tedious in a bargain; be long in coming to the price.
Phoo! how she stands biting her nails,
As if she play'd for half her vails,
Sorting her cards, haggling, and picking!
Shendons.

I never could drive a hard bargain in my life, concerning any matter whatever; and least of all do I know how to haggle and huckster with merit.
—Burke.

Hagiographa. s. [Gr. ἅγιος = holy, and γράφω = write.] Certain compositions which formed the last of the three primary divisions into which, in the time of St. Jerome, the Jews distributed the books of the Old Testament: (for details see extract).

Eight [of the translators of the Bible.] assembled at Cambridge, were to finish the rest of the historical books, and the hagiographa.—A rabbinical Newcome, On the Translation of the Bible, p. 49.

These are the five books of Moses which they call Torah, that is, the Law. The second class contains the propheta, and they begin from . . . Jesus, the son of Nave, who with them is called Josue Ben Nun. . . . The third class is that of the Hagiographa, the first of which is Job; the second David; . . . the third Solomon; . . . the fourth Ecclesiastes; . . . the fifth the Song of Songs; . . . the sixth is Daniel; . . .
the seventh . . . the Chronicle; . . . the eighth Ezra;
the ninth Esther. Thus, in all there are twenty-two books of the old law; that is, five books of Moses, eight of the propheta, and nine of the Hagigrapha.—Translation from St. Jerome (Hieronymus) Prologus Galatius in Hieron. Introduction to the Critical Study and Knowledge of the Holy Scriptures.

Hagiographical. adj. Denoting, connected with, constituted by, or related to, the writings called Hagiographa.

Strabus . . . writing upon St. Jerome's prologues, there placed before the Old Testament, wherein, according to the copies then in use, the book of Tobit is said to be separated from the Divine Scriptures and numbered among the hagiographa; he indeed fault with the transcribers, and saith, that Tobit is to be set among the apocryphal books, and not among the hagiographa, properly so called; . . .

whereof there be but nine, the whole number of the canonical books being no more than twenty-two in all.—Bishop Cosin, Canon of Scripture, p. 162.

Hagiographer. s. Writer of, or in, a hagiography.

They were hagiographers, who are supposed to be left to the use of their own words.—Whitby, General Preface to the New Testament.

Hagiology. s. [Gr. λόγος = word.] Biography of saints.

The Greek Menologies, . . . in the puerility and trivialness of their wonders, . . . even surpass the Western Hagiologies. Milman, History of Latin Christianity, ii. xiv. ch. ii.

Hagship. s. Title of a witch or hag; state of a hag.

What's this? Oh, 'tis the charm her hagship gave me. Middleton, The Witch.

Hah. interject. An expression of sudden effort.

Her coats tuck'd up, and all her motions just,
She stamps, and then cries hah! at every thrust.
Tristram, Translation of Juvenal.

Hail. s. [A.S. hægol, hægel, hægl.] Drops of rain frozen in their falling.

With strange rains, hails, and showers, were they persecuted.—Winkler, xvi. 16.
When this hail would heat from Herminia felt,
So he dissolved, and showers of oaths did melt.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, i. 1.

Thunder mix'd with hail,
Hail mix'd with fire, must rend the Egyptian sky.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 181.

Hail. v. n. Fall as hail.

My people shall dwell in a peaceable habitation when it shall hail, coming down on the forest. —
Isaiah, xxxii. 19.

Hail. v. a. Pour or shed as hail.

For, ere Demetrius look'd on Herminia's eye,
He hail'd down oaths, that he was only mine.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, i. 1.

Hail. interj. See Hal!

Hail, hail, brave friend!
Say to the king the knowledge of the hail.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 2.

Her sick head is bound about with clouds:
It does not look as it would have a hail
Or health wish'd in it, as on other morns.
B. Jonson.

The angel hail
Bestow'd, the holy salutation we'd Long after to blest Mary, second Eve.
Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 336.

Peace-well, happy fields,
Where joy for ever dwells; hail, horrors! hail,
Infernal world! and thou, profoundest hell,
Receive thy new possessor! Ibid. i. 249.

All hail, he cry'd, thy country's grace and love,
Once first of men below, now first of birds above.
Dryden.

Hail. v. a. Salute; call to.

A gallery drawing near unto the shore, was hail'd
by a Turk, accompanied with a troop of horsemen.
—Kneller, History of the Turks.
Thrice call upon my name, thrice beat your breast,
And hail me thrice to everlasting rest.
Dryden.

Hail-fellow. s. Companion: (two words rather than a compound, the result being an imperative or interjectional combination; well met being often added).

No man, that erst hail'd fellow was with beast,
Woke on to woe himself a god at least.
Bishop Hall, Satires, iii. 1.
All these agree with him in blindness and darkness; yea, they are all hail-fellow well met! —Junius, Sin Stigmatized, p. 111.

I thought all people here had been hail fellow well met.—Sir R. L. Estlin, Translation of Quetzaco,
p. 46.

tleman and the clown are upon the square with one another.—Goodman, Winter Evening's Conference, pt. i.

Hailstone. s. Particle or single ball of hail.

They were more which died with hailstones, than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword.—Jeremiah, x. 11.
You are no surer, no,
Than is the coal of fire upon the ice,
Or hailstone in the sun.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, i. 1.

Hard hailstones lie not thicker on the plain,
Nor shaken oaks such show'rs of acorns rain.
Dryden.

Haily. adj. Consisting of hail; full of hail.

From whose dark womb a rattling tempest pours,
Which the cold North conveys to haily showers.
Pope.

Hair. s. [A.S. hær.]

1. Covering of certain parts of the skin of men and quadrupeds (mammalia) so called.

My fleece of woolly hair that now uncurls.

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, ii. 3.
Shall the difference of hair only, on the skin, be a mark of a different internal constitution between a changeling and a drill? —Locke.

[Hair] is to be found upon all the parts of the body, except the sides of the feet and palms of the hands. When we examine the hairs with a microscope, we find that they have a round bulbous root, which lies pretty deep in the skin, and which draws their nourishment from the surrounding humours; that each hair consists of five or six others, wrapt up in a common tunic or tube. They grow as the nails do, each part near the root thrusting forward that which is immediately above it, and not by any liquor running along the hair in tubes, as plants grow. —Quincy.

2. Single hair.

Naughty lady,
These hairs which thou dost ravish from my chin,
Will quicken and accuse thee.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 7.

Much is breeding;
Which, like the courser's hair, hath yet but life,
And not a serpent's poison.
Id., Antony and Cleopatra, i. 2.

3. Anything proverbially small.

If thou tak'st more
Or less than just a pound; if the scale turn
But in the estimation of a hair.
Thou diest. —Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

His judicious to a hair of little inconvenience, and knows better than any man what is not to be written.—Dryden.

If I could but calculate the precise date of his death, I would write a novel on purpose to make George the hero. I could hit him off to a hair.—
Lamb, Letter to Coleridge.

4. Course; order; grain; hair falling in a certain direction.

He is a curve of souls, and you a curve of bodies;
if you should fight, you go against the hair of your profession.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor,
ii. 3.

Hairbrained. adj. Wild; irregular; unsteady.

Let's leave this town; for they are hairbrained slaves,
And hunger will enforce them be more eager.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. i. 1.

Hairbreadth (also Hairbreadth, which latter is often two words). s. Very small distance; diameter of a hair.

Seven hundred chosen men left-handed could sling stones at an hairbreadth, and not miss.—
Julius, xx. 16.

Used adjectivally.

I spoke of most disastrous chances,
Of moving accidents by flood and field;
Of hairbreadth 'scapes in th' imminent deadly breach.
Shakespeare, Othello, i. 3.

At length however Eumenes himself, after an unsuccessful attempt to escape into Armenia, seeing his ranks thinned by frequent desertions, thought it best to put an end to this life of perpetual wandering, fatigue, and hairbreadth escapes, which could lead to no useful result, and he recommended to the greater part of his men to return to their homes, and wait for better times.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. liii.

Haireloth. s. Stuff made of hair, very rough and prickly, worn sometimes in mortification.

It is composed of reeds and parts of plants woven together, like a piece of haircloth.—Grew, Hypothesis.

Haired. adj. Having hair: (thus we say,
'A red-haired man').

A beast, haired like a bear.
Purchas's Pilgrimage, p. 708: 1617.

Hairhung. adj. Hanging by a hair: (in the extract with accent on the last syllable).

Man, whose fate,
Fate irreversible, entire, extreme,
Endless, hair-hung, breeze-shaken, o'er the gulf
A moment trembles.
Pope, Night Thoughts.

Hairiness. s. Attribute suggested by Hairy.

To discover the inequalities, ribs, and hairiness of the skin.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, ii. 9.

Hairlace. s. Fillet with which women tie up their hair.

Some worms are commonly resembled to a woman's hairlace or fillet, thence called tooth.—Harvey.

If Molly happens to be careless,
And but neglects to warm her hairlace,
She gets a cold as sure as death.
Swift.

Hairless. adj. Wanting hair.

White beards have arm'd their thin and hairless scalps
Against thy majesty.
Shakespeare, Richard II. iii. 2.

HAIRNEEDLE } HAIR

To see an old shorne lozel perched high,
Crouching beneath a golden canopy;
The while a thousand hairless crowns crouch low
To kiss the precious case of his proud toe.
Bishop Hall, Satires, iv. 7.

Hairneedle. s. See Hairpin.

Hairpin. s. See extract.
Hairneedle or hairpin [was] formerly an instrument for torturing the hair; the latter within our own memory; the former very ancient. Saxon hær-nædle, calamistrum, i. e. an iron to curl the hair. The modern hairpin kept the hair in certain fanciful shapes by being stuck through the plaster of powder and pomatum most plentifully bestowed upon it.—Tuchl, in voc.

Hairy. adj.

Draw forth to combat on the velvet plain.

Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iii.

Halberdier. s. One who is armed with a halberd.

The duchess appointed him a guard of thirty halberdiers, in a livery of murrey and blue, to attend his person.—Bacon.

Captain, for so I show thee by thy arms
And the loose flanks of halberdiers about thee.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Noble Gentleman.
The king had only his halberdiers, and fewer of them than used to go with him.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

Halcyon. s. [Lat. halcyo, from Gr. ἀλκυών and ἀλκυή.] Bird, of which it is said that she breeds in the sea, and that there is always a calm during her incubation. See Kingfisher.

Amidst our arms as quiet you shall be,
As halcyons brooding on a winter sea.

Dryden.

Used adjectively.
Such sniffling rogues, as these . . . sooth ev'ry passion;
Bring oil to fire, snow to their colder moods
Revive, affirm, and turn their halcyon beaks
With ev'ry gale and vary of their masters.

Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

Halcyon. adj. Placid; quiet; still; peaceful.

When great Augustus made war's tempest cease,
His halcyon days brought forth the arts of peace.

Sir J. Denham.
No man can expect eternal serenity and halcyon days from so incompetent and partial a cause, as the constant course of the sun in the equinoctial circle.—Bentley.

Halcyonian. adj. Same as Halcyon.

Thence our halcyonian times of peace and prosperity.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 179: 1816.

In itself indifferent, if he should with blows be Haled to it when he had no mind?—Locke.

In all the tumults at Rome, though the people Proceeded sometimes to pull and hale one another about, yet no blood was drawn till the time of the Gracchi.—Swift.

Half. s. pl. halves. [A.S. healf.] One of two equal parts.

An half-acre of land.—1 Samuel, xiv. 14.
Many might go to heaven with half the labour they go to hell, if they would venture their industry the right way.—B. Jonson.

Well chosen friendship, the most noble
Of virtues, all our joys makes double,
And into halves divides our trouble.

Sir J. Denham.
(Or what but riches is there known
Which man can solely call his own;
In which no creature goes his half,
Unless it be to squint and laugh?) Butler, Hudibras.

No mortal tongue can half the beauty tell;
For none but hands divine could work so well.

Dryden.
Of our manufacture foreign markets took all one half, and the other half were consumed amongst ourselves.—Locke.

The council is made up half out of the noble families, and half out of the plebeian.—Addison,
Travels in Italy.

Her beauty, in thy softer half
Bury'd and lost, who ought to grieve.

Prior.
Natural was it for a prince, who had proposed to himself the empire of the world, not to neglect the sea, the half of his dominions.—Arbuthnot.

Had the land selected of the best,
Half had come hence, and let the world provide the rest.

Dryden.

Half. adv.

1. In part; equally.
I go with love and fortune, two blind guides,
To lead my way; half-lost, and half consenting.

Dryden.

face; small faced. Contemptuous.

Proud incroaching tyranny
Burns with revenging fire, whose hopeful colours
Advance, a half-faced sun striving to shine.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 1.
This same half-faced fellow, Shadow; give me this man: he presents no mark to the enemy; the foeman may with as great aim level at the edge of a penknife.—Id. Henry VI. Part II. iii. 2.

Half-penny. s. Copper coin so called, of half the value of a penny.

Bardolph stole a lute-case, bore it twelve leagues,
and sold it for three half-pence.—Shakespeare,
Henry V. iii. 2.

HALI

He cheats for half-pence, and he doth his craft
To save a farthing in a ferryboat.

Dryden.
Never admit this pernicious coin, no not so much as one single half-penny.—Swift.

You will wonder how Wood could get his majesty's broad seal for so great a sum of bad money, and that the nobility here could not obtain the same favour, and make our own half-pence as we used to do.—Id.

Used adjectively.

There shall be in England seven half-penny leaves sold for a penny; the three-hooped pot shall have ten hoops, and I will make it felony to drink small beer.—Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 2.

Half-pennyworth. s. Worth of a half-penny.

O monstrous! but one half-pennyworth of bread

The various ways of paying the salute with the half-pike.—Trotter.

Half-read. adj. Superficially skilled by reading.

The clown unread, and half-read gentleman.
Dryden, Hind and Panther.

Half-strained. adj. Half-bred; imperfect.
I find I'm but a half-strained villain yet,
But mungrel-mischievous; for my blood bolls'd
To view this brutal act.

Dryden.

Half-sword. s. Close fight; within half the length of a sword.

I am a rogue, if I were not at half-sword with a dozen of them two hours together.—Shakespeare,
Henry IV. Part I. ii. 4.

Half-wit. s. Blockhead; foolish fellow.
Half-wits are fools, so little and so light,
We scarce could know they live, but that they bite.

Dryden.

Half-witted. adj. Imperfectly furnished with understanding.

I would rather have trusted the refinement of our language, as to sound, to the judgement of the women than of half-witted poets.—Swift.

Jack had passed for a poor, well-meaning, half- witted, crack-brained fellow; people were strangely surprised to find him in such a roguesy.—A. B. Hall,
History of John Bull.

Halves. adj. Wanting half its due qualities

halliers or halliers.—Holinshed, Description of England, c. iii. Rich.

hallimote. s. See extract.

Hallimote, or Hallimote, [is] that court among the Saxons which we now call a court-baron; and the etymology is from the meeting of the tenants of one hall or manor. The name is still kept up in several places in Herefordshire. . . . It hath been sometime taken for a convention of citizens in their public hall where they hold their courts, and which was also called folimote and hallimote; but the word hallimote is rather the lord's court held within the manor, in which the differences between the tenants were decided.—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

halloo. interj. [Fr. haller.] Word of encouragement when dogs are let loose on their game.

Some popular chief,
More noisy than the rest, but cries halloo,
And, in a trice, the bellowing herd come out.
Dryden.

halloo. v. n. [Fr. haller.]

Amidst the brakes and furz.
B. Jon Ma Tick Lull.

halloo. v. a. [A.S. halgian.] Consecrate; make holy.

Let Cade think I have slain, that monstrous traitor?
Sword, I will halloo thee for this thy deed,
And hang thee o'er my tomb, when I am dead.
Shakespeare, Henry VI, Part II, v. 10.

When we sanctify or halloo churches, it is only to signify that we make them places of public remory; that we invest God himself with them, and that we sever them from common uses.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

halloved. part. adj. Made holy.

Then banish'd faith shall once again return,
And vestal fires in halloved temples burn. Dryden.
No satey larks within this halloved ground;
But nymphs and heroines, kings and gods abound.
Girarde.

hallovmass. s. Day of All Hallows, or

All Saints, i. e. first day of November.
She came adorned hither like sweet May,
Sent back like Hallovmas, or short-st of day.
Shakespeare, Richard II, v. 1.

One of the cross quarters of the year put in ancient writing on Hallovmas to Candlemas.—Court.

hallucination. s. [Lat. hallucinatio, -onis.]

Mental illusion. For its special import in Psychology or Mental Pathology, see last extract.

A wasting of flesh, without any frequently terminal or hereditary disease; but unquestionably a hallucination of the vulgar. Harvey.

This must have been the hallucination of the transcriber, who probably mistook the dash of the I for a T. Addison.

False perceptions, without disease of the organs of sense, . . . have been called illusions by some,
and hallucinations by others. M. Esquirol proposes to confine the latter term to them; and he since then to be . . . at a when there are no appropriate external objects to excite them in the organs of sense. . . . Darwin supposes that hallucinations proceed from inflammation of the . . . of the nerves of sensation; and
M. Es . . . says that 'the false . . . of the produced by the . . . and ideas resulting, and personified by habit. A person in such a state converts the product of the understanding into a corporeal form; he dreams while he is awake;

but in those who dream the ideas which were entertained while awake continue during sleep, whilst he who is in a delirium perfects his dream when waking.
... of hallucinations, they are lively or sad, capable of inspiring sentiments of benevolence, or of arming the hand of the maniac with an instrument of homicide. Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

halo. s. [Fr. halo; Gr. álos.] Circle like the fringe of light which may often be seen round the margin of the moon, especially when . . . luminous circle in general;

glory as that round the head of the Saviour.

If the hail be a little flatted, the light transmitted may grow so dense, as a little less distance than that of twenty-six degrees, as to form a halo about the sun or moon; which halo, as often as the hailstones are duly cleared, may be coloured. Sir J. Newton.

I saw by reflection, in a vessel of stagnating water, three halos, crowns or rings of colours about the sun, like three little rainbows, concentrick to his body.—Id.

haloid. adj. [Gr. hálō = salt + ídō = form.]

Saltlike in the chemical sense of the word salt.

A fourth order of salts has been formed by Berzelius, comprising for the most part bi-elementary compounds which consist of a metal on one hand, and of chlorine, iodine, bromine, fluorine, and the radicals of the hydracids on the other. . . .
The reader will at once perceive that these haloid salts, as bi-elementary compounds, differ in com-7 D

position from other salts, and are analogous to oxides and sulphurets. But their characters are essentially those of the oxygen salts. Thus chloride of sodium, or sea-salt, is very similar in its properties to sulphate or nitrate of soda. Indeed, the common term salt is taken from sea-salt.—Turner, Elements of Chemistry, p. 267; 1847.

halse. s. [A.S. heals.] Neck. Obsolete.

Many a truer man than he has hanged up by the halse.—Günther Garton's Nettle. (Nares by H. & W.)

halse. v. a. Embrace.

Each other kissed and
And lovely halsed, from fears of treason free,
And plighted hands, for ever friends to be.
Spenser, Rhymer Queen, iv. 3, 19.
Now will ye hear an ancient tale of old Bohemian lay.

It was a noble morning in wedding-bed he lay,
He halsed and kissed his loving wife, that was as sweet as May,
And said 'Now, darling of my heart, attend the works I say.'
Sir W. Scott, Ballad of the Noble Mornington.

halster. s. [Lat. heliciarius.] Drawer. Ob- solete.

Heliciarius, a halster, or he which leath and draweth a ship or barge along the river by a rope; also he that draweth up burthens and packes into the ship. Nomenclator: 1653. (Nares by H. and W.)

halt. v. n. [A.S. healt.]

1. Limp; be lame.

And will she yet delude her eyes
On me, that halt and am misshapen thus?
Shakespeare, Richard III, i. 2.
Spenser himself affects the obsolete,
And Sidney's verse halts ill on Romain feet
Pope, Epistle to an Old Woman.

2. Stop in a march.

I was forced to halt in this perpendicular march.
—Addison.
On the road he [Emmeline] was seized with illness, the effect, it is said, of unusual intemperance at a banquet which he gave, as if to vie with Priam; he was obliged to halt for some days, in great danger, and continued so weak that he let himself be carried in a litter in the rear, while Priam and Antigone commended in his stead. Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lviii.

3. Hesitate; stand dubious; fail; falter.

How long halt ye between two opinions?—Kings, xviii. 21.

halt. adj. Lame; crippled.

Bring in hither the poor, the maimed, the halt, and the blind. Luke, xiv. 12.

halt. s. [Fr. as in fairhalt = stop (make a stoppage) in march.] Stop in a march.

Down from a sky of Jasper lighted glow
In Paradise, and on a hill made halt.
Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 264.

Scouts each coast light armed secure,
Each quarter, to descry the distant foe,
Where lodged, or whether lost, or if for light
In motion, or in halt. Id. vi. 529.

Without any halt they marched between the two armies.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

He might have made a halt till his foot and artillery came up to him. Id.

Two months were spent in the march from Ora to Pura, the capital of Gedrosia. The time seems great, compared with the direct distance, especially as the army was often forced to make very long marches from one station to another, and we hear of none but the ordinary halts. Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. li.

halter. s. One who halts.

These halters between two religions think they ... do their homage to the true God and to the false.—Stokes, On the Prophecy, p. 412; 1659.

halter. s. [German, halfter, halster, halter.]

Rope for special purposes.

a. Tethering, or confining, an animal.

Whom neither halter binds nor burthens chace.
Saunders.

b. For hanging malefactors.

He's fled, my lord, and all his pow'rs do yield;
And humbly thus, with halters on their necks,
Expect your highness' doom of life or death.
Shakespeare, Henry VI, Part II, iv. 3.

They were to die by the sword if they stood upon defence, and by the halter if they yielded; wherefore they made choice to die rather as soldiers than as dogs.—Sir J. Heyward.

Were I a drowsy judge, whose dismal note
Disgorgeth halters, as a juggler's throat
Doth ribanda. Clarendon.

He gets renown, who, to the halter near,
But narrowly escapes, and buys it dear.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

halter. v. a. Bind, tie, or catch, with a halter.

HALTING & HALT

Some that are tall, and some that are dwarf,
Some that are halter'd, and some that wear scarfs.
He might have employed his time in the frivolous delights of catching moles and haltering frogs.—
Bishop Atterbury.

Halting. part. adj. Limping; lagging;
stopping.

Here's a paper written in his hand;
A halting sunset of his own pure brain,
Fashion'd to Beatrice.

Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, v. 4.
Thus hibern broils the factions would engage,
Or wars of exile's heirs, or foreign rage,
Till halting vengeance overtook our age. Dryden.

Halting. verbal abs. Act of one who halts;
stopping.

All my familiars watched for my halting, saying, Peradventure he will be enticed, and we shall prevail against him.—Jeremiah, xz. 10.

Halve. v. a. Divide into two parts.

Our N cholas, for I account him at least halft between us, tells me that you have good means to know when — will be in town.—Sir H. Watton, Letters, Kennel, p. 37: 1638.

Then, says he, the moon has strength enough;
and is not yet halft.—*Stukely, Palaeographia Sa-

Halver. s. One who halves, i.e. divides into half, or possesses half, of anything.

It would be more pleasing unto thee, and commendable with men, if thyself and such halvers in opinion, "omnium horum homines" for your private ends, would openly avow what covertly you conceal.—Bishop Montague, Appeal to Caesar,
p. 142.

Halves. interj. Expression by which anyone lays claim to an equal share.

Have you not seen how the divided dam
Rains to the summons of her hungry lamb?
But when the twin cries halve, she quits the first.
Cleaveland.

And he, who sees you stoop to th' ground,
Cries, halve! to every thing you're found.
Dr. Savage, Horace to Secura, p. 32: 1730.

Halving. verbal abs. See extract.

Halving is a method of joining timbers by letting them into each other. It is preferable to mortising, even where the timbers do not pass into each other, as they are less liable to be displaced by shrinkage.—Gwill, Encyclopaedia of Architecture,
Glossary.

Halvyards. s. In Navigation. Ropes for hauling or heaving in the sails.

The halvyards and top bow-lines soon are gone.
Fletcher, Shipwreck, canto ii.

Halymote. s. See extract.

Halymote is properly a holy or ecclesiastical court:
but there is a court in London, formerly held on the Sunday next before St. Thomas's Day, called the halymote or holy court, Curia Sancti Thomae, for regulating the bakers of the city.—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

Ham. s. [A.S. ham.]

1. Hip: hinder part of the thigh.
The ham was much relaxed; but there was some contraction remaining.—Biscan.

2. Thigh of a hog salted.
Who does not burn'd, fresh sturgeon and ham pye
Are no rewards for labour and industry?
Pope, Institutions of Horace, b. ii. sat. 1.

Hamadryad. s. [Gr. ἡμαδρύς, aiōs; Lat.
hamadryas, -adis.] Wood nymph.

The common opinion concerning the nymphs, whom the ancients called hamadryades, is more to the honour of trees than any thing yet mentioned:
It was thought that the fate of these nymphs had so near a dependence on some trees, more especially oaks, that they lived and died together. Spectator,
no. 529.

The hamadryad or nymph, who must necessarily have perished with the tree, appeared to him the next day.—Ibid.

Hamate. adj. [Lat. hamatus, from hamus
= hook.] Entangled; twisted together.

To explain cohesion by hamate atoms is accounted "ignotum per ignotum."—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 227.

Hamble. v. a. [A.S. hamelan.] See extract.

[To] hamble [or] hammer [is] to render dogs unfit for hunting by cutting their feet.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Hambling. s. See extract.

Menclaw says hambling of dogs is quasi hama- bling; i.e. keeping at home by paring their feet, so that they cannot take delight in running abroad.
—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Hames. s. See Heam.

Hamlet. s. [Fr. hameau.] Small village.

HAMM

Within the self-same lordship, parish, or hamlet, lands have divers degrees of value.— Bacon.
He pitch'd upon the plain
His mighty camp, and when the day return'd,
The country wast'd and the hamlets burn'd.
Dryden.

Hamleted. adj. Countrified; accustomed only to a hamlet.

He is properly and pitiedly to be counted alone that is illiterate, and unactively lives hamleted in some untravelled village of the duller country.—
Kilham, Roscoe, ii. 40.

Hammer. s. [A.S. hamer.]

1. Instrument, consisting of a long handle and heavy head, with which anything is forged or driven.

The armoursers,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of protestation.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. chorus.

The stuff will not work well with a hammer.—
Bacon.

It is broken not without many blows, and will break the best anvils and hammers of iron.—Sir H.
Browne, Vulgar Errors.
Every morning he rises fresh to his hammer and his anvils.—South, Sermons.

The smith prepares his hammer for the stroke.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

2. Anything destructive.

That renowned pillar of truth, and hammer of heresies, St. Augustine.—Hakewill, Apology.

Hammer. v. a.

1. Beat with a hammer.

His bones the hammer'd steel in strength surpasses.
Sandys.

This christal here,
That shines so clear,
And carries in its womb a little day,
Once hammer'd will appear
Impure as dust, as dark as clay.
J. Hall, Poems, p. 57: 1650.

2. Forge or form with a hammer.

Some hammer helmets for the fighting field.
Dryden.

Druid'd like a smith, and on the anvil beat,
Till he had hammer'd out a vast estate. Id.

3. Work in the mind; contrive by intellectual labour.

Will thou still be hammering treachery,
To humble down thy husband and thyself?

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. i. 2.
He was nobody that could not hammer out of his name an invention by this witcraft, and picture it accordingly.—Camden.

Some spirits, by whom they were stirred and guided in the name of the people, hammer'd up the articles. Sir J. Hayward.

By this time Mr. Pryn's malice had hammer'd out something.—Archbishop Laud, History of his Trial, ch. xx.

Hammer. v. n.

1. Work; be busy.

Nor need'st thou much importune me to that,
Whereto this month I have been hammering.
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, i. 3.

I have been studying how to compare
This prison where I live unto the world;
And, for because the world is populous,
And here is not a creature but myself,
I cannot do it; yet I'll hammer it out.
Id., Richard II. v. 5.

2. Be in agitation.

Vengeance is in my heart, death in my hand;
Blood and revenge are hammering in my head.
Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, ii. 3.

Hammercloth. s. [The derivation as given in the extract is no longer admitted; the true import of hammer being that which it bears in the compound Yellow-hammer, as the name of a bird. It is from the A.S.
hama = skin.] Cloth, originally a skin, thrown over a coach-box. See extract.

Hammercloth [is] the cloth that covers a coach-box. The coachman formerly used to carry a ham- mer, pliers, a few nails, &c., in a leather pouch belonging to his box; and this cloth was used for the hiding or concealing of them from the public view.—Payge.

Hammerman. s. One who beats with a hammer at the forge.

Hard-handed and stiff ignorance, worthy a trowel or a hammerman.—B. Jonson, Mysterick Un-dert.

Hammoek. s. [Caribb. amucca.] Long net, suspended and swung; swinging bed.

Cotton for the making of hammoeks, which are Indian beds.—Sir W. Raleigh, Discovery of Guiana,
p. 32: 1596.
The Brazilians call their beds hammoeks; they are

HAMS

as a sheet laced at both ends; and so they sit rock-ing themselves in them.—Sir R. Hesketh, Observations on a Voyage to the South Sea, § 37.

The storm being over, they [Caribs] commonly set into their beds or hammoeks.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 6.

Prince Maurice of Nassau, who had been accustomed to hammoeks, used them all his life.—Sir W.
Temple.

Hamper. s. [Lat. hanaperium.] Large covered wicker basket.

Either as a spiritual food and victual in their tabernacles, ampers, hutchies; or as a mystic in their locked closets.—Sheldon, Miracles of Anti-christ, p. 255: 1616.

The Greek word, used by the translators, doth properly signify a hutch, or aspire to put victuals in, or a chest to lock treasures in.—Ibid. p. 263.

What powder'd wig! what flames and darts!
What hamper full of bleeding hearts! Swift.

Hamper. v. a.

1. Shackle; entangle, as in chains or nets.

O loose this frame, this knot of man untie!
That my free soul may use her wing,
Which now is pinion'd with mortality,
As an entangled, hamper'd thing. Herbert.
What was it but a lion hamper'd in a net!—Sir
R. B. Estrange.

Wear under visage-masks their talents,
And mother wit bestrut their gallants;
Until they're hamper'd in the nose,
Too fast to dream of breaking loose.

Butler, Hudibras.

They hamper and entangle our souls, and hinder their flight upwards.—Archbishop Tillotson.

But being now in the eleventh year of my residence, and, as I have said, my ammunition growing low, I set myself to study some art to trap and snare the guests, to see whether I could not catch some of them alive; and particularly, I wanted a she-cat great with young. For this purpose, I made narrow to hamper them; and I do believe they were more than once taken in them; but my tackle was not good for I had no wire, and I always found them broken, and my bait devoured. At length I resolv'd to try a pitfall.—Defoe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

2. Ensnare; inveigle; catch with allurements.

She'll hamper thee, and dandle thee like a baby.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. i. 3.

3. Perplex; embarrass by many hindrances and troubles.

And when th' are hamper'd by the laws,
Release the lab'ours for the cause.

Butler, Hudibras.

At Dunbar there is a noble park, with a lodge, belonging to the duke of Roxburgh, where Oliver Cromwell had his head quarters, when Levelling, at the head of a Scotch army, took possession of the mountains in the neighbourhood, and hamper'd him in such a manner, that he would have been obliged to retire and get away by sea, had not the fanaticism of the enemy forfeited the advantage which they had obtained by their general's conduct.—Smollett, Expedition of Humphrey Clinker.

He [Levelling] was so hamper'd by the material tendencies of his time, that he could not bring himself to conceive heat as a purely super-sensual force, of which temperature was the external manifestation.
—Huckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii.
ch. v.

4. Specially applied to the derangement of machinery.

I hamper'd the lock of the library door, so that I might be secure of interrupting those who should resort thither.—Life of a Lover, vi. 203.

Hamper. s. Chain or fetter. Obsolete.

The swarthy smith spits in his buckshorn flat,
And bids the men bring out the five-fold twine,
His shackles, shacklocks, *hamper*s, givers, and chains.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, b. i.

Hamster. s. [German.] Rodent animal so called, of the genus Cricetus; pouched rat.

The hamster is not much larger than the common rat, and has the same form of head and general physiognomy. . . . Notwithstanding . . . they differ very essentially, and form very distinct sub-genera.
... The hamster is found in France only near the Lower Rhine; but is common in all the northern parts of Germany where the soil is suitable. The German hamster was first described and figured in the Linnæan Transactions, and subsequently by Dr.
Shaw in the General Zoology. . . . The Ammonius
hamster (Mus ammonius, Thompson) must be considered also as placed conditionally only among the hamsters by the character of the cheek pouches.—
Translation of Cuvier's Régne Animal, by Giffiths.

Hamstring. s. Tendon of the ham.

A strutting player, whose conceit
Lies in his hamstring, and doth think it rich
To hear the wooden dialogue and sound
Twist his stretched footing and the wallflower.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

On the hinder side it is guarded with the two hamstrings.—Wiscman.

Hamstring. v. a. Lame by cutting the tendon of the ham; cripple.

His doctrine, referring all to an absolute decree, hamstringed all industry, and cut off the sinews of men's endeavours towards salvation.—Fuller, Holy State, p. 82: 1618.

Hamstring'd behind, unhappy Ogyes dy'd;
Then Plutarch is added to his side.

Dryden, Translation of the Fœd, ix. 1028.
He defended himself desperately, and would have cut his way through them, had they not hamstringed his horse.—Maccarty, History of England, ch. v.

Chanaper. s. [L. Int. chanaperium.] Treasury; exchequer. The clerk of the chanaper receives the fees due to the king for the seal of charters and patents.

The fines for all original writs were wont to be immediately paid into the chanaper of the Chancery.—Bacon.

Chanaper office [is] one of the offices so called belonging to the Court of Chancery. Writs relating to the business of the subject and their returns were, according to the simplicity of the ancient times, kept in an hamper, is chanaperio; and the others, relating to such matters wherein the Crown is immediately or mediately concerned, in a little sack or bag; in parva bursa; and hence has arisen the distinction of the Chanaper Office and Peety-bag Office, which both belong to the Common-law Court in Chancery.—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

Hance. s. (generally plural.) See extracts.

1. In Navigation.

Hances [are] falls of the five-rails placed on handrails on the poop and quarter-deck down to the gangway.—Harria.

2. In Architecture.

Hances [are] the ends of elliptical arches; and these are the arches of smaller circles than the scheme, or middle part of the arch.—Harria.

The sweep of the arch will not contain above fourteen inches, and perhaps you must count pieces to long of the courses in the hance, to make them long enough to contain fourteen inches.—Morav.

Hance. v. a. ? Intoxicato.

I swear by these contents... I do find myself sufficiently hanced... and that whenever I shall happen to be hanced again I shall arm myself with the craft of a fox, the manners of a lawyer, the wisdom of an ass, mixt with the civility of a bear. This was the form of the oath.—Taylor.

Hand. s. [A.S.]

1. Divided and terminal portion of the fore extremity, when adapted for holding or grasping.

They laid hands upon him, and bound him hand and foot.—Knolles, History of the Turks.
They had in hand, with wandering steps and slow.

Through Eden took their solitary way.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 618.
That wonderful instrument the hand, was it made to be idle?—Bishop Berkeley.

2. Measure of four inches; i.e. the breadth of a hand, chiefly used in giving the height of horses.

3. Side, right or left.

For the other side of the court-gate, on this hand, and that hand, were hangings of fifteen cubits.—Ezekiel, xxxviii. 18.

4. Part; quarter; side.

It is allowed on all hands, that the people of other nation this day under the sun.—Swift.

5. Rate; price.

Time is the measure of business; money of wares; business is bought at a dear hand where there is small dispatch.—Bacon.

6. Labour; act of the hand.

Alnaschar was a very idle fellow, that never would set his hand to any business during his father's life.—Addison.

I rather suspect my own judgement, than I can believe a fault to be in that poem, which lay so long under Virgil's correction, and had his last hand put to it.—Id.

7. Performance; power of performance.

Where are these porters,
These lazy knaves? 'Twas made a fine hand! fellows.
There's a trim rabble let in.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. v. 3.
He had a great mind to try his hand at a Spectator, and would fain have one of his writing in my works.—Addison.

A friend of mine has a very fine hand on the violin.—Id.

8. Manner of gathering or taking.

As her majesty hath received great profit, so may she, by a moderate hand, from time to time reap the like.—Bacon.

9. Workmanship; power or act of manufacturing or making.

An intelligent being, coming out of the hands of infinite perfection, with an aversion or even indifference to be reunited with its author, the source of his utmost felicity, is such a shock and deformity in the beautiful analogy of things, as is not consistent with finite wisdom and perfection.—Cheque.

10. Manner of acting or performing.

The master saw the madness rise;
His glowing cheeks, his ardent eyes;
And while he heav'n and earth defy'd,
Clang'd his hand, and cheek'd his pride.
Dryden, Alexander's Feast.

11. Agency; part in action.

God must have set a more than ordinary esteem upon that which David was not thought fit to have an hand in.—South, Sermons.

12. Discharge of duty.

Let it therefore be required on both parts, at the hands of the clergy, to be in meanness of estate like the apostles; at the hands of the laity, to be as they who lived under the apostles.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

13. Reach; nearness: (as, at hand, within reach, near, approaching).

The sight of a mind was like some sights of eyes: rather at hand than to carry afar off.—Bacon.

It is not probable that any body should effect that at a distance, which nearer hand it cannot perform.—Sir T. Browne.

When mineral or metal is to be generated, nature needs not to have at hand salt, sulphur, and mercury.—Boyle.

14. State of being in preparation: (with in).

Where is our usual manner of death?
What revells are at hand? Is there no play,
To ease the anguish of a torturing hour?
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, v. i.

15. State of being in present agitation: (with in).

I look'd upon her with a soldier's eye;
That lik'd, but had a rougher task in hand
Than to drive liking to the name of war.

Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, i. 1.
It is indifferent to the matter in hand which way the learned shall determine of it.—Locke.

16. Cards held at a game.

There was never an hand drawn, that did double the rest of the habitable world, in force this.—Bacon.

17. That which is used in opposition to another.

He would dispute,
Confute, change hands, and still confute.
Butler, Hudibras.

18. Scheme of action.

Consult of your own ways, and think which hand is best to take.
H. Jonson.
They who thought they could never be secure except the king were first at their mercy, were willing to change the hand in carrying on the war.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

19. Advantage; gain; superiority.

The French king, supposing to make his hand by these rude ravages in England, broke off his treaty of peace, and proclaimed hostility.—Sir J. Hayward.

20. Competition; contest.

She in beauty, education, blood
Holds hand with any in the world.
Shakespeare, King John, i.

All Israel mourned for him, according to the word of the Lord, which he spake by the hand of his servant Ahijah the prophet.—1 Kings, xiv. 18.

22. Possession; power

Sacraments serve as the moral instruments of God to that purpose; the use whereof is in our hands, the effect in his.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

And though you war like petty wrangling states,
You're in my hand; and when I bid you cease,
You shall be crush'd together into peace.
Dryden.
Between the landlord and tenant there must be a quarter of the revenue of the land constantly in their hands.—Locke.

It is fruitless pains to learn a language, which one may guess by his temper he will wholly neglect, as soon as an approach to manhood setting him free from a governor, shall put him into the hands of his own inclination.—Id.

Vortiglew's Agri were lands taken from the enemy, and distributed amongst the soldiers, or left in the hands of the proprietors under the condition of certain duties.—Arbuthnot.

23. Pressure of the bridle.

Hollow men, like horses hot at hand,
Make gallant show and promise of their mettle.
Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, iv. 2.

24. Method of government; discipline; restraint.

Menelaus bore an heavy hand over the citizens, having a malicious mind against his countrymen.—2 Maccabees, v. 23.

He kept a strict hand on his nobility, and chose rather to advance clergymen and lawyers.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VIII.

However strict a hand is to be kept upon all desires of fancy, yet in recreation fancy must be permitted to speak.—Locke.

25. Influence; management.

Flattery, the dangerous nurse of vice,
Got hand upon his youth, to pleasure bent.
Daniel.

26. That which performs the office of a hand in pointing.

The body, though it moves, yet not changing perceivable distance with other bodies, as fast as the ideas of our own minds do naturally follow one another, the thing seems to stand still; as is evident in the hands of clocks and sundials of sundials.—Locke.

27. Agent; person employed; manager.

The wisest prince, if he can save himself and his people from ruin, under the worst administration, what may not his subjects hope for when he changes hands, and maketh use of the best?—Swift.

28. Giver and receiver.

This tradition is more like to be a notion bred in the mind of man, than transmitted from hand to hand through all generations.—Archbishop Tillotson.

29. Actor; workman; soldier; sailor.

The nurse of time and everlasting fame,
That warlike hands enubel with immortal name.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, i. 11. 5.

Your wrongs are known: impose but your commands,
This hour shall bring you twenty thousand hands.
Dryden.

Demetrius appointed the painter guards, pleased that he could preserve that hand from the barbarity and insolence of soldiers.—Id.

A dictionary containing a natural history requires too many hands, as well as too much time, ever to be hoped for.—Locke.

All hands aloft, aloft, let English valour shine;
Let fly a culverin, the signal of the line;
Let every hand supply his gun!

Follow me,
And you'll see,
That the battle will be soon begun.

Song on the Sea-fight in 1692.

30. Catch or reach without choice.

The men of Israel turned again upon the children of Benjamin, and smote... as well the men of every city as the best, and all that came to hand.—Judges, xx. 48.

A sweetly reaper from his tillage brought
First fruits, the green ear, and the yellow sheaf,
Unsell'd as came to hand.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 434.

31. Form or cast of writing.

Here is the indictment of the good lord Hastings, which in a set hand fairly is enrosc'd;
Even hours I've spent to write it over.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 5.
Solyman shew'd him his own letters intercepted, asking him if he knew not that hand, if he knew not that seal?—Knolles, History of the Turks.

Being discovered by their knowledge of Mr. Cowley's hand, I happily escaped.—Sir J. Ingham.

If my debtors do not keep their day,
Bey their hands, and then refuse to pay,
I must attend.

Whether men write court or Roman hand, or any other, there is something peculiar in every man's writing.—Cicero.

The way to teach to write, is to get a plate graved with the characters of such hand you like.—Locke.

I present these thoughts in an ill hand; but scholars are bad penmen; we seldom regard the mechanical part of writing.—Fellon, Dissertation on reading the Classics.

They were wrote on both sides, and in a small hand.—Arbuthnot.

At hand. Act of giving or presenting; etc.

Let Tamar dress the meat in my sight, that I may eat it at her hand.—2 Samuel, xiii. 5.

See words at hand, nor hiding dirt afar,
Are doom'd to avenge the tedious bloody war.
Dryden.

To-night the poet's advocate I stand,
And he deserves the favour of my hand.
Addis.

A rascally yea-forsooth knave, to bear a gentleman in hand, and then stand upon security.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. i. 2.

Be hand in glove. Be intimate and familiar; suit one another.

Our author is here hand in glove with Providence.—Burton, On Purports of Literature, p. 47.

From hand to mouth. As want requires,
In matter of learning, many of us are from day-labourers, and to live from hand to mouth.

being not able to lay up any thing.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xxvii.

They, good people,
Have but from hand to mouth.

De Witt and Fletcher, Mast Laser.
I can get bread from hand to mouth, and make even at the year's end.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

Hand over head. Negligently; rashly; without seeing what one does.

So many strokes of the alarm bell of fear and awaking to other nations, and the facility of the titles, which, hand over head, have served their turn, doth ring the peal so much the louder.—Macdon.

A country fellow got an unlucky tumble from a tree: Thus 'tis, says a passenger, when people will be doing things hand over head, without either fear or wit.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

Hand to hand. Close fight.

In single opposition, hand to hand.

No did confound the best part of an hour.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. l. 3.
He comes, ere the fight, his dread command,
That stings afar, and pounds hand to hand,
He banish'd from the field.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, iii. 506.

Hand in and out. See extract.

Hand in and out is the name of an unlawful game now disused and prohibited by statute 17 Edw. 3. c. 2.—Jobb, Law Dictionary.

Hand in hand. In union; conjointly.

And the sea been Marlborough's element, the war had been bestowed there, to the advantage of the country, which would then have gone hand in hand with his own.—Swift.

Hand in hand. Fit; put.

As fair and as good, a kind of hand in hand comparison, had been something too fair and too good for any lady in Britain.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline.

In hand. Ready payment with respect to the receiver.

Of which offer the house accepted, receiving in hand one year's tribute.—Kaolika, History of the Turks.

These two must make our duty very easy; a considerable reward in hand, and the assurance of a far greater recompence hereafter.—Archbishop Tillot.

No hand. Terms; conditions; rate.

Would you have any man without exception to take up in him the office of a schoolmaster?—No, on no hand.—Staddon, Anatomy of Abuse, pt. ii. sign. 33. 4. 1588.

With simplicity admire and accept the mystery; but at no hand by pride, ignorance, interest, or vanity, wrest it to ignoble senses.—Jeremy Taylor, Worshy Communicant.

Employment and high place should become our greatest fear and terror, but at no hand our choice.—Bishop Pitt, Life of Hammond.

Off hand. [two words.] See Offhand (one word and a compound).

When a statesman wants a day's defence, Or envy holds a whole week's war with sense, Or simple pride for flattery makes demands, May dances by dance be whistled off my hands.—Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

On hand. Under care.

Jupiter had a farm a long time upon his hands, for want of a tenant to come up to his price.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

Take in hand. Attempt; undertaking.

Out of them you dare take in hand to lay open the original of such a nation.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

To hand: (with make). Fit.

His power reaches no further than to compound and divide the materials that are made to his hand; but can do nothing towards the making or destroying one atom of what is already in being.—Locke.

Many, whose greatness and fortune were not made to their hands, had sufficient qualifications and opportunities of rising to these high posts.—Addison.

Hand, v. a.

1. Give or transmit with the hand.

Judas was not far off, not only because he dipped in the same dish, but because he was so near that our Saviour could hand the sop unto him.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

I have been shown a written prophecy that is handed among them with great veneration.—Addison.

2. Guide or lead by the hand.

Angels did hand her up, who next God dwell.

Thomas.
By safe and insensible degrees he will pass from a boy to a man, which is the most hazardous step in life; this therefore should be carefully watched, and a young man with great diligence handed over to it.—Locke.

3. Seize; lay hands on.

Let him, that makes but trifles of his eyes,
First hand me: on mine own record, I'll off.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

4. Manage; move with the hand.

'Tis then that with delight I rave
Upon the boundless depth of love;
I bless my chains, I hand my car,
Nor think on all I left on shores.

5. Transmit in succession, with down; deliver from one to another.

They had not only a tradition of it in general, but even of several the most remarkable particular accidents of it likewise, which they handed down to the succeeding ages.—Woodward.

I know no other way of securing these monuments, and making them numerous enough to be handed down to future ages.—Addison.

Arts and sciences consist of scattered theorems and maxims, which are handed about amongst the masters, and only revealed to the 'illit' artists, till some great genius appears, who collects these disjointed propositions, and reduces them into a regular system.—Arbuthnot.

6. Link hands.

Into their innest bowers
Handed they went.—Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 738.

Hand, v. n. Go hand in hand; cooperate with.

I hitherto have liv'd an ill example,
And, as your captain, led you on to mischief;
But now will truly labour, that good men
May say hereafter of me, to my glory, (Let but my power and means hand with my will,
His good endeavours did weigh down his ill.)
Mossington, Renegade.

Handball, s. Game at ball so called.

A custom by no means unlike the playing at handball for a tuncy-eake, the winning of which depends chiefly upon swiftness of foot.—Brand, Observations on Popular Antiquities.

Handbarrow, s. Frame on which anything is carried by the hands of two men, without wheeling on the ground.

A handbarrow, wheelbarrow, shovel and spade.
Tucker, Fore Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Set the board whereon the hive standeth on a handbarrow, and carry them to the place you intend.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Handbell, s. Bell rung by the hand: (as opposed to one with bellropes).

The strength of the percussion is a principal cause of the loudness or softness of sounds; as in ringing of a handbell louder or softer.—Bacon.

Handbow, s. Bow drawn by the hand: (as opposed to crossbow).

Thus endeth the lives of these good yemen;
God send them eternal bliss;
And all, that with a handbow shotteth,
That of heaven they never miss.

(Old Ballad of Adam Bell.)

Handbreadth, s. Space equal to the breadth of the hand; palm.

A border of an handbreadth round about.—Eredu, xxv. 25.

Behold, thou hast made my days as an handbreadth; and mine age is as nothing before thee.—Psalm, xxxix. 5.

The eastern people determined their handbreadth by the breadth of barley corn, six making a digit, and twenty-four a hand's breadth.—Arbuthnot.

Handcuff, s. Manacle.

Handcuff, v. a. Manacle; fasten by the hands.

If he cannot carry an ox, like Milo, he will not, like Milo, be handcuffed in the oak, by attempting to rend it.—Hay, Essay on Deformity, p. 26: 1751.

Hander, s. One who hands anything over to another; transmitter; conveyer in succession. Rare.

They would assume, with wondrous art,
Themselves to be the whole, who are but part,
Of that vast frame the church; yet grant they were
The handers down, can they from thence infer
A right V interpret? Or would they alone,
Who brought the present, claim it for their own?

Dryden, Religio Laici, 357.

Handfast, s. Hold; custody; power of keeping. Rare.

If that shepherd be not in handfast, let him fly.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Can it be, that this most perfect creature,
This image of his Maker, well-squar'd man,
Should leave the handfast that he had of grace,
To fall into a woman's easy arms?

Rowson and Fletcher, Woman-Hater.

Handfast, adj. Fast, as by contract; firm in adherence. Obsolete.

A virgin made handfast to Christ.—Bale, English Volary, pt. i. fol. 63. b.

Handfast, v. a. Obsolete.

1. Betroth.

If a damsel that is a virgin be handfasted to any man, (betrothed, present version.)—Deuteronomy, xlii. 23: Coverdale's Translation.

Every man must esteem the person to whom he is handfasted none otherwise than for his own spouse.—Cristen State of Matrimony, fol. 43. b. 1549.

2. Join together solemnly by the hand; complete the ceremony of marriage.

Auspices were those that handfasted the married couple; that wished them good luck; that took care for the dowry.—H. Jonson, Notes on his Masques at Court.

3. Oblige by duty; bind.

We flat not to handfast ourselves to God Almighty, to make ourselves over to him by present deed of gift; but would fain, forthwith, bequeath ourselves to him a legacy in our last will and testament.—Archbishop Saurcraft, Sermon on the Fire of London, 1666.

Handfasting, ceremonial. Marriage contract; agreement; engagement.

After the handfasting and making of the contract, the churching and wedding should not be deferred to longe.—Cristen State of Matrimony, fol. 43. b.

Handful, s.

1. As much as the hand can gripe or contain.

(Others, taking handfuls of dust that was next at hand, cast them altogether upon Lysimachus.)—2 Maccabees, iv. 11.

I saw a country gentleman at the side of Rosamond's pond, pulling a handful of oats out of his pocket, and gathering the ducks about him.—Addison, Freholder.

2. Palm; hand's breadth; four inches.

Take one vessel of silver and another of wood, each full of water, and keep the tops together about an handful from the bottom, and the sound will be more resounding from the vessel of silver than that of wood.—Racine.

The powerful scabbard where it dwelt,
The rancour of its edge had felt;
For of the lower end two handful
It had devour'd, it was so useful.

Butler, Hudibras.
Poor Sydenham's horse stumbled, and fell upon him, and broke his thigh-bone about a handful above the knee.—Lord Clarendon, State Letters, ii. 315.

3. Small number or quantity.

He could not, with such a handful of men, and without cannon, propose reasonably to fight a battle.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

4. As much as can be done.

Being in possession of the town, they had their handful to defend themselves from firing.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Handgallop, s. Slow easy gallop, in which the hand presses the bridle to hinder increase of speed.

Ovid, with all his sweet crew, has as little variety of numbers and sound as he: he is always upon a handgallop, and his verse runs upon carpet ground.—Dryden.

Handgun, s. Gun wielded by the hand.

Guns have names given them, some from serpents or ravenous birds, as culverines or culubines, others in other respects, as cannon, demicannon, handgun, and muskets.—C Camden.

Handicraft, s.

1. Manual occupation; work performed by the hand.

Particular members of convents have excellent mechanical geniuses, and divert themselves with painting, sculpture, architecture, gardening, and several kinds of handicraft.—Addison.

2. Men who live by manual labour.

The covetous father now includes the night,
And cov'nants thou shalt break by candle-light,
When pulling snails, and every painful trade
Of handicrafts, in peaceful beds are laid.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, sat. vii.

The nurseries for children of ordinary gentlemen and handicrafts are managed after the same manner.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

Handicraftsman, s. One employed in handicraft.

Of innumerable age I virtue is not regarded in handicraftsmen.—Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 2.

He has simply the best wit of any handicraftsmen in Athens.—Id., Midsummer-Night's Dream, iv. 2.

The principal bulk of the vulgar natives are tillers of the ground, free servants, and handicraftsmen: as smiths, masons, and carpenters.—Macdon.

The profaneness and ignorance of handicraftsmen, small traders, servants, and the like, are to a degree very hard to be imagined greater.—Swift.

Handiness. s. Attribute suggested by Handy: (in composition in the extract).

Ungracious attitudes and actions, and a certain left-handiness (if I may use that word) loudly proclaim low education, and low company.—Lord
Chatterfield.

Handiwork. s. Work of the hand; product of labour; manufacture.

In general they are not repugnant unto the natural will of God, which willeth to the works of his own hands, in that they are his own handiwork all happiness; although perhaps, for some special cause in our own particular, a contrary determination have seemed more convenient.—Hooker, Reckonistical Polity.

As proper men as ever trod upon neat-leather have gone upon my handiwork.—Shakespeare, Julius Cæsar, l. 1.

The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament sheweth his handiwork.—Paulina, xix. 1.
He parted with the greatest blessing of human nature for the handiwork of a tailor.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

Handkerchief. s. Piece of silk or linen used to wipe the face, or cover the neck.

She found her sitting in a chair, in one hand holding a letter, in the other her handkerchief, which had lately drunk up the tears of her eyes.—Sir P.
Nidney.

He was torn to pieces with a bear: this avouches
the shepherd's son, who has not only his innocence, but a handkerchief and rings of his, that Paulina knows.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 2.
The Romans did not make use of handkerchiefs, but of the lemnis or border of the garment, to wipe their face.—Arbuthnot.

Handlanguage. s. Talking with fingers.

Because the convenience of writing cannot always be in readiness; neither yet though it could, is it so proper a medium of interpretation, between persons present face to face, as a hand-language: it will therefore be necessary to teach the dumb scholar finger-alphabet.—Dalgarneo, Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor, p. 74.

Handle. v. a.

1. Touch; feel with the hand.

The bodies which we daily handle make us perceive, that whilst they remain between them, they hinder the approach of the parts of our hands that press them.—Locke.

2. Manage; wield.

That fellow handles his bow like a crowkeeper.—Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 4.

3. Make familiar to the hand by frequent touching.

An incurable shyness is the general vice of the Irish horses, and is hardly ever won in Flanders, because the hardness of the winters forces the breeders there to house and handle their colts six months every year.—Sir W. Temple.

4. Treat; mention in writing or talk.

He left nothing fitting for the purpose
untouch'd, or slightly handled in discourse.

Her eyes, her hair, her cheek, her gait, her voice,
Thou handlest in this discourse.—Id., Troilus and Cressida, i. 1.

Leaving to the author the exact handling of every particular, and labouring to follow the rules of abridgement.—Macvey, ii. 51.

Of a number of other like instances we shall speak more, when we handle the communication of sounds.
—Bacon.

By Guidus Ulminus, in his treatise for the explication of this instrument, the subtleties of it are largely and excellently handled.—Bishop Wilkins, Didalus.

In an argument, handled thus briefly, everything cannot be said.—Bishop Atterbury.

5. Deal with; practise.

They that handle the law know me not.—Jeremiiah, ii. 8.

6. Treat well or ill.

Tellot, my life, my joy, again return'd!
How wert thou handled, being prisoner?
—Shakespeare, Henry VI., Part I. i. 4.

They were well enough pleased to be rid of an enemy that had handled them so ill.—Lord Clarendon,
History of the Grand Rebellion.

7. Practise upon; transact with.

Pray you, my lord, give me leave to question; you shall see how I'll handle her.—Shakespeare, Mousetrap, for Measure, v. 1.

Handle. s.

1. Part of anything by which it is held in the hand; hafi.

No hand of blood and bone
Can grip the sacred handle of our empire,
Unless he do profane, steal, or usurp.

Fortune turneth the handle of the bottle, which is easy to be taken hold of; and after the belly, which is hard to grasp.—Bacon.

There is nothing but hath a double handle, or at least we have two hands to apprehend it.—Jeremy Taylor.

A carpenter, that had got the iron work of an axe, begged only as much wood as would make a handle
to it.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

Of bone the handles of my knives are made.
Yet no ill taste from thence affects the blade,
Or what I carve; nor is there ever left
Any unvarying haunt-guest from the host.—Dryden.

A beam there was, on which a beechen pail
Hung by the handle on a driven nail.—Id.

2. That of which use is made.

They overturned him in all his interests by the sure but fatal handle of his own good nature.—South, Sermons.

Handless. adj. Without a hand.

Speak, my Lavinia, what accursed hand
Hath made thee handless!

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, iii. 1.

His mangled myrmidon,
Noneless, handless, hackt and clapt, came to him,
Crying on Hector.—Id., Troilus and Cressida, v. 5.
The handless, fearless corpses of their fellow-countrymen.—Fuller, Holy War, p. 194.

Handling. s. [A.S. handlung.]

1. Touch.

I'll have no touches therefore,
Nor takings by the arms, nor tender circles
Cast 'bout the waist, but all be done at distance:
Love is brought up with these soft migniard handlings;
His pulse lies in the palm.—B. Jonson, Devil is an Ass.

2. Cunning; trick.

Through his fine handling, and his cleanly play,
He all those royal signs had stolen away.
—Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.

Handmaid. s. Waiting maid; female servant; subordinate attendant or minister.

Bravo Burgundy, undoubted hope of France!
Stay, let thy humble handmaid speak to thee.

Shakespeare, Henry VI., Part I. i. 3.
She gave the knight great thanks in little speech,
And said she would his handmaid poor remain.

I will never act politics against ethicks, especially for that true ethicks are but as a handmaid to divinity and religion.—Bacon.

Heaven's youngest-learned star
Hath fix'd her polish'd ear,
Her sleeping Lord with handmaid lamp attending.

Love led them on; and faith, who knew them best,
Thy handmaid, clad them o'er with purple beams
And azure wings, that up they flew so dress'd,
And spake the truth of thee on glorious thrones
Before the judge.—Id., Scenes, xiv. 10.

Those of my family their master's sight,
Grown despicable in my handmaid's sight.
By viewing Nature, Nature's handmaid, Art,
Makes mighty things from small beginnings grow;
Thus flies first to shipping did impart;
Their tail the rudder, and their head the prow.

Since he had placed his heart upon wisdom, health, wealth, victory and honour should always wait on her as her handmaid.—Addison.

Then criticism the muse's handmaid prov'd,
To dress her charms, and make her more beloved.
—Pope, Essay on Criticism.

Handmaiden. s. Handmaid.

He hath regarded the low estate of his hand-maiden.—Luke, i. 48.

Handmill. s. Mill moved by the hand.

Off the drudging ass is driv'n with toil;
Returning late, and laden home with gain
Of barter'd pitch, and handmills for the grain.

Dryden.

Handmills. s. Sails managed by the hand.

ander giveth it to thee full of wine with good hand-sell.—Sir T. Elyot, Governour, fol. 116. b.

The apostles term it the pledge of our inheritance, and the handsel or earnest of that which is to come.
—Hooker, Reckonistical Polity.

Thou art Joy's handsel; here's a lie flat in thee,
Subject to every mounter's bended knee.—Herbert.

Handsel. v. a. Use or do anything the first time.

In timorous deer he handsels his young paws,
And leaves the rugged bear for firmer claws.

Cowley.

I'd show you
How easy 'tis to die by my example,
And handels fate before you.

Dryden.

From handels, a contract, were named the Handelsstadter, the Hanse Towns, a confederation of towns on the Baltic and North Sea united by mutual agreement for the security of trade. From this original the term Hanse was applied in a more general sense to a mercantile corporation. French,
Hanse, a company, society, or corporation of merchants (for so it signifies in the book of ordinances of Paris); also an association with, or the freedom of, the Hanse, also the fee or fine which is paid for that freedom; hanse, to make free of a civil company or corporation. German, hanse, to banish, to initiate a novice. (Kuttner.) Here it will be observed we apparently get back to the original form of the word, although the second syllable of the German verb is the usual frequentative termination, and not the element hand, signifying to deliver, in the original expression. —Widdowood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Handsmooth. adv. With dexterity; with readiness.

If we can but come off well here, we shall carry on head sadly; but inwardly he is full of deceit.—Ecce- lesiasticus, xix. 26.

The beauties of this place should mourn;
The humorous fruits and flowers at my return Should hang their wither'd head; for sure my breath
Is now more poisonous.
Dryden.

The rose is fragrant, but it fades in time;
The violet sweet, but quickly past the prime;
White lilies hang their heads and soon decay;
And whiter snow in minutes melts away.
Id., The Jealous Lover.

The cheerful birds no longer sing;
Each drops his head, and hangs his wing.
Prior.

Superillum . . . hang, the hang of a door.—Nomenclator: 1855.

Hap. s.

1. Chance; fortune.

Whether art it were, or heedless hap,
As through the flowering forest rash she fled,
In her rude hairs sweet flowers themselves did lay,
And flourishing fresh leaves and blossoms did enwrap.

Her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Bonn.—Rail, ii. 3.

2. That which happens by chance or fortune.

Curst be good haps, and curst be they that build
Their hopes on haps, and do not make despair
For all these certain blows the sages shield.

Sir P. Sidney.

To have ejected whatsoever that church doth make account of, without any other crime than that it hath been the hap thereof to be used by the church of Rome, and not to be commanded in the word of God, might hap have pleased some few men, who, having taken such a course themselves, must be glad to see the example followed.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Solyman commended them for their valour in their evil haps, more than the victory of others got by good fortune.—Knollys, History of the Turks.

A fox had the hap to fall into the walk of a lion.—Sir R. L. K. Laing.

3. Accident; casual event; misfortune.

Nor feared she mount the hands to stray

He seem'd in heart to harbour thoughts unkind,
And nourish bloody vengeance in his bitter mind.

Sponser, Faerie Queen

Hardihood, s. Stoutness; bravery.

Boldly assault the mercenary's hall.

Where, if he be, with dauntless hardihood,
And brandish'd blade, rush on him.

Milton, Comus, 640.

Hardiment, s. Courage; stoutness; bravery.

But full of fire and greatly hardiment,
The youthful knight could not for ought be staid.

Sponser, Faerie Queen

On the gentle Severn's sedgy bank,
In single opposition, hand to hand,
He did confound the best part of an hour
In changing hardiment with great Glendower.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. l. 3.

Zeal was the spring whence flowed his hardiment

Purpure, Translation of Ta

Hardiness, s. Attribute suggested by Hardy.

1. Hardship; fatigue.

They are valiant and hardy; great endurers of cold, hunger, and all hardiness.—Sponser, View of the State of Ireland

2. Stoutness; courage; bravery.

If we, with three such powers left at home,
Cannot defend our own doors from the dog,

Let us be worried; and our nation lose
The name of hardiness and policy.

Shakespeare, Henry V. l. 2.

Perkin had gathered together a power of all nations, neither in number nor in the hardiness and courage of their persons contemptible.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

He has the courage of a rational creature, and such an hardiness we should endeavour by custom and use to bring children to.—Locke

Criminal as you are, you avenge yourself against the hardiness of one that should tell you of it.—Specht

3. Effrontery; confidence.

Hardiboured, adj. Elaborate; studied; diligently wrought.

How carefully the hawkers cry
A satire, and the gentry buy!

While my hardiboured poem pines
I mould upon the printer's lines.

Swift

Hardily, adv. In a hard manner.

1. With difficulty; not easily.

Touching things which generally are received,
although in themselves they be most certain, yet, because men pronounce them granted of all, we are hardily able to bring such proof of their certainty as many satyrs gossayers, when suddenly and besides expectation they require the same at our hands.

—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity

Remember hardily what he lost before,
His right endears it much, his purchase more.

Dryden

False confidence is easily taken up, and hardily laid down.—South, Sermons

2. Scarcely; scant; not lightly; with no likelihood.

The fish, that once was caught, new hate will hardily bite.

Sponser, Faerie Queen

HARDMOUTHED} HARD

- They are worn, lord consul, so
That we shall hardly in our ages see
Their banners wave again.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.
- Hardly shall you find any one so bad, but he desires the credit of being thought good.—South, Sermons.
3. Almost not; barely.
The waud'ring breath was on the wing to part,
Weak was the pulse, and hardly heay'd the heart.
Dryden.
- There is hardly a gentleman in the nation who hath not a near alliance with some of that body.—Swift.
4. Grudgingly; as an injury.
If I unwittingly
Have aught committed that is hardly borne
By any in this presence, I desire
To reconcile me. Shakespeare, Richard III. ii. 1.
5. Severely; unfavourably.
If there are some reasons inducing you to think hardly of our laws, are those reasons demonstrative, are they necessary, or mere possibilities only?
—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
6. Rigorously; oppressively.
Many men believed that he was hardly dealt with.
—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.
They are now in prison, and treated hardly enough; for there are fifteen dead within two years.
—Addison.
- They have begun to say and to fetch instances,
where he has in many things been hardly used.—Swift.
7. Unwelcomely; harshly.
Such information comes very hardly and harshly to a grown man; and, however softened, goes but ill down.—Locke.
8. Not softly; not tenderly; not delicately.
Heav'n was her canopy; bare earth her bed;
So hardly lodg'd. Dryden.
- Hardmouthed, adj. Disobedient to the rein;
not sensible of the bit.
"Tis time my hardmouth'd coursers to controul,
Apt to run riot, and transgress the goal. Dryden.
But who can youth, let loose to vice, restrain?
When once the hardmouth'd horse has got the rein,
He's past thy pow'r to stop. Id.
- Hardness, s. Attribute suggested by Hard.
1. Durity; power of resistance in bodies.
Hardness is a firm cohesion of the parts of matter that make up masses of a sensible bulk, so that the whole does not easily change its figure.—Locke.
From the various combinations of these corpuscles happen all the varieties of the bodies formed out of them, in colour, taste, smell, hardness, and specific gravity.—Woodward.
2. Difficulty to be understood.
When I waked, I found
This label on my brow whose containing
Is so from sense in hardness, that I can Make no collection of it. Shakespeare, Cymbeline, v. 3.
3. Difficulty to be accomplished.
It was time now or never to sharpen my intention to pierce through the hardness of this enterprise.—Sir P. Sidney.
Concerning the duty itself, the hardness thereof is not such as needeth much art.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
4. Scarcity; penury.
The tenants poor, the hardness of the times,
Are ill excuses for a servant's cruises. Swift.
5. Obduracy; profligateness.
The six hundred thousand footmen, who were gathered together in the hardness of their hearts.—Ecclesiasticus, xvi. 10.
From hardness of heart, and contempt of Thy word and commandment, good Lord, deliver us.—Book of Common Prayer, Litany.
6. Courtness; harshness of look.
By their virtuous behaviour they compensate the hardness of their favour, and by the pulchritude of their souls make up what is wanting in the beauty of their bodies.—Ray.
7. Keenness; vehemence of weather or seasons.
If the hardness of the winter should spoil them, neither the loss of seed nor labour will be much.—Mortimer.
8. Strictness of manners; austereness.
A person austere and wise, full of holiness and full of hardness.—Bishop Taylor, Moral Demonstration of the Truth of the Christian Religion.
9. Cruelty of temper; savageness; harshness; barbarity.
That if we fail in our request, the blame
May hang upon your hardness.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 3.
They quicken cloth, perpellicles unity,
• Make roughness smooth, and hardness mollify.
Sir J. Denham.

HARE

10. Stiffness; harshness.
Sculptors are obliged to follow the manners of the painters, and to make many ample folds, which are insupportable hardness, and more like a rock than a natural garment.—Dryden.
11. Faulty parsimony; stinginess.
Hardeck, s. The reading of the first folio edition of Shakespeare, probably for harlock.
Why he was met ev'n now,
Crown'd with rank hunter and furrow-weeds,
With hardecks, hemlock, nettles, cuckoo-flowers.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 4.
- Hards, s. [A.S. heordas.] Refuse or coarser part of flax.
- Hardship, s.
1. Injury; oppression.
They are ripe for a peace, to enjoy what we have conquered for them; and so we, to recover the effects of their hardships upon us.—Swift.
2. Inconvenience; fatigue.
They were exposed to hardship and penury.—
Bishop Sprat.
You could not undergo the toils of war,
Nor bear the hardships that your leaders bore. Addison.
- Hardware, s. Manufactures of metal.
- Hardwareman, s. Maker or seller of metal-line manufactures.
One William Wood, an hardwareman, obtains by fraud a patent in England to coin copper to pass in Ireland.—Swift.
- Hardy, adj. [Fr. hardi.]
1. Bold; brave; stout; daring; resolute.
Try the imagination of some in cock-fights, to make one cock more hardy, and the other more cowardly.—Bacon.
Who is there hardy enough to contend with the reproach which is prepared for those, who dare venture to dissent from the received opinions of their country?—Locke.
Could thirst of vengeance, and desire of fame,
Excite the female breast with martial flame?
And shall not love's diviner pow'r inspire
More hardy virtue, and more generous fire?
Prior, Henry and Emma.
2. Strong; hard; firm; stubborn.
Is a man confident of his present strength? An unwholesome blast may shake in pieces his hardy fabrick.—South, Sermons.
- Hare, s. [A.S. hara.]
1. Native rodent animal so called, of the genus Lepus.
Dismay'd not this
Our captains Macbeth and Banquo?
As sparrows, eagles; or the hare, the lion.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 2.
2. In Astronomy. Constellation so called.
The hare appears, whose active rays supply
A nimble force, and hardly wings deny. Creech.
- Hare, v. a. [Fr. harer, as in harer un chien— set a dog on.] Frighten; hurry with terror.
The poor creature [Richard Cromwell] was so harred by the council of officers, that he presently raised a proclamation to be issued out, by which he did declare the parliament to be dissolved.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion, h. xvi.
To hare and rate them, is not to teach but vex
them.—Locke.
- Hare-lip, s. [two words.] Approach in the human mouth to that of a hare, caused by the imperfect union of the two sides of the upper lip, so as to leave a fissure in the middle.
The hints of nature's hand
Shall not in their issue stand;
Never mole, hare-lip, nor scar,
Shall upon their children be.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, v. 2.
The third stitch is performed with pins or needles,
as in hare-lip.—Winneman, Surgery.
- Harebell, s. See Heatherbell.
Thou shalt not lack
The flow'r that's like thy face, pale primrose; nor
The saur'd harebell, like thy vains.
Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iv. 2.
- Harebrained, adj. Harebrained.
A bold, harebrained, mad fellow.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, To the reader.
- Harebrained, adj. Volatile; unsettled;
wild; fluttering; hurried.
The overmuch folly of many clients hath, and doth maintayne the lawyers to be both warm within and abroad; while many harebrained clients must tarry and attend without.—Knight, Trial of Truth, fol. 50, b: 1580.

HARL

- That harebrained wild fellow begins to play the fool, when others are weary of it.—Bacon.
- Spelt as if from Hair.
- At first Elizabeth would not hear of it; she would not ruin herself by any such harebrained madness.
—*Freule, History of England, Reign of Elizabeth,
ch. xi. vol. ii. p. 298; ed. 1803.*
- Harepipe, s. Snare to catch hares.
Any person who shall take or destroy any hare with harepipes, shall forfeit for every hare twenty shillings.—Statute of James I.
- Harepot, s. [Fr.] In Cookery. Ragout so called; also as the name of a peculiar kind of French bean used therein.
I have ordered a harepot, to which you will be very welcome about four o'clock.—Lord Chesterfield.
The harepot blanc is the seed of a peculiar kind of French bean of which we have some difficulty in ascertaining the English name.—Miss Acton, Modern Cookery.
[Harepot is described as small pieces of mutton partly boiled and then fried with vegetables, but without any reference to harepot bean.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]
- Hareidan, s. [?] Worn-out strumpet.
She just endur'd the winter she began,
And in four months a battered hareidan;
Now nothing's left, but wither'd, pale, and shrunk,
To bawl for others, and go shares with punk. Swift.
- Hare, s. [A.S. hegerisa = hedge robber.]
One of the names for the Galium Aparine, Cleavers, or Gooseshare.
- Hark, v. n. [German, horken.]
1. Hearken.
Pricking up his ears, to hark
If he could hear too in the dark. Butler, Hudibras.
2. In the imperative mood, as an interjection.
List! hear! listen!
What harmony is this? My good friends, hark!
Shakespeare, Tempest, iii. 2.
The butcher saw him upon the gallop with a piece of flesh, and called out, Hark ye, friend, you may make the best of your purchase. Sir R. L. Estlin.
Hark! methinks the roar that late pursu'd us,
Sinks like the murmurs of a falling wind. Rowe.
- Harl, s. Filaments of flax; filamentous substance in general.
The general sort are wicker hives, made of privet,
willow, or harl, daubed with cow-dung.—Mortimer.
- Harlequin, s. Character in pantomimes so called, as distinguished from the clown and pantaloon.
Coming from Venice the last summer, and taking Bergamo in my way homeward to England, it was my happy, sojourning there some four or five days, to light in fellowship with that famous French Hip
Harlequin, who, perceiving me to be an Englishman by my habit and speech, asked me many particulars of the order and manner of our plays, which he termed by the name of representations.—Nash, Almond for a Parrot, Epistle Dedicatory.
The joy of a king for a victory must not be like that of a harlequin upon a letter from his mistress.
—Dryden.
- Harlequin, v. a. Conjure away, like a harlequin.
Monkeys have been
Extreme good doctors for the spleen;
And kitten, if the humour hit,
Has harlequin'd away the fit. Green, The Spleen, 96.
- Harlock, s. Plant so called, probably Churlock.
The honey-suckle, the harlock,
The lily, &c. Drayton, Eclogues, 1288.
- Harlot, s. [Welsh, herlod = young man,
herlodes = young woman; originally limited neither to females nor to persons of bad
name.]
1. Whore; strumpet.
They help thee by such aids as grease and harlots.
H. Johnson, Catiline's Conspiracy.
The harlots crowd the public place;
Go, fools, and purchase an unclean embrace. Dryden.
2. Base person; rogue; client.
Whether we [be] the false harlots, and you the trews men.—Dialogue between Euclius and Theophilus, sign. h. 6. b: 1534.
No man but he and thou, and such other false harlots, praiseth any such preaching.—Max, History of the Acts and Monuments of the Church, Examination of W. Thorpe.
- Used adjectivally.
The harlot king
Is quite beyond mine arm. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

The harlot's lap
Of Philistine Dailah.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1000.
For now she rules me with her look,
And round me winds her harlot's chain.

Way, Fables, Lay of the Ivy.
Harlot. v. n. Play the harlot; keep the company of harlots.

They that spend their youth in loitering, bawling, and harlotting.—Milton, Animadversions upon a Defence of the Humble Remonstrance.

Harlotry. s.

1. Trade of a harlot; fornication.

Harlotry, when committed with a common strumpet.—Bishop Nicholson, Exposition of the Catechism, p. 123: 1002.

Nor shall,
From Rome's tribunal, thy harlots prove all
Gaiety harlotry, while thou art clad so thin.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, sat. ii.

2. Name of contempt for a woman.

A peevish self-will'd harlotry,
That no persuasion can do good upon.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 1.
A kind of common and harlotry Venus, which,
Deriving only from the body and a branch of the animal life, draws down the soul to what is merely corporeal, and, mingling with it, defiles and pollutes it.—Malligrell, Excellence of Moral Virtue, p. 111: 1024.

3. Anything meretricious.

The harlotry of the ornaments.—Matthias, Pursuits of Literature.

Harm. s. [A.S. hearn.] Injury; crime; wickedness; mischief; detriment; hurt.

We, ignorant of ourselves,
Beg often our own harms, which the wise Powers
Deny us for our good.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 1.
How are we happy still in fear of harm?

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 326.

They should be suffered to write on: it would keep them out of harm's way, and prevent them from evil courses. Swift.

Harm. v. a. Hurt; injury.

What sense had I of her stol'n hours of lust?
I saw't not, thought it not, it harm'd not me.

Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 3.

Passions never could grow
To harm another, or impair your rest. Waller.
After their young are hatched, they brood them under their wings, lest the cold, and sometimes the heat, should harm them.—Ray.

Harmful. adj. Hurtful; noxious; mischievous; injurious; detrimental.

His dearly loved square
His spear of hoven-wood behind him bare,
When harmful lead, thrice heated in the fire,
Had riven many a breast with pike-head square.

Spenser.
Let no man fear that harmful creature less,
because he sees the apostle safe from that poison.—
Bishop Hall.

The earth brought forth fruit and food for man, without any mixture of harmful quality. Sir W. Raleigh.

For flax and oats will burn the tender field,
And sleepy poppies harmful harvests yield.

Dryden.
Harmfully. adv. In a harmful manner; hurtfully; noxiously; detrimentally.

A scholar is better occupied in playing or sleeping, than spending his time not only vainly, but harm-
fully in such kind of exercise.—Ascham.

Harmless. adj.

1. Innocent; innoxious; not hurtful; not doing harm.

Touching ceremonies, harmless in themselves, and hurtful only in respect of number, was it aims to decree that those things that were least needful, and newest come, should be the first that were taken away.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

She, like harmless lightning, throws her eye
On him, her brother's, me, her master; hitting Each object with a joy.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, v. 3.

2. Unhurt; undamaged; not receiving harm.

The shipwright will be careful to gain by his labour, or at least to save himself harmless, and therefore suits his work slightly, according to a slight price.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Harmlessly. adv. Innocently; without hurt; without crime.

He spent that day free from worldly trouble, harmlessly, and in a recreation that became a churchman.—J. Walton.

Bullets batter the walls which stand inflexible, but fall harmlessly into wood or feathers.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Harmlessness. s. Attribute suggested by Harmless; innocence; freedom from tendency to injury or hurt.

When, through tasteless flat humility,
In douch-baked men some harmlessness we see,
'Tis but his phlegm that's virtuous, and not he.

Thompe.
Compare the harmlessness, the credulity, the tenderness, the modesty, and the ingenuous pliancy to virtuous counsel, which is in youth untainted, with the mischievousness, the slyness, the craft, the insouciance, the falsehood, and the confirmed obstinacy in an aged, long-practised sinner.—South, Sermons.

Harmonie. adj. Concordant; musical; proportioned to each other.

No swells each wind-pipe; see intones to me,
Harmonick twang of leather, horn, and brass.

Pope, Dunciad, ii. 253.

Harmonical. adj. Same as Harmonic.

After every three whole notes, nature requirith, for all harmonical use, one half note to be interposed.—Bacon.

Harmonical sounds and discordant sounds, are both active and positive; but blackness and darkness are, indeed, but privatives.—Id.

Harmonically. adv. In an harmonic manner; musically.

The mind, as some suppose, harmonically composed, is roused up at the tunes of music.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 295.

Anthems... which proceed in one full yet distinct strain, harmonically, and, at the same time, intelligibly.—Mason, Essays Historical and Critical on English Church Music, p. 130.

Harmonicon. s. Musical instrument so called.

Harmonics. See extract.

In the Sixth Book of the Republic, Plato treats of the then existing sciences as the instruments of a philosophical education. Among the most conspicuous of these is astronomy. He there ridicules the notion that astronomy is a sublime science because it makes men look upward. He asserts that the really sublime science is that which makes men look at the realities, which are suggested by the appearances seen in the heavens; namely, the spheres which revolve and carry the luminaries in their revolutions. Now it was no doubt the determined search for such 'realities' as these which gave birth to the Greek astronomy, the first and critical step in the progress of science. Plato, by his exhortations, if not by his suggestions, contributed effectually, as I conceive, to this step in science. In the same manner he requires a science of harmonics which shall be free from the defects and inaccuracies which occur in actual instruments. This belief that the universe was full of mathematical relations, and that these were the true objects of scientific research, gave a vigour, largeness of mind, and confidence to the Greek speculators which no more cautious view of the problem of scientific discovery could have supplied. It was well that this advanced guard in the army of discoverers was filled with indomitable courage, boundless hopes, and creative minds.—Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas, b. iii. ch. ii.

Harmoniously. adj.

1. Adapted to each other; having the parts proportioned to each other; symmetrical.

All the wide-extended sky,
And all the harmonious worlds on high,
And Virgil's sacred world shall die.

Cowley.
God has made the intellectual world harmonious and beautiful without us; but it will never come into our heads all at once; we must bring it home piece-meal.—Locke.

2. Having sounds concordant to each other; musical; symphonious.

Thoughts that voluntary move Harmonious numbers.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 38.
The verse of Chaucer is not harmonious to us; they who lived with him thought it musical.—Dryden.

Harmoniously. adv. In an harmonious manner; musically; with concord of sounds.

Not chaos-like together crush'd and bruise'd;
But as the world harmoniously confus'd:
Where order in variety we see,
And where, though all things differ, they agree.

Pope.
That all these distances, motions, and quantities of matter, should be so accurately and harmoniously adjusted in this great variety of our system, is above the fortuitous hits of blind material causes, and must certainly flow from that eternal fountain of wisdom.—Bentley.

Harmonist. s.

1. One who understands the concord of sounds; one who delights in music.

Sweet harmonist, and beautiful saw-wood.

Young, Night Thoughts, iii.
I am well aware, that many profound harmonists may be disgusted at what I have already advanced, and think their craft in danger, when I seem to attack the very staple of music.—Mason, Essays Historical and Critical on English Church Music, p. 103.

A musician may be a very skillful harmonist, and yet be defective in the talents of melody, air, and expression.—A. Smith, On the Imitative Arts, p. ii.

2. One who brings together corresponding passages on a subject; harmonizer.

He endeavourth to show how, among the fathers, Augustin and Hieron are flatly against the harmonist.—Newton, Life of Bishop Bull, p. 221.

Harmonize. v. a. Adjust in fit proportions; make musical.

Love first invented verse, and form'd the rhyme,
The motion measur'd, harmoniz'd the chime.

Dryden.

Harmonize. v. n. Agree; correspond.

It. Taciturnus shows how the making of the tabernacle harmonizeth with the making of the world.—Lightfoot, Miscellanies, p. 183: 1029.

Harmonizer. s. One who, or that which, harmonizes; one who brings together corresponding passages on any subject.

They do not forget to show a prudent disdain for commentators and harmonizers, by whose care all they have to say is often superseded.—Cheever, Inquiry into the Character of David, p. 5: 1702.

Harmony. s. [Gr. harmonia; Fr. harmonie.]

1. Just adaptation of one part to another.

The pleasures of the eye and ear are but the effects of equality, good proportion, or correspondence; so that equality and concordance are the causes of harmony.—Racon.

The harmony of things,
As well as that of sounds, from discord springs.

Sir J. Deaham.

Sure infinite wisdom must accomplish all its works with consummate harmony, proportion, and regularity.—Chepur.

2. Just proportion of sound; musical concord.

The sound
Symphonious, of ten thousand harps that tun'd Angelicharmonics.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 354.

Harmony is a compound idea made up of different sounds united.—Watts.

3. Concord; corresponding sentiment.

In us both one soul,
Harmony to behold in wedded pair!

More grateful than harmonious sounds to the ear.

Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 604.

Harness. s. [Fr. harnois.]

1. Armour; defensive furniture of war. Somewhat antiquated.

A worthy knight, all dress'd in harness meet,
That from his head no place appeared in his feet.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Of no right, nor colour like to right,
He doth fill fields with harness.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 2.

2. Traces of draught horses, particularly of carriages of pleasure or stute; (of other carriages we say gear).

Or wilt thou ride? Thy horses shall be trapp'd,
Their harness studded all with gold and pearl.

Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, Induct. ac. 2.

Their steeds around,
Free from their harness, graze the flow'ry ground.

Shakspeare.

Harness. v. a.

1. Dress in armour.

He was harness'd light,
And to the field was he.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.

Full fifty years, harness'd in rugged steel,
I have endur'd the biting winter's blast.

Romeo.

2. Defend; protect.

They saw the camp of the heathen, that it was strong, and well harness'd, and compass'd round about with horsemen.—1 Maccabees, iv. 7.

The remnant of the horsemen... being harness'd all over amidst the ranks, [in the margin, being compass'd with the ranks, or defended with the vallies].—Ibid. vi. 38.

3. Fix horses in their traces.

Before the door her iron chariot stood,
All ready harness'd for journey new.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Harness the horses, and set up the horsemen,
and stand forth with your helms.—Jeremiah, xvi. 4.

When I plow my ground, my horse is harness'd, and chained to my plough.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

Harpe. s. [A.S. hearp; L.Lat. harpa; German, harfe; Fr. harpe.]

1. Instrument strung with wire or gut, and commonly struck with the finger.

Arion, when through tempests' cruel wreck
He forth was thrown into the gravelly sea,
Through the sweet music which his harp did make,

Allur'd a dolphin him from death to ease. Spenser.
They touch'd their golden harps, and hymning
prais'd it.

God and his works. Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 238.
Nor wanted tuneful harp, nor vocal quire;
The muses sung, Apollo touch'd the lyre. Dryden.

2. Constellation so called, or Lyra.

Next shines the harp, and through the liquid skies
The shell, as lighted, first begins to rise;
This when sweet Orpheus struck, to listening rocks
He senses gave, and ears to wither'd oaks. Creech.

Harp. v. n.

1. Play on the harp.

I heard the voice of harpers harping with their harps. — Revelation, xiv. 2.
Tushimel cherubim,
And sworded seraphim,
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings display'd,
Harping in loud and solemn quire,
With unexpressive notes to Heaven's new-born heir.
Milton, Ode on the Nativity, 112.

2. Touch any passion, as the harper touches a string; dwell on a subject.

Gracious duke,
Harp not on that, nor do not banish reason
For inequality; but let your reason serve
To make the truth appear.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, v. 1
He seems
Proud and disdainful, harping on what I am,
Not what he knew I was.
Id., Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 11.

Harp. r. a.

1. Bring out as a sound from a harp.

Things without life giving sound, whether pipe or harp, except they give a distinction in the sounds, how shall it be known what is piped or harped? —
1 Corinthians, xiv. 7.

2. Touch; affect; move.

For thy good caution thanks,
Thou hast harp'd my fear aright.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

Harp on one string — Treat any subject in a too exclusive or monotonous manner.

You harp a little too much upon one string.
— Collier.

Harper. s. Player on the harp.

Never will I trust to speeches penn'd,
Nor to the motion of a schoolboy's tongue;
Nor woo in rhyme, like a blind harper's song.
Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

I'm the god of the harp: stop, my fairest — in vain.
Nor the harper, nor the harper could fetch her again.
Tickell.

Harping-iron. s. See Harpoon.

The boat which on the first assault did go,
Struck with a harping-iron the younger foe;
Who when he felt his side so rudely go'd,
Loud as the sea that nourish'd him he roar'd.
Waller.

Harpiat. s. Player on the harp.

She . . . can no less
Tame the fierce walkers of the wild-woods,
Than that Egyptian harpiat, for whose lay
Tigers with hunger plin'd, and left their prey.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, b. i. song 5.

Harpoon. s. [Spanish and Fr. harpon.] Barbed dart or javelin attached to a line for whale fishing.

Some fish with harpoons, some with darts are struck,
Some drawn with nets, some hang upon the hook.
Dryden.

Harpechord. s. [N. Fr. harpechorde.] Musical instrument, strung with wires, and played by striking keys.

Let them run divisions on the harpechord or virginals. — Parthena Sacra, p. 144: 1653.

He would exactly perform his part of many things to a harpechord or theorbo. — Bishop Fell, Life of Hammond.

I shall allow them to be harpechords, a kind of music, which every one knows is a consort by itself. — Tadler, no. 183.

Harpy. s. [Lat. harpyia; Gr. ἁρπυία.] 1. See extract.

The harpies were a kind of birds which had the faces of women, and foul long claws, very filthy creatures; which, when the table was furnished for Phineas, came flying in, and devouring or carrying away the greater part of the victuals, did so defile the rest that they could not be endured. — Sir W. Raleigh.

2. Ravenous person.

I will do you any amissment to the pignora, rather than hold three words conference with this harpy. — Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 2.

Harrotem. s. [?] Stuff or cloth so called.

Mean time, this silver'd with meanders gay,
In mimic pride the small-wrought tissue shines,
Perchance of taffety or of harrotem
Not ill expressive; such the power of snails!
Shenstone, Economy, pt. iii.

Harrier (dog). s. See Hound.

Harrier (bird). s. See Hen-harrier.

Harrihness. s. Roughness; huskiness.

Rare.

Dates are good for the harrihness or roughness of the throat. — Turner, Herball.

Harrow. s. [Daulish, haro = harrow; German, harke = rake.] Agricultural implement so called; timbers crossing each other, and set with teeth, drawn over sowed ground to break the clods and throw the earth over the seed.

The land with daily care
Is exercis'd, and with an iron war
Of rakes and harrows. Dryden

Two small harrows that clap on each side of the ridges, harrow it right up and down. — Mortimer, Husbandry.

Harrow. r. a.

1. Cover with earth by the harrow.

Friend, harrow in time, by some manner of means,
Not only thy person, but also thy beans.

Tassier, Five Hundred Points of Good Husbandry.

2. Break with the harrow.

Canst thou bind the unicorn with his band in the furrow? or will he harrow the valleys after thee? —
Job, xxxix. 10.

Let the Volcians
Plow Rome, and harrow Italy.

Harrow. r. a. [?] Acutely distress; rack.

The primary meaning is uncertain. Any one of the three significations of harrow
(1. instrument; 2. hery = seize; 3. interjection) will give it. Mr. Wedgwood (see Harrowing (of Hell)) chooses the last.
The editor prefers that of hery. See Hery.

1. Invade; harass with incursions; subdue.

Most glorious Lord of life, that on this day
Didst make thy triumph over death and sin;
And having harrow'd hell, didst bring away captivity thence captive, us to win. Spenser.

2. Pillage; strip; lay waste.

As the king did ever in good commonwealth laws, so he had in secret a design to make use of them, as well for collecting of treasure as for correcting of manners; and so meaning thereby to harrow his people, did accumulate them the rather. — Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

3. Tear up; rip up.

Imagine you behold me bound and scourg'd,
My aged muscles harrow'd up with whips;
Or hear me groaning on the rending rack. Romeo.

4. Disturb; put into commotion; overpower.

Most like: it harrowes me with fear and wonder.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 1.
I could a tale unfold, whose lighted word
Would harrow up thy soul, freeze thy young blood, Make thy two eyes, like stars, start from their spheres. Ibid., i. 5.

Harrow. interj. [N. Fr. haro, harao, haran, hure.] Exclamation of sudden distress; cry for help.

Harrow now out and weal away, he cried;
What dismal day hath sent this cursed light,
To see my lord so deadly damnify'd? Spenser.

Harrowed. part. adj. Distressed; overpowered.

Amas'd I stood, harrow'd with grief and fear.
Milton, Comus, 563.

Harrower. s. One who harrows.

The natives were likewise bound to give three plowdays each; and every plow was to be allowed four boon-leaves, and to harrow three days; and every harrower was allowed a brown loaf, and two herrings a day. — Blount, A Ancient Tenures, p. 143.

Harrowing (of Hell). s. See extract; also Harrow — Hery.

The harrowing of hell was the triumphant exposition of Christ after his crucifixion, when he brought away the souls of the righteous who had been held captive in hell since the beginning of the world. — Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymo- logy.

Harrowing. verbal abs. Acutely distressing.

See Harrow = Hery, v. a. 3, 4.

A harrowing night is one which leads to the exclamation of harrow. — Ibid.

Herry. v. a. [A. S. hergian.]

1. Tense; ruffle; vex.

I repent me much
That I so harried him.
Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 3.

2. Plunder.

The Saxons, with perpetual landings and invasions, harried the south coast of Britain. — Milton, History of England, b. ii.

Herry. v. n. Make harassing incursion.

What made your roughships
Harrowing for victuals here?
Beaumont and Fletcher, Bonduca.

Harsh. adj. [German, harsch.]

1. Austere; rough; sour.

Our nature here is not unlike our wine;
Some sorts, when old, continue brisk and fine;
No age's gravity may seem awry,
But nothing harsh or bitter ought to appear.

Sir J. Denham, Of Old Age, pt. iii.
The same defect of heat which gives a fierceness to our natures, may contribute to that roughness of our language, which bears some analogy to the harsh fruit of colder countries. — Swift.

2. Rough to the ear.

A name unmusical to Volcanian ears,
And harsh in sound to thine.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 5.
Age might, what nature never gives the young,
Have taught the smoothness of thy native tongue;
But nature needs not that, and wit will shine
Through the harsh cadence of a rugged line.

The unnecessary consonants made their spelling tedious, and their pronunciation harsh. — Id.

Thy lord commands thee now
With a harsh voice, and supercilious brow,
To serve duties. Id.

3. Crabbed; morose; peevish.

He was a wise man and an eloquent; but in his nature harsh and haughty. — Bacon.

Bear patiently the harsh words of thy enemies, as knowing that the anger of an enemy diminishes us of our duty. — Jeremy Taylor.

No harsh reflection left remembrance raise;
Forbear to mention what thou canst not praise.

A certain quickness of apprehension inclin'd him to kindle into the first motions of anger; but for a long time before he died, no one heard an intemperate or harsh word proceed from him. — Bishop Atterbury.

4. Rugged to the touch; rough.

Black feels as if you were feeling needles' points, or some harsh sand; and red feels very smooth. —
Boyle.

5. Unpleasant; rigorous.

With eloquence innate his tongue was arm'd;
Though harsh the precept, yet the preacher charm'd.
Dryden.

Harshly. adv. In a harsh manner.

1. Sourly; austere to the palate, as unripe fruit.

2. With violence: (in opposition to gentleness, unless in the following passage it rather signifies unripe).

Till, like ripe fruit, thou drop
Into thy mother's lap; or be with ease
Gather'd, not harshly pluck'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 535.

3. Severely; morosely; crabbedly.

I would rather he was a man of a rough temper, that would treat me harshly, than of an effeminate nature. — Addison.

4. Unpleasantly to the ear.

My wife is in a wayward mood to-day;
I tell you, 'twould sound harshly in her ears.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, iv. 4.
The rings of iron that on the doors were hung,
Sent out a jarring sound, and harshly rung.
Dryden.

Harshness. s. Attribute suggested by Harsh.

1. Sourness; austere taste.

Take an apple and roll it upon a table hard;
the rolling doth soften and sweeten the fruit, which is nothing but the smooth distribution of the spirits into the parts; for the unequal distribution of the spirits maketh the harshness. — Bacon.

2. Roughness to the ear.

Neither can the natural harshness of the French, or the perpetual ill accent, be ever refined into perfect harmony like the Italian. — Dryden.

'Tis not enough no harshness gives offence:
The sound must seem an echo to the sense.

Pope, Essay on Criticism, pt. ii.

5. Ruggedness to the touch.

Harshness and ruggedness of bodies is unpleasant to the touch.—Bacon.

4. Crabbedness; moroseness; peevishness.

Thy tender hatted nature shall not give These o'er to harshness: her eyes are fierce, but thin
Do comfort and not burn.

Shakespeare, King Lear, II. 4.

Thy beauty cannot move
Rage from the seas, nor thy love teach them love,
Nor tame wild Boreas' harshness.

Dante, Poems, p. 257.

Hart. s. [A.S. heart, heort.] He-deer; male of the hind; stag.

That instant was I turn'd into a hart,
And my desires, like fell and cruel hounds,
E'er since pursue me.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, I. 1.

The deer
And fearful harts do wander every where Amidst the dogs.

May, Translation of Virgil.

Hartshorn. s. See extract.

Hartshorn is a drug that comes into use many ways, and under many forms. What is used here are the whole horns of the common male deer, which fall off every year. This species is the fallow deer; but some tell us, that the medicinal hartshorn should be that of the true hart or stag. The salt of hartshorn is a great sudorific, and the spirit has all the virtues of volatile alkalies: it is used to bring people out of faintings by its pungency, holding it under the nose, and pouring down some drops of it in water.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

Rancous concretions of the volatile salts are observable upon the glass of the receiver, whilst the spirits of vipers and hartshorn are drawn. Woodward.

Hartstongue. s. Native fern so called, of the genus Scelopendra.

It [hartstongue] commonly grows out from the joints of old walls and buildings, where they are moist and shady. There are very few of them in Europe.—Miller.

Hartstongue is propagated by parting the roots, and also by seed.—Mortimer.

So saxifraga is good, and hartstongue, for the stone.
Drayton, Polyolbion, song 13.

Harcumscaram. adj. Flighty; hurried: (as 'a harum-scarum fellow.') Colloquial.

Harvest. s. [A.S. harfest.] Season of reaping and gathering the corn.

As it ebbs, the seedman
Upon the slims and once scatters his grain,
And shortly comes to harvest.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, II. 7.

Figuratively for fruits, reward, retribution, result.

From Ireland come I with my strength,
And reap the harvest which that rascal sow'd.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. III. 1.

When the father is too fondly kind,
Such seed he sows, such harvest shall he find.

Dryden.

Used adjectively or as the first element in a compound.

With harvest work he is worse than in spring.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

Harvest. v. a. Gather in.

I have men a stock of reeds harvested and stacked,
Two or three hundred pounds.—Pennant,
Tour in Scotland.

Harvest-home. s.

1. Song which the reapers sing at the feast made for having inured the harvest.

Your hay it is now'd, and your corn it is reap'd;
Your barns will be full, and your hovels heap'd;
Come, my boys, come,
Come, my boys, come,
And merrily rear out harvest-home.

Dryden.

2. Time of gathering harvest.

At harvest-home, and on the shearing-day,
When he should thus 's to Pan and Pales pay.

Dryden.

3. Opportunity of gathering treasure.

His with I will use as the key of the cuckold's rogue's coffer; and there's my harvest-home.—Shakespeare,
Merry Wives of Windsor, II. 2.

Harvester. s. One who harvests at the harvest.

I have appointed you, as harvesters, to go abroad in all the world, and bring in converts to heaven.—Hammond, Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament, I Peter, II. 8.

Harvestman. s. Labourer in harvest.

In this large field of the Scriptures, a man may gather some ears untouched after the harvest-men, how diligent never they were.—Archbishop Parker,
Preface to the Old Testament.

Like to a harvestmen, that's task'd to mow
Or all, or lose his hire. Shakespeare, Coriolanus, I. 2.

Hatch. v. a. [Fr. hacher.] Mince; chop into small pieces and mingle.

He rais'd his arm
Above his head, and rain'd a storm,
Of blows so terrible and thick,
As if he meant to hatch her quick.

Rutler, Hudibras.

What have they to complain of but too great variety, though some of the dishes be not served in the exactest order, and politeness; but hatched up in haste.—Garth.

Hatch. s. In Cookery. Kind of stew so called.

The cook should be reminded that if the meat in a hatch or mince be allowed to boil, it will immediately be hard, and can then only be rendered eatable by long stewing, which is by no means desirable for meat which is already sufficiently done.—Miss Acton, Modern Cookery.

Hask. s. [Swedish, hussas = rush.] This seems to signify a case or habitation made of rushes or flags. Obolete.

Phubus, weary of his yearly task,
Establish'd hath his steed in lowly lay,
And taken up his inn in fishes hask.

Spenser.

Hasp. s. [A.S. heaps.] Clasp folded over a staple, and fastened on with a padlock.

Have down to open and shut at pleasure, with hasps to them. Mortimer.

Hasp. v. a. Shut with a hasp.

Heard in a tombril, awkwardly you've shin'd,
With one fat slave before and none behind.

Garth, Dispensary, canto v.

Hassock. s. [see Hask.] Thick padded mat on which men kneel at church.

He found his parishioners very irregular; and in order to make them kneel, and join in the responses, he gave every one of them a hassock and common prayer-book.—Addison.

Haste. v. n. [Fr. hâter.] Move with swift-ness, eagerness, or hurry.

'Tis 'Cinna, I do know him by his gait;
He is a friend. Cinna, where haste you so?

Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, I. 2.

All these things are passed away like a shadow,
and as a post that hastes by.—Wisdom of Solomon,
v. 9.

Hasting to pay his tribute to the sea,
Like mortal life to meet eternity.

Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

These rites perform'd, the prince without delay
Hastes to the nether world, his destin'd way.

Drayton, Translation of the Ecce, VI. 336.

To distant Sparta, and the spacious waste
Of wandy Pyle, the royal youth shall haste.

Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, I. 118.

Haste. s.

1. Hurry; speed; nimbleness; precipitation.

Spare him, death!
But O, thou wilt not, cannot spare I
Haste hath never time to hear.

Crashaw.

Our lines reform'd, and not compos'd in haste,
Polish'd like marble, would like marble last;
But as the present, so the last are writ;
In both we find like negligence and wit.

Waller.

The wretched father running to their aid
With pious haste, but vain, they next invade.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, II. 254.

2. Passion; vehemence.

I said in my haste, All men are liars.—Psalms, cxvi. 11.

Haste. v. a. Push forward; urge on; precipitate; drive to swifter pace.

Let it be so hasted, that supper be ready at the farthest by five of the clock.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, II. 2.

All hopes of succour from your arms are past;
To save us now, you must our ruin haste.

Dryden.

Hasten. v. n. Make haste.

I hastened to the spot whence the noise came.—Defoe,
Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

Hasten. v. a. Hurry.

Each sees his lamp with different lustre crown'd;
Each knows his course with different periods bound;
And in his passage through the liquid space,
Nor hastens nor retards his neighbour's race.

Hastener. s. One who hastens or hurries.

[They] took upon them to be the saviours and preservers of the city; but, as it proved, the hasten- ers and precipitators of the destruction of that kingdom.—Hammond, Works, IV. 360.

Pride and indolence, the two great hasteners of modern poems.—Johnson, Rambler, no. 160.

Hastily. adv. In a hasty manner.

1. In a hurry; speedily; nimbly; quickly.

A voice, that called loud and clear,
Come hither, hither, O come hastily!

Spenser.

If your grace incline that we should live,
You must not, sir, too hastily forgive.

Waller.

The next to danger, but pursued by fate,
Half cloth'd half naked, hastily retire.

Dryden.

2. Rashly; precipitately.

Without considering consequences, we hastily engaged in a war which hath cost us sixty millions.
—Swift.

Hastiness. s. Attribute suggested by Hasty.

1. Haste; speed; hurry; precipitation.

A fellow being out of breath, or seeming to be furhaste, with humble hastiness told Basilissa.—Sir P.
Nichols.

2. Rash eagerness.

The turns of his verse, his breakings, his propriety, his numbers and his gravity, I have as far imitated as the poverty of our language, and the hastiness of my performance, would allow.—Dryden.

There is most just cause to fear, lest our hastiness to embrace a thing of so perilous consequence, should cause posterity to feel those evils.—Hooker,
Ecclesiastical Polity.

Hastings, s. pl. Peas that come early.

As loud as one that sings his part
To a wheel-barrow, or turnip-art
Or your new nick-named old invention
To cry green hastings with an engine.

Rutler, Hudibras.

The large white and green hastings are not to be set till the cold is over.—Mortimer, Household.

Hastlet. s. [see extract.] In Cookery. Dish so called.

[Hastlet, Hastener.—A hog's hastlet, or harslet, the liver, heart, and lights of a pig. Corrupted from haste- lets, French hastille, hasteril, hasturme, the pluck or garter of an animal. The sense is little roastings, from French haste, a spit, also a piece of roast meat, hastelle, hastel, hustille, a skewer, spit, whence English hastler, or corruptly haste- ler, a skewer to reverberate the fire on roasting meat. Hastlers, that roast the meat, astator, astor- ius (Pronunciation: Parulorum.) Old French hastler, the rack on which the spit turns; to haste, to roast. (Halliwell.)

'First to you I will schawe,
The pyrites of cure al by rawe;
Of potage, hastery and laskun mite.'
(Liber Cure Cocorum in Way.)

All from Latin haste, a spear, transferred to the signification of a spit. It is singular that the Dutch should have arrived by a totally different track at so similar a form as hast, a roast, hersteden, hasten, to roast, apparently from heerle, hearth. (Kilian.)
—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Hasty. adj.

1. Quick; speedy; passionate; vehement;
rash; precipitate.

He that is slow to wrath is of great understanding; but he that is hasty of spirit exalteth folly.—Provverbs, xiv. 29.

Next thou a man that is hasty in his words?
There is more hope of a fool than of him.—Ibid.,
xxix. 20.

Be not rash with thy mouth, and let not thine heart be hasty to utter any thing before God.—Ecclesiastes, v. 2.

2. Early ripe.

Beauty shall be a falling flower, and as the hasty
fruit before the summer.—Isaiah, xxviii. 4.

As the first element in a compound.

Is this the summer that we two have shar'd,
The sister's vows, the hours that we have spent,
When we have chid the hasty footed time
For parting us?

Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, IV. 2.

Hasty-pudding. s. Pudding made of milk and flour, boiled quickly together; as also of oatmeal and water boiled together.

Sure hasty-pudding is thy chiefest dish.
With bullock's liver, or some stinking fish.

Dorset.

Hat. s. [A.S. hæt.] Cover for the head.

She's as big as he is; and there's her thrummed hat, and her muffler too.—Shakespeare, Merry
Wives of Windsor, IV. 2.

His hat was like a helmet, or Spanish montero.—Bacon.

Hermes o'er his head in air appear'd,
And with soft words his drooping spirits cheer'd;
His hat adorn'd with wings disclos'd the gait,
And in his hand he bore the sleep-compelling rod.

Dryden.

Hatch. v. a. Closed as with a hatch.

If in our youth we could pick up some pretty outate, 'twere not amiss to keep our door hatched.—Shakespeare, Pericles, IV. 3.

Hatch. v. a.

1. Produce young from eggs by the warmth of incubation.

He kindly spreads his spacious wing,
And catches plenty for th' ensuing spring.

Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

1133

The tepid caves, and fens, and shores,
Their brood as numerous hatch from the eggs, that soon
Bursting with kindly rupture, forth disclose'd
Their callow young.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 417.

Quicken the egg by incubation.
When they have laid such a number of eggs as they can conveniently cover and hatch, they give over, and begin to sit.—Ray.

Others hatch their eggs and tend the birth, till it is able to shift for itself.—Addison.

3. Produce by precedent action.

Which thing they very well know, and, I doubt not, wilkessly confess, who live to their great both toil and grief, where the blasphemy of Ariane are renowned by them, who to hatch their horey have chosen those churches as fittest nests, where Athenian's creed is not heard.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

4. Form by meditation; contrive.

He was a man harmless and faithful, and one who never hatch'd any hopes prejudicial to the king, but always intended his safety and honour.—*Sir J.
Hayward.*

Thy wicked head never at rest, but hammering
And hatch'g hellish things.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Night Walker.

Hatch. v. a.

1. Chase; engrave.

Who first shall wound, through others' arms, his blood appearing fresh,
Shall win this sword, silver'd and hatch'd.

Chapman.

Such as Agamemnon and the hand of Greece
Should hold up high in brass; and such again
As venerable Nestor, hatch'd in silver.
Should with a bond of air, strong as the axle tree
On which heaven rides, knit all the Grecian cars
To his experience'd tongue.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, I. 3.

Doat on my horse well trapp'd; my sword well hatch'd!—Beaumont and Fletcher, Bonduca.
Some grave instructors on my life; they look,
For all the world, like old hatch'd hilts.

Id., Valentin.

A sword bravely gilt and hatch'd with gold.—
Heath, Chronicle of the Civil Wars, p. 411.

2. Cover.

His weapon hatch'd in blood.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Humorous Lieutenant.

His face
Is hatch'd with impudency threefold thick.
Heywood, Iron Age.

Hatch. v. n. Be in the state of growing quick.

He observed circumstances in eggs, whilst they were hatching, which varied.—Boyle.

Hatch. s.

1. Brood excluded from the egg.

In the age of Aristotle, it was generally said that no one had ever seen the hatch of the cuckoo.—
Translation of Buffon's History of Birds.

2. Exclusion from the egg; disclosure; dis- covery.

Something's in his soul,
O'er which his melancholy sits on brood;
And, I do doubt, the hatch and the disclosure
Will be some danger.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 1.

Hatch. s. Half door; door with an opening over it.

Something about, a little from the right,
In at the window, or else o'er the hatch.
Shakespeare, King John, I. 1.

In the plural. Doors or openings by which they descend from one deck or floor of a ship to another.

To the king's ship, invisible as thou art,
Thou shalt thou find the mariners asleep
Under the hatches.

Shakespeare, Tempest, v. 1.

The mariners all under hatches stow'd. Ibid. I. 2.
No sea, impelled by winds with added power,
Assault the sides, and o'er the hatches tow'r.

Dryden.

A ship was fasten'd to the shore;
The plank was ready laid for safe ascent,
For shelter there the trembling shadow bent,
And skipp'd and skulk'd, and under hatches went.

Id.

Be under hatches. Be in a state of ignominy, poverty, or depression.

Some, who have been phlegmatick, and therefore weak, or kept under hatches, and therefore lowly.—
Dean Pierce, Sermon, 29th May, 1661, p. 24.
He assures us how this fatherhood continued its course, till the captivity in Egypt, and then the poor fatherhood was under hatches.—Locke.

Hatchel. s. See Heckle.

Hatcher. s. One who hatches; contriver.

Let the hoppers and hatchers of new opinions be;

1134

amazed.—Lee, Bliss of Brightest Beauty, p. 32 1614.

A man ever in hate, a great hater and breeder of business.—Swift, Tale of a Tub, sect. 9.

Hatchet. s. [Fr. hachette.] Small axe.

His harmful hatchet he bent in his hand,
And to the field he speedeth.

Spenser
Our countryman presented him with a curious hatchet; and asking him whether it had a good edge, tried it upon the door.—Addison.

Hatchet-face. s. Ugly face; such, I sup- pose, as might be hewn out of a block by a hatchet.

Such is the sense given by Johnson, and, consequently, that in which he would himself have used it. What Dryden, the authority, meant is less certain. As the etymology will give more senses than one,
and as the question is 'one which can scarcely be settled by authority, the meaning is simply that which the person who uses it attaches to it. The editor's inquiries have led to a view different from Johnson's, i. e. to the notion suggested by hatchet being leanness, bonyness, or prominence of the face, and its sense being thin-visaged or hatchet-like rather than hatchet-hewn.

An ape his own dear image will embrace;
An ugly bean adorns a hatchet-face.

Dryden.

Hatching. part. adj. Shading (the shading consisting of crossed lines).

Those tender airs, and those hatching strokes of the pencil, which make a kind of minced meat in painting, are never able to deceive the sight.—Dryden.

Hatching. s. Etching.

[The] figure is afterwards with needles drawn deeper quite through the ground, and all the shading and hatching put in.—Harri.

Hatchment. s. [archaism.] Armorial escutcheon, exhibited on the hearse at fune- rals; sometimes hung up in churches.

His means of death, his obscure funeral,
No trophy, sword, nor hatchment o'er his bones,
No noble rites nor formal ostentation,
Cry to be heard.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 5.
I would have master Pynd-mantle, her grace's herald, to pluck down his hatchments, reverse his coat armour, and nullify him for no gentleman.—
H. Jonson, Staple of News.

Receive these pledges,
These hatchments of our grief, and grace us so much,
To place 'em on this hearse.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Bonduca.

Hatchway. s. Way over or through the hatches.

The men quickly following, the women on the gangways, twenty-five in number, were after a deperate struggle, overpowered or driven down below;
and the second party of boarders having now come forward amidst loud cheers, the hatchways were closed down, and a sharp fire opened upon the marines in the tops, who kept up a destructive fire of musketry. Sir A. Alison, History of Europe
during the French Revolution, ch. xxi. § 40.

As two words (for the sake of the metre).

They fought in desolation, disorder, and dismay,
And in eleven minutes they were down the main
hatch way.

Naval Song: 1813.

Hate. v. a. [A.S. hatian.] Detest; abhor; abominate; regard with the passion oppo- site to love.

Those old inhabitants of thy holy land, whom thou hatest for doing most odious works.—Wisdom of Solomon, xii. 4.

Hate. s. Hatred.

Speak then to me, who neither beg nor fear
Your favours nor your hate.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, I. 3.

Hate to Mænetius arm'd five hundred more.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Hateful. adj.

1. Causing hate or hatred.

My name's Macbeth.—
The devil himself could not pronounce a title
More hateful to mine ear.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 7.

But Unhriel, hateful genius! forbears not so;
He breaks the vial whence the sorrows flow.

Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iv.

2. Feeling abhorrence; abhorrent; detesting; malignant; malevolent.

Palamon compell'd
No more to try the fortune of the field;
And, worse than death, to view with hateful eyes
His rival's conquest.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, iii. 664.

Hatefully. adv. In a hateful manner.

1. Odiously; abominably.

The ceremony was hatefully tedious.—Drummond, Torela, p. 73.

Long since.

They shall deal with thee hatefully, take away all thy labour, and leave thee naked and bare.—Eschekel, xlii. 29.

Hater. s. One who hates; abhorrer; de- tester.

I of her understood of that most noble constancy, which whosoever loves not shows himself to be a hater of virtue, and unworthy to live in the society of mankind.—Sir P. Sidney.

They never wanted so much knowledge as to inform and convince them of the unlawfulness of a man's being a murderer, an hater of God, and a covenant-breaker.—South, Sermons.

Hatred. s. Hate; ill-will; malignity; male- volence; dislike; abhorrence; detestation; abomination; passion contrary to love.

I wish I had a cause to seek him there,
To oppose his hatred fully.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.
Hatred is the passion of aversion, and there is a kind of aversion and hostility included in its very essence; but then if there could have been hatred in the world when there was scarce any thing odious, it would have acted within the compass of its proper object.—South, Sermons.

Hatred is the thought of the pain which any thing present or absent is apt to produce in us.—Locke.

Hatreds are often begotten from slight and almost innocent occasions, and quarrels propagated in the world.—Id.

Retain no malice nor hatred against any; be ready to do them all the kindness you are able.—
Archbishop Wake.

She is a Presbyterian of the most rank and virulent kind, and consequently has an inveterate hatred to the church.—Swift.

Hatred has in it the guilt of murder, and just the guilt of adultery.—Bishop Sherlock.

Hatter. v. a. [?] Harass; weary; wear out with fatigue. Hate.

He's hatter'd out with penance.

Dryden.

Hatter. s. Maker of hats.

A hatter sells a dozen of hats for five shillings apiece.—Swift.

Hauberk. s. [N.F. hauberc; the French itself being derived from the German hals = neck + bergy = defence. Old High Ger- man, halsberc; A.S. halsberg; Italian, usbergo.] Armour for the neck and chest; breastplate; gorget.

And on the hauberk struck the prince so sure,
That quite disjointed all the linked frame,
And pierced to the skin.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.
Hauberks and helms are hewed with many a
wound;

The mighty maids with such haste descend,
They break the bones, and make the solid armour bend.

Dryden.

Haught. adj. Haughty. Archaic.

Proud Lucifer, which from the heavens on high
Down to the pit of hell below was cast, . . .
More haud of heart was not before his fall,
Than was this proud and pompous cardinal.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 322.

His courage haught
Desir'd of foreign women to be known,
And far abroad for strange adventures sought.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.
This haught resolve becomes your majesty.

Marlowe, King Edward II.
The proud insulting queen,
With Clifford and the haught Northumberland,
Have wrought the easy melting king like wax.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. ii. 1.
No lord of thine, thou haughtiest insulting man;
Nor no man's lord.

Id., Richard II. iv. 1.
A vine from Egypt thou hast brought,
Thy free love made it thine,
And drov'st out nations proud and haud
To plant this lovely vine.

Milton, Poems, lxx. 8.
Yet, were a few short summers mine,
My name should more than Kate's shine,
With honours all my own.

I had a sword, and have a breast,
That should have won as haught a crest
As ever waved along the lim
Of all those sovereignty acres of thine.

Byron, Parisina.

Haughtily. adv. In a haughty manner; proudly; arrogantly; contemptuously.

Neither shall ye go haughtily.—Micaiah, ii
Her heavenly form too haughtily she prisd;
His person hated, and his gifts despisd.

Haughtiness. s. Attribute suggested by

Haughty; pride; arrogance; quality of being haughty.

Writing in his pride to make the land navigable, and the sea passable by foot. Such was the haughtiness of his mind.—Maccabees, v. 21.

By the head we make known our supplications, our threatenings, our mildness, our haughtiness, our love, and our hatred.—Dryden.

Haughty, adj. [N.F. haut, haut = high.]

Haught the purer form, the -y, unless it represent the -ain in the French hautain, being an English affix.

1. Proud; insolent; arrogant; contemptuous.

His wife, being a woman of a haughty and impetuous nature, and of a wit superior to his, quickly resented the disrespect she received from him.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

I shall sing of battles, blood and rage; And haughty souls, blind mov'd with mutual hate, In fighting fields pursu'd and found their fate. Dryden.

2. Proudly great.

Our vanquish'd wills that pleasing force obey: Her goodness takes our liberty away; And haughty Britain yields to arbitrary sway. Prior.

3. Bold; adventurous; of high hazard.

Who now shall give me words and sound? Equal unto this haughty enterprise? Or who shall lend me wings, with which from ground My lowly verse may loftily arise? Sponser, Faerie Queen.

4. High; lofty.

Yea, God who rules the haughty heaven abish, Inrich'd my realm, with foyson of each thing; Abundant store did make my people king. Mirror for Magistrates, p. 208.

Haul, v. a. [Fr. huler = pull; German, holen = fetch, carry.] Pull with violence: (when applied to persons, with awkwardness or rudeness).

1. Frequent; be much about any place or person.

A man who for his hospitality is so much haunted, that no news stir but comes to his ears.—Sir P. Sidney.

Now we being brought known unto her, after once we were acquainted, and acquainted we were sooner than ourselves expected, she continually almost haunted us.—Id.

Celestial Venus haunts Idalia's groves; Diana Cynthia, Ceres Hybla loves. Pope.

2. Used in an ill sense of one that comes unwelcome.

You wrong me, sir, thus still to haunt my house; I told you, sir, my daughter is disposed of. Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 4.

Oh, could I see my country wail, There, leaning near a gentle brook, Sleep, or pursue some ancient book; And there in sweet oblivion drown These cares that haunt the court and town. Swift.

3. Used of apparitions or spectres that appear in a particular place.

Foul spirits haunt my resting place, And ghastly visions break my sleep by night. Fairfax.

Haunt, v. n. Be much about; appear frequently.

I've charg'd thee not to haunt about my doors: In honest plainness thou hast heard me say, My daughter's not for thee. Shakespeare, Othello, i. 1.

Where they most brood and haunt, I have observ'd The air is delicate. Id., Macbeth, i. 6.

Haunt, s.

1. Place in which one is frequently found.

Know and see his place where his haunt is, and who hath seen him there.—1 Samuel, xxiii. 22.

We set traps, nets, gins, snares, and traps, for beasts and birds in their own haunts and walks.—Sir J. Denham.

To me pertains not, she replies, To know or care where Cupid flies; What are his haunts, or which his way, Where he would dwell, or whither stray. Prior.

A scene where, if a god could cast his sight, A god might gaze and wonder with delight! Joy touch'd the messenger of heaven, he stay'd Entranc'd, and all the blissful haunt survey'd. Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, v. 35.

2. Habit of being in a certain place.

The haunt you have got about the courts will one day or another bring your family to beggary.—Arbuthnot.

Haunter, s. One who haunts; frequenter; one who is often found in any place.

The ancient Grecians were an ingenious people, of whom the vulgar sort, such as were haunters of theatres, took pleasure in the conceits of Aristophanes. Sir H. Wotton, On Education.

O golden, haunter of the woodland green, Queen of the yewer skies. Dryden.

Haut-gout, s. [Fr. = high taste or flavour.]

Anything with a strong relish or a strong scent, as overkept venison or game.

He deprives his appetite with haut-gouts. Butler, Remains, ii. 362.

They made use of both the leaves, stalk, and extract especially [of Silphium] as we now do garlic, and other haut-gouts, as nauseous altogether.—Evelyn.

Haútbois, s. [pronounced hoboy, being English in sound, though French in origin and spelling.] Variety of garden strawberry so called.

Haútboy, s. [Fr. haut bois = high wood.]

Wind instrument so called.

I told John of Gaunt he beat his own name; for you might have trusted him and all his apparied in an eel-skin; the case of a treble hautboy was a mansion for him.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iii. 2.

The hautboy, not as now with latten bound, And rival with the trumpet for his sound, But soft, and simple, a few holes breath'd time And tune too. B. Jonson, Translation of Horace's Art of Poetry.

Now give the hautboys breath; he comes, he comes. Dryden.

Hauteur, s. [Fr.] Pride; insolence; haughtiness.

The ill-judging zeal and hauteur of this king, In pushing things to extremity, brought on the Revolution.—Blackop Ellis, Treatise on Temporal Liberty, p. 185; 1765.

Havage, s. Possessions; fortune. Rare.

Peter knoweth Miss Hannah's havage; knoweth all her points; and pronounceth her unqualified for a first-rate racer, whatever her powers amongst the ponies.—Nil Admirari, p. 23.

Have, v. a. [A.S. habban, hafan.] In the other forms of this verb the v is ejected. Hence the second and third persons singular are hast, hath (has), for haves, haveth, the preterito and past participle had (haved). Notwithstanding this contraction, the word is short.

1. Possess; obtain; take; have about one; be supplied with; hold; maintain.

Upon the mast they saw a young man, who sat as on horseback, having nothing upon him.—Sir P. Sidney.

He that gathered much had nothing over, and he that gathered little had no lack.—Exodus, xvi. 18.

Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people?—Numbers, xi. 13.

Now, O Father, glorify me with thine own self, with the glory which I had with thee before the world was.—John, xvii. 5.

2. Accept as a husband or wife: (opposed to refuse; accept, however, is the commoner, or at least, the more polite opposite).

Upon my life then you took the wrong.—What need you tell me that? I think so, when I took a boy for a girl: if I had been married to him, for all he was in woman's apparel, I would not have had him.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 5.

3. Buy.

If these trifles were rated only by art and artfulness, we should have them much cheaper.—Collier.

4. Wish; desire.

I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.—Psalm, lxxix. 10.

I would have no man discouraged with that kind of life or series of notions, in which the choice of others, or his own necessities, may have engaged him.—Addison.

5. Be engaged as in a task or employment.

If we maintain things that are established, we have to strive with a number of heavy prejudices, deeply rooted in the hearts of men.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The Spaniard's captain never hath to meddle with his soldier's pay.—Sponser, View of the State of Ireland.

Of the evils which hindered the peace and good ordering of that land, the inconvenience of the laws was the first which you had in hand.—Ibid.

Kings have to deal with their neighbours, their wives, their children, their prelates or clergy, their nobles, their merchants, and their commons.—Bacon.

6. Hold opinion.

Sometimes they will have them to be natural heat, whereas some of them are crude and cold; and sometimes they will have them to be the quality of the tangible parts, whereas they are things by themselves.—Bacon.

With away. Remove.

That done, go and cart it, and have it away.—Tasso.

With a care: (note the use of the article, it has the same meaning as take).

I cannot speak; if my heart be not ready to burst! Well, sweet Jack, have a care of thyself.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. ii. 4.

Your plan is good; but still I say, beware: Laws are explained by men; so have a care. Pope, Imitations of Horace, b. ii. sat. 1.

With in: (it is nearly synonymous with hold).

Of them shall I be had in honour.—2 Samuel, vi. 22.

Have after, at, or with = Done! Agreed!

Let's follow: 'tis not fit thus to obey him.—Have after.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 4.

I can bear my part: 'tis my occupation; have at it with you.—Id., Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Will you go, Mrs. Page?—Have with you.—Id., Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

Captain, will you go?—Have with you.—Id., Othello, i. 2.

I never was out at a mad frolic, though this is the maddest I ever undertook: have with you, lady mine; I take you at your word.—Dryden, Spanish Friar.

In its construction as an auxiliary verb, have, though it can scarcely be said to retain, at the present time, its original power of indicating possession, is still, fundamentally, the word before us in respect to the construction of the combinations in which it appears. In these the words have or had are ordinary active, or transitive verbs; the substantive which follows being in the accusative case and governed by it. With this the participle agrees. Hence have or has denotes past time, though it is itself in the present tense. A little consideration will show how this may be. We cannot say that a man has a thing upon which any act has been performed without implying that the time of that act has gone by, i.e. I have a letter written, I have a letter as a written thing, runs easily into I have written a letter. A further extension of this view covers even such expressions as I have been where the verb is neuter.

Haven. s. [A.S. hafn.] Port; harbour; station for ships; refuge; resting place.

Love was threatened and promised to him, and his cousin, as both the tempest and haven of their best years.—Sir P. Sidney.

After an hour and a half sailing we entered into a good haven, being the port of a fair city.—Baron.

The queen beheld, as soon as day appear'd, The navy under sail, the haven clear'd.

Sir J. Denham, The Passion of Dido.
We may be shipwreck'd by her breath:
Love, favour'd once with that sweet gale,
Doubles his haste, and fills his sail,
Till he arrive, where she must prove
The haven, or the rock of love. Waller.

Havener. s. Overseer of a port or haven. These earls and dukes appointed their special officers, as receiver, havener, and customar.—Carew.

Haver. s. Possessor; holder. Valour is the chiefest virtue, and Most dignifies the haver.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, ii. 2.

Hæver. s. [Danish.] Oats. When you would amend, take a blue stone, such as they make hæver or oat cakes upon, and lay it upon the cross hairs of iron.—Peckham.

Hæverack. s. Kind of course bag, in which soldiers carry provisions. And next the venerable man From out his hæverack and can Prepared and spread his slender stock.

Byron, Mazeppa.

Hæving. verbal abs. 1. Possession; estate; fortune.

My hæving is not much;
I'll make division of my present with you;
Hold, there is half my coffee.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Our content is our best hæving.

Id., Henry VIII, ii. 3.

2. Act or state of possessing. Of the one side, was alleged the hæving a picture, which the other wanted; of the other side, the first striking the shield.—Sir P. Sidney. Thou art not for the fashion of these times, Where none will sweat but for promotion; And having that do choketh their service up, Ev'n with the hæving.

Shakespeare, As you like it, ii. 3.

Hæviour. s. Conduct; manners; behaviour. Her heavenly hæviour, her princely grace. Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, April. Their ill hæviour garra men missay Both of their doctrine and their fay.

Id., September.

Put thyself Into a hæviour of less fear.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iii. 4.

Hævee. s. [? Welsh, hafog.] Destruction; waste.

Having been never used to have any thing of their own, they make no spare of any thing, but harock and confusion of all they meet with.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Saul made harock of the church.—Acts, viii. 3. The Rabbin, to express the great harock which has been made of the Jews, tell us, that there were such torrents of holy blood shed, as carried rocks of a hundred yards in circumference above three miles into the sea.—Addison.

If it had either air or fuel, it must make a greater harock than any history mentions.—Chapman.

Used as an interjection.

That noo man be so hardy to crye harocke, upon payne of hym that is so fawnde beginner, to dye therefore; and the remenant to be emprysoned, and theyr bodies punished at the kynge's will.—Statutes of Warre, &c., by King Henry VIII.: 1513. Why stand these royal fronts amazed thus? Cry harock, kins.

Shakespeare, King John, ii. 2.

A falconer Henry is, when Emma hawks;
With her of tartsels and of larks he talks.
Prior, Henry and Emma.

2. Fly for the purpose of attack, as a hawk.

A falcon towering in her pride of place,
Was by a mousing owl hawk'd at and kill'd.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 4.

Whether upward to the moon they go,
Or dream the winter out in caves below,
Or hawk at flies elsewhere, concerns us not to know.
Dryden.

Hawk. v. n. [from Welsh hochi.] Bring up phlegm.

Come sit, sit, and a song. . . . Shall we clap into't roundly, without hawking or spitting, or saying we are hoarse, which are the only prologues to a bad voice?—Shakespeare, As you like it, v. 3.

Hawk. v. a. Bring up by hawking in the way of expectoration.

She complained of a stinking tough phlegm which she hawk'd up in the mornings. Wise man.

Hawkers and hunters, drunkards, fornicators, adulterers, having no other god but their belly.—Harnar, Translation of Rza's Sermons, p. 33k.

2. One who hawks as a dealer.

I saw my labours, which had cost me so much thought, hawked about by common hawkers, which I once intended for the consideration of the greatest person.—Swift.

To grace this honour'd day the queen proclaims,
By herald hawkers, high beacock causes,
She summons all her sons; an endless band
Pours forth, and leaves unpeopled the land.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 17.

Hawking. verbal abs. Sport or diversion of flying hawks at fowls.

One followed study and knowledge, and another hawking and hunting.—Locke.

Hawking. part. adj.

Blood, cast out of the throat or windpipe, is spit out with a hawking or small cough.—Harey.

Hawk-nosed. adj. Having an aquiline nose: (sometimes corrupted into hook-nosed).

He was tall of stature, and slender, being hawk-nosed. Life of Bernard Gilpin, p. 60: 1623.

If flat-nosed, who is gentle and courteous: if hawk-nosed, she means then to be of a kindly race.—Ferrand, L'oeu Melancholy, p. 35.

Hawkbeard. s. Native plants so called, of the genera Crepis and Borkhusia.

Hawkweed. s. Native plants of the genus Hieracium, which it approximately translates (tipak = hawk).

Hawse. v. n. [N.Fr. hausser, haulser.]

Everything was hawsed above measure; ancrements were turned into lines, lines into ransoms.—Sir T. More. (Rich.)

He wayed up his anchors and hawsed up his sails.

—Drifflon. (Rich.)

[The hawse-holes (are) the holes in the bow of a ship through which the cable runs in hawling or raising the anchor.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Hawses. s. pl. See extract.

Dance the hay.

He taught them rounds and winding hays to tread,
And about trees to cast themselves in rings.

Sir J. Davies.

I will play on the labor to the worthies,
And let them dance the hay.

Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 1.

Hence shadows, seeming idle shapes
Of little frisking elves and apes,
To earth do make their wanton escapes
As hope of pasture lures them;
Which maids think on the hearth they see,
When fires well nigh consumed be,
There dancing hays by two and three,
Just as their fancy casts them.

Drayton, Nymphidia.

The gum and glist'ning, which with art
And study'd method, in each part Hangs down,
Looks just as if that day

Snails there had crawl'd the hay. Sir J. Suckling.

Hæyloft. s. Loft to put hay in.

The dairy, barn, the hæyloft, and the grove.

Gap, North of the Squire.

grass for hay. As to the return of his health and vigour, were you here, you might enquire of his hæymakers.

Pope, Letter to Swift.

Hæythorn. s. Hawthorn.

They hang in their entries (among other things) hæythorn, otherwise white-thorn, gathered on May-day.—Scott, Discovery of Witchcraft, p. 132.

Hæyward. s. [from hæg = hedge.] Parish, or district, petty officer so called, whose business is the conservation of the enclosures; etymologically, hedge-warden.

There may be a custom in a manor to have a surveyor of the fields or hæyward, and for him to detain cattle damaged by them.—Toulton, Law Dictionary. (Gauger.)

Hæzard. s. [Fr. hazard; Spanish, azar = unlucky throw of dice.]

1. Chance; accident; fortuitous hap.

I have set my life upon a cast,
And I will stand the hazard of the die.

Shakespeare, Richard III. v. 4.
Where the mind does not perceive connection,
there men's opinions are not the product of judgement,
but the effects of chance and hazard, of a mind floating at all adventures without choice and without direction.—Locke.

2. Danger; chance of danger.

We are bound to yield unto our Creator, the Father of all mercy, eternal thanks, for that he hath delivered his law unto the world; a law wherein so many things are laid open, as a light which otherwise would have been buried in darkness, not without the hazard, or rather not with the hazard, but with the certain loss of thousands of souls, most undoubtedly now saved.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The hazard I have run to see you here, should inform you that I love not at a common rate.—Irridan.
Men are led on from one stage of life to another in a condition of the utmost hazard, and yet without the least apprehension of their danger.—Rogers.

3. Game at dice so called.

The duke playing at hazard, held in a great many hands together, and drew a huge heap of gold.—Swift.

HAZARD. v. a. Expose to chance, danger, risk, or hazard.

They might, by persisting in the extremity of that opinion, hazard greatly their own estates, and so weaken that part which their places now give.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

It was not in his power to adventure upon his own fortune, or bearing a public charge, to hazard himself against a man of private condition.—*Sir J.
Hayward.*

By dealing indifferently meretriciously to all, you may hazard your own share.—Bishop Sherlock.

HAZARD. v. n. Run a risk; stand a chance.

I pray you tarry; pause a day or two,
Before you hazard; for in choosing wrong
I lose your company.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.
She from her low-provinces would go,
Rather than hazard to have you her foe. Waller.

HAZARDOUS. adj. Capable of being haz- arded; venturous; liable to chance. Rare.

An hazardous determination it is, unto fluctuating and indifferent events, to affix a positive type or period.—Sir T. Browne.

HAZARDOR. s. One who hazards; gamester.

The outrageous divers and hazardors.—Confuta-tion of N. Shaeton, sign. B. vi. 156d.

HAZARDOUS. adj. Invested with, character- ized or accompanied by, hazard or risk; dangerous; exposed to chance.

Grant that our hazardous attempt prove vain,
We feel the worst, secur'd from greater pain. Dryden.

HAZARDRY. s.

1. Temerity; precipitation; rash adventu- rousness. Rare.

Hasty wrath, and heedless hazardry,
Do breed repentance late, and lasting infamy. Spenser, Faerie Queer.

2. Gaming in general; playing at the game of hazard.

Some fell to daunce; some fell to hazardry;
Some to make love. Spenser, Faerie Queer.

HAZE. s. Incipient, or slight, fog or mist.

In the fog and haze of confusion all is enlarged, and appears without any limit.—Barker.

HAZE. v. n. Become hazy.

It hazes; it mingles, or rains small rain.—Ray, North Country Words.

HAZEL. s. [A.S. hæsel.] Nut and nuttree so called, of the genus Corylus.

Why sit we not beneath the grateful shade,
Which hazels, intermix'd with elms, have made? Dryden.

Used adjectively.

Kate, like the hazel twig,
Is straight and slender; and as brown in hue
As hazel nuts, and sweeter than the kernels. Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, II. 1.
Her chariot is an empty hazel nut.

Id., Romeo and Juliet, I. 4.
There are some from the size of a hazel nut to that of a man's fist.—Woodward.
The nuts grow in clusters, and are closely joined together at the bottom, each being covered with an outward husk or cup, which opens at the top, and when the fruit is ripe it falls out. The species are hazel nut, cobnut, and filbert. The red and white filberts are mostly esteemed for their fruit.—Miller.

HAZEL. adj. Having the colour of hazel.

Choose a warm dry soil, that has a good depth of light hazel mould.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

HAZELLY. adj. Same as preceding.

Uplands consist either of sand, gravel, chalk, rock or stone, hazelly loam, clay, or black mould.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

HALE. v. a. [Fr. hasler, haler.] Dry in the air. Obsolete.

Those that by that happy wind of thine didst hale and dry up the fœdora dregs and slime of Noah's deluge.—Rogers, Naaman the Syrian, (Trench.)

HAZY. adj. Dark; foggy; misty.

Our clearest day here is misty and hazy; we see not far, and what we do see is in a bad light.—T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

He. The personal pronoun for the third person of the masculine gender and the singular number; i.e. pronoun denoting a single male. The original inflexion was complete; heo being the nominative feminine, and hi, heora, heom, the plural; now superseded by she, they, their, and th
all of which, though now treated as feminine and plural forms, are wholly different words; i.e. they stand in, no etymological or inflexional relation to He.

Again, the original neuter was hi-t; the
-t being the -t in that, and whet, a true neuter inflexion, though limited to the nominative case. The genitive or possessive neuter was his, i.e. the same as the masculine. Its (see I) is a new form.

Who can impress the forest, bid the tree
Unfix his earth-bound root?

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.
Not the dreadful spout.

Shall dizzy with more clamour Neptune's ear
In his descent. Id., Troilus and Cressida, v. 2.

There's not the smallest orb, which thou beholdest,
But in his motion like an angel shins,
Still quiring to the young-eyed cherubims.

Id., Merchant of Venice, v. 1.
This rule is not so general, but that it admitteth his exceptions.—Cicero, Speech of Cornelia.
Opium loath some of her poisonous quality, if it be vapoured out, mingled with spirit of wine.
—Bacon.

His and her, even when treated as such, are never adjectives. They agree with the Latin ejus, rather than the Latin eius.
This is shown by expressions like her father, his mother, wherein her and his agree in gender, not with mother and father, but with the person whose mother or father is spoken of.

Her is sometimes, though much more rarely, used in a singular combination.

1. Male: (as, a he bear, a he goat).

The he's in birds have the fairest feathers.—Bacon.

2. Man.

I stand to answer thee, or any he the proudest of thy sort. Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III, ii. 2.

I should not have been so rude to have taken it from you, if you had called your; but I'd have you know I'm a better man to suffer the best he in the kingdom to drink before me in my own house, when I call your.—Fletcher, Adventures of Joseph Andrews.

3. Individual.

Such mortal dunes I have; but Mantua's law
Is death to any he that utters them. Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, v. 1.

4. Mistaken for 's, the sign of the Possessive case.

Where is this mankind now? who lives to age
Fit to be made Methuselah's son? Donne.
By thy fond consort, by thy father's cares,
By young Telemachus thy blooming years.

Pope, Translation of the Odyssey.
My paper is the Cyclops his law, in which every man of wit or learning may try his strength.—Addison, Guardian, no. 28.

The same single letter (s) on many occasions does the office of a whole word, and represents the his and her of our forefathers.—Id., Spectator, no. 133.

It is sometimes used as a sign of the genitive case:
as 'the man his ground,' for 'the man's ground.' It is now rarely thus used, as its use proceeded probably from a false opinion that the s formative of the genitive was his contracted. Dr. Johnson.

The latter instance might have shewn him, how groundless this notion is; for it is not easy to conceive how the letter s added to a feminine noun should represent the word her, any more than it should the word their added to a plural noun; as,
'the children's bread.' But the direct derivation of this case from the Saxon genitive case is sufficient of itself to decide this matter.—Lowth, Introduction to English Grammar.

Since the remarks on this use of his
by Addison, Johnson, and Lowth, much has been written on the subject; the fact of the 's in his being not only the s in father's, mother's, and the substantives in general, but also the s of patrimony, patri-s, &c., in other words of the Latin, Greek, Slavonic, and Sanskrit genitive case, being conclusive in favour of the view taken by Lowth. Still, the other doctrine has found, and still finds, favourers; not, perhaps, as a general rule, but as favouring certain instances; indeed it is difficult to deny that such an expression as the father—his son, is either as an ellipsis, or by some other figure of speech, justifiable. The evidence, however, of the h and i having been lost, and the contraction into a simple 's having taken place, is wanting; indeed the actual process seems to have been the very reverse. The forms in his are all later than the forms in 's.

When the nominative case ends in -s,
the tendency to confusion is increased.
Telemachus's son differs from Telemachus his son by only a single sound.

Her similarly known.

First making known his lawful claim
In Argente fil right,
He warred in Deriu, and he won
Bernicia, too, in fight.

Warner, Albion's England.
(For further remarks see Hence, Here, II, She, and They.)

HEAD. s. [A.S. heafod.]

1. Part of the animal that contains the brain or the organ of sensation or thought.

The dewy paths of meadows we will tread,
For crowns and chaplets to adorn thy head. Dryden.

I could still have offers, that some, who hold their heads hither, would be glad to accept.—Swift.

2. Person.

What he acts more of her than sharp words, let it lie on my head.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Win-dors, ii. 1.

Who of all men to succeed, bid feeling
The evil on him brought by me, will curse
My head? I'll fare our ancestor's impure. Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 733.

3. Individual.

When Innocent desired the marquis of Carpio to furnish thirty thousand head of swine, he could not spare them; but thirty thousand lawyers he had at his service.—Addison.

The tax upon pasturage was raised according to a certain rate per head upon cattle.—Archbold.
If there be six millions of people, then there is about four acres for every head.—Grant.

4. Chief; principal person; one to whom the rest are subordinate; leader, commander.

For their commonness, there is little danger from them, except it be where they have great and potent heads.—Bacon.

Your head I him appoint:
And by myself have sworn, to him shall bow
All knees in heaven, and shall confess him Lord. Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 322.

The heads of the chief sects of philosophy, as Timon, Anaxagoras, and Pythagoras, did consent to this tradition.—Archbishop Tillotson.

5. Place of honour; first place.

Notwithstanding all the justices had taken their places upon the bench, they made room for the old knight at the head of them.—Addison.

6. Place of command.

An army of fourscore thousand troops, with the duke of Marlborough at the head of them, could do nothing.—Addison.

7. Top of anything; knob.

A man fetcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve.—Deuteronomy, xix. 5.

His spear's head weighed six hundred shekels of iron.—1 Samuel, xvii. 7.

As high
As his proud head is rais'd towards the sky,
So low low'ls his hell his roots descend. Dr. Deham.

Trees, which have large and spreading heads, would lie with their branches up in the water.—Woodward.

HEAD

If the buds are made our food, they are called heads or tops; so heads of asparagus and artichokes.—Watts.
Head is an equivocal term; for it signifies the head of a nail, or of a pin, as well as of an animal.—Id.

With this meaning applied to roots.

How turnips hide their swelling heads below,
 And how the closing coleworts upwards grow.—Gay, Pastoral.

8. Fore part of anything, as of a ship.

By gallees with brass heads who might transport over India at once three hundred thousand soldiers.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Their heads are turn'd to sea, their sterns to shore.
Dryden.

9. That which rises on the top.

Let it stand in a tub four or five days before it be put into the cask, stirring it twice a day, and beating down the head or yeast into it.—Mortimer.

10. Upper part of a bed.

And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.—Genesis, xlii. 31.

11. Headdress.

Ladies think they gain a point when they have teased their husbands to buy them a laced head, or a fine petticoat.—Swift.

12. Principal topic of discourse.

These heads are of a mixed order, and we propose only such as belong to the natural world.—T. Burnet,
Theory of the Earth.

"Tis our great interest, and duty, to satisfy ourselves on this head, upon which our whole conduct depends.—Bishop Atterbury.

13. Source of a stream; headwater.

It is the glory of God to give; his very nature delighteth in it: his mercies in the current, through which they would pass, may be dried up, but at the head they never fail.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
 The current by Giza is but a small stream, rising between it and the Red sea, whose head from Giza is little more than twenty English miles.—Sir W.
Raleigh, History of the World.
 Some did the song, and some the choir maintain,
 Beneath a laurel shade, where nightly Po
 Mounts up to woods above, and hides his head below.
Dryden.

14. Top of a pustule, pimple, or boil, in which matter, a sign of maturation or ripening, appears; hence, (with come or grow):
a. Crisis; pitch.
 The indisposition which has long hung upon me, is at last grown to such a head, that it must quickly make an end of me, or of itself.—Addison.
b. Body; conflux.
 People under command chuse to consult, and after to march in order; and rebels, contrariwise, run upon an head together in confusion.—Bacon.
 A mighty and a fearful head they are,
 As ever offer'd foul play in a state.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 2.
 For in the marches here we heard you were,
 Making another head to fight again.
Id., Henry VI. Part III. ii. 1.
 Let all this wicked crew
 Depart, divide themselves from good men, gather
 Their forces to one head.
B. Jonson, Catiline's Conspiracy, iv. 3.

Head and ears. Whole person. Over head and ears is applied to a person greatly in debt, in love, &c.

"You're over head and ears, ere you be aware."
Beaumont and Fletcher, Wit at several Weapons.
Head and shoulders. By force; violently.
 People that hit upon a thought that tickles them,
 will be still bringing it in by head and shoulders, over and over, in several companies.—Sir R. L'E-
strange.
 They bring in every figure of speech, head and shoulders by main force, in spite of nature and their subject.—Fellon.

With beat. Trouble one's brains.
 The lazy and inconsiderate took up their notions by chance, without much beating their heads about them.—Locke.
 If a man shows that he has no religion, why should we think that he beats his head and troubles himself to examine the grounds of this or that doctrine?—Id.

With get. Power; influence; force; strength;
 dominion.
 Within her breast though calm, her breast though
 pure,
 Motherly cares and fears get head, and rule'd
 Some troubled thought.
Milton, Paradise Regained, ii. 63.

With give. Give a horse a free rein.
 He gave his able horse the head,
 And bounding forward, struck his agile heels
 1138

HEAD

Against the panting sides of his poor jade
 Up to the rowl-head.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. i. 1.
 God will not admit of the passionate man's apology, that he has so long given his unruly passions their head, that he cannot now govern nor controul them.—South, Sermons.

Lay heads together. Combine in a plan.

The wretches laid their heads together.—Sir R.
L'Estrange.

 Against my power.

Two valiant gentlemen making head against them, accounted by half a dozen more, made forty run away.
Sir W. Raleigh.

Shin having depraved his judgement, and got possession of his will, there is no other principle left him naturally, by which he can make head against it.—South, Sermons.

On one's own head. Spontaneously; without orders; on one's own responsibility.

The bordering wars in this kingdom were made altogether by volunteers, upon their own heads, without any pay or commission from the state.—Sir
J. Davies.

Often used adjectivally; often, also, used as the first element in a compound.

Head. v. a.

1. Lead; influence; direct; govern.

Alas, who would our friend, in either fed,
 Or, what we fear, our enemies does head.
Dryden.
 Nor is what has been said of princes less true of all other governors, from him that heads an army to him that is master of a family, or of one single servant.—South, Sermons.
 This lord had headed his appointed bands,
 In firm allegiance to his king's commands.
Prior.

2. Behead; kill by taking away the head.

If you head and hang all that offend that way but for ten years together, you'll be glad to give out a commission for more heads.—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 1.

3. Fit with a head, or principal part.

Headed with flints and feathers bloody dy'd,
 Arrows the Indians in their quivers hid.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.
 Of cornel-wood a spear upright,
Headed with piercing steel, and polish'd bright.
Dryden.

4. Enter as a main division of a book, or speech.

Now let us look to pilgrimages; to the preference for the particular image of a saint at some one place, over other images of the same saint elsewhere; to the public advertisement of accounts of purgato-rial remission for specified external acts; to the very prayers which we find in the churches of the continent, headed with the promise that such and such religious advantages shall be given to all who devoutly recite them.—Tillotson, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. vii. § 30.

5. Lop trees.

You must disbranch them, leaving only the mummified entire: it may be necessary to head them too.—Mortimer.

6. Get ahead of.

The horses headed; the marquess kept his seat;
 Lucretia, alarmed, sprang up, the carriage was dashed against the trunk of a tree, and she was thrown out of it, at the very instant that one of the outriders had succeeded in heading the equipage and checking the horses.—Disraeli the younger,
Coningsby, h. vi. ch. v.

Headach. s. Pain in the head: the medical term being Cephalalgia, which translates it (κεφαλή = head, άλγος = pain).

From the cruel headach,
 Riches do not preserve.
Sir P. Sidney.
 Nothing more exposes to headachs, colds, catarrhus, and coughs, than keeping the head warm.—Locke.
 In the headach he orders the opening of the vein of the forehead.—Arbuthnot.

At some dear idle time,
 Not plagu'd with headachs, or the want of rhyme.
Pope, Epistles to Miss Blount, ep. ii.

Headband. s. Fillet for the head; topknot.
 The Lord will take away . . . the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs, and the headbands.—Isaiah,
 iii. 20.

Headborough. s. Constable; subordinate constable.

Here lies John Dod, a servant of God, to whom he is gone,
 Father or mother, sister or brother, he never knew none.
 A headborough and a constable, a man of fame,
 The first of his house, and last of his name.
Epitaph from Camden.

HEAD

This none are able to break thorough,
 Until they are freed by head of borough.
Butler, Hudibras.

Headress. s. [the d double in sound as well as in spelling.]

1. Covering of a head.

There is not so variable a thing in nature as lady's headress: I have known it rise and fall above thirty degrees.—Addison, Spectator, no. 98.
 If e'er with airy horns I planted heads,
 Or discompos'd the headress of a prude.
Pope.

2. Anything resembling a headress, and prominent on the head.

Among birds the males very often appear in a most beautiful headress, whether it be a crest, a comb, a tuft of feathers, or a natural little plume, erected like a kind of pinnacle on the very top of the head.
Addison.

Headed. adj. Having a head or top; come to a head.

Embossed sores, and headed evils.
Shakespeare, As you like it, ii. 7.

Header. s.

1. One who, or that which, heads; whether by putting a head on anything, as in nail-making or plimaking, or by acting as a head, captain, director, or leader, in which case it is a near equivalent to chief, from Fr. chef; Lat. caput = head.

2. First brick in the angle.

If the header of one side of the wall is toothed as much as the stretcher on the outside, it would be a stronger toothing, and the joints of the headers of one side would be in the middle of the headers of the course they lie upon of the other side.—Mozon.

3. Plunge into water, made headforemost, by a bather or swimmer. Colloquial.

Headgargle. s. [P] Disease in cattle so called.
 For the headgargle, give powder of fenugreek.—Mortimer.

Headgear. s. Dress of a woman's head.
 Those glittering attires, counterfit colours, head- gears, curled hairs, &c. wherewith our countrywomen counterfeit a beauty.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 478.

Headily. adv. In a heady manner; hastily;
 rashly; so as not to be governed.

What strange fury possesseth the minds of ignorant, unstable men, that they should thus headily desire and sue to shake off so sacred and well-grounded an institution?—Remonstrance to Parlia- ment, p. 22; 1640.

Had they not been headily carried on by passion and prejudice, they would never have passed this rash sentence.—Archbishop Tillotson, xii. 125. (Ord MS.)

Headiness. s. Attribute suggested by heady; hurry; rashness; stubbornness;
 precipitation; obstinacy.

If any will rashly blame such his choice of ad-and unwonted words, him may I more justly blame, and condemn, either of witless headiness in judging, or of headless hardness in condemning.—E. K., On Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar.

Heading. s. Notice, title, or mark of any kind used in writing or composition to indicate the nature of matter which follows:
 (as, the heading of a part, chapter, paragraph, or clause).

Headkercher. s. Kerchief for the head;
 (as Kerchief itself is from couvre = cover
 + chef = head, and means head-covering, the compound is tautological).

The animal doth purdle and correct the ayre, and they do perfume therewith their headkerchers when they do go to sleep.—Frampton, Joyfull News,
p. 3. (Ord MS.)

Headland. s.

1. Promontory; cape.

An heroic play ought to be an imitation of an heroic poem, and consequently love and valour ought to be the subject of it: both these sir William Davenant began to shadow; but it was so as discovers draw their maps, with headlands and promontories.—Dryden.

2. Ground at the end of a land as formed by furrows.

Now down with the grass upon headlands about,
 That growth in shadow no rank and so stout.
Tasso, Five Hundred Points of good
Husbandry.

Headless. adj.

1. Wanting a head.

a. Of the body.

HEAD

His shining helmet he 'gan soon unlace,
And left his headless body bleeding at the place.

b. Chief.

They reeded not until they had made the empire stand headless about seventeen years. — Sir W. Raleigh.

All confidence was now at an end. It was notorious that Pope John meditated escape; and should he escape would boldly appeal to Christendom against the decrees of a headless council. The council was determined that he should not leave the city. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiii. ch. ix.

c. Sense.

[He] calleth it a rumour, which is an headless tale.
— Baron, Charge in the Star-Chamber.

It may more justly be numbered among those headless old-wives' tales, which Plutarch so justly derideth. — Petherick, Athenæstæ, p. 62.

2. Obstinate; inconsiderate; ignorant; wanting intellects; perhaps for headless.

How may I more justly blame and censure, either of witless headlessness in judging, or of headless hardness in condemning. — E. K., On Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar.

Headlong. adj.

1. Steep; precipitous.

Rise, rise, and leave thy rosy head
From thy coral-paven bed;
And bridle in thy headlong way,
Till thou our summons answer'd have.
Milton, Comus, 883.

2. Rash; thoughtless; sudden; precipitate.

It suddenly fell from an excess of favour, which many examples having taught them, never stooped his race till it came to a headlong overthrow. — Sir P. Sidney.

Headlong. adv. [see Groveling.]

1. With the head foremost.

I'll look no more,
Lest my brain turn, and the delicate sight
Tumble down headlong. Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 4.
Who, while he steering view'd the stars, and bore
His course from Africa to the Lætan shore,
Fell headlong down.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Headlong from thence the glowing fury springs,
And o'er the Thibian palace spreads her wings.
Pope, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad of Statius.

2. Rashly; without thought; precipitately.

To give Alab such warning, as might infallibly have prevented his destruction, was esteemed by him evil; and to push him on headlong into it, because he was fond of it, was accounted good. — South, Sermons.

Some ask for envy'd pow'r, which public hate
Pursues and hurries headlong to their fate;
Down go the titles.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, sat. 3.

3. Hastily; without delay or respite.

Hence will I drag thee headlong by the heels,
Unto a dunghill, which shall be thy grave.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 10.
Unhappy offspring of my tearing wound!
Dragg'd headlong from thy cradle to thy tomb.
Dryden.

Headmoney. s. Capitation tax.

To be taxed by the pole, to be wencod our head-money. — Milton, Of Reformation in England, n. ii.

Head-mould-shot. s. [arcent doubtful.] See extract.

[Headmouldshot] is when the sutures of the skull, as ride . . . in . . . the shot over one another, which is frequent in infants, and occasions convulsions and death. — Quincy.

Headpiece. s.

1. Armour for the head; helmet; morion.

I pulked off my headpiece, and humbly intreated her pardon, or knowledge why she was cruel. — Sir P. Sidney.
The word is given; with eager speed they leave
The shining headpiece, and the shield embrace.
Dryden.

This champion will not come into the field, before his great blunderbuss can be got ready, his old rusty breastplate secured, and his cracked headpiece mended. — Swift.

2. Understanding; force of mind.

'Tis done by some several
Of headpiece extraordinary, lower measures
Perchance are to this business purblind.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 1.

Kumene had the best headpiece of all Alexander's captains. — Prideaux.

Headshake. s. Shake of the head, generally

suggestive of doubt or denial.
You, at such times seeing me, never shall
With arms encumber'd thus, or this head-shake,
Or by pronouncing of some doubtful phrase, . . .
Or such ambiguous giving out, to note
That you know aught of me.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 5.

HEAD

Headship. s. Dignity; authority; chief place.

Not the plotting for an headship; (for that is now become a court-business,) but the contriving of a baronship of twenty nobles a year, is many times done with as great a portion of ailing, sliding, &c.
Hales, Golden Remains, p. 276.

That the followers should be bound to each other as well as to the chief; that this headship was not at first hereditary. — Darke, Abridgement of English History, li. 7.

The Scottish establishment, it may be remarked by the way, possibly as claiming by direct gift from Heaven that Divine authority which we deduce through the apostolical commission, has commonly been jealous, in the extreme, of admitting either the term or the idea of royal headship. — Glaidstone, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. vi. § 48.

Headsmen. s. Executioner.

Rods broke on our associates' bleeding backs,
And headsmen labouring till they blunt their axes.
Dryden.

Headspring. s. Fountain; origin.

That we is the headspring of our belief. — Stapleton, Fortness of the Faith, fol. 110, b. 1663.

Headstall. s. Part of the bridle that covers the head.

His horse, with a half-check'd bit, and a headstall of sheep's leather, which being restrained to keep him from stumbling, hath been often burst, and now repaired with knots. — Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

Headstone. s. First or capital stone; grave-stone.

The stone which the builders refused is become the headstone of the corner. — Psalms, cxviii. 22.

Headstrong. adj. Unrestrained; violent;

un governable; resolute to run his own way: (as a horse whose head cannot be held in).

An example, for headstrong and inconsiderate zeal, no less fearful than Achiophel for proud and irreligious wisdom. — Hucker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

I'll try if yet I can reduce to reason
This headstrong youth, and make him spurn at Cato. — Addison, Cato.

You will be both judge and party: I am sorry thou discoverest so much of thy headstrong humour.
— Archbold.

Headstrongness. s. Attribute suggested

by Headstrong.

Rosinette's headstrongness is here remarkable, and shews that a beast knows when he is wary, or humory, better than his rider. — Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 4.

Headtire. s. Attire for the head.

An headtire of the linen, and a chain about his neck. — 1 Esdras, iii. 6.

Headway. s. In Navigation. Motion of advancing at sea: (used figuratively in the extract).

Their Majesties have mounted. Crack go the whips; but twenty Patriot arms have seized each of the eight bridles: there is roaring, reeking, waving, fermentation; not the smallest headway. — Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. ii. b. iv. ch. i.

Headly. adj.

1. Rash; precipitate; hasty; violent; un-

governable; hurried on with passion.

Take pity of your town and of your people,
While yet the cool and temperate wind of grace
Overblows the filthy and contagious clouds
Of headly murder, spoil, and villany.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iii. 3.

Those only are rewarded who are true to their party; and all the talent required is to be hot, to be headly, to be violent on our side or other. — Sir W. Temple.

Men, naturally warm and headly, are transported with the greatest flush of good-nature. — Addison.

2. Apt to affect the head.

I was entertained with a sort of wine which was very headly, but otherwise seemed to be such. — Boyle.

Since hearty beef and mutton will not do,
Here's julep-dance, pisan of some and show:
Give you strong sense, the liquor is too headly;
You're come to farce, that's asses' milk, already.
Dryden.

Flow, Welsed! flow, like thine inspirer, never;
Though staid, not ripe; though thin, yet never clear:

So sweetly mawkish, and so smoothly dull;
Headly, not strong; and flaming, though not full.
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 160.

3. Violent; impetuous.

Never came reformation in a flood
With such a headly current scouring faults;
Nor ever hydra-headed wilfulness
So soon did lose his seat. — Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 1.

HEAL

Thou clay'st the rock, from whose green wound
The thirst-excelling fountain broke;
Thou mai'st the headly streams forsake:
Their channels, and become dry ground.
Sandys, Epigrams, lxxiv.

Heal. v. a. [A.S. helan.]

1. Cure a person; restore from hurt or sickness.

I will restore health unto thee, and I will heal thee of thy wounds. — Jeremiah, xxx. 17.

Who would not believe that our Saviour healed
the sick, and raised the dead, when it was published by those who themselves often did the same miracles? — Addison.

2. Restore anything from an upsood to a sound state.

He went forth unto the spring of the waters, and cast the salt in there, and said, Thus saith the Lord,
I have healed these waters; there shall not be from thence any more death. — 2 Kings, ii. 21.

After separation of the eschar, I deterged and healed. — Wineman.

3. Reconcile (as, 'He healed all dissensions').

Heal. v. u. Grow well.

Those wounds heal ill that men do give themselves.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iii. 3.

Abscesses will have a greater or less tendency to heal, as they are higher or lower in the body. — Sharp.

Healer. s. One who heals.

I will not be an healer. — Isaiah, lii. 7.

Healing. part. adj. Curative; mild; molli-

fying; gentle; assuasive.

Thou hast no healing medicines. — Jeremiah, xxi. 13.

To whom with healing words Adam replied.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 290.

Healing. s. Act or power of curing.

Unto you that fear my name shall the Sun of Righteousness arise with healing in his wings. —
Malachi, . . .

Of the Most High cometh healing. — Ecclusiasticus, xxxviii. 2.

A new reign, also, was favourable to the healing of political differences and the fusion of parties. —
T. Erskine May, Constitutional History of Eng- land, ch. i.

Health. s.

j. Freedom from bodily pain or sickness.

Our father is in good health, he is yet alive. —
Genesis, xliii. 24.

May be he is not well;

Infirmity doth still neglect all office
Whereunto our health is bound.

Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 4.
Health is the faculty of performing all actions proper to a human body, in the most perfect manner. — Quincy.

2. Welfare of mind; purity; goodness; principle of salvation.

There is no health in us. — Book of Common Prayer.
The best preservative to keep the mind in health,
is the faithful admonition of a friend. — Bacon.

3. Salvation spiritual and temporal.

My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me, and art so far from my health, and from the words of my complaint? — Book of Common Prayer,
Psalms, cxi. 1.

4. Wish of happiness used in drinking.

Come, love and health to all;
I drink to the general joy of the whole table.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.

He asked leave to begin two healths: the first was to the king's mistress, and the second to his wife. —
Howell.

For peace at home, and for the publick wealth
I mean to crown a bowl to Cæsar's health. — Dryden.

Healthful. adj.

1. Free from sickness.

Adam knew no disease, so long as temperance from the forbidden fruit secured him: Nature was his physician, and innocence and abstinence would have kept him healthful to immortality. — South, Sermons.

2. Well disposed.

Such an exploit have I in hand,
Had you an healthful ear to hear it.
Shakespeare, Julius Cæsar, ii. 1.

3. Wholesome; salubrious.

Many good and healthful airs do appear by habitation and proofs, that differ not in smell from other airs. — Bacon.

They pervert pure nature's healthful rules
To loathsome sickness; worthy, since they God's image did not reverence in themselves.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 823.

Our healthful food the stomach labours thine,
At first embracing what it straight doth crush.
Dryden.

HEALTHFULLY } HEAL

4. Salutary; productive of salvation.
Pour upon them the healthful spirit of thy grace.
—Book of Common Prayer.
5. Free from morbidity.

We can scarcely express the admiration which we feel for a mind so great, and, at the same time, so healthful and so well proportioned, so willingly contracting itself to the humblest duties, so easily expanding itself to the highest, so contented in repose, so powerful in action.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Nugent's Memoirs of Hampden.

Healthfully, adv. In a healthful manner.

1. In health.

If it be so, that neither for fear nor love thou wilt part with thy goods, yet part with thy prayers for thy king; that he may healthfully, happily, and victoriously reign.—Sir M. Sandys, Essays, p. 123: 1634.

2. Wholesomely.

If merit be disease; if virtue, death;
To be good, not to be; 'twould then bequeath
Himself to discipline; 'twould not extenuate
Labour a crime? study self-murderer doom?
Our noble youth now have pretence to be Dunces securely, ignorant healthfully.
—Dryden, On the Death of Lord Hastings.

Healthfulness, s. Attribute suggested by Healthful.

1. State of being well.

This verse sets forth the healthfulness and vigour of the inhabitants of that fertile country.—Bishop Patrick, Paraphrase and Commentaries on the Old Testament, Genesis, xlii. 12.

2. Wholesomeness; salubrious qualities.

To the winds the inhabitants of Geneva ascribe the healthfulness of their air; for as the Alps surround them on all sides, there would be a constant stagnation of vapours, did not the north wind put them in motion.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Healthless, adj.

1. Weak; sickly; infirm.

The leaves, that withlorn were so fresh and green,
In healthless autumn to the ground do fall.
—Mirror for Magistrates, p. 563.

2. Not conducive to health.

He that spends his time in sports, is like him whose garment is all made of fringes, and his meat nothing but sauces; they are healthless, changeable, and useless.—Jeremy Taylor.

Healthlessness, s. Attribute suggested by Healthless.

Passing is the best in many respects, and remains such unless it be altered by the inconveniences or healthlessness of the person.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Dubautium, l. 419. (Ord M.)

Healthsome, adj. Wholesome; salutary. Obsolete.

Shall I not then be stifled in the vault,
To whose foul mouth no healthsome air breathes in,
And there be strangled ere my Romeo comes?
—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iv. 3.

Healthy, adj.

1. Enjoying health; free from sickness; hale; sound.

The husbandman returns from the field, and from manuring his ground, strong and healthy, less innocent and laborious.—South, Sermons.
Temperance, industry, and a public spirit, running through the whole body of the people in Holland, hath preserved an infant commonwealth, of a sickly constitution, through so many dangers, as much more healthy one could never have struggled against without those advantages.—Swift.
Air and exercise contribute to make the animal healthy.—Arbuthnot.

2. Conducive to health; wholesome.

Gardening or husbandry, and working in wood, are fit and healthy recreations for a man of study or business.—Locke.

Heam, s. See extract.

[Heams—heams. The two crooked pieces of wood which encompass a horse collar and to which the traces are fastened. The stuffing of hay or straw by which these were prevented from galling the shoulders of the horse was called hamberwee, or hamboroughgh, a coarse horse collar, made of reed or straw (Halliwell), from berwe, or borough, shelter, protection against the hawsen. . . . The origin of the word heam is seen in the Walloon heue, a splint or thin piece of wood, corresponding to the German schien, a splint, band to keep things close (germ-schien, hein-schien, armour for the arm or leg). The old writing of the Walloon word was rhine, and the change from the hissing sound of sch to that of the simple aspirate is in accordance with the usual course of the dialect. . . . It will be observed that the French aloué (the names of a draught-horse's collar (Cotgrave), also signifies a splint. . . . Flemish haem, a horse collar. The word is sometimes used in the singular in that sense in English. 'The deponent remembers to have seen her father carry a horse and haem to Mul-

HEAR

'town' (Jamieson; A.D. 1100).—Waldwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Heap, s. [A.S. heap.]

1. Many single things thrown together; pile; accumulation.

The way to lay the city flat,
And bury all which yet distinctly ranges,
In heaps and piles of ruins.
—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.

The dead were fallen down by heaps, one upon another.—Window of Solomon, xviii. 23.
Huge heaps of slain around the body rise.
—Dryden.

2. Crowd; throng; rabble.

A cruel tyranny; a heap of vassals and slaves, no freemen, no inheritance, no stirp or ancient families.
—Bacon.

3. Cluster; number driven together.

An universal cry resounds aloud;
The sailors run in heaps, a helpless crowd.
—Dryden.

Heap, v. a.

1. Throw in heaps; pile; throw together.

Heap on wood, kindle the fire.—Ezekiel, xiv. 10.
2. Accumulate; lay up.

Though he heap up silver as the dust, and prepare ruin as the clay; he may prepare it, but the just shall put it on, and the innocent shall divide the silver.—Job, xxvii. 16.

How great the credit was, wherein that oracle was preserved, may be gathered from the vast riches which were there heaped up from the offerings of all the Grecian nations. . . .
—Sir W. Temple.
They who will make profession of painting, must heap up treasures out of their reading, and there will find many wonderful means of raising themselves above others.—Dryden.

3. Add to something else.

For those of old,
And the late dignities heaped up to them,
We rest your hermits.
—Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 6.

Heapy, adj. Lying in heaps.

Old Ocean lifts his heapy waves on high.
—Race, Translation of Lucan.
Where a dim gleam the palely lantern throws
O'er the mid pavement, heapy rubbish grows.
—Gay, Trivia.

Hear, v. a. [A.S. hyran.]

1. Perceive by the ear.

The trumpeters and singers were as one, to make one sound to be heard in praising and thanking the Lord.—2 Chronicles, v. 13.
And sure he heard me, but he would not hear.
—Dryden.

2. Give an audience, or allowance to speak.

Who against faith or conscience can be heard Infallible?
—Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 528.

8. Acknowledge as a name or title; bear a name. Latinism.

O! what of gods then boots it to be born,
If old Avenge's sons no evil hear?
—Spenser, Faerie Queen, i. 5. 23.
Or hear'st thou rather, pure ethereal stream,
Whose fountain who shall tell?
—Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 7.
Hear'st thou submissive, but a lowly birth?
—Prior.

Hear say. An elliptical expression meaning hear a thing said.

A people great and tall, the children of the Anakims, whom thou knowest, and of whom thou hast heard say, Who can stand before the children of Anak?—Deuteronomy, ix. 2.
If thou shalt hear say in one of thy cities, . . . saying, Certain men, the children of Belial, are gone out from among you . . . then shalt thou enquire.—Id., xiii. 12.

HEAR

Hear a bird sing. Expression, implying the receipt of a very particular or private communication.

I hear a bird sing in mine ear,
That I must either light or flee.
—Old Ballad of the Kinsie in the North.
I will lay odds, that, ere this year expire,
We bear our civil swords, and native fire,
As far as France; I heard a bird so sing.
—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II, v. 5.
Did you observe their whisper, brother knight?—
I did; and heard, hush'd, a grave bird sing,
That they intend, sweetheart, to play us pranks!
—Duke of Buckingham, Rehearsal.

Hear, v. n.

1. Perceive sound generally; have the sense of hearing.

Princes cannot see far with their own eyes, nor hear with their own ears.—Sir W. Temple.

2. Listen; hearken to: (as, 'He heard with great attention'.)

No spoke our mother Eve, and Adam heard,
Well-pleas'd, but answer'd not.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 621.

3. Be told; have an account: (with of).

I have heard by many of this man.—Acts, ix. 13.
Prepare, I say, to hear of such a crime
As traitor poets, since the birth of time,
Ne'er feign'd. The Translation of Juvenal, sat. xv.
This, of eldest parents, leaves us none in the dark, who, by divine institution, has a right to civil power, than those who never heard any thing at all of their or descent.—Locke.

Hearer, s.

1. One who hears.

And so was she dull'd withal, that we could come so near as to hear her speeches, and yet she not perceive the hearers of her lamentation.—Sir P. Sidney.
St. John and St. Matthew, which have recorded these sermons, heard them; and being hearers, did think themselves as well respected as the pluriest.
—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
For these reasons James charged his hearers on their allegiance neither to sack nor destroy the city.
—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xvi.

2. One of a collected audience.

Plays in themselves have neither hopes nor fears:
Their fate is only in their hearers' ears. B. Jonson.
Her hearers had no share
In all she spoke, except to stare.
—Swift, Cadogan and Vanessa.

Hearing, s.

1. Sense by which sounds are perceived.

Bees are called with sound upon brass, and therefore they have hearing.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Audience.

The French ambassador upon that instant Crav'd audience; and the hour, I think, is come To give him hearing.
—Shakespeare, Henry V., i. 1.
Alexander . . . sent Taxiles to summon him to surrender. But the sight of his old enemy only roused his indignation; Taxiles could not gain a hearing for his message, and narrowly escaped a wound.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. liii.

3. Judicial trial.

When Agrippa was come, and Herod . . . and was entered into the place of hearing.—Acts, xxv. 23.
The readers are the jury to decide according to the merits of the cause, or to bring it to another hearing before some other court.—Deplou.
Those of different principles may be betrayed to give you a fair hearing, and to know what you have to say for yourself.—Addison.
The advocate made another attempt to obtain a hearing, but to no purpose.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. iv.

4. Note by the ear; reach of the ear.

In our hearing the king charged thee, Beware that none touch Absalom.—2 Samuel, xvii. 12.
If we profess, as Peter did, that we love the Lord, and profess it in the hearing of men; charity is prone to hear all things, and therefore charitable men are like-y to think we do so.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
The fox had the good luck to be within hearing.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

Hearken, v. n. [A.S. hearcnian.]

1. Listen; listen eagerly or curiously.

The youngest daughter, whom you hearken for.
Her father keeps from all access of suitors.
—Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, i. 2.
He hearkens after prophecies and dreams.
—Id., Richard III., i. 1.

They do me too much injury,
That ever said I hearken'd for your death:
If it were so, I might have let alone
The insulting hand of Luchan on my side.
—Id., Henry IV. Part I, v. 4.

The furies hearken, and their snakes uncurl.
—Dryden.

He who makes much necessary, will want much;

and, wearied with the difficulty of the attainment, will hearken after any expedient that offers to shorten his way to it.—Rogers.

2. Attend; pay regard.

Hearken unto me, thou son of Zippor.—Numbers, xlii. 18.

Those who put passion in the place of reason, neither use their own, nor hearken to other people's reason, any farther than it suits their humour.—Locke.

There's not a blessing individuals find,
But some way leads and hearkens to the kind.
Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 30.

Hearken. v. a.

1. Hear by listening.

She past into this dreadful den,
Where nought but darkness dreariness she found,
No creature saw, but hearkened now and then
Some little whispering, and soft-sounding sound.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

But here she comes; I fairly step aside,
And hearken, if I may, her business here.
Milton, Comus, 108.

2. Hear with attention; regard.

The king of Naples being an enemy
To me inveterate, hearkens my brother's suit.
Shakespeare, Tempest, i. 2.

Hearkeners of rumours and tales.—Barret, Alceste, 1590.

Hearse. s. Rehearsal; relation.

With this sad hearsall of his heavy streams
The warlike daimon was embosomed sore.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Hearsay. s. Report; rumour; what is not known otherwise than by account from others. Often used adjectivally.

For prey these shepherds two he took,
Whose metal stiff he knew he could not bend
With hearsay pictures, or a window look.
Sir P. Sidney.

He affirms by hearsay, that some giants saved themselves upon the mountain Baris in Armenia.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

All the little scammers after fame fall upon him, publish every blot in his life, and depend upon hearsay to defame him.—Addison.

What proof do you give that he has taken any [money] to betray his country? Is it hearsay; or the evidence of letters, or ocular; or the evidence of those concerned in this black affair?—Junius, Letters, let. 39.

Hearse. s. See extracts from Weever and Wedgwood.

1. Carriage in which the dead are conveyed to the grave. This is the common meaning of the word at present.

When mourning nymphs attend their Daphnia's herse,
Who does not weep that reads the moving verse?
Romans.

A cenotaph is an empty funeral monument or tomb, erected for the honour of the dead; in imitation of which our hearses here in England are set up in churches, during the continuance of a year, or the space of certain months.—Weever, Funeral Monuments.

[The origin is the French herse, a harrow, an implement which in that country is made in a triangular form, not square as with us. Hence the name of herse or herche was given to a triangular framework of iron used for holding a number of candles at funerals and church ceremonies. Herse on a dedication ceremony. (Promptorium Parvulorum.) 'In reliquis vero festivitatibus quibus accendi solet machina illa ferrea que vulgo herse vocatur, per illa lampadibus vitreis illustratur.' (Statuta Abbatie Tunicensis, in Ducange.) 'Peria quinta, &c. et sabbato herche debet esse ad dextrum eorum magni altaris et ibi debent esse 24 cerei illuminati ad matutinas.'—'Volo quod 24 torches et 5 taper, quolibet taper pondere to librum preparatur per sepulturam meam absque allo alio herche.' (Testamentum Johannis de Nevil, A. D. 1381.) 'Cujus quidem sepultura seu funera nostri exequius more regio volumus celebrare, ita quod per predictis exequiis ibi herche excellentissime convenientes regali—in locis subscriptis per executorum nostrorum preparantur.' (Testamentum Ricardi II. Rymer, vol. vii. 75.) The quantity of candles being the great distinction of the funeral, the name of the frame which bore them came to be used for the whole funeral obsequies, or for the cenotaph at whose head the candles were placed, and finally for the funeral carriage.

'At Poulis his name was done, and dirge
In herse royal, gently to royale.'
(Hardyng, Richard II. in Way.)

Herse, a dead body, corpse. (Falsgrave.)—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology, in voce.]

2. Place, or case, in which a dead corpse is deposited.

Beside the hearse a fruitful palm-tree grows,
Ennobled since by this great funeral,
Where Duden's corpse they softly laid in ground.
Fairfax, Translation of Tasso.

These poor and fruitless drops,
Which willingly would fall upon his hearse,
To embalm him twice.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Coronation.

3. Temporary monument set over a grave. This is the original, though obsolete, meaning.

So many torches, so many tapers, so many black gowns,
So many merry mourners laughing under black hoods, and a gay herse.—Sir T. More.

The gaudy girlhood deck her grave,
The faded flowers her corpse embrace.
O heavy herse!
Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, November.

Hearse. v. a. Enclose in a hearse. Rare.

Tell,
Why thy canonied bones, hearsed in death,
Have burst their cerements?
Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 4.

I would my daughter were dead at my feet, and the jewels in her ear. O! would she were hearsed at my foot, and the ducats in her coffin!—Id., Merchant of Venice, iii. 1.

Hearse-cloth. s. Covering thrown over the hearse or coffin; pall.

Without any blacks to be hung any where in or about the church, other than a pulpit-cloth, a hearse-cloth, and a mourning gown for the preacher.—L. Walton, Life of Sanderson.

Hearse-like. adj. Mournful; suitable to a funeral.

If you listen to David's lute, you shall hear as many hearse-like airs as carols.—Bacon, Essays, Of Adversity.

Heart. s. [A.S. heort.]

1. Muscular organ which by its contraction and dilatation propels the blood through the course of circulation.

The heart gives heat, and motion, and life, unto that which is to be our nourishment.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 230.

2. Chief, vital, vigorous, or efficacious part of anything.

Harley being steeped in water, and turned upon a dry floor, will sprout half an inch; and if it be let alone, much more until the heart be out.—Bacon.

3. Innermost part of anything.

Some Englishmen did with great danger pass by water into the heart of the country.—Abbot, Description of the World.

The king's forces are employed in appeasing disorders more near the heart of the kingdom.—Sir J. Hayward.

Generally the inside or heart of trees is harder than the outward parts.—Boyle.

Here in the heart of all the town I'll stay,
And timely succour, where it wants, convey.
Dryden.

If the foundation be bad, provide good piles made of heart of oak, such as will reach ground.—Maron.

4. Fine fellow; jolly mate.

Hry, my heart; cheerly, my heart.
Shakespeare, Tempest, i. 1.

Often followed by of and a second substantive.

The king's a bawcock, and a heart of gold,
A lad of life, an imp of fame.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 1.

What says my Ascalaphus, my Galen, my heart of elder? Has it he dead?—Id., Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

5. Seat of courage, affection, honesty, or baseness.

He with providence and courage go passed over all, that the mother took such spiteful grief at it, that her heart brake withal, and she died.—Sir P. Sidney.

But since the brain doth lodge the powers of sense,
How makes it in the heart those passions spring?
The mutual love, the kind intelligence
Twixt heart and brain, this sympathy doth bring.
Sir J. Davies, Immortality of the Soul

Press with heart corroding grief and years,
To the gay court a rural shed prefers.
Pope.

6. Courage; spirit.

If it please you to make his fortune known, I will after take heart again to go on with his falsehood.—Sir P. Sidney.

There did other like unhappy accidents happen out of England, which gave heart and good opportunity to them to regain their old possessions.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Wide was the wound; and a large lake warm flood,
Red as the rose, thence gushed grievously,
That when the paynim spy'd the streaming blood,
Gave him great heart and hope of victory.
Id., Faerie Queen.

Having left that city well provided, and in good heart, his majesty removed with his little army to Bowdley.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Finding that it did them no hurt, they took heart upon't, went up to't, and viewed it.—Sir R. L. Estcourt.

The expelled nations take heart, and when they fly from one country invade another.—Sir W. Temple.

7. Affection; inclination.

Josh perceived that the king's heart was towards Absalom.—2 Samuel, xiv. 1.

Means how to feel, and learn each other's heart.
By the abbot's skill of Westminster is found.
Id.

'Tis well to be tender; but to set the heart too much upon any thing, is what we cannot justify.
Sir R. L. Estcourt.

A friend makes me a feast, and sets all before me; but I set my heart upon one dish alone, and if that happen to be thrown down, I scorn all the rest.—Sir W. Temple.

Then mixing powerful herbs with music art,
She changed his form who could not change his heart.
Dryden.

What did I not, her stubborn heart to gain?
But all my vows were answer'd with disdain.
Id.

8. Memory; (with by).

Whatsoever was attained to concerning God, and his working in nature, the same was delivered over by heart and tradition from wise men to a posterity equally zealous.—Sir W. Raleigh.

We call the committing of a thing to memory the getting it by heart: for it is the memory that must transmit it to the heart; and it is in him to expect that the heart should keep its hold of any truth, when the memory has let it go.—North, Scamozzi.

Shall I in London act this idle part,
Composing sonnets for fools to get by heart?
Pope.

9. Good will; ardour of zeal: (with to or at).

If he take not their causes at heart, how should there be but in them frozen coldness, when affections seem tumultuous, from whom theirs should take fire?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

If he would take the business at heart, and deal in it effectually, it would succeed well.—Bacon.

The lady marchioness of Hertford counsel her husband to take this business at heart.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Amongst those who took it most at heart, Sir John Stowel was the chief.—Id.

Every prudent and honest man would join himself to that side, which had the good of their country most at heart.—Addison.

Learned men have been now a long time searching after the happy country from which our first parents were exiled: if they can find it, with all my heart.—Woodward.

What I have most at heart is, that some method should be thought on for ascertaining and fixing our language.—Swift.

10. Secret thoughts; recesses of the mind.

Michael saw king David leaping and dancing before the Lord, and she despised him in her heart.—2 Samuel, vi. 16.

The next generation will in tongue and heart, and every way else, become English; so as there will be no difference or distinction but the Irish will betwixt us.—Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

Would you have him open his heart to you, and ask your advice, you must begin to do so with him first.—Locke.

Men, come to business, come to pleasure take:
But every woman is, at heart, a rake.
Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 215

Doing all things with so pretty a grace, that it seemed ignorance could not make him do amiss, because he had a heart to do well.—Sir P. Sidney.

11. The heart is considered as the seat of tenderness: a hard heart, therefore, is cruelty.

Such iron hearts we are, and such
The base barbarity of human kind.
Rowe.

12. Secret meaning; hidden intention.

I will on with my speech in your praise,
And then shew you the heart of my message.
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, i. 5.

13. Conscience; sense of good or ill.

Every man's heart and conscience doth in good or evil, even secretly committed, and known to none but itself, either like or disallow itself.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

14. Strength; power; vigour; efficacy.

Try whether leaves of trees, swept together, with some chalk and dung mixed, to give them more heart, would not make a good compost.—Bacon.

That the spent earth may gather heart again,
And better'd by excretion bear the grain.
Dryden.

Care must be taken not to plough ground out of heart, because if 'tis in heart, it may be improved by man again.—Mortimer.

15. Utmost degree.

This gay charm,
Like a right gipsy, hath, at last and long,
Begull'd me to the very heart of loss.
Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 10.

16. Life: ('for my heart') seems sometimes to signify, 'if life was at stake;' and sometimes 'for tenderness'.

HEART

I bid the rascal knock upon your gate,
And could not get him for my heart to do it.
Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, l. 2.
I gave it to a youth,
A prating boy, that baw'd it as a fish:
I could not for my heart deny it him.
Id., Merchant of Venice, v. 1.
Profoundly skill'd in the black art,
As English Merlin for his heart.
Butler, Hudibras.

Find in the heart. Be not wholly averse.
For my breaking the laws of friendship with you,
I could find in my heart to ask your pardon for it,
but that your now handling of me gives me reason to confirm my former dealing.—Sir P. Sidney.

Heart. v. a. Invest with heartiness in the sense of courage.

For putting life into and hearting this free-will worship, which is only acceptable to God when it proceeds according to his own directory, three things in the Scripture and our church-book are especially to be taken notice of.—Bishop Prideaux.

Heart-deep. adj. Rooted in the heart.
Dipping and reasoning all our words and sentences in our hearts, before they come into our mouths, truly affecting and cordially expressing all that we say; so that the auditors may plainly perceive that every word is heart-deep.—Herbert, Country Parson, ch. vii.

Heartache. s. Sorrow; pang; anguish of mind.

To die—to sleep—
No more; and, by a sleep, to say we end
The heart-ache, and the thousand natural shocks
That flesh is heir to.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 1.

Heartblood. s.
1. Blood of the heart; life.

Our nobler swords will drink the blood of none,
But thy heart-blood, Porsema, thine alone.
Danvers, Poems: 1660.

2. Essence.
The mortal Venus, the heart-blood of beauty.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iii. 1.

Heartbreak. s. Overpowering sorrow.
Better a little chiding than a great deal of heartbreak. Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 3.

Heartbreaker. s. One who, or that which, breaks hearts; applied in the extract to locks of hair, or love-locks, supposed to be of extraordinary effectiveness in exciting love or admiration.

Like Sanson's heart-breakers, it grew
In time to make a nation rue. Butler, Hudibras.

Heartbreaking. part. pref. Overpowering with sorrow.

Those piteous plaints and sorrowful state,
Which late you poured forth, as ye did sit Beside the silver springs of Helicone,
Making your music of heart-breaking mone.
Spenser.

Heartbreaking. s. Overpowering sorrow.
What greater heart-breaking and confusion can there be to one, than to have all his secret faults laid open, and the sentence of condemnation passed upon him?—Dickens.

Heartbred. adj. Bred in the heart.
His virtue that within had root,
Could not choose but shine without;
And the heart-bred lustre of his worth,
At each corner peeping forth,
Pointed him out in all his ways,
Circled round in his own rays.
Crashaw, Poems, p. 31.

Heartburn. s. Form of indigestion so called.
The medicine already recommended for heartburn . . . will . . . be appropriate.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Heartburned. adj. Having the heart inflamed.

How tartly that gentleman looks! I never can see him but I am heart-burn'd an hour after.—
Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 1.

Heartburning.

1. Same as Heartburn. Rare.
Fine clean chalk is one of the most noble ab-sorbents, and powerfully corrects and subdues the acid humours in the stomach: this property renders it very serviceable in the cardialgia, or heart-burning.—Woodward.

2. Discontent; secret enmity.
In great changes, when right of inheritance is broke, there will remain much heart-burning and discontent among the meaner people.—Swift, Letter to Pope.

Heartburning. adj. Causing discontent.

HEAR

Well may we raise Jars,
Jealousies, strifes, and heart-burning disagreements,
Middleton, The Witch.

Heartdear. adj. Sincerely beloved.
The time was, father, that you broke your word,
When you were more endeared to it than now;
When your own Percy, when my heart-dear Harry,
Threw many a northward look to see his father
Bring up his powers; but he did long in vain.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. ii. 3.

Heartease. s. Quiet; tranquillity.
What infinite heart-ease must kings neglect,
That private men enjoy.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 1.

Hearted. adj.
1. Seated or fixed in the heart.
Yield up, O love, thy crown, and hearted throne,
To tyrannous hate. Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 3.

2. Laid up in the heart.
I have told thee often, and I re-tell thee again and again, I hate the Moor: my cause is hearted;
thine hath no less reason. Shakespeare, Othello, i. 3.

Heartedness. s. Attribute suggested by Hearted; sincerity; warmth; zeal: (generally as the second element of a compound).
They who pretended most public-heartedness, and did really wish the king all the greatness he desired.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Hearten. v. a.

1. Encourage; animate; stir up.
Falloidin blaming those that were slow heartening them that were forward, but especially with his own example leading them, made an impression into the squadron.—Sir P. Sidney.
This rare man, Tydides, would prepare;
That he might conquer hearten'd him. Chapman.
Thus hearten'd well, and flesh'd upon his prey,
The youth may prove a man another day. Dryden.

2. Meliorate or renovate with manure.
The ground one year at rest; forget not then
With richest dung to hearten it again.
Magn, Translation of Virgil.

Heartener. s. One who, or that which, heartens, animates, or stirs up.

A coward's heartener in war,
The stirring drum, keeps lesser noise from far.
W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, bk. i. song 1.

Heartfelt. adj. Felt in the conscience.
What nothing earthly gives, or can destroy,
The soul's calm sunshine, and the heart-felt joy,
Is virtue's prize. Pope.

Heartgrief. s. Affliction of the heart; deep sorrow.

There's not, I think, a subject
That sits in heart-grief and uneasiness
Under the sweet shade of your government.
Shakespeare, Henry V. ii. 2.

And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
To show them fears.
Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1330.

Hearth. s. [A.S. heorð.] Pavement of a room on which a fire is made; ground under the chimney.
Crickle, to Windsor chimneys shalt thou leap,
Where thou find'st fires unquench'd, and hearths un-sway'd.
There pinch the maids as blue as bilberry.
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 5.
The vanquish'd fires withdraw from every place;
Or, full with feeding, sink into a sleep:
Each household genius slugs again its face.
And from the hearths the little larks creep.
Dryden.

Heartmoney. s. Tax upon hearths.
Upon the revolution, heart-money was declared to be not only a great oppression to the poorer sort, but a badge of slavery upon the whole people.
Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

Heartily. adv. In a hearty manner.

1. From the heart; fully.
I bear no malice for my death;
But those that sought it, I could wish more Christians;
Be what they will, I heartily forgive them.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. ii. 1.

If to be and is to be wise,
I do most heartily despise
Whatever Socrates has said,
Or Tully writ, or Wanley read.
Prior, Alma, canto iii.

2. Sincerely; actively; diligently; vigorously.
Where his judgement led him to oppose men on a public account, he would do it vigorously and heartily; yet the opposition ended there.—Bishop Atterbury.

HEAR

3. Eagerly; with desire.
As for my eating heartily of the food, know that anxiety has hindered my eating till this moment.—
Adrian.

Heartiness. s. Attribute suggested by heartily.

1. Sincerity; freedom from hypocrisy.
This entertainment
May a free face put on; derive a liberty
From heartiness, from bounty, fertile bosom,
And well become the agent.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

2. Vigour; engerness.
The anger of an enemy represents our faults, or admonishes us of our duty, with more heartiness than the kindness of a friend.—Jeremy Taylor.

Heartless. adj. Destitute of, wanting, or deficient in, courage; spiritless.
I joyed oft to chase the trembling pricknet,
Or hunt the heartless hare till she were tame.
Spenser.

Thousands besides stood mute and heartless there,
Men valiant all; nor was I used to fear. Corley.
The peasants were accustomed to payments, and grew heartless as they grew poor.—Sir W. Temple.
Heartless they fought, and quitted soon their
ground,
While ours with easy victory were crown'd.
Dryden.

Heartlessness. s. Want of courage or spirit; dejection of mind.

Who have yielded themselves over to a discon-solate heartlessness, and a sad dejection of spirit.—
Bishop Hall.

Heartness. s. See extract.
A plant with round small seeds in form of peas, of a black colour, having the figure of an heart of a white colour upon each. Mills.

Heartrending. adj. Killing with anguish.
Heart-rending news, and dreadful to these few,
Who her resemble, and her steps pursue;
That death should licence have to range among
The fair, the wise, the virtuous, and the young!
Watts.

Heart-sick. adj.

1. Pained in mind.
If we be heart-sick, or afflicted with an uncertain soul, then we are true desirers of relief and mercy.—
Jeremy Taylor.

2. Mortally ill; hurt in the heart.
Good Remedy, hide thyself—
Not I, unless the breath of heart-sick groans,
Mist-like, in fold me from the beams of eyes.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iii. 3.
All unaided
Of chafed spasm, or racking torture; qualms
Of heart-sick agony. Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 482.

Heartsease. s.

1. Native and cultivated plant so called,
Viola tricolor; pansy.
Heartsease is a sort of violet that blows all summer, and often in winter; it sows itself.—Mortimer.

2. Toy or ornament formerly so called.
He gave me a heartsease of silk for a new year's gift.—Queen Katharine Howard, Burnet, History of the Reformation, iii. Rec. iii. 72.

Heart-sore. s. That which pains the mind.
Wherever he that godly knight may find,
His only heart-sore and his only foe.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Heart-sore. adj. Violent with pain of heart.
Penitential groans,
With nightly tears and daily heart-sore sighs.
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, i. 1.

Heartstrings. s. Tendons or nerves supposed to brace and sustain the heart.

He was by Jove deprived
Of life himself, and heart-strings of an eagle riv'd.
Spenser.
That grants my heart-strings: what should discontent him!
Except he thinks I live too long.
Sir J. Denham, The Sophy.

If thou thinkest thou shalt perish, I cannot blame thee to be so and till thy heart-strings crack.—Jeremy Taylor.

Heartstruck. adj.

1. Driven to the heart; infixed for ever in the mind.

Who is with him?—
None but the fool who labours to out-jest
His heart-struck injuries.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 1.

2. Shocked with fear or dismay.
He added not, for Adam, at the news
Heart-struck, with chilling grips of sorrow stood,
That all his senses bound.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 223.

HEATH

genus Campanula, or bell-flower), and its growth on heath.

Heathcock.

Not heath-cock, or the rare bird Which Phœnix or Ionia yields. More pleasing morsels would afford Than the fat olives of its fields. Dryden.

Heathy.

adj. Abounding in, or consisting of, heath.

This sort of land they order the same way with the heathy land.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

3. Rise with pain; swell and fall. Thro' hast made my curv'd blood run back, My heart heave up, my hair to rise in bristles. Dryden.

Frequent for breath his panting bosom heaves. Prior.

In widen'd circles beats on either side, Gay, Trivia.

Heave.

s. 1. Lift; exertion or effort upwards. None could guess whether the next heave of the earthquake would settle them on the first foundation, or swallow them.—Dryden.

2. Rising of the breast. There's matter in these sighs; these profound heaves You must translate; 'tis fit we understand them. Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 1.

3. Struggle to rise. But after many strains and heaves, He got up to his saddle eaves. Butler, Hudibras.

Used adjectively: (with offering). Offering among the Jews. Ye shall offer up a cake of the first of your dough for an heave offering, as ye do the heave offering of the threshing floor.—Numbers, xv. 20.

Heaven.

s. [A.S. heafun.]

1. Regions above; expanse of the sky. The words are taken more properly for the air and other than for the heavens.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

With shouts heavens high, the friendly band Applaud. Dryden.

HEAV

2. Habitation of God, good angels, and pure souls departed.

It is a knell That summons thee to heaven or to hell. Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.

3. Supreme power; sovereign of heaven. Now Heaven help him! Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 7.

The prophets were taught to know the will of God, and thereby instruct the people, and enabled to prophesy, as a testimony of their being sent by Heaven.—Sir W. Temple.

4. Celestial beings. Take physick, pomp; Expose thyself to feel what wretches feel. That thou may'st shake the superfluous to them, And show the heavens more just. Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 4.

They can judge as fitly of his worth, As I can of those mysteries which heaven Will not have earth to know. Id., Coriolanus, iv. 2.

Heaven's what a spring was in his arm, to throw! How high he held his shield, and ran at every blow. Dryden.

5. Elevation; sublimity. O, for a muse of fire, that would ascend The brightest heaven of invention. Shakespeare, Henry V. i. chorus.

Heaven-born. adj. Descended from the celestial regions; native of heaven. It was the winter child, While the heaven-born child All meanly wrapt in the rude manner lies. Milton, Ode on the Nativity, 29.

Depressing the high and heaven-born spirit of man far beneath the condition wherein either God created him, or sin hath sunk him.—Id., Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, introd.

It once a fever flung his sulphurous blood, In every fit he feels the hand of God, And heaven-born flame. Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Oh heaven-born sisters! source of art! Who charm the voice, or mend the heart; Who lead fair virtue's train along, Moral truth, and mystick song! Pope, Choruses to the Tragedy of Brutus.

Heaven-bred. adj. Produced or cultivated in heaven. Much is the force of heaven-bred poetry. Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 2.

Heaven-loved. adj. Beloved of Heaven. But oh! why didst thou not stay here below To bless us with thy heaven-loved innocence. Milton, Ode on the Death of a Fair Infant, 64.

Such was this heaven-loved tale, Than Lesbia fairer, and the Cretan shore. Sir W. Jones, Ode.

Heavenize. v. a. Invest with the character of heaven, or of a heavenly being. Rare.

O my soul, if thou be once actually heavenized in thy thoughts and affections, it shall be otherwise with thee; then thou shalt be ever, like this firmament, most happily restless.—Bishop Hall, Solilo.

Heavenliness. s. Attribute suggested by Heavenly; supreme excellence. Goddess of women, with your heavenliness Hath now couch'd itself to represent To our dim eyes. Sir J. Davies, Orchestra.

Heavenly. adj. 1. Resembling heaven; supremely excellent. As the love of heaven makes one heavenly, the love of virtue virtuous, so doth the love of the world make one become worldly. Sir P. Sidney.

Not Mars's muse, who sang the mighty man; Not Pindar's heavenly lyre, nor Horace when a swain. Dryden.

2. Celestial; inhabiting heaven. Adoring first the genius of the place, Then earth, the mother of the heavenly race. Dryden.

Heavenward. adj. Towards heaven. I prostrate lay, Or to obey, at length, my mournful look Heavenward erect, determin'd, thus I spoke. Prior, Solomon, b. iii.

Heavily. adv. In a heavy manner. 1. With great ponderousness. And took off their chariot-wheels, that they drove them heavily.—Ezekiel, xiv. 25.

2. Grievously; afflictively. Upon the ancient host thou very heavily laid thy yoke.—Isaiah, xlvii. 6.

HEAV

Base must be impracticable to the evildoers; they lie under a double misfortune; common calamities and common blessings fall heavily upon them.—Collier.

3. Sorrowfully; with grief. I bowed down heavily, as one that mourneth for his mother.—Paulina, xxv. 11.

This O'Sell took very heavily, because his condition in the army was less pleasant to him.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Heaviness. s. Attribute suggested by Heavy.

1. Ponderousness; quality of being heavy; weight. The subject is concerning the heaviness of several bodies, or the proportion that is required betwixt any weight and the power which may move it.—Bishop Wilkins, Mathematical Magic.

2. Dejection of mind; depression of spirit. We are, at the hearing of some, more inclined unto sorrow and heaviness; of some more mollified, and softened in mind.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

3. Inaptitude to motion or thought; sluggishness; torpidness; dulness of spirit languidness; languor. Our strength is all gone into heaviness, That makes the weight. Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 13.

He would not violate that sweet recess, And found besides a welcome heaviness, Which heav'd his eyes. Dryden.

What wouldst thou this heaviness that hangs upon me? This lethargy that creeps through all my senses? Addison, Cato, v. 1.

4. Deepness or richness of soil. As Alexandria exported many commodities, so it received some, which, by reason of the fatness and heaviness of the ground, Egypt did not produce; such as metals, wool, and pitch. Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Heaving. v. n. & v. a. 1. Pant; motion of the heart. 'Tis such as you, . . . That creep like shadows by him, and do sigh At each his needless heavings; such as ye Nourish the cause of his awaking. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

2. Swell. Of all objects that I have ever seen, there is none which affects my imagination so much as the sea or ocean. I cannot see the heavings of this prodigious bulk of waters, even in a calm, without a very pleasing astonishment. Addison, Spectator, no. 43.

Heavy. adj. [A.S. heafig.]

1. Weighty; ponderous; tending strongly to the centre; contrary to light. Mercurius tells us, that a little child, with an of an hundred double pulleys, moimt this earth, though it were much heavier than it. Bishop Wilkins, Mathematical Magic.

2. Sorrowful; dejected; depressed. He taketh with him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy; and saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death.—Mark, xiv. 35.

3. Grievous; oppressive; afflictive. Metellus . . . bare an heavy hand over the citizens, having a malicious mind.—2 Maccabees, v. 21.

Pray for this good man, and for his issue, Whose heavy hand hath bow'd you to the grave. Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 2.

Charles, at Sir Robert's leave, Tells with a sweet the tidings heav. Swift, On the Death of Dr. Swift.

4. Wanting alacrity; wanting briskness of appearance. My heavy eyes, you say, confess A heart to love and grief inclin'd. Prior.

5. Wanting spirit or rapidity of sentiment; unanimated. A work was to be done, a heavy writer to be encouraged, and accordingly many thousand copies were bespoken.—Swift.

6. Wanting activity; indolent; lazy. Fair, tall, his limbs with due proportion join'd; But of a heavy, dull, degenerate mind. Dryden, Cymon and Iphigenia.

7. Drowsy; dull; torpid. Peter and they that were with him were heavy with sleep.—Luke, ix. 32.

8. Stupid; foolish. I would not be accounted so base minded, or heavy headed, that I will confess that any of them is for valour, power, or fortune better than myself.—Knolles, History of the Turks.

9. Burthensome; troublesome; tedious. I put into thy hands what has been the diversion of some of my life and heavy hours.—Locke, Epistle to the Reader.

When alone, your time will not be heavy upon your hands for want of some trifling amusement.—Swift.

10. Loaded; encumbered; burthened.

Hearing that there were forces coming against him, and not willing that they should find his men heavy and laden with booty, he returned unto Scotland.—Racine, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

11. Not easily digested; not light to the stomach.

Such preparations as retain the oil or fat, are most heavy to the stomach, which makes laked meat hard of digestion.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

12. Thick; cloudy; dark.

It is a heavy night. Shakespeare, Othello, v. 1.

Heavy. adv. Heavily. Common in composition.

a. As the first element.

Your carriages were heavy laden; they are a burden to the weary head.—Isaiah, xlv. 1.
Come unto me, all ye that labour and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest.—Matthew, xi. 28.
But let thy spiders, that suck up thy venom, And heavy gaited loads lie in their way.

Shakespeare, Richard II, iii. 2.
This heavy headed revel, East and West,
Makes us traduce'd, and tax'd of other nations.

Id., Hamlet, i. 4.
Another whose more heavy hearted saint
Delights in nought but notes of rueful plaint.

Bishop Hall, Satire, i. 13.
We are dull soldiers,
Gross heavy headed fellows.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Mad Lover.

b. As the second: (as in top-heavy).

Hébdómád. s. [Lat. hebdomas, hebdomadis.]

Week; space of seven days.

Computing by the medical month, the first hebdomad or septenary consists of six days, seventeen hours and a half.—Sir T. Browne.

Those of creation being coincided within the first hebdomade.—Gilaneila, Pre-existence of Souls, ch. ii.

Hébdómadal. adj. [Gr. ἡβδομαίος, from ἡπτά = seven.] Weekly.

As for hebdomadal periods, or weeks, in regard of their sabbaths, they were observed by the Hebrews.—Sir T. Browne.

They had their original of later time than this hebdomadal account.—Selden, On Drayton's Polyolbon, song 11.

Hébdómátikal. adj. Weekly.

Far from the conceit of deambulatory, hebdomatical, or perambulante, ephemeral, offices.—Bishop Morton, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 112.

Hébon. s. Ebony: (used adjectivally).

A gentle youth, his dearely loved squire,
His square of eben wood behind him bare.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, i. 7, 37.

Hébetate. v. a. [Lat. hebetatus, pass. part. of hebetare; hebetus = dull.] Stupidly.

The eye, especially if hebetated, might cause the same perception.—Harvey, On Consumption.

Beef may suffer a robustness on the limbs of my son, but will hebetate and clog his intellects.—Arbuthnot and Pope.

Hébate. adj. Dull; stupid.

Examine and try the commonality in almost every place, and you must observe how hebate and dull they are, how strangely unacquainted with what they profess to believe.—Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 325.

Hébetude. s. Dulness; obtuseness; bluntness.

The pestilent seminaries, according to their grossness or subtilty, activity or hebetude, cause more or less truculent plagues.—Harvey, On the Plague.

Hébraizma. s. Hebrew idiom.

Milton has infused a great many Latinisms, as well as Grecisms and sometimes Hebraisms, into the language of his poem.—Addison, Spectator.

Hébraist. s. Person skilled in Hebrew.

Hébrician. s. Same as Hebraist. Rare.

The words are more properly taken for the air or ether than the heavens, as the best Hebrician understand them.—Sir W. Raleigh.

The nature of the Hebrew verse, as the meanest Hebrician knoweth, consists of uneven feet.—Poacham.

Hécatomb. s. [Gr. ἑκατόμβη; ἑκατόν = hundred.] Sacrifice of an hundred cattle.

In rich men's homes
I bid kill some hecatomb, but no hecatombs;
None starve, none suffer.

Donne.
One of these three is a whole hecatomb,
And therefore only one of them shall die.

Dryden.

VOL. I.

Her triumphant songs in war succeed,
And slaughter'd hecatombs around 'em bleed.

Addison.

Héckle, also Héckle and Héckhell. s. Instrument for preparing flax.

By the operation of heckling a threefold object is proposed: 1. The parting of the filaments into their finest fibres; 2. The separation of the short fibres which are unfit for spinning; 3. The equable and parallel arrangement of the long filaments. The instrument of accomplishing these objects is a comb-fashioned tool called the heckle or heckle; a surface studded more or less thickly with metal points called heckle teeth, over which the flax is drawn in such a way that the above three required operations may be properly accomplished.

Whenever one half of the stroke of flax is heckled it turned round to heckle the other half.—Encyclopædia of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Héckle. v. a. Prepare flax by Heckling.

His teeth are very industrious in their cutting, and his chops, like a Bridegroom, perpetually hatching.—Butler, Remarks, li. 463.

(For another example, see under Heckle, s.)

Héckling. verbal abs. Act or process of preparing flax by the Heckle. See Heckle, s.

The minister, mentioned by Kircher in his description of China, put into water, moulders like clay, and is a fibrous small excrescence, like hairs growing upon the stomach and for the heckling, spinning, and weaving it, he refers to his Mundus subterraneus.—Wanderer.

Héctie. adj. [Gr. ἡκτικὴ - having; bearing; constitution.]

1. Habitual: constitutional.

A hectic fever hath got hold
Of the whole substance, not to be controll'd.

Donne.

The word hectic is joined only to that kind of fever which is slow and continual; and, ending in a consumption, is the contrary to those fevers which arise from a plethora, or too great fullness from obstruction.

It is attended with too low a state of the excretory passages, and generally those of the skin; whereby so much runs off as leaves not resistance enough in the contractile vessels to keep them sufficiently distended, so that they vibrate often, excite the fluids the more, and keep them thin and hot.—Quercus.

2. Troubled with a morbid heat.

A corrosive to one already in a hectic condition.—Harrell, Letter, ii. 43.

The busy brain of a lean and hectic chymist.—Steele, Sermons, i.

Perilance she died in youth: it may be, how'd
With wear far heavier than the ponderous tomb
That weigh'd upon her gentle dust, a cloud
Might rather o'er her beauty, and a bloom
In her dark eye, prophetic of the doom
Heaven gives its favourites: early death; yet shed
A sunset charm around her, and illum'd
With hectic light, the opus of the dead,
Of her consuming cheek the autumnal leaf-like red.

Byron, Cenci Harold, iv. 103.

Héctie. s. Hectic fever.

Like the hectic in my blood he rages,
And thou must cure me.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 3.

By wasting hectic of his flesh and heart.—Shakespeare, Job, p. 18.

Héctical. adj. Same as Héctie, the latter being the commoner word.

That silence which I will not call a symptom of sickness, but a sickness itself. However, I will keep it from being hectic.—Sir H. Wotton, Kimmins, To Sir E. Bacon.

Héctically. adv. In a hectic manner.

He was for some time hectically giddy.—Johnson, Life of Anselm.

Héctor. s. [Greek and Latin. Proper name of the eldest son of Priam, the hero of the Trojans, to whom the character of an overbearing blusterer was attributed, and by whom some boastful expressions are certainly used in the Iliad, but not to the extent suggested by the present use of the word. It is in later works that the full justification of the term must be sought.]

Blustering, turbulent fellow.

Those usurping hectors, who pretend to honour without religion, think the chances of a life a blot not to be washed out but by blood.—South.

We'll take our cooling cup of nectar,
And drink to this celestial factor.

Prior.

Héctor. v. a. Threaten or bully after the fashion of a Hector.

They reckon they must part with honour together with their opinion, if they suffer themselves to be hecorted out of it.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

The weak low spirit fortune makes her slave;
But she's a drudge, when hecorted by the brave.

Tragedy.

An honest man, when he came home at night, found another fellow downing him in his study, hecoring his servants, and calling for supper.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Héctor. v. g. Play the bully; bluster.

They have attacked me, some with piteous moans and entreaties, others grinning and only showing their teeth, others ranting and hecoring, others sobbing and weeping.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

Don Carlos made his chief director,
That she might over the servants hector.

See ft.

Héctoring. verbal abs. Acting as an Hector.

Hence it follows of necessity that vast numbers of our people are compelled to seek their livelihood by hecoring, robbing, stealing, cheating, juggling, flattering, suborning, forswearing, forging, lying, teasing, hecoring, voting, scribbling, star-puzzling, poisoning, whoring, canting, labelling, free-thinking, and the like occupations.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels, pt. iv. ch. vi. (Ord MS.)

One would think the hecoring, the scolding, the sullying, and all the different species of the angry, should be cured.—Spectator.

Several persons have been admitted into the parlour and entered the opportunity of hecoring and condolence for their letters, being content this evening to vary their enjoyment by taking their spirits and water where they could themselves hector and condolence in company that called for beer.—Stiles Marston, ch. v.

Héctorism. s. Character of a Hector.

A desperate principle of Héctorism, which, if it take root in men's hearts, will turn the whole of mankind into a wilderness of savage beasts.—Christian Religion's Appeal, p. 15. (Ord MS.)

Héctory. adj. Blustering; insolent; outrageous.

Those who seek glory from evil things, (who glory in their shame), from presumptuous transgression of God's law, hecorty, prodigious, and delinquent, from outrageous violence, from overreaching craft, are not only vicious, but impudent.—Barnes, Sermons, vol. iii. serm. 31.

Hedge. s. [A.S. hegge.] Fence made round grounds with bushes, or trees planted and trimmed so as to spread into a fence.

The carious unfold variety of colours to the eye every morning, and the hedge's breath is beyond all perfume.—Pope.

Common as either an adjective, or as the first element of a compound, denoting mean, vile, of the lowest class; perhaps from a hedge, or hedge-born man, a man without any known place of birth.

There are five in the first show: the pedant, the braggart, the hedge-priest, the fool, and the boy.—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

The clergy do much better than a little hedge, contemptible, illiterate wear can be presumed to do.—Swift.

A person, who, by his style and literature, seems to have been the corrector of a hedge-priest in Little Britain, proceeded gradually to an author.—Id.

Hedge. v. a.

1. Enclose with, or as with, a hedge; fence.

Hedge thy possession about with thorns.—Ecclusiasticus, xxviii. 2.

such divinity doth hedge a king,
That treason can but peep in what it would.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 5.

Those alleys must be hedged at both ends, to keep out the wind.—Marston.

With in.

England, hedg'd in with the main,
That water-walled bulwark, still secure
And confident from foreign purposes.

It must not be paid and exported in ready money; so says our law; but that is a law to hedge in the cuckoo, and serves for no purpose; for if we export not goods, for which our merchants have money due to them, how can it be paid by bills of exchange?—Locke.

With up. Obstruct.

I will hedge up thy way with thorns.—Isaiah, li. 6.

2. Confounded with edge. Force into a place already full.

When I was hoody, thou delay'dst me longer;
I pray thee, let me hedge one to-morrow
Into thy promise; for thy life preser'd.
When you are sent on an errand, be sure to hedge in some business of your own.—Swift, Advice to Servants, Directions to the Landman.

3. Manage to make certain bets safe by setting others against them so as to neutralize the loss.

Hedge. v. n. Shift; hide the head.
I myself sometimes, hiding my honour in my necessity, am fain to shuffle, to hedge, and to lurch.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

Hedge-born. adj. Having no known birth; meanly born.
He then, that is not furnish'd in this sort,
But he usurp the sacred name of knight,
And should, if I were worthy to be judge,
Be quite degraded, like a hedge-born swain,
That doth presume to feast of gentle blood.
Shakespeare, Henry VI., Part I. iv. 1.

Hedge-creeper. s. Native bird so called of the genus Sylvia.
No marvel, therefore, if not long after there ensued a collision of opposite parts and much scuffling between the liberties of antichristian servitude and cannibal liberty; whom this hedge-creeper dare term incontinent Greens, schismatics, heretics; his pen is no slander.—Bishop Hall, House of Married Clergy, li. lii. (Ord MS.)

Hedge-note. s. Word of contempt for low writing.
When they began to be somewhat better bred, they left these hedge-notes for another sort of poem, which was also full of pleasant railery.—Dryden.

Hedge-pig. s. ? Hedgehog.
Thrice the bridled cat hath mew'd,
Thrice and once the hedge-pig whin'd.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

Hedge-sparrow. s. Native bird so called, of the genus Accentor; more akin (notwithstanding its name) to the Linnet than the true Sparrow. The name Hedge-Accentor has been suggested in modern works of authority; but as the only other member of the genus (Accentor Alpinus) is a very rare British bird, it is probable that the popular, though inaccurate name, will hold its ground.
The hedge-sparrow fed the cuckoo so long,
That it had its head bit off by its young.
Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 4.

Hedge-writer. s. See Hedge.
There are two things wherewith this author is peculiarly angry; first at the dissensions way of the sect of mankind treating the greatest poets in the nation; secondly, that these hedge-writers (in phrase) unwillingly lend him, because it cost me some pains to invent) seldom speak a word against any of the late ministry, but they presently fall to compliment my lord treasurer and others in great places.—Swift, Remarks on a Letter to the Seven Lords, vol. iv. p. 235. (Ord MS.)

Hedgeboot. s. Wood used for repairing a hedge.
It has been agreed that if a man cuts trees for household, hedgeboot, cartboot, ploughboot, and fireboot, (tithes shall not be paid for them).—Agstiff, Parergon Juris Canonici. (Ord MS.)

Hedgehog. s.
1. Native quadruped so called of the genus Erinaceus.

Like hedge-hogs, which Lie tumbling in my barefoot way, and mount
Their prickles at my foot-fall.
Shakespeare, Tempest, iii. 2.

2. Term of reproach.
Didst thou not kill this king?—I grant ye.—
Dost grant me, hedge-hog?
Shakespeare, Richard III. i. 2.

Hedgehysop. s. Plant so called.
Hedge-hysop is a purging medicine, and a very rough one; externally it is said to be a vulnerary.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

Hedger. s. One who makes hedges.
What time the labour'd ox
In his loose traces from the furrow came,
And the swink'd hedger at his supper sat.
Milton, Comus, 231.

He would be laughed at, that should go about to make a fine dancer out of a country hedger at past fifty.—Locke.

Hedgerow. s. Series of trees or bushes planted for enclosures.

Sometime walking not unseen
By hedgerow clus, on hillocks green.
Milton, L'Allegro, 57.

The fields in the northern side are divided by hedgerows of myrtle. Bishop Berkeley, Letter to Pope.

Hedging. verbal abs. Manœuvring with a a bet.

Now this stake is drawn, my lord may be for hedging off, mayhap. Read! I'll go to Jack Speed's, secure Nabob, and be out of town in an hour.—Colman the elder, The Jealous Wife, v. 3.

Hedging-bill. s. Cutting hook used in making hedges.

Comes master Dametas with a hedging-bill in his hand, chiding and swearing.—Sir P. Sidney.

Heed. v. a. [A.S. hedan.] Mind; regard; take notice of; attend.

With pleasure Argus the musician heeds;
But wonders much at those new vocal reeds.
Dryden.

He will no more have clear ideas of all the operations of his mind, than he will have all the particular ideas of any landscape or clock, who will not turn his eyes to it, and with attention heed all the parts of it.—Locke.

Heed. v. n. Mind; consider.

Thoughtless she leaves amid the dusty way
Her eyes, to ripen in the genial ray;
Nor heeds, that some fell beetle, who thirsts for blood,
Or the rude foot, may crush the future brood.
Watson, Paraphrase of Job, ch. xxxix.

Heed. s.

1. Care; attention.

With wanton heed and giddy cunning,
The melting voice through mazes running.
Milton, L'Allegro, 131.

Take heed that, in their tender years, ideas, that have no natural cohesion, come not to be united in their heads.—Locke.

must take heed, my Portia
The world has all its eyes on Cato's son.
Addison, Cato.

2. Caution; fearful attention; suspicious watch.

Either wise hearing or ignorant carriage is caught
As men catch diseases, one of another; therefore, let men take heed of their company.—Shakespeare, Henry IV., Part II. v. 1.

3. Seriousness; staidness.

He did unsent them; and the first he view'd,
He did it with a serious mind; a heed
Was in his countenance.
Shakespeare, King Henry VIII. iii. 2.

Heedful. adj.

1. Watchful; cautious; suspicious.

Give him heedful note;
For I mine eyes will rivet to his face;
And, after, we will both our judgements join,
In censure of his seeming.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 2.

2. Attentive; careful; observing; (with of).

Thou heedful of advice, secure proceed;
My praise the precept is, be thine the deed.
Pope.

Heedfully. adv. In a heedful manner; attentively; carefully; cautiously.

That worthy divine did not heedfully observe the great difference betwixt these instanced degrees.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience, D. i. c. 5.

Heediness. s. Attribute suggested by Heedly; caution; vigilance.

And evermore that craven coward knight
Was at his back with heartless heediness,
Waiting if he unwares him murder might.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 6, 25.

Heedless. adj. Negligent; inattentive; careless; thoughtless; regardless; unobserving.

The heedless lover does not know
Whose eyes they are that wound him so.
Heedless of verse, and hopeless of the crown,
Scarce half a wit, and more than half a clown.
Dryden.

Some ideas, which have more than once offered themselves to the senses, have yet been little taken notice of; the mind being either heedless, as in children, or otherwise employed, as in men.—Locke.

Heedlessly. adv. In a heedless manner; carelessly; negligently; inattentively.

Post not heedlessly on unto the non ultra of folly, or precipice of perdition.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, i. 30.

Our women run on so heedlessly in the fashion, that though it is the interest of some to hide as much of their faces as possible, yet because a leading coat appeared with a backward head-dress, the rest shall follow the mode, without observing that the author of the fashion assumed it because it could become no one but herself.—Tatler, no. 212.

Heedlessness. s. Attribute suggested by Heedless; carelessness; thoughtlessness; negligence; inattention.

In the little harms that suffer from knocks and falls, they should not be puffed, but bid do so again; which is a better way to cure their heedlessness.—Locke.

Heedy. adj. Heedful. Rare.

In the midst of this supposed safety, the watch-tower is not unfurnished with heedy eyes.—Bishop Hall, John with Jehoram. (Ord MS.)

Heel. s. [A.S. hel, hele.]

1. Part of the foot that protuberates behind.

If the luxated bone be distorted backward, it lies over the heel bone.—Wise, Surgeon.

2. Whole foot of animals.

He calls to mind his strength, and then his speed,
His winged heels, and then his armed head;
With these I avoid, with that his fate to meet;
But fear prevails, and bids him trust his feet.
Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

Pegasus appeared, lunging off the side of a rock, with a fountain running from his heel.—Addison.

3. Anything shaped like a heel.

At the other side is a kind of heel or knob, to break cloths with.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

4. Feet, as employed in flight.

Nothing is commoner, in times of danger, than for men to leave their masters to tears and tears, and show them a fair pair of heels for't.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

5. Back part of a stocking; whence the phrase to be out at heels, to be worn out.

A good man's fortune may grow out of heels.
Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

Be at the heels of any one. Pursue closely; follow hard.

Sir, when comes your book forth?—
Upon the heels of my presentment.
Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, i. 1.

But is there no sequel at the heels of this Mother's admiration?—Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 2.

The Spaniards fled on towards the North to seek their fortunes, being still chased by the English navy at their heels, until they were fain to give them over for want of powder.—Halcyon.

Want! worldly want! that hungry meagre fiend,
Is at my heels, and chases me in view.
Chapman, Venice Preserved, i. 1.

Have the heels of. Outrun; (as, 'My horse had the heels of him').

Lay by the heels. Fetter; shackle; put in gyver.

If the king blame me for't, I'll lay ye all
By th' heels, and suddenly; and on your heads
Clap round lines for neglect.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. v. 3.

One half of man, his mind,
Is, sui juris, unconfined.
And cannot be laid by the heels. Buller's Husbands.

I began to smoke that they were a parcel of nummers; and wondered that none of the Middlesex justices took care to lay some of them by the heels.—Addison.

Heel. v. n. Dance.

I cannot sing,
Nor heel the high lallant, nor sweeten talk.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iv. 1.

Heel-piece. s. Piece fixed on the hinder part of the shoe, to supply what is worn away.

Heel-piece. v. a. Put a piece of leather on a shoe-heel.

Some blamed Mrs. Bull for new heel-piecing her shoes.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Heeltaps. s. Wine left in glass that according to the rules of drink should have been emptied. Slang.

Heft. s. Heaving; effort.

May be in the cup
A spider strop'd, and one may drink; depart,
And yet partake no venom; for his knowledge
Is not infected; but if one present
Th' abhorrent ingredient in his eye, make known
How he hath drunk, he cracks his gorge, his sides
With violent hefts. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

Heft. s. Haft.

His oily side devours both blade and heft. Waller.

It affords a greater heft and purchase.—Widdow, Speech against Reformers of Parliament, 1580.

Hegeomónia. adj. [Gr. hēgemon, hēgemon = leader; hēgemonía.] Having the nature or charracter of, relating to, a leader; ruling; predominant.

All manakia have a predominant idea, which masters every other, and is hegemonical in most of their propositions.—Johnstone, On Madness, p. 2.

Hegemonical. adj. Same as Hegemonic.

The most princelike and hegemonical part of his soul, which ought to rule over all, is now become servile and a slave unto all.—Elderby, Alchemists, p. 120: 1022.

Hegemony. s. [Gr. hēgemonia :: leadership.] First applied in the politics of Republican Greece to the contest between the two chief commonwealths of Athens and Sparta for the preponderating or exclusive influence over the minor states. At present the contest between Austria and Prussia for a similar preponderance in Germany best illustrates the word. Leadership of one state over another: (its application being to political bodies rather than to individual persons).

The professed object of Prussia is the hegemony of Northern Germany, rather than the actual sovereignty over the smaller kingdoms and principalities.—Dr. R. G. Latham, Nationalities of Europe.

Hegira. s. [Arabic.] See extract.

Hegira [in] a term in chronology, signifying the epocha, or account of time, used by the Arabians and Turks, who begin their computation from the day that Mahomet was forced to make his escape from the city of Mecca, which happened on Friday, July 10, A.D. 622, under the reign of the emperor Heraclius.—Harris.

Heifer. s. [A.S. heafre.] Cow.

A heifer will put up her nose, and snuff in the air, against rain.—Bacon.

For her the flocks refuse their verdant food; Nor thirsty heifers seek the gliding flood. Pope.

Heigh-ho. interj. Expression of slight languor and uneasiness.

Heigh-ho! can't be not four by the day, I'll be hang'd. Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. ii. 1.
I would I had a wife, saith he; ha-ho for an husband, cries she! Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 568.

In the following extract as a voice of exultation.

We'll toss off our ale till we cannot stand,
And heigh-ho for the honour of old England. Dryden.

Height. s. [The e of the ordinary spelling is out of place; the gh sufficiently indicating the diphthongal sound of the i.]

1. Elevation; altitude; definite space measured upwards.

Around I'll study thee,
As he removes far off, that great heights takes. Donne.

There is in Tichman a church that is in length one hundred feet in breadth twenty, and in height near fifty.—Bacon.

An amphitheatre appear'd,
Rain'd in degrees, to sixty paces rear'd;
That when a man was plac'd in one degree,
Height was allow'd for him above to see. Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, ii. 445.

An amphitheatre's amazing height
Hero fills the eye with terror and delight. Addison.

2. Degree of latitude.

Guinea lieth to the North sea, in the same height as Peru to the South. Abbot, Description of the World.

3. Summit; ascent; towering eminence; high place.

From Alpine heights the father first descends;
His daughter's husband in the plain attends. Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

4. Elevation of rank; station of dignity; great degree of excellence.

Ten kings had from the Norman conqueror reign'd,
When England to her greatest height attain'd,
Of pow'r, dominion, glory, wealth, and state. David.

Every man of learning need not enter into their difficulties, nor climb the heights to which some others have arrived.—Watts.

5. Utmost degree; full completion.

That to the height of this great argument,
I may assert Eternal providence. Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 23.

Despair is the height of madness.—Sherlock.

6. State of excellence; advance towards perfection.

Social duties are carried to greater heights, and enforced with stronger motives, by the principles of our religion.—Addison.

Heighten. v. a.

1. Make high; raise; elevate.

Being so heighten'd,
He water'd his new plants with dews of flattery,
Seducing many friends; and, to this end,
He bow'd his nature. Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 5.
Heighten'd in their thoughts beyond
All doubt of victory. Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 620.

2. Improve; meliorate.

By the infusion of three drops out of one of his phials, he converted it into a most beautiful pale Burgundy. Two more of the same kind heighten'd it into a perfect Languedoc.—Addison, Tatler, no. 131.

3. Aggravate.

Foreign states used their endeavours to heighten our confusions, and plunge us into all the evils of a civil war.—Addison.

Heightening. verbal abs. Making high; exaltation; addition in the way of intensity to any quality.

As in a room, contrived for state, the height of the roof should bear a proportion to the area; so in the heightenings of poetry, the strength and vehemence of figures should be suited to the occasion. Dryden.

Heinous. adj. [Fr. haineux; haine—hate.]

Atrocious; wicked in a high degree.

To abrogate or innovate the gospel of Christ, if men or angels should attempt, it were most heinous and accursed sacrifice.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

This is the man should do the bloody deed:
The image of a wicked heinous fault.

Lives in his eye. Shakespeare, King John, iv. 2.

As it is a most heinous, so it is a most dangerous impiety to despise him that can destroy us.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Heinously. adv. In a heinous manner; atrociously; wickedly.

If the net be so heinously flagitious, and rebounding to so high dishonour of God. Bishop Hall, Cane of Conscience, addenda.

Heinousness. s. Attribute suggested by heinous; atrociousness; wickedness.

He who can treat offences, provoking God, as jests and trifles, must have little sense of the heinousness of them.—Bayly.

Heir. s. [N.Fr. heire; Lat. heres.]

1. One who is inheritor of anything after the present possessor.

That I'll give my voice on Richard's side,
To bar my master's heirs in true descent,
God knows, I will not do it. Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 2.

Being heirs together of the grace of life.—1 Peter, iii. 7.

Sunk is the hero, and his glory lost,
And I his heir in misery alone. Pope.

The heirs to titles and large estates have a weakness in their eyes, and a tenderness in their constitutions.—Swift.

2. One newly inheriting an estate.

The young extravagant heir had got a new steward, and was resolved to look into his estate.—Swift.

Heir. r. a. Inherit. Inherit commoner.

His sons in blooming youths were snatch'd by fate;
One only daughter heir'd the royal state. Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 78.

Heirloom. s. State or possessions of an heir.

Or if, O shame! in hired harlot's bed
Thy wealthy heirloom then lost layd;
Then, Pontic, little buds thee to discourse
Of a long line of golden ancestors. Bishop Hall, Satires, iv. 3.

Heiress. s. Female heir.

An heiress she, while yet alive;
All that was hers to him did give. Waller.

Æneas, though he married the heiress of the crown, yet claimed no title to it during the life of his father-in-law.—Dryden.

Heirless. adj. Destitute of, deprived of, or wanting, an heir.

I still think of
The wrong I did myself; which was so much,
That heirless it hath made my kingdom. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 1.

Heirloom. s. [A.S. geloima—goods.] Movable, chattel, or article of furniture, bequeathed on condition that it descend by inheritance, and therefore inseparable from the freehold.

These principles of obedience and patience, which our Saviour left to his apostles, and they like heirs to their successors.—Proceedings against Garnet, &c., Y. y. 3: 1010.

7 u 2

Achilles' sceptre was of wood,
Transmitted to the hero's line;
Thence through a long descent of kings
Came an heirloom, as Homer sings. Swift.

Heirship. s. State, rank, character, or privileges of an heir.

A bymn appoints an heir or an executor in his will, to build an hospital within a year, under pain of being deprived of his heirship.—Lytle, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Hele. r. a. [A.S. helan.] Hide; conceal. Obsolete, provincial.

Else would the waters overflow the lands,
And fire devour the air, and hell them quight. Spenser, Faerie Queene, ix. 10, 53.

Helical. adj. [Gr. hēlios—sun.] Emerging from the lustre of the sun, or falling into

And they ascribed the heat of the season to this star, they would not have computed from its helical ascent.—Sir T. Braghe.

The exact light and magnitude of the stars; their helical, zodiacal, matutine, and vesperine motions. Sir T. Braghe, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 227.

The southsayer who followed, carrying a clock and a palm-branch, the emblem of the year, could count the four astrological books, one on the moon's phases, one on the fixed stars, and two on their helical risings.—Sharpe, History of Egypt.

Helically. adv. In a helical manner.

From the rising of this star, not casually, that is, with the sun, but helically, that is, its emergence from the rays of the sun, the ancients computed their calendar days. Sir T. Braghe.

He is tempestuous in the summer, when he rises helically; and rainy in the winter, when he rises acronically.—Dryden.

The beginning of the reign of Antoninus Pius was remarkable as being the end of the Soline period of one thousand four hundred and sixty years; the memorable new year's day of the calendar had come round to the place in the natural year from which it first began to move in the reign of Memphres or Thothmes III.; it had come round to the day when the doxstar rose helically. If the years had been counted from the beginning of this great year, there could have been no doubt when it came to an end, as from the want of a leap-year the new-year's day must have been always moving one day in four years; but no satisfactory reckoning of the years had been kept, as to the end of the period.—Sharpe, History of Egypt.

Helical. adj. Spiral; with many circumvolutions.

The screw is a kind of wedge, multiplied or continued by a helical revolution about a cylinder, receiving its motion not from any stroke, but from a twist at one end of it. Bishop Wilkins.

Another trait which has to be noticed under this head, is the spiral, or rather the helical, arrangement of parts.—H. Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xii. § 231.

Helio-centric. adj. Having the sun as a centre.

The helio-centric place of a planet is said to be such as it would appear to us from the sun, if our eyes were fixed in its centre.—Harris.

We by no means find, even in those practical discoveries to whom, in reality, the revolution in science, and consequently in the philosophy of science, was due, this prompt and vigorous recognition of the supreme authority of observation as a ground of belief; this bold estimate of the probable worthlessness of traditional knowledge; and this plain assertion of the reality of theory founded upon experience. Among such discoveries, Copernicus must ever hold a most distinguished place. The helio-centric theory of the universe, established by him with vast labour and deep knowledge, was, for the succeeding century, the field of discipline and exertion of all the most active and speculative minds. Men, during that time, proved their freedom of thought, their hopeful spirit, and their comprehensive view, by adopting, incubating, and following out the philosophy which this theory suggested. But in the first promulgation of the theory, in the works of Copernicus himself, we find a far more cautious and reserved temper. He does not, indeed, give up the reality of his theory, but he expresses himself as to avoid shocking those who might (as some afterwards did) think it safe to speak of it as an hypothesis rather than a truth. Herschel, On the Philosophy of Discovery.

See also Geocentric; the two words being opposed to one another.

Heliotrope. s. [Gr. hēlios—sun + trōpe—turn, trōpe—turning.]

1. Plant that turns towards the sun; but more particularly the turnsol or sunflower.

'Tis an observation of flatterers, that they are like the heliotrope; they open only towards the sun, but shut and contract themselves at night and in cloudy weather.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

HELI

The rows, the mignonette, the heliotropes, all combined their fragrance to refresh the air, and, although from its proximity to the high-way, Hall's servant had to brush the plants as he did his coat every morning, to get rid of the dust, it was what the most fastidious critic must have pronounced a delightful little place.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurnep.

2. Precious stone, of a green colour, streaked with red veins.

They sell . . . agates, turquoises, heliotropes, cornelians.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Year's Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 14.

Heli-spherical. adj. [Gr. ἥλιος = coil + σφαῖρα = sphere. Helic-spheric the fuller and more correct form.] Having the character of a helix.

The heli-spherical line is the rhomb line in navigation, and is so called because on the globe it winds round the pole spirally, and still comes nearer and nearer to it, but cannot terminate in it.—Harris.

They are heli-spherical lines, as they call them, that is, partly circular, and partly helical or spiral. Cicero, Posthuma, p. 285; 1050.

Helix. s. [Gr. ἥλιος = coil, spiral; ἄνω = roll.] Spire, or part of a spiral line: circ-convolution; coil.

Find the true inclination of the screw, together with the quantity of water which every helix does contain.—Bishop Wilkins.

Hell. s. [A.S. hel, place of punishment after death, as the Greek ἄδης, and the Latin Tartarus. In Norse, Hela is the goddess thereof; i.e. the analogue of the Greek, Hecate, the Latin Proserpina.]

1. Place of the devil and wicked souls.

For it is a knell
That summons thee to heaven, or to hell.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.

If a man were a porter of hell gates, he should have old turning the key.—Ibid.
He descended into hell.—Book of Common Prayer, Apostles Creed.

2. Temporal death.

The horrors of hell compassed me about; the snarers of death prevented me.—Psalm, xlii. 5.

3. Place at a running play, to which those who are caught are carried.

Then comes three be straight allotted there;
They of both ends the middle two do fly;
The two that in mid-place, hell called were,
Must strive with walking foot, and watching eye,
To catch of them, and them to hell to bear,
That they, as well as they, hell may supply.
Sir P. Sidney.

4. Place into which the tailor throws his shreds.

This trusty squire, he had, as well
As the bold Trojan knight, seen hell;
Not with a counterfeit'd pass
Of golden bough, but true gold lace.
Hatter, Hudibras.

In Covent-garden did a taylor dwell,
Who might deserve a place in his own hell.
King, Cookery.

5. Formerly, a dungeon in a prison.

In Wood-street's hole, or Poultry's hell.
The Counter-Rat: 1658.

6. Infernal powers.

Much danger first, much toll did he sustain,
While Saul and hell crost his strong fate in vain.
Cowley, Davideis.

7. Gaming-house.

Don Juan, our young diplomatic sinner,
Pursued his path, and drove past some hotels,
St. James' Palace, and St. James' hell.
Hells, gaming-houses. What their number may now be in this life I know not. Before I was of age I knew them pretty accurately, both 'gold' and 'silver.' I was once nearly called out by an acquaintance, because when he asked me where I thought his soul would be found hereafter, I answered, 'In Silver Hell.'—Byron, Don Juan, xi. 20, and note.

At midnight, he had lost forty-eight thousand pounds. Affairs now began to be serious. . . . On they played, and the Duke lost more. . . . Another morning came, and there they sat, ankle deep in cards. No attempt at breakfast now—no affectation of making a toilet, or airing the room. The atmosphere was hot, to be sure, but it well became such a hell. There they sat, in total, in positive forgetfulness of everything but the hot game they were hunting down.—Disraeli, The Young Duke, b. iv. ch. viii.

Hell-broth. s. Composition boiled up for infernal purposes.

Adder's fork and blind-worm's sting,
Lizard's leg and owl's wing;
For a charm of powerful trouble,
Like a hell-broth boil and bubble.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

HELL

Hell-cat. s. Witch; hag.

The whorson old hell-cat would have given me the layne of a rat once.—I had her make mawes with 't.—Middleton, The Witch.

'A woman told me this night that she knew why I came to your house—that I was in her power.' 'Vat woman?' 'A hell-cat, who hates me as she does the devil.' 'A hell-cat would not hate de devil, slowly observed the Jew. 'Well, perhaps not; but she will ruin me if she can.'—Maryat, Sharkey's, vol. ii. ch. 1.

Hell-hag. s. Hag of hell.
A corroding disease it [envy] is; an hell-hag that feeds upon its own marrow, bones, and strongest parts.—Bishop Richardson, On the Old Testament, p. 281.

Hell-hound. s.

1. Dog of hell; agent of hell.

From forth the kennel of thy womb hath crept
A hell-hound that doth hunt us all to death.
Shakespeare, Richard III. iv. 4.

My hell-hounds to lick up the draft, and filth,
Which man's polluting sin with taint had shed
On what was pure.—Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 629.
Now the hell-hounds with superior speed
Had reach'd the dame, and fast'ning on her side,
The ground with issuing streams of purple dy'd.
Dryden, Thebes and Hamlet, 142.

Against your Protestant brethren—to lay waste their country, to desolate their dwellings, and exterminate their race and name with these horrible hell- hounds of savage war—hell-hounds, I say, of savage war. Spain armed herself with bloodhounds to exterminate the wretched natives of America, and we improve on the inhuman example of even Spanish cruelty: we turn loose these savage hell-hounds against our brethren and countrymen in America, of the same language, laws, liberties, and religion, endured to us by every tie that should sanctify humanity. My lords, this awful subject, so important to our honour, our constitution, and our religion, demands the most solemn and effectual inquiry; and I again call upon your lordships, and the united powers of the state, to examine it thoroughly and decisively, and to stamp upon it an indelible stigma of the public abhorrence.—Brougham,
Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Lord Chatham.

2. Profligate person.
Gods keep me from these hell-hounds.
Hammond and Fletcher, Philaster.

Hell-kite. s. Kite of infernal breed.
Did you say all? What all? Oh hell-kite! all?
What all my pretty chickens, and their dam,
At one fell swoop?—Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

Hellebore. s. [Lat. helleborus.] Christmas flower.
And melancholy cures by sovereign hellebore.
Dryden, Polydorus, song 13.

Helleborine. s. Native orchidaceous plant so called, of the genera Cephalanthera and Epipactis.

The Cephalanthera glandiflora, or helleborine.—Darwin, Impregnation of Orchids.

Helleborism. s. Medicinal preparation of hellebore.

In vain should the physician attempt, with all his medicines and helleborisms, the cure of those that are sick of love, or any the like passions.—Ferrault, Love Melancholy, p. 109; 1010.

Hellenism. s. Greek idiom.
Virgil is full of the Greek forms of speech, which the critics call hellenisms.—Addison, Spectator, no. 285.

Hellenist. s.

1. Grecinizing Jew.
That the thing was done by the Jews, I deny not; but by those, I mean the Hellenists.—Gregory, Post-humus, p. 88.

Uncanonical pieces that had been annexed to, by the Hellenists.—Cassin, Canon of Scripture, p. 60.

2. Any one skilled in the Greek language.
Another thing observable of s with its affinity t: when they come alone, without the implication of other consonants, they are of an easy and graceful pronunciation. Homer seems to have heeded them; but if all this do not satisfy the critical Hellenist, then I must add, &c.—Dalgarno, Deaf and Dumb Man's Tutor, p. 120.

Hellenistic. adj. Relating to the language used among the Jews of the parts wherein the Greek was spoken concurrently with the native language, e.g. Syria, Asia Minor, and Egypt.

The Hellenistic Greek of these writers was that of the Macedonian of Alexander's army, rather than of the Ionians, Dorians, or Æolians.—Sharpe, History of Egypt.

HELM

Hellenistic. adj. Same as Hellenistic.

The importance of the hellenistic dialect, into which he had made the exactest march.—Bishop Hall, Life of Hammond, § 1.

Heinrich and some other scrupulous critics reckon this an hellenistic form of speech.—Blackwell, Sacred Classics, ii. 157.

Hellenize. v. n. Use the Greek language.

To hellenize is to speak Greek, and to have skill in the Greek learning.—Hammond, Paraphrase and Annotations on the New Testament, Acta, vl. 1.

Hellier. s. Sluter; tiler; i.e. coverer (of houses).

He that covereth the house with tile or slate, is commonly called a hellier.—Archbishop Usher, A word to the Jewish Nation, p. 210.

In the West, he that covers a house with slates is called a hellier or hellier.—Kap.

Hellish. adj. Sent from hell; belonging to hell; having the qualities of hell; infernal; wicked; detestable.

O thou celestial or infernal spirit of love, or what other heavenly or hellish title thou list to have, for effects of both I find in myself, have compassion of me.—Sir P. Sidney.

No benefits shall ever ally that diabolical rancour that ferments in some hellish breasts, but that it will foam out at its foul mouth in slander.—South, Sermons.

Hellishly. adv. In a hellish manner; infernally; wickedly; detestably.

That wicked plot [the gunpowder treason] was contrived and managed with the greatest sworn secrecy, made hellishly secret and firm by solemn oaths.—Bishop Harlowe, Remains, p. 320.

Hellward. adv. In the direction of, towards hell.

No next thy ears the able sheep to place
Full o'er the pit, and hellward turn their face.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, p. 628.

Helly. adj. Having the qualities of hell.

Rare.
Such blasphemies they brag out of their helly hearts.—Anderson, Exposition, fol. 48, b.; 1573.
Free Helicon and frank Parosian hills,
Are helly haunts, and rank pernicious illa.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 453.

Helm. s. [from A.S. helm.]

1. Covering for the head in war; helmet; morion; head-piece.

France spreads his banners in our noiseless land;
With plumed helm the day's begins his threats.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 2.
Menechmus lays hard load upon his helm.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

2. Part of a coat of arms that bears the crest.
More might be added of helms, crests, mantles, and supporters.—Cassan, Remains.

3. Upper part of the refoat.
The vulgar chymists themselves pretend to be able, by repeated collocations, and other dit operations, to make the distilled parts of a concrete bring its own caput mortuum over the helm.—Boyle.

Helm. s.

1. Steerage; upper part of the rudder.

'y did not leave the helms in storms;
And such they are make happy seasons. B. Jonson.
More in prosperity is reason lost
Than ships in storms, their helms and anchors lost.
Sir J. Denham, Of Prudence.

Fair occasion shows the springing gale,
And interest guides the helm, and honour swells the sail.
Prior.

2. Station of government.

I may be wrong in the means, but that is no objection against the design: let them at the helm contrive it better.—Swift.

3. In the following line it is difficult to determine whether steersman or defender is intended: I think steersman.

You slander
The helms of the state, who care for you like fathers,
When you cur-e them as enemies.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, i. 1.

Helm. v. a. Guide; conduct.

The very stream of his life, and the business he hath helmed, must, upon a warranted need, give him a better proclamation.—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 2.

Helmed. adj. Furnished with a helm.

The helmed cherubim
Are seen in glittering ranks with wings display'd.
Milton, On the Nativity, 112.

Helmet. s. Helm; headpiece; armour for the head.

I saw him down; thrice up again, and fighting;
From helmet to the spur all bleeding o'er.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 6.

Seven darts are thrown at once, and some rebound run his bright shield, some on his helmet sound.
Dryden, Translation of the Aeneid, x. 455.

Helmeted, adj. Wearing a helmet.

Oh! no knees, none, widow;
Into the helmeted helms use them,
And pray for me your midwife.

Benjamin and Fletcher, Two Noble Kinsmen.

Helminthologist, s. Investigator, or student, in helminthology.

Few parts of either England or Scotland have been surveyed by the eye of the helminthologist.
Fleming, Philosophical Zoology, ii. 416. (Ord M.S.)

Helminthology, s. [Gr. ἕλμινξ, ἕλμινος = worm, specially intestinal + λογία = word, principle.] Investigation of the nature and classification of intestinal worms.

Helminthology may be considered to have been founded by Rudolph—Mason Good, Practice of Medicine.

Helmsman, s. Man at the helm; steersman.
The ice it split with a thunder fit,
The helmsman steered them through.

Coldridge, The Ancient Mariner.

Helmwind, s. Kind of wind so called. See extract.

In these mountains [of Westmoreland], towards the north-east part of the county, is a very remarkable phenomenon, such as we have not found any account of elsewhere in the kingdom, except only about Ingleton, and other places bordering upon the mountains of Ingleborough, Pendle, and Pendgout, in the confines of the counties of York and Lancaster. It is called a helmwind. A rolling cloud, sometimes for three or four days together, hovers over the mountain tops, the sky being clear in other parts. When this cloud appears, the country people say, the helm is up: which is an Anglo-Saxon word signifying properly a covering for the head.
This helm is not dispersed or blown away by the wind, but continues in its station, although a violent roaring hurricane comes tumbling down the mountain, ready to tear up all before it. Then on a sudden comes a profound calm. And then again alternately the tempest; which seldom extends into the country above a mile or two from the bottom of the mountain. Barnes and Nicholson, History of Westmoreland and Cumberland, i. 7.

Helot, s. [Native of Helos, a district of Laconia, of which, when conquered by Lacedæ-mon, the inhabitants were made slaves.]
Lacedæmonian slave.

Nor was it lawful for any Spartan to improve this lot to the best, by living upon it; for they were strictly prohibited all occupations, even that of agriculture; and their hands or helots paid them only an annual quantity of corn, wine, and other fruits.
Bishop Hutton, Monarchy Asserted, p. 110.
Ayl! 'Build him a dwelling!' let each give his mite!
Till, like Habel, the new royal dome hath arisen!
Let thy beggars and helots their pittance unite
And a palace braw for a poor-house and prison!

Byron, Derivatives of Pity.

Helotry, s. Body of Helots, or Helotlike bondsmen.

'How is it,' said I, 'that every thing which is connected with manufactures presents such features of unqualified deformity? From the largest of Manu-mon's temples down to the poorest hotel in which his helots are stalled, these edifices have all one character. Time will not mellow them; nature will remain always so offensive to the eye as to the mind.'—Southey, Colloquia on Society.

The helotry of Manumon are not, in our day, so easily enforced to content themselves as the pen-santry of that happy period, as Mr. Southey considered it, which elapsed between the fall of the feudal and the rise of the commercial tyranny.—Maccubbin, Critical and Historical Essays, Southey's Colloquia on Society.

Help, v. a. [A.S. helpan.] The old preterite help; old past participle holpen, now nearly obsolete.

1. Assist; support; aid.

Make haste to help me, O Lord my salvation.—
Psalms, xxxviii. 22.

They that dwell round about them, and helped them in all things with silver and gold. 1 Kings,
ii. 9.

2. It has, in familiar language, the particle out, which seems to have meant, originally,
out of a difficulty.

This he conceives not hard to bring about.
If all of you should join to help him out. Dryden.
The god of learning and of light,
Would want a god himself to help him out. Swift.

3. Raise by help: (with up).
Woe to him that is alone when he falleth; for he hath not another to help him up.—Becketianus,
iv. 10.

4. Enable to surmount: (with over).

Wherever they are at a stand, help them presently over the difficulty without any reluke.—
Locke.

5. Remove by help: (with off).

Having never learned any laudable manual art, they have recourse to those foolish or ill ways in use to help off their time.—Locke.

6. Free from pain or vexation.

Help and ease them, but by no means bemoan
them.—Locke.

7. Cure; heal: (with off). Obsolete.

Love doth to her eyes repair,
To help him of his blindness.—
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 2, song.

8. Promote the cure of disease.

The true calamus helps coughs.—Gerarde, Herball.

9. Remedy; change for the better.

Comes to lament for that thou canst not help;
And study help for that which thou lament'st.
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 1.

10. Prevent; hinder.

She, betwixt her modesty and pride,
Her wishes, which she could not help, would hide.
Dryden.

It is reckoned ill manners for men to quarrel upon difference in opinion, because that is a thing which no man can help in himself.—Swift.

11. Forbear; avoid.

He cannot help believing, that such things he saw and heard.—Bishop Atterbury.

I cannot help remarking the resemblance betwixt him and our author in qualities, fame, and fortune.
—Pope.

12. Promote; forward.

And they helped forward the affliction.—Zechariah, i. 15.

If you make the earth narrower at the bottom than at the top, in fashion of a sugar-loaf reversed, it will help the experiment.—Bacon.

Help to. Supply with; furnish with; (specially) present at table.

Whom they would help to a kingdom, those reign;
and whom again they would, they displace.—1 Maccabees, viii. 13.

The man that is now with Tiresias can help him to his own again.—Sir R. L. Estlin.
In plenty starving, tantalized in state,
And complacently helped to all I hate;
Treated, caroused, and fêted, I take my leave.
Pope, Moral Essays, ep. iv. 163.

Help, v. n.

1. Contribute assistance.

Sir, how comes it that you have help to make this rescue?

Discreet followers and servants help much to reputation.—Bacon.
Doubtless the matchless impudences
helped to support the knave. Dryden.

A generous present helps to persuade as well as an agreeable person.—Garth.

2. Bring a supply: (with out).

Some, wanting the talent to write, made it their care that the actors should help out where the muses failed.—Rymer.

Help, s.

1. Assistance; aid; support; succour.

Muleasses, despairing to recover the city, hardly escaped his enemies' hands by the good help of his uncle.—Knutson, History of the Turks.
He may be beholden to experience and acquired notions, where he thinks he has not the least help from them.—Locke.

2. That which gives help.

Virtue is a friend and an help to nature; but it is ice and luxury that destroy it, and the diseases of intemperance are the natural product of the sins of intemperance.—South, Sermons.

Another help St. Paul himself affords us towards the attaining the true meaning contained in his epistles.—Locke.

3. That which forwards or promotes.

Coral is in use as an help to the teeth of children.
—Bacon.

Helper, s.

1. Assistant; auxiliary; aider; one who helps or assists.

There was not any shut up, nor any left, nor any helper for Israel.—2 Kings, xiv. 20.

2. One who administers remedy.

Compassion, the mother of tears, is not always a mere idle spectator, but an helper of offences of evil.
—Dr. H. More.

3. One who supplies with anything wanted:
(with to).

Heaven
Hath brought me up to be your daughter's dower,

As it hath fed her to be my motive

And helper to a husband.

Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, iv. 1.

4. Supernumerary servant.

I live in the corner of a vast unfurnished house;
my family consists of a steward, a groom, a helper in the stable, a footman, and an old maid. Swift, Letter to Pope.

Helpful, adj.

1. Useful; that which gives assistance.

Let's fight with gentle words,
Till time lends friends, and frays their helpful
swords. Shakespeare, Richard II. iii. 3.

He orders all the succours which they bring;
The helpful and the good about him run,
And form an army. Dryden.

2. Wholesome; salutary.

A skilful physician can, as well, by separation of viscid elements, draw helpful medicines out of poison, as present out of the most healthful herbs.—
Sir W. R. B. History of the World.

Helpfulness, s. Attribute suggested by helpful: assistance; usefulness.

God ordain'd man to be in his helpfulness and helpfulness to be in his helpfulness. Atton, Tetrachordon.

Helpless, adj.

1. Wanting help.

One dice shot
Close by the board the prince's main must bore;
All three now helpless by each other lie. Dryden.

Let our enemies rage and persecute the poor and the helpless; but let it be our glory to be pure and peaceable.—Romans.

How shall I then your helpless fame defend?
'Twill then be infamy to seem your friend. Pope.

2. Irremediable; admitting no help.

Such helpless humors it's better hidden keep,
Than rip up grief, where it may not avail. Spenser.

3. Unsupplied; void: (with of). Rare;
probably a Latinism for Inops.

Naked he lies, and r-ly to expire,
Helpless of all that human wants require. Dryden.

Helplessly, adv. In a helpless manner;
without ability; without succour.

If he thus be helplessly distract,
'Tis requisite his office be resign'd. Kyd, Spanish Tragedy.

Helplessness, s. Attribute suggested by Helpless; want of ability; want of success.

It was an objection constantly urged by the ancient Epicureans, that man could not be the creature of a benevolent being, as he was formed in a state so helpless and infirm: Montaigne took it and urged it also. They never considered or perceived that this very infirmity and helplessness were the cause and element of society.—J. Warton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Helpmate, s. Assistant.

I was now provided with a helpmate.—De foe,
Robinson Crusoe.

Helper-skelter, adv. In a hurry; without order; tumultuously.

Sir John, I am thy pistol, and thy friend;
And helper-skelter have I rode to England,
And tidings do I bring. Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. v. 3.

He had no sooner turned his back, but they were at it helper-skelter, throwing books at one another's heads.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

All dominion ended with the day, and males and females met helper-skelter.—Spectator, no. 270.

Helve, s. [A.S. helf.] Handle of an axe.

His hand catcheth a stroke with the axe to cut down the tree, and the head slippeth from the helve.
—Isaiah, xlviii. 5.

Hem, Interjection so called.

I would try if I could cry hem and have him.
Shakespeare, As you like it, i. 3.

Hem, v. n. Utter a noise by violent expulsion of the breath.

She speaks much of her father; says, she hears There's tricks in the world; and hem, and beats her heart. Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iv. 3.

He loves to clear his pipes in good air, and is not a little pleased with any one who takes notice of the strength which he still exerts in his morning hem.
—Addison.

Hem, s. [A.S.] Edge of a garment doubled and sewed to keep the threads from spreading.

Hollers must be made of even cloth, white and gentle, without hem, seam, or thread hanging by.
—Winnean, Surgery.

Hem, v. a.

1. Close the edge of cloth by a hem or double border sewed together.

The contour of this speech will perhaps be the less subject to ravel out, if I turn it with the speech of our learned and pious annotator.—Spenser, On Prodiges, p. 212.

2. Border; edge.

Along the shore of silver streaming Thames,
Whose rushy bank, the which his river *hem*s.

Spenser.

All the skirt about

Was hem'd with golden fringe. Id., Faerie Queen.

3. Enclose; environ; confine; s. (perhaps always with a particle, as in, about, round).

*So of either side, stretching itself in a narrow length, was it hemmed in by woody hills, as if indeed nature had meant therein to make a place for beholders.—Sir P. Sidney.

Why, Neptune, hast thou made us stand alone,
Divided from the world for this, say they;
Hem'd in to be a spoil to tyranny,
Leaving affliction hence no way to fly? Daniel.

I hurry me in haste away,
And find his honour in a pound,
Hem'd by a triple circle round,
Chequ'd with ribbons, blue and green. Pope.

Hematemesis. s. [Gr. haima, -αἷμα = blood + ema = vomiting.] Vomiting of blood.

The blood may proceed from the mucous surface of the stomach, which is most commonly the case; and from the surface of the duodenum or of the œsophagus. It may proceed, also, from the rupture of an aneurismal tumour which has poured its blood either directly or indirectly into the stomach; and it may be simulated by the blood passing from the posterior nares or throat, or from the respiratory organs, into the stomach, and being afterwards vomited. Hematemesis is attended with almost every grade of vascular action, from the lowest state of sub-action, to the most acute action; but more frequently the vascular system is deficient of vital tone, and this condition is extended, more or less, to all the soft solids of the frame. In a very great number of cases, also, we observe a state either of general cachexia, or of congestion and morbid function, or morbid structure, of more than one of the abdominal viscera. . . . Hematemesis is, more commonly than is generally stated by authors, a mode of termination, or a consequence, of inflammation, or of inflammatory irritation and congestion of the internal tunic of the stomach and duodenum, when it presents signs of sthenic action, or is preceded by cardialgia, acute pain, tenderness, distention, and a sense of heat in the region of this organ, or when it occurs in young plethoric subjects, and is caused by incarceration, by acrid matters received into the stomach, by the use of irritating fluids, and by the suppression of accustomed discharges. In this inflammatory form of the disease, the blood thrown from the stomach is seldom in large quantity at one time, although frequently ejected, and is of less deep colour than in some other varieties; and that taken by consecution is usually cupped and luffed. The pathology of the disease will be further illustrated by the following observations on the subject, and in which I shall notice first, the primary and less complicated state of hematemesis; secondly, the supplemental, symptomatic, or vicarious forms of this disease; thirdly, hematemesis from disease of the viscera connected with the stomach; fourthly, hematemesis from certain organic lesions of the stomach, or of its vessels, and from complications with other diseases; and lastly, that rarer form of hematemesis, which, from the colour of the ejected fluid, has been called the morbus niger.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hemierania. s. [Gr. hemi = half, erania = skull.] See Megrim, for which it is the medical term; also the word out of which the popular name is a corruption.

Hemicycle. s. [Gr. hemi = half + kyklos = circle.] Half circle.

Upon the right hand of her, but with some little descent, in a hemicycle, was seated Erycin, or Quiet, the first handmaid of Peace.—B. Jonson, Part of the King's Entertainment.

Hemiplegia. s. [Gr. hemi = half + root of πλησσω = strike, seize.] Palsy that seizes one side at a time. See Paralysis.

Hemiptera. s. In Entomology. See Hymenoptera.

Hemisphère. s. [Gr. haima = blood.]

1. Half of a globe when it is supposed to be cut through its centre in the plane of one of its greatest circles.

That place is earth, the seat of man; that light his day, which else, as the other hemisphere, Night would invade.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 724.

The sun is more powerful in the northern hemisphere, and in the æquinox; for therein his motion is slower.—Sir T. Browne.

In open prospect nothing bounds our eye,
Until the earth seems join'd unto the sky;
So in this hemisphere our utmost view
Is only bounded by our king and you. Dryden.

2. In Anatomy. Side of the convoluted part of the brain.

Influenced by the inapplicability of the term 'hemisphere' to parts which are more commonly spheres or spheroids, and to avoid misconception by those who attach to the word 'cerebrum' the idea of the whole brain minus 'cerebellum' and 'medulla oblongata,' or who may restrict the term 'cerebral hemisphere' to the super-imposed masses of the lateral ventricles in higher vertebrata, I shall apply the term 'prosencephalon' to the constant division of the brain in question, and prosencephalic lobes or prosencephala to its commonly distinct nodules. It is unfortunate for the student of anatomy that, in his introduction to the science by the human structure, he should become acquainted with these parts of the brain under the name of 'hemispheres,' as if they were two halves of an essentially spherical whole or single organ.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. viii. note.

Hemisphérique. adj. Half round; containing half a globe.

A pyrite, placed in the cavity of another of an hemisphérique figure, in much the same manner as an acorn in its cup.—Woodward, On Fossils.

Hemisphérique. adj. Same as Hemispheric.

The thin film of water swells above the surface of the water it swims on, and commonly constitutes hemisphérique bodies with it. Hogbe.

Hemistich. s. [Gr. hemi = half, stichos = rank, row, order.] Half a verse.

He broke off in the hemistich, or midst of the verse; but, seized as it were with a divine fury, he made up the latter part of the hemistich.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Painting.

The method of writing parallel hemistichs in opposite columns. . . . may sometimes have caused a transposition of whole lines. Archbishop Newcome, Essay on a Translation of the Bible, p. 218.

Hemistichal. adj. Denoting, consisting in, constituted by a hemistich.

The reader will observe the constant return of the hemistichal point, which I have been careful to preserve; . . . as I suspect, that it shows how these poems were sung to the harp by the minstrels.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, addition to vol. i.

The hemistichal division is not exhibited to the eye in the printed page.—Bishop Horley, Translation of Homer, p. 35.

Hemlock. s. [A.S. hemleac.] Native umbelliferous and poisonous plant so called; Conium maculatum.

The leaves are cut into many minute segments: the petals of the flower are small, heart-shaped, and unequal; the flower is succeeded by two short clam-petted seeds. One root is sometimes used in medicine, though it is noxious; but the hemlock of ancients, which was such deadly poison, is generally supposed different.—Miller.

We cannot with certainty affirm, that no man can be nourished by wood or stones, or that all men will be poisoned by hemlock.—Locke.

Hemoptysis. s. [Gr. hemi = half, ptysis = spitting; πτῶ = spit.] Spitting of blood.

Having fulfilled the first intention, the arrest of the hemoptysis, attention should immediately afterwards be directed to the removal of any blood that may have been collected in the bronchi, and of whatever inflammatory irritation connected with it, either extemporarily or consecutively, that may exist. . . . With this intention, also, as well as to prevent the return of the hemorrhage, the assiduous adoption of external irritants, and the internal use of the balsamic or tonic medicines must be persevered in. At the same time, the digestive and excretory functions ought to receive due attention. . . . Their inhalation of watery or medicated vapours has been recommended in hemoptysis, and lately employed by both rational and empirical practitioners. The practice requires much caution; but I think it will be found often of service if discrimination as well as perseverance be observed in respect to it. Towards the acetone, or in the slighter forms of hemoptysis, the more astringent substances may be used in this way, care being taken that they neither occasion irritation or tightness in the thorax, nor excite cough. . . . The regimen during and after hemoptysis is a most important part of the treatment. The ancients advised cooling beverages and diet. They allowed acid wine, and acerb or acid fruits. The pomegranate was much and deservedly praised by them, on account of its cooling and astringent operation. Glutinous and mucilaginous articles of diet were also recommended. . . . The remarkable effects observed by Dr. Archibald Smith in persons subject to hemoptysis on their residing in elevated, dry, and temperate situations on the Andes, should suggest the adoption of residences in similar localities.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hemorrhage. s. [Gr. haima = blood + root of ρῥυμι = break.] Violent flux of blood.

Twenty days' fasting will not diminish its quantity so much as one great hemorrhage.—A. Rebutant, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Sources of hemorrhage may take place from the heart, the arteries, the capillaries, or veins, in consequence of disease or of external injury. It may proceed from the capillaries without very obvious lesion, excepting an almost inappreciable dilatation of them. All parts of the body may become the seats of hemorrhage, excepting those which are extremely dense, as the bones, cartilages, ligaments, tendons, &c.; yet it most frequently proceeds from the minute vessels distributed in mucous or serous membranes or in the parenchyma of organs. . . . In a great majority of instances, hemorrhage is merely a symptom, contingent upon a variety of affections, the primary ailment being chiefly important to the physician. If we enter into an analysis of the pathological relations of hemorrhage, we shall find that, in comparatively few cases, as they strictly primary or idiopathic; and that they may be referred to four general heads: namely—1st. To the states of organic nervous power and vital action; 2nd. To the state of structure in which the hemorrhage takes place; 3rd. To the state of the circulating organs and vessels; 4th. To the conditions of the blood.—and, 5th. To any two or more of these conjoined.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hemorrhagic. s. Consisting of, constituted by, a hemorrhage.

The frequency of hemorrhages, especially their more active states, is greater in the sanguineous, the irritable, or the sanguineous-bilious temperaments, in pethoric constitutions, and in the scrofulous diathesis. They are more common and abundant towards the completion of youth, than at any other period; and they are comparatively rare in infancy and in old age. Females are more subject to them than males. There may be said to be a hemorrhagic diathesis; inasmuch as hemorrhages are more common in the offspring of parents who have experienced attacks than in others, and as they are often observed in several children or members of the same family.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hemorrhagy. s. Same as Hemorrhage.

Great hemorrhagy succeeds the separation. Rap.

Hemorrhoids. s. [Gr. haimorrhoides.] In Medicine. Piles.

I got the hemorrhoids.—Swift.

Hemorrhoidal. adj. Belonging to the veins in the fundament.

Besides, there are hemorrhages from the nose and hemorrhoidal veins, and fluxes of them. Rap.

The Hæmorrhoids of Ant. registered in the Works of the Cyclopædia.

Emulset upon the field, a tall the stool
Of heaves, spouting hemorrhoidal blood.

Hemp. s. [A.S. hæmp; Lat. cannabis.]

Plant so called of the genus Cannabis. It hath digitated leaves opposite to one another, the flowers have no visible petals; it is male and female in different plants. Its bark is useful for cordage and cloth. Miller.

Let gallows gaze for dogs, let man go free,
And let not hemp his windpipe suffocate.

Shakspeare, Henry V. iii. 6.
Morton, in Handbinder.

Used adjectively.

— upon hemp agrimony is found wild by ditches, and sides of rivers.—Miller.

Hempen. adj. Made of hemp.

In foul reproach of knight-hood's high degree,
About his neck a hemp rope he wears.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

I twitch'd his dangling garter from his knee:
He wist not when the hemp was strung to it.

Gay, The Shopkeeper's Week, Thursday.

Hempweed. s. Native plant so called: called also hemp agrimony; Eupatorium cannabinum.

The hempweed or hempagrimony, a common plant enough, was cautiously recommended some time ago by some bushmen from South Africa, who happened to be in Guernsey, as the material from which they obtained an intoxicating substance for smoking.—André, The Channel Islands, p. 178.

Hempy. adj. Resembling hemp.

'Twixt the rind and the tree there is a cotton, or hempy kind of moss.—Hortel, Letters, ii. 53.

Hens. s.

1. Female of a house-cock.

Dame Partlet was the sovereign of his heart. . . . Nor chick, nor hen, was known to disloyal.

Dryden, The Cock and the Fox, 64.

2. Female of any land-fowl.

The peacock, pheasant, and goldfinch cocks have glorious colours; the hens have none.—Bacon.

Whilst the hen bird is covering her eggs, the male generally takes his stand upon a neighbouring bench within her hearing, and by that means diversifies her with his songs during the whole time of her sitting.—Addison.

Hébane. s. Native poisonous and medicinal plant so called; Hyoscyamus niger. That to which old Socrates was cured. Or hébane juice, to swell 'em till they burst.

Dryden.
Hébane [is] very often found growing upon the sides of banks and old dunnhills. This is a very poisonous plant.—Miller.

Hénbit. s. Native plant so called of the genus Galeopsis.

In a scarcity in Sicily a rumour was spread of its raining millet-seed; but it was found to be only the seeds of the ivy-leaved spenswell, or small hébit.—Derham, Physico-Theology.

Héne. adv. [A.S. hennes, from the same root as he, her, here, &c., the s being (probably) the s in hi-s, father-s, &c., i.e. the s of the genitive or possessive case. Spelt with ce in order to ensure the s being sounded, since hens would, probably, be pronounced henz.]

1. From this place to another.

Discharge my followers; let them hence away.
From Richard's night to Bolingbroke's fair day.

Shakespeare, Richard II. iii. 2.
The Almighty hath not built
Here for his envy; will not drive us hence.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 250.
A sudden prudence drew them hence
From noise, fraud, and impertinence.

2. Away; to a distance; word of command.
Be not found here; hence with your little ones.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 2.
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse.
Milton, Lycidas, 18.

3. At a distance; in other places.

Why should I then be false, since it is true
That I must die here, and live hence by truth?

Shakespeare, King John, v. 4.
All members of our cause, both here and hence,
That are instructed to this action.

4. Applied to time; the future.

Make less thy body, hence, and more thy grace.
Shakespeare, King Henry IV. Part II. v. 5.

He who can reason well to-day about one sort of matters, cannot at all reason to-day about others, though perhaps a year hence he may.—Locke.

Let not posterity a thousand years hence look
For truth in the voluminous annals of pedants.—Arbuthnot.

5. For this reason; in consequence of this; from this cause; from this ground.

Hence perhaps it is, that Solomon calls the fear of the Lord the beginning of wisdom.—Archbishop Tillotson.

By too strong a projectile motion the aliment tends to putrefaction; hence may be deduced the force of exercise in helping digestion.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

6. From this source; from this original; from this store.

My Flora was my sun; for as
One sun, so but one Flora was:
All other flowers borrow'd hence
Their light and grace, as stars do thence.

Sir J. Suckling.

7. From hence is an exceptionable expression, which crept into use even among good authors, as the original force of the word hence was gradually forgotten.

An ancient author prophesied from hence,
Behold on Latian shores a foreign prince!

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 103.

Used as a verb, meaning send hence, or off; dispatch to a distance. Rare.

Go, bawling cur! th', hungry maw go fill
On yon foul flock, belonging not to me;
With that his dog he hence'd, his flock he curd.

Sir P. Sidney.

Héneforth. adv. From this time forward.

Thence and kinamen,
Héneforth be waris. Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 7.

Tudo this, and be héneforth among the gods,
Thyself a goddess. Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 74.

If we treat gallant soldiers in this sort,
Who then héneforth to our defence will come?

Dryden.

Héneforward. adv. From this time to futurity.

Pardon, I héneforward you;
Héneforward I am over rul'd by you.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iv. 2.

The royal academy will admit héneforward only such who are endued with good qualities.—Dryden.

Then in full power our sovereign prelate awayed,
By kings, and all the rabble world obeyed;
Here humble monarch at his feet knuckled down,
And begged the alms, and charity of a crown;

There, when in solemn state he pleased to ride,
Poor scapled slaves ran héneboys by his side;
None, though in thought, his grandeur durst blame.

Nor in their very sleep a treason dream.
Oltham, Satires upon the Jesuits.

Hénchman. s. [hunch + man.] Attendant at the side of any one; follower; page.

Why should Titania cross her Oberon?
I do but beg a little chaming boy,
To be my hénechman.

Shakespeare, A Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 2.
Three hénechmen were for every knight assign'd,
All in rich livery clad, and of a kind.

Hénd. v. a. Same as Hént.

1. Seize; lay hold on.

With that the sergeants hént the young man about,

And bound him likewise in a worthless chain.

Fairfax.

2. Crowd; surround.

The generous and bravest citizens
Have hént the gates, and very near upon
The duke is entering.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iv. 6.

Héndecasyllable. s. [Gr. ἑνδεκά + σίλλαβος.]

Metrical line consisting of eleven syllables.

A living author, that must be nameless, has written the following héndecasyllables:
O dulcis puer, O venuste Marce, &c.

J. Walton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Héndiads. s. [Gr. ἑν = one + διὰ = two

ἑν = two, couple.] Rhetorical figure, when two noun substantives are used instead of a substantive and adjective; e.g. the strength of Hércules (ἡ τῆς ἰσχύος), instead of the strong Hércules, or Hércules the strong. Scarcely a naturalized word, the Greek being the language wherein the figure is commonest, and the word being rather Greek than English. Even in Greek,

ἑν διὰ τῶν = one through two, is the commoner term.

Héndriver. s. Kind of hawk; hen-harrier.

The hen-driver I forbear to name.—L. Walton, Complete Angler.

Hénharrier. s. [harrier, i.e. harasser or enemy of hens (poultry).] Nearly synonymous with Hen-driver; also with the rarer term Hen-harm.] Hawk so called of the genus Circus.

The marsh-harrier (Circus arcticus). . . is distinguished from the true harriers by the more elongated and slender form of their bodies, their lengthened, taper, and naked legs, the still greater softness of their plumage, and by the circular disk of short feathers which surround the face. . . The divided difference in colour between the males and females of the true harriers when adult is a subject

now so generally understood as to require to be noticed here only as a prominent illustration of one of the laws which appear to influence the assumption and changes of plumage in birds. . . In the present instance, the old male, from his almost uniform ash-grey colour as seen in the figure, is called provincially the dark hawk, and blue hawk, and by the more general name of the hen-harrier. The female, called a ringtail, is brown.—Varell, British Birds, Marsh and Sea Harrier.

Hénhearted. adj. Dastardly; cowardly; like a hen.

One pulling hen-hearted rogue is sometimes the ruin of a set.—Guyton, Soliloquy on the Quixote, p. 119.

Hénpecked. adj. Governed by the wife.

A stepdame too I have, a hen-pecked man.

Who rith my hen-pecked sire, and orders

Hepburn, Translation of the Eclogues, iii. 18.

The neighbours reported that he was hen-pecked, which was impossible, by such a mild-spurred woman as his wife.—Arbuthnot.

Hénreost. s. Place where the poultry roost.

Many a poor devil stands to a whipping-post for the puttering of a silver spoon, or the robbing of a hen-roost.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

Her house is frequented by a company of rogues, whom she encourages to rob his hen-roosts.—Sir J.

If a man prosecutes physics with severity, his hen-roost is sure to pay for it.—Addison.

They oft have sally'd out to pillage
The hen-roosts of some peaceful village.

Tickett, Imitation of the Prophecy of Nemo.

Hénfoot. s. Native plant so called (though with doubtful propriety); Caulalis daucoides.

Hénfoot [is] a mere translation of [the] Latin pes pedis, a name that Stapel . . . says was given it from the resemblance of its leaves to a hen's claw, an observation which he must have made on a bad picture. Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hént. v. a. [A.S. hentan.] Take; overtake; seize; fetch.

See on, for on, the fast-path way,
And meeting hent the side a.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 2, scene.

Hép. s. Same as Hép.

In hard winters there is observed great plenty of héps and héps, which preserve the small birds from starving. Baron.

Hépátic. adj. [Gr. ἥπαρ, ἥπατος = liver.] Belonging to the liver.

If the evacuated blood be florid, it is stomach blood; if red and copious, it's hépatic. Harepy, Discourse on Consumption.

The cystic gall is thick, and intensely bitter;

the hépatic gall is more fluid, and not so bitter.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

The molecular movements and changes in the organs of vivacious life constitute a more uninterrupting source of caloric. The blood which returns from the extensive set of such operations afforded by the nervous intestinal tract is warmer than before it enters that tract; the blood of the hépatic vein after its passage through the portal circulation, and its work in the liver, shows a more marked rise of temperature. Urine in mammals, before its escape, is hotter than blood; and the rich supply of nerves to the adrenals may relate to the caloric functions of the kidneys.—Allen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Hépachord. s. [Gr. ἑπτά = seven + χορδή = chord.]

Anciently, a musical instrument of seven strings; as, the lyre; and also a poetical composition played or sung on seven different notes or sounds.

This instrument seems to merit a particular description here, not only from its great antiquity, but from its form; for by having been furnished with a neck, though it had but two strings it was capable of producing from them a number of notes; for instance if these two strings were tuned fourths to each other, they would furnish that series of sounds which the ancients called a hépacchord, consisting of two conjunct tetrachords. Burney, History of Music, Egyptian Music.

Héptagon. s. [Gr. ἑπτά = seven + γωνία = angle.] Figure with seven sides or angles.

Three pentagons are too little, and three hépacchords too much.—Bay, (Rich.)

Héptagonal. adj. Having seven angles or sides.

In a circle describe a héptagonal and equilateral figure, from whose every side shall fall equilateral triangles.—Selden, Dreyton's Polyglottion, song 11.

(Rich.)

Héptamerede. s. [Gr. ἑπτά = seven + μέρος = part.] That which divides into seven parts. Rare.

The héptamerede of M. Sauveur could express an interval so small as the seventh part of what is called a comma, the smallest interval that is admitted in modern music. J. Smith, On the Imitative Arts.

Héptarchie. adj. Denoting a sevenfold government.

The Saxons practised this mode of division for fixing the several extents of their héptarchie empire.—T. Barton, History of the Parish of Kiddington, p. 63.

Héptarchist. s. He who rules one of the divisions of a sevenfold government.

In 752, the Saxon héptarchists, Guthred and Ethelwald, fought a desperate battle at Beorford, or Burford. T. Barton, History of the Parish of Kiddington, p. 48.

Héptarchy. [Gr. ἑπτά = seven.] Sevenfold government.

In the Saxon héptarchy I had the noted of arms, all the Germans, of whom they descended, used shields. Cantab.

England began not to be a people, when Alfred reduced it into a monarchy; for the nations that were extant before, namely, under the héptarchy.—Sir M. Hale, Translation of Markland.

The next returning planetary hour

Of Mars, who shur'd the héptarchy of power,
His steps bold Aëte to the temple bent.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, iii. 290.

herdman. s. One employed in tending herds: formerly an owner of herds.

The words of Amos, who was among the herdmen of Tekoa.—Amos, i. 1.

herdman. s. Same as Herdman.

A herdman rich, of much account was he, Whom no evil did reign, or good appear.—Sir P. Sidney.

And you, enchantment, Worthy enough a herdman, if e'er thou These rural latches to his entrance open, ... I will devise a death as cruel for thee As thou art tender to't.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Scarcely themselves know how to hold A sheephook, or have learn'd aught else the least That to the faithful herdman's art belongs.—Milton, Lycidas, 119.

There oft the Indian herdman, shunning heat, Shelter in cool, and tends his pasturing herds As loop-holes cut through thickest shades.—Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1109.

So stands a Thracian herdman with his spear Full in the gap, and hopes the hunted bear.—Dryden.

The herdman round The cheerful fire, provoke his health in goblets crown'd.—Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

When their herdmen could not agree, they parted by consent.—Locke.

here. adv.

1. In this place.

I, upon my frontiers here, Keep residence.—Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 939.

Here Nature first begins Her further work.—Ibid., ii. 1037.

How stretched does Prometheus' state appear, While he his second misery suffers here!—Cowley.

To-day in ours, we have it here.—Id.

2. In the present state.

Thus shall you be happy here, and more happy hereafter.—Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

3. It is used in making an offer or attempt.

Then here's for earnest.—Dryden.

4. In drinking a health.

Here's to thee, Dick.—Cowley.

However, friend, here's to the king, one cry; To him who was the king, the friend replies.—Prior.

5. It is often opposed to there; in one place, distinguished from another.

We are come to see thee fight, to see thee foigne, to see thee traverse, to see thee here, to see thee there.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

Then this, then that man's aid, they crave, implore; Post here for help, seek there their followers.—Daniel.

I would have in the heath some thickets made Of sweet-briar and honey-suckle, and some wild vine amongst; and the ground set with violets; for these are sweet, and prosper in the shade; and these to be in the heath here and there, not in order.—Bacon.

The devil might perhaps, by inward suggestions, have drawn in here and there a single proselyte.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Your city, after the dreadful fire, was rebuilt, not presently, by raising continued streets; but at first here a house, and there a house, to which others by degrees were joined.—Bishop Saurin, Sermon.

No that rides post through a country may be able to give some loose description of here a mountain and there a plain, here a morass and there a river, woodland in one part, and savanna in another.—Locke.

6. Used substantively. Place; condition.

Bid them farewell, Cordelia, though unkind; Thou loosest here, a better where to find.—Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 1.

Neither here nor there. Out of place; irrelevant.

Good night: mine eyes do itch; Doth that bode weeping?—Twelfth Night, iv. 3.

hereabout. adv. About this place.

For all this name, I'll hide me hereabout; His looks I fear, and his intent I doubt.—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, v. 3.

hereabouts. adv. About this place.

I saw hereabouts nothing remarkable except Augustus's bridge.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

hereafter. adv.

1. In time to come; in futurity.

How worthy he is, I will leave to appear hereafter, rather than story him in his own hearing.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline, i. 6.

The grandchild, with twelve sons increas'd, departs From Canaan, to a land hereafter call'd Egypt.—Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 153.

Hereafter he from war shall come, And bring his Trojans peace.—Dryden.

2. In a future state.

You shall be happy here, and more happy hereafter.—Bacon.

Used substantively.

'Tis the divinity that sits within us; 'Tis heaven itself that points out an hereafter, And intimates eternity to man.—Addison, Cato, v. 1.

His superstitious every little prospect of gain and advantage which offers itself here, if he does not find it consistent with his views of an hereafter.—Id., Spectator, no. 224.

The mind that is habituated to the lively sense of an hereafter, can hope for what is the most terrifying to the generality of mankind, and rejoice in what is the most afflicting.—Trotter, no. 134.

I still shall wait.

Some new hereafter, and a future state.—Prior.

hereat. adv. At this.

One man coming to the tribune, to receive his denative, with a garland in his hand, the tribune, offended hereat, demanded what this singularity could mean.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

hereby. adv. By this.

In what estate the fathers rested, which were dead before, it is not hereby either one way or other determined.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Hereby the Mosaics are not excluded by beauty, there being in this description no consideration of colour.—Sir T. Brown.

The acquisition of truth is of infinite concernment: hereby we become acquainted with the nature of things.—Watts.

heredipety. s. [Lat. herex, heredis - heir; peto = seek.] Legacy-hunting.

The prodigality of the officers to the church and to the clergy, those more especially by bequest, is so immoderate, that a law is necessary to restrain the profusion on one hand, and the avidity on the other, a law which the statesman Ambrose and the Monk Jerome approve, as demanded by the abuses of the times.—Priest of Idols, mimes, charlatans, harlots may receive bequests; it is interdicted, and wisely interdicted, only to ecclesiastics and monks.

The Church may already seem to have taken the place of the Emperor as universal trustee. As men before bought by this posthumous adulation the favour of Caesar, so would they now that of God.—Hereditipety, or legacy-hunting, is invoked against, in the clergy especially, as by the older Satirists.

Milton, History of Latin Christianity, b. i. ch. xi.

hereditable. adj. Capable of being possessed as inheritance.

Adam being neither a monarch, nor his imaginary monarchy hereditable, the power which is now in the world is not that which was Adam's.—Locke.

hereditament. s. Inheritance, or hereditary estate.

Hereditament, says Sir Edward Coke, includes not only lands and tenements, but whatsoever may be inherited, be it corporeal or incorporeal, real, personal, or mixed.—Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

hereditarily. adv. In a hereditary manner; after the manner of an inheritance; by inheritance.

In this kingdom such were hereditarily honoured with it.—Selden, Notes on Drayton's Polygraphon, song 11.

Tutelar respects, which those who are really and hereditarily possessed of, can wield without any such taint or suspicion of partiality.—Bishop Hall, Reunion, p. 129.

Here is another, who thinks one of the greatest glories of his father was to have distinguished and loved you, and who loves you hereditarily.—Pope, Letter to Swift.

hereditary. adj. Possessed or claimed by right of inheritance; descending by inheritance.

To thee and thine, hereditary for ever, Remain this ample third of our fair kingdom.—Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 1.

Thus while the mute creature downward bend Their sight, and to their earthly mother tend, Man looks aloft, and with erected eyes Beholds his own hereditary skies.—Dryden, Translation from Ovid.

He [Lycurgus] possessed an ample hereditary fortune; but he lived, like Phocion, with Spartan simplicity.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lvi.

heredity. s. [Lat. herex = heir, and, in a secondary sense, descendant generally.] Hereditary transmission.

Already, in the last two chapters, the law of hereditary transmission has been tentatively mentioned. Understood in its entirety, the law is, that each plant or animal produces others of like kind with itself. ...

That wheat produces wheat—that existing even have descended from ancestral even that every unfolding organism eventually takes the form of the class, order, genus, and species from which it springs; is a fact which, by force of repetition, has acquired in our minds almost the aspect of a necessity. It is in this, however, that heredity is principally displayed: the phenomenon commonly referred to it being quite subordinate manifestations. And, as thus understood, heredity is universal. ... While, however, the general truth that organisms of a given type uniformly descend from organisms of the same type, is so well established by infinite illustrations as to have assumed the character of an axiom; it is not universally admitted that non-typical peculiarities are inherited. ... Some naturalists seem to entertain a vague belief, that the law of heredity applies only to main characters of structure, and not to details; or, at any rate, that though it applies to such details as constitute differences of species, it does not apply to smaller details. The circumstance that the tendency to repetition is in a slight degree qualified by the tendency to variation (which, as we shall hereafter see, is but an indirect result of the tendency to repetition), leads some to doubt whether heredity is unlimited. A careful weighing of the evidence, however, and a due allowance for the influences by which the minor manifestations of heredity are obscured, will remove the grounds for this scepticism.—H. Spencer, Induction of Science.

heretic. s. In this.

How highly severe it may please them with words of truth to extol sermons, they shall not heretics offend us.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Since truths absolutely necessary to salvation are so clearly revealed that we cannot err in them, unless we be notoriously wanting to ourselves, heretic the fault of the judgement is resolved into a silent default in the will.—South, Sermons.

heretic. s. In this.

Because the point about which we strive is the quality of our laws, our first entrance heretic cannot better be made than with consideration of the nature of law in general.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

heretic. s. From this; of this.

Heretic comes it that Prince Harry is valiant.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 3.

heretic. s. Upon this.

If we should strictly insist heretic, the possibility might fall into question.—Sir T. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

heretic. s. Out of this place.

A bird all white, well feather'd on each wing, He cut up to the throne of God did fly.—Spenser.

hermit. s. Hermit; hermit.

Hermit, and other votaries, professing only devotion.—Bishop Hall, Select Thoughts, § 82.

heremical. adj. Relating to, connected with, having the character of, suited for, a hermit.

You describe so well your heremical state of life, that none of the ancient hermits could go beyond you for a cave in a rock.—Pope.

heresiarch. s. Head or founder of a heresy.

The Pope declared him not only an heretic, but a heresiarch.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

The reform of the Church, in its head and in all its members, was among the avowed objects, it was the special function, of the Council of Constance: the maintenance of the unity of the Church a most noble heresy; the suppression of heresies, which had led to the suppression of sects, had become a duty of the nations. In Constance would be seen of the monarchs of Christendom perhaps one only, but he the greatest, the Emperor. ... There might be three Pontiffs, each of whom had worn each best of himself the rich and varied of the Papal tiara. There was certainly the whole College of Cardinals, the most famous and learned churchmen from every kingdom of the West; even those dreaded cardinals, the heirs and successors of the Bishop of Rome, who had nearly covered the kingdom of Bohemia from Latin Christianity.—M. von, History of Latin Christianity, bk. xiii. ch. xvi.

heresiarchy. s. [Gr. heresy - rule, government.] Principal heresy.

The book itself [the Alogian] consists of heresiarchies against our blessed Saviour.—Sir T. Brown, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 323.

heresy. s. [Gr. hairesis - choice, originally in a good, or indifferent, sense.] Opinion of private men different from that of the catholic and orthodox church.

Heresy prevails only by a counterfeit shew of reason, whereby notwithstanding it becomes invincible, unless it be convicted of fraud by manifest remembrance clearly true, and unable to be withstood.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

As for speculative heresies, they work mightily upon men's wits; yet do not produce great alterations in states.—Bacon.

Upon this occasion, I cannot but take notice that of all the heresies in politics profusely scattered by the partisans of the late administration, none ever displaced me more, or seemed to have more dangerous consequences to monarchy, than that pernicious talent, so much affected, of discovering a contempt for birth, family, and ancient nobility.—Swift, Examiner, no. 41. (Ord. MS.)

Heretic. s.

1. One who propagates his private opinion in opposition to the catholic church.

These things would be prevented, if no known heretic or schismatick be suffered to go into those countries.—Bacon.

No heretics desire to spread

Their wild opinions like these Epicureans.
—Sir J. Davies.
When a Papist uses the word heretics, he generally means Protestants; when a Protestant uses the word, he means any person wilfully and conscientiously obstinate in fundamental error.—Watts, Logic.

2. It is or has been used ludicrously for any one whose opinion is erroneous.

I rather will suspect the sun with cold
Than thee with wantonness; thy honour stands,
In him that was of late an heretic,
As firm as faith.

—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 3.

Heretical. adj.

Containing heresy.
How exclude they us from being any part of the church of Christ under the colour of heresy, when they cannot but grant it possible, even for him to be, as touching his own personal persuasion, heretical, who in their opinion not only is of the church, but holds the chiefest place of authority over the same? —Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity.
Constantinople was in an uproar, upon an ignorant jealousy that those words had some heretical meaning.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Piety.

Heretofore. adv.

Formerly; anciently.
I have long desired to know you heretofore, with honouring your virtue, though I love not your person.—Sir P. Sidney.
So near is the connection between the civil state and religion, that heretofore you will find the government and the priesthood united in the same person.—South, Sermons.

We now can form no more
Long schemes of life, as heretofore. —Swift.

Herewith. adv.

This.
They which rightly consider after what sort the heart of man herewith is framed, must of necessity acknowledge, that whose assesteth to the words of eternal life, doth it in regard of his authority whose words they are.—Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity.
Acceptable herewith might not be amiss to make children often to tell a story of any thing they know.—Loggia.

Herewithal. adv.

Upon this.
The melancholy silence that follows herewithal, . . . raises in the spectators a grief that is inexpressible.—Tillot, no. 133.

Herewithal. adv.

With this.
You, fair sir, be not herewith dismayed,
But constant keep the way in which ye stand.
—Spenser.
Herewith the castle of Flame was suddenly surprised by the Scots.—Sir J. Hayward.

Herewithal. adj.

Herewithal.
When the salubrity of the earth and the air was impaired, and herewithal the excellency of the vegetable diet, men indulged themselves in all the kinds of excess.—Grew, Cosmologia Sacra, p. 186. (Ord. MS.)

Therely professing that herewithal he owed, and offered up himself body and soul, unto God.—Ibid., b. iv. (Ord. MS.)

Heriot. s. [A.S. hergenta = warlike implement, hubbilitment, or chattel; from here = army, and geatwe = apparatus.] Fine paid to the lord at the death of a landholder, sometimes the best thing in the landholder's possession; usually, a beast.

This he detains from the ivy; for he should be the true possessory lord thereof, but the olive dispenseth with his conscience to pass it over with a complicit and an heriot every year.—Hobbes, Voculi Porroci.

Though thou consume but to renew
Yet love, as lord, doth claim a heriot due.

I took him up as your heriot, with intention to have made the best of him, and then have brought the whole produce of him in a purse to you.—Dryden, Don Sebastian.

Heriotable. adj. Subject, or liable, to the demand of an heriot.

The tenants are chiefly customary and heriotable. —Barn, History of Cumberland and Westmoreland, i. 174.

Heritable. adj. Capable to inherit whatever may be inherited.

By the canon law this son shall be legitimate and heritable, according to the laws of England.—Sir M. Hale, Common Law.

Heritage. s.

1. Inheritance; estate devolved by succession; estate in general.

Let us our father's heritage divide.

—Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.
To cause to inherit the desolate heritages. —Isaiah, xlix. 8.

He considers that his proper home and heritage is in another world, and therefore regards the events of this with the indifference of a guest that tarries but a day.—Rogers.

2. People of God.

O Lord, save thy people, and bless thine heritage. —Book of Common Prayer, Te Deum.

Hermaprodité. s. Being in the state of an hermaprodité.

Some do believe hermaprodité.

That both do act and suffer. —R. Johnson, Alchemist.

Hermaprodité. s. [Gr. and Lat. hermaproditus, from Hermes = Mercury (a god) and Aphrodite = Venus (a goddess), being supposed to be of two sexes.] Animal apparently uniting two sexes; in reality, one in which the sexual character is equivocal; simulating in a male, female, in a female, male organs.

Man and wife make but one right
Canonical hermaprodité. —Cleveland.
Monstrously could not incarnate from marriage,
Witness hermaprodité. —Arbuthnot and Pope.

Hermaproditic. adj. Partaking of both sexes.

Look on me, and with all thine eyes,
Male, female, yea hermaproditic eyes.

—B. Johnson, Staple of News.

Hermaproditical. adj. Partaking of both sexes.

[These ladies] cry down, or up, what they like or dislike in a brain of fashion, with most masculine, or rather hermaproditical, authority.—B. Johnson, Epistle.

There may be equivocal seeds and hermaproditical principles, that contain the radicality of different forms.—Sir T. Browne.

There is another kind of occasional dress in use among the ladies; I mean the riding habit, which some have not injudiciously styled the hermaproditical, by reason of its masculine and feminine composition.—Guardian, no. 119.

Hermaproditically. adv. After the manner of both sexes.

Unite not the views of both sexes in one; be not monstrous in iniquity, nor hermaproditically vicious.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, l. 31.

Hermeneutical. adj. Relating to, constituted by, Hermeneutics.

The following is a list of Hermeneutical Treatises from the Revelation to the present time.—Davidson, Sacred Hermeneutics, ch. xv.

Hermeneutics. s. pl. [Gr. ἑρμηνεύω = interpret.] System, or principles, of interpretation.

The meaning of all language, written or spoken, is developed by the application of general laws, usually termed Hermeneutics. These principles, in their relation to scripture, are styled Sacred Hermeneutics; and their application to particular instances has received the name Exegesis.—Davidson, Sacred Hermeneutics, ch. i.

Hermetic. adj. [from Hermes (Triemegistus) the name of a reputed Egyptian philosopher, to whom was attributed a profound knowledge of the mysteries of nature, especially those of a chemical kind.] Having the character of chemistry, alchemy, or magic.

Their seals, their characters, hermetic rings,
Their gem of riches, and bright stone that brings Invisibility. —B. Johnson, Underwoods.

Hermetical. adj. Same as Hermetic.

An hermetical seal, or to seal any thing hermetically, is to heat the neck of a glass till it is just ready to melt, and then with a pair of hot pincers to twist it close together.—Quincy.
The tube was closed at one end with dischylon, instead of an hermetical seal.—Rogge.

Hermetically. adv. According to the hermetical art: (its special application being to the corking, sealing, or closing of vessels, so as to make them air-tight).

He suffered those things to putrefy in hermetically sealed glasses, and vessels close covered with paper; and not only so, but in vessels covered with fine lawn, so as to admit the air and keep out the insects: no living thing was ever produced there.—Bentley.

Hermit. s. [Gr. ἱσιτικός.]

1. Solitary; anchorite; one who retires from society to contemplation and devotion.

You lay this command upon me, to give you my poor advice for your carriage in so eminent a place: I humbly return you mine opinion, such as an hermit rather than a courtier can render.—Bacon, Advice to Villiers.

He had been duke of Savoy, and after a very glorious reign, took on him the habit of a hermit, and retired into this solitary spot.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

2. Headsman; one bound to pray for another.

For those of old,
And the late dignities heap'd up to them,
We rest your hermits. —Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 3.

Used adjectively.

As in the embryo of the hermit-crab, the two sides are alike; and as the embryo may be taken to represent the type from which the hermit-crab has been derived: we have in this case evidence that a symmetrically-bilateral form has been moulded into an unsymmetrically-bilateral form, by the action of unsymmetrically-bilateral conditions.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xiv. § 250.

Hermitage. s. Cell or habitation of a hermit.

By that painful way they pass
Forth to an hill, that was both steep and high;
On top whereof a sacred chapel was,
And oke a little hermitage thereby.

—Spenser, Faerie Queene.
Go with speed

To some forlorn and naked hermitage,
Remote from all the pleasures of the world.

—Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and rightly spell
Of every star that heaven doth shew,
And every herb that sips the dew.

—Milton, Il Penseroso, 167.
About two leagues from Friburg, we went to see a hermitage: it lies in the prettiest solitude imaginable, among woods and rocks.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Hermitage. s. [from a vineyard so called.] French wine (a Burgundy) so called.

By the infusion of three drops out of one of his phials, he converted it into a most beautiful pale Burgundy. Two more of the same kind heightened it into a perfect Lauguedue; from thence it passed into a florid hermitage.—Addison, Tuller, no. 131.

Hermitary. s. Religious cell annexed to some abbey; hermitage. Rare.

Chapels, monasteries, hermitaries, nunneries, and other religious houses.—Hobbes, Letters, ii. 77.

Hermitess. s. Female hermit; woman retired to devotion. Rare.

The violet is truly the hermitess of flowers, affecting woods and forests.—Parthenius Sacra, p. 38: 1633.

Hermitical. adj. Suitable to a hermit.

You would have me resolve the hermitical and austere character into a timid, gloomy, and phlegmatic one.—Coventry, Philomena, conv. 1.

Hermodactyl. s. [Gr. ἑρμῆς = Mercury, the deity so called + ἀκτύλ = finger.] See extract.

Hermodactyl is a root of a determinate and regular figure, and represents the common figure of a heart cut in two, from half an inch to an inch in length. This drug was first brought into medicinal use by the Arabians, and comes from Egypt and Myria, where the people use them while fresh, as a vomit or purge; and have a way of roasting them for food, which they eat in order to make themselves fat. The dried roots are a gentle purge, now little used.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

Hern. s. See Heron.

Hernia. s. [Lat. hernia; Gr. ἑρμία.] Rupture. A hernia would certainly succeed.—Wierman, Surgery.

Héro. s. [Lat. heros; Gr. ἥρως.] Man eminent for bravery.

I sing of heroes and of kings.
In mighty numbers mighty things.
These are thy honours, not that here thy bust
Is mix'd with heros, or with kings thy dust.
—Pope.

héroïne. s. Female hero. Rare; Heroine being the usual word.
In which were held, by sad decease,
Heroes and heroesses. Chapman.

héroïque. adj.

1. Productive of heroes.

From John of Gaunt doth bring his pedigree,
Being but the fourth of that héroïque line.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. ll. 3.

2. Noble; suitable to an hero; brave; magnanimous; intrepid; enterprising; illustrious.

Not that which justly gives héroïque name
To person or to poem.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 40.

Venus makes héroïque virtue live,
But you can live to virtues give. Waller.
He was buried, Diomedes says, with héroïque honours; but it does not appear that in this respect he was distinguished from the other citizens who had fallen in the war, and were afterwards interred with the usual pomp in the same ground which contained the sepulchres of the ancient heroes.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. iv.

If there was any thing to disturb the complacency with which Phœon contemplated this calm and orderly state of affairs, it was perhaps the petulance of Demades, who, like a satyr by the side of a héroïque person, would be committing some extravagance, or making some raucous speech, which tended to destroy the illusion of his graver friend's administration.—Ibid. ch. lvii.

3. Reciting the acts of heroes.

Methinks héroïque poetry, till now,
Like some fantastic fairy land did show. Gayley.
I have chosen the most héroïque subject which any poet could desire: I have taken upon me to describe the motives, the beginning, progress and success of a most just and necessary war.—Dryden.
An héroïque poem is the greatest work which the soul of man is capable to perform: the design of it is to form the mind to héroïque virtue by example.—Id.

4. Applied to certain metres, i.e. those most used in heroic poetry.

The measure is English héroïque verse without rhyme, as that of Homer in Greek, and of Virgil in Latin. Milton, Introduction to Paradise Lost.

héroïque. s. Heroic verse, which consists, in our poetry, of ten feet.

The Latin hexameter has more feet than the English héroïque.—Dryden.

héroïque. adj. Befitting an hero; noble; illustrious; heroic.

Musichorus was famous over all Asia for his héroïque enterprises.—Sir P. Sidney.
Though you have courage in an héroïque degree, I ascribe it to you as your second attribute.—Dryden.

héroïcally. adv. In an heroic manner; after the way of an hero; suitably to an hero.

Not héroïcally in killing his tyrannical cousin.—Sir P. Sidney.
Free from all meaning, whether good or bad;
And, in no word, héroïcally mad.
Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel, ll. 410.

The Jacobites... not very consistently represented him at once as a poor uneducated artisan who was ignorant of the nature and tendency of the act for which he suffered, and as a martyr who had héroïcally laid down his life for the banished King and the persecuted Church.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. 25.

héroïcally. adv. Suitably to a hero: (Heroically commoner).

Samson hath quit himself
Like Samson, and héroïcally hath finish'd
A life heroic. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1703.

héroïceness. s. Attribute suggested by Heroic: (Heroism commoner).

I cannot but value the other much before it, if we regard the nobleness and héroïceness of the nature and mind from whence they both proceed.—Nir Koneim Digby, Observations upon Religious Meditation. (3rd Ed.)

héroïcisme. adj. Consisting of a mixture of dignity and levity: (specially applied to compositions which are related to the epic (or heroic poem), in respect to their form and style, whilst in respect to their subject matter they are light, low, or ludicrous).

The Rape of the Lock, now before us, is the fourth, and most excellent of the héroïcisme poems.—J. Warton, Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope.

héroïcisme. adj. Same as Heroicomic.

He offended Pope, by adopting the machinery of his symples, in an héroïcisme poem. J. Warton, Essay on the Genius and Writings of Pope.

héroïne. s. Female hero.

But inborn worth, that fortune can controul,
New-strung, and stiffer bent her softer soul;
The héroïne assum'd the woman's place,
Confirm'd her mind, and fortify'd her face.

Then shall the British slugs
More noble characters expose to view,
And draw her finish'd héroïne from you. Adeline.

héroïsme. s. Qualities or character of an hero.

If the Odyssey be less noble than the Iliad, it is more instructive: the Iliad abounds with more héroïsme, this with more morality.—Broom, Notes to the Odyssey.

héron. s. [A.S. hrugra.] Native bird so called of the genus Arden, especially Arden cinerea.

So lords, with sport of stag and héron fall,
Sometimes we see small birds from nests do pull.
Sir P. Sidney.

The héron, when she soareth high, sheweth winds.
—Dante.

Commonly pronounced, and often spelt, hern.

The tow'ring hawk let future poets sing,
Who terror bears upon his soaring wing:
Let them on high the frighted hern survey,
And lofty numbers paint their airy fray. Gay.

hérony. s. [generally pronounced henry.] Place where herons breed.

They carry their laid to a large hérony above three miles.—Berthou, Physico-Theology.

héronbill. s. [generally pronounced hernsbill.] Native plant so called of the genus Erodium.

héronshaw. s. [N.Fr. heronseau: generally, when its import is understood, pronounced as spelt, i.e. not after the manner of Heron (sounded Hern); but, as may be seen in he extracts, often subject to the same alteration as its congeners. Of this we have an exaggerated catchword in the expression 'not know a huck from a handsaw,' wherein neither the hands nor saws are involved, the meanings being huck and heron, as stated by Warburton in extract.] Heron.

As when a cast of faulcons meets his flight
At an héronshaw, that lies aloft on wing.
The whyles they strike at him with headless might
The warie fowle his bill doth backward wring. Spenser, Faerie Queene, xl. 7, 8.

Like a tame héron.—B. Jonson, Mirth of Newes.
'I know a hawk from a héronshaw.' (Shakespeare's Hamlet.) This was a common proverbial speech. The Oxford editor alters it to: 'I know a hawk from a héronshaw;' as if the other had been a corruption of the players; whereas the poet found the proverb thus corrupted in the mouth of the people; so that the critic's attention only serves to show us the original of the expression. Warburton.

hérologist. s. Biographer of heroes.

Hale also mentions his comedy (Edward the 6th) called the Whore of Babylon, which Heald the hérologist, who perhaps had never seen it, and knew not whether it was a play or a ballad, in verse or prose, pronounced to be a most elegant performance.—J. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 105. (3rd Ed.)

héroshep. s. Character of a hero.

[He.] his three years of héroshep expired,
Returns indignant to the slighted plow. Copey, Task, b. iv.

héroses. s. [Latin and Greek.] Skin disease so called.

Herpes [is] a cutaneous inflammation of two kinds: miliaris, or pustular, which is like millet-seed upon the skin; and exsiccative and penetrating, to form little ulcers. —Quincy.

A farther progress towards acrimony maketh a herpes; and, if the access of acrimony be very great, it maketh an herpes exulans. —Wissman, 8.

Herpetic eruptions consist in an eruption of vesicles, in distinct irregular clusters, upon inflamed bases which extend some hat beyond the margin of each cluster; attended by tingling, converting into lamellar scales, and not contagious. It is an inflammatory affection, chiefly of the specular rete of the skin, causing the effusion of a thin fluid, which elevates the cuticle into groups of small vesicles. This affection occurs generally in circumscribed patches, the skin retaining its natural aspect in the intervals; passes through a regular course of increase, maturation, and decline; and terminates usually in from ten to fifteen days, but is sometimes prolonged to twenty-one days. It is frequently preceded by constitutional disorder, and is sometimes critical of other diseases. The vesicles are filled at first with a colourless and clear fluid, which gradually becomes milky and opaque, and ultimately concretes into thin scales; but occasionally a discharge of it takes place, and ulcerations follow. Tingling or pricking pains sometimes attend the eruption. In some cases, as the crusts fall off in one part, fresh vesicles arise in the vicinity, and the eruption thus creeps over a large portion of the surface and its duration is thereby prolonged. There are several species of this disease. ... This species of herpes is generally preceded by disorder of the digestive organs, and by slight febrile disturbance. It usually assumes an acute form, terminating within three weeks, but it sometimes becomes chronic.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

hérring. s. [A.S. herene.] Sea-fish so called of the genus Clupea.

The coast is plentifully stored with round fish, pilchard, hérring, mackerel, and cod.—Currie, Survey of Liverpool.
Buy my hérring fresh. Swift.

hérs. [from Her, itself an oblique case.] See He, I, Mine, and She.

hérsself. pron.

1. Female individual, as distinguished from others.

The jealous hérsself widow and hérsself,
Since that our brother shudd'ed them gentlewomen,
Are nightly gossip in this monarchy. Shakespeare, Richard III. l. 1.

2. Being in her own power; mistress of her own thoughts.

The more she looks, the more her fears increase
At nearer sight, and she's hérsself the less. Dryden.

3. Oblique case of the reciprocal pronoun.

The daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash hérsself.—Exodus, ll. 5.
Her wise ladies answered her, yea, she returned answer to hérsself.—Julius, v. 23.

héry. o. a. [A.S. herian.] Hallow; regard as holy.

Thence, now is the time of merry-making,
Nor thin to héry, nor with Love to play;
Sike mirth in May is meetest for to make;
Or summer shade, under the cocked bay. Spenser, Shepherds Calendar.

But were thy years green, as now be mine,
Then wouldst thou learn to card of love,
And héry with hymns thy lass's. Id.

hérsitancy. s. Dubiousness; uncertainty; suspense.

The reason of my hérsitancy about the air is, that I forgot to try whether that liquor, which shot into crystals, exposed to the air, would not have done this like in a vessel accurately stopp'd. —Boyle.

Some of them reasoned without doubt or hérsitancy, and lived and died in such a manner as to show that they believed their own reasonings.—Rankin, Altiplano.

hérsitant. adj. Pausing; wanting volubility of speech.

He was a man of no quick utterance, but often hérsitant; but spoke with great reason. —Baecher, Life and Times, pt. iii. p. 47.

hérsitate. v. n. [Lat. hesitatus, pass. part. of hesito.] Be doubtful; delay; pause; make difficulty.

A spirit of revenge makes him curse the Gae in the seventh book, when they hérsitate to see Hector's challenge. —Pope.

hérsitate. v. n. Indicate by hesitation; express in a hesitating manner.

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hérsitate dislike;
Alike reserv'd to blame or to commend,
A tim'rous foe, and a suspicious friend. Pope, Epistle to Artel.

hérsitation. s.

1. Doubt; uncertainty; difficulty made.

I cannot foresee the difficulties and hérsitation every one; they will be more or fewer, according to the capacity of each person. —Woodward.

2. Intermission of speech; want of volubility

Many clergymen write in so diminutive a manner, with such frequent blots and interlineations, that they are hardly able to go on without perpetual hérsitations.—Swift.

hést. s. Behest, of which it is the older and simpler form.

The sacred things and holy héstas fortaught.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Thou wast a spirit too delicate
To act her earthly and abhor'd commands,
Refusing her grand héstas. Shakespeare, Tempest, l. 2.

héstern. adj. [Lat. hesternus.] Belonging to yesterday.

So if a chronicle should misreport exploits that were enterprised but hetero-day.—Holinshead, History of Ireland, ii. 5. col. 2. (Nares, by H. & W.)

Heterarchy. s. [Gr. ἑτερο- = another + ἀρχή = command.] Government of an alien.

It is a joy to think we have a king of our own: our own blood, our own religion: . . . otherwise, next to slavery, is heterarchy; neither do we find much difference betwixt having no head at all, and having another man's head on our shoulders.—Bishop Hall, Sermons, Christ and Caesar.

Heterocæral. adj. See Homocæral.

Heteroclitite. s. [Gr. ἑτερο- = another, different, deviating, abnormal, irregular; κλίσις = bending, inflection; κλίσις = bending, inflectional.]

1. See extract.

Such nouns as vary from the common forms of declension, by any redundancy, defect, or otherwise, are called heteroclitite.—Clarke.

2. Any thing or person deviating from the common rule.

Heteroclitite, which no new hospital can hold, no physick help.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, To the reader.

There are strange heteroclitite in religion nowadays.—Hurd, Letters, iv. 35.

Here only riddles he,
And heteroclitite in physiognomy.
—Cleland, Poems, p. 32.

Heteroclitite. adj.

1. Denoting nouns varying from the common forms of declension.

The heteroclitite nouns of the Latin should not be touched in the first learning of the rudiments of the tongue.—Watts.

2. Deviating from common rules; singular.

Upon a general view of his poetry, we shall find him, as in his other performances, an uncommon, surprising, heteroclitite genius.—Karl of Overy, Remarks on the Life and Writings of Dr. Swift, p. 120. It is impossible for a man of sense to guard himself the mortification that may be given him by fools, or heteroclitite characters, because he cannot foresee them.—Shenstone.

Heteroclitical. adj. Deviating from the common rule.

In the mention of sins heteroclitical, and such as want either name or precedent, there is oft times a sin, even in their histories.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors, iv.

Heteroclitous. adj. Varying from grammatical declension.

Parrot-like, repeating heteroclitous nouns and verbs.—Sir W. Petty, Advice to a Merchant, p. 23: 1694.

Heterodox. adj. [Gr. ἑτερο- = opinion.] Deviating from the established opinion: (as opposed to orthodox).

Partiality may be observed in some to vulgar, in others to heterodox tenets.—Locke.

Heterodox. s. Peculiar opinion. Rare.

Not only a simple heterodox, but a very hard paradox it will seem, and of great absurdity, if we say its attraction is unjustly appropriated unto the loadstone.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Heterodoxal. adj. Heterodox. Rare.

This new piece of philosophy comes to usher in the new year, dropped from the brain of the subtlest spirits of France, and the great personage, the duke of Espenon, though heterodoxal and cross-grained to the old philosophers.—Hurd, b. iv. 15. (Ord MS.)

Heterodoxy. s. Quality of being heterodox. Polydianism and Socinianism, with several other heterodoxies concur to, and dependant upon them.—South, Dedication of his Sermon to the University of Oxford.

Heterodoxies, false doctrines, yea and heresies may be propagated by prayer as well as preaching.—Bishop Hall, Works, ii. 662.

(See also under Doxy.)

Heterogene. adj. [Gr. ἕτερο- = kind.] Differing in kind; dissimilar. Rare.

An old French hood.

And other pieces, heterogene enough.
—H. Johnson, New Inn.

All the guests are no meer heterogene,
And strangers, no man knows another.
—Id., Magnetical Lady.

Heterogeneous. adj. Differing. Rare.

Let the body adjacent and ambient be not commaterial, but merely heterogeneous towards the body that is to be preserved: such are quicksilver and white amber to horn and flies.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Whatever next presents itself, his heavy earnest sits upon, and goes along with, however hetero- genial to his matter in hand.—Donne, Character of a Duncie.

The light, whose rays are all alike refrangible, I call simple, homogeneous, and similar; and that whose rays are some more refrangible than others, I call compound, heterogeneous, and dissimilar.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Heterogeneity. s. Opposition of nature; contrariety of dissimilitude of qualities.

Guineum, burnt with an open fire in a chimney, is sequestered into ashes and soot; whereas the same wood, distilled in a retort, does yield forth other heterogeneity, and is resolved into oil, spirit, vinegar, water, and charcoal.—Boyle.

Finally, when we remember how rapidly analogous modifications of function and structure arise in the superficial tissues of individual plants, the general inference can scarcely be resisted. When we meet with so striking a case as that of the Begonia, a fragment of which stuck in the ground produces roots from its under surface and leaves from its upper surface . . . the presumption becomes extremely strong that the heterogeneity of surface which we have considered, result, as alleged, directly or indirectly, from heterogeneity in the incident forces.—Robert Brown.

Heterogeneous. adj. Opposite or dissimilar in nature; which cannot be arranged one under another.

That which may be added to, or subtracted from, a right-lined angle, is homogeneous to it; because heterogeneous quantities are not capable of addition or subtraction.—Wallis, Correction of Hobbes, § 1.

I have observed such heterogeneous bodies, which I found included in the mass of this sandstone.—Woodward.

Heterogeneously. adv. In a heterogeneous manner.

I never yet heard of any one, whose eyes were so heterogeneously organized, or so strangely mixed, that they would not bear the effort of darkness.—Knight, On Taste. (Ord MS.)

Heterogeneousness. s. Attribute suggested by Heterogeneity.

Dissimilitude of style, and heterogeneousness of sentiment, may sufficiently show that a work does not really belong to a reputed author.—Johnson, Edition of Shakespeare, Observations on Henry VI. Part III. (Ord MS.)

Heteropathic. adj. [Gr. ἑτερο- = suffering.] Regulating by a different action, force, or law.

Again, laws which were themselves generated the second mode, may generate others in the first. Though there be laws which, like those of chemistry and physiology, owe their existence to a branch of the principle of composition of causes, it does not follow that these peculiar, or, as they might be termed, heteropathic laws, are not capable of composition with any another. The causes which by one combination have had their laws altered, may carry their new laws with them unaltered into their ulterior combinations. And hence there is no reason to despair of ultimately raising chemistry and physiology to the condition of deductive sciences; for though it is impossible to deduce all chemical and physiological truths from the laws or properties of simple substances or elementary agents, they may possibly be deducible from laws which commence when these elementary agents are brought together into some moderate number of not very complex combinations.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, b. iii. ch. vi. § 2.

Heteroptics. s. [see Optics.] Peculiar or wrong-view.

This irregularity in vision, together with such enormities as tipping the wink, the circumspicuous roll, the side-jump through the beard or fan, must be put in the class of heteroptics, as all wrong notions of religion are ranked under the general name of heterodox.—Spectator, no. 220. (Ord MS.)

Heterosclan. adj. [Gr. σκιά = shade.] Having the shadow only one way.

The noon-shadows are heterosclan.
—Gregory, Pastime, p. 300: 1650.

Hétman. s. [Turkish; whence introduced into the Russian, as 'the hetman of the Kosnks.'] Captain; head man.

Among the rest, Mazepa made
His pillow in an old oak's shade—
Himself as rough, and scarce less old,
The Ukraine's hetman, calm and bold.
—Byron, Mazeppa.

Héviour. s. [?] See extract.

This word does not occur in the dictionaries; but it means a male fallow-deer gelded, which is so called upon the same footing as a stone-horse in French is called cheval-entier. . . . Many, through ignorance of the etymon, [half?] will call it heviour, which is very absurd, and puts me in mind of a worthy gentleman, who told me he once wanted to send half of one of these cut bucks as a present, but when he came to write about it, could not spell the proper term, and could get no information about it; and as he did not care to give it wrong, he at last omitted sending it.—Pope, Anonymiana, or Ten Centuries of Observations, iv. 42.

Hew. v. a. past part. hewn or hewed. [A.S. heawan.]

1. Cut by blows with an edged instrument; huck.

Upon the joint the lucky steel did light,
And made such way that hew'd it quite in twain.
—Spenser.

One Vane was so grievously hewn, that many thousands have died of less than half his hurts, whereof he was cured.—Sir J. Haysward.

2. Chop; cut.

He from deep wells with engines water drew,
And w'd his noble hands the wood to hew.
—Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, l. 587.

3. Cut, as with an axe: (with the particles down, when it signifies to fell: up, to excavate from below; off, to separate).

He that depends
Upon your favours, swims with loss of head,
And hews down oaks with rushes.
—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, i. 1.

Yet shall the axe of justice hew him down,
And level with the root his lofty crown.
We'll force the gate where Marcus keeps his guard,
And hew down all that would oppose our passage.
—Addison, Cato.

4. Form or shape with an axe: (with out).

Thou hast hewed thee out a sepulchre here, as he that hewed him out a sepulchre on high.—Isaiah, xlii. 16.

This river rises in the very heart of the Alps, and has a long valley that seems hewn out on purpose to give its waters a passage amidst so many rocks.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

5. Form laboriously.

The gate was adamant; eternal frame;
Which, hew'd by Mars himself, from Indian quarries came,
The labour of a god.
—Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, ii. 551.

I now pass my days, not studious nor idle, rather polishing old works than hewing out new.—Pope, Letter to Swift.

Hew. s. Destruction by cutting down.

Then to the rest his wrathful hand he bends;
Of whom he makes such havoc and such hew,
That swarms of damned souls to hell he sends.
—Spenser, Faerie Queen, vi. 8. w.

Héwer. s. One who hews; one whose employment is to cut wood or stone.

From the hewer of thy wood unto the drawer of thy water.—Deuteronomy, xxi. 11.

And Solomon had fourscore thousand héwers in the mountains. 1 Kings, v. 16.

That in héwers of stone; for timber was hewed by Hiram's servants in Lebanon.—Bishop Patrick.

Hexagon. s. [Gr. ἑξ = six, γωνία = angle.] Figure of six sides or angles.

The space about any point may be filled up with . . . three hexagons.—Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation. (Rich.)

Hexagonal. adj. Having six sides or corners.

The regular figures of cubes, as the hexagonal of crystal.—Glanville. (Rich.)

Many of them shoot into regular figures; as crystal and bastard diamonds into hexagonal.—Ray.

Hexagony. s. Figure of six angles. Rare.

When I read in St. Ambrose of hexagony, or sex-angular collars of bees, did I therefore conclude that they were multilateral?—Archbishop Bramhall, Against Hobbes.

Hexámeter. s. [Gr. ἡξήμετρον = metre.] Verse of six feet.

The Latin hexameter has more feet than the English heroick.—Dryden.

Mr. Chiswick was inflexible. He thought the years which had already been wasted on hexameters and pentameters quite sufficient.—Manning, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Hexámeter. adj. Having six metrical feet.

Like Ovid's Fædi, in hexameter and pentameter verse.—J. Warton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Hexámétric. adj. Consisting of hexameters.

That Ovid among the Latin poets was Milton's favourite, appears not only from his elegiac but his hexamétric poetry.—T. Warton, Preface to Milton's Smaller Poems.

Hexamétrical. adj. Hexametric.

I have already cited his version of Næmness's hexamétric poem.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 485.

Hexagonal. adj. Having six corners.
Hexagonal prism or shoots of crystal.—Woodward.

Hexaped. s. [Gr. ἑξά, ἑξήκοντα = foot.] Animal with six feet: (in the extract treated as a Greek word). See Insect.
I take those to have been the hexapodes, from which the greater sort of beetles come: for that sort of hexapodes are eaten in America.—Ray.

Hexastich. s. [Gr. ἑξά, ἑξήκοντα = row, rank.] Poem of six lines.

His request to Diana is an hexastich.—Selden, On Drayton's Polyolbion, song 1.
That famous hexastich which Nannazarius made.—Howell, Letters, l. 1. 30.
The following hexastich on a similar subject, is of the same rude period.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, l. 30.

Hey. interj. Expression of joy, or mutual exhortation.
Shadwell from the town retires,
To bless the world with peaceful lyric:
Then hey for praise and pansy-rick. Prior.

Heyday. interj. Expression of frolic and exultation, and sometimes of wonder.
'Twas a strange riddle of a lady,
Not love, if any lov'd her, heyday! Bulwer, Hudibras.

Heyday. s. Frolic; wildness.
At your age
The heyday in the blood is tame, it's humble,
And waits upon the judgement. Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 4.

Heydeguy. s. [?] Dance so called.
Friendly Fairies, met with many Graces,
And light-foot Nymphs, can chase the lim'ring night
With heydeguyes and truly trodden traces.
Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, June.
Our banquet done, we had our music by,
And then, you know, the youth must needs guidance,
First, galliards; then, heydeguyes; and heydeguyes.
Beaumont, Works of a Young Wit, 1577.

The nimble Cambrion rills
Dance heydeguyes amongst the hills.
Drayton, Polyolbion, song 5, arc.
There is much probability that hey as a dance was only an abbreviation of this [heydeguy], though a very early one.—Nares, Wright and Italian II.

Hiaton. s. Act of gaping.
Men observing the continual hiaton, or holding open of the camelion's mouth, conceive the intention thereof to receive the aliment of air; but this is also occasioned by the greatness of the lungs.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Hiatus. s. [Lat. hiatus = gaping, from hio = gape.]

1. Aperture; gaping breach.
Those hiatuses are at the bottom of the sea, whereby the abyss below opens into and communicates with it.—Woodward.

2. Opening of the month by the succession of an initial to a final vowel.

The hiatus should be avoided with more care in poetry than in oratory; and I would try to prevent it, unless where the cutting off is more prejudicial to the sound than the hiatus itself.—Pope.

Hibernal. adj. [Lat. hibernus = wintry.]

Belonging to the winter.

This star should rather manifest its warming power in the winter, when it remains conjoined with the sun in its hibernal conversion.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Hibernato. v. n. Pass the winter in a state of torpidity.

Hibernation. s.

1. Condition of an animal that hibernates.

There is a certain growth of warm-blooded animals [wherein] the temperature of their bodies . . . may be brought down nearly to freezing point . . . and yet the vital properties be retained. . . This state is called hibernation. In the marul, and animals which, like it, hibernate completely, the temperature of the body and the general vital activity are proportionally depressed. . . the condition of a hibernating mammal closely resembles that of a cold-blooded animal.—Carpenter, Principles of Physiology, § 84.

2. Going into winter quarters.

The next day . . . the visier [Marched] to Nar-behir, for his hibernation.—Continuation of Kiothas History of the Turks, p. 1403. (Ord MS.)

Hibernating. part. adj. Having the nature of that which hibernates. See Hibernation.

Hibernicism. s. [Lat. Hibernicus.] Mode of speech peculiar to natives of Ireland.

Perhaps there cannot be anywhere found a more striking instance of this species of nonsense, ludicrously styled Hibernicism, than we meet with here.—Scott, Critical Essays, p. 14. (Ord MS.)

Hiccup. s. Cant word for a juggler; one who plays fast and loose.

An old dull wit, who told the clock
For many years at Bridewell dock,
At Westminster and Hieck's-hall,
And hiccup hiccup play'd in all;
Where, in all governments and times,
H' had been both friend and foe to crimes.

Hiccup. s. Sudden cough so called; singultus.

So by an obsequy's skeleton of late
I heard an echo supervene,
Through imperfection, and the voice restore,
As if she had the hiccup o'er and o'er. Chatterbox, Sneezing curth the hiccup, and is profitable unto women in hard labour.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

If the stomach be hurt, singultus or hiccup follows.—Wieman, Surgery.

Hiccup. v. n. Sob with a convulsed stomach.

Quoth he, to bid me not to love,
Is to forbid my pulse to move,
My heart to grow, my ears to prick up.
Or, when I'm in a fit to hiccup. Bulwer, Hudibras.
The column order'd on the assault scarce pass'd
Beyond the Russian batteries a few toises,
When up the bridling Moslem rose at last,
Answering the Christian thunders with like voices;
Then one vast fire, air, earth, and stream embrac'd,
Which rock'd as 'twere beneath the mighty nois; when
The restless Titan hiccup in his den.

Byron, Don Juan, viii. 7.
Vomiting and hiccup are also occasionally present, particularly if the diaphragmatic pleura is implicated.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hickory. s. [?] Wood so called.

A couple of gaudy parrot's feathers were stuck through the division of the nostrils; there was a blue stone set in the chin; her ear-rings consisted of two pieces of hickory, of the size and shape of drumsticks; her arms and legs were adorned with bracelets of wampum; her breast glittered with numerous strings of glass beads; she wore a curious pouch, or pocket, of woven grass, elegantly painted various colours; about her neck was hung the fresh scalp of a Mohawk warrior, whom her deceased lover had lately slain in battle; and, finally, she was adorned from head to foot with bear's grease, which sent forth a most agreeable odour.—Smith II, Expedition of Humphrey Claker.

Hickwall, or Hickway. s. [?] Woodpecker.

'Tis this same herb your hickways, alias woodpeckers, use.—U. II, Translation of Babelais, iv. 63. (Nares by H. & W.)

Hiccup. adj. In an hidden manner.

These things have I hiccup-ly spoke, and yet not so secretly, but that they might very well take notice of it.—Coleridge, The Schizar, 6.
In some maps you shall find the miles thus hiccup-ly set down, as in that of Artois in Ortelius, and elsewhere.—Gregory, Pastimes, 316. (Ord MS.)

Hidalgo. s. [Spanish.] One of noble birth.

Of all the miseries which he had endured, this was the greatest; that he, an hidalgo, a gentleman of Spain, should live to be a servant.—T. Cary, Voyages to East India, p. 169: 1653.

Hide. v. a. präterite hid; past part. hid or hidden. [A.S. hydan.] Conceal; withhold or withdraw from sight or knowledge.

Avant, and quit my sight: let the earth hide thee!
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.
Thus the sire of gods and men below:
What I have hid a, hope not thou to know.

Drayton.
The crafty being makes a much longer voyage than I losses, puts in practice many more wiles, and hides himself under a greater variety of shapes.—Adel.
He'll trembles at the sight, and hides his head in utmost darkness, while on earth each heart is fill'd with peace. Bacon, Royal Concert.

Hide. v. n. Lie hid; be concealed.

Our bolder talents in full view display'd;
Your virtues open fairest in the shade:
Bred to disguise, in publick 'tis you hide,
Where none distinguish twist your shame and pride,
Weakness ord'ers duty. Pope, Moral Essays, ep. II. 201.

Hide and seek. Play in which some hide themselves, and another seeks them.

The boys and girls would venture to come and play at hide and seek in my hair.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

Hoopers' hide. See Hooper.

Hide. s. [A.S. hyde.]

1. Skin of any animal, either raw or dressed.
The trembling weapon past
Through gine bull hides, each under other plac'd
On his broad shield.
Pierced it was first to grasp their hands,
And spread soft hides upon the yellow sands.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, iii. 47.

2. Of a human being. Rhetorical and contemptuous.

Oh, tyrer's heart, wrap in a woman's hide!
How couldst thou drain the life-blood of the child?
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. l. 4.
His mantle, now his hide, with ruffled hairs
Crown'd to his back; a famish'd face he bears. Drayton.

Hide. s. [Low Lat. hila.] Measure of land.

One of the first things was a more particularquisition than had been before of every hide of land within the precincts of his conquest, and how they were holden. Sir H. Wotton.
When the realm was first divided into hides, a hide contained 100 acres, that is, 120 according to English measure. The just value of a hide, that might fit the whole kingdom, never appears from Domesday, was over of an uncertain quantity.—Kithen, a Homely Book.

Hidebound. adj. See extract.

1. Morbidly tight in the skin.

A horse is said to be hidebound when his skin sticks so hard to his ribs and back, that you cannot with your hand pull up or loosen the one from the other. It sometimes comes by poverty and bad keeping; at other times from over-riding, or a surfeit. Barrie's Dictionary.

2. In Horticulture. Being in the state in which the bark will not give way to the growth; barkbound.

A rack of a tree may be hidebound, but it will not keep open without somewhat put into it.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.
Like stunted hidebound trees, that just have got Sufficient sap at once to bear and rot. Sir J.

3. Harsh; untractable.

To blot or alter what precisely accords not with the hidebound humour, which he calls his judgement. Milton, A Recognite.
And still the lander and hidebound
The damsel prove, become the fonder. Bulwer, Hudibras.

In detestation of the former, when they observe to be often absurd and unreasonable, but always hidebound and fantastical.—Goodman, Winter Evening Conference, pt. I.

4. Niggardly; penurious; parsimonious.

He hath wealth; yet he will scarce use it, though to purchase his own health; but starves his poor hidebound carcase, and impoverisheth his body to enrich his purse.—Shaffer, North, pt. I. p. 91: 1611.
Hath my nurse been hidebound to my hungry brother?—Quarles, Judgement and Mercy, The Swearer.
Care and sleepless nights tormented with continual lashings a hidebound miser.—Situation of Paradise, etc., p. 73: 1683.

Hideos. adj. [Fr. hideux.]

1. Horrible; dreadful; shocking; formidable.

... have turned himself to as many forms as Proteus, every form should have been made hideous. Sir P. Sidney.
Her eyes grew stiffen'd, and with sulphur burn;
Her hideous looks and hellish form return;
Her curling snakes with hissing fill the place,
And open all the furies of her face.

Drayton, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 624.
'Tis forced through the hiatuses at the bottom of the sea with such violence, that it puts the sea into the most horrible disorder, making it rage and roar with a most hideous and amazing noise.—Woodward.

2. It is used by Spenser in a sense not now retained; detestable.

O hideous hunger of dominion. Spenser.

Hideosly. adv. In a hideous manner; horribly; dreadfully; in a manner that shocks.

I am myself
To welcome the condition of the time;
Which cannot look more hideously on me,
Than I have drawn it in my fantasy. Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. v. 2.

This, in the present application, is hideously profane; but the sense is intelligible.—Collins, Defence.

Hideosness. s. Attribute suggested by hideous.

Go antickly, and show outward hideousness.
Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, v. 1.
She presented in her trusty glass
The faithful copy of my hideousness.
Bacon, Psyché, p. 79: 1651.

Hiding. verbal abs. Concealment; act of withholding from sight.

There was the hiding of his power. Habbukuk, iii. 4.

I never gave any directions about the flower-pots,' said Yang. 'Then the whole council broke forth. "How dare you say so? We all remember it." Still the knave stood up erect, and exclaimed, with an impudence which Oates might have envied, "This hiding is all a trick got up between the Bishop and Blackhead. The Bishop has taken Blackhead off; and they are both trying to stifle the plot."

This was too much. There was a smile and a lifting up of hands all round the board.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xviii.

Hiding, v. [from hide = skin.] Beating. Colloquial.

Hiding-place, s. Place of concealment.

A fox, hard run, beyond of a countryman to help him to some hiding-place.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

Had they now known the world, and the hiding-places that are therein, they would have gone into the dens and rocks of the mountains.—Shuckford, On the Creation, p. 201.

When it appeared that . . . the popular enthusiasm excited by that dancer had subsided, when the lenity of the government had permitted some conspirators to leave their prisons and had encouraged others to venture out of their hiding-places, the faction which had been prostrated and stunned began to give signs of returning animation.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xvi.

The Colonna Cardinals had not yet been permitted to resume their place in the Conclave. The elder, James Colonna, had lived in seclusion, if not in concealment, at Perugia. He came forth from his hiding-place; he summoned his nephew, who had found an asylum at Padua, to his aid.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xii. ch. 1.

Hie, v. n. [A.S. higan.]

1. Hasten; go in haste.

When they had mark'd the changed skies.

They wait their hour was spent; then came to rest him hie.—Spenser, Faerie Queen.

My will is even this,

That presently you hie you home to bed.

Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 2.

Some to the shores do fly,

Some to the woods, or whither fear advis'd;

But running from, all to destruction hie.—Daniel.

The make no more libel'd,

But virtue heard it, and away she hie'd.—Crashaw.

Thither, full fraught with unobscured revenge,

Accurs'd, and in a curs'd hour, he hie'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 1031.

Thus he advis'd me, On you then two

Hang up thy life, and his thou to the sea. Waller.

The youth, returning to his mistress, hie'd.—Dryden.

Hie thee hence, and breast at home

That never shall enquire come

To break my iron sleep again

Till Lok hath burst his tenfold chain. *

Gray, The Desert of Olin.

2. It was anciently used with or without the reciprocal pronoun. It is now almost obsolete in all its uses.

Auster spy'd him;

Cruel Auster thither hie'd him.—Crashaw.

Hiemal, adj. [Lat. hiemalis, from hiems = winter.] Belonging to winter: (as, 'the hiemal solstice').

Resides vernal, estival, and autumnal made of flowers, the ancients had also hiemal garlands.—Sir T. Browne, Miscellanies, p. 92.

Astronomers have divided the whole face of heaven into four eclipes; the vernal, estival, autumnal, hiemal.—Muscon, Astronomical Plying Cards, p. 10.

Hiemation, s. Shelter from the cold of winter.

Where we set them [exotic plants] in for hiemation.—Eccllyn.

Hierarch, s. [Gr. hierarches, from hieros = holy, and arche = rule.]

1. Chief of a sacred order.

Angels, by imperial summons call'd,

Forthwith from all the ends of heaven appear'd,

Under their hierarchs in orders bright. Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 586.

2. Chief of any establishment.

The politick learning of accommodating hierarchs, or statesmen.—Cowley, Philomus, conv. 3.

Hierarchal, adj. Belonging to sacred government.

The great hierarchal standard was to move.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 701.

Hierarcheal, adj. Belonging to sacred or ecclesiastical government.

This epistle [of St. Paul to Titus] is one of the three, not unfrequently styled the hierarcheal epistles, 'de statu ecclesiastico composite,' as Tertullian speaks; being so many rescripts apostolical to Timothy, and Titus; (the one, desired by St. Paul to stay at Ephesus, primate of Asia; the other, left in Crete, metropolitan of that and the neighbour islands) directing them, how they ought to behave themselves in the house of God, &c.—Archbishop Bancroft, Sermons, p. 1.

Bishop Hall was the defender of our hierarcheal establishment.—T. Warburton, History of English Poetry, iv. 2.

The history of Latin Christianity may be traced in its more favoured saints, first martyrs, then bishops, then fathers, Jerome, Augustin, Gregory, then monks (the type St. Benedict). As the Church grew in wealth, kings or nobles, magnificent donors, were the saints; as it grew in power, rose hierarcheal saints, like Berkt. St. Louis was the saint of the Crusades and chivalry; St. Thomas Aquinas and Bonaventura of Scholasticism.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. 11.

Hierarchism, s. Hierarchal character.

After a few centuries the more dominant hierarchism of the West is manifest in the opposition between Greek and Latin Church architecture.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. vii.

Hierarchy, s.

1. Sacred government; rank or subordination of holy beings.

Out of the hierarchy of angels shewn,

The gentle Gabriel call'd he from the rest.

Fairfax.

He rounds the air, and breaks the hymnick notes In birds, heaven's choristers, organick thrills; Which, if they did not die, might seem to be A tenth rank in the heavenly hierarchy.—Donne.

Jehovah, from the summit of the sky, Environ'd with his winged hierarchy.

The world survey'd. Sandys.

These the supreme king Exalted to such power, and gave to rule, Each in his hierarchy, the orders bright.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 753.

The blessed of mortal wights, now questionless the highest saint in the celestial hierarchy, began to be so important, that a great part of the divine liturgy was addressed solely to her.—Dowell, Poetical Exercises.

He addressed all the sovereigns of Christendom; he urged them to a league of all temporal kings to oppose this oppressive league of the pope and the hierarchy.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. iii.

2. Ecclesiastical establishment.

The presbytery had more sympathy with the discipline of Scotland than the hierarchy of England.—Brown.

While the whole Levitical hierarchy continued, it was part of the ministerial office to flay the sacrifices.—South, Sermons.

Consider what I have written, from regard for the church established under the hierarchy of bishops.—Swift.

Hieratic, adj. In Egyptology. Abbreviated or approximately cursive form of the hieroglyphic mode of writing.

The prophet or teacher who walked last, carrying in his arms the great water-pot, was the president of the temple, and learned in the ten books, called hieratic, relating to the laws, the gods, the management of the temples, and the revenue.—Sharpe, History of Egypt, xiv.

Hieroglyph, s. [Gr. hieros = sacred; glypho = carve.] Emblem.

He gave her a kind expression, by a quaint device sent unto her in a rich jewel, fashioned much after the manner of the trivial hieroglyph used in France, called 'Reins de Pienard.'—Sir G. Duck, History of Richard III., p. 115: 1614.

Herodotus, holding the very same hieroglyph, speaks much plainer.—Swift, Tale of a Tub, § 3.

No brute can endure the taste of strong liquor, and consequently it is against all the rules of hieroglyph to assign any animals as patrons of punch.—Swift.

Hieroglyphic, adj. Having the character, constituted by, consisting in, a hieroglyphic, or series of hieroglyphics; emblematic; expressive of some meaning beyond what immediately appears.

The Egyptian serpent figures time, And, stripp'd, returns into his prime; If my affection then would not win, First cast thy hieroglyphic skin. Clarendon.

Hieroglyphical, adj. Hieroglyphic.

In this place stands a stately hieroglyphical obelisk of Theban marble.—Sandys, Travels.

The original of the conceit was probably hieroglyphical, which after became mythological, and, by a process of tradition, stole into a total verity, which was but partly true in its morality.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Hieroglyphically, adv. In a hieroglyphical manner; after the manner of a hieroglyph; emblematically.

Others have spoken emblematically and hieroglyphically, as the Egyptians, and the phoenix was the hieroglyphical of the sun.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Hieroglyphics, s. Generally pl. In Egyptology. Egyptian character, in the way of writing or carving letters, signs, or symbols of letters, syllables, and words; old Egyptian writing.

A temple of Serapis, which had lately been built at Canopus, was dedicated to the god in the name of the Emperor Commodus; and there some of the graver inscriptions of the polytheists find before the spread of Christianity and Paganism in Alexandria. The sculptures on the beautiful temples of Contra-Latopolis were also finished in this reign, and the emperor's name and titles were carved on the walls in hieroglyphics with those of the Ptolemies, under whom the temple itself had been built. Commodus may perhaps not have been the last emperor whose names and praises were carved in hieroglyphics; but all the great buildings in the Thebaid, which add such value to the early history of Egypt, had ceased before his reign. Other buildings of a less lasting form were no doubt being built, such as the Greek temples at Antinopolis and Ptolemais which have long since been swept away; but the Egyptian priests, with their gigantic undertakings, their noble plan of working for after ages rather than for themselves, were nearly ruined, and we find no ancient building now standing in Egypt that was raised after the time of the Antonines.—Sharpe, History of Egypt.

Hieroglyphize, v. a. Reduce to hieroglyphics.

More admirable is that which they attest was found in Mexico . . . where they hieroglyphized both their thoughts, histories, and inventions to posterity.—Beclun, Sculptura. (Rich.)

Hierogrammatic, adj. [Gr. γραφμα, = writing; (adjective γραφματικός) = writing.] Expressive of holy writing.

Clement adds to epistolical [writing] the hierogrammatic, which was alphabetic; but, being confined to the use of the priests, was not so well known.—Adle, Origin and Progress of Writing, ch. iii.

Hierogrammatist, s. [Gr. hierogrammatist.] Writer of hieroglyphics.

There were two sorts of languages and characters among the Egyptians; one common, and used by all, constituted for their trade and commerce with mankind, and which was that tongue or idiom called the Coptic or Pharonic; and the other used only by priests, prophets, hierogrammatists, or holy writers, and the like persons in sacerdotal orders.—Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 201.

Hierographic, adj. Hieroglyphic, except (etymologically) so far as carving differs from writing.

Apuleius describes the sacred book or ritual of the Egyptians as partly written in symbolic, and partly in these hierographic characters of arbitrary institution.—Adle, Origin and Progress of Writing, ch. iii.

Hierographical, adj. Same as Hierographic.

These [characters] were properly what the ancients call hierographical.—Adle, Origin and Progress of Writing.

Hierophant, s. [Gr. hierophantes.] One who teaches rules of religion; priest.

Hence the wantonness of poets, and the crafts of their breathless priests and hierophants, abundantly gratified the fancy of the people.—Sir J. Hale, Origin of Mystical.

To cause at the truth of his character, he was severely interrogated by the priest or hierophant.—Warburton, Divine Legation of Moses, ii. § 1.

Upon the established religions of Europe the East had removed her encroachments, and was pouring forth a family of rites which in various ways attracted the attention of the luxurious, the political, the ignorant, the restless, and the remorseful. Armenian, Chaldean, Egyptian, Jew, Syrian, Phrygian, as the case might be, was the designation of the new hierophant; and magic, superstition, barbarism, jugglery, were the names given to his rites by the world. J. H. Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine.

Higgle, v. n. [see Huckster.] Chaffer; be penurious in a bargain.

In good offices and due retributions we may not be pinching and niggardly: it avails an ignominious mind, where we have wrangled, to higgle and dudge in the accounts. Sir J. Hale.

These that art To higgle thus for a few blows, To gain thy knight an opulent spouse. Butler, Hudibras.

Higgledy-piggledy, adv. Confusedly; chance medley. Colloquial.

Higgler, s. Hawker; cudger.

The Temple itself was profaned into a den of thieves, a rendezvous of higlers and drovers.—South, Sermons, iii. 311.

Thorndyke, who was in the habit of travelling between Leeds and the capital, has recorded, in his Diary, such a series of perils and disasters as might suffice for a journey to the Frozen Ocean or to the Desert of Sahara. On one occasion he learned that the floods were out between Ware and London, that passengers had to swim for their lives, and that a hippler had perished in the attempt to cross.—Macaulay, History of England, vol. i. ch. iii.

Higgings. verbal abs. Chaffering.

Why all this higgling with thy friend about such a paltry sum? Does this become the generosity of the noble and rich John Bull?—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

High. adj. [A.S. heah.]

1. Long upwards; rising above from the surface, or from the centre: (opposed to deep or long downward).

Their Anden, or mountains, were far higher than those with us; whereby the remnants of the generation of men were, in such a particular deluge, saved.—Huon.

The higher parts of the earth being continually ascending, and the lower continually sinking, they must of necessity at length come to an equality.—T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

2. Elevated in place; raised aloft: (opposed to low).

They that stand high have many blasts to shake them,
And, if they fall, they dash themselves to pieces.

O mortals! bled in fate, who never know
To bear high fortune, or endure the low.

High over their heads a mould'ring rock in place,
That promises a fall, and shakes at every blast.

Reason elevates our thoughts as high as the stars,
And leads us through the vast spaces of this mighty fabric; yet it comes far short of the real extent of even corporeal being.—Locke.

3. Exalted in nature.

The highest faculty of the soul.—Baile.

4. Elevated in rank or condition: (as, high priest; high sheriff; high steward; high bullif; high constable).

Herod on his birth-day made a supper to his lords, high captains, and chief estates of Galilee.—Mark, vi. 21.

5. Exalted in sentiment.

Solomon . . . aim'd not beyond higher design than to enjoy his state.

6. Difficult; abstruse.

They meet to hear, and answer such high things.
—Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, i. 2.

7. Boastful; ostentatious.

His forces, after all the high discourses, amounted ready but to eighteen hundred foot.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

8. Arrogant; proud; lofty.

Him that hath an high look, and a proud heart, I will not suffer.—Psalm, cii. 5.

The governor made himself merry with his high and threatening language, and sent him word he would neither give nor receive quarter.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

9. Severe; oppressive.

When there approach on either side an high hand, violent persecution, cunning advantages taken, and combination, then is the virtue of a judge seen.—Baron.

10. Noble; illustrious.

Trust me I am exceeding weary.—I had thought, weariness durst not have attacked so high blood.—
It doth me, though it discolors the complexion of my countenance to acknowledge it.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. i. 2.

11. Strong; powerful.

The children of Israel went out with an high hand.—Exodus, xiv. 8.

Thou hast a mighty arm; strong is Thy hand, and high is Thy right hand.—Psalm, lxxix. 13.

With an high arm brought He them out.—Acts,
xiii. 17.

12. Violent; tempestuous; loud: (applied to the wind).

More ships in calms on a deceitful coast,
Or unseen rocks, than in high storms are lost.

Spiders cannot weave their nets in a high wind.—Dryden.

At length the winds are rais'd, the storm blows
high;

Be it your care, my friends, to keep it up
In its full fury.—Addison, Cato.

13. Tumultuous; turbulent; ungovernable.

Nor only tears
Rain'd at their eyes, but high winds worse within Began to rise; high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord; and shook more
Their inward state of mind.

Can heavenly minds such high resentment show,
Or exercise their spirit in human woe?

She had from her infancy discovered so imperious
a temper, usually called a high spirit.—Taylor, no.
231.

14. Full; complete (applied to time); now used only in cursory speech.

High time now ran it was for Una fair,
To think of those her captive parents dear.

Sweet warrior, when shall I have peace with
you?

High time it is this war now ended were.

It was high time to do so; for it was now certain that forces were already upon their march towards the West.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

It was high time for the lords to look about them.
—Ibid.

15. Raised to any great degree: (as, high pleasure; high luxury; a high performance; a high colour).

For Solomon, he liv'd at ease, and full
Of honour, wealth, high fare.

High maces and spices are fetched from the Indies.—Baker.

16. Advancing in latitude from the line.

They are forced to take their course either high to the North, or low to the South.—Abbot, Description of the World.

17. At the most perfect state; in the meridian: (as, 'By the sun it is high noon,' whence probably the foregoing expression,
high time).

It is yet high day, neither is it time that the cattle should be gathered.—Cicero, xix. 7.

18. Far advanced into antiquity.

The nominal observation of the several days of the week, is very high, and as old as the ancient Egyptians, who named the same according to the seven planets.—Sir T. Browne.

19. Dear; exorbitant in price.

If they must be good at so high a rate, they may be safe at a cheaper.—South, Sermon.

20. Capital; great, opposed to little: (as,
high treason, in opposition to petty).

That sabbath day was an high day.—John, xix. 31.

What hath this day decreed? what hath it done,
That it in golden letters should be set,
Among the high tides, in the calendar?

—Shakespeare, King John, iii. 1.

21. Loud; full.

There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voic'd quire below,
In service high, and anthems clear.

—Milton, Il Penseroso, 161.

22. Zealous in the cause of others: (as, 'He was high in the praise of him; 'He was a high man for the king').

23. With church. See extracts.

A term applied, some time after the revolution, to the church; which was raised by the dissenters, in order to break the church party, by dividing the members into high and low; and the opinion raised, that the high joined with the papists, inclined the low to fall in with the dissenters.—Swift, Examiner,
no. 43.

The terms high church, and low church, as commonly used, do not so much denote a principle, as they distinguish a party. They are like words of battle, that have nothing to do with their original signification, but are only given out to keep a body of men together, and to let them know friends from enemies.—Addison, Tuller, no. 220.

He is said, by the author of the Biographia, to have declared himself of the party who had the honourable distinction of high churchmen.—Johnson,
Life of Yalden.

High. adv.

1. Aloft.

Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave, towering high.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 634.

2. Profoundly; with great degrees of knowledge.

In thoughts more elevate, and reason'd high
Of providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 557.

3. Luxuriously.

He that eats high and drinks deep, that in his sleep he may procure pollution, is guilty of that uncleanliness, as well as of that excess, which St. Paul intimates in those words, Make not provision for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof.—Jeremy Taylor,
Ductor Dubitantium, ii. 489. (Ord. M.)

On high.

a. Above; aloft.

The windows from on high are open.—Isaiah,
xlv. 18.

captive.—Ephesians, iv. 8.

b. Alond.

Fiercely that stranger forward came, and high
Approaching, with bold words and bitter threat
Had that same longer, as he mote on high,
To leave to him that lady.

—Spenser, Faerie Queen, iii. 8. 16.

Highblown. adj. Swelled much with wind;
much inflated.

I have ventur'd,
Like little wanton boys that swim on bladders,
These many summers on a sea of glory;
But far beyond my depth: my high-blown pride
At length broke under me, and now has left me,
Wearied and old with service, to the mercy
Of a rude stream, that must for ever hide me.

—Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2.

Highborn. adj. Of noble extraction.

Cast round your eyes
Upon the high-born beauties of the court;
There chuse some worthy partner of your heart.

skin.—Foerster.

Highday. s. Fine; befitting an holiday; feast-day; day for ceremonies: (as, 'high-
days and holidays').

Used adjectively.

Thou spend'st such high-day wit in praising him.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 9.

Highfed. adj. Pampered.

A favourite mule, high-fed, and in the pride of flesh and mettle, would still be bragging of his family.—Sir R. L. Estrange.

Highflier. s. One who carries his opinions to extravagance.

She openly professeth herself to be a high-flier;
and it is not improbable she may also be a Papist at heart.—Swift.

(See also under Highlow.)

Highfown. adj.

1. Elevated; proud.

This stiff-neck'd pride, nor art nor force can bend,
Nor high-fown hopes to Reason's lure descend.

—Sir J. Denham, Of Prudence.

opinions.

Of their high-fying arbitrary claims.
—Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, iv. 161.

Highgoing. adj. Going or moving at a great rate.

How can she brook the rough high-going sea,
Over whose sunny back our ship, well-rip'd
With hope and strong assurance, must transport us?

—Massey, Rencadeo.

Highgrown. adj. Having the crop grown to considerable height.

Search every acre in the high-grown field.
—Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 4.

Highheeled. adj. Having the heel of the shoe much raised.

By these embroidered high-heel'd shoes,
She shall be caught as in a noose.

—Swift.

By the high-hung taper's light,
I could discern his cheeks were glowing red.

—Dryden.

Highland. s. Mountainous region.

The wandering moon
Beholds her brother's meals beneath her own;
The highlands smok'd, clef by the piercing rays.

—Addison.

Ladies in the highlands of Scotland use this discipline to their children in the midst of winter, and find that cold water does them no harm.—
Locke.

Used adjectively: (as, 'Highland clan').

Highlander. s. Inhabitant of a highland district.

His cabinet council of highlanders.—Addison.

Highlandish. adj. Denoting a mountainous country.

The country round is altogether so highlandish, that sometimes, when I waked from my little reveries, I really thought myself at home.—Drummond, Travels, p. 10.

Highlow. s. Shoe, or half boot, so called.

'There will be no holding Kieley,' said Tupper:
'I'm afraid he will be looking for something very high.' 'The higher the better,' rejoined Tailpaw.

'and then he will not interfere with us. I like your high-fines: it is your plunders I detest, wearing old hats and high-tops, unpacking in committee, and thinking they are men of business: do n them!'—Disraeli to the younger, Coningsby, b. vi. ch. li.

Highly, adv. In a high manner.

1. In a great degree.

Whatever expedients can allay those heats, which break us into different factions, cannot but be useful to the publick, and highly tend to its safety.—Addison.

It cannot but be highly requisite for us to enliven our faith, by dwelling often on the same considerations.—Blackop Afterbury.

2. Proudly; arrogantly; ambitiously.

What thou wouldst highly
That thou wouldst holly; wouldst not play false,
And yet wouldst wrongly win.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, l. 3.

3. With esteem; with estimation.

For I say, through the grace given me, to every man that is among you, not to think of himself more highly than he ought to think.—Romans, xii. 3.

Highmen, s. pl. Dice falsified so as to throw the higher numbers, as opposed to low-men, which threw the lower ones.

Then, play thou for a pound or for a pin,
High-men or low-men still are foiled in.
Harrington, Epigrams, l. 79.
(Sares by H. & W.)

Highmettled, adj. Proud or urdent of spirit.

He falls not in these to keep a stiff rein on a high-mettled Pegasus; and takes care not to surfet here, as he had done on other heads, by an erroneous abundance.—Garth.

Highminded, adj. Proud; arrogant.

My breast I'll burst with straining of my courage,
But I will chastise this high-minded strut.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. l. 3.

Because of unbelief they were broken off, and thou standest by faith: be not highminded, but fear.—Romans, xi. 20.

Highest, adj. Highest; topmost.

Now is the sun upon the highest hill
Of this day's journey.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 3.

Highness, s. Attribute suggested by High.

1. Elevation above the surface; altitude; loftiness.

The battle of Flodden Field was fought at Brans ston, near Flodden Hill, being a part of the Cheviot, a mountain that exceedeth all the mountains in the North of England for highness.—Dryden, Notes to Homer's Epistle to Gaius, (Ord MS.)

Somewhere about Staffordshire is the highest ground in England, and the place as many do think of greatest longevity; which, that it is due to the highness of the land, is visible from the inspection of any map of England.—Southwell Birch, History of the Royal Society, (Ord MS.)

2. Title of princes, anciently of kings.

Most royal majesty,
I crave no more than hath your highness offered
Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 1.

How long in vain had nature striv'd to frame
A perfect princess, ere her highness came? Waller.
Beauty and greatness are eminently joined in your royal highness.—Dryden.

3. Dignity of nature; supremacy.

Destruction from God was a terror to me, and by reason of his highness I could not endure.—Job, xxxi. 23.

4. Excellence; value.

The park, for a cheerful rising ground, for groves and browns for the deer, for rivulets of water, may compare with any for its highness in the whole land.—Moor, Familiar Letters, l. i. 8.

High, v. a. [A.S. hatan, pret. hēht, hēt; a form like did, wherein the sign of the perfect is the first h, the word being reduplicate.]

1. Bear a name. (compare the Latin cluo.)

The city of the great King high it will,
Wherein eternal peace and happiness doth dwell.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Around the rest a good old woman was,
High Mother Hubbard.
Id., Mother Hubbard's Tale.

Within this homestead liv'd, without a peer
For crowing loud, the noble Chanticleer,
So high her cock.
Dryden, The Cock and the Fox, 39.

Right well mine eyes avide the myst'ry wight,
On parchment scraps yfed, and Wormius high,
Pope, Dunciad, iii. 187.

2. Entrust; aim.

The gates stood open wide,
'Yet charge of them was to a porter high.'
Spenser, Faerie Queen, l. 4, 6.

But the sad Steele said not where it was high
Upon the childe, but somewhat short did fall.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, v. 11, 8.

Highwater, s. [generally two words.] Utmost flow of the tide; tide at its greatest height.

They have a way of draining lands that lie below the high-water, and are something above the low-water mark.—Mortimer.

Highway, s.

1. Great road; public path.

No few there be
That chase the narrow path or seek the right:
All keep the broad highway, and take delight
With many rather for to go stray.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Two inscriptions give a great light to the histories of Appius, who made the highway, and of Fabius the dictator.—Addison.

Entering on a broad highway,
Where power and titles senter'd lay,
He strove to pick up all he found.
Swift.

As the Romans always elevated their publick is above the circumjacent country, by a way of stone, or else by earth thrown up, such roads came to be called by the name, which they have retained, of the highway.—Blakesley, History of Shrewsbury.

2. Figuratively, a train of action with apparent consequence.

I could mention more trades we have lost, and are in the highway to lose. Child, On Trade.

Highwayman, s. Robber that plunders on the public roads.

'Tis like the friendship of pickpockets and highwaymen, that observe strict justice among themselves. Baith.

A remedy like that of giving my money to an higher tyman, before he attempts to take it by force, to prevent the sin of a robbery.—Swift.

Highwrought, adj.

1. Agitated to the utmost.

It is a high-wrought flood;
I cannot, 'twixt the heaven and the main,
Desery a sail. Shakespeare, Othello, ii. 1.

2. Accurately finished; nobly laboured.

Thou triumph'd, victor of the high-wrought day,
And the pleas'd dance, soft smiling, leav'd away.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 186.

Higre, s. See extract.

[Higre, Kipper, Ake. The commotion occasionally made in certain rivers by the meeting of the tide and current is known by the foregoing names. Ake of the sea flows me, impetus maris, (Promptorium Parvulorum.) Taylor the water poet describes the phenomenon on the coast of Lincolnshire.

'—the flood runs there with such great force,
That I imagine it outruns a horse;
And with a head some four foot high that roars,
It on the molting swells and beats the sh
It hath less mercy than bears, wolfe, or tyger,
And in those countries it is called the higre.'
(Taylor in Sares.)

Any sudden inundation of the sea is called an igor, at Howden in Yorkshire. (Kennet in Halliwell.) The essential meaning seems a swelling of the waters apparently arising from some internal cause.

'We know they the remue (French remuer, to stir) it if arise,
Anker it is clep'd, I understande,
Whose myght there may no shippes or wynd wyte stande.

This remue in th' ocean of propre kynde,
Wytonde wynde hath his commotion.
(MS. in Way.)

The term is obviously identical with Bavarian hilt, hilt, applied to a rising of the underground water level which has the effect of flooding cellars and low grounds in the neighbourhood of rivers by seepage from beneath. When this occurs they say that the Hall cins, giving the name of Hilt-waters to the floods so produced. (Schmeller.) The only character in common to this phenomenon and the English higre, is that both consist in a spontaneous swelling or rising of the water, without the action of floods in the one case or of wind in the other. It is probable then that the origin may be preserved in North Frisian hies, to rise or swell as water, to higher (Hendens), although in English high and higre, and in Dutch hoog, high.—Widdows, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Hilarity, s. [Lat. hilaritas, from hilaris—merry.] Merriment; gaiety.

Cheer up the countenance, expel misery, bring in hilarity.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 291.

Averroes restrained his hilarity, and made no more thereof than Seneca commeth, and was allowable in Cato; that is, a sober influence and regulated estimation from wine.—Sir T. Browne.

Hilary, [Lat. Hilarianus.] Name of a saint so merry.] Merriment; gaiety.

Cheer up the countenance, expel misery, bring in hilarity.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 291.

Averroes restrained his hilarity, and made no more thereof than Seneca commeth, and was allowable in Cato; that is, a sober influence and regulated estimation from wine.—Sir T. Browne.

Hilary, [Lat. Hilarianus.] Name of a saint so called; hence the word is a proper rather than a common term; moreover, being used only in combination with the word Term, its construction is adjectival, or rather, it is a part of a combination rather than a separate word. Hilary term (terminus sancti Hilarii) begins on January 23.

Hiding, s. [A.S.]

1. Sorry, paltry, cowardly follow.

If your lordship find him not a hiding, hold me no more in your respect.—Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, iii. 6.

A lasso slave,
A hiding for a livery, a squire's cloth.
Id., Cymbeline, ii. 3.

2. Applied to a female.

Laura, to his lady, was but a kitchen wench;
Helen and Ilro, hiddings and harlots.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4.

This idle toy, this hiding acorns my power,
And sets us all at naught.
Rowe, Jane Shore.

3. Used adjectivally.

He was some hiding fellow, that had stolen
The horse he rode on.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. l. 1.

Hill, s. [A.S.] Elevation of ground less than a mountain.

My sheep are thoughts, which I both guide and
Their pasture is fair hills of fruitless love.
Sir P. Sidney.

Jerusalem is seated on two hills,
Of height unlike, and turned side to side.
Fairfax, Translation of Tasso.

Hill, v. a. Raise as, convert into, a hill; accumulate.

When hoord on hoord, when heap on heap he hills th.
What doeth he else but build himself his ruine?
Spenser, Du R. l. 635—2. (Ord MS.)

Those mountains
Hill'd with snow. Cicero, Poems, p. 115.

We shall enquire yf there be any house in the waste, that is hillyd with any other thing than tile, or slate, or lead, for perill of fire.—Travail, Chronicle, sign. F. 5 b.

Hilling, verb. abs. Covering; accumulation.

Crave then, all you that aim at the hilling up of fatal gold, and employ your hours in a more noble traffic. Herit, Sc. canon, p. 41.

Hillock, s. Little hill.

Yet which this also! great is not great to the greater: what, judge you, doth a hillock show by the lilly Olympus?—Sir P. Sidney.

This mountain, and a few neighbouring hill-els that lie scattered about the bottom of it, is the whole circuit of these dominions. Addison, Travels in Italy.

Hilly, lj.

1. Consisting of hills.

Towards the hilly corners of Draina remain yet her very Aborigines, thrust amongst an assembly of mountains.—Harrell.

Climbing to a hilly steep,
He views his birds in vales afar. Dryden.

Lo! how the Norick plains
Rise hilly, with large piles of slaughter'd knights.
J. Philips.

Hilly countries afford the most entertaining prospects, though a man would chuse to travel through a plain one.—Addison.

2. Like a hill; lofty.

Better to have liv'd
Poor and obscure, and never seal'd the top
Of hilly empire, than to die with few
To be thrown headlong down almost as soon
As we have reach'd it.

Beaumont and Fletcher, Prothartes.

Hill, s. [A.S.] Handle of anything, particularly of a sword.

Now sits expectation in the air,
And hides a sword from hill unto the point.
With crowns imperial; crowns, and coronets.
Shakespeare, Henry V. li. chorus.

Take thou the hill,
And when my face is cover'd, as 'tis now,
Guide thou the sword. Id., Julius Caesar, v. 3.

Him. See He and Self.

Hin, s. [Hebrew.] Jewish measure so called, containing about ten pints.

With the one lamb a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil.—Exodus, xxix. 40.

Hinch-pinch, or Hineby-pineby, s. Game so called.

HIND

Your puffs, your cross-puffs, your expuffs, your impuffs upon the face of a tender infant . . . are fitting complements for hunch-puffs and laugh not, and under a candlestick, friar Rush, and twopenny beer.—Declaration of Popish Impudence; 1691. (Sarcas by H. & W.)

Hind. adj. See Hindmost.

Bringing its tail to its head, it bends its back so far till its head comes to touch its hind part, and so with its armour gathers itself into a ball.—Rap.

Hears his own feet, and thinks they sound like mine,
And fears his hind legs will o'ertake his fore. Pope.

Hind. s. [A.S. hinde.] Female of red deer.

How he slow, with glancing dart anise,
A gentle hind, the which the lovely boy
Did love as life. Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Canst thou mark when the hinds do calve?—Job, xxix. 1.

Nor Hercules more hands or labours knew,
Not though the brazen-footed hind he slew. Dryden.

Hind. s. [A.S. hine, hina, from higne; hiye, hiva.] Labouring man attached to a household.

A couple of Ford's knaves, his hinds were called forth by their mistress, to carry me in the name of God clothes, to Dutch-lane.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 5.

The Dutch, who came like greedy hinds before,
To reap the harvest their ripe ears did yield,
Now look like those, when rolling thunders roar,
And sheets of lightning blast the standing field.

He said, and cloth'd himself in coarse array,
A labouring hind in show. Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, cxi.

Id., Palamon and Arcite, l. 572.

When Prince George of Denmark visited the stately mansion of Poworth in wet weather, he was six hours in going nine miles; and it was necessary that a body of sturdy hinds should be on each side of his coach, in order to prop it.—Macaulay, History of England, vol. I. ch. iii.

Hindberry. s. [A.S. hindberian; German, himbeere.] Raspberry.

Adelung suggests the derivation of hindberry from the Latin hibernus, by a change that is quite consistent with analogy, viz. prefixing an h to the initial vowel, and an a before d.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hinder. v. a. [A.S. hindrian.] Obstruct; stop; let; impede.

Hinder me not, seeing the Lord hath prospered my way: send me away that I may go to my master.—Genesis, xxiv. 56.

The whole world shined with clear light, and none were hindered in their labour.—Wind Solomon, xvii. 20.

If the alms were hindered only by entreaty, the hinderer is not tied to restitution, because entreaty took not liberty away from the giver.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of Holy Living.

Solitude damps thought and wit; too much company dissipates and hinders it from fixing.—Sir W. Temple.

What hinders younger brothers, being fathers of families, from having the same right?—Locke.

Hinder. v. n. Raise hindrances; cause impediment.

This objection hinders not but that the heroic action of some commander, enterprised for the Christian cause, and executed happily, may be written.—Dryden.

Hinder. adj. See Hindmost.

Bears, fighting with my man, stand upon their hinder feet, and so this did, being ready to give me a shrewd embracement.—Sir P. Sidney.

As the hinder foot of the horse stuck to the mountain, while the body reared up in the air, . . . peep with great difficulty kept himself from sliding off his back.—Addison.

The lure was no sooner on shore, than it sent itself on its hinder legs, and listened to the sound of the pursuers.—Faulding, Adventures of Joseph Andrews.

Hindrance. s. Impediment; let; stop; obstruction.

False opinions, touching the will of God to have things done, are wont to bring forth mighty and violent practices against the hindrances of them, and those practices now opinions more pernicious than the first; yet most extremely sometimes opposite to the first. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

There must be in every Christian church the same, except mere impossibility of so having it be the hindrance.—Ibid.

What hindrance have they been to the knowledge of what is well done?—Dryden.

Have we not pledged each our holy oath,
That one should be the common good of both;
One soul should both inspire, and neither prove
His fellow's hindrance in pursuit of love?

Id., Palamon and Arcite, l. 291.

HING

He must conquer all these difficulties, and remove all these hindrances out of the way that leads to justice.—Bishop Atterbury.

hinderer. s. One who, or that which, hinders or obstructs.

A confessor commonly proves an hinderer; and by his envious clashing, doth often dig his partner's grave.—Faller, Holy State, p. 273.

Brake's, great hinderers of all plowing, grow. Mau

Hindering. part. adj. Obstructive.

You millions of hindering knot-grass made,
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, iii. 2.

Hinderling. s. Paltry, worthless, degenerate animal.

From this root [hind] comes the Anglo-Saxon hineþing, properly one who comes far behind his ancestors, 'familie sue opprobrium.' In Lexicon Edw. Confess. c. 35, 'Occidentales Saxones habent in proverbio similem despectui hinderling, i. e. omni honestate defecta et reversione inuicem;' the scoundrel of his family.—Collander, Two Ancient Scottish Poems, p. 55.

Hindmost. adj. Hindmost; last; in the rear.

He put the handmaids and their children foremost, and Leah and her children after, and Rachel and Joseph hindmost.—Genesis, xxiii. 2.

Hindhead. s. Back part of the head.

He said, then rai'd the stick and laid it hard
On the bald hind-head of the routed barl.

Battle of the Barin, p. 13.

Hindheel. s. [A.S. hind-hele.] Plant so called, of the genus Chenopodium (Botys). Hind-hele, from its curving the hind (i. e. probably the same as Elephantium, which deer were supposed to eat when stung with serpents).—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hindmost. adj. Last; lag; that which comes in the rear.

He met thee by the way, and smote the hindmost of thee, even all that were feeble behind thee.—Isaiah, lxxv. 18.

Like to an enter'd tide, they all rush by,
And leave you hindmost.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iii. 3.

Let him retire, betwixt two ages cast.
The first of this, and hindmost of the last,
A losing gamester.

'The race by vigour, not by vaunts is won;
So take the hindmost, hell!'—Pope, said, and run. Pope, Duuciel, ii. 50.

Hinge. s. [from root of hang.]

1. Joints upon which a gate or door turns.

Thou from the hinge their strokes the gates divorce,

And where the way they cannot find, they force.

Sir J. Denham, Destruction of Troy.

2. Cardinal points of the world, East, West,

North, and South.

Nor slept the winds

Within their stony caves, but rush'd abroad

From the four hinges of the world.

Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 413.

If when the moon is in the hinge at East,

The high beam forward from its native rest;

Full eighty years, if you two years abide,

This station gives. Creek, Translation of Manilla.

3. Governing rule or principle.

The other hinge of punishment might turn upon a law, whereby all men, who did not marry by the age of five and twenty, should pay the third part of their revenue. Sir W. Temple.

Be off the hinges. Be in a state of irregularity and disorder.

The man's spirit is out of order and off the hinges; and till that be put into its right frame, he will perpetually bequeathed.—A Robinson Tilldram.

Mc thinks we stand on ruins, Nature shakes

About us, and this universal frame

So loose, that it but wants another push

To leap from off its hinges. Dryden.

Hinge. v. a.

1. Furnish with hinges.

2. Bend as an hinge.

Be thou a flatterer now, and hinge thy knee;

And let his very breath, whom thou'lt observe,

Blow off thy cap. Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

Hinge. v. n. Turn as upon a hinge; hang:

(as, 'The settlement of this matter hinges upon this point').

Cicero and Cato might have handled opposite analogies for ever; it rested with each of them to prove by just induction, or at least to render probable, that the case resembled the one act of analogous cases and not the other, in the circumstances on which the disputed question really hinged.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, p. 501.

HIPP

Hippy. v. n. [Lat. hinnia.] Neigh.

He neigheth and hinneth; all is but hinnin, sophistry.—H. Jenson, Bartholomew Fair.

Hint. v. a. [Danish, ymte = whisper.] Suggest by a slight mention or remote allusion; mention imperceptibly.

For examples out of other histories to hint a few of them. South, Sermons, l. 290.

Willing to wound, and yet afraid to strike,
Just hint a fault, and hesitate dislike.

Pope, Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

Hint at. Allude to; touch slightly upon.

Speaking of Augustus's actions, he still remembers that agriculture ought to be some way hinted at throughout the whole poem.—Addison.

Hint. s.

1. Faint notice given to the mind: remote allusion; distant insinuation.

Let him strictly observe the first stirrings and intimations, the first hints and whisperings of good and evil that pass in his heart.—South, Sermons.

2. Suggestion; intimation.

Upon this hint I spake;
She lov'd me for the dangers I had pass'd.

Shakespeare, Othello, i. 3.

Actions are so full of circumstances, that, as men observe some facts more than others, they take different hints, and put different interpretations on them. Addison.

Hip. s. [A.S. hipe; Dutch, heupe; German, hüfte.]

1. Joint of the thigh.

How now, which of your hips has the most profound sentience?—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, i. 2.

Hippocrates affirmeth of the Scythians, that, using continual rutine, they were generally molested with sciatica, or hip gout.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

2. Haunch; flesh of the thigh.

To set the same mark on the hip
Both of their sound and rotten sheep.

Against a stump his trunk the monster grinds,
And gash'd his hip with one continu'd wound.

Dryden, Have on the hip. Have an advantage over another.

If this poor brach of Venice, whom I trash
For his quick hunting, stand the putting on,
I'll have our Michael Cassio on the hip.

Shakespeare, Othello, ii. 1.

Hip and thigh.

He smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter.—Judges, xv. 8.

Samson hip and thigh, pell-mell, haply with his leg and foot only, slew the Philistines with a great slaughter.—Bishop Richard, On the Old Testament, p. 60.

Hip. s. In Architecture. See extract.

Hip, croupe, French (is) the external angle formed by the meeting of two sloping sides or skirts of a roof, which have their wall-plates running in different directions, . . . the pieces of timber in these angles are called hip rafters, and the tiles with which they are covered are called hip-tiles. . . Hip-knob (is) a pinnacle, or some other similar ornament, placed on the top of the hips of a roof, or on the point of a gable. Glossary of Architecture.

Hip. s. [A.S. heopa, hiop; Danish, hybe.] Fruit of the briar or the dogrose.

Eating hips and drinking watery foam.
Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.

Hip. v. a. Spruin or shoot the hip.

His horse was hipp'd.

Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, iii. 2.

Hip. interj. Exclamation, or calling to one.

Hip-hop. Cant word formed by the reduplication of hop.

Your different tastes divide our poet's cares;
One food the sock, 't'other the buskin wears;
Thus while he strives to please, he's forc'd to do't
Like Volscius, hip-hop in a single boot. Congreve.

Hipped. adj. Melancholy.

Or to some coffee-house I stray
For news, the muna of a day;
And from the hipp'd discourses gather,
That politics go by the weather.

Green, Spleen, 168.

Hippish. adj. [corruption of hypochondriac.] Somewhat hypochondriac.

I fancy you are a little hippish; and I hope you fright yourself without any reason.—Graves, Epistola Quirade, li. ix. ch. xi.

They went to the Riddell (it's a place
To which I mean to go myself to-morrow,
Just to divert my thoughts a little space,
Because I'm rather hippish, and may borrow 1161

Some spirits, dancing at what kind of feet
May lurk beneath each mask; and as my sorrow
Markens its pace sometimes, till make, or find,
Something still leave it half an hour behind.

Byron, Beppo, lxi.

Hippocamp. s. [Gr. ἵπποκαμπος.] Sea-horse; fish so called.

Guiding from rocks her chariot's hippocampus,
Sir T. Browne.

Hippocentaur. s. [Gr. ἵπποκένταυρος.] Fabulous monster, half horse and half man.

How are poetical fictions, how are hippocentaur and chimera to be imagined, which are things quite out of nature, and whereof we can have no notion?
—Druid.

Hippocras. s. [Fr. hipocras; from Lat. vinum Hippocratis—wine of Hippocrates, the famous Greek physician so called.] Medicinal wine so called.

Sack and the well-spiced hippocras, the wine,
Was all the bowl, with ancient ribbons flue. King.

Hippodame. s. ? Hippopotamus.

Infernal hags, centaurs, dems, hippodamas
—Spenser, Faerie Queene, i. 9, 50.
That his swift chariot might have passage wyle,
Which four great hippodamas did draw, in four-wheeled. Ibid., iii. 11, 10.

Hippodrome. s. [Gr. ἵππος = horse + δρόμος = course.] Course for chariot and horse races, or exercises.

Within the hippodrome many of the cavalry used to ride. —Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Greater Asia, p. 102.
Stukely supposes these two links to have formed the ground for a British hippodrome, or horse-race.
—T. Warton, History of the Parish of Kildington, p. 70.

Travellers still trace the walls of the baths, a theatre, and a hippodrome, while the wide space covered by ruins and the number of Corinthian columns prove the magnificence and taste of the founder.
—Sharpe, History of Egypt, xiii.

Hippogriff. s. [Gr. ἵππος + γρύψ; Fr. hippogriffe.] Winged horse; being imagined by Ariosto.

He caught him up, and without wine
Of hippogriff bore through the air sublime.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 511.

A centaur, hippogriff, and a flying dragon, are things that were never seen. —Fletcher, Essay on Miracles, p. 185.

In truth, much of Bacon's life was passed in a visionary world, amidst things as strange as any that are described in the Arabian Tales, . . . amidst buildings more sumptuous than the palaces of Aladdin, fountains more wonderful than the golden water of Paradise, conveyances more rapid than the hip-pogriff of Ruggione, arms more formidable than the lance of Astolfo, remedies more efficacious than the balsam of Firabraz. Yet in his magnificent day-dreams there was nothing wild, nothing but what some reason sanctioned. —Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Bacon.

No day when they mounted there, a peaceable pedestrian, on that wild hippogriff of a democracy; which, spinning the firm earth, my landing at the very stars, no yet known Astolph could have ridden! —Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. i. h. iv. ch. iv.

God is as much a general term to the Christian or the Jew as to the Polytheist, and dragon, hippogriff, chimera, mermaid, ghost, are as much so as if real objects existed, corresponding to those names. —
J. N. Mill, System of Logic, b. i. ch. vii. § 1.

Hippopotamus. s. [Gr. ἵππος = horse + ποταμός = river.] Animal so called.

The same river Nilus bringeth forth another beast called hippodamus, i. e. a river horse. —Holland, Translation of Pliny, b. viii. ch. xxv. (Rich.)

Like a, though professing to give the system of his predecessors, has been frequently careless and unjust towards Cuvier; his mention of several quadrupeds (the only part of the latter's work at which I have looked) having been unnoticed in the Systema Nature. We do not find, however, that Cuvier had made very considerable additions to the number of species known to the ancients; and it cannot be reckoned a proof of his inattention in zoology, that he placed the hippopotamus among aquatic animals, and the bat among birds. —Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, viii. 25.

Hipshot. adj.

1. Sprained or dislocated in the hip.
Why do you go nodding and waggling so like a foal, as if you were hipshot? says the groom to the gondolier. —Sir R. C. Knollys.

2. Lame; awkward.
The field this hipshot grammarian cannot get into right frame of construction, neither here in the similitude, nor in the following reddition thereof.
—Milton, Apology for Smeatonius.

Hipwort. s. Native plant so called; Cotyledon umbilicus.

Hipwort, from the resemblance of the leaf to the Acetabulum or hip-socket, whence its former name of Herba cotyledonis, or herb of the hips. —Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hire. v. a. [A.S. hyran.]

1. Procure anything for temporary use at a certain price; engage anyone to temporary service for wages.

They . . . weigh silver in the balance, and hire a goldsmith, and he maketh it a god. —Isaiah, xvi. 2.
I cannot strike at a wretched kerns, whose arms
Are hired to bear their states. —Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 7.

His sordid avarice makes
In excrements, and hires the jakes. —Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

2. Bribe.
Tyrant's first, 'tis doubtful whether hired,
Or so the Trojan destiny require'd,
Might that the ramparts might be broken down. —Dryden, Translation of the Aeneid, ii. 42.

3. Let; set for a time at a certain price.
They that were full, hired out themselves for bread; and they that were hungry, ceased. —
1 Samuel, ii. 5.

Hire. s. Reward or recompence paid for the use of anything; wages paid for service.

Great thanks and possibly need to that good sire,
He, thence departing, gave for his prime hire.
—Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Though little was their hire, and light their gain,
Yet somewhat to their share he threw. —Dryden.
All arts and artists Theseus could command,
Who sold for hire, or wrought for better fare. —Id., Palamon and Arcite, ii. 453.

He served probably for nothing but his hire; yet he displayed as much zeal in his commission, as if he had been instigated by private enmity. —Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lvi.

Hireless. adj. Destitute, deprived of, wanting hire; not rewarded; not recompensed;
not expecting hire.

Your misbelief my hireless value see —Sir W. Lisle, Lancelot, C. 16.

Oh hireless science and of all alone
The liberal; meanly the red coat stat
In pension treat; but this depends on none. —Ibid., ii. 5.

Hireling. s.

1. One who serves for wages.
The hireling lones to see the shades descend,
That with the tedious day his toil might end,
And he his pay re. —Saunders, Paraphrase of the Book of Job.

In the framing of Hiero's ship there were three hundred carpenters employed for a year, besides many other hirelings for carriages. —Wilkins, Decade.

2. Mercurial; prostitute (the present use being generally in a bad or disparaging sense).

Now she shades thy evening walk with bays,
No hireling she, no prostitute to praise. —Pope.

Used adjectively.
Then trumpets, torches, and a tedious crew
Of hireling mourners for his funeral due. —Dryden.

The mercurial aid on which you rely irritates to an invincible resentment the minds of your enemies, whom you overrun with the sword, with rapine and of plunder, devoting them and their possessions to the rapacity of hireling cruelty! —Lord Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen during the Reign of George III., Lord Chatham.

Hirsute. adj. [Lat. hirsutus.]

1. Rough; rugged; shaggy.
There are bulbous, fibrous, and hirsute roots; the hirsute is a middle sort, between the bulbous and fibrous; that besides the putting forth sap upwards and downwards, putteth forth in round. —Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

An hirsute beggar's brat, that lately fed on scraps.
—Harton, Anatomy of Melancholy, to the reader.
Their bodies, that are affected with this universal melancholy, are most part black; —hirsute they are and lean. —Ibid., p. 201.

2. Of coarse manners; of rough behaviour.
He looked elderly, and was cynical and hirsute in his behaviour. —Life of A. Wood, p. 109.

Hirsuteness. s. Attribute suggested by Hirsute; hairiness.

Leanness, hirsuteness, broad veins, much hair on the brow, &c., shew melancholy. —Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 58.

Hiss. See He.

Hispid. adj. [Lat. hispidus.] Rough.

John of the wilderness? the hairy child?
The hispid Thibault? or what hairy wild?
—Mary, Verses prefixed to Hall's Poems, 1646.

Hiss. v. n.

1. Utter a noise like that of a serpent and some other animals.

And in the height of this bath, when I was more than half stew'd in grease, like a Dutch dish, to be thrown into the Thames, and cool'd, glowing hot, in that surge, like a horse-shoe; think of that, —hissing hot, think of that, under Brook. —Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 5.

The merchants shall hiss at three. —Ezekiel, xxvii. 30.

See the furies arise:
See the sunken that they rear,
How they hiss in their hair. —Uryles, Alexander's Feast.

Against the sword he threw
His forehead spear, which, hissing as it flew,
Pierced through the yielding planks. —Id., Translation of the Aeneid, ii. 64.

2. Express disapprobation by so doing; condemn at a public exhibition.

Men shall pursue with merited disgrace;
Hiss, clap their hands, and from his country chase. —Saunders, Paraphrase of the Book of Job.

Hiss. v. a. Condemn by hissing; explode.
Every one will hiss him out to his disgrace. —Excelsiarius, xxii. 1.

Thy mother plays, and I
Play too; but so disgrace'd a part, whose issue
Will hiss me to my grave. —Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

What's the newest grief? —
That of an hour's age doth hiss the speaker,
Each minute seems a new one. —Id., Macbeth, iv. 3.

She would so shamefully fail in the last act, that instead of a plaudite, she would deserve to be hiss'd off the stage. —Dr. H. More.

I have seen many successions of men, who have shot themselves into the world, some falling out upon the stage with vast applause, and others hiss'd off, and quitting it with disgrace. —Dryden.

Will you venture your all upon a cause, which would be hiss'd out of all the courts as ridiculous?
—Voltaire, the Quinlan.

'Tis true? —Quite true; not the slightest doubt.
Saw him myself. Not at all hiss'd; certainly not hiss'd. Perhaps a little hiss'd. The fellow really cheer'd him. Saw him myself. —Diarist, the pamphlet, C. 16, ch. v.

Hiss. . .

1. Sound of a serpent, and of some other animals.

He would have spoke,
But hiss for hiss return'd with forked tongue
To forked tongue. —Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 517.

2. Censure; expression of contempt used in theatres.

He heard
On all sides, from innumerable tongues,
A dismal universal hiss, the sound
Of public scorn! —Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 506.
Fierce champion Fortitude, that knows no fears
Of hisses, blows, or want, or loss of ears. —Pope, Dunciad, i. 7.

Hissing. verbal obs. Act of one who, or that which, hisses.

1. Noise of a serpent, and of some other animals.

Being serent with heads that passed by, and hissing of serpents, they died for fear. —Wisdom of Solomon, xvii. 9.

2. Object of hisses or disgrace.
To make their land desolate, and a perpetual hissing; every one that passeth thereby shall be admired, and was his head. —Jeremiah, xviii. 16.

Hist. interj. [Hist.] Silence.

Hist, hist, says another that stood by, away, doctor; for here's a whole pack of dismal coming. —
Swift.

Histology. s. [Gr. ἵστος = spindle, tissue; λόγος = word, principle.] In Anatomy.
Doctrine of the tissues in animal and vegetable organisms.

Histology [is a] term for the doctrine or science of the minute or ultimate structure and composition of the different structures of organismal bodies.
—Mayne, Expository Lessons of Terms ancient and modern of General Medical Science.

Histological. adj. Relating to histology.

In the development of the skull of osseous bones it is found, however, that, whilst the central or basilar, the neurophysal, and the parapsysal elements of the cranial vertebræ are developed out of a pre-existing cartilaginous basis, the modified spinous elements, with the exception of that of the occipital vertebra, are formed by the deposition of the calcareous salts in the epimeral membrane; and Dr. Reichert, apparently not remembering that that the cartilaginous, or intermediate histological

change between the primitive membranous and ultimate osseous stage, has been as little recognised in the development of the epicondylar bones of man, would reject the parietal and frontal bones from the system of the endo-skeleton. Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

In the hydra, where complete transposition of functions is possible, the histological differentiation that has been established, is extremely slight, or even inappreciable. — Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology.

In the histological development of the higher plants we find confirmation. Ibid.

The change from the outside of the lip to their inside, introduces us to a new series of interesting and instructive facts, joining on to those with which the last chapter closed. They concern the differentiations of those coats of the alimentary canal, which, as we have seen, are physiologically outer, though physically inner. These coats are greatly modified at different parts, and their modifications vary greatly in different animals. In the lower types, where they compose a simple tube, running from end to end of the body, they are almost uniform in their histological characters; but on ascending from these types, we find them presenting an increasing variety of minute structures between their two ends. The argument will be adequately enforced if we limit ourselves to the leading modifications they display in some of the higher animals. — Ibid.

HISTORIAN. s. Writer of history.

What thanks sufficient, or what recompence

Equal, have I to render thee, divine

Hidarian! — Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 5.

Our country, which has produced writers of the first figure in every other kind of work, has been very barren in good historians. — Addison.

Not added years on years my task would close,

The long historian of my country's woes. — Pope.

HISTORIC. adj.

1. Containing or giving an account of facts and events.

Here rising bold, the patriot's honest face;

There warriors frowning in historic brass. — Pope.

2. Suitable or pertaining to history or narrative.

With equal justice and historic care,

Their laws, their toils, their arms with his compare. — Prior.

It likewise may be thought, that the public events which have been thus unfavourably represented are capable of being read in a very different sense; of teaching, namely, this historic lesson, that the two forces of religion and nationality were then so intimately blended together, that the range of the variations between the former and the reformed systems, large as it was, was not able to sever them. — Gladstone, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. vii.

HISTORICAL. adj. Historic.

Because the beginning seemeth abrupt, it needs that you know the occasion of these several adventures; for the method of a poet historical is not such as of an historiographer. — Spenser.

In an historical relation we use terms that are most proper and best known. — T. Barne, Theory of the Poeth.

HISTORICALLY. adv. In the manner of history; by way of narration.

The gospels, which are weekly read, do all historically declare something which our Lord Jesus Christ himself either spoke, did, or suffered in his own person. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

HISTORIC. s. Historian. Rare.

Huntredonensis, doctor Paynet's historic, reporteth of priests' marriages. — Martin, On the Marriage of Priests, M. ii. 163.

HISTORIÉTTE. s. [Fr.] Little history.

Nobody had a chance against him; he answered all your questions before you asked them; contradicted everybody with the intrepidity of a Riely; annihilated your anecdotes by historiéttes infinitely more piquant; and if anybody chanced to make a joke which he could not excel, declared immediately it was a Joe Miller. — B. Disraeli, The younger, Coningsby.

HISTORIFY. v. a. Relate; record in history; reduce to a history.

O muse, historify.

Her praise, whose praise to learn your skill hath framed me. — Sir P. Sidney.

The third age they term historical; that is, such wherein matters have been more truly historified, and therefore may be believed. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Though in some points of doctrine, and perhaps of discipline, I am diffident of lending a perfect assent to that church which you have so worthily historified, yet may the ill time never come to me, when with a chilled heart or a portion of irreverent sentiment, I shall enter her beautiful and time-hallowed edifice. — Laub, Essays of Elia, The Tomb in the Abbey.

HISTORIOGRAPHY. s. [Gr. γράφω = write.]

Writer of history.

The method of a poet historical is not such as of an historiographer. — Spenser.

What poor ideas must strangers conceive of persons famous among us, should they form their notions of them from the writings of those our historiographers! — Addison.

I put the journals into a strong box, after the manner of the historiographer of some eastern monarch. — Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Inspire my spirit, Spirit of Deceit. . .

In such a place

Who could expose thy face.

Historiographer of deathless Crime!

Laub, Pindaric Ode to the Tremblant.
Far, far exceeding the bombast of Macbeth, the Duke could not resist . . . that had it been his fortune to lay . . . in the land in which his historiographer will seem to have come, in short, to have been a peech instead of a peer, he might have married all three. — B. Disraeli, The younger, The Young Duke.

He now, having determined to apply himself vigorously to the discharge of the duties which belonged to him as historiographer of France, came to see the great events which it was his office to record. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. xix.

HISTORIZE. v. a. Treat as history.

That rare and renowned knight (Ravleigh), whose fame shall contend in longevity with this island itself, yet, with that great world which he historizeth so gallantly. — Howard, B. ii. c. 2. (Orel MS.)

HISTORIZE. v. n. Think, muse, or write, as an historian; invest one's self with, or affect, the character of an historian.

While Dryad-like, conversing thus with trees,

Under their blooming shade I historize. — Howell, Escott Forest. (Orel MS.)

HISTORY. s. [Gr. ιστορία; Lat. historia; Fr. histoire.]

1. Narration of events and facts delivered with dignity.

Justly Caesar scorns the poet's lays;

It is to history he trusts for praise. — Pope.

2. Narration; relation.

What histories of toil could I declare?

But still long-wear'd nature wants repair. — Pope.

3. The knowledge of facts and events.

History, so far as it relates to the affairs of the Bible, is necessary to divines. — Watts.

Used adjectivally.

His works resemble a large history piece, where even the less important figures have some convenient place. — Pope.

HISTORICAL. adj. [Lat. historicus, from historia = player, actor.] Belonging to the stage; suitable to a player; becoming a buffoon; theatrical.

In consequence of his love and his knowledge of the historical art, he taught the chorists over which he presided to act plays. — T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 255.

We smile, perforce, when historical scenes

Ape the swain dialogue of kings and queens.

When 'Chrononhotont' holds us must die,

And Arthur struts in mimic majesty. — Brown, Hints from Horner

HISTORICAL. adj. HISTORIC: (this latter being the commoner term).

A historical contempt

Of what a man fears most. — B. Jones, A, Magnificent Lady.

Historical lectures, representing unto us Apollo's solemnities in his temple at Delos. — Peter Smart, Sermon at Delos, p. 25, 1628.

Touch the world be historical, and most men live ironically, yet be that what they sing art and personate only thyself. — Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, iii. 20.

Such naked and forlorn Quakers act a part much more cunning, false, and historical, than those that least affect such pitiful simplicities. — Bishop Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 164.

HISTORICALLY. adv. In a historical manner.

He [the Christian] is so deeply sensible of the real evil that is in sin itself, that he cannot be contented to have it only historically triumphed over. — Cudworth, Sermons, p. 79. (Orel MS.)

HISTORICISM. s. Theatrical or feigned representation. Rare.

When personations shall cease, and historicism of happiness be over; when reality shall rule. — Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, ii. 24.

HIT. v. a. [Swedish, hitta.]

1. Strike; touch with a blow.

When I first saw her I was presently stricken; and I, like a foolish child, that when any thing hita him will strike himself again upon it, would needs look again, as though I would persuade mine eyes that they were deceived. — Sir P. Sidney.

2. His conscience shall hit him in the teeth, and tell him his sin and folly. — South, Sermons.

3. Touch the mark, as opposed to miss.

Is he a god that ever flies the light? Or naked he, discards in all untruth? If he be blind, how hit he so right? — Sir P. Sidney.

So hard it is to tremble, and not to err, and to hit the mark with a shaking hand. — South, Sermons.

Were I but twenty-one,

Your father's house is so hot in you.

His very . . . that I should call you brother.

As I did him. — Shakesp., As You Like It, v. 1.

Search every comment that your care can find,

Some here, some there, may hit the poet's mind. — Rowe, Hamlet.

With learning tunes, and their endeavours to hit the notes right, put it past doubt that they have perception, and retain ideas, and use them for patterns. — Locke.

Here's an opportunity to show how great a labour my author is in hitting features. — Bishop Atterbury.

3. Suit; be conformable to.

Hail, divinely melancholy!

Whose softly visage is too bright

To hit the sense of human sight. — Milton, Il Penseroso, 72.

1. Strike; catch by the right bait; touch properly.

There you hit him: St. Dominick loves charity exceedingly; that argument never fails with him. — DePina, Spanish Fruits.

HIT off. Strike out; fix or determine luckily.

What prince soever can hit off this great secret, need know no more either for his own safety, or that of the people he governs. — Sir W. Temple.

HIT out. Perform by good luck.

Having the sound of ancient poets ringing in his ears, he moulted needs in singing hit out some of their tunes. — Spenser.

HIT. v. n.

1. Clash; collide.

If bodies be extension alone, he . . . they move and hit one against another; or what can make distinct surfaces in an uniform extension? — Locke.

Bones, teeth, and shells being sustained in the water with no tallic corpuscles, and the said corpuscles meeting with and hitting upon those bodies, become conjoined with them. — Woodward.

2. Chance luckily; succeed by accident; not to miss.

Of expectation fails, and most oft there

Where hope is coldest, and despair most sits.

Shakespeare, A's well that ends well, ii. 1.

3. Succeed, as opposed to miscarry.

The experiment of banding of thoughts would be diversified, and you are to note whether it hita for the most part. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

But thou bring'st valour too and wit,

Two things that seldom fail to hit. — Butler, Hudibras.

This may hit, 'tis more than barely possible.

— Dryden.

All human race would fain be wits,

And millions miss for one that hita. — Swift, On Poetry.

4. Light on.

There is a kind of conveying of effectual and imprinting passages amongst compliments, which is of singular use, if a man can hit upon it. — Bacon.

There's but a true and a false prediction in any telling of fortune; and a man that never hita on the right side, cannot be called a bad guesser, but must miss out of design. — Beaumont.

5. Agree; suit.

Pray you, let us hit together. — Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 1.

The number so exactly hita. — Waterland, Scripture Vindicated, iii. 6.

HIT. s.

1. Stroke.

The king hath laid, that in a dozen passes between you and him, he shall not exceed you three hits. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 2.

So he the famed Cilician fencer praised,

And at each hit with wonder seemed an. — Dryden.

2. Chance; fortuitous event.

If the rule we judge by be uncertain, it is odd that we shall judge wrong; and if we should judge right, yet it is not properly skill, but chance; not a true judgement, but a lucky hit. — South, Sermons.

But with more lucky hit than those

That use to make the stars depose. — Butler, Hudibras.

3. Lucky chance.

Have all his ventures fail'd? What, not one hit?

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iii. 2.

These hitch of words a true poet often finds, without seeking.—Dryden, Translation of Du Fresnoy's Art of Poetry.
 'Tis not that he minds his hitch.
 And dricks champagne among the wits,
 Five deep he toasts the to'ring Isaac. Prior.
 What! This may prove a good hit—but such a vulgar family. O'Keefe, Postscript, ii. 3.

If the quality of being natural without being obvious is a pretty correct description of felicitous expression, or what is called fine writing, it is a yet more accurate representation of the passions, or felicitous hitch in speaking.—Lord Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Lord Chatham.

Suppose that the observer makes the luckiest hit which could be given by any conceivable combination of chances.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, vi. vii. § 4.

Hitch. v. n.

1. Become entangled or hooked together.

But if this will not do, we are told, that there was an infinite number of company of little bodies, called atoms, from all eternity, flying and revolving about in a void space, which at length hitched together and united, by which union and connection they grew at length into this beautiful, curious, and most exact structure of the universe. A conceit fit for Bedlam than a school, or an academy.—South, Sermons, iii. 190.

2. Be caught; fall into; be hooked in.

Who'er offends, at some unlucky time
 Slides into verse, or hitches in a rhyme.

Pope, Imitation of Horace, b. ii. sat. i.
 Have you not tried in some instances to palm off a yesterday's pun upon a gentleman, and has it answered? Not but it was new to his hearing, but it did not seem to come new from you. It did not hitch in. It was like picking up at a village almshouse a two-days-old newspaper. You have not seen it before, but you resent the stale thing as an affront.—Lamb, Last Essays of Elia, Discant Correspondence.

And then to hitch Latimer and Servetus together! To be sure, there was a snake and a fire in each case, but where the rest of the resemblance is I cannot see.—Wateridge, Table Talk.

In the act of separation the crab has sometimes been seen to throw itself on its back, working the branches with unusual force, and making the utmost effort to disengage the internal processes. It ceases at the fissure where the tail is connected with the carapace. Sometimes the crab hitches one of its claws into some crack or fissure, and from this point of resistance gains more power in emerging and withdrawing itself from between the carapace and tail.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. xiv.

Hitch. v. a. Catch or hook up.

Here Short hitched up the waistband of his second pair of trousers, turned about round, and was going below, when Sharkey saw him at his heels.—Marryat, Sharkey, vol. i. ch. iii.

Hitch. s. Catch; anything that holds; impediment: (as, 'There is a hitch in the business'; 'The man has a hitch in his gait').

I am credibly informed, that there is still a considerable hitch or hobble in your enumeration; and that when you speak fast, you speak unintelligibly.—Lord Chesterfield.

I never felt more awkwardly in my life. It was a question whether I had better or not recur to any thing that had passed; we had been friends—we were friends. There had been a sort of a hitch—a hiatus, but the light had set that to rights, and I had been wounded, which was as much as a man of honour could expect, and my friend had not wounded me, which made the affair of reconciliation easier.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney, vol. iii. ch. i.

Hitchcock. s. Bungler.

Among whom this hitchcock missed his rapier.—Sets of George Peck. (Nares by H. & W.)

Hither. adv. [A.S. hider.]

1. To this place from some other, as opposed to Thither.

Cæsar, tempted with the fame
 Of this sweet island, never conquered,
 And envying the Britons blazed arms,
 O hideous hunger of dominion, hither came.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

2. To this end; to this design; to this topic of argument.

Hereupon dependeth whatsoever difference there is between the states of saints in glory; hither we refer whatsoever belongeth unto the highest perfection of man, by way of service towards God.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Hither. adj. Nearer; towards this part.

But on the hither side, a different sort,
 From the high neighbouring hills descended.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 673.

An eternal duration may be shorter or longer upon the hither end, namely, that extreme wherein it is finite.—Sir M. Hale.

Hither and thither. In different direction; backwards and forwards; here and there.

Victorie is like a traveller, and goeth hither and thither, not resting long in a place; and although it be for most part both gotten and kept by courage and discretion, yet oftentimes, when you have most carefully and politically disposed of all things, the fortune and chance of warre have therein a great sway.—Knutley, History of the Turks, 377, B. (Ord MS.)

Hithermost. adj. Nearest on this side.

That which is eternal can be extended to a greater extent at the hithermost extreme.—Sir M. Hale.

Hitherto. adv.

1. To this time; yet.

Hitherto I have only told the reader what ought not to be the subject of a picture or of a poem.—Dryden.

2. In any time till now.

More ample spirit than hitherto was wont,
 Here needs me, whilst the famous ancestries
 Of my most dreadful sovereign I recount.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

3. At every time till now.

In this we are not their adversaries, though they in the other hitherto have been ours.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

He could not have failed to add the opposition of ill spirits to the good; this alone has hitherto been the practice of the moderns.—Dryden.
 To correct them, is a work that has hitherto been assumed by the best qualified hands.—Swift.

Hitherward. adv. This way; towards this place.

Some parcels of their power are forth already,
 And only hitherward.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, i. 2.

Hitherwards. adv. Same as preceding.

The king himself in person hath set forth,
 Or hitherwards intended speedily.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iv. 1.

Hive. s. [A.S. hyfe, hwe, hige—family, house.]

1. Habitation or artificial receptacle of bees.

So bees with smoke, and doves with noisome stench,
 Are from their hives and houses driv'n away.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. i. 5.

So wandering bees would perish in the air,
 Did not a sound, proportion'd to their ear,
 Appease their rage, invite them to the hive.
Waller.

Bees have each of them a hole in their hives; their honey is their own, and every bee minds her own concerns.—Addison.

2. Bees occupying the same.

The common, like an angry hive of bees
 That want their leader, scatter up and down.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iii. 2.

3. Company.

What modern masons call a lodge, was by antiquity called a hive of free masons; and therefore, when a discussion happens, the going off is to this day called swarming.—Swift.

Hive. v. a.

1. Put into hives; harbour.

Mr. Addison of Oxford has been trouble me to me; after his bees, my latter swarm is scarce worth hiving.—Dryden.

When bees are fully settled, and the cluster at the biggest, hive them.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

2. Contain, as in hives; receive, as to an habitation.

Ambitious now to take exiles
 Of a more fragrant paradise,
 He at Fuscara's shew arriv'd,
 Where all delicious sweets are hiv'd.
Cervantes.

Hive. v. n. Take shelter together; reside collectively.

He sleeps by day
 More than the wild cat, drones hive not with me,
 Therefore I part with him.
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 5.

In summer we wander in a paradisaical scene, among groves and gardens; but at this season we get into warmer houses, and hive together in cities.—Pope, Letters.

Hiver. s. One who puts bees in hives.

Let the hiver drink a cup of good beer, and wash his hands and face therewith.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Hives. s. pl. Cutaneous eruption; skin disease so called.

The eruption in this disease consists of vesicles scattered over the body: they are mostly smooth and transparent, lentil-shaped, or irregularly circular, flattened at the top; the fluid, at first pellucid, then whitish, afterwards straw-coloured; and this kind is called the chicken-pox. Sometimes the vesicles are pointed and the fluid clear through-out the disease; and this is termed the swine-pox. In other cases, the vesicles are very large and globular, and the fluid, at first whey-coloured, is afterwards yellow; this form is denominated the hive.—Hopier, Medical Dictionary, in voce Varicella.

Hiss. v. n. Same as Hiss.

To have a thousand with red burning spits

Come hissing in upon them.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 6.

Hissing. s. Same as Hissing.

Lost, by the sun the organs parch'd and spill'd,
 The dismal ghost uncertain hissings yield.
May, Translation of Lucan, b. vi.

Ho. interj. Call, or exclamation to give notice of approach, or anything else; command to stop; cease; give over; enough.

The duke of Norfolk was not full set forward, when the king cast down his warder, and the heralds cried ho, ho, ho!—Holinshet.
 Behold, the kinsman of whom Boaz spoke came by; unto whom he said, Ho, such a one, turn aside, sit down here. Ruth, iv. 1.

Ho, every one that thirsteth, come ye to the waters. Isaiah, lv. 1.

Ho, ho, come forth and flee from the land of the north. Zachariah, ii. 6.

Ho, swain, what shepherd owns these roused sheep?
Dryden, Translation of the Eclogues, iii. 1.

Ho. s. Stop; bound; limit.

Formerly the word was common in this country. Mr. Malone says, it is yet common in Ireland; as, there is no ho with him, i.e. he knows no bounds, he never has enough, he is intemperate. 'Out of all ho.' Immoderately.—Littell, Dictionary, 1715.
 Here was no ho in devout drinking.—Langham's Letters of Queen Elizabeth's Kitchens at Kiltingham, 1575.
 He once loved the fair maid of Fressingfield out of all ho. Greene, Private Bacon.

Ho. interj. Sudden exclamation to give notice of approach or anything else.

Here dwells my father Jew; ho! who's within?
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 6.

When I cried ho!
 Like boys unto a noise, knees would start forth,
 And cry, Your will.
Id., Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 11.

Hoaming. adj. ? Swelling; surging.

What a sea comes in!
 It is a hoaming sea. We shall have foul weather.
Dryden, Tempest. (Rich.)

Hoar. adj. [A.S. har.]

1. White.

The hoar waters from his fount ran,
 And the light bubbles danced all about.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, ii. 12, 10.

A people,
 Whom Ireland sent from fountains and forests hoar.
Raiford.

2. Gray with age.

It cover'd was, and guided evermore
 Through wisdom of a matron hoar and hoar.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Let not his hoar head go down to the grave in peace. 1 Kings, ii. 6.

Now swarms the populace, a countless throng;
 Youth and hoar age, and man drives man along.
Pope.

3. Mouldy; musty.

Guyon finds Mammon in a deluge
 Sunning his treasure hoar.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, ii. 7, argument.

A hoar, sir, in a lenten pie, that is something stale and hoar. Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

Hoar. s. Antiquity; hoariness.

His grants are engraffed on the pulchre law of Europe, covered with the awful hoar of innumerable ages.—Burke.

Hoar. v. a. Make hoary. Rare.

Man himself, when age, like frost, has hoar'd his hairs, and all his fires are out, can underrid play with his flames and rays.—Fellham, p. 36. (Ord MS.)

Hoar. v. n. Become mouldy or musty.

A hoar that is hoar,
 Is too much for a score,
 When it hoars ere it be spent.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 4, song.

Hoar-frost. s. Congelations of dew in frosty mornings on the grass.

When the dew was gone up, behold upon the face of the wilderness there lay a small round thing, as small as the hoar-frost on the ground.—Isaiah, lvi. 10.

In Fahrenheit's thermometer, at thirty-two degrees, the water in the air begins to freeze, which is hoar-frost.—Arbuthnot.

Hoard. s. [A.S. hord.] Store laid up in secret; hidden stock; treasure.

I have a venturesome fairy, that shall seek
The squirrel's hoard, and fetch thee thence new nuts.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, iv. 1.
They might have even starved, had it not been for this providential reserve, this hoard, that was stored in the strata underneath, and now seasonably disclosed.—Woodward.

Hoard. v. a. Lay in hoards; husband privily; store secretly.

You hoard not health for your own private use,
But on the public spend the rich produce. Dryden.
You will be unsuccessful, if you give out of a great man, who is remarkable for his frugality for the publick, that he squanders away the nation's money; but you may safely relate that he hoards it.
—Arbuthnot, Art of Political Lying.
A superfluous abundance tempts us to forget God,
when it is hoarded in our treasures, or considered as a safe, independent provision laid up for many years.—Rogers.

With up.

I have just occasion to complain of them, who because they understand Chaucer, would hoard him up as unicers do their grandam gold, only to look on it themselves, and hinder others from making use of it.—Dryden.

The less wretch who hoards up all he can,
Is prais'd, and call'd a careful thrifty man. Id.

Hoard. v. n. Practice hoarding.

He hoard'd not even himself to be in need,
Nor hoard'd to hoard for those whom he did breed.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Hoarder. s. One who, that which, hoards.

The hoarders of provision were constrained to open their garners, and the prices of grain abated. *Sir
H. Votton, Panegyric to King Charles I.*
Since commodities will be raised, this alteration will be an advantage to nobody but hoarders of money.—Locke.

Hoarding. verbal abs. Act of one who hoards, especially applied to the habit of secretly money, or treasure: (as opposed to that of putting in a bank, out at interest, or investing).

No great was the difficulty that the practice of hoarding was common.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xix.

Hoared. part. adj. Mouldy; musty.

All the bread of their provision was dry and hoared, (in the present version, mouldy).—Joshua i.
Is. 5, Matthew's, Croumer's, and the Bishop's Translation.

Hoariness. s. Attribute suggested by Hoary.

1. State of being whitish, or of the colour of old men's hair.

He grows a wolf, his hoariness remains,
And the same rage in other members reigns.
Dryden.

2. Mouldiness.

Hoariness, or vigewitness, such as is on bread or meat long kept; or mouldiness from moisture or lack of cleansing. Barret, Alcegar.

Hoarse. adj. [A.S. hars.] Having the voice rough, as with a cold; having a rough sound.

Come, sit, sit, and a song... clap into't roundly, without hawking or spitting, or saying we are hoarse.
—Shakespeare, As you like it, v. 3.

The raven himself is hoarse,
That croaks the fatal entrance of Duncan
Under my battlements. Id., Macbeth, i. 5.
He aged his steps along the hoarse resounding shore. Dryden.

Translation of the First Book of the Iliad.

Hoarsely. adv. In a hoarse manner; with a rough harsh sound.

Hard at my feet ran down a crystal spring,
Which did the cumbrous pebbles hoarsely chide
For standing in the way. Moor, Cypid's Conflict: 1037.

The hounds at nearer distance hoarsely bay'd;
The hunter close pursu'd the visionary maid.
Dryden, Theodora and Honorio.

Hoarseness. s. Attribute suggested by Hoarse.

I had a voice in heav'n ere sulph'rous steams
Had damp'd it to a hoarseness. Dryden, King Arthur.

The want of it in the wind-pipe occasions hoarseness in the gullet, and difficulty of swallowing.—
Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Hoary. adj. [A.S. hár.] White; whitish.

One would think the deep to be hoary.—Job, xli.
32.
Thus she rested on her arm roagin'd,
The hoary willows waving with the wind. Addison.

With age.

A comely palmer clad in black attire,
Of ripest years, and hairs all hoary grey.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.
Polyman, marvelling at the course and majesty of the hoary old prince in his so great extremity, dismiss'd him, and sent him again into the city. —
Knotter, History of the Turks.

Has then my hoary head deserv'd no better?

Then in full age, and hoary holiness,
Retire, great preacher, to thy promis'd bliss.
—Prior, Solomon.

With frost.

The seasons alter; hoary headed frosts
Fall in the fresh lap of the crimson rose.
Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 2.

With mould.

There was brought out of the city into the camp very coarse, hoary, moulded break.—Knotter, History of the Turks.

Hoax. v. a. [A.S. hucse. cheat.] Take in,
or deceive any one, by a hoax.

M. was hoaxing you, surely, about my engraving;
'tis a little sixpenny thing, too like by half, in which the draughtsmen has done his best to avoid flattery.
—Lamb, Letter to Burton.

Hoax. s. Imposition; deception.

Thelwall was introduced by them to Lamb, and was welcomed to his circle, in the true catholicism of his spirit, although its master cared nothing for the Roman virtue which Thelwall devotedly cherished, and which Horne Took kept in uncertain vibration between a rebellion and a hoax. Telford, Memoir of Lamb.

He... would have been scared by so silly a hoax.
—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxi.

Hobbad-de-hoy. s. [?] Stripling; lad of an equivocal age; neither man nor boy.

Man's age divided here is have
By prattishness from birth to grave.
The first seven years bring up as a child:
The next to learning, for waiting too while:
The next keeps under Sir Hobbad-de-hoy:
The next a man, no longer a boy, &c.
Tasso, Four Hundred Points of good Housewifery, p. 57: 1540.

Why! he's a mere hobbad-de-hoy, neither a man nor a boy. Swift, Polite Conversation. (Ord MS.)
The only males that are in such families are too insufficient to excite jealousy or spite: they are either the babes and sucklings of the present, or the hobbad-de-hoy of the last year; and what the status of a hobbad-de-hoy is, all know and have felt.—Bonar, Forest Creatures, The Wild Boar.

Hobble. v. n.

1. Walk lamely or awkwardly upon one leg more than the other; hitch; walk with unequal and encumbered steps.
The friar was hobbling the same way too. Dryden.
When I was hobbling over the stile, after Frederick, there and thought the dog might be shivered to atoms I made a determination in my own mind, if he survived, that he, and your daughter —what's your name, young lady?—Colman the younger, The Poor Gentleman, v. 3.
You can run, I see. Why, after a thousand pounds I can hobble a bit. —Can you? Then hobble to Lucern, in Switzerland, and obtain proof of their union; he denies being married.—Morton, Six Acts worth knowing, i. 1.

Nothing could escape her little twinkling bloodshot eyes or her acute ear; she could scarcely hob-ble fifty yards, but she kept no servant to assist her,
for, like her son, she was avaricious by the extreme.
—Marrgat, Southey, vol. i. ch. xiv.

2. Move roughly or unevenly. Feet being ascribed to verses, whatever is done with feet is likewise ascribed to them.
While you Pindarick truths rehearse,
She hobbles in alternate verses. Prior, Alma, canto i.

Hobble. s.
1. Uneven awkward gait.
One of his heels is hicker than the other, which gives him a hobble in his gait.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

2. Difficulty: (as, 'He has got into a hob-ble'). Colloquial.

Hobblor. s. [N.Fr. hobelr.] Kind of horse-soldier.
For twenty hobblers armed, Irishmen so called,
because they served on hobblers, he paid six-pence a-piece per diem.—Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

Hobbling. part. adj. Halting; limping.

Some persons continued a kind of hobbling march on the broken arches, but fell through.—Addison.

Those ancient Romans... had a custom of re-proaching each other in a sort of extempore poetry, or rather tunable hobbling verse.—Dryden, Origin and Progress of Satire.

Yet whether right or wrong the ancient rules,
It will not do to call our fathers fools!
Though you and I who cruditely know
To separate the elegant and low,
Can also, when a hobbling line appears,
Detect with fingers, in default of eyes.

Dryden,Hints from Horace.
Hobbling. verbal abs. Act of one who hob-bles.

Was he ever able to walk without leading-strings, without being discovered by his hobbling?—Swift.

Hobby. s. [from Fr. hobereau.] Species of falcon so called.

They have such a hovering possession of the Valtoire, as a hobby hath over a hawk. Baron.

The people all chop like trout at an artificial fly, and dare like larks under the awe of a painted hobby.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

Larks lie dar'd to shun the hobby's flight. Dryden.

Hobby. s. [from N.Fr. hobin; Low German,
hoppe.]

1. Horse.

Hobblers armed, Irishmen so called, because they served on hobbers. Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

2. Stick on which boys get a-stride and ride.

As young children, who are ty'd in Coarcts, to keep their shins from sliding,
When members knit, and legs grow stronger,
Make use of such machine no longer;
But leap per hiltin, and seat
On horse call'd hobby, or without. Prior.

3. Favourite object or pursuit of a person.

Of quite another stamp was the then accountant,
John Tim. He neither pretended to high blood, nor, in good truth, cared one fig about the matter.
He thought an accountant the greatest character in the world, and himself the greatest accountant in it. Yet John was not without his hobby. The fiddle relaxed his earnest hours. Lamb, Essays of Elia, The South-Sea House.

Every man has his hobby, and usually pays dear for it; so did Mylnher Krause. Marrgat, Southey.

Hobby-horse. s.

1. Stick on which boys get astride and ride.

These grave confenders about opinionative trifles look like good Socrates upon his boy's hobbyhorse.—
Clarendon.

2. Character in the May-games.

The hobby-horse was represented by a man equipped with as much post-board as was sufficient to form the head and hinder parts of a horse, the quadrupedal defects being concealed by a long mantle or foot-cloth that nearly touched the ground.
The performer on this occasion exerted all his skill in burlesque horsemanship. Dancer.

But see the hobby-horse is forgot;
Fool! it must be your lot.
To supply his want with farses
And some other bullion cresses.

The word hobby-horse is not usual to his man, and thereupon he plays the most notorious hobby-horse, jostling and tramping in the luxury of his nonsense.—
Milton, Colasterion.

3. Stupid or foolish person.

I have studied eight or nine wise words to speak to you, which these hobby-horses must not hear.—
Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 2.

4. Favourite object or pursuit of a person.

What the last are denominated hobbers, or hobby-horses, we style collections: Uncle Toby's library has required no apology among the hunters of old ballads, and churchwardens' bills of our day!
—Prior, Illustrations of Sterne, ch. v.

Hobgoblin. s. [? goblin with hobby's or horse's head.] Fairy; vulgarly, a frightful one.

You are that shrewd and knavish sprite,
Call'd Robin Goodfellow: ...
Those that Hobgoblin call you, and sweet Puck,
You do their work.

Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 1.
Fairies, black, gray, green, and white,
Attend your office and your quality:
Crier Hobgoblin, make the fairy o'ys.

Id., Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 5.

Hobnail. s. [? nail used in shoeing a hobby or little horse.]

1. Nail with a thick strong head.
Stead, if thou turn thine edge, I beseech Jove on my knees thou may'st be turned into hobnails.—
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II, iv. 10.

2. Clownish person, in contempt.

No antic hobnail at a morsel, but is more hand-somerly facetious.—Milton, Colasterion.

Hobnailed. adj. Set with hobnails.

Wouldst thou, friend, who hast two legs alone, &

Wouldst thou, to run the martlet, these expose
To a whole company of hobnail'd shoes?
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Hobnob. Same as Hubnob.

His advancement at this moment is so implacable, that satisfaction can be none but by pangs of death,
and sepulchre; hobnob is his word, give't or take't.
—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Hobthurst. s. [Hob of the hurst.] Hob-joblin; clown.

Both can easily pardon the mistake of this rude writer, nor are at all surprised at it as a novelty, that any ignorant rural hobthurst should call the spirit of nature (a thing so much beyond his capacity to judge of) a prodigious hobgoblin. —Lunaticism on Glanville, &c., p. 91; 1882.

Hock. s. [A.S. hok; ho heel.] Joint 1 between the knee and the fetlock.

[Hock, the joint of a horse's leg from the knee to the fetlock; hock, the back of the knee.—Walden,
Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Hock. s. [short for Hockheimer, adjective of Hockheim, the name of a place on the Rhine so called.] Wine from Hockheim.

Wine becomes sharp, as hock, like vitriolic acidity.—Flager.

Hockamore. s. [corruption of Hockheimer.]
Same as Hock.

Restor'd the fainting high and mighty,
With brandy, wine, and aqua vita.
And made 'em stoutly overcome
With barchaz, hockamore, and mum.

If cyder royal should become unpleasant, and as unfit to bottle as old hockamore, mix one hock-head of that and one of tart new cyder together.
—Mortimer.

Hockey, or Hawkey. s. [?] Game so called.
Hockey is brought Home with hollowin.

Poor Robin's Almanack: 1675.
A name for harvest-home, used in Norfolk, Suffolk, and Cambridgeshire, according to Pezzer; and certainly in other places. Hockey cake is that which is distributed to the people at harvest-home. The hockey cart is that which brings the last corn and the children rejoicing with boughs in their hands, with which the horses are also attired.—Selmon,
Survey, Hertfordshire, from Brand's Popular Antiquity.

In the town of Cambridge, and centre of our University, such curious remains of ancient customs may be noticed, in different seasons of the year, which pass without observation. The custom of blowing horns on the first of May (old style) is derived from a festival in honour of Diana. At the haukie, as it is called, I have seen a clown dressed in woman's clothes, having his face painted, his head decorated with ears of corn, and bearing about him other symbols of Ceres, carried in a wasson, with great pomp and loud shouts through the streets, the horses being covered with white sheets; and when I enquired the meaning of the ceremony, was answered by the people that they were drawing the harvest-queen.—Dr. Clarke, Travels.
It is a game played in Little Tibet was a kind of hocky on horseback.—Vigne, Travels in Cashmere and Little Tibet.

Hocus-pocus.

1. Word used by jugglers.

I will speak of one man more exceeding in that craft than others, that was not about in king James his time, and long since, who called himself 'the king's majesty's most excellent hocus pocus;' and so was he called, because that, at the playing of every trick, he used to say, 'hocus pocus, fantus, talantus, vnde eleuteri jubes,' a dark composition of words to blind the eyes of beholders.—Adrian's Cudde in the Dick, Treatise of Witches, &c., p. 23.

Do they think this pen can juggle? I would we had hocus pocus for 'em then, your people; or Travittano Tudesco.—Who's that, boy? Another juggler with a long name.—R. Johnson, Magickal Jargon.
Dancing-wenchies, hocus pocus, and other an-ticks past my remembrance.—Nir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels in Africa and the Great Asia, p. 154.

2. Juggle; cheat; words formerly used by conjurers in practising their tricks.

Right and wrong
Could never hold it out so long,
And, like blind fortune, with a slight
Convey men's interest and right.
From Silcock's pocket into Nokes's.
As easily as hocus pocus. —Bulter, Hudibras, iii. 3.
If thou hast any hocus pocus tricks to play, why can'tst thou do them here? —Addison, Drummer.

Hocus, or Hocus-pocus. s. a. Cheat. Vulgar.
One of the greatest pieces of humbuggery, and with which these jugglers hocus the vulgar and incautious of the present age. —Nelson.

Used as a verbal abstract.

This gift of hocus pocus, and of disguising matters, is surprising.—Nir B. L'Estrange.

Hod. s. [?] Kind of trough, supported by a handle, in which a labourer carries mortar to the masons.

A fork and a hook to be tampering in clay,
A lath, hammer, trowel, a hod or a tray.
Tanner, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Hodden. adj. and s. [?] Coarse kind of cloth so called.

While see! so long as it is but drest in hodden or russet; and Revolution, less frequent than War, has not yet got its laws of Revolution, but the hodden or russet individuals are Unrevolutionary, 4) striking beloved brother blockheads of mankind, let us close these wide mouths of ours; let us cease strieking, and begin considering. —Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. iii. b. l. ch. d.

Hoddy-doddy. s. A word of contempt denoting an awkward, foolish, or ridiculous
man.

Oh! his wife, and you,
That make your husband such a hobby-doddy.
R. Johnson, Every Man in his Humour.
He has more goodness in his little finger, than you have in your whole body:
My master is a personable man, and not a spindle-shank'd hobby-doddy.
Swift, Cookmaid's Letter to Dr. Sheridan.

Hoddy-peak. s. [Dutch, huldebek, hobbelbek.] Stammerer; dolt; nimby.

What ye brain-sick fools, ye hobby-peaks, ye doddy-peaks. —Latimer.

Hodge-podge. s. [Fr. hockepot.] Medley of ingredients boiled together.

They have made our English tongue a callimach-frey, or hodge-podge of all other speeches.—Epistle Prefatory to Spenser's Shepherds Calendar.
As for mercury water and other poisons, they might be fit for rats, which is a kind of hodge-pod.
Racon, Speech against the Countess of Somerset.
It produces excellent corn, whereas the Turks make their trachana and baubart, a certain hodgepodge of sundry ingredients.—Stachis, Travels.

Hodtern. adj. Constituted by, consisting of,
to-day; existing.

I know that this contrary to the common opinion not only of the senses, but even of divine hodtern mathematicians. —Boyle, Works, vol. ii.
p. 75k. (Rich.)

Hodmand. s. Snail.

Those that cast their shell are the lobster, the crab, the crawfish, and the hodmand or dodman.
—Bacon.

Hoe. s. [Fr. houe.] Instrument to cut up the earth, of which the blade is at right angles with the handle.

They should be thimself with a hoe. —Mortimer,
Husbandry.

Hoe. s. a. Cut or dig with a hoe.

They must be continually kept with weeding and hoeing. —Mortimer, Husbandry.

Hoful. adj. [A.S. hoga, hug, hoh -- mind, thought.] Prudent; careful. Rare.

S. Gregory, ever hof of his doings and behaviour, directed especial letters unto him. —Stapleton, Fortress of the Faith, fol. 97, b. 1. 1585.

Hofully. adv. In a hof manner. Rare.
Women serve God *hof*ly and chastely. —Stapleton, Fortress of the Faith, fol. 119, b.

Hog. s. [from Welsh huch.] General name of swine.

This will raise the price of hogs, if we grow all the pork-venters. —Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice,
iii. 5.

The hog, that ploughs not, nor obeys thy call,
Lives on the labours of this Lord of all.

Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 4.

Bring hogs to a fine market. Fail of one's design.

You have brought your hogs to a fine market.—
Spectator.

Hog. s. a. Cut the hair short, like the bristles of a hog; (especially the mane of a horse).

Hog-doe. s. [two words.] See extract.

The axine group contains but three species . . .
Among the British sportsmen and residents in India, these animals are called hog-deer; they are most usually found in the heavy grass jungles in the lower provinces, and to the northward in the Jaw and Surpat jungles, along the banks of the rivers;
they feed in preference on the silky grass used for making turine. They are extremely indolent in their habits, feeding at night, and passing most of the day in sleep. To this we may probably trace the repugnance of the hog-deer to remain in districts much frequented by the wild panthers, whose loud and discordant voice must frequently disturb them.—Swainson, Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 288.

Hogcote. s. House for hogs; hogsty.

Out of a small hogcote sixty or eighty load of dung hath been raised. —Mortimer, Husbandry.

Hoggerel. s. [N.Fr. hoguetz.] Hog.
And to the temples first they haste and seek,
By sacrifices with hoggers (hideous) of two years,
Chosen as ought to be.—Surrey, Translation of the Aeneid, iv. (Rich.)

Hoggins. s. [?] See extract.

They committed themselves unto the sea, and loosed the rudder bands, and hoised up the sail, and made toward shore.—Acts, xxvii, 10.
That man which praiseth virtue for itself, and can not endure to hoise and strike his sails, as the divers natures of calms and storms require, must cut his sails of mean length and breadth, and content himself with a slow and sure navigation.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Hoiſt. v. a. Raise; lift.

What haste she made to hoist her purple sails!
And to appear magnificent in flight,
Drew half our strength away.—Dryden, All for Love.

Seize him, take, hoist him up, break off his hold,
And toss him headlong from the temple's wall.
Southern.

What made Absalom kick at all the kindnesses of his father, but because his ambition would needs be flouting the sceptre, and hoisting him into his father's throne?—South, Sermons.

Hoiſt. s. Raising; lifting; lift.

He is upon his second hoist into the cart.—Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, p. 296.

Hoiſting. s. See extract.

Confession was bribed out of some by offers of indulgence, wrung from others by the dread of torture, by actual torture, torture with the various ways of which our hearts must be shocked, that we may judge more fairly on their effects. These were among the forms of procedure by torture in those times, without doubt mercilessly employed in the dungeons which confined the Templars. The criminal was stripped, his hands tied behind him; the cord which lashed his hands hung upon a pulley at some height above. At the sign of the judge he was hauled up with a frightful wrench, and then violently let fall to the ground. This was called in the common phrase, hoisting. It was the most usual, perhaps the mildest form of torture. Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xii, ch. i.

Hoiſt. v. n. [Norse, hauta.] Leap; caper.

He lives at home, and sings, and hoists, and revels, among his drunken companions.—Rowland and Fletcher, Knight of the Burning Pestle.

Hoiſting. part. uſf. Over-lively.

Butler, Hudibras.
He was confirmed in this opinion upon seeing the holderforth.—Addison.

Holdfast. s. Anything which takes hold; catch; hook; support; hold.

His holdfast was gone: his footing lost.—Bishop Mountague, Appeal to Caesar, p. 18.

The several teeth are furnished with holdfasts suitable to the stress that they are put to.—Ray, On the Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

The broad truncated teeth of the myliobates have their attached surface longitudinally grooved to afford them better holdfast, and the sides of the contiguous teeth are articulated together by serrated or finely undulating sutures, a structure unique in dental organisation.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. ix.

Holdings. s.*1. Tenure; farm.

Holdings were so plentiful, and holders so scarce, as well as the landlord who could not get one to be his tenant.—Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

Whether flax and tillage do not naturally multiply hands, and divide land into small holdings, and well improved?—Bishop Berkeley, Querist, § 98.

2. Hold; influence.

HOLD

Every thing would be drawn from its holdings in the country to the personal favour and inclination of the prince.—Harke, Thoughts on the present Discontents: 1770.

3. Burden or chorus of a song. Obsolete.

The holding every man shall bear, as loud As his strong sides can volley.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 7. The under-song or holding whereof he, it is merry in hall where beads was all.—The Serving Man's Comfort: 1580.

Holding, part. adj. Tenacious.

We see, by the peeling of onions, what a holding substance the skin is.—Bacon.

Holding, verbal abn.

1. Tenure, land, or house rented: (as, 'The tenantry were turned out of their holdings').

2. Resistance: (with out).

As to the holding out against so many alterations of state, it sometimes proceeds from principles.—Collier, On Pride.

Hole, s. [A.S. hol.]

1. Perforation; interstitial vacuity; cave: (as the last, applicable to the habitations of several animals, as the fox, badger, &c.).

The earth had not a hole to hide this deed.

Look upon linen that has small holes in it: these holes appear black, men are often deceived in taking holes for spots of ink; and painters, to represent holes, make use of black.—Boyle.

2. Contemptuous expression for a mean habitation, or place.

When Alexander first beheld the face Of the great cynic, thus he did lament: How much more happy thou, that art content To live within this little hole, than I Who after empire, that vain quarry, fly.—Dryden.

Hole and corner—clandestine: (as, 'A hole and corner meeting').

Take down a hole. Same as take down a Peg (q.v.), the latter being the commoner expression.

He has taken his thoughts a hole lower.—Lyly, Eudymion.

Hole, v. n. Go into a hole.

I have you in a purse-net, Good master Picklock, with your winking brain, And wriggling engine head of maintenance, Which I shall see you hole with very shortly; A fine round head, when these two jaws are off, To trundle through a pulley.

R. Jonson, Staple of News.

Holidam, s. Same as Holidom.

By my holidam here comes Katharine.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, v. 2.

Now on my faith, and holidom, we are beholden to your worship.

R. Jonson, Tale of a Tub.

Holiday, s.

1. Day of some ecclesiastical festival.

The histories, which were writ before the reformation, do frequently speak of transactions happening upon such a holiday, or about such a time, without mentioning the month: relating one thing to be done at Lammastide, and another about Martinmas, &c., so that these names quite left out of the calendar, we might be at a loss to know when several of these transactions happened.—Whitby, On the Common Prayer.

2. Anniversary feast.

This victory was so welcome unto the Persians, that in memorial thereof they kept that day as one of their solemn holidays for many years after.—Knutley, History of the Turks.
Rome's holidays you tell, as if a guest With the old Romans you were wont to feast.

Waller.

3. Day of gaiety and joy.

My approach has made a little holiday, And every face was dressed in smiles to meet me.

Keats, Jane Shore.

4. Day of rest from ordinary occupation.

Suppose you had a mind to persuade Mr. Maittaire to give you a holiday? would you blunty say to him, Give me a holiday?—Lord Chesterfield.

Holiday, adj.

1. Belitting a holiday; gay; cheerful.

Headbands, holiday clothes, and veils, glasses, and scarves.—Knight, Trial of Truth, fol. 7. 1380.
What, have I scaped love-letters in the holiday time of my beauty, and am I now a subject for them?—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

2. Occurring seldom.

Courage is but a holiday kind of virtue, to be seldom exercised.—Dryden.

Holly, adv.

1. Piously; with sanctity.

Vol. I.

HOLL

Thou would'st be great, Art not without ambition; but without The illness should attend it: what thou would'st highly, That would'st thou holly.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 3.

2. Inviolably; without breach.

Friendship, a rare thing in princes, more rare between princes, that so holly was observed to the last of those two excellent men.—Sir P. Sidney.

Holliness, s. Attribute suggested by Holly.

1. Sanctity; piety; religious goodness; state of being hallowed; dedication to religion.

Religion is rent by discords, and the holiness of the professors is decayed, and full of scandal.—Bacon.

Then in full age, and hoary holiness, Retire, great tender, to thy promised bliss. Prior.

We see piety and holiness ridiculed as morose singularities. Boycar.

2. Title of the pope.

I here appeal unto the pope, To bring my whole cause fore his holiness.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII, ii. 4.

His holiness has told some English gentlemen, that those of our nation should have the privilege.

—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Holla, interj. Word used in calling to anyone at a distance.

Holla! stand there. Shakespeare, Othello, i. 2.

Holla, v. n. Cry out loudly.

But I will find him when he lies asleep, And in his ear I'll holla, Mortimer!

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I, i. 3.

What hollings and what stir is this to-day?

Id., Two Gentlemen of Verona, v. 4.

Holla, s.

1. Shout.

Some off holla break List! list! I hear

He's here with a whoop, and come with a holla.

Milton, Comus, 480.

Duke of Buckingham, Rehearsal.

2. Word of command to a horse to stop.

What reeketh he his rider's every stir, His flustering holla, or his stand I say?

Shakespeare, Venus and Adonis.

But I must give my horse the holla here.

Cotton, Woodcock of the Peak.

Holland, s. Linen, originally, made in Holland.

Some for the pride of Turkish court design'd For folded turbans this stiff holland bear.

Dryden, Assa's Mirabilia, eccl.

Hollands, s. See extract.

Gin or Geneva, from juniper (juniper), is a kind of ardent spirit manufactured in Holland, and hence called Hollands gin in this country to distinguish it from British gin. . . . For the . . . details of the manufacture of genuine Hollands, I am indebted to Robert More, Esq. formerly of Underwood, distiller.—L. c., Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hollibock, s. [A.S. hoc mallow; the first element being holy, the plant being introduced from the Holy Land.] Garden plant so called; rose mallow.

Even with this garland made of hollibocks, I cross thy brows from every shepherd's kiss:

Heigh ho! how glad I am to touch thy locks My frolic heart even now a freeman is.

R. Greene, Poems.

Hollibocks far exceed poppies for their durability, and are very ornamental. Mortimer.

Hollirose, s. Plant so called, of the genus Helianthemum; cistus; rock-rose.

Why, hollirose, dost thou of slender frame, And without scent, assume a rose's name?

Tate, Corley.

Hollow, adj. [A.S. hol; German, hohl.]

1. Excavated; having a void space within, as opposed to solid.

It is fortune's use To let the wretched man outlive his wealth, To view with hollow eye and wrinkled brow

An age of poverty. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice.

Some search for hollow trees, and fell the woods.

Dryden.

2. Noisy, like sound reverberated from a cavity.

The southern wind, Now by his hollow whistling in the leaves, Foretells a tempest.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I, v. 1.

Thence issued such a black and hollow roar, As threaten'd from the hinges to leave the door.

Dryden.

3. Not faithful; not sound; not what one appears.

HOLL, {HOLDING

Who in want a hollow friend doth try, Directly seasons him his enemy.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 2.

Hollow church papists are like the roots of nettles, which themselves sting not; but bear all the stinging leaves.—Bacon.

He seem'd For duncy compos'd, and high exploit; But all was false and hollow.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 110.

Used adverbially, as in the colloquial expressions 'He carried it hollow'—he gained the prize without difficulty; 'He was beaten hollow'—was beaten without a chance of success, without effort on the part of the winner, or beyond a doubt.

Hollow, s.

1. Cavity; concavity.

I've heard myself proclaim'd, And by the happy hollow of a tree Escap'd the hunt.

Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 3.

I suppose there is some vault or hollow, or hole, behind the wall, and some passage to it.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

He throws, which troubles with enclosed fear; Whilst from the hollow of his womb proceed

Groans not his own.

Sir J. Ashmole, The Destruction of Troy.

Himself, as in the hollow of his hand, Holding, obedient to his high command,

The deep abyss.

Prior, Solomon.

2. Cavern; den; hole.

Upon the barren hollows, high overshadowing The haunts of savage beasts.

Prior.

3. Pit.

A fine genius for gardening thought of forming such an insight y hollow into so uncommon and agreeable a scene.—Addison.

4. Any opening or vacuity.

He touched the hollow of his thigh.—Genesis, xxi.

5. Passage; canal.

The little springs and rills are conveyed through little channels into the main hollow of the aqueduct.

Addison, Travels in Italy.

Hollow, v. a. Make hollow; excavate.

Trees rudely hollow'd did the waves sustain, Ere ships in triumph plow'd the wat'ry plain.

Dryden.

Multitudes were employed in the sinking of wells, and the hollowing of trees. Spectator.

Hollow, v. n. Shout; hoot.

This uneven judge will wait, and in your ear Will hollow rebel, tyrant, murderer.

Dryden.

I pass for a disaffected person and a murderer, because I do not hoot and hollow, and make a noise.

Addison.

He with his bounds comes hollowing from the stable.

Makes love with nods, and knees beneath a table.

Pope, Epistle to Miss Mount, ep. ii.

Hollow-eyed, adj. Having the eyes sunk in the head.

Death hollow-eyed, With bones sly-dry'd, With his worm-eaten maw,

And his rusty jaw.

Shelton, Poems, p. 257.

A needy, hollow-eyed, sharp-looking wretch.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, v. 1.

Hollow-hearted, adj. Dishonest; insincere; differing in practice from profession.

What could be expected from him but knotty and crooked hollow-hearted dealings?—Hawell, Foxall Forest.

The hollow-hearted, disaffected, And close malignants are detected.

Butler, Hudibras.

Hollow-wort, or Holewort, s. Native plant so called, Corydalis claviculata.

Hollow-wort, or hole-wort, from its hollow root.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hollowly, adv. In a hollow manner; unfaithfully; insincerely; dishonestly.

O earth, bear witness, And crown what I profess with kind event, If I speak true; if hollowly, invert

What best is boded me, to mischief!

Shakespeare, Tempest, iii. 1.

Hollowness, s. Attribute suggested by Hollow.

1. Cavity; state of being hollow.

If you throw a stone or a dart, they give no sound; no more do bullets, except they happen to be a little hollowed in the casting, which hollowness penetrates the air.—Bacon.

I have seen earth taken up by a strong wind, so that there remained great empty hollowness in the place.—Hakewill.

The river... is drawn into little hollownesses.—Jerome Taylor, Sermons.

Earth's hollownesses, which the world's lungs are, Have no more wind than the upper vault of air.—Donne, Poems, p. 144.

2. Deceit; insincerity; treachery.

Thy youngest daughter does not love thee least; Nor are those empty hearted, whose low sound Reverts to hollowness. Shakespeare, King Lear, I. 1. People, young and raw, and soft natured, think it an easy thing to gain love, and reckon their own friendship a sure price of any man's; but when experience shall have shown them the hardness of most hearts, the hollowness of others, and the imposture and ingratitude of almost all, they will then find that a friend is the gift of God, and that he only who made hearts can unite them.—South, Sermons.

Holly. s. [A.S. holcgn, hollen.] Native evergreen so called, Ilex aquifolium.

The leaves of the holly are set about the edges with loud, sharp, stiff prickles: the berries are small, round, and generally of a red colour, containing four triangular striated seeds in each. Of this tree there are several species; some variegated in the leaves, some with yellow berries, and some with white.—Miller.

Fairest blossoms drop with every blast; But the brown beauty will like holly's last.—Gay, Shepherd's Week, Wednesday.

Holly or holm, on the eastern border called holles, ... is a word derived from Latin hler, which, in the middle ages, was confused with her, the holm oak of the ancients, whence the adjective alpinus, and, with the prefixed aspirate hulimus and holm. The form holly will have been the more readily adopted, from the branches of this shrub being used for olive branches, and adorned before the image of Jesus in certain solemnities of the Church that represented His entrance into Jerusalem. Thus in George's Nomenclature—

Here's one the same that, lone alone,
While in the straits he roams,
The people met, and olive boughs
So thick before him strove.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Holm. s. [A.S.] River island; islet; low land by the side of a river. The exact meaning varies with the district, as may be seen from the numerous geographical names, especially in Scandinavia (Holmstrand, &c.), in which it enters as an element of a compound. Land, however, by the side of, or surrounded by, water, is generally, perhaps always, intended.

A little higher up the river was a holm, which divided it into two branches.—Vallant, Tracts.

Holm. s. [A.S. holen = holly.] Tree so called, of the genus Quercus; holm-oak (the word being generally used adjectivally or as the first element of a compound) being the common term.

Under what tree did'st thou take them company-line together? who answered, under a holm tree.—History of Samanah, 18.

The carver holme, the ample seldom inward sound.—Spenser, Runic Queen.

Holocaust. s. [Gr. holos = whole, and causis, from caio = burn.] Burnt sacrifice; sacrifice of which the whole was consumed by fire, and nothing retained by the offerer.

Isaac carried the wood for the sacrifice, which being an holocaust, or burnt offering, to be consumed unto ashes, we cannot well conceive a burden for a boy.—Sir T. Browne.

Let the eye behold no evil thing, and it is made a sacrifice; let the tongue speak no filthy word, and it becomes an oblation; let the hand do no unlawful action, and you render it a holocaust.—Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Eusebius cut a piece from every part of the victim, and by this he made it an holocaust, or an entire sacrifice.—Brown.

Holograph. adj. [Gr. holos = whole, and graphein = writing; graphein = write.] Written as a whole applied to letters of which the contents, as well as the signature, are in the handwriting of a single person, as opposed to letters of which the signature only is writing.

A holograph letter by a man of quality is a true treasure.—Lamb, Letter to Coleridge.

Holograph. s. Holograph letter.
I have got your holograph.—Lamb, Letter to Manwaring.

Holster. s. [A.S. heolster.] Case for a horseman's pistol.

In a rusty holster put what meant
Into his hose he could not get. Bolton, Hudibras.
He would have been as ready as any of his Protestant neighbours to gird on his sword, and to put pistols in his holsters, for the defence of his native land against an invasion of French or Irish Papists.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. viii.

During many months the ground was strewn with skulls and bones of men and horses, and with fragments of hats and shoes, saddles and holsters.—Ibid. ch. x.

Holt. s. [A.S.]

1. Wood; grove; forest.

The wilde forest, the clothed holten with green.

Lord Surrey, Songs, &c., p. 10.

A grove, hull, or wood of such trees.—Mole, Works, v. 65: 1677.

2. In the following extracts the previous editions give hill as the meaning. That the authors may have meant this is probable, the authority of the editor being added. As many woods are on hills, and many hills are wooded, the interpretation may be true. It is, however, more probable that the true meaning of the word has been misunderstood.

O'er holt and heath

We went, through deserts waste, and forests wild.

Keats, Translation of Tasso, viii. 12.

Underneath the holles so hoar.

Old Poem cited by Percy, Reliques of Ancient Poetry, v. 1. 138.

He, whose rustic muse

O'er heath and craggy holt her wing display'd.

Dryden.

Holly. adj. [A.S. hollig.]

1. Good; pious; religious.

See where his grace stands 'twixt two clergymen!

And see a book of prayer in his hand,

True ornaments to know a holly man.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 7.

2. Hallowed; consecrated to divine use.

Bare was his hoary head; one holly hand

Held forth his laurel crown, and one his sceptre.

Dryden.

3. Pure; immaculate.

Common sense could tell them, that the good God could not be pleased with any thing cruel; nor the most holly God with any thing filthy and unclean.—South, Sermons.

4. Sacred.

An evil soul producing holly witness,

Is like a villain with a smiling cheek.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, I. 3.

He has deserv'd it, were it carbuncled

Like holly Phœbus' ear.

Id., Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 8.

Holyone. s.

1. One of the appellations of the Supreme Being, by way of emphasis; applied also to God the Son.

I am the Lord, your Holy-One, the Creator of Israel, your King. Isaiah, xliii. 15.

I know thee who thou art, the Holy-One of God.

Luke, iv. 34.

Nor from the Holy-One of heaven

Refrained his tongue blasphemous.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 350.

2. One separated to the service of God.

And of Levi he said, Let thy Thummim and thy Urim be with thy holly-one.—Deuteronomy, xxxiii. 9.

Homage. s. [N.Fr. homage; Low Lat. homagium, homo = man.]

1. Service paid and fealty professed to a sovereign or superior lord, wherein he who renders it professes himself the man of his superior.

Call my sovereign yours,

And do him homage as obedient subjects.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. iv. 2.

The chiefs, in a solemn manner, did their homages

and made their oaths of fidelity to the earl marshal.

Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

2. Obedience; respect paid by external action.

The gods' great mother, when her heavenly race

Do homage to her.—Sir J. Denham.

A tuft of daisies on a flowery lay

They saw, and chitther'd they bent their way:

To this both knights and dames their homage made,

And due obedience to the daisy paid.

Dryden, The Plower and the Leaf, 300.

Homageable. adj. Subject to homage, Rare.

Of them two, he of Holland, being homageable to none, ... was the more potent.—Howell, Letters, I. 2, 16.

For which he is homageable to the crown of France.—Ibid. I. 6, 12.

Homager. s. One who holds by homage to a superior lord.

Thou blushest, Antony; and that blood of thine

Is Caesar's homager.—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, I. 1.

His subjects, traitors, are received by the duke of Bretagne, his homager.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Hombre. s. Same as Ombre.

It was there that Egalité Orleans roasted partridges on the night when he and the Marquis of Steyne won a hundred thousand from a great personage at hombre.—Thackeray, Vanity Fair, ch. xlvii.

Home. s. [A.S. hām.]

1. One's own house; one's private dwelling.

I'm now from home, and out of that provision

Which shall be needful for your entertainment.

Shakespeare, King Lear, II. 4.

Something like home that is not home is to be desired; it is found in the house of a friend.—Sir W. Temple.

Home is the sacred refuge of our life,

Secur'd from all approach but a wife.

Dryden.

Those who have home, when home they do repair,

To a last lodging call their wand'ring friends.

Id.

2. One's own country.

With honour to his home let Theseus ride,

With love to friend.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, I. 11.

They who pass through a foreign country towards their native home, do not usually give up themselves to the pleasures of the place.—Bishop Atterbury.

3. Place of constant residence.

Flandria, by plenty made the home of war,

Shall weep her crime, and how to Charles restor'd.

Prior, Ode to the Queen, 1704.

Used adjectivally.

a. Domestic, produced at home, or in the same country.

Let the exportation of home commodities be none in value than the importation of foreign.—Bacon.

b. Implying force and efficacy.

Poison may be false;

The home thrust of a friendly sword is sure.

Dryden.

I am sorry to give him such home thrusts; for he lays himself so open, and uses so little art to avoid them, that I must either do nothing, or expose his weakness. Bishop Stillingfleet.

Used adverbially.

a. To one's own habitation.

One of Adam's children in the mount lights

... a glittering substance; home he carries it to

Adam, who finds it to be hard, to have a bright yellow colour, and exceeding great weight.—Locke.

b. To one's own country.

Men in distant regions roam,

To bring politest manners home. Gay, Fables, xiv.

c. Close to one's own bread or affairs.

He that encourages treason lays the foundation of a doctrine, that will come home to himself.—Sir R. E. D'Arigny.

This is a consideration that comes home to our interest.—Addison.

These considerations, proposed in general terms,

you will, by particular application, bring home to your own concern.—Archbishop Wake, Preparations for Death.

d. To the point designed; to the utmost; closely; fully.

Ever since we incessantly thou givest me woof for woof, or, as we say, thou payest me home.—Klopst. 1530.

Crafty enough either to hide his faults, or never to show them, but when they might pay home.—Sir P. Sidney.

Accuse him home and home.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iv. 3.

Men of age object too much, adventure too little,

and seldom drive business home to the full period;

but content themselves with a mediocrity of success.—Bacon.

That counteth up home to the business, and taketh off the objection clearly.—Bishop Sanderson.

Break through the thick array

Of his throng'd legions, and charge home upon him.

Addison.

He makes choice of some piece of morality; and,

in order to press this home, he makes less use of reason.

—Brown.

I can only refer the reader to the authors themselves who speak very home to the point.—Bishop Atterbury.

Homborn. adj.

1. Native; natural.

Though to be thus elemented, arm

Them creatures from homborn intrinsick harm.

Donne.

2. Domestic; not foreign.

Num'rous hands
With homeborn lyce, or taken from foreign lands.
Pope.

Homebred. adj.

1. Native; natural.

God hath taken care to anticipate every man, to draw him early into his church, before other competitors, homebred herds, or vicious customs of the world, should be able to pretend to him.—Hammond, On Fundamentalism.

2. Not polished by travel; plain; rude; artless; uncultivated.

Only to me two homebred youths belong. Dryden.

3. Domestic; not foreign.

But if of danger, which hereby doth dwell,
And homebred evil, ye desire to hear,
I can you tidings tell. Spenser, Faerie Queen.
This once happy land,
By homebred fury rent, long proud'd.

J. Phillips, Cyclo, h.ii.
Homebrewed. adj. Brewed at home, applied to beer and ale, as opposed to brewers' drink.

I drink the virgin lymph, pure and crystalline as it gushes from the rock, or the sparkling beverage homebrewed from malt of my own making; or I indulge with elder, which my own orchard affords.—Smollett, Expedition of Humphrey Clinker.

Homefelt. adj. Inward; private.

Yet that in pleasing slumber hush'd the senses,
And in sweet madness hush'd it of itself;
But such a sacred and homefelt delight,
Such sober certainty of waking bliss,
I never heard till now. Milton, Comus, 200.
Happy next him, who to these shades retires,
Whom nature charms, and whom the muse inspires,
Whom humbler joys of homefelt quiet please,
Successive study, exercise, and ease.

Pope, Windsor Forest.

Homekeeping. adj. Staying at home.

Homekeeping youth have ever homely wit.
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night of Verona, I. 1.

Homeliness. s. Attribute suggested by homely; plainness; rudeness; coarseness. Originally, management; care of home.

wise tapestry may, afar off, show well; which when it comes to be close viewed, discovers an homeliness in texture and faults enough, both in shape and colour. Bishop Hall, Heuristics, p. 51.

Home has opened a great field of railway to men of more delicacy than acuteness of genius, by the homeliness of some of his sentiments.—Johnson.

With regard to the style, I have considered perspicuity not only, as it always must be, the first point, but as one of such momentary importance to such a subject, as to justify the neglect of all others. Proflixity of explanation, homeliness in illustration, and baldness of expression, I have regarded as blemishes not worth thinking of, when any thing was to be gained in respect of clearness.—Archbishop Whately, Logic, pref.

Homelin. s. [?] Fish of the genus Raia (Raia maculata).

In the oviscap homelin the lobes of the large rudimentary gill-plate are reniform.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, vii.

The smooth-skinned spotted ray, called Raia levis and homelin, so long known as the time of Merrett, and one of the most common species along the line of our southern coasts, has not been so well distinguished or so clearly defined by some authors as its obvious characters admit and require.—Farrist, British Fishes.

Homeling. s. Native. Rare.

So that within a while they began to molest the homelings (for so I find the word indigenous to be Englished in an old book that I have, wherein advena is translated also a homeling).—Hudibras, I. (Rich.)

Now there were two legions inarrison for the defence of the city, to wit, Prima Flavia and Prima Parthica, besides many homelings and natural inhabitants.—Holland, Translation of Annals of Marcellinus. (Rich.)

Homely. adj. Plain (in its euphemistic meaning of ill-looking); coarse; rude.

Each place handsome without curiosity, and homely without homeliness.—Sir P. Sidney.

It is for homely features to keep home; They had their name thence. Milton, Comus, 718.

It is observed by some, that there is none so homely but loves a looking-glass.—South, Sermons.
Their homely fare dispatch'd, the hungry band Invade their trenchers next.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 155.

Now Stephen daily entertains
His Chloë in the homely strains. Swift.

Homely. adv. In a homely manner.

It is a beautiful child; homely brought up,
In a rude homely. B. Jonson, New Inn.
Thus like the god his father, homely dress,
He strides into the hall a horrid guest. Dryden.

Homemade. adj. [the m double.] Made at home; not manufactured in foreign parts.

A tax laid on your native product, and home-made commodities, makes them yield less to the first seller.—Locke.

Homoeopathy. s. [Gr. homo = like + pathe = suffering, ailment.] System of medical treatment founded upon the doctrine that the medicine which when given to a person in health will produce certain morbid symptoms, will, when given a person suffering from those symptoms in the ordinary course of disease, cure them; the remedy in disease being like the cause of disease in health.

Medicism, homoeopathy, and phrenology, have now been before the world a sufficient time to be fairly and fully examined by competent judges; and as they have not stood the test of impartial scientific investigation, and therefore have not established themselves in professional opinion, they may be safely, on this ground alone, set down under the head of mock sciences.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. iii.

Homér. s. [Hebrew.] Jewish measure of about three pints.

An homér of barley-wheat shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver. Leviticus, xvii. 16.

Homœtick. adj. Pining for home; an approximate translation of the maladie du pays: (as, 'homœtick schoolboy'.)Homœspeaking. s. Foreible and efficacious speech.

Our Saviour, who had all gifts in him, was Lord to express his indomitable power in what sort him best seemed; sometimes by a mild and familiar discourse; sometimes with plain and impartial homœspeaking.—Milton, Apology for Socrates.

Homœspan. adj.

1. Spun or wrought at home; not made by regular manufacturers.

They sometimes put on, when they go ashore, long, sleeveless coats of homœspan cotton.—Sandys, Travels.

Instead of homœspan coats, were seen
Good pinners, clad with collyerion.
Swift, Récit and Philémon.

2. Not made in foreign countries.

He appeared in a suit of English broad cloth, very plain, but rich; every thing he wore was substantial, honest, homœspan ware. Addison.

3. Plain; coarse; rude; homely; inelegant.

We say, in our homœspan English proverb, He killed two birds with one stone.—Dryden.
Our homœspan authors must forsake the field,
And Shakespeare to the soft Scarlatti yield.

Addison

Homœspan. s. Coarse, inelegant, rude, untaught, rustic man. Obsolete.

What homœspan homœspan have we swaggering here,
So near the cradle of the fairy queen?
Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream, iii. 1.

Homœstall. s. Place of the house; including sometimes a small portion of land adjoining the house.

Through every homœstall and through every yard
(His midnight walks) panting, forlorn he flies.
Samuel Croft, The Chase, b. iii.

Homœstead. s. Homestead; 'farm building about a house.

I do not see thee led into the market-place, or any other part of the city, or thy homœstead of Nazareth, but into the vast wilderness.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations, Christ tempted.

Both house and homœstead into seas are borne,
And rocks are from their old foundations torn.

Dryden.

But the large public thing we had to remark is this: That the twentieth of September 1792 was a raw morning covered with mist; that from three in the morning, Saint-Marcoult, and those villages and homœsteads we know of old, were stirred by the rumble of artillery-vans, by the clatter of hoofs and many-footed tramp of men; all manner of military, patriot and Prussian, taking up positions on the heights of La Laine and other heights; shifting and shoving, seemingly in some dread chess-game; which may the Heavens turn to good!—Carlyle, French Revolution, pt. iii. b. i. ch. vii.

Homeward. adv. Towards home; towards the native place; towards the place of residence.

Then Urania homeward did arise,
Leaving in pain their well-fed hungry eyes.
Sir P. Sidney.

Look homeward, ancel, now, and melt with ruth;
And O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth!

Milton, Lycidas, 183.

Like a long train of snowy swans on high,
Which clap their wings, and cleave the liquid sky,
Which homeward from their wat'ry pastures borne,
They sing, and Asia's lakes their notes return.

Dryden.

Homewards. adv. Homeward.

What now remains,
But that once more we tempt the wat'ry plains,
And, waud'ring homewards, seek our safety thence?
Dryden.

Homicidal. adj. Murderous; bloody.

The troop forth issuing from the dark recess,
With homicidal rage the king oppresses. Pope.

Homicide. s. [from Lat. homicidium = slaughter of a man.]

1. Murder; man killing.

The apostle command to abstain from blood; construe this according to the law of nature, and it will seem, that homicide only is forbidden.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Destruction: (in the following lines it is not proper).

What wonder is't that black detraction thrives?
The homicide of names is less than lives. Dryden.

Homicide. s. [from homicida = slaughterer of a man.] Murderer; manslaughter.

I'd undertake the death of all the world,
So might I live one hour in your sweet bosom.—
If I thought that, I tell thee, homicide.
These nails should rend that beauty from my cheeks.

Shakespeare, Richard III. I. 2.

Hector comes, the homicide, to wield
His conqu'ring arms, with corps to strew the field.
Dryden, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad, 354.

Homilistical. adj. Social; conversible.

His life was holy, and when he had leisure for retirement, severe; his virtues active chiefly, and homilistical; not those lazy sullen ones of the cloyster.—Bishop Atterbury, Character of Luther.

Homilist. s. One who preaches to a congregation.

To this good homilist I have ever been stubborn.
Rowland and Fletcher, Scornful Lady.
The plainest Christian homilist, speaking as the oracles of God.—Bishop Hurd, Works, vol. viii. p. 21.

Homily. s. [Gr. hómilia = intercourse, company, intercommunication.] Discourse read to a congregation.

Homilies were a third kind of readings usual in former times; a most commendable institution, as well then to supply the casual, as now the necessary defect of sermons. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

What tedious homily of love have you wearied your parishioners withal, and never cried, Have patience, good people.—Shakespeare, As you like it, iii. 2.

If we survey the homilies of the ancient church, we shall discern that, upon federal days, the subject of the homily was constantly the business of the day.—Hammond, On Fundamentalism.

Homœcercal. adj. [Gr. hómē like, equal + cercus = tail.] Having an equal tail. In Ichthyology, applied to fishes like the hering, and the majority of existing fish, in which the upper and lower portions of the tail are equal; its opposite being heterocercal, (hetero = another, different), applying to fishes like the sturgeon, wherein the lower division is overlapped by the upper.

The heterocercal configuration is found in all fishes at an early point of their development, giving place to the homœcercal in the osseous fishes, in proportion as their other peculiarities manifest themselves.—Carpenter, Principles of Physiology, § 322 a.

Homogeneous. adj. Same as Homogeneous. Know you the mpor poutick? sapor styptic? or is it the homogeneous or heterogeneous.—B. Jonson, Alchemist, ii. 3.Homœgeneal. adj. Same as Homogeneous. Rare.

The means of reduction, by the fire, is but by congregation of homœgeneal parts.—Heron.

The light, whose rays are all alike refrangible, I call simple, homœgeneal, and similar; and that whose rays are some more refrangible than others, I call compound, heterogeneous, and dissimilar.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Homogeneity. s. Participation of the same principles or nature; similitude of kind.

The mixtures acquire a greater degree of fluidity and similarity or homogeneity of parts.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.
Upon this supposition of only different diameters,

It is impossible to account for the homogeneity or similarity of the secreted liquors.—Cheyne.

Homogeneous. adj. [Gr. ὁμογενής, from ὁμός together, conjoined, in a like manner + γενεῖν = kind.] Having identity, similarity, or uniformity of nature, or kind: (opposed to heterogeneous).

Ice is a similar body, and homogeneous concretion, whose material is properly water.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

An homogeneous mass of gold is easily distinguishable from any other; gold from iron, sulphur from alum, and so of the rest.—Woodward, Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth.

This theory is at least a homogeneous and consistent theory.—Hewell, History of Scientific Ideas, ii. 58: ed. 1838.

Homogeneity. s. Joint nature.

By the driving back of the principal spirits, which preserve the consistence of the body, their government is dissolved, and every part returneth to his nature or homogeneity.—Barrow.

Homologous. adj. Having, or constituting, a homology.

Comparing the homologous or corresponding members on both sides.—Bishop Berkeley, Analyst, § 20.

Homologous. s. Equivalent in the way of homology.

The roof of the mouth is extended posteriorly by three cartilaginous plates: one single and extending backwards, from the posterior interspace of the palatines; this seems to be the homologue of the two median cartilages, called 'palatal' by Dr. Henle, on the roof of the buccal mouth of the Nareine.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

Homology. s. [Gr. ὁλογος = word, principle.] In Comparative Anatomy to the correspondence or equivalence of certain organs, animal or vegetable, to others resembling them in development and relation to the rest of the organism, though not in detail; parts so corresponding being homologous, or the homologies, to one another.

Terms must be constructed so as to be fitted to enunciate general propositions, and terms which imply theoretical views are admissible for this purpose. And hence it happens that the history of terms in any science which has gone through several speculative stages, is really the history of the generalizations and theories which have had currency among the cultivators of the science. This appears in comparative anatomy from what we have been saying. The recent progress of that science is involved in the rise and currency of the terms which have been used by the anatomists whose synonymy Mr. Owen has to discuss; and the reasons for selecting among these, or inventing others, include those truths and generalizations which are the important recent steps of the science. The terms which are given by Mr. Owen in his table to denote the homology of the head and vertebral terms, if they are good terms, because their adoption and use is the only complete way of expressing the truths of homology; namely, of that special homology, according to which all vertebrate skeletons are referred to the human skeleton as their type, and have their parts designated accordingly. But further: there is another kind of homology which Mr. Owen calls general homology, according to which the primary type of a vertebrate animal is merely a series of vertebrae; and all limbs and other appendages are only developments of the parts of one or another of the vertebrae. And in order to express this view, and in proportion as the doctrine has become current amongst anatomists, the parts of vertebrae have been described by terms of a degree of generality which admit of such an interpretation. And here, also, Mr. Owen has proposed a terminology for the parts of the vertebrae, which seems to convey more systematically and comprehensively than those of preceding writers the truths to which they have been tending. . . . Besides these doctrines of special homology by which the bones of all vertebrates are referred to their corresponding bones in the human skeleton, and of general homology, by which the bones are referred to the parts of vertebrae which they represent, Mr. Owen treats of serial homology, the recognition of the same elements throughout the series of segments of the same skeleton; as when we show in what manner the arms correspond to the legs.—Hewell, Novum Organum Rerum.

Only the gradual termination of the similarly insignificant 'as mystaceum' in the osseous fish to its higher form and function in the Salmonoid and Malmacroid species, could have made the homology of this separate bone appreciable in the surgeon.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. vi.

We find, when nature reduces the organs of sight to such minute specks as can give but a feeble idea of the presence of light, sufficient, perhaps, to warn the Amblyopius to retreat to the darker recesses of its subterranean abode; that the optic lobes are not reduced in the same proportion, but retain a form and size, which, as compared with their homologues in other animals, are sufficiently remarkable to suggest a function over and above that of receiving the impressions of visual spectra, and forming the ideas consequent thereon. The anatomical condition of the pre-nucleus, and its homology with the hemispheres of the bird's brain experimented on by M. Flourens, would lead to the belief that it was in this division of the bird's brain that impressions become sensations, and that here was the seat of distinct and tangible ideas.—Ibid., lect. viii.

Homonym. s. [Gr. ὁμός = name.] In Philology, homonyms are words which with a difference of meaning are identical in sound. See Synonym.

Homonymous. adj. Equivocal; having a common name for several things, but having a different definition of each.

It is a rule in art, that words which are homonymous, of various and ambiguous significations, ought ever in the first place to be distinguished.—Archbishop Bramhall, Against Hobbes, p. 19.

As words signifying the same thing are called synonymous, so equivocal words, or those which signify several things, are called homonymous, or ambiguous; and when persons use such ambiguous words, with a design to deceive, it is called equivocation.—Watts, Logic.

Homonymously. adv. In an homonymous manner.

It follows that one word may be, not homonymously, but truly and essentially common to many particulars, past, present, and future; so that, however these particulars may be infinite, and even fleeting, yet language notwithstanding may be definite and steady.—Harris, Hermes, b. iii. ch. iii. (Ord MS.)

Homonymy. s. Equivocation; ambiguity.

Heralds new mould men's names: taking from them, adding to them, melting out all the liquid letters, torturing notes to make them speak, and making words dumb, to bring it to a fallacious homonymy at the last, that their names may be the same with those noble houses they pretend to.—Fuller.

The devil earth-thrims himself in an homonymy, as a fox in the ground; if he be stopped at one hole, he will get out at another.—At, Holy War, p. 272.

Homopathy. s. [Gr. πάσχω = suffering.] Similarity of feeling.

philosopher (Plato, . . .) here further insists upon internal sensations alone, and that homopathy, that sympathy or homopathy, which all animals, to the same purpose; it being one of the same thing in them, which produces pain in the most distant extremities of the body, as in the sole of the foot, and in the crown of the head.—Cudworth, Intellectual System. (Ord MS.)

Homoptera. In Entomology. See Hymenoptera.

Homotony. s. [Gr. root of τείνω = stretch.] Keeping to the same tone; monotonous.

Thomson has often fallen into the homotony of the couplet.—Langhorne, Effusions of Friendship. (Ord MS.)

Hone. s. See Honewort.

Hone. s. [A.S. hæn; Norse, hein.] Whetstone.

A hone and a parer, to pare away grass.
Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.
These snakes they made stiff chancellors
Of all the folks they list on;

They turned barbers into hogs,
And masons into free-stone.

Hallid of St. George for England.

Hone. v. n. [N.Fr. hoiner.] Lament. Rare.
His heart is still with her, to talk of her, admiring, and commending her, lamenting, hoining, wishing himself anything for her sake.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 53.

Honest. adj. [Lat. honestus; N.Fr. honeste.] 1. Upright; true; sincere.

What art thou?—
A very honest hearted fellow, and as poor as the king.
Shakespeare, King Lear, l. 3.

An honest physician leaves his patient, when he can contribute no further to his health.—Sir W. Temple.

This way to relieve ourselves from those sophisms, is an honest and diligent enquiry into the real nature and causes of things.—Watts, Logic.

2. Chaste.

We'll leave a proof by that which we will do,
Wives may be merry, and yet honest too.
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 2.

3. Just; righteous; giving to every man his due.

Tate will subscribe, but fix no certain day;
He's honest, and as wit comes in, will pay. Tate.

4. Creditable; honourable.

No manner of art that was honest.—Sir T. Egton, Governor, fol. 49, b.

Let ours also learn to maintain good works for necessary uses [in the margin, profess honest trades].—Watts, iii. 14.

5. Well-looking; jolly; open. Latinism.

Bacchus ever fair and young; . . .
Flush'd with a purple grace,
He shews his honest face.

Dryden, Alexander's Feast.

Honest fellow. Ironical expression, as good-fellow is sometimes used; denoting a jovial companion.

I was five hours with three merry, and two honest fellows. The former sang catches; and the latter even died with laughing at the noise they made.—Says one of the honest fellows, Let us drink alone. We did so from seven of the clock until eleven.—Tatler, no. 55.

When we say in English, He is an honest man, our meaning is, that he is a knave.—Gerarde, Herball. (Ord MS.)

Honest. v. a. [Lat. honesto.] Adorn; grace;—trifit.

He also did honest and honour the same with his presence.—Archbishop Sandys, &c., fol. 130.

You have very much honesty of my lodging with your presence.—A. Johnson, Epitaph.

Honestation. s. [Lat. honestatio, -onis.] Adornment; grace.

Many countries have brought out with them much of this precious metal of human prudence and sanctity, by which virtuous qualities and honestations they have been more happy than others in their applications to move the minds of men.—W. Montague, Decent Essays, pt. 1, p. 118: 1618.

Honestly. adv. In an honest manner.

It doth make me tremble,
There should those spirits yet breathe, that when they cannot Live honestly, would rather perish basely.

R. Johnson.
For some time past all proposals from private persons to advance the publick service, however honest and innocently designed, have been called flying in the king's face. Swift.

Honesty. s.

1. Justice; truth; virtue; purity.
Thou shalt not have thy husband's lands.—
Why, let honesty shall be no do.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part III., iii. 2.

Goodness, as that which makes men prefer their duty and their promise before their passions or their interest, and is properly the object of trust, in our language goes rather by the name of honesty; though what we call an honest man, the Romans called a good man; and honesty in their language, as well as in French, rather signifies a composition of those qualities which naturally acquire honour and esteem.—Sir W. Temple.

2. Honour; credit.

For the honesty of your shooting.—Ascham, The schooler, h. 1.
You looked some time to have had honesty, pleasures, and commodities.—Bishop Ridley, Farewell to his Friends.

3. Frankness; liberality.

A noble gentleman 'tis, if he would not keep so good a house.—Every man has his fault, and honesty is his.—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iii. 1.

Honeywort. s. Native plant so called, Trinia glaberrima. See extract.

I took the description of this herbe the year 1620, but observed it long before, not knowing the name of it. . . . At length about the year 1621 I saw Mistress Ursula Leigh . . . gather it in the wheat crabs about Mapplethorpe, who told me it was called honeywort, . . . and that her Mistress Charles Leigh, late of Bradling in the Isle of Wight, deceased, taught her to use . . . for a swelling which she had on her left cheek, which for many yeeres would once a yeere at least arise there, and swell with great heat, redness, and itching, until by the use of this herbe it was perfectly cured. . . . This swelling her mother called by the name of a honey, but asking whether such tumours were in this midle usually called honey, she could not tell, by reason she was brought from Bradling aforehand young, and being above twelve yeeres old when she used this medicine.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 1018: 1633.

Honey. s. [A.S. hunig.]

1. Sweet liquid, secreted by bees, so called.

Of honey, the first and thickest kind is virgin honey, not very firm, and of a fragrant smell: it is the first produce of the swarms, obtained by draining the combs without pressing. The second is often almost solid, procured by pressure; and the worst is the common yellow honey, extracted by heating the combs, and then pressing them. In the flowers of plants, by certain glands near the base in the petals, is secreted a sweet juice, which the bee, by means of its proboscis, or trunk, sucks up, and discharges again from the stomach through the mouth into the comb. The honey deposited in the comb is destined for the young offspring; but in hard seasons the bees are reduced to the necessity of feeding on it themselves.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

2. Sweetness; lusciousness.

The king hath found
Aer against him, that for ever mara
A honey of his language.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2.

3. Sweet; sweetness; name of tenderness.

Honey, you shall be well desir'd in Cyprus;
I've found great love amongst them. Oh, my sweet,
I prattle out of fashion, and I dote.

Shakespeare, Othello, ii. 1.

Used adjectively.

Why, honey bird, I bought him on purpose for Thee.—Dryden.

Touching his education and first fostering, some affirm, that he was fed by honey bees.—*Sir W.
Raleigh, History of the World.*

Honey. v. n. Talk fondly.

Nay, but to live

In the rank sweat of an incestuous bed,
Shew'd in corruption, honeying and making love
Over the nasty sty.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 4.

Honeybag. s. See extract.

The honey-bag in the stomach, which bees always fill to satisfy, and to spare, vomiting up the greater part of the honey to be kept against winter.—Grise, Museum.

Honeycomb. s. Cells of wax in which the bee stores her honey.

All these a milk-white honey-comb surround,
Which in the midst the country banquet crown'd.

Dryden.

Honeycombed. adj. Spoken of a piece of ordinance fluted with little cavities by being ill cast.

A mariner having discharged his gun, which was honey-combed, and loading it suddenly again, the powder took fire. Wicmann.

Honeydew. s. Vegetable secretion, of a sweet taste, which collects on the stalks and leaves of the hop and other plants.

There is a honey-dew which hangs upon their leaves, and breeds insects.—Mortimer.
How honey-dews embalm the fragrant morn,
And the fair oak with luscious sweets adorn. Garth.

Honeyflower. c. Plant so called.

It hath a perennial root, and the appearance of a shrub. This plant [honey-flower] produces large spikes of chocolate-coloured flowers in May, in each of which is contained a large quantity of black sweet liquor, from whence it is supposed to derive its name.—Miller.

Honeymoon. s. Honeymoon, this latter being the common term.

Sometimes the parties fly asunder even in the midst of courtship, and sometimes grow cool in the very honeymoon.—Tatler, no. 192.

Honeymoon. s. First month after marriage, when there is nothing but tenderness and pleasure.

And now their honey-moon, that late was clear,
Doth pale, obscure, and tenebrous appear.

Corinna, 1612.

A man should keep his fiery for the latter season of marriage, and not begin to dress till the honeymoon is over.—Addison.

Honey-mouthed. adj. Flattering; using honeyed words.

He must be bold on't, and he shall: the office
Becomes a woman best; I'll take't upon me:
If I prove honey-mouthed, let my tongue blister.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 2.

Honeyrose. s. [Lat. ros, rosis = dew.] Honeydew. Rare, barbarous.

He on a sudden felt love's honey-rose Soak in. Vivian, Virgil: 1632.

Honeystalk. s. [?] Clover.

With words more sweet, and yet more dangerous,
Than baits to fish, or honey-stalks to sheep.

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, iv. 4.

Honeystone. s. [? German direct, honigstein, which it translates.] Mineral so called, yielding 'mellie' (related to honey) acid, being a mellate of alumina.

The honeystone, like amber, belongs to the geological formation of lignites. It has, hitherto, been found clearly in only one locality, at Artern in Thuringia.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Honey-suckle. s.

1. Native climbing and flowering tree of the genus Lonicera; woodbine.

Did her steal into the pleasant bower

Where honey-suckles, ripen'd by the sun,
Forbidden the sun to enter; like so favourites,
Made proud by princes, that advanced their pride
Against the power that bred it.

Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 1.

2. Flower or blossom of the woodbine.

Woodbine that beareth the honey-suckle.—Barret, Alceste: 1590.

A honey-suckle,

The amorous woodbine's offspring.

Sirind and Nephew of The Fatal Cur: 1610.

Then self-bent, and honey-suckle's pound;

With these alluring savours srew the ground.

Dryden.

Honey-tongued. adj. Using soft speech.

This is the flower that smiles on every one,
To show his teeth as white as whines bone;
And consciences, that will not die in debt,
Pay him the due of honey-tongued Bayes.

A bluster on his sweet tongue, with my heart!

Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Honed. adj.

1. Covered with honey.

The bee with honied thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing.

Milton, It Penseroso, 142.

2. Sweet; luscious.

When he speaks,
The air, a charter'd libertine, is still;
And the mute wonder lurketh in men's ears,
To steal his sweet and honied sentences.

Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 1.

The Grecian sophists, as Plutarch tells us, by their singing tones, and honied words, and effeminate phrases and accents, did very often transport their auditors into a kind of bacchical enthusiasm.—Scott, Works, ii. 129.

Honorarium. s. [Lat.] Fee.

Honorarium. s. English form of the preceding.
The fee, or honorarium, which the scholar pays to the master, naturally constituted a revenue of this kind.—A. Smith, Wealth of Nations. (Ord MS.)

Honorary. adj.

1. Done or made in honour of anything; indicative of honour.

There was probably some distinction made among the Romans between such honorary arches erected to emperors, and those that were raised to them on the account of a victory, which are properly triumphal arches.—Addison, Travels in Italy.
This monument is only honorary; for the ashes of the emperor lie elsewhere.—Ibid.

2. Conferring honour without gain; gratuitous; unpaid: (as opposed to salaried).

The Romans abounded with little honorary rewards, that without conferring wealth and riches, gave only place and distinction to the person who received them.—Addison.

3. In Academic language. An honorary degree is a degree conferred in a privileged manner on the strength of royal or noble birth.

Honneur. s. [Fr. honneur; Lat. honor.]

1. Dignity; high rank.

I will promote thee unto very great honour.—
Numbers, xlii. 17.

2. Reputation; fame.

A man is an ill husband of his honour, that en-tereth into any action, the failing wherein may disgrace him more than the carrying of it through can honour him.—Lucan.

3. Title applied to the holders of certain offices: (as the Master of the Rolls, who is addressed as Your honour).

Return unto thy lord,
Bid him not fear the separated counsels:
His honour and myself are at the one;
And at the other is my good friend Caliochy.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 2.

4. Nobleness of mind; scorn of meanness; magnanimity.

Now shall I see thy love; what motive may
Be stronger with thee than the name of wife?
That which upbraideth him, that thee upholds,
His honour. Oh, thine honour, Lewis; thine honour.

If by honour is meant any thing distinct from conscience, 'tis no more than a regard to the censure and esteem of the world.—Rogers.

5. Reverence; due veneration.

This is a duty in the fifth commandment, required towards our prince and our parent, under the name of honour; a respect, which in the notion of it, implies a mixture of love and fear, and, in the object, equally supposes goodness and power.—Rogers.

6. Chastity.

She dwells so securely on the excellency of her honour, that the fall of my soul dares not present itself; she is too bright to be looked against.—Shakespear, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.

7. Dignity of mien.

Two of far nobler shape, erect and tall,
Godlike erect! with native honour clad,
In naked majesty, seem'd lords of all.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 286.

8. Glory; boast.

A late-learned person, the honour of his profession for integrity and learning.—T. Barret, Theory of the Earth.

9. Public mark of respect.

He saw his friends, who, when'd beneath the waves,

Their funeral honours claim'd, and ask'd their quiet graves. Dryden, Translation of the Aeneid.
Such discourses, on such mournful occasions, as these, were instituted not so much in honour of the dead, as for the use of the living. Shaksp. Atterbury.

Numbers engage their lives and labours, some to heap together a little dirt that shall bury them in the end; others to gain an honour, that at best can be celebrated but by an inconsiderable part of the world, and is evanescent and eclipsed by more than his truly given. Archbishop Wake, Preparation for Death.

10. Privileges of rank or birth.

Henry the seventh, truly paying
My father's loss, like a most royal prince,
Restored to me my honours, and, from ruins,
Made my name once more.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. ii. 1.

Then here, sir, if you will a lord,
To do the honour to a word. Pope.

11. Ornament; decoration. Latinitas.

The sire then shook the honours of his head,
And from his brows dumps of oblivion shed.

Dryden.

12. Seignior; lordship.

Being his majesty's steward of his majesty's honour and manor of Woodstock.—Lord Clarendon, Life, Continuation, iii. 92.

Do honour. Treat with respect.

They took thee for their mother,
And every day do honour to thy grave.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iii. 3.

His Grace of Canterbury,
Who holds his state at door, inured pursuivants,
Purses, and footboys. Ha! 'tis he, not I!
Is this the honour they do one another?

Ibid., Henry VIII. v. 2.

Honour. v. a.

1. Reverence; regard with veneration; dig- nity.

He was called our father, and was continually honoured of all men, as the next person unto the king. Ethi. xvi. 11: (apocryphal).
The poor man is honoured for his skill, and the rich man is honoured for his riches.—Eccl. xiv. 2.

How lov'd, how honour'd once, avails thee not.

Pope, Essay to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady.

2. Glorify.

I will harden Pharaoh's heart, that he shall follow
after them; and I will be honoured upon Pharaoh, and upon all his host; that the Egyptians may know that I am the Lord. Exodus, xiv. 1.

Honourable. adj. [Fr. honorable.]

1. Illustrious; noble.

Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, the crowning city, whose merchants are princes, whose travellers are the honourable of the earth? Isaiah, xvii. 8.

2. Great; magnanimous; generous.

Sir, I'll tell you,
Since I am charg'd in honour, and by him
That I think honourable.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

3. Conferring honour.

Think'st thou it honourable for a noble man
Still to remember wrongs?

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 3.

Then warlike kings, who for their country fought,
And honourable wounds from battle brought.

Dryden.

Many of these persons, who put this honourable task on me, were more able to perform it themselves.
—Ibid.

4. Accompanied with tokens of honour.

With this wretched woman overcome
Of anguish, rather than of crime, hath been,
Preserve her cause to her eternal doom;
And in the mean, vouchsafe her honourable tomb.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, Queen.

5. Not to be disgraced.

Here's a Bohemian Thwack carries the com' or down of thy fat woman: let her descend; my chamber are honourable.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Win-dour, iv. 5.

6. Free from taint; free from reproach.

As he was honourable in all his acts, so in this,
that he took Joppa for an haven: *1 Maccabees,
xiv. 5.*

methinks I could not do any where so contented

as in the king's company, his cause being just, and his quarrel honourable.—Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 1.

7. Honest; without intention of deceit.

The angel went again to know if they would entertain their pardon, in case he should come in person, and assure it; they answered, they did conceive him to be so honourable, that from himself they would most thankfully challenge it. Sir J. Heywood.

If that thy heart of love be honourable,
Thy purpose marriage, send me word to-morrow.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

Honourableness. s. Attribute suggested by Honourable; eminence; magnificence; generosity; dignity; honesty.

My next place, of the honourableness of marriage amongst all, he smooths over with a pretended concession.—Bishop Hall, Humour of married Clergy, p. 108.

Peter, moved with the patriarch's persuasions, the equity and honourableness of the cause, . . . took the whole business upon him.—Fletcher, Holy War, p. 11.

To spread the fame of the Gospel in the world; to make it appear lovely in the eyes of all beholders; and to allure the . . . to submit to the honourableness, the gentleness, the easiness of its yoke.—Bishop Sprat, History of the Royal Society, p. 366.

Honourably. adv. In an honourable manner.

1. With tokens of honour.

The re-verend abbot,
With all his convent, honourably receiv'd him.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iv. 2.

2. Magnanimously; generously.

After some six weeks, which the king did honourably interpose, to give space to his brother's intercession, he was arraigned of high treason.—Bacon.

3. Reputably; with exemption from reproach.

'Tis just, ye rods! and what I well deserve:
Why did I not more honourably starve?—Dryden.

Honourer. s. One who honours.

I must not omit Mr. Gay, whose zeal in your concern is worthy a friend and honourer.—Pope.

First, for what concerns our own church: he was a sincere honourer and approver of it. Ward, Life of Dr. Henry More, p. 165.

Honourless. adj. Wanting, destitute or deprived of honour; not honoured.

That religion which renders void the first precept of my text, by taking away the fear of God, will always be for introducing a form of government which renders void the second; by taking away all 'honour from the king.' And so, respectively, will an honourless king promote the worship of a fearless God.—Bishop Warburton, Sermons, xiv.

Hoof. s. [A.S. huf, generally as the second element of a compound, as also it is in English.] Quality; character; condition.

Thou'kest little good,
So vainly to advance thy headless head.
Spenser, Shepherd's Calendar, February.

Hoof. s. [A.S. huf.]

1. Upper covering of a woman's head.

The glasses, and the fine linen, and the hoofs, and the veil.—Isaiah, iii. 28.
In velvet, white as snow, the troop was gown'd;
Their hoofs and sleeves the same.

Dequena, The Flower and the Leaf.

2. Anything drawn upon the head and wrapping round it.

All hoofs make not monks.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 1.

He undertook so to muffle up himself in his hoof, that none should discern him.—Sir H. Bolton.

The lacerta came, from being a military habit, to be a common dress: it had a hoof, which could be separated from and joined to it. Arctinus, Tables of Ancient Coins, Wright, and Miquet.

3. Covering put over the hawk's eyes when he is not to fly.

Ornamental fold that hangs down the back of a graduate, to mark his degree.

Such ministers as are erudites shall wear upon their surplices such hoofs as are agreeable to their degrees.—Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, 88.

Hoof. v. a.

1. Dress in a hood.

To converse veiled and hoofed, and sing like a devout nun.—Arctius, Saul and Simeon at Kedor, p. 318: 167 k.

The robber apron'd, and the person gown'd,
The friar hoofed, and the monarch crown'd,
Pope, Essay on Man, cp. iv. 107.

2. Disguise as in a hood.

But hoofed with the shew of outward loquacity,
Byguiling my simplicity of mind,
He in the end a deadly foe did prove.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 648.

3. Blind us with a hood.

While grace is saying, I'll hoof mine eyes
Thus with my hat, and sigh, and say, Amen.
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 2.

4. Cover.

An hollow crystal pyramid he takes,
In monumental waters dipt above;
Of it a broad extinguisher he makes,
And hoofs the flames that to their quarry strove.
Dryden.

5. Put the covering on the head of a hawk.

Hoofed. part. adj. Shielded, or covered, with a hood.

See him laugh'd at! See him baffled!
As a hoofed hawk, or owl
With light blinded, when the fowl
With their armies flock about her,
Some to beat, and some to flout her.
Sir R. Fanshawe, Translation of Guarini's Pastor Fido.

Hoofman-blind. s. Blindman's buff.

What devil was't,
That thus hath cover'd you at hoofman blind?
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 4.

Hoofwink. v. a.

1. Blind with something bound over the eyes.

They timely hoofwinking themselves from seeing his faults, he often abused the virtue of courage to defend his foul vice of injustice. Sir P. Sidney.
Prejudice so that rascally hoofwinks men's minds as to keep them in the dark, with a belief that they are more in the light. Locke.

2. Cover; hide.

Be patient, for the prize I'll bring thee to Shall hoofwink this misbalance.
Shakespeare, Tempest, iv. 1.

3. Deceive; impose upon.

She delighted in infancy, which often she had used to her husband's shame, filling all men's ears, but his, with reproach; while he, hoofwinked with kindness, least of all men knew who struck him.—Sir P. Sidney.

Hoof. s. [A.S. hōf.] Hard horny substance on the feet of gregarious animals.

With the hoofs of his horses shall he tread down all thy streets.—Isaiah, xlviii. 11.
The bull and ram know the use of their horns as well as the horse of his hoofs.—Dr. H. More.

Plural hooves.

The gravel at the bottom of the river being raised and removed by the heavy hooves of the cattle, was taken down the river to a place where by great good hap there was also a ford, and there gathered together in a heap, had in such sort raised the depth of the channel, that it made as it were a shift for their commodious passage.—Knutler, History of the Turks, 163. (Ord MS.)

Hoof. v. n. Walk; move by leisurely steps; go on foot.

To hoof it over as many weary miles, . . .
As'er the bravest and fiercest of the woods.
Elphinstone, from Noddy to Sir W. Scott's Lady of the Lake.

Hoof-bound. adj. See extract.

A horse is said to be hoof-bound when he has a pain in the fore-foot, occasioned by the dryness and contraction for narrowness of the horn of the quarters, which straitens the quarters of the hoofs, and oftentimes makes the horse lame. A hoof-bound horse has a narrow heel, the sides of which come too near one another, inasmuch that the flesh is kept too tight, and has not its natural extent.—Farrier's Dictionary.

Hoofed. adj. With hoofs.

Among quadrupeds, the deer is the swiftest; of all the hoofed the horse is the most beautiful; of all the clawed, the lion is the strongest.—Grew.

Hook. s. [A.S. hōc, hōc.]

1. Anything bent so as to catch hold.

This falling net, for that they had not far enough undermined it, they assayed with great hooks and strong ropes to have pulled it down. Knutler, History of the Turks.

2. Curved wire on which the bait is hung for fishes.

Like unto golden hooks,
That from the foolish fish their baits do hide.
Spenser.

3. Snare; trap.

A shop of all the qualities that man
Loves woman for, besides that hook of wiving,
Fairness, which strikes the eye.
Shakespeare, Cymbeline, v. 5.

4. Broad-bladed plain-edged sickle for reaping; the true sickle being narrow-bladed, and slightly serrated at the edges.

Peas are commonly reaped with a hook at the end of a long stick.—Mortimer.

5. Any instrument to cut or lop with.

Not that I'd lop the beauties from his book,
Like slashing Bentley with his desperate hook.
Pope, Imitations of Horace, b. ii. ep. i.

Off the hooks. In disorder.

My doublet looks,
Like him that wears it, quite off o' the hooks.
Clearland.

She was horribly bold, meddling, and expensive, easily put off the hooks, and monstrous hard to be pleased again.—Sir E. L. Estlin.

While Sheridan is off the hooks,
And friend Delany at his books. Swift.

Hook or crook. One way or other; by any expedient; by any means direct.

For all your braggs, hooks and crooks, you have such a fall, as you shall never be able to stand upright again.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, fol. 311.

That which her size had wrapp'd by hook and crook.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, v. 2. 27.
Master of almost two millions yearly, what by hook or crook.—Milton, Eikonoclastes, ch. xi.
Which he by hook or crook had author'd,
And for his own inventions feather'd.
Hutler, Hutlubs.

He would bring him by hook or crook into his quarrel.—Dryden.

The phrase is very ancient in our language, although ascribed to the names of two learned judges, in the time of Charles the First, Hook and Crook, implying, that a difficult cause was to be gotten either by Hook or Crook. See observations on Spenser by Warton, who says that the phrase occurs in Skelton; and that the form was not then invented as a proverb, but applied as a pun.—Todd.

Hook. v. a.

1. Catch with a hook.

The huge jack he had caught was served up for the first dish: upon our sitting down to it, he gave us a long account how he had hooked it, played with it, foiled it, and at length drew it out upon the bank.—Addison.

2. Entrap; ensnare.

3. Draw as with a hook.

I can hook to me. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 3.

4. Draw by force or artifice.

There are many branches of the natural law no way reducible to the two tables, unless hooked in by tedious consequences.—Norris.

Hook. v. n. Bend; have a curvature.

Her bull hooks, and bends downwards.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 383.

Hookah. s. [Indian.] Pipe for tobacco, with long flexible tube, so called.

The colonel plays a good knife and fork at tiffin, and resumes those weapons with great success at dinner. He smokes his hookah after both meals, and pulls away as quietly while his wife scolds him, as he did under the fire of the French at Waterloo.—Thackeray, Family Fair, ch. xlii.

Hooked. adj.

1. Bent; curved.

Gryps signifies eagle or vulture; from whence the epithet gryps, for an hooked or aquiline nose.—Sir T. Herbert.

Now thou threaten'st, with unjust decree,
To seize the prize which I so dearly bought;
Mean match to thine; for still above the rest,
Thy hook'd rapacious hands usurp the best.
Dryden.

Caterpillars have claws and feet: the claws are hooked, to take the better hold in climbing from twig to twig, and hanging on the backside of leaves.—Grew.

2. Furnished with hooks, or any instrument to cut with.

The hooked chariot stood,
Unstain'd with hostile blood.
Milton, Ode on the Nativity.

Hookheal. s. [see extract.] Native plant so called; slough-heal; self-heal; Prunella vulgaris.

Hookheal, from its being supposed, on the doctrine of signatures to heal wounds from a bill-hook, which its curule was thought to resemble.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hooknose. s. Curved nose, sometimes, though not necessarily always, catachrestic for hawk-nose.

Mr. Barton was immediately accented by a person well stricken in years, tall, and raw-boned, with a hook-nose, and an arch leer, that indicated, at least, as much cunning as sagacity.—Smollett, Expedition of Humphry Clinker.

Hooknosed. adj. Having the aquiline nose rising in the middle. See Hooknose.

I may justly say with the hook-nosed fellow of Homo there, Caesar, I came, saw, and overcame.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 3.

Hoop. s. [A.S. hōp.]

1. Anything circular by which something else is bound, particularly casks or barrels.

Thou shalt prove a shelter to thy friends,
A hoop of gold to bind thy brothers in,
That the united vessel of their blood
Shall never leak.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 4.
To view so lewd a town, and to refrain,
What hoops of iron could his spleen contain?

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.
And learned Athens to our art must stoop,
Could she behold us tumbling through a hoop.

Pope.

2. Whalebone with which women extend their petticoats; farthingale.

At coming in you saw her stoop,
The entry brush'd against her hoop. Swift.
All that hoops are good for is to clean dirty shoes,
and to keep fellows at distance. Richardson, Clarissa.

My new maid promises very well, and she has a sprightliness without pettiness that pleases me well, and wears no hoop—no much for domestics. Life and Correspondence of Mrs. Delany, edited by Lady Llanover.

3. Anything circular.

I have seen at Rome an antique statue of Time, with a wheel or hoop of marble in his hand. Adrian, Travels in Italy.

Cock-a-hoop. Improper for Cock-a-whoop. See Cock.

Hoop. v. a.

1. Bind or enclose with hoops.

The casks for his majesty's shipping were hooped as a wine-cask, or hooped with iron. Sir W. Raleigh.

I could never make a cask to be hooped. I had a small runlet or two, as I observed before; but I could never arrive to the capacity of making one by them, though I spent many weeks about it: I could neither put in the heads, nor join the staves so true to one another as to make them hold water; so I gave that also over. DeFoe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

2. Encircle; clasp; surround.

I hoop the firmament, and make
This my embrace the zodiac. Chaucer, Canterbury Tales.
That shelly guard, which hoops in the eye, and hides the greater part of it, might occasion his mistake. Gree.

Hooper. s. One who hoops tubs; cooper.

Every tinker, taylor, hooper, hostler, cardmaker, and horsekeeper, might as they did compare in learning, and all other offices, above a doctor of divinity. Martin, Marriage of Priests, li. li. b. 155.

Hooper. s. Wild swan; whistling swan; elk; Cygnus ferus.

The hooper, so called, on account of the peculiar note uttered by this bird, is a winter visitor of the British islands. Farrell, British Birds.

Hoopers'-hide. s. Explained in Nares as another term for 'the game more usually called blind-man's buff. Evidence, however, in support of this view is wanting. The etymology which the editor suggests is 'Whoopers! hide!' i.e. 'Let those who cry whoop conceal themselves;' which makes it more probable that Hide-and-seek is the game intended.

But Robin, finding him silly,
Most friendly took him aside,
Till while that his wife with Willy
Was playing at hoopers' hide.

The Winchester Wedding, (Nares by H. & W.)

Hooping-cough. s. [whooping, from the character of the cough. The spelling with h, with which the pronunciation agrees, though by no means exclusively adopted, is prevalent.] Disease so called, in medical Latin Pertussis.

Numerous and various opinions have been held respecting the pathology of hooping-cough, of which, however, we can but give a short summary. Thus it has been imputed to the presence of a subtle and irritating vapour, or an infectious morbid principle acting directly on the respiratory organs and stomach;—to gastric disorder and spasm; the lungs being affected sympathetically;—to a nervous irritation, and generally giving rise to a peculiar kind of catarrh, attended with convulsive action of the glottis and diaphragm;—to spasmodic irritation of the stomach primarily, and of the lungs and diaphragm sympathetically;—to inflammatory irritation of the stomach, extended to the bronchi, &c.;—to irritation of the pneumogastric nerves extended to the diaphragm and stomach, giving rise to forcible expiratory efforts and vomiting respectively; the latter relaxing, and being antagonistic to, the spasmodic state of the respiratory organs; to irritation of the phrenic nerve, and a morbid state of the diaphragm, extended to the rest of the organs of respiration, and to the stomach; to excited irritability of the lungs, as well as of the diaphragm and stomach; or to a peculiar atmospheric miasm affecting chiefly the intercostal, pneumogastric, and recurrent nerves;—to a spasmodic state of the larynx and diaphragm superadded to a common cough;—to a specific catarrhal inflammation seated in the trachea and bronchi, accompanied with spasm of the trachea and glottis;—to an inflammatory state of the bronchi, being a variety of bronchitis, or to a state which should be regarded as a variety of pulmonary catarrh; whilst it is imputed the disorder to inflammatory irritation of the brain, or of its meninges, or both; or to cerebral irritation consequent upon inflammation of the bronchi, the characteristic hoop occurring when the cerebral irritation has become local. From my researches into the path ology to 1825, I was led to consider the morbid oblongata of its meninges early implicated in this disease. Copland, Dict. of Practical Medicine.

Hoōpōo. s. [Lat. hupupa; Gr. ἡοῦπος.] Bird so called of the genus Epos.

'Vanuolus' (the hupping) is a new-made name of the French 'vanuolus,' which bird, by a great mistake, hath been generally taken to be the hupupa of the ancients, which is now by all acknowledged to be the hoopoo. Rap, Dictionary of Zoology, p. 22.
The folicles to which is due the peculiar colour of certain birds, as e.g. the hoopoe, Muscovy duck, black vulture, &c., are probably somewhat diffused on parts of the integument. Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrata.

1. Shout in contempt.

A number of country folks happened to pass thereby, who hollowed and hooped after me as at the arrantest coward. Sir P. Sidney.

Matrons and girls stand hoop at thee no more. Dryden.

2. Cry as an owl.

Some keep back
The clamorous owl, that nightly hoops and wonders
At our quaint sports.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 3

Hoop. v. a. Drive with noise and shouts.

We hooped him; but, like toward holders gave way to yonder clusters,
We hooped him out of the city.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 6.

The owl of Rome, whom boys and girls will hoop!
That were I set up for that wooden god,
That keeps our gardens, could not fright the crows,
Or the least bird, from mating on my head.

Partridge and his clan may hoop me for a client and impostor, if I fail in any particular of moment. Swift.

Francis [St.] concealed himself in a cave, where he lay hid for a month in solitary prayer. He returned to Assisi, looking so wild and haggard that the rabble hooped him as he passed and pelted him with mire and stones. Julian, History of Latin Christianity, li. ch. x.

Crisp had committed a great error; but he had paid with a very slight penance. His play had not been hooped from the stage. It had, on the contrary, been better received than many very estimable performances have been, than Johnson's Trane, for example, or Goldsmith's Goodnatured Man. Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Dunc and Letters of Madame de Arleberg.

Hoop. s. Clamour; shout; noise.

Its assertion would be entertained with the hoop of the rabble. Glaucill, Synopsis of the Works of Swift.

Hooping. v. verbal abs. Shouting.

How loud hoop, hooping or whooping; voices whereof whoop are scarce, or infamous old women discovered. Colgrave.

With hooping and shouting we pierce through the sky,
And Echo turns huntress, and doubles the cry.

Dryden.
They were received by a great multitude with such hooping and exclamation that they thought it advisable to retire with all speed. Macaulay, History of England, ch. ix.

Hop. v. n. [A.S. hoppian.]

1. Dance.

What good doth all that dancings of young women holding upon men's arms, that they may hop the higher? Northbrooke, Treatise against Dancing,
p. 132.

2. Jump; skip lightly.

Go, hop me over every kennel home;
For you shall hop without my custom, &c.
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iv. 3.
Your Ben and Fletcher, in their first young flight,
Did no Volpone, nor no Arlecchino write;
But hopped about, and short excursions made
From bough to bough, as if they were afraid.

Dryden.

I am highly delighted to see the jay or the thrush
hopping about my walks. Speckard.

3. Leap on one leg.

Men with heads like dogs, and others with one humer fast alone, whereupon they did hop from place to place. Shakspeare.

I always beat him at three jumps; but he could hop upon one leg further than I. Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield.

4. Walk lamely, or with one leg less nimble or strong than the other; limp; halt.

The limping smith once had the sudden feast,
And hopping here and there, himself a jest,
Put in his word.

Dryden, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad.

5. Move; play.

Softly feel
Her feeble pulse, to prove if any drop
Of living blood yet in her veins did hop.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Hop. s. Dance; jump; light leap; spring on one leg.

When my wines are on, I can go above a hundred yards at a hop, step, and jump. Johnson.

Hop. s. [A.S. hoppa.] Native plant, used to give bitterness to beer and ale, so called, of the genus Humulus: (often used adjectivally, or as the first element of a compound).

If hop yard or orchard ye mind for to have,
For hop poles and creepers in hoping to save,
Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Hop. v. n. Impregnate with hops.

He was in October, and hop it for long keeping. Marston, Household.

To increase the milk, diminished by fleshment, take malt-drink not much hopped. Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Hopbine. s. Stem of the hop: (in the extract incorrectly bind).

It is made febrile without benefit of clerry, maliciously to cut any hop-binds growing in a plantation of hops. Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

Hope. s. [A.S. hōpa.]

1. Expectation of some good; expectation indulged with pleasure.

Hope is that pleasure in the mind which every one finds in himself, upon the thought of a profitable future enjoyment of a thing, which is apt to delight him. Locke.

There is hope of a tree, if cut down, that it will sprout again. Job, xiv. 7.

Sweet hope! kind cheat! fair fallacy! by thee
We are not where or what we are;
But what and where we would be; thus art thou
Our absent presence, and our future now. Franklin.
Young men look rather to the past age than the present, and therefore the future may have some hopes of them. Swift.

2. Confidence in a future event, or in the future conduct of any person.

It is good, being put to death by men, to look for hope from God, to be raised up again by him. 2 Maccabees, vii. 18.

Blessed is he who is not fallen from his hope in the Lord. Ezekiel, xiv. 2.

3. That which gives hope; that on which the expectations are fixed, as an agent by which something desired may be effected.

I might see from far some forty truncheoners draw to her succour, which were the hope of the Strand, where she was quartered. Shakespeare, Henry VIII. v. 3.

4. Object of hope.

Thy mother felt more than a mother's pain,
And yet brought forth less than a mother's hope;
To wit, an indigested morsel of hum.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. v. d.
She was his care, his hope, and his delight,
Most in his thought, and never in his sight.

Dryden, Sigismund and Gratiana.

Hope, as in Forlorn Hope. [from German hoffen = mass of men.] See Forlorn.

Hope. v. n. [A.S. hōpian.]

1. Be in expectation of some good.

Hope for good success, according to the efficacy of the causes and the instrument; and let the husbandman hope for a good harvest. Jeremy Taylor, Rules and Exercises of Holy Living.

My muse, by storms long tost,
Is thrown upon your hospitable coast;
And finds more favour by her ill success
Than she could hope for by her happiness. Dryden.

2. Place confidence in another.

He shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord. Psalms, cxxi. 24.

Hope. v. a. Expect with desire.
Faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.—Hebrews, xi. 1.
So stands the Thracian herdsmen with his spear
Full in the sap, and hopes the hunted bear.
Dryden.

Hopeful. adj.

1. Promising; likely to obtain success; likely to come to maturity; likely to gratify desire, or answer expectation.

You serve a great and gracious master, and there is a most hopeful young prince whom you must not desert.—Hamlet.

They take up a book in their declining years, and grow very hopeful scholars by that time they are threescore.—Addison.

2. Full of hope; full of expectation of success.

Men of their own natural inclination hopeful and strongly convicted, whatsoever they took in hand.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

I was hopeful the success of your first attempts would encourage you to make trial also of more nice and difficult experiments.—Boyle.

Still must the wound'd Telemachus sustain,
If, hopeful of your aid, he hopes in vain.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey.

Hopefully. adv. In a hopeful manner.

1. In such a manner as to raise hope; in a promising way.

They were ready to renew the war, and to prosecute it hopefully, to the reduction or suppression of the Irish.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

2. With hope; without despair.

From your promising and generous endeavours we may hopefully expect a considerable enlargement of the history of nature.—Gillette.

Hopefulness. s. Attribute suggested by Hopeful; promise of good; likelihood to succeed.

Set down beforehand certain signatures of hopefulness, or characters, whereby may be timely described what the child will prove in probability.—Sir H. Wotton, On Education.

Hopeless. adj.

1. Wanting hope; being without pleasing expectation; despairing.

Are they indifferent, being used as signs of immoderate and hopeless lamentation for the dead?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Hopeless of ransom, and condemn'd to lie
In duresses, doom'd a lingering death to die.
Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, i. 161.

2. Giving no hope; promising nothing pleasing.

The hopeless word of never to return.
Breath'd I against thee upon pain of life.
Shakespeare, Richard II. i. 3.

Hopelessly. adv. In a hopeless manner.

Is your last hope past to mollify Morecraft's heart about your mortgage?—Hopelessly past. Ben Jonson and Fletcher, Successful Lady.

Scarcely any thing in history is more melancholy than that late and solitary gloom, lighting up the close of a life which had dawned so splendidly, and which had so early become hopelessly troubled and gloomy.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xvii.

Various flocks will look up at you weak by weak, hopelessly blank of all interest or intelligence.—Representations of a Country Parson, ch. i.

Hope. s. One who hopes.

I expect all hopes, who turn the scale, because the strong expectation of a good certain salary will outweigh the loss by bad rents.—Swift.

Hopefully. adv. With hope.

One sign of despair is the presumptuous contempt of the condition which is the ground of hope; the going on not only in terrors and amazement of conscience, but also boldly, hopefully, and confidently in wild habits of sin.—Hammond.

Hopeful. s. [Gr. ἐλπίτης, from ἐλπίς = arm, weapon.] Heavy-armed soldier.

Without the latter he could not do his duty as an hopeful in the ranks for the defence of his country; without the former he could not escape danger to his fortune or honour, and humiliation in the eyes of his friends, if called before a hopeful; nor could he lend assistance to any of those friends who might be placed under the like necessity.—Grote, History of Greece, pt. ii. ch. lxvii.

Hope. s. One who hops.

I conceive, a female hope, or dancer, was called a hope.—Tyrrhitt, Notes on Chaucer.

Hope. s. [?] Box or open frame of wood into which the corn is put to be ground, or set out, in a mill, for grinding.

The mill of the lake Asphaltites shooteth into perfect cubes. Sometimes they are pyramidal and plain, like the hopper of a mill.—Greville.

Granivorous birds have the mechanism of a mill: their maw is the hopper which holds and softens the grain, letting it drop by degrees into the stomach.—Arbuthnot, on the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Just at the hopper will I stand,
In my whole life I never saw a grain of ground,
And mark the clock how justly it will sound.
Batterton.

Hopping. verb. abs. Meeting of persons intending to dance.

Their dances were spiritual, religious, and gaily, not after our hoppings, and leppings, and intermingling hues, men with women.—Northbrooke, Treatise against Dancing, p. 118.

In the north of England, . . . meetings are still kept up under the name of hoppings.—Brand, Popular Antiquities, ii. 428.

Hopscootch. s. Game so called.

Horal. adj. [Lat. hora = hour.] Relating to the hour.

Howe'er reduced and plain,
The watch would still a watch remain;
But if the horal orbit ceases,
The whole stands still, or breaks to pieces.
Prior, Alma.

Horary. adj.

1. Relating to an hour.

I'll draw a figure that shall tell you
What you perhaps forgot to tell you,
By way of horary inspection,
Which some account our worst erection.
Bulter, Hudibras.

In his answer to an horary question, as what hour of the night to set a fox-trap, he has discussed, under the character of Reynard, the manner of surprising all sharpers.—Tidder.

2. Continuing for an hour.

When, from a basket of summer-fruit, God by Amos foretold the destruction of his people, thereby was declared the propinquity of their desolation, and that their tranquillity was of no longer duration than those horary or soon decaying fruits of summer.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Hording. s. See Hurdle.

Horde. s. [Mongolian, orda.] Clan; migratory crew of people.

Such were the horda among the Goths, the clans in Scotland, and septs in Ireland.—Sir W. Temple, Introduction to the History of England.

Horehound. s. [see extract.] Native plant so called, aromatic and medicinal, of the order Labiata, so called, of the genus Marrubium.

Horehound has its leaves and flower-cup covered very thick with a white hoariness; it is famous for the relief it gives in most asthmas, of which a thick and viscid matter is the cause; but it is now little used.—Sir J. Hall, Materia Medica.

Pale horehound, which he holds of most especial use.—Dryden, Polydoron, song 13.

Horehound, from A.S. hord-hanc, from hord, a hare, and hanc, an unmeaning word, now replaced with hound. In one MS. the reading is hord-hantig, hord-hantig. The name may, perhaps, be a corruption of Latin horreus, the plant having been regarded as of great efficacy in cases of stranguary and dysuria.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Horizon. s. [Gr. ὁρίζων, that which terminates, from ὁρίζω = a boundary.] Line that terminates the view.

The horizon is distinguished into sensible and real: the sensible horizon is the circular line which limits the view; the real is that which would bound it, if it could take in the hemisphere.—Tidd.

With the accent on the first syllable, incorrectly if we look at the quantity of the i, which is long; but in conformity with théâtre, scénator, and most other words in the same condition.

When the morning sun shall raise his ear
Above the border of this horizon,
We'll forward towards Warwick and his mates.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. iv. 7.

She began to cast with herself from what coast this blazing star should first appear, and at what time it must be upon the horizon of Ireland.—Bacon.

Soon the sun arose with beams so bright,
That all the horizon laugh'd to see the joyous night.
Dryden.

When the sea is worked up in a tempest, so that the horizon on every side is nothing but fanning billows and floating mountains, it is impossible to describe the agreeable horror that rises from such a prospect.—Addison.

Next morning, therefore, by what time the sun
With glittering rays had gild the horizon.
Sylvester, In Barbas, 418. (Ord 218.)

When once the sun has come near enough to the zenith, and remains above the horizon long enough to give more warmth during one diurnal rotation than the counteracting cause, the earth's radiation, can carry off, the more continuance of the cause would progressively increase the effect, even if the sun came no nearer and the days grew no longer; but in addition to this, a change takes place in the accidents of the cause, its series of diurnal positions tending to increase the quantity of the effect.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, bk. xv. § 2.

Horizontal. adj.

1. Near the horizon.

As when the sun, new risen,
Looks through the horizontal misty air,
Shorn of his beams; or from behind the moon,
In slim eclipses, dim dusky twilight sheds
On half the nations.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 804.

2. Parallel to the horizon; on a level.

An obelisk erected, and golden horua placed horizontal about it, was brought out of Egypt by Augustus.—Sir T. Browne.

The problem is reduced to this: what perpendicular height is necessary to place several ranks of rows in a plane inclined to a horizontal line in a given angle?—Arbuthnot, Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Horizontally. adv. In a direction parallel to the horizon.

As it will not sink into the bottom, so will it neither float above, like lighter bodies; but, being near in weight, lie superficially, or almost horizontally unto it.—Sir T. Browne.

The ambient ether is too liquid and empty to impel them horizontally with that prodigious celerity.—Hentley, Scrimous, vii.

Horn. s. [A.S.]

1. Hard bodies which grow on the heads of some graminivorous quadrupeds, and serve them for weapons.

No beast that hath horns hath upper teeth.—Bacon.

2. An instrument of wind-music first made of horns.

The squire ran nicher to approach,
And wind his horn under the castle-wall,
That with the noise it shook as it would fall.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

There's a post come from my master, with his horn full of good news.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

The golden . . . to her crooked horn,
Such as was then by Latin shophoria borne,
Adds all her breath: the rocks and woods around,
And mountains, tremble at th' infernal sound.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 715.

3. Extremity of the waxing or waning moon, as mentioned by poets.

She blest the bed, such fruitfulness convey'd,
That ere ten moons had sharpen'd either horn,
To crown their bliss, a lovely boy was born.
Dryden.

4. The feelers of a snail: (whence the proverb, 'To pull in the horns,' to repress one's ardour).

Love's feeling is more soft and sensible,
Than are the tender horns of cockled snails.
Shakespeare, Henry's Labour's lost, iv. 3.

Antidius.

Hearing of our Marcian's banishment,
Thrust forth his horns again into the world,
Which were unsheld when Marcian stood for Rome,
And durst not once peep out.—Id., Coriolanus, iv. 6.

5. Drinking-cup.

They attended the banquet, and served the heroes
With horns of mead and ale.—Mason, Notes on Gray's Poems.

6. Winding stream.

With sevenfold horns mysterious Nile
Surrounds the skirts of Egypt's fruitful soil.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, iv. 400.

7. Antler of a cuckold.

If I have horns to make one mad, let the proverb go with me, I'll be horn-mad.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 5.

Merchants, venturing through the main,
Slight pirates, rocks, and horns for gain.
Bulter, Hudibras.

Horn-mad. Perhaps mad as a cuckold.

I am glad he went not in himself: if he had, he would have been horn-mad.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, i. 4.

Horn-mad, mean of them, to let others lie with their wives, and wink at it.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, to the reader.

Horn. v. a. Invest with horns.

I not repent me of my late disguise.—
If you can horn him, sir, you need not.
B. Jonson, Volpone.

Horn with horn; horn under horn. This is a combination applied to that kind of common-right wherby cows and oxen were turned out on commons extending over or lying within the boundaries of more than one parish.

The commoning of horns with horns was properly when the inhabitants of several parishes let their common herds run upon the same open spacious commons; and therefore that there might be no dispute upon the right of tithes, the bishop ordains that the cows should pay all profit to the minister of the parish where the owner lived.—Tomlin, Law Dictionary, Grainger.

Horn-shavings. s. pl. Scrapings or raspings of the horns of deer; hartshorn.

What had she then?—Only a bit of the mother; They burnt old shoes, worse-fathers, assa-fetida, A few horn-shavings, with a bone or two, And she is well again. R. Johnson, Mynnetick Lady.

Horn-silver. s. In Mineralogy. Chloride of silver.

Hornsilver is rare in the European mines; but it occurs in great quantity in the district of Zautiens, Fresnillo, and Oatague in Mexico. Cr., Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hornbeam. s. Native tree so called.

Betulus, or the hornbeam tree, grows great and very like unto the elm, or hazel tree, having a great body; the wood or timber whereof is better for arrows or shafts, pulleys for mills, and such like devices, than elm or with hazel; for in time it waxeth so hard that the toughness and hardness of it may be rather compared to horn than unto wood, and therefore it was called hornbeam or hardbeam.—Gerarde, Herbal, p. 179: 1633.

The hornbeam is indigenous to a great part of England, and abounds in Essex, Kent, Norfolk, &c.; it is also common in parts of Wales, in Lancaster, and in the north midland counties; or it does not, however, extend to the northernmost counties; nor do we think it truly indigenous to Scotland; although Sir W. Hooker includes it in his Flora Scotica. . . . It is also a native of Ireland. Sedg., British Forest Trees.

Hornbeam, or hornbeech, apparently from Latin 'ornus,' with the usual prefix of an aspirate, the tree having by the older botanists been classed under that genus.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Hornbill. s. Bird so called, of the genus Buceros.

The epiderm is in some places continued as a simple layer over the corium, following its wrinkles and folds, as around the naked necks of some vultures. It is moulded upon the bony mandibles to form the beak, and in some birds adheres to osseous protuberances on the cranium, where it forms a species of horn; and it is remarkable that these instances occur chiefly in those orders of birds, the Cuculiformes and Rosiformes, which are most analogous to the ruminantia among quadrupeds: the cassowary and helmeted curassow are examples. The hornbills are, however, instances in the vulturiform, and the kamichi in the grallatoriform order.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates, ch. xxii.

Hornblende. s. [German direct, blende.] Mineral so called. See extract.

Hornblende is also a mineral abundantly distributed in several igneous and altered rocks. It is characterised by its dark green or velvet black colour, its peculiar form of crystallisation, and its shining lustre. It is opaque and tough, but yields pretty easily to the knife. It contains a considerable portion of iron (the blacker varieties especially) combined with silica, alumina, lime and magnesia. It has a distinct cleavage and a coarse uneven fracture, and yields a peculiar smell when breathed upon. Auzite is another name for the same mineral, distinguished from hornblende by its higher lustre, greater hardness, and conchoidal fracture, and is more frequently found in volcanic rocks of comparatively modern date, than in the oldest igneous and altered rocks. Aust. d. Geology, Introductory, Descriptive, and Practical, vol. ii. p. 178.

Hornblende rock, united with quartz, is called hornstone.—Ibid. 183.

Hornbook. s. First book of children covered with horn to keep it unsoiled; primer.

He teaches you the horn-book.
Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 1.
Nothing has been considered of this kind out of the ordinary read of the hornbook and primer.—Locke.
To master John the English maid
A hornbook gives of glimmer-braid;
And that the child may learn the better,
As he can name, he calls the letter. Prior, Alms.

Horned. adj.

1. Furnished with horns.

As when two rams, stir'd with ambitious pride,
Fight for the rule of the rich fleeced flock,
Their horned fronts no nerve on either side
Do meet, that, with the terror of the shock,
Antagonist both stand senseless as a block.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Thither all the horned hinds resort,
To graze the ranker mead.
Sir J. Denham, Cooper's Hill.

2. Shaped like a horn or crescent; resembling horns; crooked.

The horned moon three courses did expire.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, iv. 6. 43.
A steep cloud-kissing rock, whose horned crown
With proud imperial look beholds the main.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 650.
Thou king of horned floods, whose plentiful urn
Suffices fatness to the fruitful corn.
Dryden.

Hornedness. s. Attribute suggested by horned; appearance resembling a horn.

The hornedness of the new moon is still faintly considered by the vulgar as an omen with regard to the weather. They say, on that occasion, the new looks sharp.—Rand, Popular Antiquities.

Hornel. [s. ? see, for a suggestion, extract.] Native fish so called, Amniodytes Tobianus, closely akin to the common Sand lance.

Both species of amniodytes are included by Professor Nilsson among the fishes of Scandinavia; both species also occur in the Forth. Dr. Neill, in his account of the fishes of that locality, says, the Edinburgh fishermen call the large ones hornels, probably an abbreviation of horned, in reference to the greater length of body . . . and the hornlike elongation of the lower jaw; by means of which they are enabled to bury themselves in the wet sands of the sea-shore. Forrest, British Fishes.

Hórner. s. One who works in horn, and sells horn.

The skin of a bull's forehead is the part of the hide made use of by hórners, whereupon they shave their horns. Grove.

Hórnet. s. [A.S. hýrnet.] Very large, strong, stinging fly, which makes its nest in hollow trees.

Silence, in times of suffering, is the best;
'Tis dangerous to disturb a hórnet's nest. Dryden.
Hórnets do mischief to trees by breeding in them. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Hórnet. adj. [translation of Lat. cornipes.] Hoofed.

Mad frantick man, that did not only quake!
With hoofed horses, and brass whelks, Jove's storms to emulate. Shakspeare, As You Like It.

Hórny. s. a. Invest with horns. Ludiæ-crona.

I proceed now to the second kind of theft, which I kept in store for women; I mean that whereby they hórny their husbands. World of Wonders, p. 99: 1608.

This versifying my wife has hórny'd n. Reynold and Fletcher, Four Plays in One.

Hórning. s. [A.S. hórning.] Appearance of the moon increasing.

It [the beaga of Mahomed] fell out upon Friday the tenth of July, and was of the incarnation, beginning on the eighth of August, the new moon of that time, but which they account not as others from the conjunction itself, but from the hórning, which is the cause why they set up in their steeples a crescent. Gregory, Pastime, q. 168: 1630.

Hórnyish. adj. Somewhat resembling horn; hard. Rare.

Temperance, as if it were of a hórnyish composition, is too hard for the flesh, by keeping under the body with fastings and watchings, till it bring it in obedience.—Sir M. Sandys, Essays, p. 21: 1634.

Hórnyless. adj. Destitute, deprived of, or wanting horns.

Creatures, whom our common mother nature with admirable wisdom hath created toothless and hórnyless, he converteth into ravenous wolves and untamed bulls. Translation of Boetius, p. 17: 1620.

Hórnype. s.

1. Dance so called.

There many a hórnype he tun'd to his Phyllis.
Sir W. Raleigh.
Let all the quicksilver i' the mine
Run to the feet veins, and refine
Your dithum jerkum to a dance
Shall fetch the fiddlers out of France,
To wonder at the hórnype here
Of Nottingham and Derbyshire. R. Johnson.
Florida danced the Derbyshire hórnype in the presence of several friends. Tatler.

The master then rose and began to propose a toast. No sooner had he uttered these words, than the whole room rang with applause, the wine-glasses danced hórnype upon the table to the music of the forks and spoons, and the noise was tremendous.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney, vol. ii. ch. ii.

2. Wind-instrument; kind of pipe.
On the right hand of the hórnype sat a Welsh harp . . . Bass-viol and kit; trumpet and Welsh harp; hunting horn and hórnype.—Tatler, no. 157.

Hórstone. s. Name of three minerals resembling horns in their structure.

Hórstone occurs under three qualifications; scintillary hornstone, conchoidal hornstone, and resolvent. . . . The hornstone which occurs in secondary limestone is called 'chert' by the English miners. It is valuable for forming the grinding blocks of flint mills in the pottery manufacture.—Cr., Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hórthumb. s. Pickpocket: (applied by the Elizabethan writers to that class because one of the modes of stealing was to detach a pocket or the like from the person of the individual who was robbed by means of a knife. As this cut down upon the thumb, a protection, in shape of a cap or plate of horn was required.) Obsolete.

I mean a child of the hórthumb, a babe of the body, boy, a cut-purse. R. Johnson, Bartholomew Fair. (Sares by H. & W.)

With the elements separated.

But, cousin, because to that office ye may not come, frequent a hórne on your thumb.
A quick eye, &c.

We also give for our arms three whetstones in gules, with no difference, and upon our crest a left hand with a hórne upon the thumb, and a knife in the hand. W. Bellamy, Moral Philosophy. (Sares by H. & W.)

Hórwork. [s. ? A.S. hurn corner.] Angular fortification in front of the polygon.

View with care the al fortifications of some strong place, and you will get a clearer idea of bastions, half-moons, hór-work, &c., than all the masters in the world could give you upon paper.—Lord Chesterfield.

Hórny. adj.

1. Made of, resembling, having the nature of, horn; hard as horn; callous.

He thought he by the brook of Cherish stood,
And saw the ravens with their hórny beaks
Feed to Elijah bringing even and morn.

Milton, Paradise Regained, li. 266.
As the serum of the blood is resolvable by a small heat, a greater heat coagulates it so as to turn it hórny, like parchment; but when it is thoroughly purified, it will no longer coagulate. Archibald, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

The pained gland was encompassed with a kind of hórny substance.—Ibid. 2.

The hórny or pellucid coat of the eye doth not lie in the same superficies with the white of the eye, but rises up above its convexity, and is of an hyperbolic figure. Rap.

2. Consisting of horns.

He leads the staring infant through the hall;
Points out the hórny spoils that graced the wall;
Tells how this stag through three whole countries fled.

What rivers swam, where bay'd, and where he bled,
Gay, Birth of the Squire.

Hórologe. s. Instrument that tells the hour; clock; watch; hourglass.

He'll watch the hórologe a double set,
If drink rock not his cradle.

Shakspeare, Othello, li. 2.

The cock, the country hórologe, that rings
The cheerful warning to the sun's awake,
Missing the dawning, scuttles in his wings,
And to his roost doth sadly him betake. Drayton, Mower, h. ii.

Horolographie. adj. [Gr. γράφω = write, describe.] Pertaining to the art of dialling.

The gnomonick projection is also called the horolographick projection, because it is the foundation of dialling. Chambers.

Horologist. s. Clockmaker.

The name of Mr. R. L. Vulliamy is one well known as connected with the highest eminence in his profession as an horologist.—Lord Bessborough, Address, &c. 54.

Hórology. s. [Gr. λόγος = word, principle.] Clock.

Before the days of Jerome there were hórologies, that measured the hours not only by drops of water in glasses, called clepsydras, but also by sand in glasses, called elephanimia.—Sir T. Browne.

Hórometry. s. [Gr. μέτρον = measure.] Art of measuring hours.

It is no easy wonder how the hórometry of antiquity discovered not this artifice. Sir T. Browne, Algar Errorum.

Hórroscope. s. [Gr. ὁρᾶν = see, spy, observe, view.] Configuration of the planets at the hour of birth; star of a nativity.

A proportion of the horoscope unto the seventh house, or opposite signs every seventh year, propheseth living creatures.—Sir P. Broun.
 Him loath beneath a boding horoscope.
 His sire, the blarney'd Vulcan of a shop,
 From Mars his forge went to Minerva's school.
Dryden.

The Greek name of this the horoscope,
 This governs life, and this marks out our parts,
 Our humours, manners, qualities, and arts.

Creech, Translation of Manilius.
 They understood the power of names of their own instinct, and fell to drawing signs out of—Bulfinch.

On one is a complete horoscope containing the places of the sun, moon, and every planet, noted down on the zodiac in degrees and minutes of a degree; and with these particulars the mathematician undertook to foretell marriage, fortune, and death of the person who had been born at the instant when the heavenly bodies were so situated.—
Sharpe, History of Egypt, ch. xiii.

Horoscopy. s. Calculation of nativities.

It would have posed old Erra Pater to have found out any given day in the year to erect a scheme upon—good days, bad days, were so shuffled together, in the confounding of all solar horoscopy.
Lamb, Essays of Elia, Rejoicings upon the New Year's Coming of Age.

Horrent. adj. [Lat. horrens, -entis, pres. part. of horreo—grow rough, shiver.]
 Pointed outwards; bristled with points.
Rhetorical.

Him a globe
 Of fiery scraphim encircled round
 With bright lambazoury and horrent arms.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 511.

The cruel winds have hurr'd upon the coast
 Some helpless bark; while sacred pilot melts
 The general eye, or terror's icy hand
 Smitten their distorted limbs and horrent hair
Akenside, Pleasures of Imagination, b. ii.

Horrible. adj. [Lat. horribilis; Fr. horrible—see Horrent.] Dreadful; terrible; shocking; hideous; enormous.

No colour affecteth the eye much with displeasure;
 there be sights that are horrible, because they excite the memory of things that are odious or fearful.—Bacon.

Eternal happiness and eternal misery, meeting with a persuasion that the soul is immortal, are of all others, the first the most desirable, and the latter the most horrible to human apprehension.—
Bacon, Sermons.

Horribleness. s. Attribute suggested by Horrible; dreadful; hideousness;
 terrible; fearfulness.

The horribleness of sin, the terror of God's indignation.
Archbishop Cranmer, Defence of the Sacrament, 6th. 7. 1550.

The horribleness of a crime committed.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience, iv. 10.

Horribly. adv. In a horrible manner.

1. Dreadfully; hideously.

What hideous noise was that?
Horribly loud. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1509.

2. To a dreadful degree.

The contagion of these ill precedents, both in civility and virtue, horribly infects children.—Locke.

Horrid. adj. [Lat. horridus.]

1. Hideous; dreadful; shocking.

Give colour to my pale cheek with thy blood,
 That we the horrid may seem to those
 Which chance to find us.
Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iv. 2.

Not in the legends
 Of horrid hell can come a devil more damn'd,
 In evils to top Macbeth.
Id., Macbeth, iv. 3.

Horror on them fell,
 And horrid sympathy.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 540.

2. Shocking; offensive; unpleasant.

Already I your tears survey,
 Already hear the horrid things they say.
Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iv.

3. Rough; rugged.

Horrid with fern, and intricate with thorn, Few paths of human feet or tracks of beasts were worn.
Dryden.

Horridly. adv. In a horrid manner; terrifically; shockingly.

Making night hideous I and we fools of nature,
 So horridly to shake our disposition,
 With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 4.

Horridness. s. Attribute suggested by Horrid; hideousness; enormity.

A bloody designer suborns his instrument to take away such a man's life, and the contriver represents the horridness of the fact, and brings him to repent-tance.—Hammond.

The looks of beauty she knew how to wear,
 And make her horridness appear so sweet,
 That she the wisest and most piercing eyes
 Had often blinded by her fallacies.
Beaumont, Paphia, p. 281. 1631.

There needs no comment to set forth the horrid-ness of these assertions.—Bishop Hall, Corruption of the Church of Rome.

Horrible. adj. Causing horror.

His jaws horrible, arm'd with three-fold fate,
 Here dwells the direful shark.
Thomson.

Horridly. v. a. Strike with horror.

I was horridly at the notion.—Theodore Hook,

Gilbert Gurney.

Horripilation. s. [horreo—shiver + pilus—hair.] Setting, or standing, of the hair on end.

Read these without horripilation if you can.—
Lamb, Letter to Manning.

Horror. s. [Lat. horror; Fr. horreur.]

1. Terror mixed with detestation; passion compounded of fear and hate, both strong.

Over them sad horror, with grim hue,
 Did always soar, beating his iron wings.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 5.

Deep horror seizes ev'ry human breast;
 Their pride is humbled, and their fear confest.
Dryden.

2. Dreadful thoughts.

I have slept full with horror;
 Direness, familiar to my slaughterous thoughts,
 Cannot once start me.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 5.

3. Gloom; dreariness.

Lies through the perplex'd paths of this drear wood,
 The nodding horror of whose shady brows
 Threats the forlorn and wandering passenger.
Milton, Comus, 36.

Black Melancholy sits, and round her throws
 A death-like silence, and a dread repose.
 Her gloomy presence saddens all the scene,
 Shades every flower, and darkens every green;
 Deepens the murmur of the falling floods;
 And breathes a browner horror on the woods.
Pope, Epistle to Arbuthnot.

1. In Medicine. Shivering; shuddering.

All objects of the senses, which are very offensive, do cause the spirits to retire; and upon their flight,
 the parts are in some degree desolate, and so there is induced in them a trepidation and horror.—
Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Horse. s. [A.S. hors.]

1. Animal so called.

A horse: a horse! my kingdom for a horse!
Shakespeare, Richard III, v. 4.

2. Constellation so called.

Thy face, bright Centaur, autumn's heats retain,
 The softer season suiting to the man;
 Whilst winter's shivering God afflicts the Horse;
 With frost, and makes him an uneasy course.
Creech, Translation of Manilius.

3. Plural, or collective, in sense.

The galloping of horses: who was't come by?
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

The armies were appointed, consisting of twenty-five thousand horse and foot, for the repulsing of enemy at their landing.—Bacon, Considerations on a War with Spain.

If they had known that all the king's horse were quartered behind them, their foot might very well have marched away with their horse.
Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

The Arcturus horse

With ill success engage the Latin force.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, x. 504.

4. Something on which anything is supported: (as, a horse to dry linen on).

5. Wooden machine which soldiers ride by way of punishment: (sometimes called a timber-mare).

As fine as a horse. Tawdrily or gaudily
 dressed.

It being the custom in this month (May) for the passengers to ride the wagoner at every inn a ribbon to adorn his team, one soon discovered the origin of the proverb, as fine as a horse; for, before they got to the end of their journey, the poor beasts were almost blinded by the tawdry, partly-coloured flowing honours of their heads.—Gentleman's Magazine, vol. xxiv. p. 324. 1754.

Take horse. Set out to ride.

I took horse to the lake of Comandine, which is formed by the entry of the Rhine.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

In Composition. As a prefix, it signifies something large or coarse.

Horse. v. a.

1. Mount upon, furnish with, a horse.

He came out with all his clowns, horr'd upon such cart-jokes, and so furnished, as I thought with myself if that were thrift, I wish none of my friends ever to thrive.—Sir P. Sidney.

After a great flight there came to the camp of Gonsalvo, the great captain, a gentleman proudly horr'd and armed: Diego de Mendoza asked the great captain, Who's this? Who answered, It is St. Elmo, who never appears but after the storm.—
Bacon, Apophthegms.

2. Carry on the back.

That treat of the discomfiting of keepers, horring
 the deer on his own back, and making off with equal resolution and success.—Butler, Characters.

3. Ride anything.

Spills, bulks, windows
 Are smother'd, and all ill'd, and riders horr'd
 With variable complexion; all agreeing
 In earnestness to see him.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, ii. 1.

4. Cover a mare.

If you let him out to horse more mares than your own, you must feed him well.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Horse. v. n. Get on horseback.

Lapping himself up handsomely in his long cloak,
 he went to horse; and rode as women use; then mounted the barber likewise on his mule.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iii. 13.

Horse-cucumber. s. See extract.

The horse-cucumber is the large green cucumber, and the best for the table, grown out of the garden.
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Horse-laugh. s. Loud violent rude laugh.

A horse-laugh, if you please, at home;
 A joke on Jekyl.
Pope, Epilogue to the Satires, dialogue i.

Horse-play. s. Coarse, rough, rugged play.

He is too much given to horse-play in his railway, and comes to battle like a dictator from the plough.
Dryden.

Horseback. s. Riding posture; state of being on a horse.

I've seen the French,
 And they can well on horseback.
Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 7.

If your ramble was on horseback, I am glad of it,
 on account of your health.—Swift, Letter to Gay.

Horsebean. s. Small bean usually given to horses.

Only the small horsebean is propagated by the plough. Mortimer, Husbandry.

Horseblock. s. See extract.

Horse-block is a square frame of strong boards, used by excavators to keep the ends of their wheeling planks.—Credt, Encyclopædia of Architecture, Glossary.

Horseboy. s. Boy employed in dressing horses; stable-boy.

Some horse-boys, being awake, discovered them by the fire in their matches.—Knox, History of the Turks.

Horsebreaker. s. One whose employment
 it is to tame horses to the saddle.

Under Sagittarius are born chariot-racers, horse-breakers, and tanners of wild beasts.—Creech.

Horsechestnut. s. Tree so called.

It [horsechestnut] hath digitated or fingered leaves; the flowers, which consist of five leaves, are of an anomalous figure, opening with two lips;
 there are male and female upon the same spike;
 the female flowers are succeeded by nuts, which grow in green prickly husks. Their whole year's shoot is commonly performed in three weeks' time, after which it does no more than increase in bulk, and become firm; and all the latter part of the summer is occupied in forming and strengthening the buds for the next year's shoots.—Miller.

It is the generally received opinion that the horse-chestnut tree is a native of the mountainous parts of Asia, and that its introduction into Europe took place about the middle of the sixteenth century; Cæsius informs us that at Vienna, in 1558, there was a plant of this species that had been brought there twelve years before, and our countryman Gerard in 1570, the first of our writers who mentions it, speaks of it as a rare foreign tree. . . Mr. Boyle, however, in his illustrations, says he never met with the common horsechestnut in the mountainous parts of Northern India, though there the pavia or Indian chestnut is abundant.—Sells, British Forest Trees.

Horsechestnut, said to be so called from its fruit being used in Turkey, the country from which we received it, as food for horses that are broken or touched in the wind. . . In this country horses will not eat them, and the name was perhaps, in reality, given to those nuts to express coarseness.—*Dr.
 Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.*

Horsecourser. s. [N.Fr. couracier—broker.]
 Dealer in horses.

A Florentine bought a horse for so many crowns, upon condition to pay half down: the horsecourser

comes to him next morning for the remainder.—Sir E. T. Estlin.

A servant to a horse-courser was thrown off his horse.—Winman, Surgery.

He that lights upon a horse in this place [Smithfield] from an old horse-courser, sound both in wind and limb, may light of a honest wife in the stew.—D. Japhin, Harleian Miscellanea, ix. p. 317. (Nares by H. & W.)

Their provender by diverse horse-courers that live by the sale of horse, doe feed them with sudden rie or branment meal, pampering them up that they may be the fairer to the eye, yet it is not good food to labour with.—B. Gage, On Husbandry, b. lii. 120. (Nares by H. & W.)

Horsedrench. s. Physic for a horse.

The most sovereign prescription in Galen... of no better report than a horsedrench.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, ii. 1.

Horseflower. s. Native plant so called.

Meclamperum is called of some Tritium vavilinum; in English, cow-wheat and horse-flower.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 91: 1633.

Horsefly. s. See extract.

Dipterous insects more particular injurious to animals are the whole family of the horse or whorse flies (Tabaride), bot and gaulflies (Stridie), and horse-flies (Hippoboscide). . . . The horse-flies cause much distress to horses in the vicinity of the New Forest, and handfals may sometimes be taken off the groins and other parts not well covered with hair.—London, Encyclopædia of Gardening, pl. ii. b. iv.: 1668.

Horsefoot. s. Plant so called.

This plant [which the moderne writers have referred to the Cerealia of the ancients, and to the kind of colt's foot] I have thought good to name in English horse-foot, for that the leaves exceed colt's foot in bignesse, yet are like them in shape; and of this plant Chusius (whom I here chiefly follow) hath described two sorts . . . both these grow in the Austrian and Sibirian Alpes under the sides of woodes, among bushes and such shadowie places; but not in England that I have yet heard of.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 813: 1633.

Twissings, or sole-foot, hath many white and long creeping roots, somewhat fat . . . when the stalks and seed is perished there appears springing out of the earth many broad leaves, green above, and next the ground of a white hearie or grayish colour, fashioned like a horse-foot, for which cause it was called sole-foot and horse-foot.—Ibid., p. 812: 1633.

Horseguards. s. pl. [horse and guard.] Regiments of horse of the King's Guard; as the Life-Guards were formerly called, and as now the Oxford Blues are.

Twelve gentlemen of the horseguards were impanelled, having unanimously chosen Mr. A. Tranchion, who is their right-hand man in the troop, for their foreman in the jury.—Addison, Tatler, no. 263.

Horsehair. s. Hair of horses.

His glittering helm, which terribly was graced With waving horse-hair.—Dryden.

Used adjectivally.

Thus as he spoke, great Hector stretch'd his arms To take his child; but luck the infant slunk, Crying and shouting, his nurse's short'ning breast, Scand' by the weapon helm and horse-hair plume, That nodd'd, fearful, on the warrior's crest.

Lord Derby, Translation of Homer.

Horseheel. s. [A.S. hors - horse, and helen - Lat. helenium, the name of a plant.] Plant so called; Elicampagne.

Horse-hele, horse-heal, or horse-hed, . . . by a double blunder . . . has been corrupted into horse-hele, and the plant employed by apothecaries to heal horses of scabs, and more heels.—Dr. Prior, Popular Names of British Plants.

Horsekeeper. s. One employed to take care of horses; groom; formerly horseknave.

Your horsekeeper tells ye the surfeits of your horse.—Dr. White, Sermon, p. 50: 1615.

Horseleech. s. Great leech that bites horses.

The horseleech hath two daughters, crying Give, Give.—Dr. White, Sermon, p. 50: 1615.

Let us to France, like horseleeches, my boys, The very blood to suck.

Shakespeare, Henry V. ii. 3.

Horselitter. s.

1. Carriage hung upon poles between two horses, in which the person carried lies along.

He that before thought he might command the waves of the sea, was now cast on the ground, and carried in an horselitter.—Marcellus, li. 8.

2. Litter for a horse; long dung.

Horseload. s. As much as a horse can carry.

They have, like good sumpters, laid ye down their horseload of citations and fathers at your door.—Wilson, Reasons of Church Government urged against Prelacy.

Horseleaf. s. See extract.

The next food [horse-leaf], which is somewhat strong and better, is bread thus made: take two bushels of good clean beans and one bushel of wheat, and grind them together; then through a fine range bolt out the quantity of two pecks of pure meal, and make it in two or three leaves by itself; and the rest sift through a meal-sieve; and so make it in great loaves, and with the coarser bread feed your horse in his rest, and with the finer bread against the days of sore labour.—G. Markham, b. i. p. 52. (Nares by H. & W.)

Oh that I were in my cat-tub, with a horse-leaf, something to hearten me.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Night-walker, v. 1. (Nares by H. & W.)

Her stature sent three horse-leaves did exceed.

Harrington, Translation of Ariosto, vii. 62. (Nares by H. & W.)

Lastly for horse-bread that three horse-leaves be sold by every baker for a penny, xiii. for xij, and every loaf to weigh the full weight.—Walton, Country Justice: 1620. (Nares by H. & W.)

Horseman. s.

1. One skilled in riding.

A skilful horseman, and a huntsman bred.

Dryden.

2. One who serves in wars on horseback.

Encounters between horsemen on the one side, and foot on the other, are seldom with extremity of danger; because as horsemen can hardly break a battle on foot, so men on foot cannot possibly chase horsemen.—Sir J. Hayward.

Before night, however, the agitation had altogether subsided; but it was suddenly revived by a bold imposture. A horseman in the uniform of the Guards spurred through the City, announcing that the King had been killed.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxi.

3. Rider; man on horseback.

With descending show'rs of brimstone fir'd, The wild Barbarian in the storm expir'd; Wrapt in devouring flames the horseman rag'd, And spur'd the steel in equal flames engag'd.

Addison.

A horseman's coat shall hide Thy taper shape, and comeliness of side.

Prior, Henry and Emma.

Horsemanship. s. Art of riding; art of managing a horse.

He caulked with such ease into his seat, As if an angel dropt down from the clouds, To turn and wind a fiery Pegasus.

And with the world with noble horsemanship.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iv. 1.

They please themselves in terms of hunting or horsemanship.—Sir H. Walton.

His majesty, to show his horsemanship, slaughtered two or three of his subjects.—Addison.

Then peers grew proud, in horsemanship excel; Newmarket's glory rose, as Britain's fell.

Pope, Imitations of Horace, b. ii. ep. i.

Horsement. s. Provender for horses.

Though green peas and beans be eaten sooner, yet the dry ones that are used for horsement are ripe last.—Bacon.

Horsemint. s. Native plant of the genus

Of horse-mint or water-mint, horse-mint hath creeping roots like as the other mints, &c.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 683.

Horsemuscle. s. Large muscle.

The great horse-muscle, with the fine shell, that breedeth in ponds, do not only scrape and slant as the oysters do, but remove from one place to another.

Horserace. s. Match of horses in running.

In horseraces men are curious that there be not the least weight upon the one horse more than upon the other.—Bacon.

Trajan, in the fifth year of his tribuneship, entertained the people with a horserace.—Addison.

Horseradish. s. Esculent root so called.

Horseradish is increased by sprouts springing from the old roots left in the ground, that are cut or broken off.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Horseran. s. See extract.

Horseran is a contrivance for . . . drawing up loaded wheelbarrows of soil from the deep cuttings of foundations, canals, docks, &c., by the help of a horse, which goes backwards and forwards instead of round as in a horse-gin.—Griffith, Encyclopædia of Architecture, Glossary.

Horseshoe. s.

1. Plate of iron nailed to the feet of horses.

I was thrown into the Thames, and cool'd glowing hot in that surge, like a horseshoe.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iii. 5.

2. Plant so called of the genus Hippocrepis; [Gr. ἵππος = horse + σπυρίς = sundial, shoe: so that the words translate one another].

eth up in certain unfilled and sunny places of Italy and Languedoc. . . . Horseshoe is commonly called in Italian Sterco de Cavallo; you may name it Ferrum equinum; in English horse-shoe.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 1236: 1633.

Horsetail. s. Tail of a horse.

1. Turkish standard.

The Pope did not attempt to extinguish the passion for war in a people like the Bulgarians, even if he had any sense of its incongruity with the Gospel. They were to go to battle no longer under their old national ensign, the horse-tail, but under the banner of the Cross.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. v. ch. viii.

Their horse-tails are plucked from the ground, and the sword From its sheath; and they form, and but wait for the word.

Tartar and Spahi and Turcoman, Strike your tents, and throng to the van.

R Byron, Siege of Corinth.

2. Plant so called of the genus Equisetum.

Horse-tail is called in Greek Tauropus; Hipparia in Latin; . . . in shops Cauda equina; . . . in Low Dutch Peerstert; in Italian Coda di Cavallo; in Spanish, Coda de mula; in French, Queue de cheval and equusque; in English horse-tail and slave-grass.—Gerarde, Herball: 1633.

Horsetongue. s. See extract.

Horse-tongue stretcheth forth round, takes a span long; whereupon are set broad-long and sharp-pointed leaves, but not so prickly as are those of Kuechelm, not unlike to leaves of the bay-tree, but lesser; greater than those of the Kuechelm, out of the middle rib wherof cometh forth another leaf, sharp-pointed also but small, and of the bignesse of the leave of Kuechelm, resembling a little tongue. . . . Horse-tongue is called in Greek Isopogon; of the later hermetists, Bomfiera, Uvularia, Bislinnea, Lamena, Pugaria, and Victoriana. . . . This Hippoglossum Bomfiera is called in High Dutch Zapfenkraut; in Low Dutch Tongensdall; in Spanish Lámina de cauallo; in English horse-tongue, tongue-blade, double-tongue, and lurel of Alexandria.—Gerarde, Herball, p. 909: 1633.

= garden.] Fit for a garden.

Such as are sative and hortensial.—Boetius, introduction, § 3.

Horticult. s. Horticulturist. Rare.

In quick succession, even the garden's hold On Thames' prolific bank, the culture's hand Alone do these horticultists ply.

Or do they owe to London's rich manure Those products which its crowded markets fill.

Dodley, Agriculture, canto ii. (Rich.)

Horticultural. adj. Relating to, connected with, consisting in Horticulture.

Russian gardening in respect to its horticultural productions.—London, Encyclopædia of Gardening, § 473.

Horticulture. s. [Lat. hortus = garden +

cultura = culture.] Art of cultivating gardens.

• Favours of the more refined parts of horticulture.—Keely.

Already a reform of agriculture had been commened. . . Evelyn had, under the formal sanction of the Royal Society, given instruction to his countrymen in planting. Temple, in his intervals of leisure, had tried many experiments in horticulture, and had proved that many delicate fruits, the natives of more favoured climates, might, with the help of art, be grown on English ground. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. iii.

Horticulturalist. s. One is fond of, or skillful in, Horticulture.

Danby wrote horticulturalist, the common form is horticulturalist. — Rich.

Hortyard. s. Same as Orchard.
The hortyard entering, [he] admires the fair And pleasant fruits. — Spenser, Translation of Ovid's Metamorphoses, edit. 1634, p. 200.

Hosanna. s. [Hebrew.] Form of acclamation, of blessing, of wishing well; exclamation of praise to God. See extract.

Through the vast of heaven It sounded, and the faithful armies rung Hosanna to the Highest.

The word hosanna is a contraction of Hebrew words, meaning 'Save, I beseech thee,' a form of acclamation which the Jews were wont to use in their feast of Tabernacles, in which also they used to carry boughs in their hands, and to sing psalms, as it is in the second book of Maccabees, ch. x. Both these customs of boughs and hymns were usual among the Greeks, in any time of sacred festivity. — Hammond, On St. Matthew, xxi. 9.

Hose. s. Part of a machine for distributing water; in a fire engine, the leathern pipes. To this pipe, water of an excellent quality is conveyed by pipes; so that boats may come at and by applying a hose to the engine at there for this purpose, fill the casks without the usual trouble and fatigue. — White, Journal, p. 16.

Hose. s. pl. hosen. [A.S. hos, hosa.] 1. Breaches.

These men were bound in their coats, hosen, hats, and other garments, and cast into the midst of the burning fiery furnace. — David, iii. 21.

He cross-examin'd both our hose, And plunder'd all we had to lose.

Butler, Hudibras.

2. Stockings; covering for the legs.

He, being in hose, could not see to garter his hose; and you, being in hose, cannot see to put on your hose. — Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, ii. 1.

Hosier. s. One who makes, manufactures, or deals in, stockings.

As arrant a cockney as any hosier in Cheap-side. — Swift.

Hosiery. s. Hosier's ware.

There is a great variety of different frames in use for producing various kinds of hosiery. The first, which forms the foundation of the whole, is that for knitting plain hosiery, or the common stocking-frame. — Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hostel. s. Hostel. Obsolete.

But the pilgrimages of Anglo-Saxon kings, and a nameless number of the people, to Rome; the dues self-imposed to support a hostie there; the fierce zeal of Boniface for the papal claims, are all proofs of a mild sentiment to the august mother of the faith. — H. Pearson, The early and middle Ages of England, ch. ix.

Hospitable. adj. [Fr. hospitable; Lat. hospitalis.] Giving entertainment to strangers; kind to strangers.

I'm your host; With robbers' hands my hospitable favours, You should not rattle thus.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 7.

Receive the ship-wreck'd on your friendly shore; With hospitable rites relieve the poor.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, l. 802.

Hospitality. s. Attribute suggested by hospitable; disposition to entertain strangers; kindness to strangers.

I have two ways to entertain my Saviour; in his members, and in himself. In his members, by charity and hospitalities; 'what I do to one of these little ones, I do to him'; in himself, by faith; 'if any man open, he will come in and sup with him.' — Bishop Hall, Contemplations, h. iv.

His [Abraham's] benignity to strangers, and hospitalities, is remarkable among all his deeds of goodness. — Barrow, Works, i. 424.

Hospitably. adv. In a hospitable manner.

Go thus hospitably live, And strangers with good cheer receive. Prior. The former liveth as piously and hospitably as the other. — Swift.

Hospitalage. s. Hospitality; the duty of a guest to his host. Rare.

That his ungentle host n'ot him approach Of vile ungentleness or hospitalage's breach.

Spenser, Faerie Queen, lib. 10, 6.

Hospital. s. [N.Fr. hospital; Lat. hospitalis.]

1. Place built for the reception of the sick, or support of the poor.

They who were so careful to bestow them in a college when they were young, would be so good as to provide for them in some hospital when they are old. — Sir H. Wotton.

I am about to build an hospital, which I will endow handsomely for twelve old husbandmen. — Adrian.

2. Place for shelter or entertainment. Obsolete.

'They spy'd a goodly castle plac'd Forth by a river, in a pleasant dale; Which choosing for that evening's hospital, They thither march'd.' — Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Hospital. adj. [see also under Hospitalier.] Kind to strangers; hospitable.

Obsolete.

I am to be a guest to this hospital maid a good while. — Hurd, Letters, l. 136.

Hospitalis, sociable, hospital; a good house-keeper. Boetius, Homerus, Æneas, p. 231: 1658.

Hospitality. s. [Fr. hospitalité.] Practice of entertaining strangers; liberality in receiving guests or visitors.

The Lacedæmonians forbidding all access of strangers into their country, are, in that respect, deservedly blamed, as being enemies to that hospitality which, for common humanity sake, all the nation should embrace. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

He has this spirit of faction broke all the laws of charity, neighbourhood, alliance, and hospitality. — Swift.

Hospitalier. s. [L.Lat. hospitalarius; Fr. hospitalier.] See second extract.

Gilbert, master of the hospitaliers, chiefly stirred up the king to this war. — Falmer, Church History, p. 33.

Many of these devotees combined the profitable employment of traffic with the holier office of the pilgrim; and those who were thus enabled to, established a relationship with the lords of the neighbouring provinces, and it frequently in their power to befriended their less fortunate brethren. In the middle of the eleventh century, some merchants of Amalfi, a rich city of the kingdom of Naples, having in the course of their trading in Egypt ingratiated themselves with the caliph Montasser Billah, who at that time held the holy city under his sway, obtained permission to establish a hospital within the limits of Jerusalem, for the use of poor and sick Latin pilgrims. In accordance with the order of the caliph, the Milanese governor of the city assigned to these pious men a site close to the Holy Sepulchre, on which, as soon as possession could be obtained, they erected a chapel dedicated to the Virgin, giving it the name of St. Mary and Latinus, to distinguish it from those churches where the service was performed according to the Greek, and from that time its sacred duties were carried on by Benedictine monks appointed for the purpose. At the same time, two hospitals, one for either sex, were erected in the vicinity of the chapel, for the reception of pilgrims; and eventually each of these hospitals had a separate chapel annexed to it: that for the men being dedicated to St. John the Almoner, and the one destined for the women to St. Mary Magdalene. Many pilgrims, who on their arrival from Europe had here experienced the kindness and hospitality so liberally extended to all wayfarers, abandoned the idea of returning to their native homes, and formed themselves into a band of charitable assistants, who, without any regular religious profession, devoted themselves to the service of the hospital, and the care of its sick inmates. All the chief cities of Italy, and the south of Europe generally, subscribed liberally for the support of this institution; the merchants of Amalfi, who were its original founders, becoming the stewards of their bounty; and as its beneficial influence became more widely known throughout Europe, from the favourable reports of grateful pilgrims on their return from these distant climes, the amount of their revenue, and consequently of their powers of usefulness, became yearly augmented. Such was the original establishment of the hospitaliers of Jerusalem, which may justly be considered as the cradle of the order of St. John, and from this pious fraternity of charitable devotees sprang a body of men who for centuries became the terror of the infidel and the bulwark of christianism in the east. — W. Porter, Knights of Malta, vol. i. ch. i. p. 13.

Hospitate. v. n. [Lat. hospitatus, pret. part. of hospitor.] Reside under the roof of another. Rare.

That always chooses an empty shell, and this hospitates with the living animal in the mussel-shell — Grev, Mammæ.

Hospitable. s. Hospitable. Rare.

One, having Oulney past . . . Through those rich fields doth run, till lost, in her pride, The shire's hospitable town she in her course divide.

Drayton, Polyolbion, song 22. (Ord MS.)

Host. s. [N.Fr. hoste; Lat. hospes, hospit.]

1. One who gives entertainment to another.

Howe never entertained either guests or hosts with long speeches, till the mouth of hunger be stopped. — Sir P. Sidney.

2. Landlord of an inn.

Time is like a fashionable host, That slightly shakes his parting guest by the hand; But with his arms outstretch'd, as he would fly, Gramps in the corner.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, lib. 3.

Host. s. [from Lat. hostis.—see extract from Wedgwood.]

1. Army; numbers assembled for war.

The waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host of Pharaoh. — Exodus, xiv. 28.

In the troubled times following the breaking up of the Roman empire the first duty of the subject was to follow his lord into the field when required. The summons to the performance of this duty was expressed by the terms banire in hostem, to order out against the enemy, or to order out on military service. 'Quicumque liber homo in hostem in banita fuerit et venire contempserit plenum heremum componat,' i.e. as it is explained, let him pay a fine of sixty shillings. — Edict of Charlemagne in Muratori, Dissertation 26. The term hostis then, which primarily signified the enemy against whom the expedition was to be made, was compendiously used for the military service itself, and is frequently taken as synonymous with hostes, expeditio, or exercitus. A suppletion is addressed to Charlemagne, 'ne episcopi deinceps sent hactenus vocantur hostes' (i.e. with demands of military service), 'sed quatinus in hostes venimus' (which may be translated either, when we march against the enemy, or when we proceed on military duty or join the ranks), 'ipsi propriis resident in parochiis.' The same immutability is expressed in a charter of A.D. 968, 'ne ab hominibus hinc inde ecclesie hostilis expeditio requiratur.' — Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

2. Any great number.

Give to a gracious message An host of tongues; but let all tidings tell Themselves when they be fell.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 6.

Host. s. [from Lat. hostis.]

1. Sacrifice.

Anon, said Isaac; Father, here I see Knife, fire and host, ready instantly; But where's your host? Oh! let us mount, my son, Said Abram, God will soon provide us one.

Sylester, Translation of De Baras, 101. (Ord MS.)

2. Sacrifice of the mass in the Romish church; consecrated wafer.

The Romanists will have Christ's whole body to be in ten thousand places together, and at once; namely, wherever their host is celebrated, and in every particle of that host. — South, Sermons, vii. 20.

Host. v. a. Give entertainment to another.

Malveco will no strange knights host For peevish jealousy.

Spenser, Faerie Queen, lib. 9, argument.

Such was that lag, unmet to host such guests.

Ibid., iv. 8, 27.

Host. v. n. Receive entertainment; live, as at an inn.

Go, bear it to the Centaur, where we host; And stay there, Dromio, till I come to thee.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, i. 2.

Hostage. s. [N.Fr. ostage, from Lat. obus, idus.] One given in pledge for security of performance of conditions.

He that hath wife and children, hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. — Bacon, Essays, On Marriage.

HOST

They who marry give hostages to the publick that they will not attempt the ruin or disturb the peace of it.—Bishop Atterbury.

Hostel. s. [N.Fr. hostel.] Inn; lodging-house.

Hospitium, one of the old hostels [or halls] at Oxford, which were very numerous before the foundation of the colleges.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, l. 425.

Hostelry. s. Hostel.

It is a bashful child, homely brought up, in a rude hostelry.—B. Jonson, New Inn.

Hostess. s.

1. Female host; woman who gives entertainment.

Fair and noble hostess.
We are your guest to-night.

Be as kind an hostess as you have been to me, and you can never fail of another husband.—Dryden.

2. Woman who keeps a house of public entertainment.

Undistinguished civility is like a whore or a hostess.—Sir W. Temple.

Hostess-ship. s. State, office, rank, or condition of an hostess.

It is my father's will I should take on me the hostess-ship of the day; you're welcome, sirs. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Hostile. s. Host in the sense of the consecrated wifer. Scarcely English.

Another priest, that lived in the court, gave him the pte with an hostie in it.—Bishop Burnet, History of his own Time: an. 1685.
The priest immediately withdrew the hostie, which is still preserved.—Dennham, Travels, p. 12.

Hostile. adj. [Lat. hostilis; from hostis—enemy.] Adverse; opposite; suitable to an enemy.

He has now at last
Given hostile strokes, and that not in the presence
Of dreadful justice, but on the ministers
That do distribute it.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 3.
Fierce Juno's hate,
Added to hostile force, shall urge thy fate. Dryden.

Hostilely. adv. [the sound of the l double; hostile + ly—like.] In a hostile manner.

I was speaking of the greatest human happiness hostilely attacked, and in danger of being lost.—Warburton, Sermons, vol. ii. appendix, p. 62. (Orel MS.)

Hostility. s. [Fr. hostilité.] Practices of an open enemy; open war; opposition in war.

Neither by treason nor hostility
To seek to put me down, and reign thyself.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. l. 1.
Hostility being thus suspended with France, preparation was made for war against Scotland.—Sir J. Heywood.

We have shewed ourselves fair, nay, generous adversaries; and have carried on even our hostilities with humanity.—Bishop Atterbury.

Hostile. v. a. Make or render hostile.

When England, Spain, Holland, and Russia, united with the powers already hostilized against an impious nation that had reduced robbery, murder, and profaneness to a civil and practical system, I thought there was the fairest prospect of their success.—Seward, Letters, iii. 376: 1794.

Hosting. s.

1. Assemblage of armed men; muster. Obsolete.

When the lord deputy hath raised any general hostings, the noblemen have claimed the leading of them.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.
Lords have had the leading of their own followers under them to the general hostings. Ibid.

2. Hostile encounter.

Strange to us it seem'd
At first, that angel should with angel war,
And in fierce hosting meet.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 91.
Yet from his loins
New authors of dissension spring: from him
Two branches, that in hosting long contend
For sovereign sway. J. Philips, Cyder, h. ii.

Hostler. s. One who has the care of horses at an inn.

The cause why they are now to be permitted in want of convenient inns for lodging travellers on horseback, and hostlers to tend their horses by the way.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Hostless. adj. Inhospitable. Rare.
Who with Sir Satyrane, as erst ye red,
Forth riding from Malbeccous hostless house,

HOTB

Fay off asyde a young man, the which fled
From an huge giant. Spenser, Faerie Queene, iii. 11, 3.

Hostry. s. Lodging-house; inn; place of reception, or entertainment.

In exchange-time one may hear seven or eight sorts of tongues spoken upon their burses, [in the Netherlands:] nor are the men only expert herein, but the women and maids also in their common hostries.—Howell, Letters, i. ii. 15: 1622.

These tabernacles of our bodies, which are the hostries of our souls, and temples of the Holy Ghost.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 71.

Swift rivers are with sudden ice constrain'd,
And studded wheels are on its back sustain'd;
An hostry now for wagons, which before
Tall ships of burden on its bosom bore.

Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

Hot. adj. [A.S. hæt.]

1. Having the power to excite the sense of heat; contrary to cold.

The great breeze which the motion of the air in great circles, such as are under the circle of the world, produceth, do refrigerate; and therefore, in those parts, noon is nothing so hot as about nine in the forenoon. Bacon.
Hot and cold were in one body flat;
And soft with hard, and light with heavy mixt.

Dryden.
Black substances do soonest of all others become hot in the sun's light, and burn; which effect may proceed partly from the multitude of refractions in a little room, and partly from easy commotion of a very small corpuscle.—Sir I. Newton.

2. Lustful; lewd.

Wint hotter hours,
Unrester'd in vulgar flame, you have Luxuriously pick'd out.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 11.

3. Violent; furious; dangerous.

That of Carthage, where the Spaniards had ing of our coming, was one of the hottest services, and most dangerous assaults, that hath been known. Bacon.
He resolved to storm; but his soldiers declined hot service, and pled it with artillery.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.
To court the eye directs us, when we found
The assault so hot, as if it were only there.

Sir J. Denham, Dedication of Troy.

Is now in hot engagement with the Moors. Dryden.

4. Ardent; vehement; precipitate.

Come, come, Lord Mortimer, you are as slow,
As hot Lord Percy is on fire to go.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 1.
Nature to youth hot rashness doth dispense,
But with cold prudence age doth recompense.

Sir J. Denham, O. Old Age, pt. I.
Achilles is impatient, hot, revengeful; Eneas, patient, considerate, and careful of his people.—Dryden.

5. Eager; keen in desire.

It is no wonder that men, either perplexed in the necessary affairs of life, or hot in the pursuit of pleasures, should not seriously examine their tenets.
—Locke.
She has, quoth Ralph, a jointure,
Which makes him have so hot a mind t' her.

Heiter, Hudibras.

6. It is applied likewise to the desire, or sense raising the desire, or action excited: (as,
'A hot pursuit').

Nor law, nor clerks of conscience will we hear,
When in hot search of gain and full career. Dryden.

7. Pungent.

Hotbed. s.

1. Bed of earth made hot by the fermentation of dung.

The bed we call a hotbed is this: there was taken horse-dung, old and well rotted; this was laid upon a bank half a foot high, and supported round about with planks, and upon the top was cast sifted earth
two fingers deep.—Is.
Preserve the hotbed as much as possible from rain.
— Evelyn.

2. Figuratively. Place favourable for the growth or development of anything.

Edinburgh is a hot-bed of genius. I have had the good fortune to be made acquainted with many authors of the first distinction; such as the L...
Humes, Robertson, Smith, Wallace, Blair, Ferguson, Walker, &c. and I have found them all as agreeable in conversation as they are instructive and entertaining in their writings. These acquaintances I owe to the friendship of Dr. Carlyle, who wants nothing but inclination to figure with the rest upon paper. Smollett, Expedition of Humphrey Clinker.

Used adjectivally.

This I perceive, that when a seed grows old,
Converts are few, and the converted cold:

HOTL

First comes the hot-bed heat, and while it glows,
The plants spring up, and each with vicar crowns;
Then comes the cooler day,—and though awhile
The verdure pines and the blossoms smile,
Yet pour the fruit, and forward by long day,
Nor will the profits for the culture pay.
The skilful gardener then no longer stops,
But turns to other beds for bearing crops.

Crabbe, The Borough, Religious &c.

Hotblooded. adj. Having a fiery temper; lustful.

Those who intrust a petulant, hot-blooded, ill-informed lad with power, are more to blame than he for the mischief which he may do with it. How could it be expected of a lively page, raised by a wild freak of fortune to the first influence in the empire, that he should have bestowed any serious thought on the principles which ought to guide judicial decisions?—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Bacon.

Now the hot-blooded gods assist me! remember,
Jove thou wast a bull for thy Europa. Id., Merry
Wives of Windsor, v. 5.

Hotbrained. adj. Violent; vehement; furious.

You shall find 'em, their hotbrained youth,

Hotchpotch. s. [?] ]

1. Mingled hush; mixture; confused mass.

Such patching maketh Littleton's hotchpot of an fortune, and, in effect, brings the same rather to a habeshish confusion than any one entire language.—Camden, Remains.

A mixture of many disagreeing colours is ever unpleasant to the eye, and a mixture or hotchpotch of many tastes is unpleasant to the taste. Bacon, Natu- ral and Experimental History.

Nor limbs, nor bones, nor carcase would remain;
But a mass'd heap, a hotchpotch of the slain.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

2. In Law. See extract.

A daughter which hath had given unto her any lands in frank-marriage, claiming to be coheir her father's death to other lands with some sisters, is constrained to suffer that part of land given her before her father's death, to be put in hotchpot, that is, to be mingled together with the lands whereof her father died seized, so that an equal division may be made of the whole. Littleton: 1626.

Hotcockles. s. [Fr. hantes coquilles.] Play in which one covers his eyes, and guesses who strikes him.

He laughs and kicks like Chrysippus when he saw an ass eat a lie; and sits upon hotcockles till he is blazed abroad, and, withal, treats his neighbours to make bonfires for his cool nap, and curseth all the bells of the parish to ring forth the peals of his own fame. Optick Glass of Humours: 1659. (Curea
by H. & W.)

The chryndra is certainly not our hotcockles; for that was by pinching, not by striking. Arbuthnot and Pope.

As at hotcockles once I laid me down,
And felt the weighty hand of many a clown,
Buxoms gave a gentle nip, and I
Quick rose, and read soft mischief in her eye.

Gay, The Shepherd's Week, Monday.

Hotel. s. [French.] Inn (generally implying one of a superior kind).

Hotheaded. adj. Vehement; violent; pussionate.

One would not make the same person zealous for a standing army and publick liberty, nor a hot- headed, crackbrained exorbitant forward for a scheme of moderation. Arbuthnot.

By this declaration, she made her own peace with Jerry; but the hot-headed boy is more than ever incensed against Wilson. Smollett, Expedition of Humphrey Clinker.

A few hot-headed men wished to bring in a bill, which should at once annul all the statutes passed by the Long Parliament, and should restore the Star Chamber and the High Commission; but the reaction, violent as it was, did not proceed quite to this length. Macaulay, History of England, ch. ii.

Hothouse. s.

1. Place to sweat in; bagnio: (with which word it agrees in having the secondary bad sense of brothel).

Now she professes a hthouse, which is a very ill house too. Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 1.
Where lately harboured many a famous whore,
A purging bill, now it's upon the door,
Tells you it is a hthouse; so it may,
And still be a whorehouse: they are synonymous.

B. Jonson.

2. Place enclosed, and covered, and kept hot, for rearing tender plants, and ripening fruits.

Hotly. adv. In a hot manner.

1. With heat; not coldly.

The shadow had forsaken them,
And Titan, tired in the mid-day heat,
With burning eye did hottly overlook them.
Shakespeare, Venus and Adonis.

2. Violently; vehemently.

The star was in the end so hottly pursued, that he was driven to make courage of despair.—*Sir P.
Sidney.*

I do contest
As hottly and as nobly with thy love,
As ever in ambitious strength I did
Contend against thy valor.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iv. 3.

3. Lustfully.

Voracious birds, that hottly bill and breed,
And largely drink, because on salt they feed.
Dryden.

Hotmouthed. adj. Headstrong; ungovernable.

I fear my people's faith,
That hotmouth'd beast that bears against the curb,
Hard to be broken.
Dryden, Spanish Friar.

Hotness. s. Attribute suggested by Hot.

God is the god of hotness, as heat is the heat of hotness.—Queen's of Christian Religion, (Ord Mn.)

Hotpress. v. a. Place sheets of paper between heated plates of metal, in order to give smoothness and a glaze to them.

While Southey's epics earn the creaking shelves,
And little's lyric shine in hot-pressed twelves.
Byron, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers.

Hotpressing. part. adj. Act of one who hotpresses.

Hotpressing, in printing, [is] a mode of giving a glossy appearance to books. The printed sheets are placed between glazed or milled boards to a thickness (together of about five inches, and laid on two cold iron plates at the bottom of a hydraulic or screw-press, then a cold plate, a hot plate, another cold plate, a further supply of sheets between glazed boards, and so on till the press is full. The press is then pumped up, or screwed down with a powerful lever, and left for a short time.—Brown and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Hotshot. s.

1. ? Slang term for some sort of soldier.

When those inferior princes' houses are guarded by hungry inferior halberdiers, and reverend rusty bill-men, with a brace or two of hot-shots, so that their palaces are more like prisons than the free and noble courts of commanding potentates.—Ibid.
(Sares by H. & W.)

2. P Stimulant; provocative.

In the rearward comes Captain Crab, Lieutenant Lobster, (whose catching claws always put me in mind of a serpent,) the blushing prawn, the well-armed oyster, the scallop, the wilke, the mussel, cockle, and the periwinkle; these are hot-shots, ven-erous provocateurs, daisy in substance, and fleshy in operation. Agassiz the Water-ped, Works: 1630.
(Sares by H. & W.)

Hotspur. s.

1 Violent, passionate, precipitate and heady person.

My nephew's trespass may be well forgot;
It hath the excuse of youth and heat of blood,
A hairbrain'd hotspur govern'd by a spleen.
Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 2.

Wars are begun by hairbrained dissolute captains, parasitical farmers, unquiet hotspurs, and restless innovators. Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy.

2. Kind of pen so called.

Of such pens as are planted or sown in gardens,
the hotspur is the speediest of any in growth.—
Mortimer, Husbandry.

Used adjectively.

Of God observ'd

The one just man alive, by his command,
Shall build a wondrous ark, as thou beheld'st,
To save himself and household from amidst
A world devote to universal wreck.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 817.

He has always taken to himself, amongst the sons of men, a peculiar household of his love, which at all times he has cherished as a father, and governed as a master: this is the proper household of faith; in the first sense of the word, it was sometimes literally no more than a single household, or some few families.—Bishop Sprat.

Great crimes must be with greater crimes repaid,
And second funerals on the former laid;
Let the whole household in one ruin fall,
And may Diana's curse o'ertake us all.

Dryden, Fables.

Learning's little household did embark,
With her world's fruitful system in her sacred ark.

Swift.

Howen. s. See extract.

Howen, a disease common to cattle on eating 1.... greedily of green clover. It consists in the pangs of the creature being swelled to a very great degree, which, after, if not prevented, puts an end to the life. Complete Farmer. (Ord MS.)

Howor. v. n.

1. Hang in the air over head, without flying off one way or other.

Al, my poor princess! al, my tender babes! If you your gentle souls fly in the air, And be not fix'd in down perpetual, Howor about me with your airy wings, And hear your mother's lamentation. Shakespeare, Richard III, iv. 3.

Great flights of birds are howoring about the bridge, and settling upon it. Addison. Till as the earthly part decays and falls, The captive breaks her prison's mould'ring walls; Howors a-while upon the sad remains, Which now the pile, or sepulchre, contains. And thence with liberty unbounded flies, I patient to regain her native sky. Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto ii.

Some less refin'd, beneath the moon's pale light Howor, and catch the shooting stars by night, Or suck the mists in grosser air below, Or dip their pinions in the painted bow. Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto ii.

2. Stand in suspense or expectation.

The landlord will no longer covenant with him; for that he daily looketh after change and alternation, and howor in expectation of new worlds. Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

3. Wander about one place.

We see so warlike a prince at the head of so great an army, howoring on the borders of our confederates. Addison.

The truth and certainty is seen, and the mind fully possesses itself of it; in the other, it only howors about it. Locke.

Howor. s. Protection; shelter by hanging over. Rare.

The pond also breedeth crabs, eels, and shrimps; and in the beginning, oysters grew upon the boughs of trees, (an Indian miracle), which were cast in thither to serve as a howor for the fish. Curee, Surgery of Ceylon.

Howoring. part. adj. Hang over.

A howoring mist came swimming o'er his sight, And seal'd his eyes in everlasting night. Dryden.

Howoring. verbal abs. Act, or state, of one who howors.

A new play had just been acted, and the conversation, after a few preliminary howorings, settled upon it. Sir E. B. Lytton, Pelham.

How. adv. [A.S. hu, hwa. See Who.]

1. In what manner.

Mark'd you not, How that the guilty kindred of the queen Look'd pale, when they did hear of Clarence' death? Prosecute the means of thy deliverance By ransom, or how else. Shakespeare, Richard III, ii. 1.

'Tis much in our power how to live; but not at all when or how to die. Sir R. L. Edranger.

It is pleasant to see how the small territories of this little republic are cultivated to the best advantage. Addison, Travels in Italy.

2. To what degree.

How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? Ezekiel, x. 3. How much better is it to get wisdom than gold! and to get understanding rather to be chosen than silver! Proverbs, xvi. 16.

How oft is the candle of the wicked put out! and how oft cometh their destruction upon them! Job, xli. 17.

O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day. Psalms, cxi. 97. How many children's plights, and mother's cries! How many woful widows left to bow To sad disgrace! David, Civil Wars of York and Lancaster.

Consider into how many differing substances it may be analysed by the fire. Boyle.

3. For what reason; from what cause.

How now, my love? Why is your cheek so pale? Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, i. 1. How is it thou hast found it so quickly? Genesis, xxvii. 10.

4. For what price.

How a score of ewes now? Shakespeare, Henry IV, Part II, iii. 2.

5. By what means.

Men would have the colours of birds' feathers, if they could tell how; or they will have gay skins instead of gay clothes. Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

6. In what state.

For how shall I go up to my father? Genesis, xli. 34. Whence am I forc'd, and whither am I borne? Dryden, Translation of the Eucrid.

7. It is used in a sense marking proportion or correspondence.

Behold, he put no trust in his servants; and his angels he charged with folly; how much less in them that dwell in houses of clay, whose foundation is in the dust? Job, iv. 18.

A great division fell among the nobility, so much the more dangerous by how much the spirits were more active and high. Sir J. Haygarth.

By how much they would diminish the present extent of the sea, so much they would impair the fertility and fountains and rivers of the earth. Jussieu.

8. That.

Thick clouds put us in some hope of land, knowing how that part of the South-sea was utterly unknown, and might have islands or continents. Bacon.

9. Used interjectionally.

How are the mighty fallen! 2 Samuel, i. 19. How doth the city sit solitary as a widow! Lamentations, i. 1.

10. Used substantively.

We examine the how and the why of things. Sir R. Edranger.

All came out about Lady Afy; and they made up for their long and previous ignorance, or, as they now boldly blustered, their long and considerate forbearance. Sheds given away gratis, edition on Saturday night for the country, and woots of the Pavilion Fête: the when, the how, and the wherefore. A. The summer-house, and Lady Aphrodite meeting the young Duke. B. The hedge behind which Sir Lucius Grafton was concealed. C. Kensington Gardens, and a cloudy morning; and so on. B. Disraeli the younger, The Young Duke, i. iii. ch. xiii.

Howbeit. adv. Nevertheless; notwithstanding; yet; however.

Things so ordained are to be kept, howbeit not necessarily any longer than till there grow some urgent cause to ordain the contrary. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

There is a knowledge which God hath always revealed unto them in the works of nature; this they honour and esteem highly as profound wisdom, howbeit this wisdom saveth them not. Ibid.

There was no army transmitted out of England, howbeit the English colonies in Ireland did win ground upon the Irish. Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

Howdy. s. [?] Midwife. Obsolete, or provincial.

I once heard an etymon of howdy to the following effect: how d'ye; midwives being great gossipers! This is evidently of a piece with Swift's 'All eyes under the grate.' Brand, Popular Antiquities, i. 451.

Howdye. [contracted from how do ye, and sometimes augmented to how d'ye do.] In what state is your health?

I now write no letters but of plain business, or plain howdye's, to those few I am forced to correspond with. Pope.

The charge receiv'd, away run I, And here, and there, and yonder fly, With services, and howdye's; Then home return full fraught with news. Dodley.

However. adv.

1. In whatsoever manner; in whatsoever degree.

This ring he holds In most rich choice; yet in his idle fire,

To buy his will, it would not seem too dear,
How'er repented of.

Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, iii. 7.

Now I feel thy power

Within me clear, not only to discern
Things in their causes, but to trace the ways
Of highest agents, down'd how'er wile.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 683.

2. At all events; happen what will; at least.
Our chief end is to be freed from all, if it may be,
how'er from the greatest evils; and to enjoy, if it may be, all good, how'er the chiefest.—Archbishop Tillotson.

3. Nevertheless; notwithstanding; yet.
In your excuse your love does little say;
You might how'er have took a fairer way, Dryden.
His views are bounded out at all sides by several ranges of mountains, which are how'er at so great a distance, that they leave a wonderful variety of beautiful prospects.—Addison, Travels in Italy.
Few turn their thoughts to examine how those dis-casses in a state are bred, that hasten its end, which would, how'er, be a very useful inquiry.—Swift.

Howitzer. s. [German direct, haubitze.] See extract.

Howitzers in artillery are a kind of mortars invented by the Germans about the year 1563 or 1594, which are mounted upon carriages like travelling gun-carriages, and have their muzzles placed nearly in the middle. The construction of howitzers is as various as that of mortars, excepting the chambers, which are all cylindric. They are all distinguished by the diameter of their bore.—Rees, Encyclopædia.

Howker. s. [German direct, huker.] Vessel so called, much used by the Dutch.

Howkers carry from fifty to two hundred ton;
and with a small number of hands will go to the East Indies; they are commonly navigated with two masts, viz. a main-mast and a mizen mast;
they tack soon and short, will sail well, and lie near the wind, and live almost in any sea.—Chambers.

Howl. v. n. [Lat. ululo.]

1. Cry as a wolf or dog.

Methought a legion of foul fiends
Environ'd me, and howl'd in mine ears
Such hideous cries, that with the very noise
I trembling wak'd. Shakespeare, Richard III. i. 4.
He found him in a desert land, and in the waste howling wilderness. Deuteronomy, xxxii. 10.
Hard as his native rocks, cold as his sword,
Pierce as the wolves that howl'd around his birth
He hates the tyrant, and the suppliant scorns.
Smith.

2. Utter cries in distress.

Therefore will I howl, and cry out for all Moab.—
Jeremiah, xlviii. 31.
I have words
That would be howl'd out in the desert air,
Where hearing should not catch them.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.
Pence, monster, pence! I to tell thy horrid tale
To savages, and howl it out in deserts!—A. Phillips.

Howl. s.

1. Cry of a wolf or dog.

Alarid by his sentinel the wolf,
Whose howl's his watch. Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.
These and the like rumours are no more than the last howls of a dog dissected alive.—Swift.

2. Cry of a human being in horror.

She raves, she runs with a distracted pace,
And fills with horrid howls the public place.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 320.

Howler. s. One who howls. In Zoology.

Howling ape of the genus Myceles.

In the platyrrhines the cranium is proportionally larger and the jaws less, as the species are smaller in size; they thus exemplify the immature characters of the larger species. The cranium is more globular, the occiput more protuberant, the foramen magnum more advanced in position, and with a more downward aspect, in the marmosets and outlets or ti-tis, than in the howlers. . . . In the red howler the superciliary region is almost flat and vertical, at right angles with the parietal surface, from which it is separated by a well-defined ridge; the foramen magnum looks almost directly backward. . . . The chief feature of peculiarity in the skull of the howler is the extraordinary depth of the mandibular ramus, especially of their angular and re-cending portions. This development relates to the protection and support of the still more extraordinarily developed laryngeal and laryngeal apparatus —the organs of the loud and dissonant cries which have procured for these South American monkeys their common name.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Howlet. s. [Fr. hulotte.] Little owl.

Electric, dancing apes, howlettes, merenaydes, and other odious monsters.—Bala on the Revolutions, 1830.
Alder's fork, and blind worm's sting,
Lizard's leg, and howlet's wing.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

Out, thou howl!
Then should'st ha' given me a mangle-owl, and then
Th' hadst made a present of thyself.

R. Johnson, Sad Shepherd.

Howling. part. adj. Wild: (as, 'a howling wilderness').

Howling. verbal abs.

1. Cry of a wolf or dog.

As when a sort of wolves infest the night
With their wild howlings at fair Cynthia's light.
Waller.

2. The cry of one in distress.

The songs of the temple shall be howlings in that day.—A. M., viii. 3.
The damned use that word in hell,
Howlings attend it.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iii. 3.

3. Any loud or horrid noise.

With hollow howlings they did chant
That hellish ode.
Dr. H. More, Poems, p. 327: 1647.
A peal of thunder immediately follows, with dreadful howlings.—Dryden, King Arthur.

Howso. adv. [for howsoever.] Although.

Let greatness go, so it go without thee:
And welcome come, howso unfortunate.
Daniel, Civil War, b. ii.

Howsoever. adv.

1. In what manner soever.

Herous, who, after Moses, was one of the most ancient, howsoever he hath been since corrupted, doth in the substance of all agree. Sir W. Raleigh,
History of the World.

2. Although.

The man doth fear God, howsoever it seems not in him.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 3.

How. v. a. Hough; ham-string.

Thou art a coward,
Which hows homely behind, restraining
From course required.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.
Leontine perceived the old soldier's meaning,
and with his sword how'd his horse, saying aloud,
This day, valiant soldiers, shall you have me both your general and fellow-soldier, fighting on foot as one of yourselves. Kauffman, History of the Turks.

How. s. [Dutch, huy.] Large boat sometimes with one deck.

He sent to Germany, strange aid to rear;
From whence oft-sons arrived here three hogs
Of Saxons, whom he for his safety employs.
Spenser, Faerie Queer.
To define a large and hog, which are between a boat and a ship, is hard.—Watts, Logic.

How. Interjection meaning stop, stay.

Away, nasty C. E. transformed by Green! How!
back to her sty!—Bishop Hall, Humour of the Married Couple, p. 16.
When one ship hails another, the words are,
What ship's how? That is, stop, and tell the name of your ship. Pope, Anecdotes of the English Language, p. 10.

Hubbub. s. Tumult; riot.

They heard a noise of many harpings shrill,
And shrieking howls then approaching near,
Which all the forest did with horror fill.
Spenser, Faerie Queer, iii. 10. 43.

An universal howl was heard
Of stunning sounds, and voices all confus'd,
Rome through the hollow dark, assaults his ear
With loudest vehemence.

Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 951.
Voices raise a hubbub at her
And dogs howl when she shines in water.

People pursued the business with all contempt of the government; and in the hubbub of the first day there appeared nobody of name or reckoning, but the actors were really of the dregs of the people.—
Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.
For six mortal hours it lasts, in this manner:
the infinite hubbub unbroken.—Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. i. b. ii. ch. vi.

. . . the mighty and opulent Amsterdam, renowned throughout the world for its haven bristling with immense masts, its canals bordered by stately mansions, its gorgeous hall of state, walled, roofed, and floored with polished marble, its warehouses filled with the most costly productions of Ceylon and Surinam, and its Exchange resounding with the endless hubbub of all the languages spoken by civilized men.—Macaulay, History of England,
ch. ix.

Hubbub-bos. s. Hubbub.

Within this hour the goshubub
Will be all over the prison: I am then Kissing the man they look for.
Deuonport and Fletcher, Two Noble Kinsmen.

His followers and kin,
Who sat and near came crowding in.
With hubbub-bos. Irish Hudibras: 1689.
Not the sweet harp that's claim'd by Jews,
Not that which to the far more ancient Welsh belongs.

Nor that which the wild Irish use,
Frightening even their own wolves with loud hub-bubos. S. Wesley, Pindaric on a Hog.

Huckaback. s. [P] Coarse linen with a raised surface (as that of towels) so called.
He bought a lot of damaged huckaback to cut into kitchen towels.—Colman the younger, Heir-at-Law.

Was your face ever sent for the housemaid to scrub?
Did you ever feel huckaback softened with mud?
Had you ever your nose towelled up to a snub?
Or your eyes knuckled out with the back of the hand. T. Hood.

Hucking. part. adj. Acting as a huckster.
A man, and hard, and huckish chapman shall never buy good flesh.—Hales, Sermon at the end of his Ream, p. 20: 1673.

Huckle. s. According to preceding editions,
hip. See Hucklebone.

Though beaten down and wounded sore,
I'm the shille, and a leg that bore
One side of him, and that of bone,
But much it's hurt, the wooden one;
Straight—getting up on stump and huckle,
He with the fee began to huckle. Haller, Hudibras, b. ii.

Hucklebone. s. [P] Hip-bone; ♀ last vertebra of the sacrum. In Anatomy.
Os coccygis.

Nay, and that were the worst, we would not greatly care.
For burning of her huckle-bone, or breaking of her elm.
But green ter is her grief.
Giamor Ginton's Nestle: 1551.

Huckster. s. [see extract from Wedgwood.]

1. One who sells goods by retail, or in small quantities; a pedlar.

There cannot be a more infamous trade than the being hucksters to such vile merchandise.—Dr.
H. More, Government of the Tongue.
God deliver the world from such guides, or rather such hucksters of souls, the very shame of religion.
—South, Sermons, ii. 335.

Should thy shoe wrench aside, down, down you fall,
And overturn the wadding huckster's stall,
The gelding huckster shall not o'er thee moan,
But pence expect for nuts and pears o'erthrown.
Gay, Trivia, li. 123.

There should be a confederacy of all servants, to drive these China hucksters from the doors.—Swift.

2. Usurer.

A merchant shall hardly keep himself from doing wrong, and an huckster shall not be freed from sin. Ecclesiastical, xvi. 29.

3. Trickish mean fellow.

Now the ape wanted his huckster man.
Spenser, Morte d'Arthur's Tale.
Some such desperate huckster should devise
To rowze thine lame's heart from her cowardice.
Bishop Hall, Satire, iv. 4.

[Huckster.—German, huck, hucker, a retailer, regenerator. . . .
Dutch, hucker, hucker, camp, propola. (Kilian.)
Bavarian, hucker, hucker, hucker; Swabian, hucker, hucker, a petty dealer, huckster. The term has always implied a certain amount of obloquy, like regener or regenerator, and similes, like them, one who sells at second-hand at an advanced price. The Liber Abbot of the City of London contains an ordinance enjoining the city officers that "demoniaci de mille vitaille soient reventours, no huckster de crovoise." 1. 46. It is essentially the name
I with German weacher; Dutch, weacher, wecker, hucker; Swabian, hucker; Old Norse, okr, (interred, mury, properly increase, from the same source with Latin, augere; Gothic, aukan; Anglo-Saxon, ecran, to increase. The Old High German weacher is applied to the increase of plants; erde-weacher, the fruits of the earth. (Notker.) It is plain that huck- ster was understood as signifying an encroacher or enhancer of prices when it was translated in Latin augetarius, augeter. Augeter is a Latin word used by Cicero and deprecandum clericequibus reatund
uolue care erona, prima, poma, priu, lactura, natura.
(John de Garlandia and Glosses.) Augeter, a huckster, (Nominale in Sak. Antiquities.) Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Huckster. v. a. Make a matter of bargain.

Some who had been called from shops and warehouses, without other merit, to sit in supreme councils, (as their breeding was) fell to huckster the commonwealth.—Milton, History of England, b. iii.

Huckster. v. n. Deal in petty bargains.

Despotism itself is obliged to truck and huckster
The sultan gets such obedience as he can. His governors with a loose rein, that he may govern at all.—
Burke, Speech on Conciliation with America.

Hucksterage. s. Dealing; business.
The ignoble hucksterage of piddling tithe.—
Milton, Of Reformation in England.

Hucksterer. s. Huckster.
Those hucksterers or money-jobbers will be found necessary, if this brass money is made current.—Swift.

Huddle. v. g.

1. Dress up close so as not to be discovered; muddle.

2. Put on carelessly in a hurry.

At twelve she rose with much ado;
Her clothes were huddled on by two.

Prior, Hans Carvel.

Now all in haste they huddle on
Their hoods, their cloaks, and get them gone,
Swift, Journal of a Modern Lady.

3. Cover up in haste.

Young, fair, and good! ah, why should young, and
fair,
And good be huddled in untimely grave?

Edwards, Sonnets, 37.

4. Perform in a hurry.

I have given much application to this poem: this is not a play huddled up in haste.—Dryden.

When continued rain
The lab'ring husband in his house restrain,
Let him forecast his work with timely care,
Which else is huddled when the skies are fair.

Bl., Translation of the Georgics, l. 350.

"I huddle on my clothes and get dressed by one."
Faust, The Recluse, ii. 1.

The duke of Gironen gave a dinner to several of the principal men in the city to settle the loan.
Mr. Townsend came in his night-gown, and after dinner, when the terms were settled, . . . said the loan was full, huddled up his papers, got into a chair, and returned home, reserving for himself by this manoeuvre, a large share in the loan. Letter of Sir George Coker, cited in Walpole's Memoirs.
Him they crush down, and huddle under-ground,
In this impatient way.—Carlyle, The French Revolution,
pt. i. b. i. ch. iv.

It had been so from the beginning: "They huddle up a peace with all everywhere," says Tertullian, "for it maketh no matter to them, although they hold different doctrines, so long as they conspire together in their sieve against the one thing, Truth."—*J. H.
Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. iv. § 2.*

5. Throw together in confusion.

Our adversary, huddling several suppositions together, and that in doubtful and general terms, makes a muddle and confusion. Lacke.

But here, thou say'st the miseries of life
Are huddled in a group. Young, Night Thoughts, viii.

Huddle. v. n. Come in a crowd or hurry.

Glance an eye of pity on his losses,
That have of late so huddled on his back,
Enough to press a royal merchant down.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

Their eyes are more imperfect than others;
for they will run against things, and huddling forwards, fall from high places.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Huddle. s. • C'fowd; tumult; confusion:
(with the sense of obscurity).

That the Aristotelian philosophy is a huddle of words and terms insignificant, has been the censure of the wisest.—Glanville.

Nature doth nothing in a huddle.

Sir R. L'Estrange.

The understanding sees nothing distinctly in things remote, and in a huddle.—Lacke.

Several merry answers were made to my question, which entertained us till bed-time, and filled my mind with a huddle of ideas.—Addison.

Huddler. s. One who huddles.

As confused huddler of things.—Cotgrave and Sherrard.

Huddling. part. adj. Confused.

Brown answered after his blunt and huddling manner.—Bacon.

Hue. s. [A.S. hwe, hwean.] Colour; dye.

For never in that land
Face of fair body she before did view,
Or that dread Lyon's look her cast in deadly hue.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

To add another hue unto the rainbow,
Is wasteful and ridiculous excess.

Shakespeare, King John, iv. 2.

Flowers of all hue, and without blum the rose.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 256.

To whom the angel, with a smile that glow'd
Celestial ray red, love's proper hue,
Answer'd.

Ibid., viii. 618.

Your's is much of the caution hue,
To change the die with a distant view.

Dryden.

Hue (in Hue and Cry). s. [N.Fr. huer = hoot, shout.] Clamour; legal pursuit;
alarm given to the country.

Hue and cry, villain, go! Assist me, knight, I am undone! fly, run, hue and cry, villain, I am undone.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 5.
Immediately comes a hue and cry after a gang of thieves, that had taken a purse upon the road.—*Sir
R. L'Estrange*.

If you should hiss, he swears he'll hiss as high;
And, like a culprit, join the hue and cry.—Addison.
The hue and cry went after Jack, to apprehend him dead or alive, wherever he could be found.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

At every town he enters, he must change his liveries and name. Which ever way he flies, the hue and cry of the country pursues him.—Junius,
Letters, let. 30.

Huff. v. n. [see extract from Wedgwood.]
Bluster; storm; bounce; swell with indignation or pride.

Therefore the maids and Roman matrons all,
A shadowing veil before their face did wear;
Their heavenly hue did throw no man to thrall;
They were content with plain and decent gear,
They huff it not with painted fringed hair.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 215.

This senseless arrant conceit of theirs made them huff at the doctrine of repentance, as a thing below them.—South, Sermons.

When Pig received John's message, she huffed and stormed like the devil. Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

[The natural expression of displeasure, assuming the shape under different circumstances of anger, despair, or contempt, is a whiff of breath through the nostrils, or protruded lips. Hence to snuff or snuff at, to treat with contempt; to take a thing in snuff, to receive it with displeasure.

"Sharp breaths of anger puffed
Her fairy nostrils out." (Tennyson.)

To huff, which signifies in the first instance to blow, is only used in the sense of showing one's displeasure, giving one a sharp answer. The endeavour to represent the sound of a snuff or blast of contempt or anger has given rise to several interjec-tions, expressive of such feelings, pish, pshaw, tut tush, Old English puff (several word Promptorium Parvulorum), pout, French, tut (an interjection importing indignation, tut, tut, ty man Col-grave), German, trotz. —Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Huff. i

1. Swell; puff.

In many wild birds the diaphragm may easily be huffed up with air, and blown in at the windpipe.—Grew.

Ecclesiencies called emphysemata, like unto bladders, puffed up and huffed with wind.—Mollat,
Translation of Pting. (Rich.)

2. Hector; treat with insolence and arrogance, or brutality.

The commissioner at Magdalen College said to
Dr. Hough, You must not presume to huff us.
Echard.

A conceited thing—she need not be so easy neither—I am as handsome as she, I hope.
—"I'll try."—rather I am to be huffed by her,
or no.—Gibber, The Careless if daunt.

Take huff. Take offence.

So I was christened Gilbert, and lost my liberty, Sir Charles having taken a huff at my not being named after him.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney,
vol. i. ch. i.

Huff. n. —To puff or blow, as whiff, or German,
huchen, to breathe or blow, from a representation of the sound. To huff up, to puff up, swell with wind. . . . Then, as an angry person puffs and blows, a huff, a fit of passion; to take huff, to take offence;
to give one a huff, to speak like an angry man to one, to give him a rebuke. . . . To huff one's draughts is so called because the move is accompanied by blowing on the piece. Danish, blæse en brækk, to blow on a piece, to huff at draughts; Polish, chuck!
I huff you; chuchen, to blow.—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Huff. s. Swell of sudden anger or arrogance.

Quoth Ralpho, honour's but a woe!
To swear by, only in a word;

In others it is but a huff.

To vapour with instead of proof. Bulter, Hudibras.

A Spaniard was wonderfully upon the huff about his extraction. Sir R. L'Estrange.

No man goes about to ensure or circumvent another in a passion, to lay trains, and give secret blows in a present huff.—South, Sermons.

Low shallow-brained huffs make Atheism and contempt of religion the male badge and character of wit. Id.

Huff-cap. s. Blusterer; bully.

As for you, colour'd huff-cap, you shall try before a civil magistrate who's the greater plottor.—Dryden,
Spanish Friar.

Huffer. s. Same as Huff-cap.

Nor have I leav'd my art
To be expos'd to 'till end to suffer,
By such a brazen'd huffer. Bulter, Hudibras.

Huffness. s. Attribute suggested by Huffy.

Their understandings being but crass and huff-ness of mind, and an ambition of approving themselves the brachiers and maintainers of strange paradoxes.—Annotations on Glanville, &c., p. 248 1632.

Huffing. part. adj. Blustering.

A huffing, shining, flat'ring, cringing coward.
A cankerworm of peace, was raised above him. Oweay.

A thief and justice, fool and knave,
A huffing, officer and slave. Bulter, Hudibras.
Huffing to upwards, flinging to the bravo,
To knaves a fool, to credulous fools a knave.

Now what's his end? O charming glory, say!
What, a fifth act to crown his huffing play? Dryden.

What a small pittance of reason and truth is mixed with those huffing opinions they are swelled with.—Lacke.

Huffy. adj. Windy; unsubstantial.

The way of physiologizing by matter, forms and qualities, is a more huffy and phantasmal thing than the other.—Cudworth, 63. (Ord MS.)

Hug. v. a.

1. Press close in an embrace.

He hugged my fortune,
And hugg'd me in his arms.

Shakespeare, Richard III. i. 4.

What would not he do now to hug the creature that had given him so admirable a serenade!—*Sir
R. L'Estrange*.

Even in that turn their brother they confess,
And hug it in their arms, and to their bosom press.

Dryden.

Sheridan, when he concluded, contrived, with a knowledge of stage effect which his father might have envied, to sink back, as if exhausted, into the arms of Burke, who hugged him with the energy of generous admiration. Moranby, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

2. Hold fast.

Age makes us most fondly hug and retain the good things of life, when we have the least prospect of enjoying them.—Bishop Atterbury.

3. Fondle; treat with tenderness.

I, under fair pretence of friendly ends
And well-plac'd words of glowing courtesy,
Dallied with reasons not implausible,
Wined me into the easy-hearted man,
And hug him into snare.—Milton, Comus, 160.

We hug deformities, if they bear our names.
Glanville.

Admire yourself,
And, without rival, hug your darling book.

Boswell.

Though they know that the flatterer knows the falseness of his own flatteries, yet they lose the impudor, and with both arms hug the abuse.—South,
Sermons.

Mark with what joy he hugs the dear discovery.
Bacon.

Construction reflective. Applaud or congratulate one's self, on account of supposed advantage or superiority.

These shall be declared the rightful heirs of the kingdom, when the presumed sons of it, who hugged themselves as the only favourites of heaven, and warmed their hands by their own fantastic fires, who flew aloft, on the wings of imagination, and prondly looked down upon the modest and humble believer: . . . these, we have reason to think, shall then be cast out.—Glanville, Sermons, p. 315.

Not to mention the wonderful delight of hugging men in power, and hugging oneself in a corner with mighty satisfaction for what you have done.—Swift, Examiner, no. 26.

I enjoy, I hug myself in your torments, I exult in the terror with which you will hear of each new enterprise, each new daring, each new triumph of myself and my gallant comrades.—Sir E. B. Lytton, Engage Aram, b. iii. ch. ii.

[The utterance induced by the shudder of cold is represented in different dialects by the interjections eph! u! uk! hu! uhu! schuck! . . . Another mode in which cold affects the frame is to make us crouch together, bringing the elbows to the side and crossing the arms upon the breast. Hence, English, hug, or huggle, to huddle, crouch in one's bed for cold.
In the ordinary sense of the word the reference to cold is lost, and all that remains is the notion of pressing the arms upon the chest, pressing something closely to one's breast. From the same image are Dutch, huck-schoulers n, to shrug the shoulders;
hucken, to crouch; Swedish, huka sig, sitta huka; Danish, sitte paa hug, to squat on one's hams. The introduction of an r (always useful in the expression of shivering) gives English, huck, to cuddle, huckle, to shrug up the back. (Halliwell.) To huck-le, to crouch, draw the body together; huckle-back, as English, huckle-backed, crump-backed (Smiskin). Dutch, hucken, as well as hucken, to crouch, (Kilian); Old Norse (with transposition of the r), hruck, crouching, shrugging; . . . English, to ruck, to squat on the hams. The same insertion of an r is seen in Scandinavian, huckle, to crouch or bow together like a cat or a hedgehog, as compared with English huddle, or with Pl. Dutch, hudders, to shudder; or again, in English, shrug, from schuck!
the interjection of cold, or in crumple, as well as enddle, to crouch with cold.—*Wedgwood, Dictionary of

Hug. s.

1. Close embrace.

Why these close hugs? I owe my shame to him.

2. Particular gripe in wrestling, called a Cornish hug.Knock down, was the word in the civil wars, and we generally added to this skill the knowledge of the Cornish hug, as well as the grapple, to play with hand and foot. — Tutler, no. 173.Huge. adj.

1. Vast; immense.

Let the state of the people of God, when they were in the house of bondage, and their manner of serving God in a strange land, be compared with that which Canaan and Jerusalem did afford; and who with not what large difference there was between them? — Hooker, Reformational Polity.This space of earth is so huge, as that it equalled in greatness, not only Asia, Europe, and Africa, but America. — Abbot.

2. Very great.

Park, huge of bulk, Wallowing unwieldy, enormous in their gait, Tempest the ocean: there Leviathan, Huge of living creatures, in the deep Stretch'd like a promontory, sleeps or swims, And seems a moving land. — Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 410.

2. Greatly; very much.

Some think it is enough, in all instances, if they pray hugely and fervently. — Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 131: 1633.Their case is hugely suspicious, though they then repent and call for mercy. — Id., Holy Dying, § iv. ch. v.A thing so hugely pleasurable. — Hammond, Works, iv. 579.It was hugely accidental, that Josiah king of Israel, being commanded by the prophet to strike upon the ground (2 Kings, xiii.) should strike no other than just three times. — South, Sermons, i. 284.I am hugely bent to believe, that whenever you concern yourselves in our affairs, it is for our good. — Swift.Hugeness. s. Attribute suggested by Huge; enormous bulk; greatness.For though, in hugeness, that blacke fleet of Spain

Did surge surgesse; yet was it farre more slow

In nimble sterage waiting to and fro.

My mistress exceeds in goodness the hugeness of your unworthy thinking. — Shakespeare, Cymbeline, i. 3.Hugeous. adj. Huge. Rare.Certainly the most treble and permanent glory proceedeth of such monuments as by reason were great and notable commoditie and profile to the life of men, rather then of the hugeous heapes of stones of the Pyramids of Egypt, wherein is nought else to see but the fonde and barbarous ostentation of superfluous riches. — Elden, Translation of the Decades of Peter Martyr. (Orel MS.)Huggermugger. s. [Swedish, i mjugg.] Secrecy; bye-place.The patrimony which a few Now hold in huggermugger in their hand, And all the rest do rob of goods and land.— Spenser, Mother Reddard's Tale.

We have done but recently.

In huggermugger to inter him. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, iv. 5.

But if I can but find them out,

Where'er 't be in huggermugger lurk,

I'll make them rue their handy work.

— Butler,  Hudibras.There's a distinction betwixt what's done openly and barefaced, and a thing that's done in huggermugger, under a seal of secrecy and concealment. — Sir R. L. Estlin.The in often, perhaps in conversation generally, omitted; in which case the word is more of an adverb than a substantive.Huggery. s. Flattery; fawning; making up to any one.If we are to believe the Courier, this species of huggery is likely to take place. — Cobbet.Huggy. adj. Huge. Rare, or rhetorical.This huggy rock one finger's force apparently will move. — Cervin, Survey of Cervin.The wide waste, places, and the huggy plain, — Scott, Waverley, Magdalen, induction.

Scarce had he finish'd, when with speckled pride, A serpent from the tomb began to glide.

His huggy bulk on seven high volumes roll'd, Blue was his breadth of back, but streak'd with scaly gold.— Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, v. 111.Huisser. s. [Fr. huisser.] Usher.It makes huisers servicable men. — R. Johnson, Forest.Huke. s. [N.Fr. hucque.] Cloak; mantle.

As we were thus in conference, there came one that to be a messenger in a rich huke. — Hutton, New Atlantis.Hulk. s. [see extract from Wedgwood.]

Sidney*.He look'd, and saw the ark hull on the flood.— Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 840.

People walking down upon the shore saw somewhat come hulling toward them. — Sir R. L. Estlin.Hulver. s. Holly.Save hulver and thorn, thereof shall for to make.— Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good Husbandry.Hum. interj. Sound implying doubt and deliberation.

Let not your ears despise the heaviest sound

That ever yet they heard. — Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

See Sir Robert . . . hum!

And never laugh for all my life to come.

— Pope, Epilogue to the Satires, dialogue i. 27.Hum. v. n.

1. Make the noise of bees.

An airy nation flew.

Thick as the humming bees that hunt the goldendew. — Dryden.

2. Make an inarticulate and buzzing sound.

I think he'll hear me: yet to bite his lip,

And hum at good comings, much ungarter me.— Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 1.

3. Make a confused noise, like that of bustling crowds at a distance.

The city swarms intense: the publick haunt,

Full of each throng and warm with mix'd discourse,

Hums indistinct. — Thomson, Seasons, Winter.

4. Pause in speaking, and supply the interval with an audible emission of breath.

Having pump'd up all his wit,

And hum'd upon it, thus he writ.— Butler, Hudibras.

I still acquiesc'd,

And never hum'd and how'd sedition,Nor smil'd treason. — *Id.*No man by humming and hawing a great while;

but, in the end, he gave up himself to the physicians. — Sir R. L. Estlin.

5. Make a low dull noise; murmur.

Humming rivers, by his cabin creeping,

Rock soft his slumbering thoughts in quiet ease.

— P. Fletcher, Piscatory Eclogues, ii. 17.Still humming on, their drowsy course they keep,

And lash'd so long, like tops, are lash'd asleep.

— Pope.

6. Express applause: (approbation was commonly expressed in public assemblies by a hum, about a century ago).

Here the spectators hum'd. — Gentlemen, this humming is not at all becoming the gravity of this court. — Trial of the Regicides, fol. 49, h. 1000.Hum. v. a.

1. Applaud.

The better sort among them will confess it a rare matter to hear a true edifying sermon in either of their great churches; and that such as are most hummed and applauded there, would be scarcely suffered the second hearing in a grave congregation of pious Christians. — Milton, Apology for Smeaton.

2. Sing low; utter murmuringly or indistinctly.

Hum half a tune. — Pope.The wild wind hums the sullen song to-night.— Ree, G. Lull, Id.: 1780.

To black Heen's summons.

The sherd-horn beetle, with his drowsy hum,Hath rung night's yawning peal. — Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 2.Nor undelightful is the careless hum,

To him who mews through the woods at noon.

— Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

2. Low confused noise, as of bustling crowds at a distance.

From camp to camp, through the foul womb of night,

The hum of either army's stillly sounds.— Shakespeare, Henry V., chorus.

Tower'd cities please us then,

And the busy hum of men,

Where throngs of knight's and barons hold

In weeds of peace high triumphal hold.

— Milton, L'Allegro, 117.

One theatre there is of vast resort,

Which whitens of requests was call'd the court;

Hark now the great exchange of news 'tis held,

And full of hums and buzz from men till night.— Dryden.

Hark to the tramp and the drum,

And the mournful sound of the barbarous horn,

And the flap of the banners, that flit as they're borne,

And the neigh of the steed and the multitude's hum,

And the clash, and the shout, they come! they come!

— Byron, Songs of Corinith.

3. Low dull noise.

Who out the war-at, by the words o'ercome,
Slept fast; the distant nodded to the hum.
Pope, Dunciad, ii. 401.

4. Pause with an inarticulate sound.

These shrugs, these hums and haws,
When you have said all's goodly, come between,
Ere you can say else's house.

Your excuses want some grains to make them current: hum and ha will not do the business.—
Dryden, Spanish Friar.

5. Expression of applause.

You hear a hum in the right place.—Spectator.
The friends of the government were greatly elated by the proceedings of this day. During the following week hopes were entertained that the parliament might be induced to vote a peace establishment of thirty thousand men. But those hopes were delusive. The hum with which William's speech had been received, and the hiss which had drowned
the voice of Seymour, had been misunderstood.—
Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxiil.

Hum. s. Houx.

A landlord of Bath put upon me a queer hum.
Epigram, Oxford Magazine.
I dare say all this is hum, and that all will come back.—Lamb, Letter to Manning.

Hum. s. Strong spirituous liquor.

The taking of tobacco, with which the devil is so delighted:—and calls for hum.
You takers of strong waters and tobacco,
Mark this.
B. Johnson, Devil in an Ass.

Hum. adj. [Lat. humanus; Fr. humain.]

1. Having the qualities of a man.

It will never be asked whether he be a gentleman born, but whether he be a human creature?
Swift.

2. Belonging to a man.

The king is but a man as I am: the violet smells to him as it doth to me; all his senses have but human conditions.—Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 1.
For man to tell how human life began
Is hard; for who himself beginning knew?
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 250.
There, serpent, subtil'st beast of all the field,
I knew; but not with human voice indu'd.
Id., i. 520.

Intuitive knowledge needs no probation, nor can have any, this being the highest of all human certainty.—Locke.

It is no disparagement, therefore, to the sciences of human nature, that those of its general propositions which descend sufficiently into detail to serve as a foundation for predicting phenomena in the concrete, are for the most part only approximately true.
... Human beings do not all feel and act alike in the same circumstances: but it is possible to determine what makes one person, in a given position, feel or act in one way, another in another; how any given mode of feeling and conduct, compatible with the general laws (physical and mental) of human nature, has been, or may be, formed. In other words, mankind have not one universal character, but there exist universal laws for the formation of character. And since it is by these laws, combined with the facts of each particular case, that the whole of the phenomena of human action and feeling are produced, it is on these that every rational attempt to construct the sciences of human nature in the concrete, and for practical purposes, must proceed.—
J. S. Mill, System of Logic.

Humanate. part. adj. Invested with humanity.

Of your saying it followeth, that the bread is hu-manate or incarnate.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 340.

Humane. adj. [Fr. humaine.]

1. Kind; civil; benevolent; good-natured.

Love of others, if it be not spent upon a few, doth naturally spread itself towards many, and maketh men become humane and charitable.—Bacon.
Envy, malice, contentiousness, and revenge are abolished: a new race of virtues and graces, more divine, more moral, more humane, are planted in their stead.—Bishop Sprat.

2. Literate. See Humanity in fourth sense.

These terms do properly signify this gesture in Aristotle, Athenicus, Euripides, Sophocles, and all humane authors.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors,
p. 244. (Ord MS.)

He was well-skilled in all kinds of humane literature.—Wood, Athenae Oxoniense, l. 310. (Ord MS.)

Humanely. adv. Kindly; with good-nature.

If they would yield us the superfluity, while it were wholesome, we might guess they relieved us humanely.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, l. 1.

Humanist. s. Same as Humanitarian.

Physicians use commonly to intend some other art or practice, which they fancy more than their profession, for you shall have of them antiquaries, poets, humanists, statesmen, merchants, divines; and in every of these better seen than in their professions.

—Bacon, Advancement of Learning, b. ii.
Of all sorts of men in the world, none repute themselves, or are reputed by others, wiser, than the profound humanist and cunning politician.—Justus,
Sto. Significat., p. 60.

Humanitarian. s. One who supports the human nature of Christ.

He [Sebastian Benefield] was so noted an humanitarian, disputant, and theologian, and so well read in the fathers and schoolmen, that he had scarce his equal in the university.—A. Wood, Athenae Oxoniense,
(Ord MS.)

Humanity. s.

1. Nature of man.

Look to thyself; reach not beyond humanity.—
Sir P. Sidney.
To preserve the Hebrew intire and uncorrupt, there hath been used the highest caution humanity could invent.—Sir T. Browne.

2. Humankind.

If he can untie those knots, he is able to teach all humanity, and will do well to oblige mankind by his informations.—Gibbes.

3. Benevolence; tenderness.

All men ought to maintain peace, and the common office of humanity and friendship in diversity of opinions.—Locke.
How few, like thee, enquire the wretched out,
And court the office of soft humanity?
Like thee reserve their raiment for the naked,
Reach out their bread to feed the crying orphan,
Or mix their pitying tears with those that weep?
Rice.

4. Philology; grammatical studies. In Latin, humaniores literæ; in French, les humani-tés; with the definite article and plural:

(an academicum term).

If then we may spend some of young years in studies of humanity; what better and more sweet study is there for a young man than poetry?—Harrington, Apology of Poetry.

A man but young,
Yet old in judgement; theoretick and practick
In all humanity.—Massinger, Fatal Dowry.
The most eminent scholars which England produced both in philosophy and humanity.—T. War-ton.

Humanization. s. Investing with the character of Humanity.

The Romans had some of those diversions and amusements, which, though they contribute to the dissipation of our time, do greatly promote the humanization of our manners.—Priestley, Lectures on History, ii. 288. (Ord MS.)

They (the negro slaves) ought to be forcibly reminded of the state in which their brethren in Africa still are, and taught to be thankful for the providence which has placed them within reach of the means of rescue. I know no right except such as flows from righteousness; and as every Christian believes his righteousness to be imputed, so must his right be an imputed right too. It must flow out of a duty, and it is under that name that the process of humanization ought to begin and be conducted throughout.—Cokeridge, Table Talk.

Humanize. v. a. Make human; invest with the character (on the favourable side) of humanity; soften; make susceptible of tenderness or benevolence.

Here will I paint the characters of war.—
And here my faithful tears in showers shall flow,
To humanize the flints whereon I tread.
Sir H. Wotton.

Was it the business of music to humanize our natures with compassion, forgiveness, and all the instances of the most extensive charity?—Adams.

Humanized. part. adj. Invested with the character of humanity.

What entertainment can possibly arise to an elegant and humanized mind, from seeing a noble beast struck to the heart by its merciless hunter, or one of our own weak species cruelly mangled by an animal of much superior strength?—Alsmoth, Cicero,
b. ii. lett. 8. (Ord MS.)

Humanizing. part. adj. Investing with the character of humanity; softening.

Whatever is beneficent and humanizing in the aims, tendencies, and proper objects of the state, it [the church] collects in itself as in a focus to radiate them back in a higher quality; or, to change the metaphor, it completes and strengthens the edifice of the state, without interference or commis-ture, in the mere act of laying and securing its own foundations.—Cokeridge, Church and State, p. 184.

Cyril had himself too much of the hot Egyptian blood in his veins; and the bishop, instead of ally-ing his sanguinary propensity by thoughts and humanizing influences of Christianity, was rarely the last to raise the banner of strife, never the first to lay it down, never laid it down until his enemies were prostrate at his feet.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. ii. ch. iii.

Humankind. s. Mankind.

Bled with a taste exact, yet unconfin'd;
A knowledge both of books and humankind. Pope.

Humanly. adv. In a human manner.

1. After the notions of men; according to the power of men.

Thus the present happy prospect of our affairs, humanly speaking, may seem to promise.—Bishop Astell.

2. Kindly; with good-nature: (now written humanely).

Though learn'd, well bred; and though well bred, sincere;
Modestly bold, and humanly severe. Pope.

Humbird. s. Humming bird.

All ages have conceived the wren the least of birds,
yet our own plantations have shew'd us one far less;
that is, the humbird, not much exceeding a beetle.—
Sir T. Browne.

Humble. adj. [Lat. humilis; Fr. humble.]

1. Not proud; modest; not arrogant.

And mighty proud to humble weak does yield.

We should be as humble in our imperfections and sins as Christ was in the fulness of the spirit, great wisdom, and perfect life.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of Holy Living.

But, if an humble husband may request,
Provide and order all things for the best.
Deighton, Wife of Bath's Tale, 515.

She should be humble, who would please;
And she must suffer, who can love. Prior.

2. Low; not high; not great.

The example of the heavenly lark,
Thy fellow-park, Cowley, under foot,
Above the skies let thy proud music sound,
Thy humble nest build on the ground.
Ah! prince, hadst thou but known the joys which dwell
With humbler fortunes, thou wouldst curse thy royalty!
Rice.

Humble. v. a.

1. Make humble; make submissive; make to bow down with humility.

Humble yourselves under the mighty hand of God,
that he may exalt you. 1 Peter, v. 6.

Let the sinner put away the evil of his doings, and humble himself by a speedy and sincere repentance:
let him return to God, and then let him be assured that God will return to him.—Rogers.

2. Crush; break; subdue; mortify.

We are pleased, by some implicit kind of revenge, to see him taken down and humbled in his reputation, who had so far raised himself above us. Adams.

Fortune not much of humbling me can boast;
Though double tax'd, how little have I lost! Pope.

3. Make to condescend.

This would not be to condescend to their capacities, when he humbles himself to speak to them, but to lose his design in speaking.—Locke.

4. Bring down from a height.

In process of time the highest mountains may be humbled into valleys; and again, the lowest valleys exalted into mountains. Hakewell, Apology.

In some of the Pronouncing Dictionaries (perhaps in most of them) this word is given as one of the words beginning with h which are to be sounded as if the h was absent, i.e. as umble; and many speakers may be found who take some trouble to speak accordingly. The pronunciation is not only wrong, but (what in the eyes of many is worse) vulgar. The combination which gives rise to it is umble-pie. To eat humble-pie is a term for eating one's own words, or for being humiliated.
Thimble-pie is a similar term, meaning, among schoolboys and children, a rap or tap on the head with a thimble. It means punishment, just as humble-pie means humiliation. The real umble-pie is a dish which few speakers who sound humble without the h would care to take their pronunciation from. It is a pie made of the umbles of a beast. The true umbles are the uavel-string and placenta of such domestic animals as have them in sufficient bulk to make a pie of. With some latitude, it means a pie made of the parts akin to it; i.e. it is giblet-pie, mutatis mutandis, of cows, sheep, and pigs. It is, probably, a long time since such was a common dish;

still less a genteel one. The pronunciation, however, which has grown out of it still exists as vulgar-genteel refinement.

Humblebee. s. [two words.] Bee without a sting.

The honeylads steal from the humblebees.
And for night lapers crop their waxen thighs.
Shakespeare, Night's Dream, iii. 1.

This puts us in mind once again of the humblebees and the tinderboxes. — Bishop Athlbury.

Humblecundumble. s. Slang for humble servant.

Madam, your humblecundumble. — Swift, Polite Conversation.

Humbleness. s. Attribute suggested by Humble.

It was answered by us all, in all possible humbleness; but yet with a countenance, that we knew that he spoke it but merely. — Bacon.
A grain of glory, mixt with humbleness,
Cures both a fever and lethargickness. — Sir T. Herbert.

Humbleplant. s. See extract.

The humbleplant is so called, because as soon as you touch it, it prostrates itself on the ground, and in a short time elevates itself again: it is raised in hotbeds. — Mortimer.

Humbling. verbal abs. Humiliation; abatement of pride.

Yearly enjoin'd some say, to undergo
This annual humbling certain number'd days,
To dash their pride and joy for man seduc'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 673.

Humbly. adv. In an humble manner; without pride; with humility; modestly; with timorous modesty.

In midst of dangers, fears, and death,
Thy goodness I'll adore;
And praise thee for thy mercies past,
And humbly hope for more. — Addison.

Humbly. s. [probably from the combination given in the extract from Ben Jonson. See Wedgwood.]

1. Plausible deceit.

There is a word very much in vogue with the people of fashion, which though it has not even the 'penumbral' of a meaning, yet makes up the sum total of the wit, sense, and judgement of the affected people of taste and fashion! — This piece will prove a confounded humbug upon the nation. . . . These theatrical managers humbug the town daubingly. . . . Humbug is neither an English word, nor a derivative from any other language. It is indeed a blackguard sound, made use of by most people of distinction! It is a fine make-weight in conversation, and some great men deceive themselves so egregiously as to think they mean something by it! — Stanton, vol. ii, p. 41: 1751.

As long as we have a man's body, we play our vanities upon it, surrounding it with humbug and ceremony, laying it in state, and packing it up in gilt nails and velvet; and we finish our duty by placing over it a stone, written all over with lies. — Thackeray, Vanity Fair.

2. Plausible deceiver.

And when he deplored with tears in his eyes almost, the little humbug! that his relationship prevented him from calling you out, eod, I believed him. — Id., The Newcomes, vol. ii, p. 182: ed. 1861.

[A modern term. Perhaps for humbug, from a passage in the Alchemist: —

'Sir, against one o'clock prepare yourself,
Till when you must be fasting; only take
Three drops of Vinegar in at your nose,
Two at your mouth, and one at either ear,
To sharpen your five senses, and cry hum
Thrice, and then huc as often.'

(R. Jonson, The Alchemist.)
— Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.]

Humdrum. adj. Dull; dronish; stupid.

Niall we, quoth he, stand still humdrum,
And see about 'rulin all alone,
By numbers barely overthrown? Batter, Anti-bras.
I was talking with an old humdrum fellow, and before I had heard his story out, was called away by business. — Addison, Whig Examiner, no. 3.
Keeper! you old dotard snore,
Sweetly snoring in the clock.
'Who is he?' 'Tis the humdrum Wynne,
Half encompassed by his klu.' — Swift.

Humectate. v. a. Wet; moisten.

The Nile and Niger do not only moisten and con-temperate the air by their exhalations, but refresh and humectate the earth by their annual inundations. — Sir T. Browne.
Her rivers are divided into sluices, to humectate
the bordering soil. — Hovel, Voyals Forest.

Humectation. s. Act of wetting; moistening.

Plashes of brass, applied to a blow, will keep it down rom swelling: the cause is repression, without injection, or entrance of anybody. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

That which is concentered by exsiccation, or expression of humidity, will be resolved by humectation, as earth and clay. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.

Humecting. part. adj. [Lat. humecto = wet.]
Wetting.

The medicaments are of a cool humecting quality,
and not too much adstringent. — Winman, Surgery.

Humective. adj. Having the power to wet or moisten.

These fountain waters have an humective and ve-getative virtue within them, to water and to make things prosper and grow up. — Parthenia's Sacra, p.
219: 1633.

Humectively. adv. In a humective manner.

By way of living humectively, or moistly, as by baths of pure fresh waters, and other such like remedies, the medicinal humour may be the longer conserved. — Time's Store House, vol. 2. (Ord MS.)

Humeral. adj. [Lat. humeralis, from humerus = shoulder.] Belonging to the shoulder.

The largest crooked needle should be used, with a ligature, in taking up the humeral arteries in amputation. — Sharp, Surgery.

Humiliation. s. [Lat. humi = on the ground; cabutio, -onis = lying down.] Act of lying on the ground.

Fasting and sackcloth, and ashes and tears, and humiliations used to be companions of repentance
— Bishop Burnet.

Humid. adj. [Lat. humidus.] Moist; wet; watery.

Iris there, with humid bow,
Waters the odoriferous banks that blow
Flowers of more mingled hue,
Than her purpled scarf can show.

Milton, Comus, 902.

The queen, recover'd, rears her humid eyes,
And first her husband on the poop espies. — Dryden.
If they slip easily, and are of a fit size to be actuated by heat, and the heat is big enough to keep them in agitation, the body is fluid; and if it be apt to stick to things, it is humid. — Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Humidity. s. Moisture.

We'll use this unwholesome humidity, this gross watry pumpkin. — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Winster, ii. 3.

Young animals have more tender fibres, and more humidity, than old animals, which have their juices more exalted and refining. — Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

[Humidity] is that quality which we call moisture, or the power of wetting other bodies. It differs very much from fluidity, depending altogether on the coherency of the component particles of any liquor to the pores or surfaces of such particular bodies as it is capable of adhering to. This quick-silver is not a moist liquor, in respect to our hands or clothes, and many other things it will not stick to; but it may be called so in reference to gold, tin, or lead, to whose surfaces it will presently adhere.
And even water itself, that wets almost every thing,
and is the great standard of humidity, is not capable of wetting every thing; for it stands and runs easily off in globular drops on the leaves of cabbage and many other plants; and it will not wet the feathers of ducks, swans, and other water-fowl. —
Quincy.

Humile. v. a. Humiliate or humble. Harr.
David ought to humile himself. — Bishop Fisher,
p. 4.

Humiliate. v. a. Humble.

Humiliating. part. adj. Humbling.

Nature has been sparing of her gifts to this noble lord; but where birth and fortune are united, we expect the noble pride and independence of a man of spirit, not the servile humiliating complaisance of a courtier. — Letter of Junius.
I asked him (Johnson) if humiliating was a good word. He said he had seen it frequently used, but he did not know it to be legitimate English. He would not admit civilisation, but only civility. —
Dowell, Life of Johnson, vol. 63: 1772.

He exacted from the republic of Genoa the most humiliating submissions. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. ii.

Humiliation. s.

1. Descent from greatness; act of humility.

The former was an humiliation of deity, the latter an humiliation of mankind; for which cause they followed upon the latter an exaltation of that which was humbled; for with power he created the world, but restored it by obedience. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Mortification; external expression of sin and unworthiness.

John fasted poorly, according unto the apparel he wore, that is, of camel's hair; and the doctrine he preached was humiliation and repentance. — *Sir T.

Browne, Vulgar Errours*.

3. Abatement of pride.

It may serve for a great lesson of humiliation to mankind, to behold the habits and passions of men trampling over interest, friendship, honour, and their own personal safety, as well as that of their country. — Swift.

At Essex House, he had to calm the rage of a young hero incensed by multiplied wrongs and humiliations, and then to pass to Whitehall for the purpose of soothing the peevishness of a sovereign, whose temper, never very gentle, had been rendered morbidly irritable by age, by declining health, and by the long habit of listening to flattery and exacting implicit obedience. — Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Bacon.

Humility. s.

1. Freedom from pride; modesty; not arrogance.

When we make profession of our faith, we stand;
when we acknowledge our sins, or seek unto God for favour, we fall down; because the gesture of constancy becometh us best in the one, in the other the behaviour of humility. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The humility of the style gained them many friends. — Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

There are some that use
Humility to serve their pride, and even Humble upon their way, to be the prouder
At their journey's end. — Sir J. Denham, Sophy.

'T is an easy matter to extol humility in the midst of hot r to begin a fast after di — South, Sermons.

As high towers, for their airy steep,
Require foundations in proportion deep;
And lofty cedars as far upwards shoot,
As to the nether heavens they drive the root;
So low did her secure foundation lie,
She was not humble, but humility. — Dryden.

2. Act of submission.

With these humilities they satisfied the young king, and by their bowing and beuding avoided the present storm. — Sir J. Denham.

Humming. verbal abs.

1. Noise of bees or flies.

The humming of bees is an unequal buzzing. —
Bacon.

So weary bees in little cells repose;
But if night robbers lift the well-stored hive,
An humming through the season city grows.
— Dryden, Anne Marston, cxxviii.

Noise humming of unnumber'd flies. — J. War-ton, Ode to Evening.

2. Inarticulate sound.

'Upon my honour, sir, I heard a humming.
And that a strange one too, which did awake me.
— Shakespeare, Tempest, ii. 1.

3. Dull, unmeaning noise.

The musical accents of the Indians, to us, are but inarticulate humming; as are ours to their otherwise tuned organs. — Charlevoix.

Humming (as applied to ale). For the explanation of the previous edition see extract from Todd. The present editor is inclined to deduce it from hummel = hop;
in which case it means well-hopped.

With humming ale encouraging his feast.
— Dryden, Wife of Bath's Tale.

Rum, brandy, gin with choicest snuff,
From Holland brought, Batavia's rack;
All these will mought avail,
To cheer a truly British heart,
And lively spirits to impart,
Like humming nappy ale.

Soup uncracked (perhaps inaccurately) to Gay.
[Sprightly ale; probably from the spirituous liquor called hum which also perhaps displaced; or from a mixture of hum with the malt liquor, as spirits are now sometimes mixed with it. — Todd.]

Humming-bird. s. Bird of the family Tro-chilidae.

The northern and Nootka humming-birds are found in the northern continent of America. — *Sir
W. Jardine, Naturalist's Library*.

Hummock. s. [hump.] Little hill; rising ground.

Point Possession bore N.N.E. about three miles' distance, and some remarkable hummocks on the north. — Mackenzie, Voyages.

Spreading bays, with smooth sand beaches, covered with many shells and fragments of shells, separate the hills and hummocks on the west side,
but all these beaches are partly covered with numbered rocks with boulders, more or less rounded, these latter marking the progress of weathering, and measuring in some degree the rate of destruction of the granite above. — Anders, The Channel Islands.

Hummocks. s. pl. [Persian, hamum; the accent being on the last syllable. In English it is on the first. The word, however, is so nearly limited to the well-known hotel in Covent-Garden so called, that it may be deemed a proper rather than a common name. Sweating-places, or baths.

Artificial grots, having also humours of stone paved with white marble. — Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 179.

The humours (or sweating-places) are many [at Cuzco in Persia]. — Ibid., p. 211.

Humoral. adj.

1. Proceeding from the humours.

This sort of fever is comprehended under continued humoral fevers. — Harris, Discourse on Consumption.

2. In Medicine, it is specially applied to the doctrine which deduced all or the greater proportion of diseases from a degeneration of the fluid rather than the solid part of the body: Solidism being its opposite.

I have, therefore, assumed the general principles of Hoffmann. And, if I have referred them more correct, and more extensive in their application, and, more particularly, if I have avoided introducing the many hypothetical doctrines of the humoral pathology which disordered both his and all the other systems that have hitherto prevailed, I hope I shall be excused for attempting a system, which, upon the whole, may appear new. — Cullen, Works, vol. i. p. 470.

Florentius Schuyf of Leyden sought to recommend the iatrochemical doctrines, by maintaining that they were to be found in the Hippocratic writings; nor was it difficult to give a chemical interpretation of the humoral pathology of the ancients. The Italian physicians also, for the most part, took this line, and attempted to show the agreement of the principles of the ancient school of medicine with the new chemical notions. This, indeed, is the usual manner in which the diffusion of new theoretical ideas becomes universal. — Harris, History of Scientific Ideas, vol. ii. p. 179; ed. 1728.

It was incumbent on Cullen, after having constructed a theory of disease by reasoning from the solids, to have constructed another theory by reasoning from the fluids; not that a co-ordination of the two theories might have raised a science of pathology, as complete as the then state of knowledge allowed. But to this, his mind was unequal. Able though he was, he lacked the grasp of intellect which characterized Adam Smith, and which made that great man perceive, that every deductive argument, which is founded on a suppression of premises, must be compensated by a parallel argument, which takes those premises into account. No little was Cullen aware of this, that, having built up that system of pathology which is known to medical writers as solidism, he never took the pains to accompany it by another system, which gave the first rank to the fluids. On the contrary, he believed that his plan was complete and exhaustive, and that what is termed humoral pathology was a fiction, which had too long usurped the place of truth. — Baile, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. xx.

Humoral pathology is simply a requirement of common practical sense; and it has always held a place in medical science, as the limits of its domain have, no doubt, been variously circumscribed or interpreted at different times. Of late years, it has met with a new basis and support in morbid anatomy, which, in the inadequacy of its discoveries in the solids to account for disease and death, has been compelled to seek for an extension of its boundary through a direct examination of the blood itself. — Translation of Rokitsky's Pathological Anatomy, vol. i. p. 362; ed. 1854.

Humorist. s.

1. One who conducts himself by his own fancy; one who gratifies his own humour.

By a wise and timely inquisition the peasant humours and humorists must be discovered and purged, or cut off; merey, in such a case, in a king, is true cruelty. — Bacon, Advice to a Father.

Many of the rest were bad men as princes; humorists rather than good humours. — Sir T. Brown, Christian Works, in. 12.

Extraordinary men of arts, in all ages, are generally observed to be the greatest humorists; they are so full of the sweetness of their own conceptions, that they become morose when they are drawn from them. — Dish p Spect, History of the Royal Society, p. 230.

The humorist keeps to himself much more than he wants, and gives his superfluities to purchase heaven. — Addison.

The notion of a humorist is one that is greatly pleased, or greatly displeased, with little things; his actions seldom directed by the reason and nature of things. — Watts.

2. One who has odd conceits; eccentric or grotesque person.

Do ye see a fine humorist, that will not dress a dish, nor lay a cloth, nor walk abroad on a Sunday, and yet make no conscience of evening his neighbour on the workday? — Bishop Hall, Sermons, The Hypocrite.

3. One who studies or describes the humours of people; one whose writing or conversation is characterized by humour, as a kind of wit.

An infectious collection of base vices and fashions of men and women . . . will be of use only among humorists for jests and table-talk. — Sir T. Dalry, Letter to Sir F. Bacon.

These poor gentlemen endeavour to gain themselves the reputation of wits, and humorists, by such monstrous conceits as almost qualify them for Hellum. — Addison, Spectator, no. 33.

At last Michael tries to raise the devil, and the devil comes at his call. My devil was to be, like Goethe's, the universal humorist, who should make all things vain and nothing worth, by a perpetual collation of the great with the little in the presence of the infinite. I had many a trick for him to play, some better, I think, than any in the Faust. In the meantime, Michael is miserable; he has power, but no peace, and he every day more keenly feels the tyranny of hell surrounding him. In vain he seems to himself to assert the most absolute empire over the devil, by imposing the most extravagant tasks; one thing is as easy as another to the devil. 'What next, Michael?' is repeated every day with more imperious severity. — Göthe, The Fish-Talk.

Sir Willoughby, who remembered the humorist in all his departed glory, and still venerated him as a temple where the deity yet breathed, though the altar was overthrown, made to this extraordinary remembrance no other reply than a long whiff, and a 'Well, Russell, damn it, but you're a queer fellow.' — Sir E. L. Bulwer, Pelham, ch. xiii.

Humorous. adj.

1. Full of humour, in the sense of moisture; damp; dewy; humid. Rare.

The humorous fogs deprive us of his sight.

Every lofty top, which late the humorous night besungled had with pearl. — Id., Polydorus, song 13.

He hath hid himself, among these trees, To be consorted with the humorous night. — Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 1.

2. Capricious; irregular; without any rule but the present whim.

I am known to be a humorous patrician; said to be something imperfect, in favouring the first complaint; hasty and tender-like, upon too trivial motion. — Shakespeare, Coriolanus, ii. 1.

Thou fortune's champion, that dost never fight But when her humorous ladyship is by, To teach thee safety. — Id., King John, iii. 1.

He's humorous as winter, and as sudden As fawns congealed in the spring of day. — Id., Henry IV. Part II., iv. 4.

O, you awake then: come away, Times be short are made for play; The humorous moon too will not stay: What doth make you thus delay? — R. Jonson, Vast is his courage, boundless is his mind, Rough as a stern, and humorous as the wind.

He that would learn to pass a just sentence on persons and things, must take heed of a fanciful temper of mind, and an humorous conduct in his affairs. — Watts, Logic.

3. Full of grotesque or odd images.

Some of the commentators tell us, that Marry was a lawyer who had lost his cause; others that this passage alludes to the story of the satyr Marry, who contended with Apollo, which I think is more humorous. — Addison, Letters in Italy.

4. Pleasant; jocular.

The humorous vein, thy pleasing folly, Lies all neglected, all forgot; And pensive, way ring, melancholy, Thon dreadst and hopst thou know'st not what. — Prior.

Humorously. adv. In a humorous manner.

1. Merrily; jocosely.

A cabinet of medals Juvenal calls very humorously, 'conspicuum argenteum in titulus farcesque minutas.' — Addison.

It has been humorously said, that some have fished the very jakes for papers left there by men of wit. — Swift.

2. Capriciously; whimsically.

We resolve by halves, and unadvisedly; we resolve rashly, silly, or humorously, upon no reasons that will hold. — Cabotus.

Humorouslyness. s. Attribute suggested by Humorous.

It must be extreme humorouslyness to deny a Providence in them. — Goodman, Winters Evening's Conference, pt. iii.

Humorsome. adj.

1. Peevish; petulant.

I am glad that, though you are incredulous, you are not humorsome too. — Goodman, Winters Evening's Conference, pt. iii.

[This] seems to me very humorsome and unreasonable. — Blackwall, Sacred Classics, i. 17.

2. Odd; humorously: (in this sense it is less used).

Our science cannot be much improved by masquerades, where the wit of both sexes is altogether taken up in continuing singular and humorsome disguises. — Swift.

Humorsomely. adv. In a humorsome manner; peevishly; petulantly.

There is no time of the world, wherein there are not very plainly the prints of divinity, and evidences of a Providence continually presiding over the world, if a man do not humorsomely despise them. — Goodman, Winters Evening's Conference, pt. iii.

Humour. s. [Lat. humor; Fr. humeur.]

1. Moisture.

The aqueous humour of the eye will not freeze, which is very admirable, seeing it hath the perpetuity and fluidity of common water. — Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

2. Different kind of moisture in man's body, reckoned by the old physicians to be phlegm, blood, choler, and melancholy, which, as they predominated, were supposed to determine the temper of mind.

Believe not these suggestions, which proceed From aneath of the mind and humours black, That mingle with thy fancy.

— Milton, Samson Agonistes, 690.

3. Tendency to disease; morbid disposition. He denied himself nothing that he had a mind to eat or drink, which gave him a body full of humours, and made his fits of the gout frequent and violent. — Sir W. Temple.

The child had a humour which was cured by the waters of Glastonbury. — Felding.

4. General turn or temper of mind.

As there is no humour to which impudent poverty cannot make itself servicable; so were there now of those of desperate ambition, who would build their houses upon others' ruin. — Sir P. Sidney.

There came a young lord, led with the humour of youth, which ever thinks that good whose goodness he sees not. — Id.

King James, as he was a prince of great judgement, so he was a prince of a marvellous pleasant humour; as he was going through Lauen by Greenwich, he asked what town it was; they said Lauen. He asked, a good while after. What town is this we are now in? They said still it was Lauen; then, said the king, I will be king of Lauen. — Bacon, Apophthegms.

They, who were acquainted with him, know his humour to be such, that he would never constrain himself. — Dryden.

In cases where it is necessary to make examples, it is the humour of the multitude to forget the crime, and to remember the punishment. — Addison. Good humour only teaches charity to look. Still makes new conquests, and maintains the past. — Pope, Epistles to Miss Blount, ep. i.

5. Present disposition.

It is the curse of kings to be attended by slaves, that take their humours for a warrant To break into the bloody house of life.

— Shakespeare, King John, iv. 2.

Another thought her nobler humour fed.

— Fairfax.

Their humours are not to be won,

But when they are imposed upon. — Butler, Hudibras.

But one submissive word which you let fall,

Will make him in good humour with us all. — Dryden, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad.

6. Grotesque imagery; jocularly; merri-ment.

In conversation humour is more than wit, com-ness more than knowledge. — Sir W. Temple.

7. Petulance; peevishness.

Is my friend all perfection, all virtue and discre- tion? Has he not humours to be endured, as well kindnesses to be enjoyed? — South, Sermons.

8. Trick; practice.

I like not the humour of lying; he hath wronged me in some humours; I should have borne the humour'd letter to her. — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 1.

9. Cuprice; whim; predominant inclination.

In private, men are more bold in their own humours; and in concert, men are more obnoxious to others' humours; therefore it is good to take both. — Bacon.

Madame D'Arbly has left us scarcely any thing but humours. Almost every one of her men and women has some one propensity developed to a morbid degree. In Cordia, for example, Mr. Delville never opens his lips without some allusion to his own birth and station; or Mr. Briggs, without some allusion to the hoarding of money; or Mr. Hobson, without betraying the self-indulgence and self-importance of a purse-proud upstart; or Mr. Simkins, without uttering some sneaking remark for the purpose of carrying favour with his customers; or Mr. Meadows, without expressing apathy and weariness of life; or Mr. Albany, without declaiming about the vices of the rich and the misery of the poor; or Mrs. Hefield, without some indefinite eulogy on her son; or Lady Margaret, without indicating jealousy of her husband. Horace is all skipping, glib, impertinence, Mr. Gosport all screaming, Lady Honoria all lively prattle, Miss Lardell all silly prattle, &c. but we cannot deny that, in the rank to which she belonged, she had few equals, and scarcely any superior. The variety of humours which is to be found in her novels is immense; and though the talk of each person separately is monotonous, the general effect is not monotonous, but a very lively and agreeable diversity. — Munday, Critical and Historical Essays, Madame D'Arlay.

Humour. v. a.

1. Gratify; soothe by compliance.

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour his men with the imputation of being near their master; if to his men, I would curry with master Shallow. — Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. v. 1.

If I were Brutus now, and he were Cassius, He should not humour me. — Id., Julius Cæsar, i. 2. Obsequence and subjection were never enjoined by God to humour the passions, lusts, and vanities of those who are commanded to obey our governors. — Swift.

You humour me, when I am sick;
Why not when I am splenetic?

Pope, Imitations of Horace, ep. vii.
Children are fond of something which strikes their fancy most, and sullen and regardless of everything else, if they are not humoured in that fancy. — Watts, Logic.

2. Fit; comply with.

To after any than shalt he writ the man,
That with smooth air could'st humour best our tongue. — Milton, Sonnets, xlii. 7.

2. Desire with great eagerness; long.

Do'st thou so hunger for my empty chair,
That thou wilt needs invest thee with my honours
Before thy hour be ripe? O, foolish youth,
Thou seek'st the greatness that will overweigh thee!
Stay but a little. — Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 4.

And from the sting of famine fear no harm,
Nor mind it, fed with better thoughts that feed
Me hungering more to do my father's will. — Milton, Paradise Regained, ii. 26.

Hungerbit, and Hungerbitten. adj. Pained or weakened with hunger.

His strength shall be hungerbitten. — Job, xviii. 12.
Bred up in poverty and straits at home;
Lost in a desert here, and hungerbit. — Milton, Paradise Regained, ii. 414.

Hungerer. s. One who hungers.

The thwarted hungerer for justice takes up the miserable commonplaces of politics; and is the radical. — Croft, Historical Sketches, Speeches, and Characters, The Church in Ireland.

Hungering. verbal abs. Suffering from hunger.

France has been her long curriculum of hungering, instructive and productive beyond academic curriculums; which extends over some seven most strenuous years. As Jean Paul says of his own life, 'to a great height shall the business of hungering go.' — Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. I. h. vi. ch. iv.

Hungerly. Hungry; in want of nourishment. (In the extracts the construction is ulcerbial.)

His beard
Grew thin and hungerly, and seem'd to ask
His supper he was drinking. — Shakespeare, Twelfth of the Shrew, iii. 2.
You have said my longing, and I feel
Most hungerly on your sight. — Id., Timon of Athens, i. 1.

They are all but stomachs, and we all but food;
They eat us hungerly, and, when they're full,
They belch us. — Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 4.

Hungerstarve. v. a. Starve with hunger.

I will hungerstarve all the gods of the Gentiles. — Travellers of the Christian Religion. (Ord MS.)

As I am now lay in the hospital, I am hungerstarved, the naked, and the lame, Want and diseases, fled before her name. — Dryden.

Hungred. adj. Pinched by want of food: (in the following extracts preceded by un, improperly, inasmuch as un (of which u is the shortened form) precedes the verbal in -ing (he went unhunting, i.e. unhunting) rather than the participle in -ed. See Un.)

And when he had fasted forty days and forty nights, he was afterwards hungred. — Matthew, iv. 2.
Oblours do in a mad degree nourish, and we see men unhungred have no smell but bread. — Bacon.

Hungrily. adv. In a hungry manner; with keen appetite.

Thus much to the kind rural gods we owe,
Who pity'd still 'rime mortals' long ago;
When old harsh norms hungrily they fed,
And gave 'em neerer joints, he'ller bread. — Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

Hungry. adj.

1. Feeling pain from want of food.

That face of his the hungry cannibals
Would not have touch'd, would not have stain'd with blood. — Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. i. 1.

By eating before he was hungry, and drinking before he was dry, he was sure never to eat or drink much at a time. — Sir W. Temple.

They that talk thus may say that a man is always hungry, but that he does not always feel it; whereas hunger consists in that very sensation. — Locke.

2. Not fat; not fruitful; not prolific; more disposed to draw from other substances than to impart to them.

Cassius has a lean and hungry look. — Shakespeare, Julius Cæsar, i. 2.

The more fat water will bear soap best; for if hungry water doth kill its unctuous nature. — Bacon.

In rushy ground, hunks are found at the first and hunks are found at the first lower in a hungry
cave. — Mortimer, Hunsbury.

This was the arms or device of our old Roman hunters: a passage of Manlius lets us know the young hunters had Melenger for their patron.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

b. Dog.

Of dogs, the valua'd file
Distinguishes the swift, the slow, the subtle,
The house-keeper, the hunter.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 1.

c. Horse: (as 'racer, hunter, hack, cart-horse')

Hunting. verbal abs.

1. Act, or practice, or habit of one who hunts.

When we grow up to men, we have another occasion of sanguinary sports; in particular, hunting.
I dare not attack a diversion, which has such authority and custom to support it.—Guardian, no. 61.

2. Search, or pursuit, in general.

Very much of kin to this is the hunting after arguments to make good one side of a question, and wholly to neglect and refuse those which favour the other side.—Locke.

Hunting-seat. s. Temporary residence for the purpose of hunting.

Near it [is] a house built by one of the grand dukes for a hunting-seat, but now converted into an inn. Tray, Letters.

Huntress. s. Female hunter.

And thou, thrice crowned queen of night, survey
With thy chaste eye, from thy pale sphere above,
Thy huntress' name, that my full life doth save.
Shakespeare, As you like it, iii. 2.

Homer represents Diana with her quiver at her shoulder; but at the same time he describes her as an huntress.—Brooke.

Huntsman. s.

1. One who delights in the chase.

Like as a huntsman, after weary chase,
Seeing the game escape from him away,
Sits down to rest him. Spenser, Sonnets.

2. Person connected with a pack of hounds whose office it is, in conjunction with that of whipper-in, to manage the hounds during a run.

Apply this moral rather to the huntsman, that managed the chase, than to the master.—*Sir R.
L'Estrange.*

Huntsmanship. s. Condition, or practice, of a huntsman (in its first, or more general, sense).

At court your fellows every day
Give the art of rhiming, huntsmanship, or play.
Jonne.

To betoken his huntsmanship, he holdeth in hand the skin of a wild beast.—Gregory, Pastimes,
p. 228; 1650.

Hurdle, mlf. Made of Hurds. Hodden (as in hodden grey), which, whether Scotch or provincial, is sometimes used (rhetorically) by even prose writers in English, is a wrong form of this.

It is, when he is reaping, making hay, or when he is hocking in his hurden flock.—Shenstone.

Hurdle. s. [A.S. hyrdel.]

1. Fence, movable and temporary, sometimes wattled (in which case it is provincially called a fleake); sometimes made like a light gate (in which case it is provincially called a tray).

The sled, the tumbrel, hurdles and the flail,
These all must be prepar'd.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics.

2. Crate on which criminals were dragged to execution.

Settle your fine joints 'gainst Thursday next,
Or I will drag thee in a hurdle-hither.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iii. 5.

The blacksmith was hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn; taking pleasure upon the hurdle, to think that he should be famous in after times.—Bacon.

An established church was then, as a matter of course, a persecuting church. Edward persecuted Atholites, Mary persecuted Protestants, Elizabeth persecuted Catholics again. The father of those three sovereigns had enjoyed the pleasure of persecuting both sects at once, and had sent to death, on the same hurdle, the heretic who denied the real presence, and the traitor who denied the royal superstition.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Harlequin and his Times.

HURD

[Hurdle, hurdling.—Dutch hurde, a hurdle, fence of branches or osiers; hurden-aardt, a wicker wall.
German hurde, a frame of rods, hurdle, grate;
hürstung, a fence made with hurdles, formally identical with English hurdling, diverted by usage to signify a fencing of boards. French hurdie, wick-le-work for walls, gave rise to Middle Latin hurdium, a wicker defence in sieges.

Et que reddidant tutes hurdicia muros.
Old Norse hurd, a door, properly a wicker gate.
The origin is Swiss hurdt, a pole, French hard, hart, a wythe, hardan, a little wythe. Hence Rouehi hour, houple, a framework of poles to keep hay from the ground in a farm; houache, a woman's scaffold.
—Wedgwood, Dictionary of English Etymology.

Hurdle. r. a. Cover, or close with hurdles.
The ground was dug in various places, as if for the purpose of further improvements, and here and there a sickly little tree was carefully hurdled round, and seemed pinning its puny heart out at the confinement.—Sir E. B. Lytton, Pelham, ch. xii.
In hurdled cotes the flocks are penned.
Keats, Sonnets, &c., p. 173.

Hurds, or Hards. s. [A.S. hordus, horddan.] Coarse tow, whether consisting of flax or hemp.

From the superficial part to the myddest which is the frute, it [the cocoon] is involved and covered with many web much lyke unto those hyrdes of tow which they use in Andalusia. Of this tow or webbe, the East Indians make a certeyne kynde of clothe of three or foure sortes, and cordes for the sakes of shippers.—Elden, Translation of P. Martyr, 1585. (Old MS.)

Hurdy-gurdy. s. [?] Musical instrument, combining the structure of a barrel organ and guitar, so called.

Whom have we here? a sightly swain and sturdy!
Hurm! plays, I see, upon the hurdy-gurdy.
Keats, Ode on Hyperion, Milan.

He plays the good old airs—such as the hurdy-gurdy players of Metz and Jan Steen grind so pitifully before cottage doors.—A. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures, The Shadow of a young Dutch Painter.

Hurl. v. a. [?] Throw with violence; drive impetuously.

If he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait.—Numbers, xxv. 20.

They were armed with bows, and could use both the right hand and the left in hurling stones and shooting arrows.—1 Chronicles, xii. 2.

Hurl ink and wit,
As madmen stones,
Conjure him far to drive the Grecian train,
And hurl'd them headlong to their fleet and main.
Pope, Translation of the Iliad.

France therefore has done two things very completely: she has hurled back the German invaders far over the marches; and likewise she has shattered her own internal social constitution, even to the minutest fibre of it, into wreck and dissolution.—Carlyle, French Revolution, pt. iii. b. ii. ch. i.

Hurl. s. Act of casting or throwing.

The gods with horror and amazement look'd down,
Beholding rocks from their firm basis torn,
Mountain on mountain thrown,
With threatening hurl that shook th' ætherial firmament.
Congreve, Ode on taking Namur.

Hurl. v. a. [?] Fr. hurler = shriek.]

The glad merchant that does view
His ship far come from wat'ry wilderness,
He hurls out vows,
Highly they rag'd against the Highest,
Hurling defiance toward the vault of heaven.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 668.

Hurl. s. Tumult; riot; commotion.

After this hurl the king was faine to flee
Northward in post, for succour and reliefe.

a railer.—Milton, Apology for Smeagmias.

2. One who plays at hurling.

The hurlers mud hurl man to man, and not two set upon one man at once.—Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

Hurling. s. Game so called; see extract.

Hurling taketh its denomination from throwing of the ball, and is of two sorts; so goals, and to the country; for hurling to goals there are fifteen or thirty players, more or less, chosen out on each side,

HURR

who strip themselves, and their join hands in ranks, one against another: out of these ranks they match themselves by pairs, one embracing another, and so pass away: every of which couple are to watch one another during this play.—Carew, Survey of Cornwall.

Hurriwind. s. [so also, hurtleberry—Whortleberry; hoop—whoop.] Whirlwind.

Like scatter'd down the howling Burns blown,
By rapid hurriwinds from his mansion thrown.

Sandys, Paraphrase of the Book of Job.
No sudden hurriwinds shall your bullock cast
On trembling earth. Id., Christ's Passion, p. 13.

Hurly. s. Tumult; commotion; bustle.

Winds take the ruffian billows by the top,
That with the hurly death itself awake.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iii. 1.

Me thinks, I see this hurly all on foot.
Id., King John, iii. 4.

Hurly-burly. s. Same as preceding.

All places were filled with tumult and hurly-burly,
every man measured the danger by his own fear;
and such a pitiful cry was in every place, as in cities presently to be besieged.—Knollys, History of the Turks.

When, I pray you, were these classical assemblies, and these delicious airs and hurriburles of Martians.—Sir G. Paul, Life of Archbishop Whitgift,
p. 63.

Hurly-burly. adj. Tumultuous.

Poor discontented,
Which gnaw and rub the elbow at the news
Of hurly-burly innovation.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. v. 1.
In the hurly-burly days of queen Elizabeth.—Persecutio Undecima, p. 11; 1688.

Hurrah. interj. Shout of joy, or triumph, or applause, or encouragement: at first,
perhaps, the shout of soldiers at the onset.

An European warrior who rushes on a battery of cannon with a loud hurrah, will sometimes shrink under the surgeon's knife, and fall into an agony of despair at the sentence of death.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Hurricane. s. [Spanish, huracan, ? from
Carib.] Violent tropical storm.

We believe a hurricane was begun, a vast or un-wonted tumour in the air. Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 41.

A poet who had a great genius for tragedy, made every man and woman too in his plays stark raving mad: all was tempestuous and blundering; heaven and earth were coming together at every word; a mere hurricane from the beginning to the end.—Dryden.

So, where our wide Numidian wastes extend,
Sudden th' impetuous hurricane descent,
Whel'd through the air, in circling eddies play,
Tear up the sands, and sweep whole plains away.

Johnson, observed Hogarth, 'like King David, says that all men are liars.' 'His incredulity,' says Mrs. Thrale, 'amounted almost to disavowal.' She tells us how he browbeat a gentleman, who gave him an account of a hurricane in the West Indies, and a poor quaker who related some strange circumstances about the red-hot balls fired at the siege of Gibraltar.
'It is not so. It cannot be true. Don't tell that story again. You cannot think how poor a figure you make in telling it.'—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Howells's Life of Johnson.

Hurricane. s. Older and less English form of Hurricane.

Blow winds and crack your cheeks;
You cataracts and hurricanes, spout.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 2.
A storm or hurricane, though but the force of air, makes a strange havoc where it comes.—*T. Burnet,
Theory of the Earth.*

The winds are not only wild in a storm, but even stark mad in an hurricane.—Fuller, Holy State,
p. 122.

Hurrier. s. One who hurries. Hellenism.

Stars, that horrid hurrier of men. Chapman.

Hurry. v. a. Hasten.

Your nobles will not hear you; but are gone
To offer service to your enemy;
And wild amusement hurries up and down
The little number of your doubtful friends.

Shakespeare, King John, v. 1.
Impetuous lust hurries him on to satisfy it.—
South, Sermons.

The multitude, in all countries, are patient to a certain point. Ill usage may rouse their indignation, and hurry them into excess, but the original fault is in government.—Letters of Junius, let. 1.

Hurry. v. n. Move on with precipitation.

Did you but know what joys your way attend,
You would not hurry to your journey's end. Dryden.

Hurry. s. Tumult; precipitation; commotion.

HURR

Among all the horrible hurries in England, Ireland was then almost quiet. — Sir J. Hayward.
It might have pleased him in the present heat and hurry of his race; but must have displeased him infinitely in the sad reflection. — South, Sermons.
The pavement sounds with trampling feet, And the mist hurry barricades the street.
Gay, Trivia.

Hurry-scurry. adv. Confusedly; in a bustle; with noise and tumult.
Each hole and cupboard they explore,
Each creek and cranny of his chamber,
Run hurry-scurry round the floor,
And o'er the bed and tester clamber.
Gray, Long Story.

Used substantially.
In the hurry-scurry of money-making, men-making, and machine-making, we had altogether outgrown, not the spirit, but the organisation of our institutions. — Disraeli the younger, Coningsby, b. ii. ch. i.

Hurst. s. [A.S.] Small wood. At present a geographical rather than a common name, being pre-eminently common, as the second element of a compound (Eschurst, Hawkhurst) in Kent, Surrey, and Bedfordshire. As a prefix it is less common, and often adjectival (Hurst Green). It sometimes stands alone (Hurst in Northamptonshire and elsewhere).
To her neighbouring chase the courteous forest showed
So just-conceived joy, that from each rising hurst,
Where many a goodlie oak had carolous been nurs'd,
The Sylva in their songs their mirthful meeting tell.
Drayton, Polyolbion, song 2.

Hurt. v. a. [A.S. hyrtan.]
1. Injure; harm; do mischief.
He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death. — Revelation, ii. 11.

My heart is turn'd to stone: I strike it, and it hurts my hand. — Shakespeare, Othello, iv. 1.
3. Damage; impair.
See thou hurt not the oil and the wine. — Revelation, vi. 6.

Hurt. s.
1. Harm; mischief.
I have slain a man to my wounding, and a young man to my hurt. — Genesis, iv. 23.
The hurt thereby is greater than the good. — Spenser.
2. Wound or bruise.
Carter adventured bravely, and received two great hurts in his body. — Sir J. Hayward.
3. Injury; wrong.
Why should damage grow to the hurt of the kings. — Esse, iv. 22.

Hurtful. adj. Mischievous; pernicious.
Secret neglect of our duty is but only our own hurt: one man's contempt of the common prayer of the church of God may be much hurtful unto many. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
The hurtful heat in the vineyard shun,
Nor plant it to receive the setting sun.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 410.

Hurtle. v. n. [Fr. heurtier.]
1. Dash in collision.
They drew out their swords, and hurled together with violence. — History of Prince Arthur, pt. i. ch. xxviii.
2. Clash; rattle.

Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, ii. 2.
Iron sleds of arrow shower
Hurled in the darken'd air.
Gray, Odes, vii.
3. Move violently.
Sudden upriseth from her stately place
The roiling dame, and for her coach doth call:
All hurled forth.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, l. 4, 10.
His approved skill to ward,
Or strike, or hurtle round in warlike rage.
Ibid., ii. 5, 8.

Hurtle. v. a. Move with violence, or velocity; whirl round; brandish.
His harmful club he gan to hurtle high,
And threaten battle to the fiery knight.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Hurtless. adj. Innocent; harmless; innoxious; doing no harm.
Unto her home he oft would go,
Where bold and harmless many a play he tries,
Her parents liking well it should be so;
For simple goodness shined in his eyes.
Sir P. Sidney.

HUSB

[She] joy'd to make proof of her cruelty
On gentle dame, so hurtleless and so true.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Shorter every snare he takes,
And vain efforts and hurtleless blows he makes.
Dryden, Translation of the Knid.

Hurtleless. adv. In a hurtless manner; without harm.
Your neighbours have found you so hurtleless strong, that they thought it better to rest in your friendship than make new trial of your enmity. — Sir P. Sidney.

Hurtling. verbal abs. Act of that which hurtles.
Kindness
Made him give battle to the flames,
Who quickly fell before him; in which hurtling,
From miserable slunder I awak'd.
Shakespeare, As you like it, iv. 3.

Husband. s. [A.S. husbanda.]
1. Male member of a married pair; correlative to Wife.
Thy husband is thy lord, thy life, thy keeper,
Thy head, thy sovereign.
Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, v. 2.
2. Male of animals. Latinism, vir gregis.
Ev'n though a snowy ram thou shalt behold,
Prefer him not in love, for husband to thy fold.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, iii. 504.

3. Manager; economist; one who knows and practises the methods of frugality and profit: (generally accompanied by some epithet implying bad or good). The verb commoner than the substantive.
Edward I. showed himself a right good husband; owner of a lordship ill husbanded. — Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.
I was considering the shortness of life, and what all husbands we are of so tender a fortune. — Collier, On Fear.
I gave each of them a musket, with a fire-lock on it, and about eight charges of powder and ball, charging them to be very good husbands of both, and not to use either of them but on urgent occasions. — De Foe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe.

4. Husbandman. Obsolete.
Husband's work is laborious and hard.
Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.
I heard a great husband say, that it was a common error to think that chalk helpeth arable grounds. — Bacon.
But when cold weather and continued rain
The lab'ring husband in his house restrain,
Let him forego his work.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, l. 350.

Husband. v. a.
1. Supply with a husband. Obsolete.
Think you I am no stronger than my sex,
Being so father'd and so husbanded?
Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, ii. 1.
If you shall prove
This ring was ever hers, you shall as easy
Prove that I husbanded her bed in Florence,
Where yet she never was.
Ibid., All's well that ends well, v. 3.
By me invested, he conquers the best. . . .
That were the most, if he should husband you.
Ibid., King Lear, v. 3.

2. Manage; economize.
It will be pastime passing excellent,
If it be husbanded with modesty.
Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, Induct. sc. 1.
The French, wisely husbanding the possession of a victory, kept themselves within their trenches. — Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.
If thou be master-runner, spend not all
That thou can'st speak at once; but husband it,
And give men turns of speech.
Herbert.
She (Grievé) wanted an eye to see her new position and relations, and a hand to collect, husband, and employ her remaining resources. — Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. lvi.
If a sum was bestowed on the wretched adventurer, such as, properly husbanded, might have supplied him for six months, it was instantly spent in strange franks of sensuality. — Murray, Critical and Historical Essays, Croker's Edition of Boswell's Life of Johnson.

3. Till; cultivate the ground with proper management. Obsolete. In a modern writer this sentence might certainly occur; but its meaning would certainly be economize, make the most of. It may be thus in the extract.
A farmer cannot husband his ground, if he sits at a great rent. — Bacon.

Husbandable. adj. Fit for husbandry.
Rare.

HUSH

The Sueves (a people of Germany) had no land which they held in particular, or divided among them; neither were they permitted to tarry longer than a year in a place to till or make it husbandable. — Time's Store-house, p. 12. (Old MS.)

Husbandless. adj. Without an husband.
A widow husbandless, subject to fears;
A woman naturally born to fears.
Shakespeare, King John, iii. 1.

Husbandly. adj. Frugal; thrifty. Rare.
Rare plots full of mists, if ye plow overthwart;
And compass it then, is a husbandly part.
Tasso, Fire Hundred Points of good Husbandry.

Husbandman. s. One who works in tillage.
This busy serves you for good use; he is your serving-man, and your husbandman. — Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II, v. 3.
The mule being more swift in his labour than the ox, more ground was allowed to the mule by the husbandman. — Bacon.

Husbandry. s.
1. Tillage; manner of cultivating land.
He began with a wild method to run over all the art of husbandry, especially employing his tongue about well tilling of a field. — Sir P. Sidney.
Ask'd if in husbandry he might do know,
To plough, to plant, to reap, to sow.
Spenser, Mother Hubbard's Tale.
Peace hath from France too long been cloud'd;
And all her husbandry doth lie on heaps,
Corrupting in its own fertility.
Shakespeare, Henry V, v. 2.

Used metaphorically.
Her pious womb
Expresseth his full tith and husbandry.
Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, l. 5.
The seeds of virtue may, by the husbandry of Christian counsel, produce better fruit than the sterility of self-nature. — Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.
2. Thrift; frugality; parsimony.
There's husbandry in heaven;
The candles are all out. — Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1.
You have already saved several millions to the publick, and that what we ask is too inconsiderable to break into any rules of the strictest good husbandry. — Swift.

3. Care of domestic affairs.
Lorenzo, I commit into your hands
The husbandry and manage of my house.
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iii. 4.
Hush. interj. Silence.
The king hath done you wrong; but hush! 'tis no. — Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, ii. 3.
There's something else to do; hush and be mute,
Or else our spell is marr'd.
Ibid., Tempest, iv. 1.

Hush. adj. Still; silent; quiet.
As we often see, amidst some storm,
A silence in the howls, the rack stand still,
The bold winds speechless, and the orb below
As hush as death. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 2.
Hush. v. n. Be silent.
This frown'd, that fawn'd, the third for shame did
hush;
Another seem'd envious or coy;
Another in her teeth did gnaw a rush;
But at these strangers' presence every one did hush.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Hush. v. a. Silence; quiet; appease.
It was my breath that blew this tempest up,
Upon your stubborn usage of the pope;
But since you are a gentle convertite,
My tongue shall hush again this storm of war,
And make fair weather in your blustering land.
Shakespeare, King John, v. 1.
When in a bed of straw we shrink together,
And the bleak winds shall whistle round our heads,
Will thou then talk thus to me? Will thou then
Hush my cares thus, and whisper me with love?
Shaw, Venice Preserved, l. 1.

Her sire at length is kind,
Calms every storm, and hushes ev'ry wind;
Prepares his empire for his daughter's case,
And for his hatching nephews smooths the seas.
Dryden.
With the return of light the rain had ceased, and the storm was hushed; and the troops were immediately embark'd. — Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. liii.
A king's life, and so much else that depends thereon, hangs trembling in the balance. Man after man mounts; the buzz hushes itself till he have spoken: death; banishment; imprisonment till the peace. — Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. iii. b. ii. ch. vii.

With up. Suppress in silence; forbid to be mentioned.
This matter is hushed up, and the servants are forbid to talk of it. — Pope.
Hushmoney. s. Bribe to hinder information; pay to secure silence or hush up a matter.
A dexterous steward when his tricks are found,
Hushmoney sends to all the neighbours round;
1193

His master, unsuspecting of his pranks,
Pays all the cost, and gives the villain thanks.

I expect hush-money to be regularly sent for every fool or vixen any commits in this whole town;
and hope I may pretend to deserve it better than a chamber-maid or a valet de chambre.—Tatler, no. 24.

Husk. s. [Dutch, hulsche.] Outermost integu-ment of fruits.

Most seeds in their growing, leave their husk or rind about the root.—Baron, Natural and Experimental History.

you feed upon husks instead of kernels.—Watts.

Huskiness. s. Attribute suggested by Husky.

I tell no lies, said the butcher, with the same mild hushness as before.—Silas Marner, ch. vi.

Husky. adj. Abounding in, consisting of,
husks.

Most have found
A husky harvest from the grudging ground.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, l. 514.

Husky. adj. [? connected with A.S. hweost
= cough.] Hoarse.

Here the mouth of sad Melpomene
Is wholly bent to tragedy's discourse:—
Here means the wrathful muse, in seas of tears,
And loud lament, to tell a dismal tale;
A tale wherein she lately hath bestow'd
The husky humour of her bloody quill.
Tragedy of Soliman and Perseda: ed. 1699.
Prower was dead, and Sergeant Quirkil
Grew husky, and had left the circuit.

Arundel Thore returned to his cousin, and seating himself at the table, took up a book, and began reading it the wrong side upwards; then he threw down a ball of silk, then he cracked a netting needle, and then with a husky sort of voice, and a half blush, and altogether an air of infinite confusion, he said,
'This has been an odd affair, May, of the Duke of St. James and Sir Lucius Grafton?'—B. Disraeli
the younger, The Young Duke, b. ii. ch. xv.
'Bed it was,' said the butcher, in his good-natured husky tone.—Silas Marner, ch. vi.

Huskar. s. [German; ? of Hungarian origin.] Soldier so called.

Two Hungarian miles from Frieslat lies Ban-we being here upon the 10th of March: the husa, who drove our chariot hither, after we had supped went out.—Brown, Travels, &c., p. 54: 1683.
He made his breeches and his doublet of one continuous piece of cloth, after the manner of the hussars.—Spectator, no. 574.

Hussel. s. Case, in the establishment of a sempstress, or female sewer, for cotton, worsted, needles, and the like. Often connected with Huswife, as if the name of some indispensable element in management or economy. Perhaps, connected with gossipium = cotton.

Hussy. s. [huswife.] Wench.
Get you in, hussy, go: now will I personate this hopeful young jade.—Southern, Innocent Adultery.
Why then, hussy—lookye there! Younda, you shall have him; hussy, you shall have him.—G. Colman the elder, The Jealous Wife, iv. 2.

Hustings. s. generally plural. [A.S. hustinge.]

1. Council; court held.

From the sheriff's court in the city of London, a writ of error lies to the court of hustings before the mayor, recorder, and sheriffs.—Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

2. Place of meeting to choose a member of parliament.

I stood on the hustings (except when I gave my thanks to those who favoured me with their votes) less like a candidate, than an unconcerned spectator of a public meeting.—Hurke, Speech at Bristol.

It was not pretended, they did not even pretend themselves, that there was any thing new in the doctrines which they preached from the hustings, and disseminated in every part of the kingdom. The discoveries had long since been made, and were gradually doing their work, encroaching upon old errors, and making proselytes in all directions. The reformers of our time swam with the stream: they sided what it would have been impossible long to resist.—Buckle, History of Civilization in England,
i. v.

Used adjectively.

Gratitude to Lord Grey was the hustings-cry at the end of 1832.—B. Disraeli the younger, Coningsby,
b. ii. ch. i.

Hutselo. v. a. [Low German, hutselen.] Crowd and press; mob.

In this convulsion, above all, no word he could speak would find favour; he says now, banishment;

and in mute wrath quits the place for ever,—much haunted in the corridors.—Carlyle, History of the French Revolution, pt. iii. b. ii. ch. vii.

Did ever any grave scene, since the beginning of the world, treat a man as a criminal merely because he had been robbed, pelted, huzzed, dragged through snow and mire, and threatened with death if he returned to the house which was his by law?—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xvi.

Huswife. s. Female manager of a house;
female husband; economist; thrifty woman.

Good huswife provides, ere a sickness do come,
Of sundry good things in her house to have none.
*Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good
Housewifery*.

Huswife. v. a. Manage with economy and frugality.

But huswifery the little Heaven had lent,
She duly paid a rent for quarter-rent;
And pinch'd her belly, with her daughters two,
To bring the year about with much ado.
Dryden, The Cuck and the Fox, v.

Huswife. s. See Huswife.

Huswifely. adj. Thrifty; frugal; becoming a housewife.

*Tusser, Five Hundred Points of good
Housewifery*.

Thy good lady . . . therein reap'd
The just reward of her high huswifery:
To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh,
When she was far.
H. Jonson, Forest.

Hut. s. [N.F. hute.]

1. Poor cottage.

Our wandering saints, in woful state, . . .
To a small cottage came at last,
Where dwelt a good old honest yeoman,
Called in the neighbourhood Philimon,
Who kindly did these saints invite,
In his poor hut to pass the night.

By a house, I mean a building with one story over another; by a hut, a dwelling with only one floor.
Johnson, Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland. (Ord M.)

2. Temporary building, more like a house than a tent, for soldiers: (as, 'to hut troops,' i.e. to lodge them in huts).

mystery in their locked closets.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 255: 1616.

The best way to keep them, after they are threshed, is to dry them well, and keep them in hutches, or close casks.—Mortimer, Housewifery.

Archbishop Chichester gave a borrowing chest to the university of Oxford, which was called Chichester's
hutch.—T. Warton, Notes on Milton's Comus.

Hutch. v. a. Lay up in, or as in, a hutch,
coffin, or chest; hoard.

In her own loins,
She hutch'd the all-worship'd ore, and precious gems.
Milton, Comus, 718.

Huzz. interj. Exclamation, or shout, of admiration or applause.

Liberty, property, and old England for ever,
huzza!—Goklamith, Essays, xiv.

Huzz. s. Utterance of the shout Huzz.

The huzzas of the rabble are the same to a bear as they are to a prince.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

The whole armament was in the highest spirits.
The rowers, flushed by success, and animated by the thought that they were going to fight under the eyes of the French and Irish troops who had been assembled for the purpose of subjugating England, pulled manfully and with loud huzzas towards the six huge wooden castles which lay close to Fort Lisson.—
Macaulay, History of England, ch. xviii.

Huzz. v. a. Shout Huzz.

and clothiers.—Addison.

Huzzing. verbal abs. Shouting of Huzz.

From the Place Louis Quinze, where they slept, all the way to the Hôtel-de-Ville, it is one sea of tri-colour cockades, of clear national muskets; one tempest of huzzings, hand-clappings, aided by 'occasional rollings' of drum-music.—Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. i. b. v. ch. vii.

Hyacinth. s. [Gr. ἡάκινθος; Lat. hyacinthus.]

1. In Botany. Plant so called. The garden, or florists', hyacinth falls into numerous varieties and sub-varieties. The wild hyacinth, a native plant, is the Hyacinthus (Agaphis) nonscriptus. The Muscari racemosum is called, from its inflorescence, the Grape, and, from its smell, the Starch hyacinth.

The hyacinth hath a bulbous root: the leaves are long and narrow: the stalk is upright and naked, the flowers growing on the upper part in a spike:
the flowers consist each of one leaf, are naked, subulose, and cut into six divisions at the brim, which are reflexed: the ovary becomes a roundish fruit with three angles, which is divided into three cells, which are filled with roundish seeds.—Miller.

2. In Mineralogy. Gem so called; Jacinth.

The hyacinth is the same with the lapis lyncurium of the ancients. It is a less showy gem than any of the other red ones. It is seldom smaller than a seed of hemp, or larger than a nutmeg. It is found of various degrees of deepness and paleness; but its colour is always a deadish red, with a considerable admixture of yellow; the most usual is that mixed red and yellow, which was known by the name of flame-colour.—Sir J. Hill, On Gems.

Diamonds, sapphires, rubies, topazes, hyacinths, and chrysoberyls are reckoned the most valuable gems.—Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mineralogy.

Hyacinthine. adj. Made of, constituted by, belonging to, resembling hyacinths.

[His] hyacinthine locks
Round from his parted forehead manly hung.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 361.

His curling locks like hyacinthine flowers.
Cowper, Translation of the Odyssey.

Hyades. s. pl. [Gr. ἡάδες; hæ-rai.] Constellation so called, and connected by the ancients with rainy weather.

We may add that it is also usual to distinguish the Head of Medusa, near Perseus; the Pleiades upon the back, the Hyades upon the forehead, of the Bull. . . In the description of the shield of Achilles the immortal poet speaks of the Pleiades, the Hyades, Orion, the Bear, or Chariot.—Arago, Popular Astronomy, translated by Admiral P. W. M.
English and R. Grant, b. viii.

Then first on was the hollowed alder swan;
Then sailors quarter'd heaven, and found a name
For every fix'd and every wandering star;
The pleiads, hyads, and the northern car.

Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, l. 307.

Hyaline. adj. [Gr. ἡάλινος, from ἡάλος = sea-green, also glass; Lat. hyalus.]

1. In Medicine. Transparent, clear, and slightly consistent (i.e. as a jelly). The older and more common use of the word is in the derivative form Hyaloid = hyaline- like, which is used both as an adjective and a substantive for the capsule of the vitreous humour of the eye. From this hyaline, a newer word (meaning 'like the contents of the hyaloid') seems to be derived, rather than from the original Greek.

Dr. Sanky's own examinations have only as yet extended to the capillaries, which he believes to be more or less diseased in every case of general paralysis. The most constant appearance is a tortuosity of these vessels, which may amount to a complex twisting, or little knots of varicose vessels of a very complicated kind. Another appearance is a sort of hyaline deposit, sitting more or less closely around the capillaries; but it must be observed that neither of the above morbid changes are confined to general paralysis.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

2. A rhetorical, or poetic, term for the colour of the sea or atmosphere. Used substantively.

Another heaven
From heaven-gate not far, founded in view
On the clear hyaline, the sky was.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 617.

Hyaloid. adj. [Gr. -ειδής = like, having the look, or appearance, (αἰος) of anything.] See Hyaline.

Hybrida. s. [Lat. from Greek, hybrida.] Cross-breed; mongrel; individual whose parents belong to either different species, or different varieties of the same species.

It is not to be wondered at that in wild nature hybrid varieties should be far from uncommon. . . . Saxifraga lutea purpurea of La Pyrae and Saxifraga rubra of De Caudolle are only wild accidental hybrids between Saxifraga nictitans and saxifraga. — Lindley.

Angles, Jutes, Saxons, and Danes poured into our own country for centuries, but they only came in boat-loads; and, although comparatively numerous, must at all times have been much inferior in number to the native inhabitants. The probability, then, is that we are more Britons than Teutons by descent, although, believing ourselves purely the latter, we call ourselves Anglo-Saxons. At the best we are but hybrids, yet, probably, not the worse for that. Among the lower animals in the wild state, no hybrids are ever produced, and something similar to this, although from a very different cause, is found to be the case in the rule state of human society. There is here a repugnance, amounting, indeed, to hostility, which prevents it. — J. Crawford, Classification of the Races of Man, Transactions of the Ethnological Society.

Hybrida. adj. Having the origin, or character, of a hybrid; belonging to the class of hybrids; bastard. Applied, in Philology, to words formed of elements from different languages; and, more generally still, to heterogeneous objects of any kind.

We should by all means deal with our separatists, and dissenters, as St. Paul did with those Judaizing, hybrid Christians. — South, Sermons, v. 618.

In America, a natural republicanism quickly got rid of the hybrid method formerly adopted by the States of New England, and left every form of faith to its own resources. — Gludson, The State in its Relations with the Church.

The Jews speak the languages of the many races among whom they are settled, and no section of them speaks the language of the Pentateuch, or any modification of it. The Egyptians speak Arabic nearly to the Jews of their original tongue. . . . A German tongue with an admixture of Latin, is now the language of the great majority of the people of Britain. . . . Assuredly we do not conclude from these facts that the ancient Egyptians were of the Arabian race, the aboriginal people of France and Spain of Italian, or those of Britain of the Geric. What we should infer, even if we did not know it to be historically true, is simply that the countries in question were long in the occupation of foreign invaders, who mixed their blood largely with that of the original inhabitants, resulting in the production of a hybrid population originating in races distinct, yet nearly allied. — J. Crawford, Classification of the Races of Man, Transactions of the Ethnological Society.

Hybridism. s. Character, state, or condition of a hybrid.

'Hybridism' is properly formed; but 'shpherdism,' with the base of English and the affix of French origin, is a specimen of hybridism. — Dr. R. G. Latham, English Language.

Hybridity. s. Same as Hybridism.

These are all well-ascertained instances of hybridity. — Prichard, Physical History of Man.

Hybridization. s. Rendering hybrid.

The most eminent physiologists seem to be arriving at the opinion that the fertilization of the ovule, as it is termed, consists in the union of a part of the contents of a pollen-grain with certain matter contained in the ovule, and that the embryo originates from this mixed matter. The correctness of this opinion is rendered still more probable by the consideration of what takes place under the circumstances of hybridization of species. — Thwaites, Annals of Natural History, i. n. s. 163.

Hybridizing. verbal abs. Act of hybridization.

The best paper we possess on the practical value of the facts elicited by hybridizing is . . . from the pen of the late Dean of Manchester. — Lindley.

We can prove the affirmative, and that is by the use of hybridizing experiments. — Dr. Herbert, in Journal of the Horticultural Society.

Hybridous. adj. Hybrid. Rare.

Why such different species should not only mingle together, but also generate an animal, and yet that that hybridous production should not again generate, is to me a mystery. — Ray.

Hyd- and Hydro-. This, as may be seen by the entries, is an import prefix. The Greek word, ὕδωρ = water, its genitive case being ὕδατος; a fact which shows that either the final p is no part of the root, or that it has been got rid of. The vowel, too, which precedes it is long, -ōp. Now, the ordinary rule in compounds from the Greek and Latin, where the substantive is what is called impariagglabie (i.e. when the oblique cases have a consonant which is wanting in the nominative), is that it is from the fuller form that the compound is developed. Hence, the derivatives from ὕδωρ, and the compounds connected with them, ought to begin, not with hydro-, but with hydrot-. As Hydatid, however, is the only word so formed, the others are more accurately derived from the adjectival form, ὕδατος, or rather from the root of it.

Hydatid. s. [Gr. ὕδατος, ὕδωρ, ὕδατος = water; Lat. hydatid. See Hydro-.] Entozoon (intestinal worm) so called.

All the water is contained in little bladders, adhering to the liver and peritoneum, known by the name of hydatidæ. — Wiemann, Nergers.

The simplest of all forms of the parasite is the hydatid or nephrocyte. This consists of a vesicle filled with fluid, and apparently possessing no further organization. A careful examining of the wall of this vessel, however, shows that, besides the enveloping cyst, it contains two or more coats, and that in the substance of the inner one are the rudiments of new cells in various stages of growth. These, as they advance in development, project more and more into the cavity of the parent cell, and at last become detached from its wall, and lie loosely within it; shortly before this separation, however, the young hydatid is seen to contain smaller cells, which increase in size along with it. — Carpeles, Principles of Human Physiology, § 309, b.; ed. 1851.

Hydatidæ . . . are of no infrequent occurrence in several of the int. . . organs of the body. They are called nephrocytes, headless bag. In size they vary from the bigness of a pea to that of a swan's egg. They look like, or rather they are, spherical membranous bladders filled with a thin colourless liquid which holds in solution a large quantity of common salt. . . . These hydatid tumours are more common in the liver than in any other single organ. . . . Minute in their origin, hydatidæ may enlarge and multiply till the tumour formed by them attains an enormous size, and at length destroys life by its bulk and pressure. . . . Of course, the direct consequences of the pressure will depend much upon the parts occupied by the hydatidæ. You may easily imagine what kind of symptoms are likely to ensue when they are lodged within the abdomen, within the less yielding thorax, within the unyielding skull. — Watson, Lectures on the Principles and Practice of Physic, lect. lxiv.

Hydra. s. [Gr. ὕδωρ; Lat. hydra = water-serpent; such being its meaning as a common term. As an English word, however, its origin is rather from Hydra, the proper name; the particular Hydra of the lake Lerne (the Lernaean Hydra) being a fabulous monster, snake or dragon, from which as fast as one head was cut off, another shot out afresh. The destruction of this monster was the second labour of Hercules.]

1. From the Lernaean Hydra; (generally connected with head, and suggesting the notion of a many-headed monster; often used adjectivally).

New rebellion rises
Their hydra heads, and the false North displays
Her broken league to imp her serpent wings.
Milton, Sonnets, xv. 6.
Nubius

The hydra of the many-headed hissing crew.

Dryden.
More formidable hydra stands within,
Whose jaws with iron teeth severely grin.

Id., Translation of the Æneid, vi. 778.

2. In Zoology. Polype so called. See extracts.

Of the hydra or fresh-water polype, two species are commonly known, the hydra viridis or green polype, and hydra fusca, or brown polype. . . . The body of the hydra consists of a stupid bag or sac which may be regarded as a stomach. At the upper end . . . is a central opening which is commonly termed the mouth, and this is surrounded by a circle of tentacles or arms, usually from six to ten in number. . . . A striking proof of the simplicity of the structure of the hydra is the fact that it may be turned inside out like a glove; that which was before its external tunicament becoming the lining of its stomach and vice versa. — Carpeles, Principles of Human Physiology, § 250.

The relations of the parts may be illustrated thus:—Cut off the finger of a leather glove that has a lining; and let the leather and the lining represent the ectoderm and endoderm of a hydra. Thrust the point of the glove-finger back into the cavity, until the introverted portion comes out beyond the open end. Cut off the projecting apex of the introverted portion level with the edges of the open end; and then unite the edges of the introverted portion and the outer portion. The arrangement of structures will then typify that which is common to all animals except the protozoa and the lower coelenterata: the introverted part representing the alimentary canal; the outer part representing the body; . . . and the closed cavity between the two representing the perivisceral sac. This, however, is not the whole parallelism. If in the glove-finger, representing in its original form the hydra, we suppose the leather standing for the ectoderm to be growing outwards, and the lining standing for the endoderm to be growing inwards, then if in the part that is introverted the same relations of growth are maintained, it is manifest that of its two layers if one which was outermost and is now innermost, will grow towards the open cavity which stands for the alimentary canal, while the other layer will grow towards the closed cavity standing for the perivisceral sac. And these are the directions of growth actually found in the parts thus symbolized. — Herbert Spencer.

Hydragogue. adj. [Gr. ὕδωρ = water + ἀγω = lead, bring out, induce.] Having a tendency to induce, or the property of inducing a flow or discharge of water; (specially applied in Medicine to a certain purgative medicine which not only brings away fecal matter, but brings along with it a great quantity of liquid matter).

Kluterium has a violent hydragogue action. — Pereira, Materia Medica and Therapeutica.

Hydragogue. s. Hydragogue medicine.

Hydragogue [are] such medicines as occasion the discharge of watery humours, which is generally the case of the strongest cathartics, because they shake most forcibly the bowels and their appendages. — Quincy.

Hydrangea. s. Garden plant so called.

Hydrangea may now be planted in pots. — Abercrombie, Gardener's Journal, April.

Hydraulic. adj. [Gr. ὕδωρ, and αἰλός = pipe, tube.] Connected with, relating, applied to hydraulics.

We have employed a virtuoso to make an hydraulic engine in which a chemical liquor resembling blood, is driven through elastic channels. — Arbuthnot and Pope.

A pressure of five hundred tons may be obtained from a well-made hydraulic press with a ten-inch ram and a one-inch set of pumps. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hydraulic. adj. Same as hydraulic.

Among the engines in which air is useful, pumps may be accounted and all hydraulic machines. — Dehaene, Physico-Theology.

Hydraulics. s. See Hydrodynamics.

Hydraulics . . . considers the motion of fluids . . . as distinguished from hydrostatics, (it) is that science which treats of certain machines or engines in which fluids are principally concerned. . . . Hydraulics explains the equilibrium of fluids, or the circulation of fluids at rest; upon removing that equilibrium, motion ensues; and here hydraulics commences. Hydraulics, therefore, supposes hydrostatics. — Encyclopædia Metropolitana.

Galileo, in a treatise entitled Della Causa che muove nell'Acqua, lays down the principles of hydraulics already established by Stevin, and among others what is called the hydraulic paradox. Whether he was acquainted with Stevin's writings may be perhaps doubted; it does not appear that he mentions them. The more difficult science of hydraulics was entirely created by two disciples of Galileo, Castelli and Torricelli. It is one every hero of high importance, and especially in Italy. The work of Castelli, Della Misura dell'Acque Corrente and a continuation, were published at Rome in 1628. His practical skill in hydraulics, displayed in carrying off the stagnant waters of the Arno, and in many other public works, seems to have exceeded his theoretical science. An error into which he fell, supposing the velocity of fluids to be as the height down which they had descended, led to false results. Torricelli proved that it was as the square root of the altitude. — Hallam, History of the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. ii. ch. viii.

Hydrocele. s. [Gr. ὕδωρ and κύλη.] Dropsy of the testicle.

In the local variety of dropsy that is called hydrocele, the re-accumulation of liquid is sometimes prevented by exciting just so much inflammation of the membrane as may cause its opposite surfaces to adhere; whereby, the cavity itself being abolished

HYDROCEPHALIC} HYDR

any return of the disease is rendered impossible.—Watson, Lectures on the Principles and Practice of Physic, lect. xvi.

Hydrocephalic, adj. Relating to, connected with, constituted by, Hydrocephalus.

The children of such families often die in infancy or early youth; are frequently scrofulous, and are liable to hydrocephalic and convulsive diseases; and, if they grow up, are frail in body and imbecile in mind, or predisposed to mental disorders.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hydrocephalus, s. [Gr. κεφαλή = head.] Dropsy in the head. See extracts.

A hydrocephalus, or dropsy of the head, is only incurable when the serum is extravasated into the ventricles of the brain.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

When the cerebral ventricles are distended with water, we express the diseased condition by the term hydrocephalus; when serum liquid collects in the pleura or in the pericardium, we say that the patient has hydrothorax or hydropericardium.—Watson, Lectures on the Principles and Practice of Physic, lect. xvi.

Hydrochloric, adj. In Chemistry. Constituted by the combination of hydrogen and Chlorine. See Muriatic.

When heartburn is attended by rancid, septic, or insipid eructations, the mineral acids, as the nitric, the hydrochloric, and the aromatic sulphuric acids, given in simple camphor, or aromatic water, or in suitable tonic infusions, will be most serviceable.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

A concentrated aqueous solution of this [hydrochloric] acid has long been known under the name of spirit of salt and of marine or muriatic acid; but in the purer form of gas it was discovered in 1774 by Priestley. . . . One of the most striking properties of hydrochloric acid gas is its powerful attraction for water.—Turner, Elements of Chemistry, p. 273.

Hydrocyanic, s. In Chemistry. Constituted by the combination of hydrogen and Cyanogen. See Prussic.

Cyanogen unites as a compound radical with oxygen, hydrogen, and most other non-metallic elements; and also with the metals; many of the latter compounds are similar to the haloid salts, but others . . . possess a perfectly distinct character. . . .

Hydrocyanic acid, prussic acid, discovered by Scheele (for a knowledge of its nature and chemical properties we are indebted to Gay-Lussac), is a constituent of the water distilled from the leaves and blossoms of several stone-fruits; . . . its vapour, when inhaled, instantly acts as a most powerful poison.—Turner, Elements of Chemistry, pp. 724-730.

Hydrodynamies, s. [Gr. δύναμις = power; δυναμικός = having, relating to, power.] That branch of general Mechanics which considers the equilibrium and motion of fluids.

The terms hydrostatics and hydrodynamics have corresponding significations to the statics and dynamics in the mechanics of solid bodies; viz. hydrostatics is that division of the science which treats of the equilibrium of fluids, and hydrodynamics that which relates to their forces and motion. It is, however, very usual to include the whole doctrine of fluids under the general term hydrodynamics, and to denote the divisions relative to their equilibrium and motion by the terms hydrostatics and hydrodynamics. Hydrostatics is that branch of hydrodynamics which relates to the equilibrium and pressure of fluids. . . . Hydraulics treats of the phenomena attending the motion of fluids.—Encyclopædia Metropolitana.

Hydrogen, s. In Chemistry. Elementary substance so called; in combination with oxygen, a constituent of water (whence its name ὑδρογ + the root of γεννέω = beget, produce).

Hydrogen was first correctly described in 1766 by (Avonhill, under the name of inflammable air. It had been previously confounded with other combustible gases, and was called phlogiston, with the notion that it is the matter of heat. . . . [It] is colourless, inodorous, tasteless; always gaseous when uncombined; a powerful refractor of light; the lightest body in nature, and hence the best material for filling balloons.—Turner, Elements of Chemistry, p. 187: 1847.

Men are not, when brought together, converted into another kind of substance, with different properties; as hydrogen and oxygen are different from water, or as hydrogen, oxygen, carbon, and azote, are different from nitric, muriatic, and tartaric. Human beings in society have no properties but those which are derived from, and may be resolved into, the laws of the nature of individual man.—Black, h. v. ch. vii. § 1.

• Sir H. Davy, from finding that the flame of hydrogen gas was not communicated through a long slender tube, conjectured that a shorter but still slenderer tube would answer the same purpose; this led him to try the experiments, in which, by continually shortening the tube, and at the same time lessening its bore, he arrived at last at the wire-gauge of his safety-lamp.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, b. iv. ch. ii. § 4.

Hydrographer, s. One who employs himself in hydrography; one who investigates or illustrates the geography, or topography, of the sea.

It may be drawn from the writings of our hydrographer.—Boyle.

Hydrographical, adj. Relating to maps or charts, which represent the sea-coast, rocks, islands, shoals, and the like.

Christopher Columbus, the first great discoverer of America, was a man that earned his living by making and selling hydrographical maps.—Chambers.

Hydrography, s. [Gr. γράφω = write, describe.] Description of the waters (especially the marine and oceanic) parts of the terraqueous globe; system of survey of particular coasts and seas; maritime surveying.

For the reception of which waters he had prepared a channel; how deep, or how great a part of the earth is filled with them, I suppose is beyond this man's skill in philosophy or hydrography to determine.—Bishop Croft, Animadversions on Dr. T. Burnet's Theory of the Earth, p. 56.

Hydromancy, s. [Gr. μαντεία = prophecy.] Prediction by water.

Divination was invented by the Persians; there are four kinds of divination: hydromancy, pyromancy, aeromancy, and geomancy.—Ayliffe, Pargoy's Jurin's Comities.

The origin of hydromancy is ascribed by Varro to the Persians, and Numa is said to have had recourse to it for instruction how he should settle the ceremonies of religion.—Brady, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Hydromel, s. [Gr. ὑδρο + μέλι = honey.] Drink, or beverage, composed of honey and water.

Hydromel is a drink prepared of honey, being one of the most pleasant and universal drinks the northern part of Europe affords, as well as one of the most ancient. —Mortimer.

In fivers the ailments prescribed by Hippocrates were ptisans and cream of barley; hydromel, that is, honey and water, when there was no tendency to a delirium.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Hydrometer, s. [Gr. μέτρον, s.; μετρέω, v.; measure.] Instrument to measure certain qualities of water (generally its specific gravity).

Hydrometer is an instrument for ascertaining the specific gravity of liquids. Reaumur's hydrometer, which is much used in France and other countries of the continent of Europe, when plunged in pure water of the specific gravity of 50° Fahrenheit, marks 0 upon its scale; in a solution containing fifteen per cent. of common salt and eighty-five of water by weight, it marks 15°, so that each degree is meant to indicate corresponding with one per cent. of that salt. —Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Hydrometry, s. Measurement (of the specific gravity) of water.

In . . . 1696 he [Dionisio Guadalupe] was made professor of mathematics, and four years afterwards a new chair was created for him, under the title of that of hydrometry, which, from that period, was accounted degrading of being ranked among the cultivated sciences.—Cressy, Encyclopædia of Civil Engineering, p. 298: ed. 1854.

Hydrophobic, adj. Connected with, relating to, Hydrophathy; (as, 'a Hydrophobic establishment').

Hydrophobist, s. One who practises, one who puts faith in the practice of, Hydrophathy.

(For example see extract under next entry.)

Hydrophathy, s. [Gr. πάθος = suffering.] Treatment of diseases by water.

He has tried both hydrophathy and homeopathy . . . has now settled into a confirmed hydrophathist. —Sala, Dutch Pictures.

Hydrophobia, s. [Gr. φόβος = fear.] Dread of water; specially applied to it in Medicine as a symptom in the disease caused by the bite of a mad dog.

HYDR

Among those dismal symptoms that follow the bite of a mad dog, the hydrophobia or dread of water is the most remarkable.—Quincy.

The pathognomonic signs [of hydrophobia] are,—cramps of the muscles of the pharynx and thorax; spasmodic action of the diaphragm; a great dread of fluids; a recurrence of paroxysms of ptyalism on attempting to drink, or on exposure to a current of air; the flow of viscid saliva (hydrophobic saliva), delirium, exhaustion, and generally death. A person, we will suppose, is bitten by a rabid animal. After an uncertain interval, called the stage of incubation or the latent period, complaint is made of mental uneasiness, chilliness, languor, and lassitude; there is restlessness also, loss of appetite, and more or less headache. Sometimes a sensation of numbness, or even of great soreness, in the bitten part is experienced, but in any case the precursory symptoms are followed in two or three days by the confirmed stage of the disease. This commences generally with garrulity, peculiar sighings, nausea, and fever; to which succeed stiffness of the neck, difficulty of breathing and swallowing, a horror of liquids, an alarming sense of suffocation, and an excessive secretion of tenacious saliva causing frequent hawking and spitting. There now set in violent spasmodic convulsions of the whole body; the paroxysms being occasioned especially by the sight of liquids, or the sound of running water, or any attempt at drinking. . . . The stage of incubation in hydrophobia may be said to vary from thirty days to eighteen or twenty months; the duration perhaps depending upon the virulence and quantity of the poison, as well as upon the constitution and age of the party inoculated. The period appears to be shorter in very young persons than in those more advanced in years. Cases are recorded where the symptoms have set in as early as the eighth day; but others are known in which their appearance has been delayed for four, five, and seven years. In one instance related by Dr. Hardley it is said that twelve years intervened between the bite and the first hydrophobic symptoms.—Tinsler, Practice of Medicine, pt. i. iv.

Hydrophobic, adj. Connected with, relating to, Hydrophobia.

(For example see extract under preceding entry and Hyperæsthesia).

Hydrophoby, s. Hydrophobia, of which it is the more vernacular though less common form.

A letter from Dr. Lister to Mr. Asdon, dated at York, March 29, 1853, was produced, containing an account of an hydrophoby in a man bitten by a mad dog. —Birch, History of the Royal Society, iv. 107.

Hydriole, adj. Dropsical.

The world's whole map is sunk:
The general balm th' hydriole earth hath drunk.
—Donne.

Every lust is a kind of hydriole distemper, and the more we drink the more we shall thirst.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Hydriole wretches by degrees deny, (sighing the more, the more they waste away;
By their own ruins they augmented lye,
With thirst and heat amidst a deluge fry.
—Sir E. Blackmore.

Hydriole, s. Dropsical person.

One sort of remedy he uses in dropsies, the water of the hydrioles.—Arbuthnot.

Hydriole, adj. Same as Hydriole.

Causticities heat the watery parts of the body; as urine, and hydriole water.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Hydriole swellings, if they be pure, are polliculi.—Wise, Surgery.

Hydropsy, s. Dropsy.

Soft-swollen and pale, here lay the Hydropsy, Unwieldy man, with belly monstrous round.
—Thomson, Castle of Indolence.

Hydroscope, s. [Gr. σκοπέω = see, observe.] Instrument for measuring the dampness, or moisture, of the air, or a gas.

It seems to me if a statical hydroscope could be had, it would be very convenient in regard to its fitness, both to determine the degree of the moisture or dryness of the air, and to transmit the observations made of them to other.—Boyle, vol. i. p. 788. (Rich.)

Hydrostatic, adj. Connected with, relating to, Hydrostatics.

This character of specific gravity may be applied by any person of common intelligence, with the aid of a small hydrostatic balance.—Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines, Ure.

It is hardly to be expected that the above reasoning will, at first sight, produce conviction in the mind of the reader, except he have . . . followed, with clear and steady apprehension, some of the trains of reasoning by which the pressures of fluids are determined; as, for instance, the explanation of what is called the hydrostatic paradox.—Whewell.

Hydrostatics, s. [Gr. στάσις, στάσις = from root of stán = stand.] See Hydrodynamica.

His [Boyle's] incomparable treatises of the air and hydrostatics.—Bentley, Sermons, vii.

The lofty column of water issuing out of the trumpet of Pam, exceeded all our conceptions of the power of hydrostatics.—Swinburne, Travels through Spain, vol. 43.

The first discovery made in hydrostatics since the time of Archimedes is due to Stevinus. He found that the vertical pressure of fluids on a horizontal surface is as the product of the base of the vessel by its height, and showed the law of pressure even on the sides.—Hallam, History of the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, p. li. ch. vii. § 20.

Hydrostatical. adj. Same as Hydrostatic.

A human body forming in such a fluid, will never be recomable to this hydrostatical law: there will be always something lighter beneath, and something heavier above; because, hence, the heavier in specie, will be ever in the midst.—Bentley.

Hydrostatically. adv. According to hydrostatics.

The weight of all bodies around the earth is ever proportional to the quantity of their matter: as for instance, a pound weight, examined hydrostatically, ... doth always contain an equal quantity of solid mass.—Bentley, Sermons, vii.

Hydrostatician. s. Investigator of hydrostatics.

It is known to hydrostaticians that, according to a theorem of Archimedes, the weight of a body belonging to that kind may be gathered from the weight of the water, that is equal in magnitude to that part of the body that is immersed in that liquor when the solid floats freely upon it.—Boyle, vol. vi. p. 482. (Rich.)

Hydrótis. s. Hydragogue, the latter being the commoner term; purger of water or phlegm.

He seems to have been the first who divided purges into hydrótis and purgers of bile. Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Chins, Weights, and Measures.

Hyen. s. Hyena. Rare, or a misprint.

I will weep when you are disposed to be merry; I will laugh like a hyen, when you are inclined to sleep. Shakespeare, As you like it, iv. 1.

Hyena. s. [Gr. haina.] Animal so called.

A wonder more amazing would we find; The hyena shows it, of a double kind: Varying the sexes in alternate years, In one begets, and in another bears.

Dryden, Fables.

The hyena was indeed well joined with the lever, as having also a lag in those parts, if thereby we understand the hyena odorata, or civet cat.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The keen hyena, fellow of the fell. Thomson.

Hyetographícal. adj. Connected with Hyetography.

Independent of anomalies, we observe that the amount of rain diminishes as we recede from the equator. This fact has led meteorologists to divide ... our globe into hyetographícal regions.—D. P. Thompson, Introduction to Meteorology, § 150.

Hyetographícal. s. [Gr. hyetós = rain + gráphiō = describe.] Description of the phenomena and causes of rain-fall.

The rain-gauge ... one of the most important instruments in hyetographícal.—D. P. Thompson, Introduction to Meteorology.

Hygiène. s. [Gr. hygia = goddess of health, health.] See extract.

Hygienic remedies are [the] remedies derived from the department of hygiene. Under the absurd name of non-naturals the ancients included six things necessary to health; but which, by accident or abuse, often became the cause of disease, viz. Air, Aliment, Exercise, Excretion, Sleep, and Affections of the mind. These are now denominated hygienic agents.—Pereira, Elements of Materia Medica and Therapeutics, p. 60: ed. 1840.

Hygienic. adj. Relating to, connected with, constituted by, consisting in, hygienic: (often opposed to Therapeutic).

(For example see preceding entry).

Hygienical. adj. Same as Hygienic.

Things relating to the hygienical part of physics.—Boyle, vol. ii. p. 182. (Rich.)

Hygíology. s. [Gr. hýōc.] Doctrine of the phenomena and causes of the moisture of the atmosphere.

[On the sea] we approach the chief problems of hygíology in their least complicated form.—Sir J. W. Lubbock, Manual of Scientific Enquiry, vol. ii.: Meteorology.

Hygrometer. s. [Gr. hýōc = wet, moist, and metron, s., metrōn, v. = measure.] Instrument to measure the degree of moisture.

I have news from Paris ... that a friend of his has found out a very sensible hygrometer, which, besides marking the moistness of the air, will also be improved to wind up a pendulum: which, if it succeeds, will be a kind of perpetual motion.—Boyle, b. vi. 510. (Rich.)

A sponge, perhaps, might be a better hygrometer than the earth of the river. Arbuthnot, On the Effects of Air on human Bodies.

A great many hygrometers have been invented; but they may all be referred to three principles. The construction of the first kind of hygrometer is founded upon the property of some substances of expanding in a humid atmosphere, owing to a deposition of moisture within them; and of contracting it again in a dry air, and in consequence contracting ... The second kind of hygrometer points out the opposite states of dryness and moisture by the rapidity of evaporation. ... The third kind of hygrometer is on a principle entirely different from the foregoing. ... It is desirable on some occasions not merely to know the hygrometric condition of air or gases, but to deprive them entirely of their vapour.—Turner, Elements of Chemistry, p. 49-51.

Hygrométric. adj. Relating to, connected with, constituted by, Hygrometry.

It is true that from meteorologic causes, inanimate objects are daily, sometimes hourly, undergoing modifications of temperature, of bulk, of hygrometric and electric condition. Herbert Spencer, Data of Biology, § 23.

If, as is manifest, the state of an organism is constantly affected by the state of its environment—if, as we know to be the fact, the changes of temperature, of composition, of hygrometric state, in the environment, as also these mechanical actions, and those variations of its food, its nutriment which occur in it, are liable to stop the processes going on in the organism; and if, as is seen in the instances hourly afforded, the changes that take place in the organism have the effect of directly or indirectly countering, balancing these changes in the environment; then, it follows that the life of the organism will be short or long, low or high, according to the extent to which changes in the environment are met by corresponding changes in the organism.—Ibid., § 121.

Hygrometry. s. Science and art of determining the atmospheric air or gases; measurement of moisture.

Hygrometer, or hygrometer [is] an instrument for measuring the degree of moisture in the air. Hygrometry is the science of the measurement of the moisture of the air, with the principles on which hygrometers are constructed. Hygrometric substances have their humidity always proportionable to the places they are in ... hygrometric—belonging to the art of determining the specific weight of moist bodies ... hygrometric [is] the science of comparing degrees of moisture.—Wilkes, Encyclopædia Londinensis.

Hygroscope. s. [Gr. skopos = see, view, spy, observe.] Instrument to show the moisture and dryness of the air, and to measure and estimate the quantity of either extreme.

(For example see under Hygrometry.)

Hygroscoptic. adj. Having affinity to water.

Hygroscoptic substances have their humidity always proportionable to the places they are in.—Adams.

Hygrostatic. adj. Connected by Hygrostatics.

Hygrostatic. s. Hygrology.

(For example see Hygrometry.)

Hylosauris. s. [Gr. hýōc = connected with, relating to, wood + sauros = lizard.] In Paleontology. See extract; also Ichthyosaurus.

The hylosaurus (or lizard of the World) appears to have been a land saurian of very large proportions (probably as much as fifteen feet in length), and covered with scales or dermal plates of moderate size and elliptical shape, which seem to have irregularly covered the skin.—Austen, Geology, Introductory, Practical, and Scientific.

Hyloarcheal. adj. [Gr. hýōc = wood; and, in a secondary sense, matter.] In Portuguese mudeira = wood or timber, is derived from the Latin materia = matter. In all the compounds, with the exception of the one which immediately follows (Hyloconurus), and which is a newly coined word, this secondary meaning prevails, the words in which it occurs belonging to the domain of speculative philosophy.] Presiding over matter.

By this hyloarcheal principle, or plastic nature, I so many of the vital motions of the body may be kept in play. Hallivell, Metamorphosis, p. 70: 1081.

Hylozoic. adj. [Gr. hýōc = life.] Connected with, relating to, constituted by, the doctrine of Hylozoism.

The ... to which the hylozoic corporealists pay all ... attention is a certain blind she-el or god-called Nature, or the life of matter.—Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 106. (Rich.)

When they [Spinoza and his followers] speak of the intelligence and knowledge of God, they mean to attribute these powers to him in no other sense than the ancient hylozoists attributed them to all matter; that is, that a stone, when it falls, has a sensation and consciousness; but that that consciousness is no cause at all, or power of acting. Which kind of intelligence, in any tolerable propriety of speech, is no intelligence at all. And consequently the arguments that proved the Supreme Cause to be properly an intelligent and active being, do also undeniably prove that he is likewise indwelt with liberty and choice; which alone is the power of acting.—Clarke, On the Attributes, § 2.

Hylozoical. adj. Hylozoic.

There hath been already mentioned another form of Atheism called by us hylozoical.—Cudworth, Intellectual System, (Rich.)

Hylozism. s. Doctrine by which life, or divine character, was attributed to matter, or the world. See Pantheism.

Hylozism makes all body, as such, and therefore every smallest atom of it, to have life essentially belonging to it.—Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 105. (Rich.)

Hylozist. s. Supporter of Hylozoism.

And from thence, afterward (to descend also further to hylozism) ... we ought not to censurer every hylozist, professing to hold a deity and a rational soul immortal for a more disguised atheist or a counterfeited historical theist.—Cudworth, Intellectual System, p. 106. (Rich.)

Hymen. s. [Gr. hýmēn = membrane.]

1. God of marriage.

He wore a garland of roses and myrtles on his head, and on his shoulders a robe like an imperial mantle, white and unspotted all over, excepting only that, where it was clasped at his breast, there were two golden turtle-doves that buttoned it by their bills, which were wrought in rubies. He was called by the name of Hymen. Teller, no. 120.

Hymen marched immediately after Love; and, seconding the good inclination which he had inspired, joined the hands of both brides.—Adams, Quixote, no. 122.

2. Virginal membrane.

Hymenéal. adj. Connected with Hymen as the god of marriage.

Chorus hymenéal.

Or triumphal chant,
Matched with thine would be all
But an empty vaunt.

A thing wherein we feel there is some hidden want. Shelley, To a Skylark.

Hymenéal. s. [Gr. hýmēn.] Marriage song.

For her the spouse prepares the bridal ring,
And her white virgins hymenéal sing. Pope.

Hymenéal. s. Same as Hymenéal.

... in close recess

With flowers, garlands, and sweet-smelling herbs,
Exposed Eye deck'd first her nuptial bed,
And heavenly claims the hymenéal song.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 708.

Hymenoptera. s. [Gr. hýmēn = membrane, and pteron = wing.] In Entomology. Name of a class of insect. See extract.

The insects which have four membranous wings simply veined, and crossing each other horizontally when at rest, form the order Hymenoptera: they undergo a complete metamorphosis, and include the most useful of insects, e.g. the bee. ... The insects which have the anterior pair of wings in the condition of the hemelytra, form the order Hemiptera; but certain genera have the dense part of the anterior wings reduced to so small a strip, that they are scarcely distinguishable, except by size, from the posterior pair, and these insects constitute a section of the order termed Homoptera.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. xvi.

Hymn. s. [Gr. hýmēn.] Encomiastic song, or song of adoration to some superior being.

As I care, in praise of mine own dame,
So now in honour of thy mother dear,
An honourable hymn I should frame. Spenser.
Our solemn hymns to sullen dirges change;
Our bridal flowers serve for a buried shame.
Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iv. 5.

When steel grows
Soft as the parasite's silk, let hymns be made
An overture for the wars. Luc, Caroleana, l. 9.

There is an hymn sung; but the subject of it is always the praises of Adam, and Noah and Abraham, concluding ever with a thanksgiving for the nativity of our Saviour.—Bacon.

Farewell, you happy shades,
When angels first should practice hymns, and string Their tuneful harps, when they to Heaven would sing. Dryden.
Hymn. v. n. Praise in song; worship with hymns.

Whose easier business were to serve their Lord
High up in heaven, with songs to hymn his throne.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 981.
Alexander came to a city called Nysa, which bested of Dionysus as its founder, and, as evidence of the fact, showed the ivy and laurel which he had planted. . . . And near the city was the mountain which he had named Meros, or Meru, in memory of his marvellous birth. The Macedonians, it is said, made a pilgrimage to the mountain, wore themselves chaplets of the ivy that grew in the thickets on its sides, and busily hymned the heart-cheering Power. Bishop Thorndike, History of Greece, ch. liii.

Hymn. v. n. Sing songs of adoration.
They touch'd their golden harps, and hymning
prais'd
God and his works. Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 953.
He had not left alive this patient saint,
This avill of afflicts, but sent him hence
To hold a peaceful branch of palm above,
And hymn'd in the quire. Dryden, Spanish Friar.

Hymnic. adj. Relating to hymns.
Where she (fair lady) tuning her chaste lays
Of England's empress to her hymnicke string.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 773.
He rounds the air, and breaks the hymnic notes
In birds, heaven's choristers, organick thrushes.
Donne.

Hymning. verbal abs. Song, or music, consisting of hymns; choir engaged on hymns.
Thus they in heaven above the starry sphere
Their happy hours in joy and hymning spent.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 416.

Hymnology. s. [Gr. hymnō = word, doctrine, principle.] System, collection, or arrangement, of hymns (specially church music).
That hymnology which the primitive church used at the offering of bread and wine for the eucharist.
Macle, Diet. Bibl., p. 141.

Even in the hymnology of the Latin church, her lyric poetry, it is remarkable, that, with the exception of the Te Deum, those hymns, which have struck, as it were, and cloven to the universal heart of Christendom, are mostly of a late period. . . .
Much of it, no doubt, like the lyric verse of the Greeks, was twin-born with the music; it is inseparably wedded with the music; its cadence is musical rather than metrical. It succeeds, as it were, the grave full tones of the chant, the sustained grandeur, the glorious burst, the tender fall, the mysterious dying away of the organ. It must be heard, not read. Decompose it into its elements, coldly examine its thoughts, its images, its words, its versification, and its music is gone. . . . Its profound religiousness has a charm to foreign ears, wherever there is no stern or passionate resistance to its power. In fact, all hymnology, vernacular as well as Latin, is poetry only to predisposed or habituated ears. Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. iv.

Hyoid. adj. and s. [like v., the form of the Greek letter Y, u-pilon.] In Anatomy.
Bone so called; in man, the bone between those of the lower jaw and the collar-bones,
i. e. the bones of the throat chiefly supporting the root of the tongue.

In the hyoid bone, simple as its form is in man,
there are no fewer than five centres of ossification,
one for the body, one for each of the great cornua, and one for each of the lesser cornua. Carpenter, Principles of Physiology.

Hyoidal. adj. Connected with the hyoid bone.
(For example see under Howler.)

Hyescyamus. s. [Lat. from Greek ἥρ, ἥρ = sow, swine, and κύμα = bean.] Henbane;
for which it is the medical term.

The treatment should consist mainly of attention to the digestive functions and state of the bowels; to the exhibition of quinine with camphor and hyoscymus, the preparations of bark with the alkalies of mineral acids, or the preparations of iron; and to the external application of the tere-binthinate ointment or embrocation already noticed.
Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hyper. Hyper-, and Hyper-. The first of these forms is merely an abbreviation of the second, which is used when the word which follows begins with a vowel. It is the Greek for under. Hyper, on the other hand, is the Greek for over. Word for word, they are the same as the Latin sub and super, to which the remarks here made may be extended. With all four the import, as the element of a compound, is of a twofold character. The word meaning under or over may be—

1. Purely and simply a Preposition or Adverb of place, as it is in such English words as underground, overhead. Or it may—

2. Denote degree, as in such English combinations as under-done, over-done.

Hyperbale. s. [Gr. from root of ὑπέρβαλον = leave under.] Figure by which words change their cases, tenses, or relations with each other.

Now these graces he requir'd as carefully to be kept as providently gotten, admonishing that they forake us not, speaking by an hyperbale, he gives us a caveat that we forgoe not them and withall noteth how ready to bee gone from us. Glacier, On Proverbs, p. 33. (Ord MS.)

Hyperaspist. s. [Gr. ἀσπίς = shield-bearer, ἀσπίς = shield.] Defender.

I appeal to any indifferent reader, whether G. M.
be not by his hyperaspist forsaken in the plain field.

The hyperaspists of the ancients bestrode their fellows fallen in battle, and covered them with their shields. Warburton, Note on Alcibiades.

Hyperbaton. s. [Gr.; root of παίρω = go.] Figure in writing, when the words are transposed from the plain grammatical order.

If your meaning be with a violent hyperbaton to transpose the text. Milton, Animadversions upon a Defense of the Humble Remonstrance.

The words are at times so transposed as to create an hyperbaton. Durell, Critical Remarks on Job, preface.

Hyperbola. s. [Gr.; root of βάλλω = throw;
the Latin rather than the Greek form.]
See extract.

[A hyperbola] in geometry [is] a section of a cone made by a plane, so that the axis of the section inclines to the opposite leg of the cone, which in the parabola is parallel to it, and in the ellipsis intersects it. The axis of the hyperbolic section will meet also with the opposite side of the cone, when produced above the vertex. Harris.

Had the velocities of the several planets been greater or less than they are, or had their distances from the sun, or the quantity of the sun's matter, and consequently his attractive power, been greater or less than they are now, with the same velocities, they would not have revolved in concentric circles,
but have moved in hyperbolas very eccentric.
Bentley.

A conic section is the locus of a point, whose distances from a fixed point and a straight line, given in position, are to each other in a constant ratio. . . .
[the ratio] may be either a ratio of equality or of lesser or greater inequality. . . . The hyperbola is the locus of a point, whose distance from the focus is always greater, in a given ratio, than its distance from the directrix. Encyclopædia Metropolitana, Conic Sections.

Hyperbole. 2. [see Hyperbola; the Greek rather than the Latin form.] Figure in rhetoric by which anything is increased or diminished beyond the exact truth: (as,
'He runs faster than lightning').

Terps unquar'd
Which, from the tongue of roaring Typhon dropt,
Would seem hyperbole.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 2.
Taffeta phrases, silken terms precise,
Three-pil'd hyperboles, spruce affectation,
Figures pedantic, these summer flies,
Have blown me full of unaged ostentation.

Id., Love's Labour's lost, v. 2.
Hyperboles, no daring and so bold,
Disclaiming bounds, are yet by rules contrail'd
Above the clouds, but yet within our sight,
They mount with truth, and make a tow'ring flight.

The common people understand rallery, or at least rhetoric, and will not take hyperboles in too literal a sense. Swift.

The hyperbole of Juliet seemed to be verified with respect to it. 'Upon their brows shame was admitted to them.' Macleay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Bacon.

Hyperbolic. adj. Belonging to the hyper-bola; having the nature of a hyperbola.

Conciliated in the middle with squares, with triangles before, and behind with hyperbolic lines.
Green, Mætem.

Hyperbolic. adj. [from hyperbola.] Having the character of a hyperbola.

The horny or pellucid coat of the eye riseth up, as a hillock, above the convexity of the white of the eye, and is of an hyperbolic or parabolical figure.
Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Hyperbolic. adj. [from hyperbole.] Exag-gerating or extenuating beyond fact.

An hyperbolic liar, a flatterer, a parasite. Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy: to the reader.

Look upon vices and vicious objects with hyperbolic eyes, and rather enlarge their dimensions, than their uneven deformities may not escape thy sense. Mir T. Bruneau, Christian Morals, iii. 2.

It is parabolical, and probably hyperbolic, and therefore not to be taken in a strict sense. Boyle.
'Perhaps,' says Salt, 'with the exception of Ariosto, no one has been more a poet by nature than he [Marini], a praise, however, which may justly seem hyperbolic to those who recall their attention to the highest attributes of poetry.' *Hollan, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iii. ch. v.
§4.*

Hyperbolism. s. Hyperbolic character.

Some particular expressions are found in it, which,
with all the allowance that can be made for the hyperbolism of the oriental style, are not easily applicable to the parties, even in a royal marriage. Bishop Horley, Sermons. (Ord MS.)

Hyperbolist. s. One who hyperbolizes.

I came to think the Psalmist an hyperbolist for comparing the transcendent sweetness of God's Word to that inferior one of honey, which is like it in nothing more, than in that of both, their sweetness experience gives much advantage to our notions than descriptions can. Boyle, On the Style of Holy Scripture, p. 263.

Hyperbolize. v. n. Speak or write with exaggeration or extenuation.

You have heard . . . how some of the ancientest fathers do speak, and how they hyperbolize sometimes, in some points, in their popular sermons. Bishop Montagu, Appeal to Cesar, p. 290: 1023.

The Spanish traveller was so habituated to hyper-bolize. Hawell, Instructions for foreign Travel, p. 178.

Which if but a rhetorical flourish, doth yet hyper-bolize into blasphemy. Palter, Holy War, p. 246.

Hyperbolize. v. a. Exaggerate; mention in a hyperbolic manner; reduce to a hyperbole.

Vain people, hyperbolizing his fact, . . . in grew by their flattery into that madness of conceit. Putherby, Atheomastix, p. 203: 1022.

Hyperborean. adj. [Lat. and Gr. Boreas = the north wind; God of the North Wind;
a proper rather than a common name.]
Northern.

Another property of an excellent language is the generality or large extent thereof; wherein no tongue within Christendom may compare with ours. For the Germans, of whom our Lithos (the Saxons, Jutes, and Angles) are a part, have spread themselves, and their Teutonic tongue, (though in divers dialects, which thing hath caused) throw all High and Low German, their primitive habitation; but also in divers other countries, where their victorious hand, enlarging still their territories, hath swept them; as in Denmark, Sweden, Lapland, Finland, Gotland, Norway, England, and the East Part of Scotland, even from Harwicke to the Orkneys, now the Isles of Orkney; which the very language, differing but little in dialect from the Northern or older English, doth shew. And therefore the Highland or Western Scots, (which indeed are the right Scots, speaking the Scottish or Irish tongue,) do call the Easterlings or Lowland-men (as the Welch do us) Saxons or Maxons. Likewise in the other Northern Isles; as Greenland, Freenland, Iceland, &c. even to the hyperboreans or frozen North. Neither only these Northern parts, but the South countries also, wheresoever they set their foots, have yielded to their puissance; France, subdued by their Franks and Normans; Africa, overrun by their Vandals; and Italy, by their Lon-bards, Gothes, and Vandals; though in these parts their language be mixt and much corrupted with the speech of the conquered people, whom they suffered to remain among them. Budler, English Grammar, 1653.

The body moul'd by the climate endures
The Equator heats and hyperborean frosts.
Armstrong.
The hyperborean ice he wander'd o'er,
And solitary roam'd round Tanais's shore.
J. Warton, Translation from Virgil.

The rough and full-mouthed pronunciation of the High-Germanic tongues . . . may be the natural produce of the bracing air of the North; the clearer and nester pronunciation of the Low-Germanic ones, that of the milder influence of the plain; the sharpner and sharper sounds of the Scandinavian group, that of the more chilly and plunging hyperborean atmosphere in which they have grown up and been formed. Craik, History of the English Literature and the English Language, vol. i. p. 6.

Hypercritic. s. Critic exact or captious beyond use or reason.

These hypercriticks in English poetry differ from the opinion of the Greek and Latin judges, from the Italian and French, and from the general taste of all ages.—Dryden.

Hypercritical. adj. Critical beyond necessity or use.

We are far from imposing those nice and hypercritical punctilios, which some astrologers obligen our partners to.—Keats.

Such hypercritical readers will consider my business was to make a body of refined sayings, only taking care to produce them in the most natural manner.—Swift.

Hyperdulia. s. [Gr. ὑπερδουλεία = slavery, service, servitude; δουλος = slave.] Superior kind of service, among the Romanists, to the Virgin Mary.

From whom our Romanists did first learn their hyperdulia, or transcendent kind of service, where-with they worship the Virgin Mary.—A. Archbishop Usher, Answer to the Jesuit Malone, p. 354.

From all Romish dulia, and hyperdulia, Good Lord deliver us.—Thid., p. 302.

Hyperduly. s. English form of the preceding.

Call you this devotion, as you please, whether duly or hyperduly.—Brevint, Saul and Samueel at Endor, p. 332.

Hypersthésia. s. [Gr. αἰσθησις = sensation.] In Physiology and Psychology. Exalted sensation.

In these cases, such is the morbid peripheral acuteness of sensibility, that the minimum portion of cold wind, or even the faintest breath of air from the mouth, coming in contact with the cutaneous surface of the hypersthésia patient, has often induced a fearful paroxysm of spasmodic suffering. In cases of acute visceral inflammation involving some of the ganglia of the great sympathetic, the general sensibility has become keenly acute. In certain hysterical affections of women the sensation is often intensely manifested. To such a degree has this hypersthésia been observed, that patients have been known to scream violently when the skin has been only touched. The faintest whisper, suddenly opening the door, or rustle of a newspaper, have been known, in such states of the nervous system, to induce severe conditions of violent convulsive spasm.—Dr. Forbes Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind, ch. xx.

Hypericon. s. In Botany. Plant so called; St. John's wort.

Hypericon, called "sua demonum," reckoned among sacred magical plants, on account of the Druids using them.—Stukeley, Paleographia Sacra, p. 18.

Hyperimeter. s. [Gr. μετρον = measure.] Excess, or instance of excess, over the standard required.

When a man rises beyond six foot, he is an hyperimeter, and may be admitted into the tall club.—Addison.

Hyperphysical. adj. Supernatural (which it translates? ὑπέρ = super + φυσικός = natural).

These are hyperphysical optics, and drawn from the heavens.—Aubrey, Miscellany, p. 147.

Hyperarcosis. s. Growth of fungous or proud flesh.

Where the hyperarcosis was great, I sprinkled it with precipitate, whereby I more speedily freed the ulcer of its putrefaction.—Wissman, Surgery.

Hyper trophy. v. a. Overnourish.

Whatever form of unsoundness belongs to the heart, the patient's own instinct is continually telling him that he must be still. . . . (The heart) is sooner hyper trophied, sooner attenuated, sooner dilated, and the disturbed blood-vessels sooner break themselves to congestions, and effusions, and hemorrhages, and inflammations.—Dr. G. H. Latham, Lectures on Subjects connected with Clinical Medicine, lect. xxiv.

Hyper trophy. s. [Gr. τροφή = nutrition.] Excess of nutrition.

We now come to those affections of the heart which may be usefully classed together under the name of unsoundness from disorganization. They consist in alterations of size and shape and bulk and capacity, and are the same which are commonly denoted by the terms hypertrophy, atrophy, dilatation, and contraction. And I shall continue to use the same terms. . . . Hypertrophy is a simple augmentation, and atrophy is a simple diminution of bulk and consistence in the heart's muscular substance. In hypertrophy its muscular substance is more red than natural, its carnes columnae are increased in thickness, and its proper fibrous texture is everywhere more strikingly manifest, while there is no interstitial deposition of matter new in its kind. In atrophy the muscular substance is less red than natural, its carnes columnae less developed, and its proper fibrous texture less distinguishable. But there is still the appearance of muscle, shrank and withered as if from an insufficient supply of nourishment. . . . A few years ago pathological anatomy had come to regard two particular forms of disorganization as the natural opposites of each other, and was fond of using names chosen on purpose to mark their contrast. These names were eccentric hypertrophy, and concentric hypertrophy.—Dr. P. M. Latham, Lectures on Subjects connected with Clinical Medicine, lect. xxvii.

Hyphen. f. [Gr. ὑφ' ὅ = under.] Note of conjunction. (as, vir-tue, ever-living).

What a sight it is to see writers committed together by the care for ceremonies, syllables, points, colons, commas, hyphens, and the like. B. Johnson, Discoveries. (See also Preliminary Notices, &c.)

Hyponotic. s. [Gr. ὑπνοτικός.] Medicine that induces sleep.

I need no better hyponotic to make me sleep. Sir T. Browne, Religion Medici. He writes, as an hyponotic for the spleen. Young, Epistle to Pope.

Hyponaut. s. [Gr. ὑπναύς = burnt.] Subterraneous chamber, or stove, in which was a furnace that served to heat the baths of the Greeks and Romans; and in modern times applied to the place which keeps warm a stove or hothouse.

The apartments on the east side. . . were probably warmed by the hyponaut.—Lycanus, Antiquit'.

Hypochondria. s. often plural. [Gr. χόνδρος = cartilage.] Parts on each side of the body, in front, lying under the cartilages of the ribs.

The blood moving too slowly through the celiac and mesenteric arteries, produce various complaints in the lower bowels and hypochondria; from whence such persons are called hypochondriac.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Hypochondria. s. Same as Hypochondriasis.

Will Hazard was cured of his hypochondria by three glasses.—Tull. r., no. 231. (Ord MS.) Moping here did hypochondria sit. Mother of spleen, in robes of various dye, Who vexed was full oft with ugly fit, And some her frantic dem'd, and some her dem'd a wit. Thomson, Cattle of Indolence.

Hypochondria. s. pl. Greek form of Hypochondria.

In the description of symptoms we are often obliged to speak of particular portions of the abdominal men; and it will be of future convenience to us if we make ourselves acquainted at starting with such a superficial map, marking out the topography of the belly. . . . Draw a horizontal line round the body touching the extremity of the costal cartilages. . . . Draw another line . . . horizontally, touching the lower edge of the false ribs; and a third touching the crest of each ilium. We have then three horizontal zones formed. These must be further subdivided by vertical lines; one on each side from the anterior spinous process of the ilium perpendicularly upwards. Each zone will be thus divided into three regions. The middle region of the upper zone is the epigastric region; on either side are the hypochondria. The middle region of the middle zone is the umbilical region; the iliac region, or the flanks, lie to the right and left of it. The hypogastric region is the middle region of the lowermost zone; and the mesal regions are contiguous to it.—Watson, Lectures on the Principles and Practice of Physic, lect. ix.

Hypochondria. adj. Melancholy; disordered in the imagination; suffering from Hypochondriasis.

Such is the hypochondria, melancholy complexion of its islanders, that we seem made of butter, every accident makes such a deep impression upon us.—Bishop Berkeley, Letters, 146, &c., p. 182: 1744.

Hypochondria. s. One who is melancholy, or disordered in imagination; sufferer from Hypochondriasis.

How the humours of the body arrive at an ability thus to impregnate the mind with conceits wild and monstrous beyond the varieties of Africa, is an enquiry not pertinent here; but to question that so they can, is to speak ourselves strangers to all the stories of hypochondriacs [which] books and discourses abound with.—Spencer, On Vulgar Prophecies, p. 98: 1653.

Reckoned dead down his life in attention of that most fundamental truth, the belief of one God; and yet he's not recorded either as foolish hypochondriac.—Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety. Sir Henry Holland has well observed that the hypochondriac, by fixing his business with morbid intention on different organs not merely creates disordered sensations in them but disordered actions.—Dr. T. H. Tanner, Practice of Medicine, p. 322.

Hypochondriac. adj. Hypochondriac (adj.).

A straightness of breath, which I should be glad to know whether you observe in other hypochondriac patients.—Sir H. Wotton, Reunion, p. 360.

Cold sweats are many times mortal, and always suspected; as in great fevers, and hypochondriac passions, being a relaxation or forsaking of the spirits.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Hypochondriacally. adv. In a hypochondriac manner.

Feelings of uneasiness, or even pain, originate in the mind as a disease existing in particular parts of the body; may be the lungs, stomach, heart, brain liver, or kidneys. Slight irregularities, and functional disturbances, in the action of these organs being noticed are at once suggestive to the mind, hypochondriacally disposed, of serious and fatal disease, progressing in the part to which the attention is conveyed. Dr. Forbes Winslow, Obscure Diseases of the Brain and Mind, p. 263.

Hypochondriacism. s. Melancholy; disordered imagination: (Hypochondriasis common).

In hypochondriacism the insanity not being formed, there is for the most part a capacity for action.—Johnstone, On Madness, p. 25.

Hypochondriasis. s. Hypochondriac affection or passion.

Mental affections produce hypochondriasis, by creating a disorder in the stomach and intestines, and in the nervous system.—Christison, On Mental Derangement, p. 200.

Hypochondriasis [is] chronic indigestion, with languor, flatulency, dejection of mind, and fear arising from inadequate causes; general exaltation of sensibility; a rapid succession of morbid phenomena, simulating numerous diseases; or otherwise a real, but variable state of sufferer, exaggerated by the morbid sensibility and fears of the patient, with unsteadiness of purpose, and distressing anxiety respecting his complaints. Hypochondriasis has been very differently arranged by medical writers. Aced placed it among spasmodic diseases, and Cullen, much more correctly, in that order of nervous complaints which depend upon defective vital power.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Hypochondry. s. One of the two regions called hypochondria.

If from the liver, there is usually a pain in the right hypochondry; if from the spleen, hardness and grief in the left hypochondry. Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 200.

Envy swells the hypochondria, which, by drinking up the nourishment of the neighbouring parts, makes the whole body lean and meagre.—Scott, Christian Life, pt. iii, ch. iii.

Hypericist. s. [Gr. ὑπερ; Lat. cistus: plant so called, gum-cistus.] See extract. Obsolete.

Hypericist is an insipidated juice, considerably hard and heavy, of a bluish black colour, when broken. The stem of the plant is thick and fleshy; and much thicker at the top, towards the bottom. The fruits contain a tough glutinous liquor, gathered before they are ripe; the juice is expressed, then formed into cakes.—Sir J. Hill.

Hypericry. s. Dissimulation with regard to the moral or religious character.

Laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypericry. 1 Peter, ii. 1.

Next stood hypericry with holy leer, Soft smiling and demurely looking down; But hid the dagger underneath the gown. Dryden, Fables.

Hypericry is much more eligible than open infidelity and vice; it wears the livery of religion, and is cautious of giving wounds; may, continued disguises are too great a constraint; men would leave off their vices, rather than undergo the toil of practising them in private.—Swift.

Hypericite. s. [Gr. ὑπερ; ῥιτις.] 1. Disssembler in morality or religion.

He heartily prays some occasion may detain us longer: I dare swear he is no hypericite, but prays from his heart.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, i. j.

A wise man hateth not the law; but he that is an hypericite therein, is as a ship in a storm.—Arctandania, xxiii. 8.

Fair hypericite, you seek to cheat in vain; Your silence argues, you ask time to repent. Dryden. The making religion necessary to interest might increase hypericry; but if one in twenty should be brought to true piety, and sinners be only hypericites, the advantage would still be great.—Swift.

2. Dissembler.

Ye honest men, beware,
Nor trust its smoothness; the third circling glass
Suffices virtue; but may hypocrite,
Who slyly speak one thing, another think,
Hateful as hell, still pleas'd unwearied drunk on,
And through insipid rage grow awful sincere.
J. Phillips, Cyphr. h. ii.

Hypocritely. adv. Hypocritically. Rare.
He is rehard'nd, like a stubborn boy,
That plies his lesson, and hypocritically coy.
While in his hand his master slinks the rod;
But if he turns his back, doth flout and nod.
Hypocrite, On Barlow, 169. (Ord MS.)

Hypocritid. adj. Dissembling; insincere; appearing differently from the reality.
Let others wear their hypocritical face. Swift.

Hypocritical. adj. Same as preceding.
Now you are confounding your enormities; I know it by that hypocritical down-cast look. Dryden, Spanish Friar.
Whatever virtues may appear in him, they will be esteemed an hypocritical imposture on the world; and in his retired pleasures, he will be presumed a libertine. Bopeya.

Hypocritically. adv. In a hypocritical manner; with either simulation or dissimulation; without sincerity; falsely.

Simon and Levi spake not only falsely, but insidiously, say hypocritically, abusing at once their prowliness and their religion. Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Hypocritish. adj. Hypocritical. Rare.
We perceive that Jesus read things in the hypocritical hearts of the pharisees. Trevelyan of Christian Religion. (Ord MS.)

Hypogastrie. adj. [Gr. γαστήρ = belly.] Belonging to the lower belly.

The swelling we supposed to rise from an effusion of serum through all the hypogastriac arteries. Wierman, Surgery.

(See also Hypochondria, & pl.)

Hypogæa. adj. [Gr.: root of γῆ = race, kind; γῆραι = beget.] See extract.

All the rocks that have been described in the present chapter, together with others which I have now thought it necessary to allude to, are sometimes spoken of as one group, under the name hypogæa, or Pluton. . . hypogæa, an expression introduced by Mr. Lyell, involves to a certain extent the reception of a theory which well deserves notice. . . Mr. Lyell proposes to include under the one name hypogæa all those unstratified rocks which offer no appearance of mechanical origin, together with the large classes of stratified rocks which do not contain any mark of organic remains, owing to changes which are assumed to have taken place in their intimate structure since their original deposition. Applied Geology, Introductory, Descriptive and Practical, vol. ii. p. 166; ed. 1844.

Hypogæum. s. [Gr. γῆ = earth.] See extract.
Hypogæum [is] a name which the ancient architects gave to all the parts of a building that were under ground, as cellars and vaults. Harris.

Hypostasis. s. [Gr. ὑπόστασις = under + standing; element for element, it is the same as Sub-stance, Under-standing; but it is also a theological rather than a metaphysical term.] See extracts.

1. Personality (a term used in the doctrine of the Holy Trinity).

The oneness of our Lord Jesus Christ, referring to the several hypostases in the one eternal, indivisible, divine nature, and the eternity of the Son's generation, and his co-eternity and consubstantiality with the Father, are assertions equivalent to those comprised in the ancient simple article. Hammond.

What was precisely the notion which these Latin Fathers intended to convey, and how far it approached the classical signification of the word 'Person', it may not be easy to determine. But we must presume that they did not intend to employ it in what is, now, the ordinary sense of the word 'Person'; both because 'Person' never, I believe, bore that sense in pure Latinity, and also because it is evident that, in that sense, 'three divine Persons' would have been exactly equivalent to 'three Gods'; a meaning which the orthodox always disavowed. It is probable that they had nearly the same view with which the Greek theologians adopted the word ὑπόστασις; which seems calculated to express that which stands under (i. e. the Subject of) Attributes. They meant, it may be presumed, to guard against the suspicion of teaching, on the one hand, that there are three Gods, or three Persons of the one God; or, on the other hand, that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are no more than three Names, all of the same signification. . . It is perhaps to be regretted that our Divines, in rendering the Latin 'Person', used the word Person, whose ordinary sense, in the present day at least, differs in a most important point from the theological sense, and yet is not so remote from it as to preclude all mistake and perplexity. If ὑπόστασις, or any other completely foreign term had been used instead, no idea at all would have been conveyed except that of the explanation given; and thus the danger at least of being misled by a word, would have been avoided. . . It is worth observing, as a striking instance of the little reliance to be placed on etymology as a guide to the meaning of a word that ὑπόστασις, 'Substantia', and 'Understanding', so widely different in their sense, correspond in their etymology. — Archbishop Whately, Elements of Logic, appendix i., Ambiguous Terms, Person.

2. In Medicine. Sediment of urine.

Here's an hypostasis argues a very bad stomach. — Nobb. & Microscopus.

Hypostatical. adj.

1. Constitutive; constituent as distinct ingredient

Let our Carnades warn men not to subscribe to the grand doctrine of the ehydists, touching their three hypostatical principles, till they have a little examined it. Boyle.

2. Personal; distinctly personal.

Beside that grounded upon the hypostatical union; beside that glorious condition upon his resurrection; there was yet another and that more proper occasion. Bishop Pearson, On the Creed, art. vi.

Hypostatically. adv. Personally.

That they should see all things and transactions, hear all prayers and orations, 'in speculo divinitatis,' is like incredible; a thing which the humanity of Christ himself, though hypostatically united to the divinity, did not pretend to. — Dr. H. More, Antidote against Idolatry, ch. ii.

Hypoténase. s. [Gr. ὑποτίνασις, second norist participle of τίνασις = stretch, τυπνῆ = line, a substantive of the feminine gender, being understood; hence the participle itself is feminine.] Line that subtends the right angle of a right-angled triangle.

The square of the hypoténase in a right-angled triangle, is equal to the squares of the two other sides. Locke.

Hypotheca. s. [Gr. ὑπόθεσις = case, keeping-place; from root of τιθεῖν = put.] See extract.

Hypotheca in the civil law was where the possession of the thing pledged remained with the debtor. — Jacob, Law Dictionary.

Hypothecarious. adj. Relating to, constituted by, a hypotheca.

Though a real or hypothecarious action does not lie against a feudal estate, yet a personal action lies to compel the heir to satisfy and discharge all such incumbrances as the testator shall lay on such hereditary life. — Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici, p. 337. (Ord MS.)

Hypotheca. v. a. [Lat. hypotheca.] Pawn; give in pledge.

Whether thy to whom this new pledge is hypothecated have redeemed their own . . . I leave it to those who recollect that memorable debate to determine. — Baker, On a Depoitee Poet.

To hypotheca a ship is to pawn the same for necessaries, and a master may hypotheca either ship or goods for relief when in distress at sea; for he represents the traders as well as the owners; and in whose hands soever a ship or goods hypothecated come, they are liable. — Jacob, Law Dictionary.

He had found the treasury empty and the pay of the navy in arrears. He had no power to hypotheca any part of the public revenue. Those who lent him money lent it on 'no security but his bare word. It was only by the patriotic liberality of the merchants of London that he was enabled to defray the ordinary charges of government till the meeting of the convention. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. xli.

Hypothèque. s. Same as Hypotheca.

An execution cannot in civil cases proceed to a man's bed, wearing apparel, and other things of the like kind, necessary to his daily use; because these things do not pass under an hypothèque; nor are a man's wearing clothes taken away from him, though condemned to die as a criminal; but when a debtor has no other goods to satisfy the judgment, his household goods and bed are liable to an execution; and only his wearing apparel on his back shall be left him. Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici, p. 372. (Ord MS.)

Hypóthesis. s. [Gr. ὑπόθεσις = placing, position.] System formed upon some principle, not proved as a fact or phenomenon of itself, but assumed because it accounts, or is supposed to account, for certain results; provisional cause or force.

The mind casts and turns itself restlessly from one thing to another, till at length it brings all the ends of a long and various hypóthesis together;

see how one part coheres with another, and as clear off all the appearing contrarieties that seemed to be criss, and make the whole intelligible. — South, Sermons.

What imagin'd sovereignty,
Lord of his new hypóthesis he reigns;
He reigns; how long? till some warmer rise;
And he too, mighty thoughtful, mighty wise,
Studies new lines, and other circles forms. Prior.

To this hypóthesis of a double ether he was driven by his aversion to admit any vacuum in nature; the rotundity of the former corpuscles having been produced, as he fancied, by their continual circular motions, which had rubbed off their angles. This seems at present rather a clumsy hypóthesis, but it is literally that which Descartes presented to the world. — Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth and seventeenth Centuries, p. iii. ch. viii. § 34.

An hypóthesis being a mere supposition, there are no other limits to hypótheses than those of the human imagination; we may, if we please, imagine, by way of accounting for an effect, some cause of a kind utterly unknown, and acting according to a law altogether fictitious. But as hypótheses of this sort would not have any of the plausibility belonging to those which ally themselves by analogy with known laws of nature, and besides would not supply the want which arbitrary hypótheses are generally invented to satisfy, by enabling the imagination to represent to itself an obscure phenomenon in a familiar light; there is probably no hypóthesis in the history of science in which both the agent itself and the law of its operation were fictitious. Either the phenomenon assumed as the cause is real, but the law according to which it acts, merely supposed; or the cause is fictitious, but its operation is supposed to produce its effects according to laws similar to those of some known class of phenomena. . . Hypótheses of the second kind are such as the vortices of Descartes, which were fictitious, but were supposed to obey the known laws of rotatory motion; or the two rival hypótheses respecting the nature of light, the one ascribing the phenomena to a fluid emitted from all luminous bodies, the other (now more generally received) attributing them to vibratory motions among the particles of an ether pervading all spaces. — J. S. Mill, System of Logic, iii. xiv. Induct.

It appears, then, to be a condition of a genuinely scientific hypóthesis, that it be not destined always to remain an hypóthesis, but be of such a nature as to be either proved or disproved by that comparison with observed facts which is termed verification. This condition is fulfilled when the effect is already known to depend on the very cause supposed, and the hypóthesis relates only to the precise mode of dependence; the law of the variation of the effect according to the variations in the quantity or in the relations of the cause. With these may be classed the hypótheses which do not make any supposition with regard to causation, but only with regard to the law of correspondence between facts which accompany each other in their variations, though there may be no relation of cause and effect between them. Such were the different laws hypótheses which Kepler made respecting the law of the refraction of light. It was known that the direction of the line of refraction varied with every variation in the direction of the line of incidence, but it was not known how; that is, what changes of the one corresponded to the different changes of the other. In this case any law, different from the true one, must have led to false results. — Ibid., iii. 16.

Hypothetical. adj. Including a supposition; conditionally.

Conditional or hypothetical propositions are those whose parts are united by the conditional particle 'if'; as, 'if the sun be fixed, the earth must move.' — Ibid.

According to the foregoing remarks, hypótheses are invented to enable the Deductive Method to be earlier applied to phenomena. But in order to discover the cause of any phenomenon by the Deductive Method, the process must consist of three parts; induction, ratiocination, and verification. . . Now, the Hypothetical Method approaches the first of the three steps, the induction to ascertain the law; and contents itself with the other two operations, ratiocination and verification; the law, which is removed from, being assumed, instead of proved. This process may evidently be legitimate on one supposition, namely if the nature of the case be such that the final step, the verification, shall amount to, and fulfil the conditions of, complete induction. . . We want to be assured that the law we have hypothetically assumed is a true one; and its leading deductively to true results will afford this assurance, provided the case be such that a false law cannot lead to a true result; provided no law, except the very one which we have assumed, can lead deductively to the same conclusion which that leads to. And this proviso is often realised. . . Newton began by an assumption, that the force which at each instant deflects a planet from its rectilinear course, and makes it describe a curve round the sun, is a force tending directly towards the sun. He then proved that if this be so, the planet will describe equal areas in equal times; and lastly, he proved that if the force acted in any other direction whatever, the planet would not describe equal areas in equal times. It being thus shown that no other hypothesis would accord with the facts, the assumption was proved; the hypothesis became an inductive truth. Not only did Newton ascertain by this hypothetical process the direction of the deflecting force; he proceeded in exactly the same manner to ascertain the law of variation of the quantity of that force.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, iii. xiv.

Hypothetically, adv. In a hypothetical manner; upon supposition; conditionally.

The only part liable to imputation is calling her a goddess; yet this is proposed with modesty and doubt, and hypothetically.—Brown, Notes on Pope's Dignity.

Hyrax, s. In Zoology. See extract.

When we find the daman, an animal not much bigger than a hare, placed with the elephant and the hippopotamus, we involuntarily start. . . . The damans of North and South America, which, whether one or two species, constitute the genus hyrax in their anatomical peculiarities, are remarkably assimilated to the rhinoceros and tapir. . . . The Dutch colonists at the Cape call the South African, or Cape hyrax, klip-damie or the rock badger. . . . Herman was the first to separate it generically under the name hyrax (capr., mouse of the Ethiopians), a far-fetched etymology, which was adopted by Schreber and Gmelin, though they kept the new genus in the order Rodentia. It is obvious, therefore, that the daman is one of those animals which is intermediate between two or more genera. . . . The hyrax found in Abyssinia . . . is considered by the Baron Cuvier as specifically the same. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

Hyson, s. [Chinese.] Kind of tea so called.

Dawkins, a dealer once, on buckled back
Bore his whole substance in a pedlar's pack;
To dunes dispersed, the duties yet unpaid,
His stores of lace and hyson he conveyed.

Cowley, The Parish Register.

Hysop, s. [Lat. hysopus.] Plant so called.

It hath been a great dispute, whether the hysop commonly known is the same which is mentioned in Scripture.—Miller.

The hysop of Solomon cannot be well conceived to be our common hysop; for that is not the least of vegetables observed to grow upon walls; but rather some kind of epiphyllaries, which only grow upon walls and stony places.—Sir T. Browne.

Hysteria, s. [Gr. harsipia, from harsipia = womb.] Nervous disorder, chiefly affecting females, so called.

Hysteria [is] a nervous disorder, often assuming the most varied forms, but commonly presenting a paroxysmal character; the attacks usually commencing with a flow of limpid urine, with unsteadiness or irregular motions, and rumbling noises in the left side region, or the sensation of a ball rising upwards to the throat, frequently attended by a feeling of suffocation, and sometimes with convul-

H Y S T

sions; chiefly affecting females from the period of puberty to the decline of life, and principally those possessing great susceptibility of the nervous system and of mental emotion. Under this definition may be arranged all those disorders which, from their varied and alarming forms, and their resemblance to many serious, and even to several dangerous or structural diseases, have puzzled and misled the inexperienced. The varieties, forms, and states of hysterical affection are so numerous, that the difficulty of describing and arranging them is very great. . . . The milder and more regular forms of hysteria present various modifications, depending chiefly upon the number of the circumstances or symptoms characterising them. . . . From either of these situations in the abdomen, a ball, the 'globus hystericus,' seems to move, with a rumbling noise, and with various convolutions, to the stomach, and thence to the throat or pharynx, where it remains for some time, and gives rise to a feeling of impending suffocation. . . . When hysteria assumes a truly convulsive form, spasmodic actions follow upon the feeling of suffocation, occasioned by the globus hystericus, as it reaches the throat. . . . Although hypochondriasis and hysteria are distinct diseases, yet they frequently approximate each other, or are even associated in females; indeed, most hysterical females may be said to be hypochondriacal, especially if hysteria has become habitual or confirmed. Dr. Cullen remarks, that the two diseases have some symptoms in common; but they are for the most part considerably different. Spasmodic disorder is rare in the one, but frequent unto a great degree in the other. Persons liable to hysteria are sometimes affected at the same time with dyspepsia; they are often, however, entirely free from it; but this never happens to those subject to hypochondriasis. These complaints occur mostly in different temperaments, sexes, and ages; a circumstance requiring no illustration.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medi-

Hystérie, adj. Connected with, related to, constituted by, hysteria, or hysterics.

In hysteric women the rarity of symptoms doth oft strike an astonishment into doctors.—Harris, Discourse of Consumption.

Hystérie, s. Fit of hysteria.

Hystérie, s. Hysterical fits.

It is also a consequence of that contrariety of passions to which it is subject, occasioned by the most dangerous and obstinate maladies; hystérie, epilepsies.—Cyprien, On the Passions, pt. ii. ch. iii. (Rich.)

Hysteron-prôteron, s. [Gr.—last-first.] In Rhetoric. Carl before the horse.

And far above the top the bottom crosses.

Banana, Psyche, c. 1, s. 85. (Rich.)

Hysterotomy, s. [Gr. tomé = section, cutting.] In Obstetrics. Operation of cutting an unborn infant out of the womb; Cæsarian operation.

This operation [the Cæsarian operation] is indeed the 'denier ressource' of midwifery. Preferable as it is to the certain death of both parties, it is far more serious in its consequences than any other operation. It comes under the class of operations, in which the life of the mother and child are necessarily more or less compromised. It is of very ancient date, being known to the Greeks. . . . but, I believe, by them only employed after the death of the mother. From the circumstances of several remarkable personages having entered the world in this way, it was deemed fortunate to be so born. . . . Among the ancients, persons thus born were considered sacred to Apollo, to which Virgil alludes in the 'Inde Ixæon ferit, exsecratum jam matre parentis,

Et tibi, Phœbe, sacrum.' (Æneid, x. 315.)
Thus Esculapius was called the son of Apollo, because it is said he was brought into the world by hysteron-prôteron.—Dr. Churchill, Theory and Practice of Midwifery, ch. xiv.

Hythe, s. [A.S.] Landing-place. In the present English, however, it is a proper rather than a common term, being chiefly found as the name, or part of the name, of a geographical locality, e.g. Hythe, Rother-hythe, Green-hythe, Lamb-eth. The spelling with g, rather than i, is Anglo-Saxon. Hurst, also, is sometimes spelt, hyrst. It is convenient, however, to limit the use of the letter y, when not final, as much as possible to words of Greek origin, so that it may mainly represent ι (Upsilon, Upsilon). Hyson is the only other word which begins with hy- in the present edition, in which this is not the case.

I.

I

I, s. Name of the ninth letter in the English alphabet.

I, pr. [A.S. ic.]

1. Word by which the speaker denotes himself when speaking of himself as the subject of a proposition, and as a single individual.

The statement concerning I in the older and in many of the newer grammars, is that it is the nominative case of me; me being some oblique case of I. This doctrine is noticed only to be condemned. I and me are different words; connected, indeed, by their import, but no more etymologically related to one another than good and better, husband and wife, along with many others.

It is nearer the truth to say that I is one out of two personal pronouns denoting one speaker; or (changing the expression) one out of two pronouns of the first person: m- (me, my) being the other, and both being defective in their declension; I existing only as a nominative and m- only as an oblique case.

It is probable, however, that even this is scarcely the exact truth. It is probable that I is less, and that m- (me) is more, of a nominative than the English grammars, as they stand at present, admit. Thus—

Question. Who is this? Answer. Me.

It is clear that if this be generally condemned (as it is) as bad English, me must be ignored as a nominative case—not so, however, if it can be defended: and of defence it certainly is capable.

Word for word, I is not only the German and Norse ich, jeg, jag, &c., but the Latin and Greek ego and ἐγώ, as well as the Slavonic, Lithuanic, and Sanskrit az, and ah-am. Being this, it is also the Italian io, the Spanish yo, and the French je, derivatives of the Latin ego. Hence, it runs through the whole of the German, Slavonic, Lithuanic, Sanskrit, Latin, and Greek languages: in all of which it is only found in the nominative case; and in all of which the oblique cases are some form of me—me, me, mihi, mi, moi, &c. The generality of this rule should command our attention; inasmuch as the use of two wholly different words in the expression of the relation under notice is not so common a phenomenon as the study of the German languages and their congeners alone would lead us to expect. In fact, it is only in the philological class to which these tongues belong that such a word as I is to be found.

As a general rule, the pronoun of the first person is single. As a general rule, the single word by which it is represented coincides with me rather than I. Thirdly, in a surprising number of languages it is wtually, if not the word me itself, some modification of the root that occurs. Thus in a language so comparatively distant from our own as the Fin, we find words so like me, as minä = I, minun = my, and me = we; whilst in a language so comparatively near as the Gaelic, though we find (as is expected) the root m-, we find it to the exclusion of either I or any equivalent term—e.g. me = I, and me, mo = mine, du-mh = to me.

Considering, then, not only the exceptional character of the term I, but the fact of the languages to which it belongs being the most advanced, or developed, in the world, it seems likely that the word is a new one, and that, as language proceeded, the notion of a pronoun of the first person (i.e. a name for the speaker, whoever it might be) instead of remaining simple and uncompounded, became divided by a separation of the speaker as the originator of an action or the agent to a verb (the terminus a quo), and the same person as an object towards which an action tended (the terminus ad quem), or as an object connected with some other (e.g. in the way of ownership, as 'My hat'). To the expression of the first of these notions I, to the second me was dedicated.

Nevertheless, if we suppose this to have been the case, it by no means follows that I should always be a nominative case, and that me should never be one. The latter word might retain some part of its old power, and the former might be used only as the subject of a proposition.

Now this is certain, that if 'It is me' be doubtful English, 'C'est je' is undoubtedly bad French; and if 'It is I' be the only correct form in English, 'C'est moi' is the only tolerable one in French. It is submitted then, as a point of general grammar, that it is more likely 'It is me' is right than that 'C'est moi' is wrong.

If we go further back, we find the same avoidance of I (ἐγώ, ego) in the predicate. Word for word translations of 'It is I' which in Greek and Latin would be ἐστὶν ἐγώ and est ego, are non-existent; yet, in Latin, the combination of the copular verb with an oblique case of the first personal pronoun is common (est mihi = there is to me = I have); and that in a sense which was by no means without an adequate representation. In Greek the well-known words of our Saviour, when walking on the water to St. Peter, are ἐγώ εἰμι.

Be of good cheer, it is I; be not afraid.—Matthew, xiv. 27.

The mention of the nominative and accusative of the personal pronoun seems not inaptly to introduce a discussion of the well-known and much-controverted phrase 'It is me'. Now this is an expression which every one uses. Grammarians (of the smaller order) prohibit; schoolmasters (of the lower kind) prohibit and chastise; but English men, women, and children go on saying it, and will go on saying it as long as the English language is spoken. Here is a phenomenon worth accounting for. 'Not at all,' say our censors; 'don't trouble yourself about it; it is a mere trivialism. Leave it off yourself, and try to persuade every one else to leave it off.' But, my good censors, I cannot.—Dr. Alford, A Plea for the Queen's English, § 192.

Hence, it is probable that not only is me when used as a predicate justifiable, but that I, so placed, is of doubtful propriety. For further remarks see Me.

2. In Metaphysics. A translation into English of the German Ich. See Ego.

For Transcendentalist Matter has an existence, but only as a phenomenon; were we not there, neither would it be there: it is a mere Relation, or rather the result of a Relation between our living souls and the First Great Cause. . . . The tree is green and hard, not of its own natural virtue, but simply because my eye and hands are fashioned so as to discern such and such appearances under such and such conditions. . . . There is in fact, says Fichte, no tree there; but only a Manifestation of Power from something that is not I. The same is true of material Nature at large, of the whole visible Universe, with all its movements, figures, accidents, and qualities: all are impressions produced on Me by something Different from Me. This, we may suppose, may be the foundation of what Fichte means by his famous Ich und Nicht-Ich (I and not-I); words, which taking lodging (to use the Hinduistic phrase) in certain 'heads' that were to be left unfurnished, occasioned a hollow echo, as of laughter, from the empty Apartments; though the words are, in themselves, quite harmless, and may represent the basis of metaphysical Philosophy as fitly as any other words. (Argyle, Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, Noctule.)

3. The affirmative particle Aye, wrongly spelt.

Hath Romeo slain himself? Aye thou but I, And that bare vowel, I, shall poison more Than the death-darting eye of cockatrice.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, iii. 2. Did your letters pierce the queen's? I, sir; she took 'em and read 'em in my presence, And now and then an ample tear trill'd down.

Id., King Lear, iv. 3. I, now the spheres are in their times again.

Id., Jonson, Masques at Court. Nothing but No and I, and I and No, How falls it out so strangely, you reply?

I tell you, fair, I'll not be answered so, With this affirming No, denying I.

I say, I love; you slightly answer I: I say, you love; you prattle me out a No:

I say, I die; you echo me with I: Save me, I cry; you sigh me out a No.

Must we and I have naught but No and I? No! I am I if I no more can live;

Answer no more, with silence make reply, And let me take myself what I do crave;

Let No and I, with I and you be so; Then answer No and I, and I and No.

Id., Dryden. (Nares by H. & W.) If then your sacrament wants,

I to your I must answer No; Therefore leave off your spelling plea,

And let my I be I per se.

Wife's Interpreter, p. 116. (Nares by H. & W.)

Iambus, *adj. Connected with, constituted by, the Iambus. The metrical system to which this term properly applies is that of the Greek and Latin, wherein the iambus consists of a long syllable preceded by a short one; its notation being  $\sim$ . Thus far, then, the word is not only more Greek or Latin than English, but the thing which it denotes is Greek or Latin also. Nevertheless, it occurs in our own Prosody. Here, however, the foot or measure is determined by accent rather than quantity, and the English iambic is, not a long syllable preceded by a short one, but an accented syllable preceded by one without an accent. Drus, bibunt, ἄνω, ποιοῦν, are Latin and Greek iambs, their quantitative notation being  $\sim$ , and their accentual (a denoting the accent, x the want of it) notation xa. The English iambs are words like renôre, away, &c., in which the accentual notation xa is the exact reverse of that of the classical languages. Hence, the parallelism between the quantitative iambs of the ancients and the accentual iambs of the moderns, which the name in the first instance has a tendency to suggest, is non-existent; or rather, the so-called modern iambs are to be opposed rather than compared to the ancient ones. The same applies to the English trochees, anapaests, and dactyles. See also Iambus.

Aristotle observes, that the iambic verse in the Greek tongue was the most proper for tragedy; because, at the same time that it lifted up the discourse from prose, it was that which approached nearest to it than any other kind of verse.—Addison, Spectator, no. 30.

Verification is the arrangement of a certain number of syllables according to certain laws. The feet of our verses are either iambic, as 'Alôft, 'Creako'; or trochaic, as 'lôft, 'Lôft'. Our iambic measure comprises verse of four syllables.

'Most good, most fair, (O things as rare,

—Johnson, Grammar of the English Language.

Iambus, s. Iambic foot, or metre.

In thy felonious heart though venom lies, It does but touch thy Irish pen, and die; Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame In keen iambicks, but mild anagrams.

Dryden, MacFlecknoe, 201. The well-known lines of Adrian to Florus, and his reply,

'Eco nolo Florus esse,' &c. are accidental trochees, but not wholly so; for the last line,

'Seythianus pati primus,' requires the word pati to be sounded as an iambic.

... The break in the middle of the Alexandrine has nothing analogous to it in the trimeter iambic, but exactly corresponds to the invariable law of the pentameter. . . . We find two species of Latin verse; one metrical, which Prudentius, Fortunatus, and others aspired to write; the other rhythmical, somewhat licentious in the number of syllables, and wholly accidental in its pronunciation. . . . The trochaic or line in which the stress falls on the uneven syllables, commonly alternating by eight and seven, was a very popular metre from its spirited flow, was adopted in military songs. . . . It was also common in religious chants. The line of eight syllables, or dimeter iambic, in which the stress falls on the even places, was still more frequent in ecclesiastical verse. . . . The Alexandrine of twelve syllables seems to be the trimeter iambic of the ancients. Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. i. ch. i. § 35, and notes.

Iambus, *s. [Gr. iambos]. In (Greek and Latin) Prosody. Dissyllabic foot so called, in which the first syllable is short, the second long. Metre constituted or characterized by such feet. From its early use (see extract) in satirical compositions, it often carries with it the notion of abuse or invective. Iambic (though adjectival in origin) is the commoner term. For its application in English see Iambic, adj.

The invention of the iambus, the rival of the elegy in antiquity and early popularity, was familiarly ascribed by the ancients, as was that of many other metrical forms, to Archilochus. . . . In the Margites, however, assigned to Homer iambic verses were interspersed with heroic hexameters. . . . The measure suggested itself instinctively to primitive genius, in any attempt to impart to the poetical treatment of a subject, not so much dignity or solemnity, as emphatic pungency. . . . smartness. This view, together with the remote mythical antiquity of the iambic measure, is supported in the tradition of the Homeric hymn to Ceres by what is probably the earliest extant residue of the name, the title of the Eleusinian nymph Iambe, who contributes by her jokes and drolleries to dissipate the grief of the goddess for her lost daughter.—Murray, Critical History of the Language and Literature of ancient Greece, b. ii. ch. i. § 7.

Iatromathematical, *adj. Constituted, or adopted, by an iatromathematician. (For example see next entry.)

Iatromathematician, *s. [Gr. iatros = physician]. Physician who relies chiefly on a mathematical physiology; generally as opposed to one (iatro-chemist or chemiatrie) whose doctrines were chemical rather than mechanical.

A second school of medicine, which superseded this, is called the iatro-mathematical. This seems to have arisen in Italy. Borelli's application of mechanical principles to the muscles has been mentioned above. These physicians sought to explain everything by statical and hydraulic laws; they were therefore led to study anatomy, since it was only by an accurate knowledge of all the parts that they could apply their mathematics. John Bernoulli even taught them to employ the differential calculus in explaining the bodily functions. But this school seems to have had the same leading defect as the chemiatrie; it forgot the peculiarity of the laws of organisation and life, which often renders those of inert matter inapplicable. Piteiriz and Boerhaave were leaders of the iatro-mathematicians; and Mead was reckoned the last of its distinguished patrons.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iv. ch. viii. § 3.

It is not necessary for us to dwell longer on this subject, or to point out the total insufficiency of the mere mechanical physiology. The iatrochemists had neglected the effect of the solids of the living frame; the iatromathematicians attended only to these. And even these were considered only as canals, as coria, as levers, as lifeless machines. These reasoners never looked for any powers of a higher order than the cohesion, the resistance, the gravity, the attraction, which operate in inert matter. If the chemical school assimilated the physician to a vintner or brewer, the mechanical physiologists made him an hydraulic engineer; and, in fact, several of the instrumentalists were at the same time teachers of engineering and of medicine. — Wheeler, History of Scientific Ideas, ii. 190.

ibex. s. [Lat.] Antelope so called.

The goats are not numerous in species; in Europe the ibex is the most celebrated. . . . The species seems to be confined to the highest mountains in Europe, the Alps, particularly the Rhodian, and the Pyrenees with their loftiest branches. . . . In Savoy and Switzerland they are now rarer than in the Tyrol. . . . The Abyssinian ibex (Capra ibex) . . . is numerous in the mountains of Abyssinia and Upper Egypt. . . . The Caucasian ibex (Capra Caucasica) is equal if not superior in strength and agility to the Alpine. . . . The ibex (Capra ibex) is distinguished from the former by the horns forming an acute angle to the front, with the ribs less broad, assuming an undulating edge, and the posterior part rounded. . . . In size and proportion it is nearly the same as the ibex. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

The horns are large, . . . robust, annulated, and bent back, as in the ibex, standing rather near the orbits, and rising vertically from the forehead; with the annuli most prominent towards the front, and reaching upwards to about two-thirds of their whole length. — Nesaimon, Natural History and Classification of Quadrupeds, § 261.

A certain bird called ibis, about the banks of the Nile, first taught the Egyptians the way of administering justice; for this bird has often been observed, by means of his crooked bill, to commit into the canal, to inject salt-water, as with a syringe, into its own bowels, and thereby to generate its purgation when too much obstructed. — Greeshill, Art of Rhetoric, p. 232.

Besides these poets, the Egyptians worshipped a great number of beasts; as the ox, the deer, the wolf, the hawk, the crocodile, the ibis, the cat. . . . Among us says Cleave, it is very common to see temples robbed, and statues carried off; but it was never known, that any person in Egypt ever abused a crocodile, an ibis, or cat; for its inhabitants would have suffered the most extreme torments, rather than be guilty of such sacrilege. It was death for any person to kill one of these animals voluntarily; and even a punishment was decreed against him who should have killed an ibis, or cat, with or without cause. — Translation of Rollin's Ancient History, vol. i. b. i. pt. ii. ch. ii. § 1.

The appearance of the glossy ibis (ibis falcinellus) in this country, though not uncommon, is still accidental. — Farrall, British Birds.

With the Latin phalar.

Australasia is the only part of the world in which the ibis are not found. . . . It is only since the publication of Bruce's Travels that positive notions have been gained respecting the genus to which we should refer the bird which was so venerated by the Ancient Egyptians. . . . Bruce found in Lower Ethiopia a bird was there named Abou haanes (Father John), and, on comparing it with the embalm individuals and with the ancient descriptions, he recognized it to be the true black and white ibis. . . . the same as the Mowat or Abou-mengel (Father of the Sick) of the Arabs. . . . Another ibis, entirely black, was equally revered by the Egyptians and embalm in a similar manner. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

ice. s. [A.S. is.] In all the allied languages the spelling is with s. In English, however, ice would run the risk of being sounded ize. The present orthography (if so it may be called) here, as in pence, whence, and many other words, does much to disguise the etymology.]

1. Water or any other liquid made solid by cold.

This sensible warm motion to become A kneaded clod, and the delighted spirit To bathe in fiery floods, or to reside In thrilling regions of thick-ribbed ice.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.
The ice was here, the ice was there,
It snowed, and grew, and cracked and howled,
Like noises in a swoon.

Coleridge, Ancient Mariner.

Used metaphorically.

Thou art all ice, thy kindness frozen.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iv. 2.

2. Vind so called, consisting, generally, of water or cream partially frozen and flavoured with fruits.

Break the ice. Make the first opening to any attempt.

If you break the ice, and do this feat,
Achieve the elder, set the younger free
For our sakes, whose hap shall be to have her
Will not so graciously be to be ingrate
Shakespeare, Taming of the Shrew, i. 2.

After he'd a while look'd wise,
At last broke silence and the ice. Baile, Hudibras.
I saw the identical object of my search. . . . I saw him, and saw that I saw me. The moment was trying and critical:—would he break the ice should I? Our eyes met, and the doubt seemed to be mutual—the inclination much the same. It is quite impossible to describe the sort of feeling by which we were both actuated. I saw he wished to cross over and speak; I wished (and thought he saw I did) to cross over and speak to him. I cannot explain the affair of the minute which followed, but, at the end of it, we had shaken hands, and were walking together. — Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney, vol. iii. ch. i.

ice. v. a.

1. Cover with ice; turn to ice; cool by means of ice.

"Th' chrysal, friend, ic'd in the frozen sea."

P. Fletcher, Pincatry Eclogues, v. 11.

2. In Cookery or Confectionary. Glaze with a coat (often of sugar) which resembles ice. (For example see icing.)

Used figuratively.

Noise and passion, and hardy confidence, iced over with some unctimonious preferences, can engage the affections of the vulgar more than ingenuity and real moderation. — Puller, Moderation of the Church of England, preface: 1679.

iceberg. s. [berg=hill, from Dutch or German direct.] Floating island of ice; drifted glacier.

One way in which the unnatural is often made to appear, for a time, natural, is, by giving a lively and striking description which is correct in its several parts, and unimpaired only, when these are combined into a whole; like a painter who should give an exact picture of an English country-house, of a grove of palm-trees, an elephant and an iceberg, all in the same landscape. — Archbishop Whately, Elements of Rhetoric, ch. ii. § 2.

The great glaciers generated in the valleys of Spitzbergen . . . are almost all cut off at the beach. . . . In Ballin's Bay, on the contrary, . . . where there is no warmer under-current, the glaciers stretch out from the shore, and furnish repeated crops of mountainous masses of ice which float off into the ocean. The number and dimensions of these bergs is prodigious. . . . other bergs have been occasionally met with . . . as far west as lat. 4° and longitude 60° west. . . . The distance to which ice bergs float . . . is . . . very different. — Sir C. Lyell, Principles of Geology, b. i. ch. vii.

The ice-berg is the creation of many ages; originally a prodigious glacier, repelling in the valley of some polar mountain, it has been loosened from its hold and tumbled in the ocean. Driven by the navigator, it floats a fantastic and majestic island. — D. P. Thompson, Introduction to Meteorology, § 251.

icefield. s. Expanse of water either wholly frozen or blocked up with floating masses of ice.

Here they were becalmed in a large bay, with three apparent openings between the islands which formed it; but every where, as far as they could see, surrounded with ice. There was not a breath of air, the water was perfectly smooth, the ice covered with snow, low and even, except a few broken pieces near the edge; and the pools of water in the middle of the ice-fields just crusted over with young ice. On the next day the ice closed upon them, and no opening was to be seen any where, except a hole or lake, as it might be called, of about a mile and a half in circumference, where the ships lay fast with their ice anchors. They filled their casks from these ice-fields, which was very pure and soft. — Southey, Life of Nelson, ch. i.

icehouse. s. House in which ice is stored, and kept solid.

Considering at how little expense an icehouse can be constructed, it is surprising that any respectable habitation in the country should not have one attached to it. The simplest and most scientific form is a double cone, that is two cones joined base to base; the one being of stone or brickwork, sunk under the ground, with its apex at the bottom, into which the ice is rammed; the other being a conical roof of carpentry covered with thatch and pointed at top. The entrance should be placed always on the north side. It should consist of a corridor or porch with double doors, and be screened from the sunbams by a small shrubbery. — Ure, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

icepail. s. Pail containing ice for cooling wine.

"This is as it should be," said I, looking round at the well-filled table, and the sparkling spirits immersed in the ice-pails: "a genuine friendly dinner." — Sir E. B. Lytton, Pelham, ch. xlv.

Ichneumon. s. [Gr.]

1. Quadruped so called, of the genus Hierpestes.

The crocodile . . . is awed by none more than the Ichneumon. — Sir T. Herbert, Travels, p. 364.
The Ichneumon makes it the whole business of his life to break the eggs of the crocodile. — Addison, Spectator, no. 125.

We proceed to the third subdivision of the Viverra, which includes the Mungos, the first of which is the celebrated Ichneumon. — Brisson, Linnaeus, Buffon, and all naturalists before Sclater, admitted but a single species of the Mungo, or Ichneumon, though Edwards had expressed a doubt concerning the identity of his Indian Ichneumon with that of Egypt. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

2. Insect so called of the genus Ichneumon: (often used adjectivally with fly.)

The generation of the Ichneumon fly is in the bodies of caterpillars, and other nymphs of insects. — Irish, Physics-Theory.

If we have reason to complain of the number of caterpillars, and of their fatal ravages in the vegetable kingdom, we ought to congratulate ourselves on the existence of the Ichneumon, which are their natural enemies. We know that the ancient naturalists designated under the denomination a little quadruped inhabiting the banks of the Nile, and which received divine honours from the Egyptians in consequence of the opinion that it destroyed the eggs of the crocodile, and even entered the mouth of that reptile, and proceeding into its body, gnawed its entrails. . . . Thus the name of Ichneumon has been well applied to the insects of which we are treating. . . . The Ichneumon of the entomologists both destroy the eggs . . . and the caterpillars themselves, and the crystals which contain them. — Translation of Cuvier's Règne Animal.

Ichthyographical. adj. Representing a certain plot of ground.

Permett has assisted the text with a figure or ichthyographical plot. — Evelyn, ii. i. 1.

Here you have the ichthyographical plan of the temple of Janus. — Dryden, Tragedy, p. 116.

Ichthyography. s. [Gr. ichthys=fish, graphein=to write.] Ground plot.

It will be more intelligible to have a draught of each front in a paper by itself, and also to have a draught of the ground-plot or ichthyography of every story in a paper by itself. — Mason.

Ichthyology. s. [Gr. ichthys=word, doctrine, principle.] In Geology. Principles, and details, connected with the investigation of the footsteps, or tracks, of certain animals left as impressions on certain strata.

Our knowledge of the footsteps of recent animals, what may be called modern ichthyology, is so limited that we cannot . . . with any degree of certainty mark even the class of beings by which they have been made. — Sir W. Jardine, Ichthyology of Animals, p. 7: 1851.

ichor. s. [Gr. ichor.] Thin watery humor like serum. See next entry.

Milk, drawn from some animals that feed only upon flesh, will be more apt to turn rancid and putrefy, acquiring first a saline taste, which is a sign of putrefaction, and then it will turn into an ichor. — Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Of course his perspiration was but ichor,

Or some such other spiritual liquor.

Byron, Union of Judgement, a. 25.

ichorous. adj. Serous; sanious; thin; undigested. In Medicine, ichor means nearly the same as sanies, i.e. a thin unhealthy discharge, as opposed to the laudable pus of healthy inflammatory action; in other words, the term is one of disparagement. In general language, it is rather involutionary than otherwise, denoting something thinner than blood, but thinner because subtler and more spiritual. The blood of the gods was ichor, and the first instance of the word is where it is applied by Homer to the blood of Venus when wounded by Diomed.

The lung-growth is imputed to a superficial sanious or ichorous excretion. — Harris, Discourse of Consumption.

The pus from an ulcer of the liver, growing thin and ichorous, corrodes the vessels. — Arbuthnot, On Diet.

Ichthyic. adj. [Gr. ichthys=fish.] In Zoology. Having the character of a fish.

You may perhaps think that I have been blessed by the extreme interest of personal discovery, in dwelling so long upon the cranial structure of the lepidodend; but I persuade myself that the actual value and intrinsic importance of this remarkable type of ichthyic organization, will justify the time and attention we have been bestowing upon it. The skeleton of the lepidosiren affords the right key to the complexities of those of the typical and better ossified fishes. I believe it to manifest, upon the whole, the highest grade which is attained in the class of fishes, in the direct progress to perfection, or, in what may be termed the vertebrate high road. — Osborn, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. iv.

In the lepidosiren the notochord, the parapophyses, the attachment of the scapula to the acetabulum, the branchiostegal covering of the permanent gills, the opercular bones, the presence of a spiral intestinal valve, the relative position of the anus, the extra-oral nasal sacs, the scaly integuments, the mucous tubes on the head, the 'lateral line,' in short, the totality of the organisation of the lepidosiren, exemplify its fundamental ichthyic nature. — Hall, Analogies of Vertebrates.

Ichthyological adj. Relating to, connected with, Ichthyology.

The Royal Society not only receives all this non-sensical ichthyological jargon, but selects it for publication. — Moths, Parasite of Literature.

Ichthyologist. s. Investigator of ichthyology.

Cuvier observes that [in] the History of Fishes [by Willoughby and Ray]... many species are described which will not be found in earlier ichthyologies, and that those of the Mediterranean especially are given with great precision. — Hall, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iv. ch. viii. § 15.

Ichthyology. s. [Gr. ἰχθυος = word, discourse, principle.] Investigation of the natural history and classification of fishes.

Some there are, as camels and sheep, which carry no name in ichthyology. — Sir T. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

Of the value of this principle of harmony, some idea may be formed from the circumstance, that on it Agassiz has based the whole of that celebrated classification, of which he is the sole author, and by which fossil ichthyology has for the first time assumed a precise and definite shape. — Locke, History of Civilisation in England, vol. i. ch. xiv.

Ichthyosaurus. s. [Gr. ἰχθυος = lizard.] Extinct reptile, combining the characters of a fish with those of a lizard; Ichthyosaurus, Plesiosaurus (approximate lizard), and other similar compounds, are common in Geology.

Waters in which the ichthyosaurus lived. — Mantell, Wonders of Geology.

Ichthyosis. s. [Gr.] In Medicine. Skin disease so called from the thickened cuticle resembling a fish's skin: fish-skin disease.

Ichthyosis consists of a morbid enlargement and elongation of the papillae, and a thickening of the epidermis. Large peduncles are thus formed, which spread so as to acquire by and irregular tops, and, undergoing partial exfoliation, sometimes resemble the scales of a fish. This affection is general or local, and hereditary or accidental. When it is hereditary, it either is congenital, or it does not appear until some months after birth. The local form is most frequently accidental, the more general affection is commonly congenital or hereditary. — Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Ichthyotomist. s. [Gr. root of ἰχθυος = cut; τομή = section.] One engaged in the dissection of fish.

The first spinal nerve [in fishes] rises usually by two roots, the dorsal one taking a caudal, rarely by non-caudal roots exclusively from the prepyramidal tracts: it usually emerges between the ex-occipital and the atlas, and divides into a small dorsal and a larger ventral branch; this communicates with the ventral branch of the next spinal nerve, and supplies the pectoral fin-muscles, the suboccipital, and the sternohyoides; it is called hypobranchial nerve by some ichthyologists. — Osborn, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. viii.

Ice. s. [Ice-ickle.] Shoot of ice commonly hanging down from the upper part.

If distilled vinegar or aqua-fortis be poured into the powder of lead-stone, the subsiding powder, dried, retains some unctuous virtue; but if the menstruum be evaporated to a consistency, and afterwards distill into iceles, or crystals, the leadstone hath no power upon them. — Sir T. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

From locks uncomb'd and from the frozen beard, Long iceles depend, and crackling sounds are heard. — Dryden.

Ice. verbal abs. Covering with ice; giving the character of ice to anything: (special application in Cookery).

The splendid icing of an immense historick plum-cake was embossed with a delicious imagery of the destruction of Troy. — T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 402.

To glaze or ice pastry.... The best mode of icing fruit-tarts, is to mix them the paste with cold water, to stir sugar thickly upon it.... When a white icing is preferred the pastry must be drawn from the oven when nearly baked and brushed with white of egg.... then well covered with sifted sugar. — Eliza Acton, Modern Cookery, ch. xvi.

Jökle. s. [A.S. gicel.] Probably, so closely connected with ice as to have the same meaning, whether simple or compound. It occurs as jökle in the North Frisian, and in the Icelandic as jökul - glacier, or snow-capped mountain? Hecla.

Be she constant, be sheickle,
Be she fire, or be she ickle,
Still unhappy is his life
That is wedded to a wife.

Cotton, Joys of Marriage: 1000.

Icon. s. [Gr. εἰκών.] Image, picture, or representation.

Boys and girls, in his tract of diction, hath set forth the icons of these ten, yet added two others. — Sir T. Brown, Vulgar Errors.

Some of our own nation, and many Netherlanders, whose names and icons are published, have deserved good commendation. — Hall, i. l. Apology.

Iconoclasm. s. Image-breaking.

The simplicity of the Alpine peasants was naturally averse to the wealth of the monastic establishments which began to arise among them; there might survive some vague tradition of the iconoclasm and holiness of Claudius of Turin, or of the later residence of Arnold of Brescia in Zurich. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. viii.

Iconoclast. s. [Gr. εἰκονοκλάτης; κῆνος = break.] Image-breaker.

Pope Stephen IV., in 768, condemned this council in a synod of Italian bishops, who asserted the honour of images against the eastern iconoclasts. — Young, The Ecclesiastical Geography, ii. 275.

Constantine, unlike his brethren, was an ardent iconoclast. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. iv. ch. viii.

Iconoclastic adj. Breaking or destroying images.

I have sometimes reflected for what reason the Turks should appoint such marks [minarets in their mosques] to direct their faces towards, in prayer. And if I may be allowed to conjecture, I believe they did it at first in testimony of their iconoclastic principle; and to express to them both the reality of the Divine presence there, and at the same time also its invisibility. — Mantell, Fossils, p. 15.

Most of those [statues] at York were destroyed, in the first emotions of iconoclastic zeal. — Strachan, Travels through Spain, letter 14.

Yet this question, thus prematurely agitated by the iconoclastic emperors, and at this period of Christianity so fatally mistimed, is one of the most grave, and it should seem inevitable controversies, arising out of our religion. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. iv. ch. vii.

Iconochoron. s. [Gr. εἰκὼν = twenty + χῶρον = sent, table.] Figure having twenty sides.

But we must not forget that this disposition to what Bacon calls anticipation was full of danger as well as of hope. It led Plato to conjecture, I believe Kepler afterwards, and many others in all ages of scientific activity, it led Plato into error, for instance, when it led him to assert (in the 'Timæus') that the four elements, earth, air, fire and water, have, for the forms of their particles respectively, the cube, the iconochoron, the pyramid, and the octahedron. — Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas.

Idiomatic. [Lat. idioma - jaundice, for which it is the medical term.] Connected with, constituted by, relating to the jaundice: (construction substantival in the extract).

In the jaundice the choler is wanting, and the idiomatic have a great sourness, and gripes, with windiness. — Plager.

Ice. adj.

1. Covered with, made, consisting, having the nature of ice: cold; frosty.

Here feel we but the penalty of Adam,
The seasons difference; as the icy fang,
And churlish chiding of the winter's wind.

Shakespeare, As you like it, ii. 1.

He relates the excessive coldness of the water they met with in summer in that icy region, where they were forced to winter. — Dryden.

Tempt icy seas, where scarce the waters roll,
Where clearer flames grow round the frozen pole.

Byron.

2. Applied to immaterial objects; generally to temperament or disposition; cold.

Thou would'st have never learn'd

The icy precepts of respect.

Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

If thou don't find him tractable to us,
Encourage him, and tell him our reasons;
If he be sudden, icy, cold, unwillling,
Be thou so too. — Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 1.

Ido. s. Native freshwater fish so called, akin to the Roach: Leuciscus (Cyprius) ido.

According to Mr. Stewart, this species was taken at the mouth of the Nith by the late Dr. Walker.... Black says this fish is distinguished by the bulky character of the body, and the anal fin having thirteen rays. It was first described by Gessner, and is found in Pomerania, Westphalia, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, and Russia.... Sir Thomas Moryson Wilson... caught a fine large specimen of the ido, whilst trolling for pike on a windy day in the Gota Elf.... The fish weighed between four and five pounds. — Farrell, British Fishes.

A careful analysis of the long olfactory nerve in the eel, the ido, or the roach, shows that it is a fasciculus of filaments distinct from their origin. — Osborn, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. viii.

Idée. s. [Gr. ἰδέα; for remarks on the pronunciation see the last extracts of the entry.] Mental image.

Our Saviour himself, being to set down the perfect idea of that which we are to pray and wish for on earth, did not teach to pray or wish for more than only that here it might be with us, as with them it is in heaven. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

How good, how fair,

Answering his great idea.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 650.

Whatever the mind perceives in itself, or is the immediate object of perception, thought, or understanding, that I call idea. — Locke.

But yet, after all this, there being men who persuade themselves that they have clear, positive, comprehensive ideas of infinity, it is fit they enjoy their privilege, and I should be very glad (with some others that I know, who acknowledge they have none such) to be better informed by their communication. — Id.

The form under which these things appear to the mind, or the result of our apprehension, is called an idea. — Watts.

I know of no ideas or notions that have a better claim to be accounted simple and original than those of space and time. — Locke, Essay on the Powers of the Mind, vol. i. p. 364.

The leading doctrine of Locke, as is well known, is the derivation of all our simple ideas from sensation, and from reflection. The former present, comparatively, no great difficulty; but he is not very clear or consistent about the latter. He seems in general to limit the word to the various operations of our own minds in thinking, believing, willing, &c. so forth. This, as has been shown, formerly, is false; from, or at least coincident with, the theory of Cassiodorus in his Synonyma Philosophicum. It is highly probable that Locke was acquainted with that work; if not immediately, yet through the account of the philosophy of Cassiodorus, published in English by Dr. Charlton, in 1653, which I have not seen, or through the excellent and copious abridgement of the Synonyma by Bernier. But he does not strictly confine his idea of reflection to this class. Duration is certainly no mode of thinking; yet the idea of duration is reckoned by Locke among those with which we are furnished by reflection. The same may perhaps be said, though I do not know that he expresses himself with equal clearness as to his account of several other ideas, which cannot be deduced from external sensation, nor yet can be reckoned modifications or operations of the soul itself, such as number, power, existence. Most of the perplexity which has arisen on this subject... may be referred to the equivocal meaning of the word idea. The Cartesian understood by the theory the object of thought, including an intellectus as well as an imaginatio. By an intellectus they meant that which the mind conceives to exist, and to be the subject of knowledge, though it may be unimaginable and incomprehensible.... Arnauld, if he is the author of L'Art de Penser, mentions the idea of a chameleon, or figure of 1000 sides, as an instance of the distinction between that which we imagine and that which we conceive or understand. Locke has employed the same instance to exemplify the difference between clear and obscure ideas. According to the former, we do not imagine a figure with 1000 sides at all; according to the latter, we form a confused image of it. We have an idea of such a figure, it is agreed by both; but in the sense of Arnauld, it is an idea of the understanding alone; in the sense of Locke, it is an idea of sensation, framed like other complex ideas by putting together those we have formerly received, though we may never have seen the precise figure. — Hall, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iv. ch. iii. §§ 107, 108, 109.

The metaphysical inquiry into the nature and composition of what have been called abstract ideas, or in other words, of the notions which answer to the mind to classes and to general names, belongs not to logic, but to a different science, and our purpose does not require that we should enter upon it here. We are only concerned with the universally acknowledged fact, that such general notions or conceptions do exist. The mind can conceive a multitude of individual things as one assemblage or class; and general names do really suggest to us certain ideas or mental representations, otherwise we could not use the names with consciousness of a meaning. Whether the idea called up by a general name is composed of the various circumstances in which all the individuals denoted by the name occur, and of no others, (which is the doctrine of Locke, Brown, and the conceptualists); or whether it be the idea of some one of those individuals, clothed in its individualizing peculiarities, but with the accompanying knowledge that those peculiarities are not properties of the class, (which is the doctrine of Berkeley, Dugald Stewart, and the modern nominalists); or whether (as held by Mr. Mill) the idea of the class is that of a miscellaneous assemblage of individuals belonging to the class; or whether, finally, (what appears to be the truest opinion,) it be any one or any other of all these, according to the accidental circumstances of the case; certain it is, that some idea or mental conception is suggested by a general name, and that this idea is employed with consciousness of a meaning. And this, which we may call if we please a general idea, represents in our minds the whole class of things to which the name is applied.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, iv, ch. ii, § 1.

The current pronunciation makes the word either an actual dissyllable, or an approach to it, by the dropping or slurring over the final a. Yet the Greek was idea. In the following the form is trisyllabic:—

Happy you that may to the saint, your only idea,
Although simply attir'd, your manly affection utter.

Sir P. Sidney.
I did infer your lineaments,
Being the right idea of your father,
Both in your form and nobleness of mind.
Shakespeare, Richard III. tit. 7.
Her sweet idea wander'd through his thoughts.
Pierfist.

If Chaucer, by the best idea wrought,
The fairest nymph before his eyes he set.
Dryden.
This pronunciation is still common in verse, and not extinct, when persons affect purity of speech, in prose.

Hail, sympathy! thy soft idea bring.
Gower, New Morality, in Anti-Jacobin.
Ideal. adj. Mental; intellectual; not perceived by the senses.

There is a two-fold knowledge of material things; one real, when the thing, and the real impression thereof on our senses, is perceived; the other ideal, when the image or idea of a thing, absent in itself, is represented to and considered on the imagination.
Cheyne, Philosophical Principles.

Ideal. s. Ideal type or standard: (with the, this, that, or some similarly defining word).
I've seen much finer women, ripe and real,
Than all your beauties of the stone ideal.
Byron, Don Juan.

The ideal of morality has no more numerous rival than the ideal of highest strength, of most powerful life; which also has been named (very falsely as it was there meant) the ideal of poetic greatness. It is the maximum of the savage; and has, in those times, gained, precisely among the greatest weaklings, very many proselytes. By this ideal, man becomes a beast-spirit, a mixture; whose brutal will has, for weaklings, a brutal power of attraction.
Carlyle, Critical and Miscellaneous Essays, Nov. 13 (from whom it is a translation).

Idealism. s. System of metaphysical philosophy founded upon the doctrine that the objects of the external world are what they are, less on the strength of any material properties of their own, than through the action of the mind, in which they exist as ideas.

Now, without entering into the intricacies of German philosophy, we need here only advert to the character of idealism, on which it is everywhere founded, and which universally prevails it. In all German systems since the time of Kant, it is the fundamental principle to deny the existence of matter, or rather, we should say, to believe it in a radically different sense from that in which the Scotch philosopher strives to demonstrate it, and the English metaphysician believes it without demonstration. To any of our readers, who has dipped never so slightly into metaphysical reading, this idealism will be no inconceivable thing. . . . The idealist, again, boasts that his philosophy is transcendental, that it 'ascends beyond the senses,' which, he asserts, all philosophy, properly so called, is, and by its nature, must be.—Carlyle, Critical and Historical Essays, November.

On innumerable other points, we find the same discrepancy between the two schools. The idealist, for example, asserts that our notions of cause, of time, of personal identity, and of substance, are universal and necessary; that they are simple; and that, not being susceptible of analysis, they must be referred to the original constitution of the mind. On the other hand, the sensationist, so far from recognizing the simplicity of these ideas, considers them to be extremely complex, and looks upon their universality and necessity as merely the result of a frequent and intimate association. This is the first important difference which is inevitably consequent on the adoption of different methods. The idealist is compelled to assert, that necessary truths and contingent truths have a different origin. The sensationist is bound to affirm that they have the same origin. The further these two great schools advance, the more marked does their divergence become. They are at open war in every department of morals, of philosophy, and of art. The idealist says that all men have essentially the same notion of the good, the true, and the beautiful. The sensationist says that there is no such standard.

I speak of ideals.
alists; though the word idealist is often used by metaphysicians in a very different sense.—Backe, History of Civilization in England, vol. I, ch. iii and note.

Idealize. v. n. Form ideas.

Others attributed it [religion] to meditation and wonder on the beauty and magnificence of nature, or the forebodings and expectations of futurity congenial to man, or their natural propensity to idealize.—Milg, Account of Menes's History of all Religions, 1790.

Ideally. adv. As conceived as an idea.

A transmission is made materially from some parts, and ideally from every one.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Ideals. v. a. Fancy; form in idea. Rare.

For thus friends about speak: these cases controul
The tediousness of my life; but for these
I could ideal nothing which could please.
Donne to Sir H. Wotton, Poems, p. 116.
What good state-such would they be, who should ideal or fancy such a commonwealth?—Knoll.

Ideist. s. Idealist: (this latter being, at present, the commoner word).

If that be so, I must necessarily conclude, that the notionists and the ideists have their apprehensive faculties very differently turned.—Locke. (Ord. MS.)

Ideistic. s. Same.

The hearer's the ideistic heard you knew.
The same numerically true. Batter, Indubious.

Ideistical. adj. Commoner form of identical.
Their majesty is ideistical with mine.

Sir M. Hale, Origin of Manhood.
Those ridiculous ideistical propositions, that both is faith, and rule as a rule, are first principles in this controversy of the rule of faith, without which nothing can be solidly concluded either about rule or faith. Archbishop Tillotson, Sermons.

If this pre-existent eternity is not compatible with a successive duration, as we clearly and distinctly perceive that it is not, then it remains, that some being, though infinitely above our finite comprehension, must have had an ideistical, invariable continuance from all eternity, which being is no other than God.—Butley, Sermons.

Ideentially. adv. In an identical manner.

In artificial things the introduction of a new form makes not the matter be ideentially different from what it was.—Ross, On Sir K. Dugby.

Identification. s. Determination of identity.

He may then be able, for aught we know to the contrary, to join the soul or spirit of man to himself. . . . Not so as to make but one person of both; such an identification I take to be impossible.—You may take it to be so; but I am sure you cannot prove it.—Shelton, Discourse on the Soul, dialogue vi.
I am not ready to admit the identification of the Romish faith with Gospel faith.—Bishop Watson, Charges.

Identify. v. t.

1. Prove, determine, or fix.

All indictments must set forth the christian name, surname, and addition of the state and degree, mystery, town, or place, and the county of the offender; and all this to identify his person.—Sir W. Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

2. Make the same: (as, 'His cause is identified with mine').

All the divine perfections, being intrinsic unto and identified with the divine nature or essence.—Barrow, Works, 1. 391.

Let us identify let us incorporate ourselves with the people.—Harcis, Speech on Economical Reform, p. 214. (Ord. MS.)

This result, however, which establishes the practical doctrine, that the State is to be neutral in questions involving religious truth and error, satisfies many persons, both practical statesmen and speculative reasoners. . . . The abstinence of the State from identifying itself with one of the rival churches, appears to them in the light of a stout neglect of religious duty—or even a profusion of religious unbelief.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. ix, § 3.

Identity. s. Sameness.

There is a fallacy of equivocation from a society in issue, inferring an identity in nature; by this fallacy was deceived that drunk aqua-fortis for strong water.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.
Certainly those actions must needs be regular, where there is an identity between the rule and the faculty.—South, Sermons.

Considering any thing as existing at any determined time and place, we compare it with itself existing at another time, and thereon form the idea of identity and diversity.—Locke.

By cutting off the sense at the end of every first line, which must always rhyme to the next following, is produced too frequent an identity in sound, and brings every couplet to the point of an epigram.—Prose.

Ideological. adj. Connected with, relating to, constituted by the doctrine of ideas.

I would willingly have confined myself to those terms understood expressions, and perceived to the end in the same substance which I have hitherto observed from ideological discussions; considering the mechanism of our thoughts to be a topic distinct from and irrelevant to the principles and rules by which the trustworthiness of the results of thinking is to be estimated. Since, however, a work of such high pretensions, and it must also be said, of so much real merit, has rested the whole theory of induction upon such ideological considerations, it seems necessary for others who follow, to claim for themselves and their doctrines whatever position may properly belong to them on the same metaphysical ground. And this is the object of the succeeding chapter.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. iv, ch. i, § 4.

Ideology. s. [Gr. logos, word, doctrine, system, principle.] Mental philosophy; psychology.

Our neighbours, in the mean time, have made choice of the term ideology (a Greek compound involving the very word we have been attempting to discard) to express that department of knowledge which has been called the science of the human mind. D. Stewart, Philosophical Essays, 3. (Right.)

Ideos. s. [Lat. idus.] A term anciently used among the Romans, and still retained in the Romish calendar. It is the 15th day of each month, except in the months of March, May, July, and October, in which it is the 13th day, because in these four months it was six days before the nones, and in the others four.

A southsayer bids you beware the ideos of March.
—Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, 1. 2.

Idiocy. s. [Gr. idiotia.] State of an Idiot.

I stand not upon their idiocy in thinking that horses did eat their bits. Baron.
Idiocy is characterized by the want of mental power being congenital. While mania or monomania and dementia form the 'dementia accidental', idiocy forms the 'dementia naturalis' of lawyers. This intellectual deficiency is marked by a peculiar physiognomy, an absence of all expression, and a vague and unmeaning look, who rely on mind may in a word be clearly identified. In many cases of congenital deficiency, the mind is capable of receiving a few ideas, and of profiting to a certain extent by instruction. To this state the term idiocy is applied. It may be regarded as a minor degree of idiocy.—Dr. A. S. Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence, ch. lxxv.

Idiom. s. [Gr. idioma, word; idios, private, peculiar.] Mode of speaking peculiar to a language or dialect; particular cast of a tongue; phrase; phraseology.

He did romanize our tongue, leaving the words translated as much Latin as he found them; wherein he followed their language, but did not comply with the idiom of ours.—Dryden.

Some that with care true eloquence shall touch,
And to just idioms fix our doubtful speech. Prose.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive fault in a single work may enter by thousands, and the fabric of the tongue continue the same, but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns.—Johnson, Preface to Dictionary.

The British, to speak plainly, has little or no resemblance to the English. Many of their terms may have gained admission among us; as from the vicinity and long intercourse we have had with that people may necessarily be imagined; but their idioms and genuis are as radically and essentially different as any two languages can possibly be.—Drake, On the Origin of the English Language, Archaeologia, vol. v. p. 317.

The language of Sévigné and Hamilton is eminently colloquial; scarce a turn occurs in their writings which they would not have used in familiar society; but their was the colloquy of the gods, ours of men; their idiom, though still simple and French, had been refined in the saloons of Paris, . . . while in our own contemporary writers, with little exception, there is what defaces the dialogue of our comedy, a tone not so much of provincialism, or even of what is called the language of the common people, as of one much worse, the dress of vulgar ribaldry, which a gentleman must clear from his conversation before he can assert that name.—Italian, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. vii. § 32.

Idiomati. adj. Peculiar to a tongue; phraseological.

Since phrases used in conversation contract meanings by passing through the mouths of the vulgar, a poet should guard himself against idiomatic ways of speaking. Spectator.

The characteristics of English writers in the first division of the [17th] century were not maintained in the second, though the change, as was natural, did not come on by very rapid steps. The pedantry of unimpaired Latinisms, the affectation of singular and not generally intelligible words from other sources, the love of quaint phrases, strange analogies, and ambitious efforts at antithesis, gave way by degrees; a greater ease of writing was what the public demanded, and what the writers after the Restoration sought to attain. They were more strictly idiomatic and English than their predecessors.—Italian, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. vii. § 32.

Idiomati. adj. Same as Idiomati.

Milton mistakes the idiomatic use and meaning of 'munditie'.—T. Warton, Notes on Milton's Smaller Poems.

Idiopátho. adj. In Medicine. Occurring as a separate and independent ailment, rather than as a symptom (σνν = with + παθω = falling, occurrence, or casualty) of, and sympathetically (σνν = with + παθω) with, anything else. Sympathetic being the term to which it is most specially opposed.

It has been customary with authors to call all these cases of tetanus, which are not brought on by wounds, symptomatic; they are no more so than those which are said to be idiopathic.—Dr. Rush, On Tetanus. (Ord MS.)

Idiopath. s. [Gr. παθω = suffering; root of παθω = suffer.] Peculiar sensibility.

Men are so full of their own, fineries and idiopathies, that they scarce have the civility to interchange any words with a stranger.—Dr. H. More, Sermon of the Soul, preface to pt. ii.

An elephant hath his idiopathy, and a man his, at the hearing of a pipe; a cat, and an eagle, at the sight of the sun.—Thiel, notes, p. 429.

Idiosyncrasy. s. [Gr. ιδιων = private, peculiar + σνν = with + σνν = mixture.] Peculiar temper or disposition of body not common to another.

Whether quails, from any idiosyncrasy or peculiarity of constitution, do innocuously feel upon hellebore, or rather sometimes but medicinally use the same.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The understanding also hath its idiosyncrasies, as well as other faculties.—Glaucoille, Scipius Scientificus.

Idiot. s. [Gr. ιδιω = private person; one who takes no part in public matters. Hence, one who is ill-informed, or destitute of intellectual sympathies; the import becoming more and more disparaging as the word grew older. In the 16th century it had a weaker meaning than at present. Idiot, neither fool nor wise; half innocent. Promptorium Parvulorum.—Weldwood.] Fatuous person; one with a congenital deficiency of intellect; foolish, silly, weak person. For its medical and medico-legal import see second extract under Idiocy.

[Idiot is] a tale, Told by an idiot, full of want and fury, Signifying nothing. Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 5. What else doth he herein, than by his excommunication tell his humble suppliants that he holds them idiot, or base wretches, not able to get relief?—Sir W. Raleigh, Essays.

By idle boys and idiots vilified, Who me and my calamities deride. Sandys. Things not understood of them who are but idiots, and understand no other than their mother tongue. —Knatchbull, Annals of the University of Oxford, xii. 13. Many idiots will believe that they see what they only hear.—Dean.

To Idiocy (sometimes spelled Idiotey) there is sometimes given the sound of a -t, as if the notion of the idiotic character was conveyed by the affix -ry, and the -t belonged to the word Idiot. The formation, however, is that of such words as Prophecy, which is prophet-ry, but from prophet.

Idiotie. adj. Having the character of an idiot.

The stupid succession persisted to the last, in maintaining that the sun, moon, and stars, were no bigger than they appeared to the eye; and other such idiotic stuff, against mathematical demonstration.—Bentley, Philoeternus Lipsianus, § 40.

Idiotical. adj.

1. Same as Idiotey.

2. Idiomatic. Rare; and fruitly, as being both unnecessary and ambiguous.

The language of the sublimed authors of Greece is, upon occasion, idiotical and vulgar.—Blackwall, Sacred Classics, l. 271.

Idiotism. s. [from idiot.]

1. Folly; natural imbecility of mind.

The wisdom of this world is idiotism; Strength a weak reed. Decker, Old Fortunatus. To come to the knowledge of his own stolidity, idiotism, and gullibility.—Translation of Boccaccio, p. 97: 1629.

It matters not whether our good humour be construed by others into insensibility, or even idiotism; it is happiness to ourselves; and none but a fool would measure his satisfaction by what the world thinks of it.—Goldsmith, Essays, iii.

2. [Gr. ιδιω = private.] Peculiarity of expression; mode of expression peculiar to a language; idiom.

That our last accurate translation of the English Bible hath women in the margin, is a poor advantage; who seek not that it is the manner of that exquisite edition to set all the idioms of either language, and divers readings, in the margin?—Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy.

Scholars sometimes in common speech, or writing, in their native language, give terminations and idioms suitable to their native language unto words newly invented.—Sir M. Hale.

We may have lost some of the idioms of that language in which it was spoken.—Dryden, Life of Plutarch.

Idiotise. v. n. Become an idiot.

It looks as if the heads of the greatest men idiotized, when they meet together. Translation of Montaigne's Persian Letters, let. cix.

Idio. adj. [A.S. idol, idol.]

1. Lazy; averse from labour.

The tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, you shall lay upon them; you shall not diminish aught thereof; for they be idie.—Keodes, div. x.

2. Not engaged; affording leisure.

For often have you writ to her; and she in modesty, Or else want of idie time, could not again reply. Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, li. 1.

3. Unactive; not employed.

Why stand ye here all the day idie? They say unto him, Because no man hath hired us.—Matthew, xx. 9. No war or battle's sound Was heard the world around, The idie spear and shield were high up hung. Milton, On the Nativity, 53.

Children generally hate to be idie; all the care then is that their busy humour should be constantly employed in something of use to them.—Locke, Thoughts on Education.

4. Useless; vain; ineffectual.

They idiotized all resistance lost, All courage; down their idie weapons dropp'd. Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 833. And threatening France, plac'd like a painted dove, Held idie thunder in his lifted hand. Dryden.

The power that guards the sacred lives of kings? Why slept the lightning and the thunderbolts, Or lent their idie rance on fields and trees, When vengeance call'd 'em here? Id., Spanish Friar.

5. Unfruitful; barren; not productive of good.

Of antres vast, and deserts idie, It was my hint to speak. Shakespeare, Othello, l. 3

The murmuring surge, That on the unnumber'd idie pebbles chafes, Cannot be heard so high. Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 6.

A poor and idie sin. B. Jonson, Sejourn. 6. Trifling; of no importance: (as, 'An idie story').

Nuffice it then, thou money god, quoth he, That all thine idie offers I refuse; All that I need I have; what needeth me To covet more than I have cause to use? Spenser, Faerie Queen.

This answer is both idie in regard of us, and also repugnant to themselves.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

They are not, in our estimation, idie reprofs, when the authors of needless innovations are opposed with such negatives, as that of Idie: how are these new devices brought in, which our fathers never knew?—Thiel.

His friend smil'd scornful, and, with proud contempt, Rejects an idie what his fellow dreamt. Dryden, The Cuck and the Fox, 319.

An idie reason lessens the weight of the good ones you gave before.—Swift.

He wishes to recall the precious hours he has spent in trifles, and loitered away in idie unprofitable diversions.—Rogers.

Idio. v. n.

1. Lose time in laziness and inactivity.

These did no hurt, were sower, but went idling about the grove with their hands in their pockets, and telling the number of the trees there.—Aubrey, Anecdotes, li. 429.

Yet free from this poetick madness, Next page he says, in sober sadness, That she and all her fellow-geese Sit idling in their high abodes. Prior, Alma, canto i.

2. Play lightly.

A lover may best ride the gossamer That idles in the wanton summer air. Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, li. 6.

Idio. v. n. Waste idly; consume unprofitably.

If you have but an hour, will you improve that hour instead of idling it away?—Lord Chesterfield.

Idieheaded. adj.

1. Foolish; unreasonable.

These idieheaded suckers resorted thither.—Carr.

2. Delirious; infatuated.

Upon this loss she fell idieheaded, and to this very day stands near the place still.—Sir B. L. Estrange.

Idleness. s. Attribute suggested by Idie.

1. Laziness; sloth; sluggishness; aversion from labour.

Nor is excess the only thing by which sin breaks men in their health, and the comfortable enjoyment of themselves; but many are also brought to a very ill and languishing habit of body by mere idleness, and idleness is both itself a great sin, and the cause of many more.—South, Sermons.

2. Absence of employment.

All which yet could not make us accuse her, though it made us pine away for sight, to lose any of our time in so troublesome an idleness.—Sir P. Sidney.

Nature being liberal to all without labour, necessity imposing no industry or travel, idleness bringeth forth no other fruits than vain thoughts and licentious pleasures.—Sir W. Raleigh.

3. Omission of business.

Ten thousand harms, more than the ill I know, My idleness doth hatch. Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, l. 2.

4. Unimportance; trivialness.

To the English court assembly now, From every region, apex of idleness. Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 4.

5. Inefficiency; uselessness; worthlessness.

Either to have it sterile with idleness, or manured with industry.—Shakespeare, Othello, l. 3.

6. Unreasonableness; want of judgement; foolishness; madness.

There is no lust of affection but is joined with some idleness of brain.—Bacon, Considerations on War with Spain.

Idelpated. adj. Idie-headed; stupid.

Let him be found never so idelpated, he is still a grave drunkard.—Sir T. Oorbury, Characters, sign. O. 3.

Idler. s. One who idles.

Many of these poor fishermen and idlers, that are commonly prevented to his majesty's ships, are so ignorant in sea-service as that they know not the name of a rope.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Idles. s. Fit of laziness: (the preceding, as it were the name of a disease like the measles, and other complaints, the term for which has a plural form.)

Idle nullum linum dust: I have been sick of the idle to-day.—Withal. (Nares by H. & W.)

Idlesby. s. Inactive or lazy person: (a coined word). Idlesby is a like formation.)

I know not whether among those 'nihil accents,' idlesby, or 'male agents,' ill spenders of their time, I should place the newsman, and amorous trifler, that spendeth his forenoon on his glass and barler.—Whitlark, Manners of the English, p. 301.

Idleness. s. Idleness. Obsolete; rhetorical.

Developing the mountains, leaves, and flowers, And shining in the hawling brook, where-by, Clear as its current, glide the wintering hours With a calm languor, which, though to the eye Idleness is seen, hath its morality. If from society we learn to live, 'Tis solitude should teach us how to die; It hath no flatterers; vanity can give No hollow aid; alone—man with his God must strive.

Byron, Childs Harold, canto iv. st. xxxiii.

Idly. adv. In an idle manner.

1. Lazily; without employment.

A young gentleman, or a young maid, that liveth wealthily and idly.—Ascham, Schoolmaster.

2. Foolishly; in a trifling manner.

To rave or speak idly in sickness.—Barret, Alceste.

He hath idly gone about the bush a little.—Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy, p. 161.

And modern Angli, whose capricious thought Is yet with stores of wilder notions fraught, Too soon convinced, shall yield that fleeting breath, Which play'd so idly with the darts of death. Prior, Ode to the Memory of the Hon. Col. George Villiers.

3. Carelessly; without attention.

In a theatre, the eyes of men, After a well-acted actor leaves the stage, Are idly bent on him that enters next, Thinking his prattle to be tedious.

Shakespeare, Richard II. v. 2.

But shall we take the name abroad To drop her idly on the road? And leave our subject in the middle, As Butler did his bear and fiddle?

Prior, Alma, canto ii.

4. Ineffectually; vainly.

Let this and other allegations, suitable unto it, cease to bark any longer idly against the truth, the course and passage whereof it is not in them to hinder.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Idol. s. [Gr. εἰδωλον; Lat. idolum.]

1. Image worshipped as God.

Used adjectively.

They did sacrifice upon the idol altar, which was upon the altar of God.—1 Maccabees, i. 60.

A nation from one faithful man to spring, Him on this side Euphrates yet residing, Brod up in idol worship.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 113.

The apostle is there arguing against the enthusiasts who joined in the idol feasts, and whom he therefore accuses of participating of the idol god. —Bishop Atterbury.

2. Image.

Never did art so well with nature strive, Nor ever idol seem'd so much alive; So like the man, so golden to the sight; So like within, so counterfeit and light.

Dryden, Medal, 6.

3. Ideal representation. Obsolete.

Men beholding so great excellence, And rare perfection in mortality, Do her adore with sacred reverence, As th' idol of her maker's great magnificence.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

4. One loved or honoured to adoration.

He's honoured and lov'd by all; The soldier's god, and people's idol.

Sir J. Denham, Sophy.

5. The idols of Bacon.

Of the splendid passages in the Novum Organum none are perhaps so remarkable as his celebrated division of fallacies, not such as the dialecticians had been accustomed to refute, depending upon equivocal words, or faulty disposition of premises, but lying far deeper in the natural or incidental prejudices of the mind itself. These are four in number: idols of the senses, which from certain common weaknesses of human nature, we are universally liable; idols of the species, which from peculiar dispositions and circumstances of individuals mislead them in different manners; idols of the forum, arising from the current usage of words, which represent things much otherwise than as they really are; and idols of the theatre, which false systems of philosophy and erroneous methods of reasoning have introduced. Hence, as the refracted ray gives us a false notion as to the place of the object whose image it transmits, so our own minds are a refracting medium to the objects of their own contemplation, and require all the aid of a well-directed philosophy either to rectify the perception, or to make allowances for its errors. These idols, idols, idols, idols, idols, or, as Lord Bacon calls them in the Advancement of Learning, false appearances, have been in the market-place. But it would be better, unless we retain the Latin name, to employ one of the synonymous terms given above. For the use of idol in this sense is little warranted by the practice of the language, nor is it found in Bacon himself, but it has misled a host of writers, whoever might be the first that applied it, even among such as are conversant with the Novum Organum.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iii. ch. iii. § 58, 59.

Idolater. s. [see Idolatry.]

1. One who pays divine honours to images; one who worships for God that which is not God.

The state of idolaters is two ways miserr first, in that which they worship they find no: cour; and secondly, at his hands, whom they ought to serve, there is no other thing to be looked for but the effects of most just displeasure, the withdrawing of grace, dereliction in this world, and in the world to come confusion.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

An astrologer may be no Christian; he may be an idolater or a pagan; but I would hardly think astrology to be compatible with rank atheism.—Bentley, Sermons.

2. Simply, an adorer; great admirer.

Jonson was an idolater of the ancients.—Bishop Hurd.

Idolater. s. Idolater.

The Jews were punished for their idolatry by idolaters, and restored by idolaters.—Crisp, Historical Sketches, Speeches, and Characters, England the Fortress of Christianity.

Idolater. s. Idolater, of which it is the proper form. See Idolatry.

Idolateress. s. Female idolater.

They would not treat, unless he first acknowledged his father to be a tyrant, and his mother an idolateress.—Howell, Letters, iv. 43.

Whose heart, though large, Remitt'd by fair idolateress, fell To idols foul.

Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 444.

Idolatrical. adj. Tending to, comprising, consisting of, idolatry. Rare.

We have in our church no public worship of idols, no heathenish or idolatrical sacrifice.—Bishop Hooper, Examination as to Apparel, sign. xxi. 4.

This pretence would not only establish purgatory, but the worship of images, and the multitude of gods and idolatrical services, and very many superstitions.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Dubautium, vol. i. p. 554.

Idolatrize. v. a. Worship as an idol.

Apollo easily perceived, that Lippus did manifestly idolatrize Tullius. Translation of Horatius, p. 17: 1620.

Idolatrize. v. n. Behave, act, or comport one's self as an idolater; practise idolatry.

Let when for answer unto him they come The lustful people should idolatrize.

Dryden, Moors, 1009. (Ord M8.)

And as the Persians did idolatrize Unto the sun.

W. Browne, Britannia's Pastorals, i. 1.

Succeeding ages would idolatrize, And as his numbers, so his reliques prize.

Valentine, On the Death of Duane.

Idolatrizing. verbal abs. Act, or practise, of an idolater.

How should either swearing, or blaspheming, or idolatrizing, be sin, if there were not a God, against whom they were committed?—Fotherby, Theomantia, p. 41.

Idolatrous. adj. Tending to idolatry; comprising idolatry, or the worship of false gods.

Neither may the pictures of our Saviour, the apostles, and martyrs of the church, be drawn to an idolatrous use, or be set up in churches to be worshipped.—Ascham, On Drawing.

Idolatrously. adv. In an idolatrous manner.

Not therefore whatsoever idolaters have either thought or done; but let whatsoever they have either thought or done idolatrously, be so far forth abhorred.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Idolatry. s. [Gr. εἰδωλον + λατρεία = service, λατρεία = serv.] Hence, the full form of this compound should be Idolo-latry. The two l's have been fused in one, or one has been omitted. In Idolater and Idolator the same has happened to the two r's; viz., the r- of λατρεία, and the r of endings -er and -or.] Worship of images; worship of anything as God which is not God.

Thou shalt be worshipp'd, kiss'd, lov'd and ador'd;

And, were there some in his idolatry, My substance should be staked in thy stead.

Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 4.

Idolatry is not only an acknowledging or worshipping that for God which is not God, but it is also a worshipping the true God in a way unsuitable to his nature; and particularly by the mediation of images and corporeal resemblances.—South, Sermons.

The kings were distinguished by judgements or blessings, according as they promoted idolatry, or the worship of the true God.—Addison, Spectator.

Idolish. adj. Devoted to, fitted for, ornamented with, idols. Rare.

They have stuffed their idolish temples with the wretched pillage of your estates.—Milton, Reason of Church Government against Prelacy, i. ii.

Idolism. s. Idolatrous worship; defence of idolatrous worship.

How wilt thou reason with them, how refute Their idolisms, traditions, parables?

Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 233.

Idolist. s. Worshipper of images. Rhetorical.

I to God have brought Dishonour, obloquy, and op'd the mouths Of idolists and atheists.

Milton, Samson Agonistes, 461.

Idolize. v. a.

1. Worship idolatrously.

The reason Theodoret assigns for God's changing the diet of men from the fruits of the earth to the flesh of animals is, that, foreknowing they would idolize his creatures, he might aggravate the absurdity, and make it the more ridiculous to do so, by their consuming at their tables what they sacrificed to at their altars.—Bibliotheca Biblica, i. 246.

2. Love or reverence to adoration.

Those who are generous, humble, just and wise, Who not their gold, nor themselves idolize.

Sir J. Denham.

Parties, with the greatest violation of Christian unity, denominated themselves, not from the grand author and finisher of our faith, but from the first breacher of their idolized opinions.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Idolizer. s. One who loves or reverences to adoration.

Overlooking idolizers of the faculty of free-will.—Dr. H. More, Mystery of Guineas, p. 281: 1600.

The idolizers of monarchy, with equal flattery, have attributed the same prerogative to temporal princes.—Bishop Mannersham, Two Discourses, p. 132: 1681.

Though I be not such an idolizer of antiquity as Harris, yet they have great claims on me.—Bishop Warburton, Letters to Horck, iv. xxviii.

Idolous. adj. Abounding in, given to, idols. Obsolete.

Was not this, think you, good wholesome counsel of this idolous byshop?—Bale, Acts of English Prelates, pt. i. fol. 90. b.

Idoneous. adj. [Lat. idoneus.] Fit; proper; convenient; adequate.

You entangle, and so fix their saline part, by making them corrode some idoneous body.—Boyle.

An ecclesiastical benefice is sometimes void 'de jure & facto,' and then it ought to be conferred on an idoneous person.—Agilffe, Parergon Legis Crimici.

Idyl. s. [Gr. εἰδωλον; Lat. idylum.] Small, or short, descriptive poem: (generally pastoral).

Theocritus is his victim in the Dissertation on Pastoral Poetry; but Fontenelle gave the Sicilian his revenge; he wrote pastorals himself; and we have altogether forgotten, or, when we again look at, can very partially approve, the idyls of the Boucard, while those Doric dactyls of Theocritus still linger like what Schiller has called soft music of yesterday, from our schoolboy reminiscences on our aged ears.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iv. ch. vi. § 10.

Idyl. conj. [A.S. gif.]

Idyl. conj. Supposing, provided, in case it be so.

Thou shalt be above only, and thou shalt not be beneath, if that thou hearken unto the commandment of the Lord thy God.—Deuteronomy, xxviii. 13.

If that rebellion Came like itself, in laws and subject routs; I say, if damn'd communion so appear'd In his true, native, and most proper shape, You, reverend father, and these noble lords, Had not been here.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 1.

b. Whether or no.

Uncertain if thy augury, or chance;
But by this easy rise they all advance.
She doubts if two and two make four:
It can't—it may be—and it must;
To which of these must Alma trust?
Nay, further yet they make her go,
In doubting if she doubts or no.

Prior, Alma, canto iii.

c. Allowing that; suppose it be granted that.

Such mechanical circumstances, if I may so call them, were not necessary to the experiments.—Boyle.

d. Though. Rare.

They themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I; if I fore-knew,
Fore-knowledge had no influence on their fault.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 116.

Used substantively.

Absolute approbation, without any cautions, qualifications, ifs, or ands.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
If they have done this deed, my noble lord—
If I talk'd thou to me of ifs! Thou art a traitor.
Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 4.

Ignaro. s. [Latin.] Contemptuous term of scolder days for a blockhead.

It was intolerable insolence in such ignaros to challenge this for popery, which they understood not.—Bishop Montague, Appeal to Caesar, p. 206: 1625.

No man can be such an ignaro, as to imagine his sin was to be made of wire, or his life to be immortal in brass.—Heery, Sermons, p. 10: 1654.

Ignarus. adj. [Lat. ignarus, from ignis = fire.] Fiery; containing fire; emitting fire; having the nature of fire.

That the fire burns by heat, leaves us still ignorant of the immediate way of ignarus solution.—Glauciole, Synopsis Scientifica.

His [Leibnitz's] hypothesis supposes the gradual cooling of the earth from ignarus fusion.—Hutton, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. vii. § 33.

Ignify. v. a. Form into fire.

The ignited part of matter was formed into the body of the sun.—Stokely, Palaeogeographia Sacra, c. p. 20.

Ignipotent. adj. [Lat. ignipotens: potens, -entis = powerful, presiding over.] Presiding over fire.

Vulcan is call'd the power ignipotent.
Pope, Translation of Homer.

Ignis fatuus. s. [Lat.; literally, foolish, rain, mislaid fire.] Will with the wisp; Jack with the lantern.

An ignis fatuus, that bewitcheth
And leads men into pools and ditches.
Butler, Hudibras, l. 1, 509.

Scared and guided by the ignis fatuus of popular superstition.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificient Handmaiden, p. 32.

Vapours arising from putrid waters are usually called ignis fatuus.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Ignitable. adj. Inflammable; capable of being set on fire.

Such bodies only strike fire which have sulphur or ignitable parts.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Ignite. v. a. Kindle; set on fire.

Take good firm chalk, ignite it in a crucible, and then powder it.—Orwe, Muscum.

The ignited particles hasten to dip themselves in the neighbouring stream.—Sir H. Shere, in Lord Halifax's Miscellaneous, p. 10.

Plato, in his Timæus, enumerating the ignited juices, names wine in the first place.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 212.

Ignite. v. n. Take fire.

A fuse fell upon the hot sand and ignited.—Richardson, Travels in Sahara.

Ignited. part. adj. *Kindled so as to take fire.

(For example see Incendiarism.)

Ignition. s. Act of kindling or setting on fire.

The laborant stirred the kindled nitre, that the ignition might be presently communicated.—Boyle.
Those black circular lines we see on dishes and other turned vessels of wood, are the effects of ignition, by the pressure of an edged stick upon the vessel turned round in the lathe.—Ray.

Ignivomous. adj. [Lat. ignicomus; vomo = vomit.] Vomiting fire.

Vulcanus and ignivomus mountains are some of the most terrible shocks of the globe.—Derham, Physico-Theology.

Ignobility. s. Want of magnanimity.

To Locke up the gates of true knowledge, from them that affect nobody seeketh it to the glory of God, is a property belonging only to the hypocritical Pharisees and false lawyers. A most sign of ignobility can not be seen, then to hyde such noble monuments. Bide, in Leland's New Year's Gift.
Pope Sixtus the fifth, who was a very poor man's son, and his father's house ill thatched, so that the sun came in many places, would sport with his ignobility, and say, "That he was unto of casa illustre," son of an illustrious house.—Bacon, Apophthegms, (Ord MS.).

Ignoble. adj. [Lat. ignobilis; Fr. ignoble.]

1. Mean of birth; not noble; not of illustrious race.

As when in tumults rise th' ignoble crowd,
Mad are their motions, and their tongues are loud.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, l. 213.

2. Worthless; not deserving honour.

The noble idle doth want her proper limbs;
Her royal stock graft with ignoble plants.
Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 7.

Ignoble. v. a. Make ignoble. Rare.

And lastly, the good entertainment of the invincible navy; which was chased till the chosen were weary, after infinite loss, without taking a cock-boat, without firing a shot, sailed on the mercy of the winds and the discretion of their adventures, making a perambulation or pilgrimage about the northern seas, and quidding manie shores and points of land by shipwreck, and so returned home with shame and dishonour, much greater than the terror and expectation of their setting forth.—Bacon, Discourses in Praque of Queen Elizabeth.

Ignobleness. s. Attribute suggested by Ignoble; meanness; want of dignity.

The ignobleness of their dispositions and breeding.—Junius, Cursus of Misperdition, 113. (Ord MS.).

Ignobly. adv. In an ignoble manner; ignominiously; meanly; dishonourably; reproachfully; disgracefully.

To those, that sorer race of men, whose lives
Religious lifted them the sons of God,
Shall yield up all their virtue, all their fame Ignobly!
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 621.

Ignominious. adj. Mean; shameful; reproachful; dishonourable.

They with pale fear surpris'd,
Fled ignominious.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 304.
Cato was, though a traitor to the state,
And tortured, scap'd this ignominious fate.
Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

They rave, and she transferr'd the curs'd advice,
That monarchs should their inward soul disguise,
Dissemble and command, be false and wise:
By ignominious arts for service ends,
Should compliment their foes, and shun their friends.
Prior, Solomon, b. ii.

Nor has this kingdom deserved to be sacrificed to one single rapacious, obscure, ignominious projector.—Swift.

Ignominiously. adv. In an ignominious manner; meanly; scandalously; disgracefully; shamefully; reproachfully.

It is some ally to the infamy of him who died ignominiously to be buried privately.—South, Sermons.

Ignominy. s. [Lat. ignominia.] Disgrace; reproach; shame; infamy; meanness; dishonour.

Strenght from truth divided, and from just,
Inaudible, nought merits but disgrace
And ignominy.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 381.

Their generals have been received with honour
after their defeat, yours with ignominy after conquest.—Addison.

Ignomy. s. Abbreviation of Ignominy.

Barbarous.
Thy ignomy sleep with thee in the grave!
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. v. 4.

Sprinkling the terms of honour wholly on the one part, and of hatred and ignomy on the other.—Sir E. Sandys, State of Religion.

They are said in their own coin; they are with ignomy repaid reproach.—Bishop Richardson, On the Old Testament, p. 264.

Ignoramus. s. [Lat. first person plural, present tense, of ignoro = we know not.]

1. Word endorsed on a bill of indictment thrown out by a grand jury.

2. Foolish fellow; vain un instructed pretender: (treated as if a Latin substantive in us).

Ever you find an ignoramus in place and power, and can have so little conscience and so much confidence as to tell him to his face that he has a wit and an understanding above all the world beside,...

I dare undertake, that, as sublime a dose as you give him, he shall readily take it down, and admit the commendation, though he cannot believe the thing!—South, Sermons, i. 353.

As if, forsooth, there could not be so much as a few houses fired, a few ships taken, or any other calamitous accident befall this little corner of the world, but that some apocalyptic ignominia must presently flud and pick it out of some abused, martyred prophesy of Ezekiel, Daniel, or the Revelation.—Ibid. v. 57.

Ignorance. s.

1. Want of knowledge; illiterateness.

If all the clergy were as learned as themselves are that most complain of ignorance in others, yet our book of prayer might remain the same.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Ignorance is the curse of God,
Knowledge the wing wherewith we fly to heav'n.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iv. 7.

If we see right, we see our woe;
Then what avails it to have eyes?
From ignorance our comfort flows,
The only wreathed are the wise.
Prior.

2. Want of knowledge respecting some particular thing.

It is in every body's power to pretend ignorance of the law.—Sherlock.

Of future events, that Being, and no other, can have the same knowledge as of the past, who is acquainted with all the causes, remote or immediate, internal and external, on which each depends. But every one is accustomed to anticipate future events, in human affairs, as well as in the material world, in proportion to his knowledge of the several circumstances connected with each; however different in amount that knowledge may be, in reference to different occurrences. And in both cases alike, we always attribute the failure of any anticipation to our ignorance or mistake respecting some of the circumstances. When, e.g. we fully expect, from our supposed knowledge of some person's character, and of the circumstances he is placed in, that he will do something which, eventually, he does not do, we at once and without hesitation conclude that we were mistaken either as to his character, or as to his situation, or as to our acquaintance with human nature; generally.—Whately, Logic, Appendix I. Ambiguous Terms, xi.

3. Want of knowledge discovered by external effect.

Forgive us all our sins, negligences, and ignorances.—Book of Common Prayer.
Punish me not for my sins and ignorances.—Zobit, iii. 3.

Ignorant. adj.

1. Wanting knowledge, unlearned; uninstructed; unenlightened.

So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee. Psalm, lxxii. 22.

Thy letters have transported me beyond
This ignorant present time, and I feel now
The future in the instant.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 5.

He that doth not know those things which are of use for him to know, is but an ignorant man, whatever he may know besides.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Unknown; undiscovered. Rhetorical.

If you know aught which does behoove my knowledge Thereof to be inform'd, imprison't not
In ignorant concealment.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

3. Without knowledge of some particular: (with of).

Let not judges be so ignorant of their own right as to think there is not left to them, as a principal part of their office, a wise application of laws.—Hooker, Laws.

O wretched ill forsooth! Better had I Lived ignorant of future! so had borne
My part of evil only.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 763.

4. Unacquainted with: (with of).

Ignorant of guilt, I fear not shame. Dryden.

5. Ignorantly, made or done.

It is shipping,
Poor ignorant boulders, on our terrible sea
Like egg-shells mov'd.
Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iii. 1.

Ignorant. s. One untaught, unlettered, uninstructed.

Let this dress carry what price it will
With noble ignorance.—B. Jonson, Forc'd.
Look into the private closets of their devout ignorants, what difference shall you find between the image and the suppliant?—Bishop Hall, Quo vadis!

Did I for this take pains to teach
Our zealous ignorants to preach?
Sir J. Denham, A Speech against Peace.

Ignorantly. adv. In an ignorant manner;

without knowledge; unskilfully; without information.

The greatest and most cruel foes we have,
Are those whom you would ignorantly save.

Dryden.

Ignorant s. n. [Lat. ignoro; pres. part. ignorans, -antis; ignorantia.] Not know; be ignorant of.

I ignored not the stricter interpretation, given by modern critics to divers texts by me alleged.—Boyle.

Philosophy would solidly be established, if men would more carefully distinguish those things that they know from those that they ignore.—Id.

Ignote, adj. [Lat. ignotus.] Unknown. Rare.

A traveller passing through the confines of ignote countries.—Sir M. Stanley, Ruins, p. 1: 1034.

Shall such very ignote and contemptible pretenders be allowed a place among the most renowned of poetick writers?—Phillips, Theatrum Poeticum, pref.: 1676.

Iguana, s. Reptile so called.

In the iguana a single broad turbid cartilage extends into the alveolar cavity from the outer side, terminating below in two tubercles.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

In the flying lizard, and the iguana, the stomach is rather pyriform, but the shape varies with the state of the contents.—Id.

Iguanodon, s. [Gr. igōia, -igōnos = tooth.]

Large extinct reptile so called, having teeth like those of the Iguana, i.e. serrated at the edges.

The Iguanodon, first discovered by Dr. Mantell, has left none of its remains in the Wealden strata of the north-eastern counties and Isle of Wight, than has any other genus of associated saurian.—Lloyd, Manual of Elementary Geology, ch. xvii.

Ile, s. Improper form of Aisle.

Upward the columns shoot, the roofs ascend,
And arches widen, and lone ile extend.

Pope.

Ileus, s. [Latin.] In Medicine. Intussusception of the bowels; colic.

An ileus, commonly called the twisting of the guts, is really either a circumscription, or insertion of one part of the gut within the other.—Arbuthnot.

Ilex, s. [Latin.] Holm, or evergreen oak.

The ilex, or great scarlet oak, thrives well in England, is a hardy sort of tree, and easily raised of acorns. The Spaniards have a sort they call cuzina; the wood of which, when old, is finely embellished, as if it were painted.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

The palace of Lord Montfort was in the most distinguished quarter of the city, and situate in the midst of vast gardens full of walks of laurel, arches of ilex, and fountains of lions.—H. Disraeli, Henrietta Temple, ch. iv.

I'll, adverb, English; the Latin being illic.

The illic in Rushey Park are of great age, and seem to be as hardy as any of the other trees.—Jones, Glencings in Natural History.

Iliac, adj. [Lat. iliu = bowels.] Relating to the lower bowels.

Those, who die of the iliac passion, have their bellies much swelled.—Boyer, On the Haemorrhoids.

Ill, adj.

1. Bad in any respect; contrary to good, whether physical or moral; evil.

Neither is it ill air only that maketh an ill wat; but ill ways, ill markets, and ill neighbours.—Bacon, Essays.

2. Unsuitable; improper.

He was saying to himself, that he was a very ill man to go on in visiting and professing love to Flavia, when his heart was enthralled to another.—Spectator, no. 308.

3. Sick; disordered.

You wish me health in very happy season;
For I am on the sudden something ill.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 2.

I have known two signs of the greatest consequence lost, by the government falling ill in the time of the sickness.—Sir W. Temple.

Ill, adv.

1. Not well; not rightly in any respect.

Ill at ease, both she and all her train
The scorching sun had burned, and beating rain.

Dryden, The Flower and the Leaf, 407.

2. Not easily; with pain; with difficulty.

Thou desirest
The punishment all on thyself! alas!
Bear thine own first, ill able to sustain
His full wrath, whose thou feel'st as yet least part,
And my displeasure bear'st no ill.

Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 948.

Ill bears the sex a youthful lover's fate,
When just approaching to the nuptial state.

Dryden.

As the first element in a compound.

Near to an old ill favoured castle they meant to perform their unkindly grand. Sir P. Sidney.
The match had been so ill made for Pleistinus, that his ill led life would have tumbled to destruction, had there not come fifty to his defence.—Id.

You shall not find me, daughter,
After the slander of most wretched mothers,
Ill eyed unto you. Shakespeare, Cymbeline, l. 2.
Lead back thy Marston to their ancient Elbe:
I would restore the fruitful Kent, the wife
Of Vertigern for Hengist's ill bought aid. Dryden.
Sparta has not to boast of such a woman;
Nor Troy to thank her, for her ill plac'd love. Id.
The fabled dragon never guarded more
The golden fleece, than he his ill god store.

Id., Translation of Juvenal.
Did you never taste delicious drink out of an ill looked vessel?—Sir K. L'Estrange.
Nor has he erred above once by ill judged superficiality.—Clark, Translation from Ovid.
Others ill lived are condemn'd to toil
Their tedious life.

Prior.

We simple rustlers take delight
To see our women's teeth look white;
And every mazy ill bred fellow
Sneers at a mouth profoundly yellow.

Id., Ilma, canto ii.
The second daughter was a peevish, forward, ill conditioned creature as ever was.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

I see thy sister's tears,
Thy father's anguish, and thy brother's death,
In the pursuit of our ill fated loves. Addison, Cato.
Bid him employ his care for these my friends,
And make good use of his ill gotten power.
By such things men much better than himself. Id.
If a man had but an ill favoured nose, the deep thinkers would contrive to impute the cause to the prejudice of his education.—Scott.
They would not make bold, as every where they do, to destroy ill formed and mis-shaped productions.—Locke.

Ill, s. [A.S. yfel.]

1. Wickedness; depravity; contrariety to holiness.

Ill, to man's nature, as it stands perverted, hath a natural motion strongest in continuance.—Id.
Young men to imitate all ill are prone;
But are compelled to swerve alone;
For then in virtue's shape they follow vice.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

2. Misfortune; misery.

Who can all sense of others' ill escape,
Is but a brute at best in human shape.

Id., Translation of Juvenal.

Though plung'd in ill and exercised in care,
Yet never let the noble mind despair;
When press'd by dangers, and beset with foes,
The gods their virtue succour interpose;
And when our timely sinks, overwhelm'd with grief,
By unforeseen expedients bring relief. A. Phillips.

Ill, v. a. Injure. Rare.

The sparrow with her angry bill,
Defends her brood from such as would thence ill.
Sylvestor, Du Bartas, 46. (Ord MS.)

Illabile, adj. [Lat. labor = slide, slip.] Incapable of slip or error. Rare.

Even infinite wisdom and power could not make a creature (for God cannot work contradictions) that was of its own nature, illabile, infallible, and impeccable.—Chrysostom, Discourses, iv. (Ord MS.)

Illability, s. Incapability of slip or error. Rare.

Before that secondary nature of eternal infallibility, illability, and impeccability could be brought about, on the most perfect of created intelligences, it must necessarily be, by continued habits, produced by repeated acts.—Chrysostom, Discourses. (Ord MS.)

Illapso, s. [Lat. illapso, pretérito part. of illabor; labor = glide in.]

1. Immission or entrance of one thing into another.

What ravishing transports now
Seize on that intellect! how doth it glow
With fresh illapso of the purest light.
J. Hall, On the Death of Lord Hastings,
Lacrymæ Mæmuræ 1656.

The prophetic illapso could never grace an impure soul.—J. Spencer, On Vulgar Prophecies, p. 40: 1665.

As a piece of iron red hot, by reason of the illapso of the fire into it, appears all over like fire; so the souls of the blessed, by the illapso of the divine essence into them, shall be all over divine.—Norris.

2. Casual coming; accession in the medical sense: (as, 'the accession of a fit of ague').

Life is all preserved
By the bold swimmer in the swift illapso
Of accident disastrous.

Thompson, Seasons, Summer.

Passion's fierce illapso
Rouses the mind's whole fabric.

Illaqueatus, s. n. [Lat. illaqueatus, pass. part. of illaqueo (laqueo = to snare; illaqueo, -onis).] Entangle; entrap; ensnare.

I am illaqueated, but not truly captivated into your conclusion.—Dr. H. More, Divine Dialogues.
They that take upon them to be the only solvers from sin, are themselves held fast in the snare of eternal death; and do as necessarily illaqueate all others therein whom they proselyte to their religion.—Id., Antidote against Idolatry, pref.

Illaqueation, s.

1. Act of snaring, or entangling; taking in a noose; hanging. Rare.

The word in Matthew doth not only signify suspension, or popishness illaqueation, but also suffocation.—Sir T. Browne.

2. Ensnaring; entrapping. Rare.

They wholly gave themselves up to learn to wrangle, and arts of illaqueation.— Evelyn, Letter to Bishop Nicholson.

Illation, s. [Lat. illatio, -onis; illatus = brought in.]

1. Inference; conclusion drawn from premises.

Which might be inferred by those that were rather apt to make evil than good illations of our proceeding.—Id.

Herein there seems to be a very erroneous illation from the indulgence of God unto Cain, concluding an immunity unto himself.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Illation so orders the intermediate ideas as to discover what connection there is in each link of the chain, whereby the extremes are held together.—Locke.

2. In a more limited sense, illation means an imperfect syllogism formed by conversion or inversion; in which there are only two terms, i.e. no middle term: as,

Some pagans were good men.

Some good men were pagans.

Illative, adj. Relating to, denoting, illation or conclusion.

There is a great deal of difference between a mere illative necessity, which consists only in the logical consequence of one thing upon another, and between a causal necessity, which efficiently and antecedently determines and puts the faculty upon working. South, Sermons, viii. 84.

In common discourse or writing, such causal particles as 'for,' and 'because,' manifest the act of reasoning as well as the illative particles 'then' and 'therefore.'—Watts.

Illative, s. That which denotes illation or conclusion.

This [word] 'for' that leads the text in, is both a relative and an illative; referring to what he had said in the foregoing words; and inferring a necessary consequence of the one clause upon the other: 'Purge out the old leaven: "for" Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us.'—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 166.

Illatively, adv. In an illative manner; by illation, second sense.

Most commonly taken illatively.—Bishop Richardson, On the Old Testament, p. 434.

Illaudable, adj. [Lat. ilaudabilis from laus, laudis = praise.] Unworthy of praise; blamable. Latinism.

Strength from truth dignified and from just,
Illaudable, nought merits but dispraise.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 381.

You, my lord, have, I fear, been awed into a restraint of your genius in that point, by that illaudable, (or otherwise) ill-grounded, and illaudable maxim of Mr. Pope.

'For fools admire, but men of sense approve,'—Johnson, Observations on Lord Hervey, p. 102.

Notwithstanding these various censures, I must own myself of opinion, both that the abolition of monastic institutions might have been conducted in a manner consistent to justice as well as policy, and that Henry's profuse alienation of the noble lands, however ilaudable in its motive, has proved upon the whole more beneficial to England than any other disposition would have turned out.—Hallam, Constitutional History of England, vol. i. ch. xi.

Illaudably, adv. In an ilaudable manner. It is natural for all people to form, not illaudably, too favourable a judgement of their own country.—Brown.

Illecebrous, adj. [Lat. illecebros = allurement.] Full of allurement.

Not the illegible deletions of Venus, but the valiant acts and noble affairs of princes.—Sir T. Flynd, The Conqueror, fol. 10.

The study is elegant, and the matter illegible, that is to say, wrote to the reader.—Ibid. fol. 120, b.

Illegality. adj. [Lat. legalis, from lex, legis—law.] Contrary to law.

No patent can oblige the subject against law, unless an illegal patent passed in one kingdom can bind another, and not itself.—Nash.

Illegality. s. Contrary to law.

He wished them to consider what votes they had passed, of the illegality of all those commissions, and of the unjustifiableness of all the proceeding by virtue of them.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

After the restoration from the captivity, down to the days of our Saviour, the priests were notoriously generals, soldiers, judges, statesmen, and chief ministers of state; and even kings; without any reproach or mark of illegality taken notice of by our Saviour, or his Apostles, just as they might be teachers in the synagogue, and doctors of the law. But they enjoyed none of these posts in right of their priesthood; they were only allowed to them as to any other qualified Jew.—Bishop Story, On the Priesthood, p. 33.

Illegally. adv. In an illegal manner.

Matches illegally struck up, contrary to the pretended conditions.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience, 1470.

Illegible. adj. [Lat. legibilis, from lego—read.] Incapable of being read.

The secretary poured the ink-box all over the writings, and so defaced them that they were made altogether illegible.—Hovell.

Illegitimacy. s. Condition of one unlawfully begotten.

There was convincing evidence of illegitimacy, though access was possible.—Taylor, Principles and Practice of Medical Jurisprudence, ch. xliii.

Illegitimate. adj. [Lat. legitimus—lawful, legitimate.] Unlawfully begotten.

Grieve not at your state; For all the world is illegitimate.—Charlesland.
Being illegitimate, I was deprived of that endearing tenderness and uncommon satisfaction which a good man finds in the love and conversation of a parent.—Johnson, Spectator.

Illegitimate. v. a. Render illegitimate; prove a person illegitimate.

The cardinal, his uncle, would first have illegitimated him.—Sir H. Wotton to Sir E. Bacon, Remains, p. 479.
Born with a legal claim to honour and to affluence, he was in two months illegitimated by the parliament.—Johnson, Lives of the Poets, Savage.

Illegitimation. s.

1. State of one not begotten in wedlock.

Richard III. had a revolution, out of his hatred to both his brethren, to disabuse their issues, upon false and incompetent pretexts, the one of attainder, the other of illegitimation.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

2. Want of genuineness.

Many such like pieces, which, neither in their sense nor idiom agreeable with the times they pretend to, do bear in their very fronts the apparent brands of illegitimation.—Dean Martin, Letters, p. 102.

Illesive. adj. [Lat. læsus, pass. part. of lædo—hurt.] Not injurious or hurtful; innocuous.

Their places of resort might be so fitted with instruments, as they might be like academies of instruction and proficiency, and these they might sweeten with the adding of illesive games.—Pallham, Remains, 81. (Ord MS.)

Illeivable. adj. That cannot be levied or exacted.

He rectified the method of collecting his revenue, and removed obsolete and illeivable parts of charge.—Sir M. Hale.

Illeliberal. adj. [Lat. liberalis, from liber—free.]

1. Not noble; not ingenuous.

It is certainly as easy to be a scholar as a gamester, or any other characters equally illeliberal and low.—Harrius, Hermes, b. iii. ch. v. (Ord MS.)

2. Mean, as unconnected with the liberal arts.

There is no art, neither liberal nor illeliberal, but it cometh from God, and leadeth to God.—Fotherby, Athanasius, p. 17: 1652.

3. Not classic or scholarlike.

Whenever you write Latin, remember that every sort of phrase which you make use of, but cannot find in Cæsar, Cicero, Livy, Horace, Virgil, and

Ovid, is bad, illeliberal Latin, though it may have been written by a Roman.—Lord Chesterfield, Letters, 164. (Ord MS.)

Illeliberality. s. Meanness of mind; parsimony; nigardliness; want of munificence.

The illeliberality of parents, in allowance towards their children, is an infamous error, and acquaints them with shifts.—Bacon.

Illest. adj. [Lat. licitus—allowed.] Unlawful.

He was licentious, profane, corrupt, too proud to behave with common politeness, yet not too proud to pocket illest gain.—Macculay, History of England, ch. iv.

Illichten. v. a. Enliven. Barbarous.

Corporal light cannot be, because then it would not pierce the air, nor dispassionate bodies; and yet every day we see the air illichten.—Sir W. Raleigh.

To illichten every one that cometh into it, [the world].—Galat. God's Eye upon Israel, preface: 1645.

Illichten. part. adj. Enlightened.

Illichten minds show a greater lustre in knowledge than in the fine gold.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xxvii.

This tale comes to Chrysostome by a third person, not by the illichten saint himself.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 78: 1616.

Illemitable. adj. Incapable of being bounded or limited.

Although in adoration of idols, unto the subtiler heads, the worship perhaps might be symbolical; yet was the idolatry direct in the people, whose credulity is illemitable, and who may be made believe that any thing is God.—Sir T. Browne.

With what an awful world-revolving power, Were first th' unwieldy planets launch'd along The illemitable void!—Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

Illemitation. s. What admits of no certain determination. Rare.

The illemitation of age, and the miseries that attend it.—Bishop Hall, Bala of Gilead, 1st Old Age, § 1.

Illemit. part. pref. Unbounded; interminable; unlimited.

They saw his power illemited and irresistible.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations, b. iv.

In the former parts, the omnipotence of a Christian suffered no restraint; it was illemited, unconfin'd.—Hales, Golden Remains, p. 126.

Neither doth the use or exercise of this dominion depend upon any one, so as to receive any direction or regulation, or to render any account of the administration of it; as being illemited, absolute, and supreme; and so the fountain from whence all dominion in any other is derived.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. 1.

Illemiteness. s. Attribute suggested by illemited; exemption from all bounds.

The absoluteness and illemitedness of his commission was generally much spoken of.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Illemitacy. s. Want of letters or learning.

As I believe that what I have mentioned gave rise to the opinion of Shakespeare's want of learning; so what has continued it down to us may have been the many blunders and illemities of the first publishers of his works.—Pope, Preface to Shakespeare.
The deplorable condition of indigence and illemity.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, ii. 452.

Illemital. adj. Not literal. Rare.

Descending under the earth, is a transition most of all unexact and illemital.—Dr. Dawson, Texts on the Logos, p. 251: 1765.

Illemitate. adj.

1. Unlettered; untaught; unlearned; unenlightened by science: (applied to persons).

The duke was illemitate, yet had learned at court to supply his own defects, by the drawing unto him of the best instruments of experience.—Sir H. Wotton.

The illemitate writer, empirick like, applies To minds diseas'd unsafe chance remedies: The learn'd in schools, where knowledge first began, Studies with rare th' anatomy of man; Sees virtue, vice, and passions in their cause, And fame from science, not from fortune draws.

Dryden.
In the first ages of Christianity not only the learned and the wise, but the ignorant and illemitate, embroiled torments and death.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Unlearned; rude; barbarous: (applied to things).

There are in many places heresy and blasphemy, and impertinence, and illemitate rudeness.—Jeremy Taylor, On Extempore Prayer.

Illemitateness. s. Attribute suggested by illemitate; want of learning; ignorance of science.

Many acquainted with chymistry but by report, have, from the illemiteness and impurities of those that pretend skill in it, entertained an ill opinion of the art.—Baile.

There needs no other argument of the illemiteness of these people [the Spaniards], and indeed of the slender growth of Christian religion there, than the very canons which were established by the council held in Aranda, in the year 1473, whereof one was, That every priest should be bound to say mass at least three or four times every year; and another, That the chief benefices and dignities should not be conferred upon any who did not understand grammar, 'a ninguno que no sepa gramatica'.—Clarendon Tracts, (Ord MS.)

Illemitate. s. Want of learning.

The more usual causes of this deprivation are want of holy orders, illemitate, or inability for the discharge of that sacred function, and irreligion.—Agilffe, Paragon Jura Canonicæ.

They, who in their present illemitate were so prone to sedition, . . . would be much more so if heated by banal speculations.—L. Addison, Description of Federal's Harbory, preface: 1671.

If the historian intended hereby to arraign the abbots of illemitate.—H. Warton, Specimens of Barnes's Errors, p. 63.

Illemiture. s. Habitual malevolence; want of humanity.

Illemiture inclines a man to those actions that thwart and sour and disturb conversation, and consists of a propensity to do ill turns, attended with a secret joy upon the sight of any mischief that befalls another, and of an utter insensibility to any kindness done him. South, Sermons.

Illemitured. adj.

1. Habitually malevolent; wanting kindness or good-will; mischievous; desirous of another's evil; unoblivious.

These ill qualities dominate a person illemited, they being such as make him grievous and uneasy to all whom he deals and associates himself with.—South, Sermons.

Stay, silly bird, th' illemited task refuse; Nor be the bearer of unwelcome news.—Addison, Translation from Ovid.

2. Intractable; not yielding to culture.

The fondly studious of increase, Rich foreign mould on their illemited land induce.—J. Philips, Cyder, b. i.

Illemit. s. Attribute suggested by III.

1. Badness or inconvenience of any kind, natural or moral; wickedness.

Thou wouldst be great; Art not without ambition; but without The illemite should attend it.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 3.
He that has his chains knocked off, and the prison doors set open, is perfectly at liberty, though his preference be determined to stay, by the illemite of the weather.—Locke.

2. Sickness; malady; disorder of health.

Since the account her majesty received of the insolent faction, during her late illemite at Windsor, she hath been willing to see them deprived of power to do mischief.—Swift.

Illemitical. adj.

1. Ignorant or negligent of the rules of logic, or reasoning.

One of the dissenters appeared to Dr. Sanderson so bold and illemital in the dispute, as forced him to say he had never met with a man of more pertinacious confidence and less abilities.—J. Walton.

2. Contrary to the rules of logic, or reason.

Reason cannot dispute and make an inference so utterly illemital.—Dr. H. More, Deacy of Christian Piety.

Illemitarred. adj. Influenced by evil stars with respect to fortune; unlucky.

O, illemitarred lovers! what avail it me To have thy love? I have mine, what boots it thee? Panharce, Translation of Guarini's Pastor Fido. Illemitarred birds, that listening, not admiring.

Shenstone, Elegies, vi.
Illemitarred, though brave, did no vision foreboding Tell you that Fate had forsaken your cause; Say, were you destined to die at Culloden?

Victory graced not your fate with applause.—Byron, Hours of Idleness.

Illede. v. a. [see Illusion.] Deceive; mock; impose on; play upon; torment by some contemptuous artifice of mockery.

Sometimes thwart sometimes he strook him straight And fisted off his blow, 't' illemide him with such bait.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.
If the solitariness of these rocks do not illemide me.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iv. 1.

In vain we measure this amazing sphere,
And find and fix its centre there or here;
While its circumference, according to be brought Ev'n into fancy's space, illuminates our vanquish'd thought.
Prior, Solomon, b. 1.

Illúme, v. a. [see Illumine.]

1. Enlighten; illuminate.

When you same star, that's westward from the pole
Hath made his course, 't illume that part of heav'n,
Where now it burns. Shakespeare, Hamlet, l. 1.

2. Brighten; adorn.

The mountain's brow,
Illum'd with fluid gold, his near approach
Betokens. Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

Illúminant, s. That which illuminates.

Sprinkling of light indefinitely, 'tis so far from arguing a divine nature in the bodies that are enclosed with it, whether, as the planets, by participation from an external illuminant, or as the sun from an internal principle; that a burned stone, witness that of Holonia, will afford, in proportion to its bulk, incomparably more borrowed light than one of the planets. —Boyle, Free Enquiry, p. 117.
(Ord. 384.)

Illúminate, v. a.

1. Enlighten; supply with light.

No painting can be seen in full perfection, but as all nature is illuminated by a single light. —Sir H.
Wotton.

He made the stars,
And set them in the firmament of heaven,
To illuminate the earth and rule the night.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 348.

Reason our guide, wilt thou she more reply
Than that the sun illuminates the sky;
Than that night rises from his absent ray,
And his returning lustre kindles day?
Prior, Solomon, b. 1.

2. Adorn with festal lamps or bonfires.

3. Enlighten intellectually with knowledge or grace.

When he illuminates the mind with supernatural light, he does not extinguish that which is natural.
—Locke.

4. Adorn with pictures or initial letters of various colours.

5. Illustrate.

My health is insufficient to amplify these remarks, and to illuminate the several pages with variety of examples. —Watts.

Illúminate, adj. Enlightened.

That famous and truly illuminated doctor, Francis Junius, the glory of Leyden. —Bishop Hall, Epistles.
A precise, pure, illuminated brother!

B. Johnson, Volpone.

Illúminate, s. One of the Illuminati.

These new illuminates have such evanescent shifts with them. —Wotton, Qualities of State, p. 44: 162.

Not unlike the refined and quaint illuminates of our time. —Lar, Bliss of Brightest Beauty, p. 15:
16: 1.

Such illuminates are our classical brethren!
Bishop Montagu, Appeal to Caesar, p. 16: 1625.

Illúminated, part. adj. In Bibliography.

Having letters with pictorial ornamentations, i. e. with the fourth sense of Illuminate.

With what eagerness I pictures, medals, and illuminated missals have been brought forth from
... at mysterious cabinets for her amusement!
Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Diary
and Letters of Madame F. Ardy.

Used substantively. Illuminates.

It has been maintained, or implied, that all existing denominations of Christianity are wrong, none representing it as taught by Christ and His apostles; that it died out of the world at its birth; ... that it has existed indeed among men ever since, and exists at this day, but as a secret and hidden doctrine, which does but revive here and there under supernatural influence in the hearts of individuals, and is manifested to the world only by glimpses, or in gleams, according to the number or the station of the illuminated, and their connexion with the history of the four times. —H. Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, intral.

Illúminati, s. [Lat. plural of illuminatus;
Italian, illuminato = enlightened.] Persons pretending to special spiritual or intellectual illumination, several sects having, at different times and places, borne the name.

Another pestilent sect there was, not long since,
of illuminati in Armenia, whose founders were a hypocritical crew of their priests; who, affecting in themselves and their followers a certain angelical purity, fell suddenly to the very counterpoint of justifying baseness. —Sir E. Rieu, State of Ar-

Illumination, s.

1. Act of supplying with light.

The illuminators of manuscripts borrowed their title from the illumination which a bright genius giveth to his work. —Eaton, Dissertation on Reading
the Classics.

2. That which gives light.

The sun is but a body illuminated, and an illumi- nation created. —Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

3. Festal lights hung out as a token of joy.

Flowers are strew'd, and lamps in order plac'd,
And windows with illuminations grac'd.
Dryden, Translation of Persius.

4. Infusion of intellectual light, knowledge,
or grace.

Hymns and psalms are such kinds of prayer as are not conceived upon a sudden; but framed by meditation beforehand, or by prophetic illumina- tion are inspired. —Hooker, Reclinalical Polity.

Illúminative, adj. Having the power to give light.

What makes itself and other things be seen, being accompanied by light, is called fire: what admits the illuminative action of fire, and is not seen, is called air. —Sir E. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of Bodies.

Illúminator, s.

1. One who gives light.

Chaucer, writing his poetical in English, is of some called the first illuminator of the English tongue. — Yorke, Reclitation of Decayed Intelligence, ch. vii.

2. In Bibliography. One who illuminates.

(For example see Illumination, l.)

Illúmine, v. a.

1. Enlighten; supply with light.

His understanding was illuminated with the beams of divine truth. —Pope, Prince Henry's Annu- scarp, p. 12: 1618.

To confirm his words, outflow
Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
Of mighty cherubims: the sudden blaze
Far round illuminat'd hell.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 663.

What in me is dark,
Illumine! what is low, raise and support!
Ibid., l. 22.

Nowhere was this species of reception more happily conducted than at the Duchess de G. —C.
The rooms, though small, decorated with taste, brightly illuminat'd; a handsome and gracious hostess, the Duke the very pearl of gentlemen, and daughters worthy of such parents. —B. Disraeli,
Coningsby, b. vi. ch. l.

2. Decorate; ado.

To Cato, Virgil paid one honest line;
O let my country's friends illuminate mine. Pope.

Illúsió, s. [Lat. illusio, -onis, from illudo

—play with, mock; pass. part. illusus.]
Mockery; false show; counterfeit appearance; error.

There wanted not some about him that would have persuaded him that all was but an illusion. — Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

We must use some illusion to render a pastoral delightful; and this consists in exposing the best side only of a shepherd's life, and in concealing its miseries. —Pope.

Illúsió, adj. Deceiving by false show.

The heathen birds, who idle fables dress,
Illusió dream in mystic forms express'd.
Sir R. Blackmore.

Illúsió, adj. Deceiving; fraudulent.

Subtlety, in those who make profession to teach or defend truth, hath passed for a virtue; a virtue indeed, which, consisting for the most part in nothing but the fallacious and illusió use of obscure or deceitful terms, is only fit to make men more convinced in their ignorance. —Locke.

Illústrate, v. a.

1. Brighten with light.

Then let us borrow from the glorious sun
A little light to illústrate this net.
Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 2, 7.

2. Brighten with honour.

Matter to me of glory! whom their hate
Illústrates, when they see all regal power
Given me to quell their pride.
Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 738.

3. Explain; clear; elucidate.

Authors take up popular conceits, and from tradition unjustifiable, or false, illústrate matters of undeniable truth. Sir T. Browne.

Illústration, s. Explanation; elucidation; exposition: (it is seldom used in its original signification for material brightness).

Whoever looks about him will find many living
illústrations of this emblem. —Sir E. L'Estrange.

Space and duration, being ideas that I have something very abstruse and peculiar in their nature, the comparing them one with another may perhaps be of use for their illústration. —Locke.

Illústrative, adj. (in the extrinsic Illústrative.)
Having the quality of elucidating or clearing.

Purging and pruning with all industry,
What's dead or useless, less demonstrative,
What's dull or flaccid, least illústrative.

Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 2, 41.

Illústrator, s. One who illustrates, brightens, clears, or beautifies.

The right gracious illústrator of virtues Chapman, Sonnets at the end of his Translation of Homer.

Illústrious, adj.

1. Bright; shining.

Shaking his illústrious tresses,
Nodding, Translation from Ovid, b. ii.
His locks behind,
illústrations on his shoulders fling with wings,
Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 626.

2. Conspicuous; noble; eminent for excellence.

In other languages the most illústrious titles are derived from things secret. —South, Sermons.

Illústrious, adj. Not luxurious. Rare.

The widow Vanhomrigh and her two daughters quitted the illústrious soil of their native country, for the more elegant pleasures of the English court.
—Earl of Orrery, Remarks on the Life and Writ- ings of Dr. Swift.

Image, s. [Fr. image; Lat. imago.]

1. Any corporeal representation, generally used of statues; statue; picture.

Whose is this image and superscription? —Mat- thew, xxi. 20.

The image of a deity may be a proper object for that which is but the image of a religion. —South.
Still must I be upbraid with your line;
But your late brother did not prize me less,
Because I could not boast of images. Dryden.

2. Idol; false god.

Mannasseh set the carved image in God's house. —
2 Chronicles, xxxiii. 7.

3. Copy; representation; likeness.

I have bewept a worthy husband's death,
And liv'd by looking on his image:
But now two mirrors of his princely semblance
Are crack'd in pieces by malignant death.
Shakespeare, Richard III., l. 2.

He made us see his image all alive;
That image is the soul, and that must be,
Or not the maker's image, or be free. Dryden.

4. Semblance; show; appearance.

This is the man should do the bloody deed:
The image of a wicked heinous fault
Lives in his eye; that close aspect of his
Does show the mood of a much troubled breast.
Shakespeare, King John, iv. 2.

The face of things a frightful image bears,
And present death in various forms appears.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

5. Idea; representation of anything to the mind; picture drawn in the fancy.

The image of the just I'll show you here at large.
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 4.

Outcasts of mortal race! can we conceive
Image of might, of light, of soft, or great? Prior.

When we speak of a figure of a thousand and we may have a clear idea of the number and thousand angles; but the image, or sensible idea, we cannot distinguish by fancy from the image of a figure that has nine hundred angles. —Watts.

Image, v. a. Copy by the fancy; imagine.

How are immaterial substances to be imagined, which are such things whereof we can have no notion? Dryden.

Fate some future bard shall join
In sad similitude of griefs to mine,
Condemn'd whole years in absence to deplore,
And image charms he must behold no more. Pope.

Imagery, s.

1. Sensible representations; pictures; sta-tuets.

Of marble stone was cut
An altar, carv'd with cunning imagery.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

When in those oratories which you see
Rich carvings, portraictures, and imagery;
Where every figure to the life express'd
The godhead's power.

Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, ll. 465.

Your gift shall two large globes be
Of silver, wrought with curious imagery.
And high emboss'd. H. Translation of St. Paul.

2. Representations in writing; such descriptions as force the image of the thing described upon the mind.

I wish there may be in this poem any instance of such imagery.—Byrdon.

3. Show; appearance.

Things of the world fill the imaginative part with beauties and fantastic images.—Jerome Taylor.
What can thy imagery of sorrow mean?
Secluded from the world, and all its care,
Hast thou to grieve or joy, to hope or fear? Primo.
All the visionary beauties of the prospect, the paint and imagery that attracted our senses, fade and disappear.—Rogers.

4. Forms of the fancy; false ideas; imaginary phantasms.

It might be a mere dream which he saw; the imagery of a melancholic fancy, such as musing men mistake for a reality.—Bishop Atterbury.

5. Form; make.

They are our brethren, and pieces of the same imagery with ourselves.—Fellham, Ramona, ii. 53.

Imaginable. adj. Capable of being imagined.

It is not imaginable that men will be brought to obey what they cannot esteem.—South, Hermans.
Men, sunk into the greatest darkness imaginable, retain some sense and awe of a Deity.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Imaginable. adj. Imagining; forming ideas.

We will enquire what the force of imagination is, either upon the body imaginable, or upon another body.—Bacon.

Imaginative. s. One who imagines, exercises, practises, or sports with, the imagination.

Imagination is the power and act of imagination, more intensive upon other bodies than the body of the imaginable.—Bacon, Advancement of Learning, li.

The air of common report, or the single testimony of some superstitious and melancholy imaginal.—J. Spencer, Discourse concerning Prophecies, p. 223: 1663.

Imaginatory. adj. Fancied; visionary; existing only in the imagination.

Fortune is nothing else but a power imaginary, to which the successes of human actions and endeavours were for their variety ascribed.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

Why wilt thou add to all the griefs I suffer Imaginary ills and fancied tortures? Addison, Cato.

Imagination. s.

1. Fancy; power of forming ideal pictures; power of representing things absent to one's self or others.

Imagination I understand to be the representation of an individual thought. Imagination is of three kinds: joined with belief of that which is to come; joined with memory of that which is past; and of times present, or as if they were present; for I comprehend in this imagination figured and as present, as if one should imagine such a man to be in the vestments of a pope, or to have wings.—Bacon.

Our simple apprehension of corporeal objects, if present, is sense; if absent, imagination: when we would perceive a material object, our fancies present us with its idea.—Glanville.

2. Conception; image of the mind; idea.

Sometimes despair darkens all her imaginations; sometimes the active passion of love cheers and clouds her invention.—Air P. Sidney.

Princes have but their titles for their glories, An outward honour for an inward toil; And, for unfelt imaginations, They often feel a world of restless cares.

Shakespeare, Richard III. i. 4.
Better I were distressed,
So should my thoughts be weeded from my griefs;
And woe, by wrong imaginations, lose
The knowledge of themselves. Id., King Lear, iv. 6.
His imaginations were often as just as they were bold and strong.—De Witt.

3. Contrivance; scheme.

Thou hast seen all their vengeance, and all their imaginations against me.—Lamentations, iii. 60.

4. Unsolid or fanciful opinion.

We are apt to think that space, in itself, is actually boundless; to which imagination, the idea of space, of itself lends us.—Locke.

Imaginative. adj.

1. Having an active, full of, imagination.

Witches are imaginative, and believe oftentimes they do that which they do not.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Characterized by imagination.

Jefferies and restraints upon the imaginative and fantastic part, because our fancy is usually pleased with the entertainment of shadows and phantasy.—Jerome Taylor, Rule and Exercises of holy Living.

The genius of Drayton is neither very imaginative nor very pathetic, but he is an agreeable and weighty writer, with an ardent if not a highly creative fancy.—Crook, History of English Literature and the English Language, vol. i. p. 636.

Imagine. v. a. Fancy; paint in the mind; devise; scheme; contrive.

They intended evil against thee, they imagined a mischievous device.—Psalms, xli. 11.

Imaginer. s. One who imagines, who forms ideas.

The juggler took upon him to know that such an one should point in such a place of a garter that was held up; and still he did it, by first telling the imaginer, and after bidding the actor think.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Imagining. verbal abs. Act of one who imagines; fancy; imagination; thing imagined.

Present fears
Are less than horrible imaginings.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 3.

Among that large class of young persons whose reading is almost entirely confined to works of imagination, the popularity of Lord Byron was unbounded. . . . Many of them practised at the glass in the hope of catching the curl of the upper lip, and the scowl of the brow, which appear in some of his portraits. A few discarded their neckcloths in imitation of their great leader. For some years the Minerva press sent forth no novel without a mysterious, unhappy, Lara-like peer. The number of hopeful undergraduates and medical students who became things of dark imaginings, on whom the freshness of the heart ceased to fall like dew, whose passions had consumed themselves to dust, and to whom the relief of tears was denied, knows all calculation.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Life of Lord Byron.

But pauper not a lusty time,
Nor feed with crude imaginings
The herd, wild hearts and feeble wings,
That every sophister can line.

Imaginous. adj. Imaginative. Rare.

Others that he awaked out of this imaginous sleep, and doe now indeed truly repent and believe, find many wants, much defectiveness, in their repentance, their faith, their hope, their fear of God.—Gutaker, Just Man, 235. (Ord. M.)

Imago. s. [Lat.] In Entomology. Full-formed insect: (as opposed to Chrysalis and Larva).

The stages through which insects pass are four: the egg, the larva, the pupa, and the imago.—Kirby and Spence. (Ord. M.)

The physiologist very well knows, that throughout the animal kingdom in general, the actions are dependent on the nervous structure. He knows that each reflex movement implies the agency of certain nerves and ganglia; that a development of complicated instincts, is accompanied by a complication of the nervous centres and their commissural connections; that in the same creature in different stages, as larva and imago for example, the instincts change as the nervous structure changes; and that as we advance to creatures of high intelligence, a vast increase in the size and complexity of the nervous system takes place.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Imbalm; Imbalk; Imbalgo; Imbarmen;

Imbark; Imbarn; Imbaso; Imbastardize; Imbathe; Imbay. See Embalm, &c.

Imbecile. adj. [Fr.; Lat. imbecillus.] Weak in respect to mental power.

The imbecile old man did as he was told.—Emilia Wynham.

Imbecile. v. a.

1. Weaken; render imbecile.

It is a sad calamity, that the fear of death should so imbecill man's courage and understanding.—Jerome Taylor, Rule and Exercises of holy Living, § 7. ch. iii.

2. (By confusion.) Embezzle.

Of this kind of affairs the wife is to be employed in, the provident and faithful keeping and preserving of provisions made and bought in by the man, that they be not imbecilled or made away, that no waste be made of them, that they be not spoiled and mis-spent.—Gutaker, Marriage Duties, p. 104. (Ord. M.)

Princes must in a special manner be guardians of pupils and widows, not suffering their persons to be oppressed, or their estates imbecilled.—Jerome Taylor, Rule and Exercises of holy Living.

Imbecillate. v. a. Weaken; render feeble, or imbecile.

The man, being skilful in natural magic, did use all the artifices his subtilty could devise to imbecillate the earl.—Arthur Wilson, History of James I.

Imbecility. s. Weakness; feebleness of mind or body. (For its relation to idleness see Idiocy and Idiot.)

A weak and imperfect rule argueth imbecility and imperfection.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
No imbecility of means can prejudice the truth of the promise of God herein.—Ibid.

Imbellie. adj. [Lat. bellicus, from bellum = war.] Not warlike. Rare.

The imbellic peasant, when he comes first to the field, shakes at the report of a musket.—Junius, Minne Stigmatized, p. 423: 1630.

Imbetter; Imbessale. See Embetter, &c.

Imbibe. v. a. [Lat. bibo = drink.]

1. Drink in; draw in.

The torrent morose imbibes,
Commissions, perquisites, and bribes. Swift.
Mummin' wide
The dewy-skirted clouds imbibe the sun.
Thomson, Seasons, Autumn.

2. Admit into the mind.

Those that have imbibed this error have extended the influence of this belief to the whole gospel, which they will not allow to contain any thing but promises.—Wm. Hall.

It is not easy for the mind to put off those confused notions and prejudices it has imbibed from custom.—Locke.

Conversation with foreigners enlarges our minds, and sets them free from many prejudices we are ready to imbibed concerning them.—Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

3. Drench; saturate; soak. Rare.

Metals, corroded with a little acid, turn into rust, which is an earth insoluble and indissoluble in water; and this earth, imbibed with more acid, becomes a metallic salt.—Sir J. Newton.

Imbiber. s. One who, that which, drinks, sucks in, or imbibes.

Salts are strong imbibers of sulphurous steams.—Arbuthnot.

Imbibition. s. Act of sucking or drinking in; of imbibing.

Most powders grow more coherent by mixture of water than of oil: the reason is the congruity of bodies, which maketh a perfecter imbibition and incorporation.—Bacon.

Heat and cold have a virtual transition, without communication of substance, but in moisture not; and to all manifestation there is required an imbibition.—Id.

A drop of oil, let fall upon a sheet of white paper, that part of it, which, by the imbibition of the liquor, acquires a greater continuity and transparency, will appear much darker than the rest; many of the incident beams of light being now transmitted, that otherwise would be reflected.—Boyle.

Imbitter; Imblaze; Imbody; Imboil; Imboiden. See Embitter, &c.

Imbonity. s. [Lat. bonitas, from bonus = good; Fr. bonté.] Want of godliness. Rare.

All fears, griefs, suspicions, discontent, imbonity, iniquities are swallowed up and drowned in this Euphrates, this Irish sea. Barton, Autobiography of Melancthon, p. 215.

Imborder; Imbock; Imbosom; Imbow; Imbower; Imbrace; Imbrangle. See Emborder, &c.

Imbroed. v. a. Generate within. Rare.

These Jesuits endeavour by all means to imbroed that fluency and obtundie in their scholars.—Sir J. Sandys, State of Religion, ii. 3. 1.

To be wise, that is, to search the truth, is a disposition imbroed in every man.—Hakewill, Apology, p. 288.

Imbricate. v. a. Lay as tiles.

The fans consisted of the trains of paroquets whose quills were set in a long stem so as to imbricate the plumes in the gradation of their natural growth.—Berkford, Caliph Vathek.

Imbricate. adj. [Lat. imbrex = tile.] Laid as tiles.

Two rows on each side of the belly consist of larger scales, ovate and imbricate.—Russell, Account of Indian Serpents, p. 7.

Imbrication. s.

1. Concave indenture.
All is guarded with a well-made tegument, adorned with neat imbrications, and many other fineries.—Dorham.

2. In Botany. Laid as tiles: (applied to the ostivation, or arrangement of the leaves of the corolla, and the veneration, or arrangement of the leaves of the calyx, of plants).

Imbréglie. s. [Italian.] Confusion intricate.

It was appointed of Fate that, in this wide-weltering, strangely growing, numerous stupendous imbréglie of Convention business, the grand first-parent of all the questions, controversies, measures and enterprises which were to be evolved there to the world's astonishment, should be this question of King Louis.—Carlyle, French Revolution, pt. iii. b. ii. ch. iii.

Imbréwig; Imbrás; Imbráto. See Embrown, &c.

Imbrúe. v. a. [Lat. imbruo.] Tincture deeply; soak with, or as with, any liquor or dye.

Her face with blushing shamefacedness imbrued.

Saunders, Translation of Ovid, b. i.

I would render this treatise intelligible to every rational man, however little versed in scholastic learning; among whom I expect it will have a fairer passage, than among those that are deeply imbrued with other principles.—Nir K. Dighy.

Clothes which have once been thoroughly imbrued with black, cannot well afterwards be dyed into lighter colour. Boyle.

Where the mineral matter is great, so as to take the eye, the body appears imbrued and tinctured with the colour.—Woodward.

Imbrúy. See Embusy.

Imitability. s. Quality of being imitable.

According to the multifariousness of this imitability, so are the possibilities of being.—Norris.

Imitable. adj.

1. Capable of being imitated; within reach of imitation.

The characters of men placed in lower stations of life, are more useful, as being imitable by greater numbers.—Bishop Atterbury.

2. Worthy to be imitated; deserving to be copied.

How could the most base men, and separate from all imitable qualities, attain to honour but by an obsequent slavish course.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

As acts of parliament are not regarded by most imitable writers, I account the relation of them improper for history.—Sir J. Haywood.

Imitate. v. a.

1. Copy; endeavour to resemble.

We imitate and practise to make swifter motions than any out of your muscles.—Bacon.

Despise wealth, and imitate a god. Churley.

I would enslave some stable-man of note, And imitate his language and his coat. Brantson, Man of Taste.

2. Counterfeit.

For shame! what, imitate an ode! Gay.

Imitation. s.

1. Act of copying; attempt to resemble; copy.

Since a true knowledge of nature gives us pleasure, a lively imitation of it, either in poetry or painting, must produce a much greater; for both these arts are not only true imitations of nature, but of the best nature.—Dryden.

2. Free or paraphrastic kind of translation.

In the way of imitation, the translator not only varies from the words and sense, but forsakes them as he sees occasion; and, taking only some general hints from the original, runs division on the ground-work.—Dryden.

Imitative. adj.

1. Inclined to copy; aiming at resemblance.

A very numerous class of words, of which the imitative nature can hardly be mistaken, are those employed to represent in the first instance the noise made by the collision or fracture of bodies of a greater or less degree of hardness or resonance, then the collision or fracture itself, the instrument by which the noise is produced, the consequences of the action, or generally any phenomenon that may be vividly associated in our mind with the noise fundamentally represented by the word in question.—Wrightwood, Dictionary of English Etymology, introd.

2. Formed after some original.

This temple, less in form, with equal grace, Was imitative of the first in Thrace. Dryden.

Lady! If for the cold and cloudy clime—
Where I was born, but where I would not die,
Of the great Poet-Sire of Italy
I dare to build the imitative rhyme.
Harsh Runic copy of the South's sublime,
Thou art the cause.

Byron, Sonnet, Dedication to the Prophecy of Isule.

Imitator. s. One who copies another; one who endeavours to resemble another.

Imitators are but a servile kind of cattle, says the poet.—Dryden.

Imitatorship. s. Office or employment of an imitator.

My soul adores judicial scholarship;

But when he servile imitatorship

Shows spruce Athenian pen is prized, is

'Tis worse than apish.

Morton, Scourge of Villany, iii. 3.

Immaculate. adj. [Lat. macula = spot, stain.]

Spotless; pure; undefiled.

To keep this commandment immaculate and blameless, was to teach the gospel of Christ.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

This king, whom catholics count a saint-like and immaculate prince, was taken away in the flower of his age.—Bacon.

Immaculeable. adj. [Lat. malleus = hammer.]

Not to be wrought upon; not to be impressed.

Oh the stiffness of a British soil! how immaculeable does it render their stony virtues to the force of all humane impressions!—Memoirs of Sir Edmund Burke, p. 79: 1802.

Immanation. s. [Lat. maneo = flow; pass.

part. manatus.] Flowing, or streaming, in of anything (actually or figuratively); influx (to which it is, etymologically, an approximate synonym; fluere = flow).

A quick immanation of continuous fantasies.—Lamb, Letter to Coleridge.

Immane. adj. [Lat. immanis.] Vast; prodigiously great. Obsolete.

Immane Areturus, weeping Pleiades, Orion, who with storms plows up the seas.

Saunders, Paraphrase of the Book of Job, p. 15.

What immane difference is there between the twenty-fourth of February, and commencement of March?—Kewen, b. i. ch. xvii. § 3.

Often coupled with cruelty; indeed, Cockeran's definition of the word is 'immane, cruel, wild.'

Doth it not appertain to the just judgement of God to avenge such immane cruelties?—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 179: 1616.

Those immane cruelties, which divers have exercised upon men's dead bodies.—Fotherby, Atheism, p. 297: 1622.

Immanely. adv. In an immane manner; monstrously; cruelly.

They have not done the same by the power of miracle and integrity of life, but only by dint of sword, which did so immanely and barbarously make havoc of them, to the destruction of some millions.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 178.

A man of excessive strength, valiant, liberal, and fair of aspect, but immanely cruel.—Milton, History of England, b. i.

Immanency. s. Internal dwelling.

The immanency and inherency of this power in Jesus is evident in this, that he was able to communicate it to whom he pleased.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. ii.

Immanent. adj. [Lat. im = in + manens,

-entis, pres. part. of maneo = wait, tarry, remain.] Intrinsic; inherent; internal.

Judging the infinite essence by our narrow selves, we ascribe intellects, volitions, and such like immanent actions, to that nature which hath nothing in common with us.—Glanville.

What he wills and intends once, he wills and intends from all eternity; it being constantly contrary to the very first notions we have of the infinite perfections of the Divine Nature to state or suppose any new immanent act in God.—South, Sermons.

Immanifest. adj. Not manifest; not plain.

Rare.

A time not much unlike that which was before time, immanifest and unknown.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Immanity. s. [See Immane.] Barbarity; savageness.

It was both impious and unnatural, That such immanity and bloody strife Should reign among professors of one faith.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. v. 1.
We shall be then most assured to taste of their fierce immanity.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 138.

A belline kind of immanity never ranged so among men.—Howell, Letters, iii. 35.

The poet brings in his goddess blaming the rusticks for their immanity.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 338.

Immarcescible. adj. [Lat. marceo and marcesco = wither, fade.] Unfading. Rare.

So minister discipline, that you forget not mercy; that when the Chief Shepherd shall come, you may receive the immarcescible crown of glory, through Jesus Christ our Lord.—Form of Communion of Bishops, 1628.

This crown which Thou hast hid up for me, is immarcescible.—Bishop Hall, Meditations of the Love of Christ, § 11.

They were inflamed with the desire of enlarging the kingdom of Christ here, and of obtaining that immarcescible crown hereafter.—Dr. H. More, Exposition of the Seven Churches, ch. iii.

Not for a garland of flowers, but for wreaths of immarcescible glory.—Hallivell, Melanconia, p. 108.

If the prize which we expect in the race of our imperfect obedience be an immarcescible crown.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. ii.

Immarcescibly. adv. In an immarcescible manner. Rare.

The honour that I now reach at, is no less than a crown, and that not fading and corruptible, as all the earthly diadems are, but immarcescibly eternal, a crown of righteousness, a crown of glory.—Bishop Hall, Immortal World, b. ii. 12. (Ord 345.)

Immaritable. adj. Not martial or warlike. Rare.

My powers are unfit,

Myself immaritable.

Chapman, Translation of the Odyssey.

Immaritable. adj. Incapable of being matched; peerless. Barbarous.

Where learned More and Gardiner I met,

Men in those times immaritable for wit.

Milnes for Maynates, p. 530.

Immaterial. adj.

1. Incorporeal; distinct from matter; void of matter.

Angels are spirits immaterial and intellectual, the glorious inhabitants of those sacred palaces, where there is nothing but light and immortality; no shadow of matter for tears, discontentments, passions, and uncomfortable passions to work upon; but all joy, tranquillity, and peace, even for ever and ever do dwell.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

As then the soul a substance hath alone;

Besides the body, in which she is confin'd;

So hath she not a body of her own,

But is a spirit and immaterial mind.

Sir J. Davies, On the Immortality of the Soul.

2. Unimportant; without weight; impertinent.

It may not be immaterial to add, that the dramatic pieces above spoken of shared the same fate.—Ruffhead, Life of Pope, p. 21. (Ord M8.)

It may seem immaterial whether we shall not recollect each other hereafter.—Cowper. (Ord M8.)

Immaterialism. s.

1. Immateriality.

A noise like to wet fingers drawn on glass, Which sets the teeth on edge; and a slight clatter Like showers which on the midnight quarts will pass, Resounding like very supernatural water, Came over Juan's ear, which throbb'd, alas!

For immaterialism's a serious matter;

So that even those whose faith is the most great

In souls immortal, shun them like a pest.

Byron, Don Juan, xvi. 114.

2. Doctrine by which the existence of matter is denied.

Immaterialist. s. See Materialist.

Immateriality. s. Incorporeity; distinctness from body or matter.

There are sicknesses that walk in darkness, and the exterminating angels that fly veiled up the curtains of immateriality.—Jeremy Taylor, Sacred Sermons on the Countess of Darby.

Few perhaps at present, who believe in the immateriality of the human soul, would deny the same to an elephant.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe in the Fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. iii. § 116.

Immaterialize. v. a. Render immaterial; invest with the character of immateriality.

Immaterialized. part. gulf. Distinct from matter; incorporeal.

Though sensuality in the most fixed cognition be no trouble to immaterialized spirits, yet is it more to our embodied souls can bear without insupport.

—Glanville, Scipio Scintilla.

Immaterialize. adj. Not consisting of matter; incorporeal; wanting body. Rare.

It is a virtue which may be called incorporeal and immaterialize, whereof there be in nature but few.—Bacon.

Philosophy makes all immaterialize belongs to be created in this first day.—Dr. H. More, Conjectura Cabalistica, p. 144.

Immature. adj. [Lat. immaturus.]

1. Not ripe, actually or figuratively.

Immature or unripe hopes.—Dr. Jackson, Works, iii. 329.

IMMATURE

2. Not perfect; not arrived at fulness or completion.

The land enterprise of Panama was an ill-measured and immature counsel, grounded upon a false account, that the passages were no better fortified than Drake had left them.—Bacon.

This is your time for faction and debate, for partial favour, and permitted hate: Let now your immature dissension cease, Sit quiet.—Dryden.

3. Premature; hasty; early; come to pass before the natural time.

How were we affected here in England for prince Henry's immature death!—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 165.

We are pleased, and call not that death immature, if a man lives till seventy.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercises of holy Living.

Immaturity. s. Unripeness; incompleteness; state short of completion.

In state, many things at first are crude and hard to digest, which time and deliberation can supply and correct; but in religion, wherein is no immaturity, nothing out of season, it goes far otherwise.—Milton, Reason of Church Government urged against Prelacy, l. 1.

I might reasonably expect a pardon from the ingenious for faults committed in an immaturity of age and judgement.—Chaucer.

Immobility. s. [Lat. immo-bilis; mobilis, from men—flow, glide.] Want of power to pass. Rare.

From this phlegm proceed white cold tumours, viscosity, and consequently immobility of the joints.—Arbuthnot.

Immeasurable. adj. Immense; not to be measured; indefinitely extensive.

Churches reared up to an height immeasurable, and adorned with far more beauty in their restoration than their founders before had given them.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Immeasured. part. pres. Unmeasured, this latter being the commoner word.

Genants, and such dreadful weights, As far exceeded men in their immortal weights.—Spenser, Faerie Queene, li. 10, 8.

Immechanical. adj. Not according to the laws of mechanics. Rare.

We have nothing to do to show any thing that is immechanical, or not according to the established laws of nature.—Chycre.

Nothing will clear a head possessed with immechanical notions.—Mead.

Immediacy. s. Condition of that in immediate or direct relation to something else: (opposed to indirect or mediate); hence, as explained by Johnson, with the remark that it is a harsh word, and, as he believes, peculiar to Shakespeare, personal greatness; power of acting without dependence. See Mediatize.

He led our powers, Bore the commission of my place and person, The which immediacy may well stand up, And call itself your brother.—Shakespeare, King Lear, v. 3.

Immediato. adj. [Lat. medius—middle; medium—intermediate agent or way.]

1. Being in such a state with respect to something else as that there is nothing between them; proximate; with nothing in the way of a medium intervening.

Moses mentions the immediate causes of the deluge, the rains and the waters; and St. Peter mentions the more remote and fundamental causes, that constitution of the heavens.—Barnes.

2. Not acting by second causes.

It is much to be ascribed to the immediate will of God, who giveth and taketh away beauty at his pleasure.—Abbot.

Had Hylas, as he should have done, taken the same ground, the dialogue would have run thus:—Philonous. Is material substance a senseless being, or a being endowed with sense and perception?—Hylas. I cannot say.—Philonous. How do you mean you cannot say?—Hylas. I mean that like you, 'I know nothing' of any qualities of bodies save those I immediately perceive through the senses; and I cannot immediately perceive through the senses whether material substance is senseless or not.—Philonous. But you do not doubt that it is senseless?—Hylas. Yes; in the same way that you doubt my external reality—doubt whether I am anything more than one of your ideas. Did we not, at the beginning, Philonous, distinguish between things known immediately and things known mediately?—Philonous. Yes.—Hylas. Did you not make me admit that sensations are the only sensible things; that is, the only things immediately perceived; and that I cannot know the causes of these sensations immediately, but can only know them mediately by reasoning?—Philonous. I did.—Hylas. And your whole argument is an attempt to show that those things which I know immediately—those things, whose existence I infer as the causes of my sensations, do not exist at all.—Philonous. True.—Hylas. How, then, can you put any trust in my reply, when I either say that matter is sensitive, or that it is not sensitive? The only sensitiveness that I can immediately perceive is in my own.—Philonous. You know that I am sensitive.—Hylas. Yes, but how? I see you turn when spoken to, and shrink when burned; from such facts, joined with my personal experiences, I infer that you are sensitive as I am; and if you must have an answer to your question, I infer that matter is not sensitive, because it shows no such signs.—Philonous. Well.—Hylas. Would you not see that if you adopt this answer your whole reasoning is vitiated? You set out to disprove a certain portion of my mediate knowledge. To do this, you now ask from me another portion of my mediate knowledge, as you have already asked several, and will, I suppose, ask more. You are combining these many portions of mediate knowledge, and will draw from them a conclusion; and this conclusion—this piece of doubly mediate knowledge, you will, I suppose, offer to me in place of the mediate knowledge you would disprove. Certainly I shall reject it. I demand that every link in your argument shall consist of immediate knowledge. If but one of them is an inference, and not a thing immediately perceived by sense, I shall say that your conclusion has the same uncertainty with this that you combat, plus the uncertainty attendant on all argument. Say, I deprecate, were every step in your demonstration a piece of immediate knowledge, I should argue that as the inference you drew was but mediate knowledge, it could have no greater warrant than the adversary one.—Robert Spenser, Principles of Psychology.

IMME

3. Instant; present with regard to time.

Immediate are my needs, and my relief Must not be lost and turn'd to me in words, But find supply immediate.—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, li. 1.

Death denou'd that day, Which he presumes already vain and void, Because not yet inflicted, as he fear'd, By some immediate stroke.—Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 40.

But she, however, of victory sure, Contains the wrath too long delay'd; And would with more immediate power, Calls cruel silence to her aid.—Prior, Ode to a Lady.

Immediately. adv. In an immediate manner.

1. Without the intervention of any other cause or event.

It is acceptance of it, either immediately by himself, or mediately by the hands of the bishop, is that which vests the whole property of a thing in God.—South, Sermons.

2. Instantly; at the time present; without delay.

Her father hath commanded her to slip Away with Mender, and with him at Elton Immediately to marry.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 6.

Immedicable. adj. [Lat. medicabilis—capable of being cured.] Not to be healed; incurable.

For which immedicable blow, Due to that time, we doom'd heaven ordain'd, Wherein confusion absolutely reign'd.—Mirraour for Magistrates, p. 522.

Wherein had concurred such abundance of malignant humours, that it might truly be said, it was immedicable.—Translation of Boccaccio, p. 130: 1626.

My griefs not only pain me . . . But finding no redress fervent and rage, Nor less than wounds immedicable, Rankle and fester, and gangrene To black mortification.—Milton, Samson Agonistes, 617.

Immelodious. adj. Not melodious; unmusical. Rare.

My lute be as thou wast, when thou didst grow With thy green mother in some shady grove, When immelodious winds had made thee move.—Drammatic, Sonnet to his Lute.

Immemorial. adj. Past time of memory; so ancient that the beginning cannot be traced.

All the laws of this kingdom have some memorials in writing, yet all have not their original in writing; for some obtained their force by immemorial usage or custom.—Sir M. Hale.

By a long immemorial practice, and prescription of an age thorough-paced hypocrisy, they come to believe that God is a reality, which, at first practice of it, they themselves knew to be a cheat.—South, Sermons.

IMME

Immense. adj. [Lat. immensus—unmeasured, and, in a secondary sense, vast.] Unlimited; unbounded; infinite.

O goodness infinite! goodness immense! That all this good of evil shall produce!

As infinite duration hath no relation unto motion, and time, so infinite or immense essence hath no relation unto body; but is a thing distinct from all corporeal magnitude, which we mean when we speak of immensity, and of God as of an immense being.—Crowe.

Immenseness. s. Attribute suggested by Immense.

The immenseness of whose excellencies [is] too highly raised for us.—Dr. H. More, Conjecturae Cabbalisticæ, p. 43.

The immenseness of the victory, and the consequences that might have attended it.—Lord Clarendon, Life, li. 512.

Immensity. s. Unbounded greatness; infinity.

By the power we find in ourselves of repeating, as often as we will, any idea of space, we get the idea of immensity.—Locke.

Immeasurable. adj. Not to be measured.

The God of immeasurable majesty.—Old Poem in Ashmole's Theatrum Chemicum, p. 305: 1652.

Immeasurable. adj. Unmeasured.

It fell into an immeasurable distance from it.—W. Monks, Deceit Essays, pt. li. p. 108: 1654.

Immerge. v. a. [Lat. mergo—dip.] Put under, or as under, water.

Their heads are gross, their souls are immersed in matter, and drowned in the mists of an unwholesome cloud.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 208: 1653.

Immerit. s. Want of desert: (preferred by Johnson to Demerit).

When I receive your lines, and find there expressions of a passion, reason and my own immerit tell me it must not be for me.—Sir J. Suckling.

Immerited. adj. Not deserved: (Unmerited commoner).

Those on whom have in the plenteous manner showered my bounty and immerited favour have darted on me.—King Charles, in the Princip Pelican, p. 270.

Immeritous. adj. Undeserving; of no value. Rare.

A frothy, immeritous, and undeserving discourse.—Milton, Colasterion.

Immerse. v. a. [Lat. mersus, pass. part. of mergo—sink, plunge.] Put under, or as under, water; sink or cover deep.

He stood More than a mile immerg'd within the wood; At once the wind was laid.—Dryden, Theodora and Honoria, ss.

Applied (like sink and quark) to the state of persons either in deep ignorance, or low servitude to the pleasures of sense.

It is a melancholy reflection, that our country, which, in times of popery, was called the nation of saints, should now have less appearance of religion in it than any other neighbouring state or kingdom; whether they be such as continue still immersed in the errors of the church of Rome, or such as are recovered out of them.—Addison, Freeholder.

It is impossible to have a lively hope in another life, and yet be deeply immersed in the enjoyments of this.—Bishop Atterbury.

Immerse. adj. Buried; covered; sunk deep.

After long inquiry of things immersed in matter, I interpose some object which is immaterial, or less material; such as this of sounds, that the intellect may become not partial.—Bacon.

Immersion. s.

1. Act of putting any body into a fluid below the surface; state of sinking below the surface of a fluid.

Achilles's mother is said to have dipped him, when he was a child, in the river Styx, which made him invulnerable all over, excepting that part which the mother held in her hand during this immersion.—Addison, Guardian.

2. State of being overwhelmed or sunk in any respect.

It was the Platonic doctrine, that humane souls or minds descended from above, and were sown in generation, that they were sown, sown, and sown, by this descent and immersion into animal nature.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 313.

Immersive. adj. Connected with, arising from, immersion. Rare.

When the sun's immense heat doth so boil the water in the cloud, like unto the urine which a man maketh in a burning fever, it looketh red when it falleth.—Nares, Speculum Mundi, 145.

Immethed. adj. Not having method; without regularity. Rare.

Their sudden thoughts, immethed discourses, and slovenly sermonizations.—Waterhouse, A apology for Learning, p. 187: 1683.

Immethedical. adj. Confused; without regularity; without method.

The unskillful and immethedical teaching of their pastor.—Milton, Means to remove Hivings out of the Church.

M. Hayle compares the answering of an immethedical author to the hunting of a duck: when you have him full in your sight, he gives you the slip, and becomes invisible.—Addison.

Immigrant. s. [Lat. migro = change place, migrate.] One who, removing from one place to another, is named from the country wherein he settles rather than from which he leaves.

A host of immigrants followed. Lord Monmouth's Rhineland, History of the Kingdom of Crumb.

Immigrate. v. n. Enter or pass into; go to dwell in some place: (opposed to E-migrate).

They immigrate into the wishes they utter.—Nares, &c., p. 67: 1684.

Immigration. s. Entering, or passing into, a place: (as opposed to E-migration).

Hitherto I have considered the Saracens either at their immigration into Spain about the ninth century, or at the time of the crusades, as the first authors of romantic fable among the Europeans.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, vol. I. sign. C. 3. b.

Imminence. s. Impending character of anything; thing imminent.

I do not speak of flight, of fear, of death; but dare all imminence, that gods and men address their dangers in.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, v. 11.

Imminent. adj. [Lat. imminere, -entis.] Impending; at hand; threatening.

What dangers at any time are imminent, what evils hang over our heads, God doth know, and not we.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Imminution. s. [Lat. imminutio, -onis; minus = lessen.] Diminution; decrease.

Without any addition, imminution, or alteration.—Bishop Ussher, Canon of Scripture, p. 14.

These revolutions are as exactly uniform as the earth's are, which could not be, were there any place for chance, and did not a Providence continually oversee and secure them from all alteration or imminution.—Eay, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Immiscible. adj. [Lat. miscere = mix.] Incapable of mixture. Rare.

It is incredible . . . that this . . . is the result of such a chain of immiscible and conflicting particles.—Cudworth, Intellectual System. (Ord MS.)

Immission. s. [Lat. immissio, -onis; missus = sent, pass. part. of mitto = send.] Act of sending in: (as opposed to E-mission).

To God must be ascribed these stirrings, these breakings; whether, by a just but clemency permission, as thus, or by a just immission, as punishment.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 76.

Transient immissions, and representations of the ideas of things future to the imagination.—South, Sermons, iii. 416.

Immit. v. a. [see Immission.] Send in; inject.

But grant an entire efficacy to this balsamic liquor, (oil or juice of cedar,) thus clysterwise immitted into the intestines; yet . . . medicines this way exhibited to the dead immediately flow out again.—Girenkil, Art of Embalming, p. 273: 1705.

Immitigable. adj. [Lat. mitigo = mitigate.] Incapable of being softened.

War was declared, and neither the Emperor nor the Pope now attempted to disguise their mutual immitigable hatred.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, h. x. ch. v.

Immix. v. a. [Lat. in = in.] Mingle. Melt nitrous humours, which are imixed with the mass of the blood.—Ferrand, Loe Melancholy, p. 241: 1640.

Reason . . . immixed and contemplated with the soul.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xvii.

Reason, with these immixed, inevitably pulled down the same destruction on himself. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1067.

Immixable. adj. [Lat. in = un.] Impossible to be mingled. Barbarous.

Fill a glass sphere with such liquors as may be clear, of the same colour, and immixable. Bishop Wilkins, Mathematical Magic.

Immixt. adj. [Lat. in = un.] Unmixed. Barbarous.

The most ancient and immixt people in the universe.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 277.

It doth steadily stand, all-uniform, Pure, pervious, immixt, immovable, mild. Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 2, 22.

Immobility. s. Incapability of being moved; want of, resistance to, motion.

The course of fluids through the vascular solids must in time harden the fibres and abridish many of the canals; from whence dizziness, weakness, immobility, and debility of the vital force.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Humours.

Duration is best perceived when we are able to detain an idea for some time without change, as in watching the motion of a pendulum. And though it is impossible for the mind to continue in this state of immobility more, perhaps, than about a second or two, this is sufficient to give us the idea of duration as the necessary condition of existence.—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. iii. § 118.

Immoderacy. s. Excess. Rare.

The strength of delight is in its seldomness or rarity, and sting in its satiety: mediocrity is its life, and immoderacy its confusion.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, ii. 1.

Immoderate. adj. Excessive; exceeding the due mean.

One means very effectual for the preservation of health, is a quiet and cheerful mind, not afflicted with violent passions, or distracted with immoderate cares.—Rip, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Immoderateness. s. Attribute suggested by Immoderate; want of moderation.

Both Solomon speak this of honey's excess only, and not of immoderateness in general.—Shelford, Learned Discourses, p. 85.

Adversaries join together in reproaching us for this immoderation; and, by their immoderateness in so doing, do also justify the moderation of our church.—Fulter, Moderation of the Church of England, p. 41.

Immoderation. s. Want of moderation; excess.

Their sin proceeded from themselves; . . . and consists in the abuse of his fatherly indulgence by a wilful immoderation and excess.—Hallisell, Melanprophet, p. 10.

There was an immoderation and fault in anger.—Hammond, Practical Catechism, II. § 6.

It may very well suit with the immoderations of the times.—Gregory, Notes on Scriptures, ch. xxvi.

Immodest. adj.

1. Wanting shame; wanting delicacy or chastity.

She railed at herself, that she should be so immodest to write to one that she knew would flout her.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 3.

So dangerous a thing is an ignorant and indiscreet preacher, and a bold, immodest auditor.—Dr. H. More, Conjectura Cubitalis, p. 225.

2. Uchaste; impure.

Immodest deeds you hinder to be wrought; But we proscribe the least immodest thought. Dryden.

3. Obscene.

'Tis needful that the most immodest word Be look'd upon, and learn'd; which, once attain'd, Your highestness knows, comes to no farther use But to be known and hated. Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 4.

Immodest words admit of no defence, For want of decency is want of sense. Lord Roscommon.

Immodestly. adv. In an immodest manner.

He would have us live soberly; . . . not wantonly, not immodestly, but devoutly.—Bishop Walton, Christian Maxims, viii. l. iii. b. 1574.

This these Corinthian women (conceiving themselves, when they prayed or prophesied in the church, to be acting the part of cho-priests, uttering oracles like the Pythia, or celebrating sacrifices as the Muses or Bacchae) were so fond as to imitate; and accordingly cast off their veils, and discovered their heads immodestly in the consecration; and thereby (as the apostle speaks) dishonoured their heads.—Mede, Diatribe, p. 220.

Immodesty. s.

1. Want of delicacy; impudence.

I beseech your grace to assist us: or else the immodesty of his competitor will bear down this most honest and bashful creature.—Lord Keeper Williams, Cato's, p. 91: 1624.

I am thereby led into an immorality of proclaiming another work, which I have long devoted to the service of my country.—Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie Wottonianae, p. 71.

The Paphian queen, With gored hand, and veil so rudely torn, Like terror did among the immortal breed, Taught by her wound that goddesses may bleed. Waller.

Immortalist. s. See extract.

This learning they had from the inhabitants by Ister, who were called Immortalists, because in the midst of all their dark notions of things, they saw this clearly, that virtuous and good men do not die, but their souls do go into blessed regions, &c.—Jeremy Taylor, Funeral Sermons, 332. (Ord MS.)

Immortality. s. Exemption from death; life never to end.

This corruptible must put on incorruption, and this mortal must put on immortality.—1 Corinthians, xv. 53.

If the immortality of souls proclaim'd, Whom th' oracle of men the wisest find. Sir J. Denham, Of the Arts, &c. iv.

When we know cogitation is the prime attribute of a spirit, we infer its immortality, and thence its immortality.—Watts.

Immortalize. v. a.

1. Make immortal; perpetuate; exempt from death.

Christ is risen from the grave, having conquered death by dying; and is ascended into the pure and peaceable habitations of glory: Therefore all his members, who are united to him in the inseparable bands of faith and love, shall feel the effects of his powerful life, in immortalizing their very bodies.—Hallstead, Sacred Method of Saving Human Souls, p. 103.

2. Exempt from oblivion.

Drive them from Orleans, and be immortalized.—Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. l. 2.

3. Keeps up; continues.

Revenge . . . by fresh returns of provocation brings in, what has in vain been attempted in nature, a kind of 'perpetual motion' in malice, and immortalizes quarrels and contentions.—Norris, On the Benefits of a p. 183.

Immortalize. v. n. Become immortal.

Muster not the want of issue among your greatest afflictions, as those do, that cry, Give me children, or else my name dies; the poorest way of immortalizing that can be, and as natural to a noble as a prince.—Adelphi, Advice to a Son, p. 70.

End all disputes, and fix the year previous, When British bands begin to immortalize.—Pope, Imitations of Horace, b. ii. ep. i.

Immortalized. s. Want of subjection, or mortification, of the passions and affections. Rare.

It mixes violence with industry, and fury with zeal, . . . and violence with desires, and immortalized in all the appetites and procreations of the soul.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 134: 1653.

Immotive. adj. Motionless.

They are all laid in the stillness of an immotive calm.—Pelham, Remembrance, 62. (Ord MS.)

Immovability. s. Incapability of being moved.

He affects an immovability of purpose which he is far from possessing.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Immovable. adj. Incapable of being moved.

We shall not question his removing the earth, when he finds an immovable base to place his engine upon.—Sir T. Browne.

How much happier is he, who, centring on himself, remains immovable, and smiles at the madness of the dance about him!—Dryden, Don Sebastian.

Immund. adj. [Lat. immundus.] Unclean. Rare.

Through their own nastiness and stultishness, immund, and sordid manner of life, they suffer their life to putrefy, and themselves to be choked up.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 81.

Immundicity. s. Uncleanness; impurity. Rare.

Nor is there any moral immundicity of a more dangerous imundation, than this of wanton discourses.—W. Montague, Decent Essays, pt. i. p. 138: 1618.

Immunity. s. [Fr. immunité; Lat. immunitas.]

1. Discharge from any obligation.

Of things harmless whatsoever there is, which the whole church doth observe, to argue for any man's immunity from observing the same, it were a point of most insolent madness.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

2. Privilege; exemption from onerous duties.

Granting great immunities to the commons, they presented so far as to entice Valerius to be proclaimed successor.—Sir P. Sidney.

Moreover Simon chose men and sent to king Demetrius, to the end he should give the land an immunity, because all that Tryphon did was to spoil.—1 Maccabees, xiii. 34.

3. Freedom.

Common apprehensions entertain the antipodal condition of Ireland, receiving only in that land an immunity from venemous creatures.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

But this annex'd condition of the crown, immunity from groves, you disown.—Dryden.

Immure. v. a. [Lat. murus: wall.] Enclose, confine, shut up, imprison within, or as within, walls.

Only, you ancient stones, these tender babes, Whom envy hath immured within your walls!—Shakespeare, Richard III. iv. 1.

Can you believe that man's all-knowing mind Can to a mortal body be confined? Though his foul foolish prison her immure On earth, she, when escap'd, is wise and pure.—Sir J. Denham, Of Old Age, pt. iv.

Immure. s. Wall; enclosure. Rare.

Their vow is made To ransack Troy; within whose strong immures The ravish'd Helen, Menelaus' queen, With wanton Paris sleeps.—Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, prologue.

Immusical. adj. Inharmonious; wanting proportion of sound: (Unmusical commoner).

● All sounds are either musical, which are ever equal, or immusical, which are ever unequal, as the voice in speaking, and whisperings.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

We consider the immusical note of all swans we ever beheld or heard of.—Sir T. Browne.

Immutability. s. Exemption from, or incapability of, change; invariableness; unchangeableness.

To shew unto the heirs of promise the immutability of his counsel.—Hebrews, vi. 17.

The immutability of God they strive unto, by working after one and the same manner.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Immutable. adj. [the in- negative.] Unchangeable; invariable; unalterable.

That by two immutable things, in which it was impossible for God to lie, we might have a strong consolation.—Hebrews, vi. 18.

Thy threatenings, Lord, as thine, thou may'st revoke

But if immutable and fix'd they stand, Continue still thyself to give the stroke, And let not foreign foes oppress thy land.—Dryden, Anna Mirabilis, ceter.

Immutably. adv. [the in- negative.] In an immutable manner.

His love is like his essence, immutably eternal.—Boyle.

Immution. s. [the in- not negative.] Change; alteration.

Lo, what delightful immutions On her soft flowing vest we contemplate.—Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 1, 23.

Strong and violent hath been the immution which sudden joy hath wrought in the body.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xxi.

Immuté. v. a. [the in- not negative.] Change; alter.

God can immediately immuté, change, corrupt, destroy, or annihilate whatsoever pleaseth His divine majesty.—Baldwin, Treatise of Angels, p. 106: 1613.

Imp. s. [see extracts from Tooke and Todd.]

1. Graft, scion, or sucker.

Boughs, branches, twigs, young imps, sprays, and buds.—Newton, Herbal to the Bible: 1587.

[Mr. Steevens needed not to have travelled to Wales, for that which he might have found at home. Our language has absolutely nothing from the Welsh. Imp is the past participle of the Saxon impan, to plant, to graft.—Morris Tooke, Diversions of Purse, p. 311.]

[Without stopping to notice here the sweeping assertion as to the Welsh language, which will be considered in another part of this dictionary, I may add that the German impfen, is also to graft; and that the earliest usage of our word, is in the sense of the shoot of a tree.—Todd.]

2. Son; offspring; progeny; youth.

That most noble imp, the prince's grace, your most dear son.—Lord Cromwell to King Henry VIII.

And thou, most drest imp of highest Jove, Fair Venus' soul.—Spranger, Fairies Queen.

That faire city, wherein make abode So many learned imps, that shoot abroad, And with their branches spread all Britany.—Thid.

The tender imp was weaned from the tent.—Pierfist.

Loath them as the most basely-begotten imps.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience.

Proving A toward imp, I call'd him home.—B. Jonson, Every Man in his Humour.

3. Subaltern; puny devil.

In this our age, the church of England is vexed with two horrible imps and messengers of our enemy Satan.—Anderson, Exposition upon Beccaficus, fol. 28, l. 1: 1573.

Much we deny not to be the imps and limbs of Satan.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Imp. v. a. [see extracts from Tooke and Todd, under Imp, s.]

1. Plant; graft; adopt.

Nothing is more dangerous than to be imp'd in a wicked family; this relation too often draws in a share both of guilt and punishment.—Bishop Hall, Jews and Jewsans. (Ord MS.)

2. Mend or improve us by a graft; splice: (applied in Falconry to the process of repairing the wing of a hawk when the quills are broken, by means of an adscititious feather).

If then we shall shake off our slavish yoke.

Imp out our drooping country's broken wings.—Shakespeare, Richard II. ii. 1.

This bird was hatched in the council of Lateran, fully plumed in the council of Trent, and now lately had her feathers imp'd by the modern casuists.—Bishop Hall, Old Religion, ch. xiii. § 1.

New rebellious raise Their hydra heads, and the false North displays Her broken league to imp their serpent-wings.—Milton, Sonnets, xv. 8.

Help, ye sat satyrista, to imp my rage With all the scorpions that should whip this age.—Churchyard.

With cord and canvas from rich Hambrugh sent, His navy's mottled wings he *imp*s once more.—Dryden, Anna Mirabilis, cxlii.

New creatures rise.

A moving mass at first, and short of thighs; Till shooting out with legs, and imp'd with wings, The grubs proceed to be with pointed stings.—Id., Translation of the Georgics, iv. 437.

The Mercury of heaven with silver wings Imp'd for the flight, to overtake his plume.—Southey.

Impacable. adj. [Lat. pacibilis, from pac, paco = pence.] Not to be softened or appeased.

Freely from hands of impacable fate, And power of death, they live for aye above.—Spenser, Rime of Time.

Impact. v. a. [Lat. impactus, from in + pango = frame, make, construct.] Drive close or hard.

They are angular; but of what particular figure is not easy to determine, because of their being impacted so thick and confusedly together.—Woodward, On Fossils.

Impact. s. Collision, with special reference to its result as a driving or moving power.

It was long thought, . . . (nor did Newton himself . . . contest the assumption, but eluded it by an arbitrary hypothesis,) that nothing (of a physical nature at least) could account for motion, except previous motion; the impulse or impact of some other body. It was very long before the scientific world could prevail upon itself to admit attraction and repulsion (i.e. spontaneous tendencies of particles to approach or recede from one another) as ultimate laws, no more requiring to be accounted for than impulse itself; if indeed the latter were not, in truth, resolvable into the former.—J. N. Mill, System of Logic.

Impaint, Impair, Impalement. See Enpaint, &c.*Impalpability. s. Character of that which is impalpable.

He [pope Gregory the Great] and Eutychius, the patriarch of Constantinople, had a curious dispute, whether the bodies of the righteous, after the resurrection, should be solid, or thinner than the air: Gregory was for the palpability, and Eutychius for the impalpability; and the dispute ended, as it is to be supposed, in a violent quarrel.—Justin, 6 marks on Ecclesiastical History, vol. iii. p. 170: ed. 1802.

Impalpable. adj.

1. Not to be perceived by touch.

If beaten into an impalpable powder, when poured out, it will cumulate a liquor, by reason that the smallness of the parts do make them easy to be put into motion.—Boyle.

2. Not coarse or gross.

His own religion from its simple and impalpable form was much less exposed to the ridicule of scenic exhibition.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 200.

Impánate. adj. [Lat. panis = bread.] Embodied in bread. Rare.

This speech meaneth not that the body of Christ is impánate.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, fol. 339.

Impánate. v. a. Embody with bread. Rare.

If the elements really contain such immense treasures, what need have we to look up to the natural body above? or what have we to do but to look down to those impánated vessels, to the elements embodied with all graces and virtues, and replenished with that very divinity which makes the humanity so considerable?—Waterhouse, Charge to the Rector, p. 61.

Impánation. s. Supposed sub-sistence of the body of Christ with the species of bread in the Lord's supper. Rare.

Forasmuch as he is joined to the bread but sacramentally, there followeth no impánation thereof; no more than the Holy Ghost is inseparable, that is to say, made of water, being sacramentally joined to the water in Baptism.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 304.

Some have imagined that our Lord's divinity becomes personally united with the elements, as well as with his own natural body, having in that sense two personal bodies. This conceit has sometimes gone under the name of 'assumption,' as it imports the body assuming the elements into a personal union; and sometimes it has been called impassation, a name following the analogy of the word 'incarnation.'—Waterland, Charge on the Sacrament, p. 34.

Impánel. See Empánel.

Impáradiso. v. a. [Italian, imparadisare.] Place as in Paradise; beautify: (Emparadise used by Donne).

Thus these two,
Imparadised in one another's arms,
The happier Eden, shall enjoy their fill
Of bliss on bliss. Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 506.

Impárralleled. part. pr. Unparalleled. Rare. That this dear price should be paid for a little wild mirth, or gross and corporal pleasure, is a thing of such unparalleled folly, that if there were not too many instances before us, it might seem incredible.—Bishop Burnet, Life of Lord Rochester, p. 108.

Impárradonable. adj. Unpardonable. Rare. Not that it is in its nature unpardonable.—South, Sermons, x. 323.

Impárrallable. adj. [Lat. par = equal; syllaba = syllable.] In Grammar. A term applied to certain inflections, and certain words having such inflections, wherein the number of syllables is increased; as Gr. οἶκος, οἰκουρος; Lat. lupis, lupulidit, opposed to vincet, victor, dominus, domini. See Parissyllabic.

Impárrity. s. [Lat. paritus, from par = equal.] 1. Inequality; disproportion.

Some bodies are hard, some soft: the hardness is caused chiefly by the jointness of the spirits, and their imparity with the tangible parts.—Bacon.

2. Oddness; indivisibility into equal parts. What verity is there in that numeral conceit, in the lateral division of man, by even and odd; and why parity or imparity of letters in men's names, to determine misfortune on either side of their bodies?—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

3. Difference in degree either of rank or excellence.

He, who by the hand of his holy Apostle, founded this church of Crete in Titus, and his elders in a meet and decent imparity and subordination, would maintain his own ordinance amongst us also.—Archbishop Bancroft, Sermons, p. 51.

Impárr, Impárrance. See Empárr, &c.

Impárrt. v. a. [N. Fr. imparter; Lat. impartio.]

1. Communicate; grant as to a partaker. I find thee knowing of thyself; Expressing well the spirit within thee free, My hunger, not imparted to the brute, Whose fellowship therefore unmeet for thee Good reason was thou freely shouldst dislike. Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 441.

2. Grant; give. High state and honours to others impart, But give me your heart. Dryden.

3. Make known; show by words or tokens. As in confession the revealing is for the ease of a man's heart, so secret men come to the knowledge of many things, while men rather discharge, than impart their minds.—Bacon.

Impárrial. adj. Free from partiality. Success I hope, and fate I cannot fear; Alive or dead, I shall deserve a name; Love is impartial, and to both the same. Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, x. 631.

Impárrialist. s. One who affects impartiality. I am professedly enough an impartialist.—Boyle, Style of Holy Scriptures, p. 76.

Impárriality. s. Equitableness; justice; indifference.

A pious and well disposed will gives not only diligence, but also impartiality to the understanding in its search into religion, which is absolutely necessary to give success unto our enquiries into truth; it being scarce possible for that man to hit the mark, whose eye is still glancing upon something beside it.—South, Sermons.

Impárriment. s. Communication of knowledge; disclosure. Rare. It becoms you to go away with it, As if it were impartiment did desire. Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 4.

Impárrable. adj. Not to be passed; not admitting passage; impervious. There are in America many high and impassable mountains, which are very rich.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Vol. I.

Impárrability. s. Exemption from suffering; insusceptibility of injury from external things.

These bodies of ours shall come out of their graves with all their parts entirely as they now are; altered indeed, I confess, in quality, in agility, in glory and splendour, in impassability.—Males, Golden Remains, p. 32.

Two divinites might have pleaded their prerogative of impassability, or at least not have been wounded by any mortal hand.—Dryden, Æneid, dedication.

Impárrable. adj. Incapable of suffering; exempt from the agency of external causes; exempt from pain.

This most pure part of the soul, and (as Aristotle sayeth) divine, impassable, and incorruptible, is named in Latin, 'Intellectus.' Sir T. Elgot, The Governour, fol. 201.

After Thy resurrection and knowledge of Thine impassable condition, it was not strange for them to talk of Thy kingdom.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations, The Crucifixion.

Secure of death I should contemn thy dart, Though naked, and impassable depart. Dryden.

Impárration, Impárrionate, Impárrioned. See Empassion, &c.

Impárrative. adj. Exempt from the agency of external causes.

[She] told him what those empty phantoms were. Forms without bodies, and impassive air. Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vi. 407.

Pale suns, unfelt at distance, roll away; And on the impassive ice the lightnings play. Pope.

Impárrate. v. See Empárrate.

Impárrible. adj. Incapable of suffering. Some have held that Jesus suffered, but Christ remained impassible.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors, 44. (Ord M.)

Impárrience. s. Intolerance of delay, pain, opposition, or the like.

All the power of his wit has given way to his impatience.—Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 6.

The experiment I resolved to make was upon thought, and not rashness or impatience.—Sir W. Temple.

The longer I continued in this scene, the greater was my impatience of retiring from it.—Bishop Hall.

Impárriciency. s. Same as Impatience.

Physicians, being over-ruled by their patient's impatience, are fain to try the best they can.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity, b. i. p. 8. (Ord M.)

Impárrient. adj. [Lat. patiens, -entis; pres. part. of pati = suffer; preterite part. passus; patientia.]

1. Not able to endure; incapable to bear: (with of). Fame, impatient of extremes, deays Not more by envy than excess of praise. Pope, Temple of Fame, 13.

2. Furious with pain; unable to bear pain. The tortured savage turns around And flings about his brain, impatient of the wound. Dryden.

3. Vehemently agitated by some painful passion: (with at). To be impatient at the death of a person, concerning whom it was certain he must die, is to mourn because thy friend was not born a monk.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercises of holy Living.

4. Hot; hasty. The impatient of man will not give himself time to be informed of the matter that lies before him. Addison, Spectator.

5. Eager; ardently desirous; not able to endure delay: (with for before the thing desired). The mighty Caesar waits his vital hour, Impatient for the world, and grasps his promised power. Dryden.

6. Not to be borne. Ay me! dear lady, which the youngs art Of rueful pity and impatient smart. Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 1. 11.

Impárrient. s. One who is not able to bear pain; one who is violently agitated by passion. I have heard and seen some ignorant impatient, when they have found themselves to smart with God's scourge, cast a sudden frown back upon him, with 'our me credit!'—Seatonian Sermons, p. 39.

Impárrionize, Impárrion. See Empárrionize, &c.

Impéach. v. a. [Fr. empêcher; see also Empéach.]

1. Hinder; impede. Obsolete.

His sons did impéach his journey to the Holy Land, and vexed him all the days of his life.—Sir J. Davies.

If they will impéach the purposes of an army, which they have no reason to think themselves able to resist, they put themselves out of all expectation of mercy.—Sir J. Hayward.

A declension of my throat impéach my utterance.—Howell.

2. Accuse by public authority.

They were both *impéach*ed by a house of commons.—Addison.

Great discussions were kindled between the nobles and commons on account of Coriolanus, whom the latter had *impéach*ed.—Strut.

3. Bring into question.

You do impéach your modesty too much, To leave the city and commit yourself Into the hands of one that loves you not. Shakespeare, Midsummer Night's Dream, ii. 2.

It is one of the most curious things in the history of metaphysics, that Reid, after *impéach*ing the method of Hume, follows the very same method himself.—Huckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. vi.

Impéach. s. Impachment. Rare.

Why, what an intricate impéach is this! If here you hear of him, here he would have been; if he were mad, he would not plead so coldly. Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, v. 1.

Impéachable. adj. Accusable; chargeable.

Had God omitted by positive laws to give religion to the world, the wisdom of his providence had been impéachable.—Gro.

Impéacher. s. One who impeaches.

Many of our fiercest impéachers would leave the delinquent to the merciful indulgence of a Saviour.—Dr H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Impéachment. s. Hindrance; impediment; obstruction.

Tell us what things, during your late continuance there, are most offensive, and the greatest impéachment to the good government thereof. Spencer, View of the State of Ireland.

Neither is this necessary of necessity any impéachment to Christian liberty, or ensuring of men's consciences. Bishop Sanderson.

Impéarl. See Empéarl.

Impeccability. s. Exemption from sin; exemption from failure.

It doth cause an everlasting impeccability.—Salted, Treatise of Angels, p. 234. 1013.

Infidelity and impeccability are two of his attributes. Pope.

The impeccability of the Bishop of Rome was not as yet an article of the Roman creed.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, ch. vi. b. iv.

Impeccable. adj. [Lat. pecco = sin.] Exempt from possibility of sin.

If we honour the man, must we hold his pen impeccable.—Bishop Hall, Honour of the married Clergy, p. 43.

Thou makest me man so acceptable, as that Thou makest him impeccable.—Donne, Devotions, p. 307.

That man pretends he never commits any act prohibited by the word of God, and then that were a rare charm to render him impeccable, or that is the means of consecrating every sin of his.—Hammond, On Fundamentals.

God is infallible, impeccable, and absolutely perfect.—Skilton, Deism Refuted, dialogue iv.

Impeccancy. s. Freedom from actual sin.

Holy spirits dignified, from their purity and impeccancy.—Waterhouse, Commentary on Fortescue, p. 218.

Impédis. v. a. [Lat. impedio; pass. part. impeditus.] Hinder; obstruct.

All the forces are mustered to impédis its passage. Dr H. More, Theory of Christian Fields.

The way is open, and no stop to forces. The stars return, or to impédis their course. Cæsar, Translation of Manilius.

However, he might call upon them not to impédis the descent of the Imperial troops from the Alps; those troops were not directed against their liberties, but came to maintain the liberties of the Church.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. iv.

Impédisible. adj. Capable of being impeded. Rare.

Every internal act is not in itself impédisible by outward violence.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Dabattianus, i. (Ord M.)

Impédisiment. s. [Lat. impedimentum.]

1. Obstruction to passage; as, a stake, or sharp instrument, to retard the progress of an enemy.

The children of Israel had prepared for war, and had shut up the passages of the hill country, and had fortified all the tops of the high hills, and had laid impediments in the campaign countries.—Judith, v. 1.

2. Hindrance; obstruction; opposition.

The minds of brutes grudge not at their bodies' comfort, nor are their senses letted from enjoying their objects: we have the impediments of honour, and the torments of conscience.—Sir P. Sidney.
The life is led most happily where in all virtue is exercised without impediment or let. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
Free from the impediments of light and noise, Man, thus retir'd, his nobler thoughts employs. Waller.

Impédiment. v. a. Obstruct; hinder. Rare.

Let Thucydides, out of hatred to his person, should have withstood and impedimented a general good.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xv.

Impédimental. adj. Hindering; causing obstruction.

The impedimental stain which intercepts her fruitive love. W. Montague, Devout Songs, pt. ii. p. 182: 1884.

Impédite. v. a. Retard; obstruct.

When diseases do not . . . impédite any faculty.—Maynwaring, Prose of Health, p. 25: 1676.

Impédite. adj. Obstructed.

Whereas our constitution is weak, our souls apt to diminution and impédite faculties, our bodies to mutilation and impurity, to blindness and crookedness, God hath in his infinite mercy provided for every condition rare emporities of comfort and usefulness.—Jeremy Taylor, Miracles of Divine Mercy. (Ord MS.)

Impéditive. adj. Causing hindrance; having power to obstruct.

There are other cases concerning things unlawful by accident, in respect to the evil effect of the same; to wit, as they may be impéditive of good, or causative, or at the least, (for we must use such words) occasionary of evil.—Bishop Sanderson, On Promissory Oaths, iii. § 11.

Impél. v. a. [Lat. impello.] Drive on towards a point; urge forward; press on.

No Myrrha's mind, impell'd on either side, Takes ev'ry bent, but cannot long abide. Dryden, Translation from Ovid.

A mightier pow'r the strong direction sends, And sever'd many impels to several ends. Pope, Essay on Man, ll. 105.

Impellent. s. Impulsive power; power that drives forward.

What do you mean by voluntary oaths?—Those that no other impellent but myself, or my own worldly gain or interest, extort from me.—Hammond, Practical Catechism, ll. § 8.

How much a variety of notions should be regularly managed, in such a wilderness of passages, by mere blind impellence as I material consequences, I have not the least conjecture.—Glennville.

Impeller. s. One that impels or urges forward.

As if he were the great impeller and inducer of men to sin.—South, Sermons, iv. 28, c.

Impend. v. n. [Lat. pendeo—hang.] Hang over; be at hand; press nearly.

Impendence. s. State of hanging over; near approach.

Good sometimes is not safe to be attempted, by reason of the impendence of a greater sensible evil.—Sir M. Hale.

Impendence. s. Impendence.

The present impendence of God's judgements.—Hammond, Works, iv. 402.

Impendent. adj. Imminent; hanging overpressing closely: (in an ill sense).

If the evil feared or impendent be a greater sensible evil than the good, it over-rides the appetite to aversion.—Sir M. Hale.

Dreadful in arms, on London's glorious plain Place Ormond's duke; impendent in the air Let his keen sabre, comet-like, appear. Prior.

Impending. part. adj. Impendent.

It expresses our deep sorrow for our past sins, and our lively sense of God's impending wrath.—Smalridge, Sermons.

Impenetrability. s. Incapability of being penetrated.

All bodies, so far as experience reaches, are either hard or may be hardened; and we have no other evidence of universal impenetrability, besides a large experience, without an experimental exception.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Imperceptible. adj.

1. Not to be pierced; not to be entered by any external force.

Nothing almost escaped that he achieved not, were the thing never an difficulty, or (as who saith) impenetrable.—Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, fol. 72. b.

2. Impervious; not admitting entrance.

Deep into some thick covert would I run, Impenetrable to the stars or sun. Dryden.

3. Not to be taught, informed, affected, or moved.

It is the most impenetrable ear That ever kept with men.—Let him alone; I'll follow him no more with hollow prayers. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, iii. 3.

Some will never believe a proposition in divinity, if any thing can be said against it; they will be credulous in all affairs of life, but impenetrable by a sermon of the gospel.—Jeremy Taylor.

Impénitence. s. Olduracy; want of remorse for crimes; final disregard of God's threatenings or mercy.

Where one man ever comes to repent, a thousand end their days in final impénitence.—South, Sermons.

He will advance from one degree of wickedness and impénitence to another, till at last he becomes hardened without remorse.—Boyers.

Impénitency. s. Impénitence.

Before the revelation of the gospel the wickedness and impénitency of the heathens was a much more execrable thing, because they were in a great measure ignorant of the rewards of another life.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Impénitent. adj. Finally negligent of the duty of repentance; obdurate.

Our Lord in anger hath granted some impénitent men's requests; as, on the other side, the Apostle's suit he hath of favour and mercy not granted.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Impénitent. s. One who neglects the duty of repentance.

When the reward of penitents and punishment of impénitents is once assented to as true, 'tis impossible but the mind of man should wish for the one, and have dislikes to the other.—Hammond.

Impénissous. adj. [Lat. impennis—wingless; penna—wing.] Wanting wings. Rare.

It is generally received an earwig hath no wings, and is reckoned amongst impénissous insects; but he that shall with a needle put aside the short and sheathy cases on their back, may draw forth two wings, larger than in many flies.—Sir T. Browne.

Impeéple. s. See Empeéple.

Imperate. adj. [Lat. imperatus, pass. part. of impero—command.] Done by order; with consciousness; by direction of the mind. Rare.

The elicit internal acts of any habit may be quick and vigorous, when the external imperate acts of the same habit utterly cease.—South, Sermons.

Those natural and involuntary actions are not done by deliberation, yet they are done by the energy of the soul and instrumentality of the spirits, as well as those imperate acts, wherein we see the empire of the soul.—Sir M. Hale.

Imperative. adj.

1. Commanding; expressive of command.

He therefore instead of using an imperative style, by downright commanding such and such things, chose rather in a more gentle and condescending way to insinuate what was his will and our duty.—Norris, On the Hostilities, p. 230.

2. In Grammar. Term applied to the mood in which a command is conveyed, as Walk! Look! &c.: (used, also, substantively, as, 'the imperative'—the imperative mood).

The verb is formed in a different manner, to signify the intention of commanding, forbidding, allowing, disallowing, intrating; which likewise, from the principal use of it, is called the imperative mood.—Clarke, Latin Grammar.

Imperatorial. adj. [Lat. imperator—commander; whence emperor.] Commanding.

Moses delivered his law after an imperatorial way, by saying, Thou shalt not do this, and Thou shalt not do that.—Norris, On the Hostilities, p. 230.

Imperceptible. adj. Not to be discovered; not to be perceived; small; subtle; quick or slow, so as to elude observation.

Some things are in their nature imperceptible by our sense; yea, and the more refined parts of material existence, which, by reason of their subtilty, escape our perception.—Sir M. Hale.

The parts must have their outlines in waves, resembling flames, or the gliding of a snake upon the ground: they must be almost imperceptible to the touch, and even.—Dryden.

Imperceptible. s. That which is not immediately perceived or discovered, on account of its smallness.

Microscopes bring to light shoals of living creatures in a spoonful of vinegar, &c. . . I should be wonderfully pleased to see a natural history of imperceptibles, containing a true account of such vegetables and animals as grow and live out of sight.—Tatler, no. 119.

Imperceptible. adj. Not perceiving; not having the power of perception.

There is no supposing the soul to be imperceptible in sleep, but by supposing the perceptivity of it to depend upon matter, which I have shown in many places of this section to be a contradiction; or by supposing that it sleeps in its own nature.—A. Baxter, Enquiry into the Nature of the Human Soul, i. 340.

Imperdible. adj. [Lat. perdo—lose.] Not to be destroyed, or lost.

As they are harder in their acquisition, so are they more imperdible and steady in their stay.—Felltham, Sermon on Ecclesiastes, ii. 11.

Imperfect. adj. Not complete; not absolutely finished; defective.

Opinion is a light, vain, crude, and imperfect thing, settled in the imagination; but never arriving at the understanding, there to obtain the tincture of reason.—R. Jonson.

The still-born sounds upon the palate hung, And died imperfect on the faltering tongue. Dryden.

As obscure and imperfect ideas often involve our reason, so do dubious words puzzle men.—Locke.

Imperfect. v. a. Make imperfect. Rare.

Time, which perfects some things, imperfects also others.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, ii. 24.

Imperfection. s. Defect; failure; fault, whether physical or moral, whether of persons or things.

Laws, as all other things human, are many times full of imperfection; and that which is supposed beloved of unto men, proveth oftentimes most pernicious.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The world is more apt to censure than applaud, and himself fuller of imperfections than virtues.—Addison, Spectator.

Imperfectness. s. Attribute suggested by Imperfect.

Their authority, joined to the knowledge of my own imperfection in the language, over-ruled me.—Pope, Letter to Mr. Bridges, cited by Dr. Warton.

Imperforate. adj. [Lat. perforatus—bored through.] Not pierced through; without a hole through.

Sometimes children are born imperforate; in which case a small puncture, dressed with a tent, effects the cure.—Sharp, Surgery.

Imperforated. part. pres. Wanting any opening usually present.

It imperforates sometimes in imperforated persons.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours, vii. 16.

Imperial. adj. [Fr. impérial; Lat. imperiális; imperium—command; impero—to command.]

1. Royal; possessing royalty.

Aim he took At a fair vernal, thrived in the west; But I might see young Cupid's fiery shaft Quench'd in the chaste beams of the watery moon. And the imperial vot'ress pass'd on In maiden meditation, fancy free. Shakespeare, Midsummer-Night's Dream, ii. 2.

2. Betokening royalty; marking sovereignty.

My dun from thee 'tis this imperial crown, Which, as immediate from thy place and blood, Derives itself to me. Shakespeare, Henry IV, Part II, iv. 4.

3. Belonging to an emperor or monarch; regal; royal; monarchical.

The main body of the marching foe Against the imperial palace is design'd. To tame the proud, the fetter'd slave to free, These are imperial arts, and worthy thee. Dryden.
Id., Translation of the Aeneid, vi. 1176.

Imperialism. s. System or state of imperial government.

Roman imperialism had divided the world into master and slave.—C. H. Pearson, The Early and Middle Ages of England, ch. xxiv.

Imperialist. s. One that belongs to an emperor's party.

The imperialists imputed the cause of so shameful a flight unto the Venetians.—Knutler, History of the Turks.

Imperialis. v. a. Invest with imperial character, or with the character of an emperor.

Imperialized, adj. Invested with an imperial character, or character of an emperor.

The Romanists cast away the witness of all imperialized authors then living.—Fallor, Holy War, p. 160.

Imperialty, s. Imperial power.

Which seventh cannot be your papacy; it must then of necessity, by a short Roman imperialty or empire, which followed upon the destruction of the sixth.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 165: 1616.

Imperial v. a. Endanger. See Emperil.

Roman George III. detected the French, of whom he knew as much as he knew of the inhabitants of Kautchaka or of Tibet, Pitt, contrary to his own judgment, engaged in a war with France by which England was seriously imperilled, and the English people burdened with a debt that their remotest posterity will be unable to pay. Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. i. ch. vii.

To the profound views of Hume respecting causation, he gravely objects, that if they were carried into effect, the operation of criminal law would be imperilled.—Ibid., vol. ii. ch. vi.

Imperious, adj.

1. Commanding; tyrannical; authoritative; haughty; arrogant; assuming command.

If it be your proud will

To show the power of your imperious eyes.

Spenser

This imperious man will work us all
From princes into pages.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII., ii. 2.

He is an imperious dictator of the principles of vice, and imputation of all contradiction. Dr. H. More, Divine Dialogues.

How much I suffer'd, and how long I strove
Against the assaults of this imperious love!

Dryden

Recollect what disorder hasty or imperious words from parents or teachers have caused in his thoughts.

—Locke.

2. Powerful; ascendant; overbearing.

A man, by a vast and imperious mind, and a heart large as the sand upon the sea shore, could command all the knowledge of nature and art.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Imperiously, adv. In an imperious manner; with arrogance of command; with insolence of authority.

Who can abide, that, against their own doctors, six whole books should, by their fatherhoods of Trent, be under pain of a curse, imperiously obtruded upon God and his church.—Bishop Hall.

It is not to insult and dominate, to look disdainfully, and revile imperiously, that procures a return from any one.—South, Sermons.

Imperiousness, s. Attribute suggested by imperious.

1. Authority; air of command.

So would he use his imperiousness, that we had a delightful fear and awe, which made us loth to lose our hopes.—Sir P. Sidney.

2. Arrogance of command.

Imperiousness and severity is but an ill way of treating men, who have reason of their own to guide them.—Locke.

Imperishable, adj. Incapability of perishing.

Devotion offers to transfigure our affections, from their impure and passive shapes, into immutable and imperishable forms; and raise them up from infirmity to virtue; and make those desires, which have been the image of terrestrial things, to bear only that of the celestial.—W. Montague, De-wout Essay, pt. i. p. 37: 1648.

We find this our empyreal form

Incapable of mortal injury,

Imperishable; and though pierc'd with wound,

Soon closing, and by native vigour heal'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 423.

Impermanence, s. Want of duration; instability.

Melancholy impermanence of human blessings.—Seward, Letters, iv. 226: 1794.

Impermanency, s. Same as impermanence.

Meddling, out of the serious contemplation of the mutability of all worldly happiness, a remedy against the evil of that fickleness and impermanency.—W. Montague, De-wout Essay, pt. i. p. 58: 1648.

Impermeability, s. State or quality of being impermeable.

Concerning the impermeability of glass by electricity.—Philosophical Transactions, vol. ii. p. 313.

Impermeable, adj. That may not be passed through.

Lands that have a retentive or impermeable soil, should be differently constituted from those that have one less retentive or more permeable.—Kitchin, On Manures, p. 84.

Impermeable, or Impermutable, adj.

[Lat. muta, permuto = change.] Incapable of being changed.

We see this apply to bea impermutable, that who soo will apply hym self to gether roots, shall sum-tyme write with sweete liquorous, and other whiche with some cackle.—Bacon, Translation of P. Martyr, 144. (Ord MS.)

Impersonal, adj.

1. Wanting personality.

2. In Grammar. Not varied according to the persons: (often postpositive, as, 'verba impersonal'; often, too, substantival).

Methodists—'it seems to me,' where there is no pronoun to precede it, is our typical impersonal verb.—Dr. R. G. Latham, English Language.

Impersonality, s. Indistinction of personality.

Junius is pleased to tell me, that he addresses himself to me personally. I shall be glad to see him. It is his impersonality that I complain of.—Letters of Junius, Sir W. Draper.

Impersonate, v. a.

1. Personify; embody as a person.

The Egyptians, who impersonated nature, had made her a distinct principle, and even deified her under the name of Isis.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 28.

The masques and pageants of the age of Elizabeth were not only furnished by the heathen divinities, but often by the virtues and vices impersonated.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 408.

Some of these masques were moral dramas, where the virtues and vices were impersonated.—Hurd, Dialogues.

Whether from righteous indignation or malignity, from moral earnestness or jealousy and hatred of authority, whether its inspiration was holy and generous or morbid and envious, or, as in most human things, from mingling and contradictory passions, the monkish Latin satire maintained its unreluctant protest against the Church. The Satirists impersonated a kind of bold reckless antagonism against Rome and the hierarchy, confounding together in their Godwin, as Rabelais in later days, solemnity and buffoonery, pedantic learning and vulgar humour, a profound respect for sacred things and freedom of invective against sacred persons.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. iv.

2. Represent by an impersonation: (this is the better sense).

States are not ordinarily invested with definite responsibilities for other states, although it be nevertheless true that they may sometimes arise. But with respect to the diffusion of religion throughout the body of the nation which it impersonates, this is in the view of reason, a part of the primary law of its self-preservation and self-improvement. . . . Impersonating and representing them, it receives much of its colour from them, and reciprocally imparts it. Gliddons, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. ii.

His age acknowledged Benedict as the perfect type of the highest religion, and Benedict impersonated his age.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. iii. ch. vi.

Impersonation, s. Representative personality, or personification.

In kind of public marriage each party enters in full to the other all which it had previously possessed; in natural consequence the secular arm would come to be entirely and almost entirely at the disposal of the Church; and offences against the latter would be held as commensurate crimes against the former, by virtue of their reciprocal impersonation.—Gliddons, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. vii.

The persons of Mr. Godwin's numerous stranger still are the naked creations of the same intellectual power, marvellously endowed with galvanic life. Though with happier symmetry, they are as much made out of chains and links of reasoning, as the monster was fashioned by the chemistry of the student, in the celebrated novel of his gifted daughter. Falkland and Caleb Williams are the more impersonations of the unbounded love of reputation, and irresistible curiosity.—Talfourd, Memoirs of Lamb.

Imperspicuity, s. Want of clearness or perspicuity.

Either very long, or very short, periods are subject to obscurity; one not opening and spreading the matter enough; the other overburdening the auditor's memory. Yet whose will not see the sentence and elegance in the one, or suffer the dismembering in the other, must in some things hazard the imperspicuity of his style.—Instructions for Oratory, p. 88: Oxford, 1682.

Impersuadable, adj. Not to be moved by persuasion.

Every pious person ought to be a Nonch, a preacher of righteousness; and if he be his fortune to have an impersuadable an auditor, if he cannot avert the deluge, it will yet deliver his own soul.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Impertinence, s. Impertinent character; anything so characterized.

We should avoid the vexation and impertinence of pedants, who affect to talk in a language not to be understood.—Swift.

Impertinency, s. Same as Impertinence.

1. That which is of no present weight; that which has no relation to the matter in hand; something not belonging to the subject.

Some though they lead a single life, yet their thoughts do end with themselves, and account future times impertinencies.—Bacon.

O matter and impertinency mix'd,
Reason and madness! Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 6.

2. Trifle; thing of no value.

I envy your felicity, delivered from the gilded impertinencies of life, to enjoy the moments of a solid contentment.—Keigh.

Nothing is more easy than to represent an impertinency as a part of learning, that have no immediate relation to the happiness or convenience of mankind.—Addison.

There are many subtle impertinencies learnt in the schools, and many painful trifles, even among the mathematical theorems and problems.—Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

3. Troublesome; intrusion.

It will be said I handle an art no way suitable to my employments or fortune, and so stand charged with intrusion and impertinency.—Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

4. Sauciness; rudeness.

It often happens in public assemblies, that a party who came thither together, or whose impertinency was of an equal pitch, act in concert, and are so full of themselves as to give disturbance to all that are about them. Sometimes you have a set of whisperers, who lay their heads together in order to sacrifice every body within their observation; sometimes a set of laughers, that keep up an insipid mirth in their own corner, and by their noise and gestures show they have no respect for the rest of company. Spectator, no. 168.

Impertinent, adj. [Lat. pertinens, -entis, pres. part. of pertinere = bend or hold on to anything (as a road); belong to anything.]

1. Of no relation to the matter in hand; of no weight.

The law of angels we cannot judge altogether impertinent into the affairs of the church of God.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The contemplation of things that are impertinent to us, and do not concern us, are but a more specious idleness.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Importunate; intrusive; meddling.

That spear directed by an impertinent malice, which opened his side, though it brought forth blood and water, caused no dolorous sensation; because the body was then dead.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. iv.

3. Foolish; trifling; negligent of the present purpose.

'Tis not a sign two lovers are together, when they can be so impertinent as to enquire what the world does.—Love.

4. Rude; unmannerly.

The ladies, whom you visit think a wiser man the most impertinent creature living; therefore you cannot be offended that they are displeased with you.—Spectator, no. 148.

Impertinent, s. Impertinent person.

Governours would have enough to do to trouble their heads with the politicks of every meddling officious impertinent.—Sir R. L. Knollys, Fables.

There are another kind of impertinents, which a man is perplexed with in mixed company; and these are your loud speakers.—Spectator, no. 148.

Impertinently, adv. In an impertinent manner.

I call not impertinently to mind, that one of my time had wit enough in Venice to become the civil head of that republic.—Sir H. Wotton, Survey of Education.

Imperturbable, adj. [Lat. perturbo; pass. part. perturbatus = disturb.] Incapable of being disturbed or disconcerted.

All this was done with imperturbable gravity.—B. Disraeli, Coningsby.

Imperturbation, s. Calmness; tranquillity; freedom from perturbation.

In our copying of this equality and imperturbability, we must profess with the Apostle, we have not received the spirit of the world, but the spirit which is of God.—W. Montague, De-wout Essay, pt. i. p. 348: 1648.

To propose the acquisition of a complete knowledge of all things in this life, of an absolute imper-

Impervious. adj. [Lat. impervius.] Unpassable; impenetrable.

Let the difficulty of passing back
May his return, perhaps, over this gulf
Impervious, impervious; let us try
To find a path from hell to that new world.

A great many vessels are, in this state, impervious to the fluids. — Arbuthnot.
From the damp earth impervious vapours rise,
Increase the darkness, and involve the skies. — Pope.

Impetrability. s. Impossibility to be passed through.

I willingly declined those many ingenious reasons given by others; as of the impetrability of eternity, and impossibility therein to attain to the present limit of antecedent ages. — Sir M. Hale.

Impetigo. s. [Lat. Impetigo, with the derivative impetiginous, as 'An impetiginous eruption.' Skin disease so called;
tetter.

Impetrate. v. a. Obtain by entreaty.
He hath impetrated reconciliation. — Parr, Life and Letters of Archbishop Usher, let. xxiii. p. 50.
Impetrating this of God, that this penitential satisfaction may be so much blessed, as to restore some value of time thither, where I am to account for so much idle dissipation of it. — W. Mountague,
Devout Essays, p. i. preface.

Impetrate. part. adj. Obtained by application or entreaty.

The one might be as easily impetrated as the other. — Lord Herbert of Chesham, History of Henry VIII. p. 227.

Impetration. s. [Lat. impetretio, pass. part.
impetratus; impetratio, -onis.] Application pertaining of the nature of a demand;
obtaining of anything thereby.

The said cardinal did not know the impetration of the said bulls to have been to the contempt and prejudice of the king. — Lord Herbert of Chesham,
History of Henry VIII. p. 241.

Application and impetration, in this matter we have in hand, are of equal extent. — Archbishop Usher, letter xxiii.

The impetration of some favour. — W. Mountague,
Devout Essays, pt. i. preface.

The blessed sacrament is the mystery of the death of Christ, and the application of his blood which was shed for the remission of sins, and is the great means of impetration, and the meritorious cause of
it. — Jeremy Taylor.

Impetrate. adj. Able to obtain by entreaty. Rare.

O Saviour, Thy prayers, which were most perfect and impetrate, are they by which our weak and unworthy prayers receive both life and glory. —
Bishop Hall, Contemplations, b. iv.

Impetratory. adj. Beacching; obtaining by entreaty. Rare.

Alms are therefore effective to the abolition and pardon of our sins, because they are preparatory to and impetratory of the grace of repentance, and are fruits of repentance. — Jeremy Taylor, Rules and Exercises of holy Living.

Impetuosity. s. Violence; fury; vehemence;
force.

I will set upon Aguecheek a notable report of valour, and drive the gentleman into a most hideous opinion of his rage, skill, fury, and impetuosity. —
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

The weapons of the mountain are those of mere nature: audacity and impetuosity which may become ferocity, as of men complete in their determination, in their conviction; nay, of men, in some cases, who as Septemberers must either prevail or perish. — Carlyle, The French Revolution, pt. iii.
b. iii. ch. ii.

Impetuous. adj.

1. Violent; forcible; fierce.
Their virtue, like their Tiber's flood,
Rolling its course, design'd their country's good;
But off the torrent's too impetuous speed,
From the low earth tore some polluted weed.
Prior, Carmen Seculare for 1700.

2. Vehement of mind; passionate.
The king, 'tis true, is noble, but impetuous.

Impetuously. adv. In an impetuous manner; violently; vehemently: (both of men and things).

Impetuous of the wrong, impetuously he raves.
Drayton, Polyolbion, song i.
He would be . . . dissolutely wanton, impetuously
self-willed. — Bishop Hall, Of Contentation, § 22.

Impetuousness. s. Violence; fury; vehemence of passion.

I wish all words of rage might vanish in that breath that utters them; that as they resemble the wind in fury and impetuousness, so they might in transiency. — Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Impetus. s. [Lat.] Violent tendency to any point; violent effort.

Why did not they continue their descent till they were contiguous to the sun, whither both mutual attraction and impetus carried them? — Hentley,
Sermons.

Under a government of legitimacy, the presumption is far rather in favour of institutions of a popular origin—and in a democracy, in favour of arrangement tending to check the impetus of popular will. — Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. vi.

The impetus which they communicated, survived their own day, and, like all great movements, was felt in every department of thought. — Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. vi.

Impicture, Impictore. See Empicture, &c.

Impierceable. adj. [the in- negative.] Incapable of being pierced. Rare.

Exceeding rage inflam'd the furious beast; . . .
For never felt his impierceable breast
So wondrous force from hand of living wight.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Naut did not lend David so impierceable an armour, when he should encounter Goliath, as David now lent him in this plea of his unction. — Bishop Hall, Saint in Jewels Care.

Impiety. s. Want of piety.

1. Irreverence to the Supreme Being; contempt of the duties of religion.

To keep that oath were more impiety
Than Jephthah's, when he sacrific'd his daughter.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. v. 1.

2. Act of wickedness; expression of irreligion: (in this sense it has a plural).

If they die unprovided, no more is the king guilty of those impieties for which they are now visited. —
Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 1.

Where shall I first complain? can mighty Jove
Or Juno such impieties approve?

Sir J. Denham, Pamion of Dido.

We have a melancholy prospect of the state of our religion: such amazing impieties can be equalled by nothing but by those cities consumed of old by fire. — Swift.

Impignorate. v. a. [Lat. pignus, pignoris = pledge.] Pledge; pawn.

The islands (Orkney and Shetland) were then impignored to England. . . . They were originally Danish possessions. — Laing, Residence in Norway.

Impingo. v. n. [Lat. impingo.] Fall against;
strike against; clash with.

Things are reserved in the memory by some corporal exuvia and material images, which, having impinged on the common sense, rebound thence into some vacant cells of the brain. — Glanville,
Securus Britannicus.

The cause of reflection is not the impinging of light on the solid or impervious parts of bodies. —
Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Impinguate. v. a. [Lat. pinguis = fat.]
Fatten; make fat. Rare.

Frictions also do move all and impinguate the body than exercise; for that in frictions the inward parts are at rest. — Bacon.

Impious. adj. [Lat. impius.] Irreligious;
wicked; profane; without reverence for religion.

That Scripture standeth not the church of God in any strid to direct, but may be left pass as needless to be consulted with, we judge it profane, impious, and irreligious to think. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Shame and reproof is generally the portion of the impious and irreligious. — South, Sermons.
When vice prevails, and impious men bear sway,
The post of honour is a private station.

Since after thee may rise an impious line,
Coarse mangers of the human face divine:
Paint on, till life dissolve thy mortal part,
And live and die the monarch of thy art.

They, impious, dare'd to pray
On herds devoted to the god of day.

Pope.
Impish. adj. Having the character of an imp.

The boy put on an impish look. — Sir E. B. Ligon,
Eugene Aram.

Impiaceous. s. Inexorableness; irrecu-citable enmity; unappeasable malice.

What calamity happened to that most noble title of Rome by the impiaceous or wrath insatiable of these two captives! — Sir T. Blyot, The Governor, fol. 101.

The powder project . . . with fury and impia-

city came to be resolved on by a pack of hontefous. — Proceedings against Garnet, D d. 2: 160.

Implacable. adj.
1. Not to be pacified; inexorable; malicious; constant in enmity.

His incensement is so implacable, that satisfaction can be none but by pangs of death. — Shakespeare,
Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Darsh bears a generous mind;
But to implacable revenge inclin'd;
A bounteous master, but a deadly foe. — Dryden.
The French are the most implacable and the most dangerous enemies of the British nation. —
Addison.

2. Admitting no relief or ease; not to be assured.

Their armour help'd their harm, crush'd in and crush'd
Into their substance pent, which wrought them pain
Implacable, and many a dolorous groan.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vl. 666.

Accented implacable.
O how I burn with implacable tyro!

Spenser, Faerie Queen, li. 4. 41.

With scorching heat of implacable fire.

Brewer, Comedy of Lingua, v. 15.

Implant. v. a. Infix; insert; place; engraft; settle; set; sow.

How can you him unworthy then decree,
In whose chief part your worths implanted be?

Sir P. Sidney.
No need of public sanctions this to bind,
Which Nature has implanted in the mind. — Dryden.

Implantation. s. Act of setting or planting;
fixation; insertion.

This [is] more especially by the expressed way of incision or implantation. — Sir T. Browne, Miscel-lanies, p. 48.

Implausible. adj. Not specious; not likely to seduce or persuade.

No improbable, no implausible means for accomplishing so great effects. — Barnes, Works, i. 343.

Nothing can better improve political schoolboys than the art of making plausible or implausible harangues against the very opinion for which they resolve to determine. — Swift.

Implacated. part. adj. See Emplacated.

By this excellent institution, four military tenants of the county or neighbourhood elected twelve others from the district, who were to declare upon oath with whom the implacated property lay. — *C. H.
Pearson*, The early and middle Ages of England,
ch. xxxiii.

Implacator. s. One who indicts another;
accuser.

The Gombette law, which was instituted by Gondeband, king of Burgundy in the year 501, allowed the expedient of dwelling to these implacators, whom the administered call to offenders did not sufficiently satisfy for as obtaining of their resigned and voluntary acquittance from the cause complained of. —
History of Switzerland, p. 3.

Implensing. adj. Unpleasing. Rare.

A melancholy man is a stranger from the drove:
one that nature made sociable, because who made him man; and a crazed disposition hath altered;
implensing to all, as all to him. — Sir T. Overbury,
Characteristicks, sign. (1, 5 b: 1657).

Implement. s. [Lat. implementum, from impleo = fill, pass. part. impletus; impletio,
-onis.] Obsolete.

1. Something that fills up vacancy, or supplies wants.

Unto life many implements are necessary; more, if we seek such a life as hath in it joy, comfort, delight, and pleasure. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Instrument of manufacture; tools of a trade; vessels of a kitchen.

Wood hath coined seventeen thousand pounds, and hath his tools and implements to coin six times
as much. — Swift.

Implément. s. Act of filling; state of being full.

Theophrastus conceiveth, upon a plentiful impletion, there may succeed a disruption of the matrix. — Sir T. Browne.

Implex. adj. [Lat. implexus.] Intricate; entangled; complicated; complex: (this latter being the true opposite to Simple).

Every poem is, according to Aristotle's division, either simple or implex: it is called simple when there is no change of fortune in it; implex, when the fortune of the chief actor changes from bad to good, or from good to bad. — Addison, Spectator,
no. 257.

Implacate. v. a. [Lat. implacatus, pass. part.

of implico: plic = a fold; Fr. impliquer.] Entangle; embarrass; involve; infold.

The ingredients of saltpetre do so mutually implicate and hinder each other, that the concrete acts but very languidly.—Boyle.

Implication. s.

1. Involvement; entanglement.

Three principal causes of firmness are the grossness, the quiet contact, and the implication of component parts.—Boyle.

2. Inference not expressed, but tacitly inculcated.

Though civil causes, according to some men, are of less moment than criminal, yet the doctors are, by implication, of a different opinion.—Aylife, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Implicatively. adv. By implication.

In revealing the confession of these men, it is implicatively granted, their fault was not then to be punished, and so it appears no fault.—Sir G. Buck, History of Richard III. p. 103: 1818.

Implicit. adj.

1. Entangled; infolded; complicated. Latinitism.

The humble shrub,
And bush with frizzled hair implicit,
Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 323.

2. Inferred; tacitly comprised or involved in something else; not expressed: (opposed to Explicit).

In the first establishments of speech there was an implicit compact, founded upon common consent, that such and such words should be signs, whereby they would express their thoughts one to another.—South, Sermons.

In the following the meaning is, perhaps, meant to be equivocal; being both entangled, and involving implication in the logical sense of the term.

Many of them [periods] together, if without connections, are but implicit argumentation at most.—Instructions for Orators, Oxford, p. 37: 1823.

3. Mixed up with, and resting upon another; connected with another over which that which is connected to it has no power; trusting without reserve or examination.

There be false peace or unities, when the peace is grounded but upon an implicit ignorance; for all colours will agree in the dark.—Bacon.

No longer by implicit faith we err,
Whilst every man's his own interpreter.

Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning.
By implicit credulity, I may believe a letter yet not opened, when I am confident of the writer's veracity.—Johnson.

Implicitly. adv. In an implicit manner.

The divine inspection into the affairs of the world doth necessarily follow from the nature and being of God; and he that denies this, doth implicitly deny his existence; he may acknowledge what he will with his mouth, but in his heart he hath said there is no God.—Hooker.

My blushing mace with conscious fear retires,
And whom they like, implicitly admires.
Rowe, Common.

Implicitly. adj. As implied.

These informers, in this frontispiece before their several suggestions, implicitly undertake to make good three assertions.—Bishop Mountain, Appeal to Caesar, p. 1: 1825.

Implorent. s. Supplication. See Implore.

This implorent and worship is holy.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 250.

The three points, wherein they did pretend to have prevented his majesty's former implorent of their concurrence.—Sir H. Wotton, Remains, Disputed in 1622, p. 161.

Implore. v. a. [Fr. implorer; Lat. imploro; ploro = weep.] Call upon in supplication; solicit, ask, beg with a mixture of earnestness, importunity, and humility.

Do not say 'tis superstition, that
I kneel, and then implore her blessing.

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 3.

Implore. s. Act of importunate and humble

begging, intreaty, or solicitation. Rare.

With piercing words and pitiful implore,
Him hasty to arise.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Imply, Implicate. See Employ, &c.

Imply. v. a. [Fr. impliquer; Lat. implico; plico = fold.]

1. Infold; cover; entangle. Obsolete.

His courage stout,
Striving to loose the knot that fast him ties,
Himself in straiter bonds too rash implic.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

And Phoebus flying so most shameful sight,
His blushing face in foggy cloud implic.

2. Involve or comprise as a consequence or concomitant.

That it was in use among the Greeks, the word trichium implic.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

What follows next is no objection; for that implic a fault.—Hooker.

How the strength of bravery arms implic,
Emblems of valour, and of victory. Id.
Where a malicious act is proved, a malicious intention is implic.—Bishop Sherlock.

Impocket, Impoison. See Empocket, &c.

Impolarly. adv. Not according to the direction of the poles. Rare.

Being impolarly adjusted unto a more vigorous lodestone, it will, in a short time, exchange its poles.—Sir T. Browne.

Impolicy. s. Want of policy; imprudence; indiscretion; want of forecast.

The schemes of Providence and nature are too deeply laid to be overthrown by man's impolicy.—Bishop Morley, Sermons: 1783.

Impolished. adj. Unpolished; rude. Rare.

The lofty phrase... could not be followed nor sufficiently expressed in our rude and impolished English language.—T. Hudson, Dedication of his History of Judith: 1821.

Impolite. adj. Not polite; rude. Rare.

I never saw such impolite confusion at any country wedding in Britain.—Drammond, Travels (lett. iii: 1744), p. 76.

Impoliteness. s. Want of politeness. Rare.

The impoliteness of his manners seemed to attest his sincerity.—Lord Chesterfield.

Testacea, for instance, kept me the other night two or three hours beyond my usual time of supper, while she was fretting because Mr. . . did not come home, till the system were all spoiled, rather than she would be guilty of the impoliteness of teaching me in his absence. Lamb, Essays of Elia, A Bachelor's Complaint of the Behaviour of Married People.

Impolitic. adj. Imprudent; indiscreet; void of art or forecast.

He that exhorteth to beware of an enemy's policy, doth not give counsel to be impolitic; but rather to use all prudent foresight and circumspection, lest our simplicity be over-reach'd by cunning slights.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Impolitely. adv. In an impolitic manner.

In the pursuits of their own remedies, they do it impolitely.—Baron, Reports in Parliament, 5 Jacobi.

Imponderable. adj. [Lat. pondus, -eris = weight.] Incapable of being weighed;

wanting weight (actually or approximately). Applied in Physics to Light, Heat, and the Electric force, when considered as substances. These may be called the imponderables, the construction being substantival.

The influence of the imponderables has been less carefully calculated.—Turner, Chemistry.

Imponderous. adj. Void of perceptible weight.

It produces visible and real effects by imponderous and invisible emissions.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Imporosity. s. Absence of pores or interstices; compactness; closeness.

The porosity or imporosity betwixt the tangible parts, and the greatness or smallness of the pores.—Bacon.

Imporous. adj. Free from pores; free from vacuities or interstices; close of texture; completely solid. Rare.

It has its earthly and salinuous parts so exactly resolved, that its body is left imporous, and not dissolved by atomical terminations.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

If atoms should descend plumb down with equal velocity, being all perfectly solid and imporous, they would never the one overtake the other.—Roy, On the Windm of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Import. s. Importance. Obsolete.

What occasion of import
Hath all so long detain'd you from your wife?
Shakespeare, Twelfth of the Shrew, iii. 2.

Some business of import that triumph wears
You seem to go with. Dryden and Lee, Ulysses.
When there is any dispute, the judge ought to appoint the sum according to the eloquence and ability of the advocate, and in proportion to the import of the cause.—Aylife, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Import. s.

1. Tendency; bearing; gist; (as, 'the import of a question' or 'observation').

2. Anything brought from abroad.

What foreign imports may be necessary for clothing?—Bishop Berkeley, Querist, § 171.

Import. v. a.

1. Carry into any country from abroad: (opposed to export).

For Ellis I would sail with utmost speed,
To import twelve mares, which there luxurious feed.
Pope.

2. Imply; infer.

Himself not only comprehended all our necessities, but in such sort also framed every petition as might most naturally serve for many; and doth, though not always require, yet always import a multitude of speakers together.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

3. Suggest. Rare.

Something he left import in the state,
Which since his coming forth is thought of, which imports the kingdom so much fear and danger,
That his return was most requir'd.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 3.

4. Behove; matter to, interest, any one: (in the third person).

Her length of sickness, with what else more serious
Imports thee to know, this bears.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, i. 2.
Let the heat be such as may keep the metal perpetually molten; for that above all imports to the work.—Bacon.

It may import us in this calm to bracken more than we have done to the storms that are now raining abroad.—Sir W. Temple.

If I endure it, what imports it you? Dryden.

These words are entered as they stood in the previous editions, except that import = importance is entered as a separate word. That it is separated from import (the opposite to export) is shown by its accent. Whether there are not two other, or rather two pairs of words besides, is doubtful.

1. It is certain that the element in- has two meanings. In import and import conveying the notion of tendency, bearing, and the like, it means within, and signifies that which the importing agent carries with it. In import and import as used in commerce, it means into, i.e. delivery at one spot after conveyance from another.

2. Again, though port = carry stands in the previous editions as the common basis of the two words, a case may be made out in favour of portus = port being the root of the commercial terms. If so, the existence of a second pair of words is beyond doubt.

Importable. adj. [from in = un-] Incapable of being borne; unbearably; intolerable.

Venus . . . hideth to shew her importable violence.
—Sir T. Elyot, Governour, fol. 127, b.

Thine angry threatening towards sinners is importable.—Prayer of Manasse.

The trumpet would be importable, if it beat always upon him from all sides.—Life of Firmin, p. 80.

With accent on the first syllable.

No both at once him charge on either side
With hideous strokes and importable power.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, ii. 8, 35.

Importable. adj. [from in = into.] Capable of being imported.

Corn was importable at a nominal duty.—Porter, Progress of the Nation.

Importance. s.

1. Thing imported or implied; import. Rare.

A notable passion of wonder appeared in them; but the wisest beholder, that knew no more but seeing, could not say if the importance were joy or sorrow.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

2. Mutter; subject. Obsolete.

It had been pity you should have been put together with so mortal a purpose, as then each bore, upon importation of so slight a nature.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline, i. 2.

Thy own importance know'st,
Not bound thy narrow views to things below.
Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto i. 35.

De Jonson, Sejanus.

She would have by this time acquainted you with my importunacy.—Shelton, Translation of The Quixote, iv. 7.

Importunate. adj.

1. Unreasonable and incessant in solicitations; not to be repulsed.

I was in debt to my importunate business; but he would not bear my excuse.—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, iii. 6.

When the mouth prate, man heareth; when the heart, God heareth. Every good prayer knocketh at heaven for a blessing; but an importunate prayer pierceth it (though as hard as brass) and makes way for itself into the ears of the Almighty.—Bishop Hall, Meditations. (Ord MS.)

2. Troublesome; not easy to be borne. Obsolete.

Rethink you, how to the importunate accidents of this human life all the world is exposed.—Donne, History of the Septuagint, p. 143.

Importunate. r. a. Importune.

Therefore, to purge ulcers so pestilent,
Two heavenly scowls the Lord to Sodom sent,
Whom, devouring mortals, let importunate
To take his lodging, and to taste his cuts.
Sylvestre, Du Bartas, lvi. (Ord MS.)

Importunator. s. Incessant solicitor, or demander.

Abnegators and dispensers against the law of God, but tyrannous importunators and exactors of their own.—St. B. Sandys, State of Religion.

IMPO

reiteration of the same request; solicit earnestly.

They cry and call to love apace,
With prayers loud importuning the sky.
Spenser, Colin Clout.

The highest saint in the celestial hierarchy began to be so importunately importuned, that a great part of the liturgy was addressed solely to her.—Howell, Vocell Forrester.

We have been obliged to hire troops from several princes of the empire, whose ministers and residents here have perpetually importuned the court with unreasonable demands.—Swift.

Too low for a bribe, and too proud to importune,
He had not a prospect of mending his fortune.
Gray.

2. Require; render necessary.

We shall write to you
As time and our concerns shall importune,
How it goes with us.
Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, i. 1.

3. Import; foretell. Rare.

The sage wizard tells, as he has redd,
That it importunes death and doleful drearyhedd.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Importune. v. n. Entered thus, because there are cases where there is no noun for it to govern, as in the one from Gray in the preceding entry. It is, probable, however, that some indeterminate word like one, anyone is understood.

Importune. adj.

1. Constantly recurring; troublesome by frequency. Rare.

All that charge did sorely apply,
With greedy malice and importune toll;
And planted there their huge artillery,
With which they daily made most dreadful battery.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Henry, king of England, needed not to have bestowed such great sums, nor so to have busied himself with importune and incessant labour, to compass my death and ruin; if I had been a feigned person.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

2. Troublesome; vexatious.

And th' armies of their creatures all, and some Do serve to them, and with importune might War against us, the vessels of their will.
Spenser.

Certainly the just God cannot be so importune and unreasonable a master, as to enjoin us what is physically impossible, to expect to reap where he has not sown, to require bricks without allowance of straw.—Booth, Sermons, ix.

3. Unseasonable; coming, asking, or happening, at a wrong time.

No fair to thine
Equivalent, or second! which compell'd
Me thus, though importune perhaps, to come
And gaze and worship thee.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 608.

4. Cruel; inexorable.

The stroke of death in importune, and cannot be voyded. Bishop Fisher, Expedition of the Seven Petrificat Palma, p. 33.

They did lament his luckless state,
And often blame the too importune fate.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, i. 12, 16.

The accent is doubtful. Spenser writes importune both for the adjective and the verb; Milton (for the adjective) importune. The current rule is that not only the verb and noun be distinguished by their accents, but that the accent of the verb be on the final syllable. This, of course, gives Importune, v. and Importune, adj. The adjective, however, has probably been used in conversation by no living speaker, importune being a common pronunciation. Importunity suggests it. The analogy of opportune complicates rather than simplifies the question. That the accent is as I have given will scarcely be denied. It is only the adjective, however, which exists. There is no such verb as opportune, and few (or no) modern instances of such an adjective as importune.

Importunately. adv. In an importune manner.

The palmer lent his ear unto the noise,
To work who called so importunately;
Again he heard a more enforced voice,
That bade him come in haste.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

With a play on the words.
The constitutions that the apostles made concerning deacons and widows, are, with much importunity, but very importunately urged by the disciplinarians.—Bishop Henderson.

IMPO

Importuner. s. One who importunes.

Preclude your care against all rash, rude, irrational, importing importuners.—Waterhouse, Apology for Learning, p. 187: 1003.

Importunity. s. Incessant solicitation.

Overcome with the importunity of his wife, a woman of haughty spirit, he altered his former purpose.—Kaule, History of the Turks.

Importable. adj. Capable of being laid as obligatory on anybody.

They were not simply importable on any particular man, farther than he was a member of some church.
Hammond.

Importo. r. a. [Lat. pono = place; pass. part. positus.]

1. Lay on as a burthen or penalty.

It shall not be lawful to impose toll, tribute, or custom, upon them.—Eccl. vii. 24.
On inhuman realms and barbarous kings impose
Thy plagues, and curse them with such ills as these.
Pope.

2. Enjoin as a duty or law.

What good or evil is there under the sun, what action correspondent or repugnant unto the law which God hath imposed upon his creatures, but in or upon it God doth work, according to the law which himself hath eternally promised to keep?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Impose but your commands,
This hour shall bring you twenty thousand hands.
Dryden.

3. Fix on; attach; impute to.

This cannot be allowed, except we impute that unto the first cause which we impose not on the second; or what we deny unto nature, we impute unto nativity itself.—Sir T. Browne.

4. Obtrude fallaciously.

Our poet thinks not fit
To impose upon you what he writes for wit.
Dryden.

5. In Printing. Put the puges on the stone, and fit on the chase, in order to carry the form to press.

Impose on. Deceive; put upon (the two words translate each other).

Physicians and philosophers have suffered themselves to be so far imposed upon as to publish chymical experiments, which they never tried.—Boyle.

He that thinks the name centaur stands for some real being, imposes on himself, and mistakes words for things.—Locke.

Impose. s. Command; injunction; thing imposed. Rare.

According to your ladyship's impose,
I am thus early come.
Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iv. 3.

Imposer. s. One who imposes.

1. One who enjoins as a law; one who lays anything on another as a hardship.

The universities' sufferings might be manifested to all nations, and the imposers of these onus might repent. I. Walton.

2. One who places or puts anything on another.

The coronary thorns did not only express the scorn of the imposers, by that figure into which they were contrived; but did also pierce his tender and sacred temples to a multiplicity of palms, by their numerous acuminations.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. iv.

Imposition. s.

1. Act of laying anything on another.

The second part of confirmation is the prayer and benediction of the bishop, made more solemn by the imposition of hands. Hammond.

2. Act of attaching or annexing.

The first imposition of names was grounded, among all nations, upon future good hope conceived of children.—Caudean.

The imposition of the name is grounded only upon the predominance of that element whose name is ascribed to it.—Boyle.

3. Injunction of anything as a law or duty.

Their determination is to trouble you with no more suit; unless you may be won by some other sort than your father's imposition, depending on the cause.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, i. 2.
From imposition of strict laws, to free
Acceptance of large grace; from servile fear
To filial; works of law, to works of faith.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 304.

4. Constraint; oppression: (with a mixture of the next meaning).

The constraint of receiving and holding opinions by authority was rightly called imposition.—Locke.

A greater load has been laid on us than we have been able to bear, and the arrogant impossibilities have been submitted to, in order to forward the dangerous designs of a faction.—Swift.

5. Cheat; fallacy; imposture.

It was therefore determined that we should dispossess of the house at the neighbouring fair, and, to prevent imposture, that I should go with him myself.—Goldsmith, Vicar of Wakefield, l. 14.

6. Supernumerary exercise enjoined scholars as a punishment: (an academical term).

When impossibilities were supply'd,
To light my pipe, or soothe my pride.

T. Warburton, Progress of Discontent.

Impossible. adj. Incapable of being done; not to be attained; impracticable.

With men this is impossible; but with God, all things are possible.—Matthew, xii. 26.

Difficult it is, but not impossible.—Chillingworth.
(For other examples see under Impossibility.)

Impossible. s. Impossibility.

I credit him
Than witches, which impossible confess,
Donne, Poems, p. 71.

Impossibility. s.

1. Incapability of being done; that which cannot be done.

Though men do, without offence, wish daily that the affairs, which with evil success are past, might have fallen out much better; yet to pray that they may have been any other than they are, this being a manifest impossibility in itself, the rules of religion do not permit.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Impossibilities! oh no, there's none,
Could I bring thy heart captive home.

Cowley.

According to the definition we may choose to give [of the word impossibility], it may be said either that there are three species of it, or that it may be used in three different senses. 1st. What may be called a mathematical impossibility, is that which involves an absurdity and self-contradiction; e.g. that two straight lines should enclose a space, is not only impossible but inconceivable, as it would be at variance with the definition of a straight line. And it should be observed, that inability to accomplish any thing which is, in this sense, impossible, implies no limitation of power, and is compatible, even with omnipotence, in the fullest sense of the word. If it be proposed, e.g. to construct a triangle having one of its sides equal to the other two, or to find two numbers having the same ratio to each other as the side of a square and its diameter, it is not from a defect of power that we are precluded from solving such a problem as these; since in fact the problem is in itself unmeaning and absurd: it is, in reality, nothing, that is required to be done. It is important to observe respecting an impossibility of this kind, that it is always susceptible of demonstrative proof. Not that every such impossibility has actually been proved such; or that we can be certain it ever will be; but that it must be in itself capable of proof—the materials of such proof—the data on which it may be founded,—being (whether discovered or not) within the range of our knowledge. This follows from the very character (as above described) of such truths as the mathematical; mathematical impossibilities being of course included under that term. For, every such truth must be implied, however tedious and difficult may be the task of eliciting it—in the definitions we set out with, and consequently in the terms, which are the exact representatives of those definitions: e.g. that any two sides of a triangle are greater than the third—in other words, that it is impossible to construct a triangle, one of whose sides shall be equal to the other two—is a matter of easy and early demonstration. The incommensurability of the side and the diameter of a square, — in other words, the impossibility of finding two numbers having to one another the ratio of the side to the diameter,—is a truth which was probably believed some time before a demonstration of it was found; but it is no less implied in the definition of 'straight line,' 'square,' &c. In the case of the circle again, the ratio of the diameter to the circumference has been long sought by mathematicians; and no one has yet demonstrated, or perhaps ever will, either, what their ratio is, or, on the other hand, that they are incommensurable; but one or the other must be within the sphere of mathematical demonstration. When therefore any one says that perhaps so and so may be an impossibility in the mathematical sense, though we may never be able to prove it such, he is to keep in mind that at least such proof is within the scope of inquiry, and that no increase of knowledge, in the sense of 'information respecting facts,' can be needed to furnish materials for the demonstration. Every such impossibility must be implied—though we may not perceive it, in the terms employed; in short, it must be properly a 'contradiction in terms.' 2ndly. What may be called a physical impossibility is something at variance with the existing laws of nature, and which consequently no being subject to those laws (as we are), can surmount; but we can easily conceive a being capable of bringing about what in the ordinary course of nature is impossible; e.g. to multiply five loaves into food for a multitude, or to walk on the surface of the waves, are things physically impossible, but imply no contradiction; on the contrary, we cannot but suppose that the being, if there be such an one, who created the universe, is able to alter at will the properties of any of the substances it contains. . . . 3dly. Moral impossibility signifies only that high degree of improbability which leaves no room for doubt. In this sense we often call a thing impossible, which implies no contradiction, or any violation of the laws of nature, but which yet we are rationally convinced will never occur, merely from the multitude of chances against it; as, e.g. that unloaded dice should turn up the same face, one hundred times successively. And in this sense, we cannot accurately draw the line, so as to determine at what point the improbability amounts to an impossibility; and hence we often have occasion to speak of this or that as almost impossible, though not quite, &c. The other impossibilities do not admit of degrees of approach. That a certain throw should recur two or three times successively, we should not call very improbable; the improbability is increased at each successive step; but we cannot say exactly when it becomes impossible; though no one would scruple to call one hundred such recurrences impossible.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Logic, appendix, Ambiguous Terms, xi. Impossibility.

2. Impracticability; state of being not feasible.

Simple Philoclea, it is the impossibility that doth torment me; for unlawful desires are punished after the effect of enjoying, but impossible desires in the desire itself.—Sir P. Sidney.

Admit all these impossibilities and great absurdities to be possible and convenient.—Archbishop Whately.

Those who assert the impossibility of space existing without matter, must make body infinite.—Locke.

Impost. s. [Fr. impost, impôt.] Tax; toll; custom paid.

Taxes and imposts upon merchants do seldom
I to the king's revenue; for that that he wins in the hundred, he loseth the shire.—Bacon, Essays.

Impost. s. [Fr. imposte.] In Architecture. That part of a pillar, in vaults and arches, on which the weight of the whole building lies; capital of a pier or pilaster which receives an arch; any supporting piece.

An impost is said to be mutilated when its projection is diminished, so that it does not exceed that of the adjoining pilaster which it accompanies.—Heill, Encyclopædia of Architecture, Glossary.

Impostor. s. One who cheats by a fictitious character.

Shame and pain, poverty and sickness, sea death and hell itself, are but the trophies of those fatal conquests got by that grand impostor, the devil, over the deluded sons of men.—South, Sermons.

Used adjectivally.

With the Fratricide, to him the fatal gift of Constantine was the doom of true religion; with them he almost adores poverty; but it is industrious down-trodden rustic poverty; not that of the impostor beggar, common in his days, and denounced as sternly as by the political economy of our own, still less of the religious mendicant. Both these I freely excluded from his all-embracing charity.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. vii.

Impostorship. s. Character of an impostor.

Knelling rather to make this phantasm an expounder, or indeed a depraver of St. Paul an examiner and discoverer of this impostorship.—Milton, Of Predestinate Episcopacy. (Ord MS.)

Impostress. s. Female impostor.

I put the case of the impostress Elizabeth Barton, that said, that if King Henry the Eighth took his wife again, Catherine dowager, he should be no longer king.—Bacon, v. 352. (Ord MS.)

Impostrious. adj. Having the character of an impostor.

We know these latter chiefly from the evidence of Plato, their pronounced enemy; yet even his evidence, when construed candidly and taken as a whole, will not be found enough to justify the charges of corrupt and immoral teaching, impostrious pretence of knowledge, &c. which the modern historians pour forth in loud chorus against them.—Græke, History of Greece, pt. ii. ch. lxvii.

Impostumate. v. n. Form an abscess; gather; form a cyst or bag containing matter.

That high food of spiritual pride and confidence . . . will be sure to impostumate in the soul.—Hawes, Works, iv. 574.

The bruising impostumated, and afterwards turned to a stinking ulcer, which made everybody shy to come near her.—Arbuthnot.

Impostumate. v. a. Afflict with an impostume.

Our vices impostumate our faces.—Sir G. Baker, History of Richard III., p. 53: 1016.

Impostumated. part. adj. Afflicted with, constituted by, or constituting, an impostume.

I have infected them to the quick, and not only let out the impostumated matter, but taken away the proud and dead flesh.—Dr. Griffith, Samaritan Reviv'd, p. 41: 1000.

They would not fly that surgeon, whose lancet threatens none but the impostumated parts.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Impostumation. s. Act of forming an impostume; state in which an impostume is formed.

He that maketh the wound bleed inwards, endangereth malign ulcers and pernicious impostumations.—Bacon, Essays.

Impostume. s. [see extract from Johnson.] Collection of purulent matter in a bag or cyst.

New rotten diseases, ruptures, catarrhs, and bladders full of impostumes, make impostumous discoveries.—Shakspeare, Troilus and Cressida, v. 10.

An error in the judgement is like an impostume in the head, which is always noxious, and frequently mortal.—South, Sermons.

[This seems to have been formed by corruption from impostum, as South writes it; and impostum to have been written erroneously for apostem, abscessus, an abscess.—Johnson.]

Impostume. v. a. Afflict with an impostume.

Impostumated. part. adj. Afflicted with an impostume.

I did always forewarn that your impostumated stomach would belch forth some noxious matter.—Sir J. Heyward, Answer to Doleman, ch. v.

Imposturage. s. Imposition; cheat. Rare.

Many other practices of human art and invention, which help crankiness, lameness, dimness of sight, &c., no man is so foolish as to impute to the devil's invention, or to count them any harmful imposturage.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 127.

Imposture. s. Cheat; fraud; supposititiousness; cheat committed by giving to persons or things a false character.

That the soul and angels have nothing to do with grosser levity is generally opinioned; but who is it that retains not a great part of the imposture, by allowing them a definite 'ubi,' which is still but imagination?—Glennville, Scipias Scientifica.

We know how successful the late usurper was, while his army believed him real in his zeal against kingship; but when they found out the imposture, upon his aspiring to the same himself, he was presently deserted, and never able to crown his usurped greatness with that title.—South, Sermons.

Form new legends,
And fill the world with follies and impostures.—Johnson, Irene.

Impostured. adj. Having the nature of imposture.

What have vile I to do with noble day,
Which shows us heaven's fair face! that face
Which I

Wantonly scorn'd, and cast my love away
Upon impostur'd lust's foul mystery.
Beaumont, Pyche, ii. 102.

Imposturous. adj. Deceitful; chenting.

Twice my thoughts were prompted by mine eye to hold thy strictness false and imposturous.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Woman-Hater.

A proud, lustful, imposturous villain.—Dr. H. More, letter quoted in Ward's Life of Dr. More, p. 352.

Impotence. s.

1. Want of power; inability; imbecility; weakness.

Weakness, or the impotence of exerting animal motion, attends fever.—Arbuthnot.
God is a friend and a father, whose care supplies our wants, and defends our impotence, and from whose compassion in Christ we hope for eternal glory hereafter.—Rogers.

2. Incapacity of procreation.

• Infertility with obscenity must prove
As hateful, sure, as impotence in love.
Bryant, Essay on Criticism, pt. ii.
Impotence [in] incapacity of sexual intercourse, and inability of procreation. Impotence and sterility are so related, that they may be considered under one head, although distinguished by some nomenclature. . . . Impotence may exist in either sex, but most commonly in the male, owing to some conformation. Sterility most frequently depends upon the female, although it sometimes is owing to the male; and, in a practical point of view, if not in a medico-legal one, it is more frequently thus owing than is stated in books. . . . Those who are thus hereditarily or constitutionally impotent, are of a leucophlegmatic or lymphatic temperament.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

3. Want of control over one's self. Latinism. Will he, so wise, let loose at once his ire, Bolke through impotence, or unaware, To give his enemies their wish, and end Them in his anger, whom his anger saves To punish endless? Milton, Paradise Lost, li. 185. Yet all combin'd.

Your beauty and my impotence of mind. Dryden.

Impotency. s. Same as Impotence. Adie was poor by impotency of nature; as young fatherless children, old decrepit persons, idiots, and cripples.—Sir J. Heyward. This is not a restraint or impotency, but the royal prerogative of the most absolute King of kings; that he wills to do nothing but what he can; and that he can do nothing which is repugnant to his divine goodness.—Bentley.

Impotent. adj. 1. Weak; feeble; wanting force; wanting power.

We that are strong must bear the imbecility of the impotent, and not please ourselves.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity. Although in dreadful whirls we hung, High on the broken wave, I knew thou wert not slow to hear, Nor impotent to save. Addison, Spectator.

2. Disabled by nature or disease. In these [porches] lay a great multitude of impotent folk, of blind, halt, withered, waiting for the moving of the water.—John, v. 3. And there sat a certain man at Lystra, impotent in his feet, being a cripple from his mother's womb, who never had walked. Acts, xiv. 8. The impotent poor might be relieved, and the idle forced to labour.—Sir W. Temple.

3. Wanting restraint; (with of). Then, impotent of tongue, her silence broke, Thus turbulent in rattling tone she spoke. Dryden, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad, 723.

4. Without power of propagation. He told beau Prim, who is thought impotent, that his mistress would not have him, because he is a enloven, and had committed a rape.—Tutler.

Impotent. s. Impotent person. Your task shall be With all the force and endeavour of your wit, To enforce the pained impotent to smile. Shakespeare, Lord's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

Impotently. adv. In an impotent manner.

1. Without power generally. The church of England is blessed with a true clergy, and glorious; and such a one as his Italian generation may impotently envy and smile at.—Bishop Hall, Discourse of married Clergy, p. 96. Proud Caesar, midst triumphal cars, The spoils of nations, and the pomp of wars, Ignobly vain, and impotently great, Shew'd Rome her Cato's figure drawn in state. Pope, Prologue to Addison's Cato.

2. Without government of one's self; without self-control. Latinism. He loves her most impotently, and she loves not him.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 570. The danger is of being impotently passionate.—Dr. H. More, Conjectures on Cabalistic, p. 203.

Impound. v. a. 1. Inclose as in a pound; shut in; confine. The great care was rather how to impound the rebels, than none of them might escape, than that any doubt was made to vanquish them.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

2. Shut up in a pinfold. England Hath taken and impounded as a stray The king. Shakespeare, Henry V. 1. 2. Seeing him wander about, I took him up for a stray, and impounded him, with intention to restore him to the right owner.—Dryden, Don Sebastian.

Impoverish, Impover. See Empoverish, &c.

Impracticability. s. Impracticable character of anything. All I shall observe on this head is, to entrust the polemic divine, in his controversy with the Deists, to push home the ground of his belief, and the impracticability of theirs.—Goldsmith, Essays, iv. (Ord MS.)

Impracticable. adj. 1. Incapable, wholly or approximately, of being performed.

To preach up the necessity of that which our experience tells us is utterly impracticable, were to affront mankind with the terrible prospect of universal damnation.—Ezra.

2. Unmanageable; stubborn. That fierce impracticable nature Is govern'd by a dainty finger'd girl. Rome, Jane Shore, l. 1.

Impracticableness. s. Attribute suggested by Impracticable.

I do not know a greater mark of an able minister than that of rightly adapting the several faculties of men, nor is any thing more to be lamented than the impracticableness of doing this.—Swift. The greatest difficulty in these sieges was from the impracticableness of the ground.—Bishop Burnet, History of his own Time.

Imprecate. v. a. [Lat. imprecatus, preterite part. of imprecor; imprecatio, -onis.] Call for evil upon one's self or others.

Eudes, who had blessed the Norman banners at Hastings, was allowed to slink unharmed through the camp, with the royal trumpets blaring and the English imprecating curses on his head.—C. H. Pearson, The early and middle Ages of England, ch. xiv.

Imprecation. s. Curse; prayer by which any evil is wished to another or one's self. My mother shall the horrid furies raise With imprecations. Chapman, Translation of the Odyssey.

Impregn. v. a. Impregnate. Rhetorical. The cane did again appear with a linen hanging thereat so grossly impregn'd, as it promised to be delivered of a most happy burthen.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iv. 13. Semole dath Impregus bear, Impregu'd of dove. Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 1, 58. In her ears the sound Yet rung of his persuasive words, impregu'd With reason, to her seeming. Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 736.

Impregnable. adj.

1. Not to be stormed; not to be taken. Two giants kept themselves in a castle, seated upon the top of a rock, impregnable, because there was no coming to it but by one narrow path, where one man's force was able to keep down an army.—Sir P. Sidney.

2. Unshaken; unmoved; unaffected; invincible.

The man's affection remains wholly unconcerned and impregnable; just like a rock, which, being plied continually by the waves, still throws them back again, but is not at all moved. South, Sermon.

Impregnant. s. [Lat. prægnans, -antis.] Pregnant; impregnate. Rare.

There was never anything ugly or mis-shapen, but the chaos; wherein notwithstanding, to speak strictly, there was no deformity because no form, nor was it yet impregnant by the voice of God.—Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici.

Impregnate. v. a. Fill with young; make prolific.

Hermaphrodites, although they include the parts of both sexes, cannot impregnate themselves.—Sir T. Browne. Christianity is of so prolific a nature, so apt to impregnate the hearts and lives of its proselytes, that it is hard to imagine that any branch should want a due fertility.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Impregnate. v. n. Become pregnant. Were they, like Spanish jewels, to impregnate by the wind, they could not have thought on a more proper invention.—Addison's Spectator, no. 127.

Impregnate. adj. Impregnated; made prolific.

The soul hereby grows (as it were) big, and impregnate with a temptation.—South, Sermons, vi. 155. With native earth their blood the monsters mix'd; The blood, endu'd with animating heat, Did in the impregnate earth new sons beget. Dryden.

Impregnation. s.

1. Act of making prolific; fecundation. They ought to refer matters unto coitus . . . which is the first beggining . . . of generation; but when they are elaborated in the womb of their counsel, and grow ripe to be brought forth, then they take the matter back into their own hands.—Bacon.

2. That with which anything is impregnated. What could implant in the body such peculiar impregnation, as should have such power?—Derham, Physico-Theology.

Imprejudicate. adj. Unprejudiced; not prepossessed; impartial. Rare.

The solid reason of one man with imprejudicate apprehensions, begets as firm a belief as the authority of aggregated testimony of many hundreds.—Sir T. Browne.

Impreparation. s. Unpreparedness; want of preparation. Rare.

Impreparation and unreadiness when they find in us, they turn it to the smothering up of themselves. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity. It is our infidelity, our impreparation, that makes death any other than advantage.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations, li. iv.

Imprescribable. adj. Without the compass of prescription; by no length of time to be aliened or lost.

The end of every political association is the preservation of the natural and imprescribable rights of man.—Narce, Works, li. 156: 1810.

Impress. s. [From Italian, impressa. Entered in previous editions as Impress; such being the sound, though not the spelling, suggested by the extract from Jonson; the one from Milton giving either impress, or imprese. In Lamb the word is merely an archaism.] Device.

A gauding impress for you at tilt. J. Jonson, Epigrams, lxxviii. Imblazon'd shields, Impresses quaint, caparisons and steeds. Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 34.

A tailor may be proud. I think he is never vain. The display of his gaudy patterns, in that book of his which emulates the rainbow, never raises any inclination of that emotion in him corresponding to what the wig-maker (for instance) conceives, when he expatiates on a curl or a bit of hair. Cloth of gold neither seems to elate, nor cloth of frieze to depress him—according to the beautiful motto to which formed the modest impress of the shield worn by Charles Brandon at his marriage with the king's sister.—Lamb, Essays of Elia, On the Antiquity of Tudors.

The Italian form in full. Impress, and devices rare, Of all her gallant knights. Pecham, Minerva Britannica: 1612.

Impress. v. a. [N. Fr. imprimer = print; Lat. impressus, pass. part. of imprimo; premo = press.]

1. Print by pressure; stamp; fix deep; mark as by a stamp.

So foul and ugly, that . . . ding four Their visages impress'd, when they approached near. Spenser, Faerie Queen. When God from earth form'd Adam in the East, He his own image on the clay impress'd. Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning. Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue Appeared, with gay enamell'd colours mix'd, Oil which the sun more stud impress'd his beams. Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 148.

The conquering chief his foot impress'd On the strong neck of that destructive beast.

We should dwell upon the arguments, and impress the motives of persuasion upon our own hearts, till we feel the force of them. Gifford.

2. Press, as applied to enforced service, and with the sense it has in Pressgang. Macbeth shall never vanquish'd be, until Great Britain-would to Dunsinane's high hill Shall come against him. That will never be; Who can impress the forest? Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

Ormond should contribute all he could for the making these levies of men, and for impressing of ships. Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Impress. s.

1. Mark made by pressure. This weak impress of love is as a figure Trench'd in ice, which with an hour's heat Dissolves to water. Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 2.

2. Effects of one substance on another.

How objects are represented to myself I cannot be ignorant; but in what manner they are received, and what impresses they make upon the differing organs of another, he only knows that feels them.—Gilchrist, Synopsis Scientificæ.

3. Mark of distinction; stamp. The very Spaniard, bearing in his face The impress of a noble warrior. Kyd, Soliman and Perseda: 1599. (Ord MS.)

God, surveying the works of the creation, leaves us this general impress or character upon them, that they were exceeding good.—South, Sermons.

4. Act of forcing any into service; compulsion; seizure.

Ajax was here the voluntary, and you as under an impress.—Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, li. 1. Why such impress of shipwrights, whose sore task Does not divide the Sunday from the week. Id., Hamlet, l. 1.

Your ships are not well mann'd;
Your mariners are mulattoes, rascals, people
Ingressed by swift impress.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iii. 7.

5. Impression; image fixed in the mind.

That he should give himself up to mere inconsiderate imaginations, and casual impressions, choosing them for his guide, because they are the strongest,
not true! — Dr. H. More, Confutation Cabbalastica,
p. 248; 1653.

Impressibility. s. Capability of being impressed; susceptibility of impressions.

They (blue eyes) are sure signs of a tender im-pressibility, and sympathising disposition. — Philosophical Letters on Physiognomy, p. 239; 1751.

Impressible. adj. Capable of being impressed; susceptible of impressions.

The differences of impressible and not impressible, figurative and not figurative, are not plebeian notions.
— Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Impression. s.

1. Act of pressing one body upon another.

Sensation is such an impression or motion, made in some part of the body, as produces some perception in the understanding. — Locke.

2. Mark made by pressure; stamp.

Like to a chess, or unlick'd bear whelp,
That carries no impression like the dam.
Shakespeare, Henry VI, Part III, iii. 2.

3. Image fixed in the mind.

To be distracted with many opinions, makes men to be of the last impression, and full of change.
Romeo.

Were the offices of religion strip'd of all the external decencies, they would not make a due impression on the mind. — Bishop Atterbury.

The false representations of the kingdom's enemies had made some impression in the mind of the successor. — Swift.

4. Efficient agency; operation; influence.

A king had made him high sheriff of Sussex, that he might the better make impression upon that county. — Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Effect of an attack. — Rare.

Such a defeat of near two hundred horse, mounted with two thousand foot, may surely endure a comparison with any of the bravest impressions in an-
— Sir H. Wallcut.

6. Printing; edition; number printed at once; one course of printing.

For ten impressions which his works have had in so many years, at present a hundred books are scarcely purchased once a twelvemonth. — Dryden.

It is certain, that the recent introduction into England of the art of typography, to which our countrymen afforded the most liberal encouragement, and which for many years was almost solely confined to the impression of English books, the fashion of translating the classics from French versions, the growing improvements of the English language, and the diffusion of learning among the laity, greatly contributed to multiply English composition both in prose and verse. — P. Walton, History of English Poetry, ii. 407. (Orel MS.)

Impressible. adj. Liable, subject to, susceptible of, impressions: (generally in the third sense of the word).

She had a pretty face and an impressible disposition. — Theobald Book, Gilbert Gurney.

1. Capable of being impressed: susceptible.

A soft and impressive fancy. — Spencer, Discourse concerning Prodiges, p. 75; 1665.

2. Capable of making impression: (as, 'An impressive discourse').

Impressiveness. s. Attribute suggested by Impressive: (chiefly in second sense).

More facility of elocution or impressiveness of manner is likewise often mistaken for wisdom in counsel. — Sir H. C. Lysons, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. vii.

It is in truth and impressiveness what it may gain in clearness and facility. — Glendone, The Ride in it Relations with the Church, ch. i.

Impressment. s. System of enforced service, worked by pressgangs, in the navy.

No impressment was necessary. The seamen came forth from their hiding places by thousands to man the fleet. — Macaulay, History of England, ch. xxi.

Impressure. s. Mark made by pressure;
dint; impression.

Lean but upon a rush,
The electric and capable impressure
Thy palm some moments keeps.
Shakespeare, As you like it, iii. 3.

Imprest. s. [Italian, in presto — in readi-
Vol. I.

ness, in hand.] Earnest money; money advanced.

I mean, that the office of the great auditor (the auditor of the receipt) shall be reduced to 3,000*l.* a year; and the auditors of the imprest and the rest of the principal officers to fixed appointments of 4,500*l.* a year each. — Burke. (Orel MS.)

Imprevalence. s. Incapability of prevailing. — Rare.

That nothing can separate God's elect from his everlasting love, he proves it by induction of the most powerful agents, and triumphs in the impossibility and imprevalence of them all. — Bishop Hall,
Reveries, p. 276.

Imprimatur. s. [Lat., third person singular, present tense, subjunctive mood, passive voice of imprimere — press.] Word formerly at the beginning of books, signifying let it be printed; licence to print.

Sometimes five imprimaturs are seen together diagonally-wise in the piazas of one title-page. —
Milton, Areopagitica.

With what zeal and outrage have you asserted its (the press's) liberty from the bondage of imprimaturs, and the inquisition of prelates. — Bishop Parker,
Reproof of the Reverend Transgression, p. 191.

Thus shall my title pass a sacred seal,
Receive an imprimatur from above,
While angels shout, An angel's realm'd!

Young, Night Thoughts, night vii.
A sheet of blank paper that must have this new imprimatur clapp'd upon it, before it is qualified to communicate any thing to the public, will work its way in the world but very heavily. — Addison,
Spectator, no. 435. (Orel MS.)

The vice-chancellor's imprimatur is dated May 10,
1713. — Johnson, Lives of the Poets, Young. (Orel MS.)
This ballad is in the British Museum. The precise year is not given; but the imprimatur of Roger Lestrangé fixes the date sufficiently for my purpose.
Macaulay, History of England, ch. iii.

Imprimery. s. [Fr. imprimerie.] Print or impression; printing-house; art of printing.

You have those conveniences for a great imprimery, which other universities cannot boast of.
Lord Arlington, To Oxford University.

Imprimis. adv. [Lat. in + ablative plural of primus — first.] First of all.

Imprint. v. a.

1. Mark upon any substance by pressure.

Having surveyed the inner of God in the soul of man, we are not to omit those characters of majesty that God imprinted upon the body. — South, Sermons.

She amidst his spacious meadows flows . . .
And sees his numerous herds imprint her sands.

Prior.

2. Stamp words upon paper by the use of types: (Print commoner).

One of the said books so translated and imprinted may be had for every cathedral. — Act for the Uniformity of Public Prayer, 14 Chas. II. ch. iv.

3. Fix on the mind or memory.

By familiar acquaintance he has got the ideas of those two different things distinctly imprinted on his mind. — Locke.

With in.

When we set before our eyes a round globe, the idea imprinted in our mind is of a flat circle, variously shadowed. — Locke.

Imprint. s. Designation of place, where a work is printed, as 'E Typographico Cla-rendoniato,' or 'At the Clarendon Press.'

What is denominated an imprint by printers, is the information given, commonly at the foot of the title-page of a book, where and by whom it was printed and sold, the date of printing, &c. Formerly imprints were placed at the conclusion of the last, and at the end of a volume, with or without a colophon. — Thomas, History of Printing. (Orel MS.)

And so thoroughly did they do their work, that, though a hundred and fifty years have elapsed since their supremacy began to wane, the imprint of their hands is every where discernible. — Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. v.

Imprinting. part. adj. Making an impression; impressive. — Rare.

There is a kind of conveying of eternal and favouring passages, most compliments, which is of singular use. — Bacon.

Imprison. v. a. [Fr. emprisonner.] Shut up, confine, keep from liberty, restrain in,
or as in, a prison.

He imprison'd me in chains riddled with
For that Hippolytus' rent come he did redress.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Try to imprison the rebellious wind,
So swift is guilt, so hard to be confin'd. — Dryden.

Imprisonment. s. Confinement; state of being shut in, or as in, prison.

His sinews waxen weak and raw,
Through long imprisonment and hard constraint.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Count Scrin, still close prisoner in this castle, lost his senses by his long imprisonment and afflictions. — Addo.

Improbability. s. Unlikelihood.

The improbability and improbability of attempting this successfully, is great. — Hammond.

As to the improbability of a spirit appearing, I boldly answer him, that a heroic poet is not tied to the bare representation of what is true, or exceeding probable. — Dryden.

Improbable. adj. Unlikely.

This account of party patches will appear improbable to those who live at a distance from the fashionable world. — Addison.

Improbably. adv. [Lat. proba.]

1. In an unlikely manner (proba — prove).

2. In a manner not to be approved (proba = approve). — Obsolete.

Aristotle tells us, if a drop of wine be put into ten thousand measures of water, the wine being overpowered, will be turned into water: he speaks very improbably. — Boyle.

Improbability. s. Want of probity or honesty;
dishonesty; baseness.

He was perhaps incommunicable, yes, and cast out for notorious improbability. — Hooker.

We balance the improbability of the one with the improbability of the other. — Sir R. L. Estlin.

Improficiency. s. Want of proficiency.

This misplacing hath caused a deficiency, or at least a great improficiency, in the sciences themselves. — Bacon, Advancement of Learning, b. ii.

Improfitable. adj. Not profitable; vain.

Secret pastimes, privie dalliances, or other im-profitable or wanton conditions. — Sir T. Egton, Gu-rtehouse, fol. 87.

of reproof. — Bishop Burnet, Life of Lord Rochester,
p. 25.

Improline. adj. Not prolific. — Rare.

Men of exalted imaginations will not clog their soul with studies that are improline. — Waterhouse,
Apology for Learning, p. 91.

Impropagate. v. a. Impreguate; fecundate.
Rare.

A difficulty in eggs is, how the sperm of the cock impropagate and makes the oval conception fruitful. — Sir T. Brown.

Impromptu. s. [Fr. from Lat. in readiness.]

Brief extemporaneous, and often merry or witty, composition.

These verses were made extempore, and were as the French call them improptus. — Dryden.

Used adjectively.

Without the bore of an establishment, he found himself among many agreeable friends, giving in an unostentatious and improptus, though refined and luxurious style. — B. Diaristi, The Young Duke,
b. iii. ch. 8.

Improper. adj. [Fr. impropre; Lat. impro-prius.]

1. Not well adapted; unqualified.

As every science requires a peculiar genius, so likewise there is a genius peculiarly improper for every one. — Barnet.

2. Unfit; not conducive to the right end.

The methods used in an original disease would be very improper in a gouty one. — Arbutnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

3. Inaccurate.

He disappear'd, was rarify'd;
For 'tis improper speech to say he dy'd:
He was exhal'd. — Dryden.

Impropitious. adj. Unfavourable; impropicious. — Rare.

I am sorry to hear in the mean time, that your dreams were impropitious. — Sir H. Wallcut, Relative Wottonian, p. 574; 1654.

Improportionable. adj. Unfit; not pro-portionable. — Rare.

I am a rhinoceros, if I had thought a her symmetry could have dared so improportionable and abrupt a digression. — R. Johnson, Cynthia's Revels.

Improportionate. adj. Wanting proportion.
Rare.

The cavity is improportionate to the head.
Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 69.

Improprie. v. a.

1. Convert to private use; seize to himself.

For the pardon of the rest, he wing'd through it not fit it should pass by parliament; the better being matter of grace, to impropriate the thanks by himself. — Dean A. History of the Reign of Henry VII.

The magistrate is wont to ingross and impropriate this scripitude to himself. — Blaise, Golden Remains, p. 130.

In the following the word is possibly neuter, meaning become, as one who impropriates. It is more probably, however, active, a substantive being understood.

Let the husband and wife infinitely avoid a curious distinction of mine and thine. . . . Let them have but one person, have also but one interest. . . . When either of them begins to impropriate, it is like a tumor in the flesh, it draws more than its share. — Jeremy Taylor, The Marriage Ring, p. 329. (Ord MS.)

- Put the possessions of the church into the hands of a layman.

Impropriate. v. n. See Impropriate, v. a.
Impropriate. adj. Devolved into the hands of a layman.

Mrs. Gulton being possessed of the impropriate parsonage of Bardwell in Suffolk, did procure from the king leave to annex the same to the vicarage. — Spelman.

Thus arose the impropriate livings in the hands of laymen, which are now actual estates. — Crabbe, Historical Sketches, Speeches, and Characters, The Church in Ireland.

Impropriated. part. adj. Made impropriate.

Those impropriated livings, which have now no settled endowment, and are therefore called no vicarages, but perpetual or sometimes arbitrary curacies; they are such as belonged formerly to those orders who could serve the cure of them in their own persons, as the canon regular of the order of St. Augustine, which being afterwards devolved into the hands of laymen, they hired poor curates to serve them, at the cheapest rate they could. — H. Wharton, Detection of Errors in Barne's History of the Reformation, p. 67: 1623.

Impropriation. s.

- Exclusive possession.

The Cistercians had, as they deemed, the impropriation of all divine knowledge. — Loc, Bliss of Brightest Beauty, p. 29: 1614.

- Alienation of the possessions of the church.

An impropriation is properly so called when the church land is in the hands of a layman; and an appropriation is when it is in the hands of a bishop, college, or religious house, though sometimes these terms are confounded. — Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Having an impropriation in his estate, he took a course to dispose of it for the augmentation of the vicarage. — Spelman.

Impropriator. s.

- One who seizes to himself.

I should condemn any man for a most unconscionable incloser and impropriator, that should take upon himself to give another leave to speak or write this or the like, which is as common for every one as the air which we breathe. — Dean Martin's Letters, p. 23: 1622.

- Layman that has the possession of the lands of the church.

Where the vicar leaves his glebe, the tenant must pay the great tithes to the rector or impropriator. — Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Impropriety. s. Unfitness; unsuitableness; inequity; want of justice.

These mighty ones, whose ambition could suffer them to be called gods, would never be flattered into immortality; but the proud have been convinced of the impropriety of that appellation. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Particular instances of the same, plural.

Many gross improprieties, as however authorised by practice, ought to be discarded. — Swift.

Every language has its anomalies, which though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things, and which require only to be reviewed, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded; but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or prescribe. — Johnson, Preface to Dictionary.

Improsperity. s. Want of prosperity, or success. Rare.

Some relics of this feud . . . were long after the cause of the one family's almost utter extinction, and of the other's improsperity. — Nauclon, Fragmenta Regalia, Knowledge.

Improsperous. adj. Unsuccessful.

This method is in the design probable, how improsperous never the wickedness of men hath rendered the success of it. — Hannond, On Pseudo-morality.

Our prodigues us at once into the guilt of bold, and punishment of improsperous rebels. — Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.

Seven revolving years are wholly run,
Since the improsperous voyage we begun.

Dryden, Translation of the Kachil.

Imprévable. adj. Capable of being improved.

We have stock enough, and that too of so imprévable a nature, that is, capable of infinite advancement. — Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.

Man is associated with moral principles, imprévable by the exercise of his faculties. — Sir M. Hale, Discourse of the Mind.

I have a fine spread of imprévable lands, and am already planting woods and draining marshes. — Addison, Spectator.

Impréve. v. a.

- Advance anything nearer to perfection; raise from good to better: (we amend a bad, but impréve a good thing).

I love not to impréve the honour of the living by impairing that of the dead. — Sir J. Isakham, Preface to Translation from Manoni.

However seems impréved with a superior ray,
And the bright arch reflects a double day.

Pope, Translation of the First Book of the Thebais of Statius.

To stated and public instruction he added familiar visits and personal application, and was careful to impréve the opportunities which conversation afforded of diffusing and increasing the influence of religion. — Johnson, Life of Watts. (Ord MS.)

- Augment; increase (for the worse).

Some learned men, who own the gospel, say there is nothing mysterious herein; an assertion, which, though it may be innocently meant, yet is so unlimited as it may, I doubt, be very easily impréved to an ill use. — Grove, Cosmologia Sacra, b. v. ch. iv. (Ord MS.)

This ill principle, which being thus habitually impréved, and from personal corruption spreading into general and national is the cause of all the mischief and disorders, public and private, which trouble and infect the world, is to be altered and corrected only by discipline. — South, Sermons, v. 17.

The earliest contest between man's inclination and duty, is in those who have wilfully contracted vicious habits, and by that means rendered their duty much more difficult to themselves; having greatly impréved the evil inclinations of nature by wicked practice. — Archbishop Tillotson, ii. 278. (Ord MS.)

- Prove in the sense of try.

Some unhappy sins in law, and waste of his fortune in those suits, made some impression upon his mind, which being impréved by domestic afflictions, and those indulgences to himself which naturally attend those afflictions, rendered his age less reformed than his youth had been. — Lord Clarendon, Life, i. 32.

Impréve. v. n. Advance in goodness.

We take care to impréve in our frugality and diligence; virtues which become us, particularly in times of war. — Bishop Atterbury.

Spelt with e.

That fool who said in his heart there is no God, e're long impréved into a wit, and loudly swears there neither is nor can be one. — A Heator, Sermons, i. 250: 1684. (Ord MS.)

Impréve. v. a. [Lat. in : un.] Disprove.

Rare.

Though the prophet Jeremy was unjustly accused, yet doth not that impréve any thing that I have said. — Archbishop Whitgift.

Imprévement. s.

- Melioration; advancement of anything from good to better.

Some virtues tend to the preservation of health, and others to the imprévement and security of estates. — Archbishop Tillotson.

- Act of improving; something added or changed for the better: (sometimes with on).

The parts of Sinon, Camilla, and some few others, are imprévements on the Greek poet. — Addison, Spectator.

- Progress from good to better.

There is a design of publishing the history of architecture, with its several imprévements and decays. — Addison.

- Progress in any respect; increase.

When the corruption of men's manners, by the habitual imprévement of this vicious principle, comes from personal to be general and universal, so as to diffuse and spread itself over a whole community, it naturally and directly tends to the ruin and subversion of the government. — South, Sermons, v. 17.

- Instruction; edification.

I took upon your city as the best place of imprévement: from the school we go to the university, but from the university to London. — South, Sermons.

- Effect of melioration.

Love is the greatest of human affections, and friendship the noblest and most refined imprévement of love. — South, Sermons.

Impréver. s. One who improves; one who makes himself or any thing else better; any thing that makes anything better.

They were the greatest imprévères of those qualifications with which courts used to be adorned. — Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Chalk is a very great impréver of most lands. — Mortimer, Husbandry.

Imprévided. part. pref. Unforeseen; unexpected; unprovided against. Rare.

She suborned both
This crafty messenger with letters vain,
To work new woe, and imprévided death,
By breaking off the band betwixt us twain.

Spenser.

Imprévidence. s. Want of foresight; want of caution.

Men would escape floods by running up to mountains, and though some might perish through imprévidence, many would escape. — Sir M. Hale.

The imprévidence of my neighbour must not make me inhuman. — Sir R. L'Etrange.

Imprévident. adj. Wanting foresight; wanting care to provide.

I shall conclude this digression, and return to the time when that brisk and imprévident resolution was taken! — Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

With of.

When men well have fed, the blood being warm,
Then are they most imprévident of harm. — Daniel.

Imprévidently. adv. In an imprévident manner; without forethought; without care.

Distracted in her course, imprévidently rash.
Dryden, Polydoron, song xii.

Imprévisatōre, Imprévisatress. s. [Italian; the form in -ice is feminine, meaning a female improvisatore.] Professional extempore versifier, or dramatist; the thing being wanting in England, the name is scarcely naturalized.

Imprévisé. v. a. Extemporize; provide extempore, or on the spur of the moment.

Imprévised. part. adj. Extemporizer.

Some embryos were one and a half line, others three-fourths of a line, in size: the ova and the morbidiform young are loose in the conceivability; but the further developed young are attached by a special pedicle to the walls of this imprévised marum-pium. — Dean, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. 2.

Imprévision. s. Want of forethought.

Her imprévision would be justly reprobable. — Sir T. Browne.

Impréudence. s. Want of prudence; indiscretion; negligence; inattention to interest.

Where good with bad were match'd, who of themselves
Abhor to join; and by impréudence mix'd,
Produce prodigious births of body or mind.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 686.

Imprudent. adj. Wanting prudence; injudicious; indiscreet; negligent.

There is no such imprudent person as he that neglects God and his soul. — Archbishop Tillotson.

Impudence. s. Shamelessness; immodesty.

A woman, if she maintain her husband, is full of anger, impudence, and much reproach. — Ecclesiasticus, xiv. 22.

These clear truths, that either their own evidence forces us to admit, or common experience makes it impudent to deny. — Locke.

Impudence in an Englishman is sullen and insolent, in a Scotchman it is intemperate and rapacious; in an Irishman, absurd and fawning. — Spectator, no. 20.

Impudent. adj. [Lat. pudet — it shames; pres. part. puclens, -entia; putor — shame; puclitia = modesty.] Shameless; wanting modesty.

It is not a confident brow, nor the throng of words that come with such more than impudent assurance from you, can thrust me from a level consideration. — Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. ii. 1.

When we behold an angel, not to fear,
Is to be impudent. — Dryden, Spanish Fryar.

Impudently. adv. Shamelessly; without modesty.

With open mouths, and impudently rail. Sandys.

Impudicity. s. Immodesty.

They are so unacquainted with Rome's impurities and impudicities.—Sheldon, Miracles of Antichrist, p. 18: 1616.

That usual pride, levity, or impudicity, which they observed or suspected in many.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 115.

Impugn. v. a. [Fr. impugner; Lat. impugnare; pugno = fight.] Attack; assault by law or argument.

You say, that in the old church the truth of this mystery was never impugned openly.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 263.

To knights of great emprise
The charge of justice given was in trust,
That they might execute her judgments wise,
And with their might beat down licentious lust,
Which proudly did impugne her sentence just.

I cannot think myself engaged to discourse of love, as to their nature, use, and allowableness; and that not only in matters of moment and business, but also of recreation, which is impugned by some, though better defended by others.—South, Sermons.

Impugnatio. s. Opposition; resistance.

The fifth is a perpetual impugnatio, and self-conflict; either part labouring to oppose and vanquish the other.—Bishop Hall, Of Contention, § 18.

Impugnator. s. One who impugns, attacks, or invades.

To defend them from the pretended slanders of their impugnators.—Pulke against Alva, p. 354: 1584.

The impugnators of our English church.—Bishop Morlon, Episcopacy Asserted, p. 2.
Leaving excellent those his will impugnors.—Milton, Apology for Smectynymus.

Impuissance. s. [Fr. puissance = power, puissant = powerful; from root of Lat. possum = I am able.] Impotence; inability; weakness; feebleness.

As he would not trust Ferdinand and Maximilian for supports of war, so the impuissance of the one, and the double proceeding of the other, lay fair for him for occasions to accept of peace.—Heaton, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Impulse. s. [Lat. impellere, pass. part. impulsus; impulsio, -onis.]

1. Communicated force; effect of one body acting upon another.

If these little impulses set the great wheels of devotion on work, the largeness and height of that shall not at all be prejudiced by the smallness of its occasion. South, Sermons.

Bodies, from the impulse of a fluid, can only gravitate in proportion to their surfaces, and not according to their quantity of matter, which is contrary to experience.—Chyane.

2. Influence acting upon the mind; motive; idea impressed.

Many times, by Joe's impulse, Megentius arm'd,
Successful Turnus, with his ardour warmed,
His fainting friends.

Dryden, Translation of the Ecceci, s. 976.
Moses saw the bush burn without being consumed, and heard a voice out of it: this was something, besides fluting an impulse upon his mind to go to Pharaoh, that he might bring his brethren out of Egypt.—Locke.

3. Hostile impression.

Like two great rocks against the raging tide
(If Virtue's force with Nature's force compare).
Unmov'd the two united chiefs abide,
Sustain th' impulse, and receive the war.

Prior, Ode to Queen Anne, 1700.

Impulsion. s.

1. Agency of body in motion upon body.

The motion in the minute parts of any solid body passes without sound; for that sound that is heard sometimes is produced only by the breaking of the air, and not by the impulsion of the air.—Barrow, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Influence operating upon the mind.

My keeper with compassion mov'd to see,
How grief's impulsions in my breast did beat,
Thus silence broke.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 632.

But that thine impulse
Divine impulsion, prompting how thou might'st
Find some occasion to infer our loss.

Milton, Samson Agonistes, 421.

He always opposed, upon the impulsion of conscience, all mutations in the church.—Lord Clarendon, Life, i. 97.

Influences, impulsions, or inclinations, . . . from the lights above.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, iii. 7.

Impulsive. adj. Having the power of impulse; moving; impellant.

Nature and duty bind him to obedience;
But those being placed in a lower sphere,
His fierce ambition, like the highest mover,
Has hurried with a strong impulsive motion
Against their proper course.

Sir J. Denham, The Sophy, iii. 1.
But although . . . it has not been thought the duty of the State to take an active and impulsive part in propagating the truth upon secular subjects, it has been held that the State could with propriety be equally passive with respect to the permission of error.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. ix, § 16.

Impulsive. s. Impellent cause or reason.
Notwithstanding all which motives and impulsions, Sir Thomas Overbury refused to be sent abroad.—Sir H. Wotton, Reading, p. 169.

Impunctuality. s. Unpunctuality. Rare.
Unable to account for his impunctuality, some of his intimates were dispatched in quest of him.—Ob-servator, no. 130. (Ord MS.)

Impunitably. adv. Without punishment. Rare.
Xenophon represents the opinion of Socrates, that . . . no man impunitably violates a law established by the gods.—Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 65.

Impunity. s. [Lat. impunitus; punitio = punishment.] Freedom from punishment; exemption from punishment.

In the condition of subjects they will gladly continue, as long as they may be protected and justly governed, without oppression on the one side, or impunity on the other.—Sir J. Denham.

A general impunity would confirm them; for the vulgar will never believe that there is a crime where they see no penalty.—Addison, Foscold, r.

Impure. adj. [Lat. impurus.]

1. Defiled with guilt; unholy: (of men).
No more can impure man retain and move
In that pure region of a worthy love,
Than earthly substance can unfear'd aspire,
And leave his nature to converse with fire. Donne.

2. Contrary to sanctity; unhalloved; unholy: (of things).
Hypocrites austere talk,
Condemning as impure what God has made
Pure, and commands to some, leaves free to all.
Milton, Paradise Lost, B. 7: 5.

3. Unchaste.
If black scandal, or foul fact's reproach,
Attend the sequel of your impudence,
Your never enforcement shall admitance me
From all the impure bids and stains the roof.

Shakespeare, Richard III., iii. 7.
One could not devise a more proper hell for an impure spirit, than that which Plato has touched upon.—Addison.

Impure. v. a. Render foul or impure; defile. Rare.

That other inundation secured the world, this impures it. Bishop Hall, Sermons, Works, ii. 263.

Impureness. s. Attribute suggested by impure: (Impurity commoner).

1. Want of purity or chastity.
The act of a substantial impureness committed.
Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce.

2. Base admixture.
The impureness of mixed posterity.—Felltham, Reading, i. 85.

Impurity. s.

1. Want of sanctity; want of holiness.
The soul of a man grown to an inward and real impurity.—Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, b. ii. ch. vi.

2. Act of unchastity.
Real impurity joined among the monkish clergy. Bishop Athelney, Sermons.

3. Fecculent admixture.
Cleanse the alimentary duct by vomiting and clysters: the impurities of which will be carried into the blood.—Arbuthnot.

Impurple. See Empurple.

Imputable. adj.

1. Chargeable upon anyone; that of which one may be accused.

It is rather imputable to that prudent modesty which so much becomes every sober woman.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 169.
That first sort of foolishness is imputable to them.—South, Sermons.

2. Accusable; chargeable with a fault. Im-proper.

If the wife departs from her husband, through any default of his, as on the account of cruelty, then he shall be compelled to allow her alimony; for the law deems her to be a dutiful wife as long as the fault lies at his door, and she is in nowise imputable.—Ayliffe, Paragon Juris Canonici.

Imputableness. s. Attributib suggested by imputable.

"Is necessary to the imputableness of an action, that it be avoidable."—Noggin.

Imputation. s.

1. Attribution of anything.

a. In the way of discredit: (the commoner import).

Whatever happens, they also the best find that source of vulgar imputation, which notwithstand they deserve. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

I have formerly said that I could distinguish your writings from those of any others: 'tis now time to clear myself from any imputation of self-conceit on that subject. Deft.

Let us be careful to guard ourselves against these groundless imputations of our enemies, and to rise above them. Addison.

Neither do I reflect upon the memory of his late majesty, whom I entirely acquit of any imputation upon this matter. Swift.

b. In the way of credit: (the rarer import).

If I had a suit to master Shallow, I would humour him with the imputation of being near your master.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II., v. 1.

2. Hint; slight notice.

Antonio is a good man.—Have you heard any imputation to the contrary? No, no; my meaning is to have you understand me that he is sufficient.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, i. 3.

Imputative. adj. Having the nature of an imputation.

In all things righteousness, acceptance, or sanctification, is free and imputative.—Translation of Bullinger's Sermons, p. 1652.

The fourth is the imputative righteousness of Christ, either explained or not rightly understood.—Newton, Life of Bishop Bull.

Imputatively. adv. By imputation; attributively.

Sarah made choice of a slave, rather than a free woman, to bring to her husband's bed, that the child, which the slave might happen to bear, might imputatively, at least, be accounted hers.—Blackstone, History of the Rites, b. ii. ch. i.

Impute. v. a. [Fr. imputer; Lat. imputo.]

1. Charge upon; attribute: (generally in an ill sense).

It was imputed to him for righteousness.—Romans, iv. 22.

I made it by your permission, to satisfy those who imputed it to folly.—Sir W. Temple.

Impute your dangers to our ignorance.—Dryden.

2. Reckon to one what does not properly belong to him; credit.

Thy merit
Imputed shall absolve them who renounce
Their own both righteous and unrighteous deeds.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 200

Im- Inseparable element in a long list of compounds. It is always a prefix.

Followed by b, p, or m, it becomes im-, as may be seen from the preceding entries. Followed by t, it becomes it-; by r, r- as in iraduable, irreligious, &c. How it comports itself before gn, though there are but few words which illustrate the change it undergoes, is worth noticing as an interesting point in general philology. Before gn, it loses its consonantal element altogether, and becomes simply i, as in i-gnoble; for such is the etymological division of this word. The only other entries are i-gnore, and i-gnoming, with their derivatives. I-gnosceble, from ignosco = pardon, is entered by Johnson, and retained by Todd, but without an example. Neither do I find more than these in the Basis of Comparison (Third Period) of the Philological Society. This form, then, is rare.

Nevertheless, it exemplifies a series of words in which an original g has, to a great extent, disappeared; only, however, in the simple word. And that naturally; inasmuch as g and k, followed by n in the same syllable, have a tendency in many languages, to drop off. They do so, as far as pronunciation is concerned, in our own, though not in the allied languages; knabe (knave), knacht (knight), &c. being sounded in German with the initial k distinctly heard. In Greek, too, words like γῆρας are commoner than words like ἡναιος in Latin, where natus is commoner than gnatus—the Latin giving both in-natus and co-gnatus. But the compounds may keep what the root rejects; and that for a plain reason. Prefix a word like co-, to gnatus, and the g, by being divided between two syllables, gains in facility of pronunciation. Hence, certain combinations preserve the g that the fundamental word has lost.

In the matter of sound this g might comport itself in two ways. (1) It might be sounded with the -i-, and, so sounded, look as if it were simply a part of the negative prefix; a mere modification of the n of in-; or (2) it might become -ng-, giving in the first instance the combination ing-nobolis, the g of the root having lost its power as a separate consonant, but having nasalized the n of the prefix. The first of these alternatives is what we find in our own language. In the French the second seems to have prevailed. The French ignoble is sounded more like in-goble (though it is needless to say that this is but the roughest of approximations to the true sound) than ig-noble. Now here the y sound represents the g, and follows, instead of (as in English) preceding the n. But there are two n's, the n of noble, and the n of in. It is suggested that it is the former which is dropped, and that it is the latter which is preserved. If so, a curious point of orthography has been illustrated; one which is generally explained by supposing a transposition. The doctrine here conveyed gives no transposition; merely the fact that out of two n's, with a softened g between them, the second is lost.

It is chiefly as a Latin adverb that in is used, and it has three powers; (1) as in in-strum, whence in-struct; (2) as in in-cludo, whence in-clude or shut in; (3) as in in-tolerable, where its import is negative, i.e. that of the English not, and un-, as in un-known.

1. The import of in-, in the compounds of the first division, though of great importance and some obscurity in Latin, is of little note in English. In English this prefix exists only so far as it belongs to certain words which have been introduced from the Latin as wholes. There being no such separable particle in English, we never have recourse to it in making compounds; and there is no ambiguity. In French it occurs as en-, and between words of French and Latin origin there is sometimes room for doubt. As a general rule, however, the distinction is clear. Enchantment is French; incantation, Latin: one from canto directly; one from canto indirectly.

2. For the in- inclusive, see En-.

3. The in- negative is what commands attention here.

With the compounds of in-, having the power of a negative, the chief complication arises from the concurrent use of the English prefix un-. This often precedes even words of Latin origin.

When do we use in-, and when un-? The rule that carries us the farthest is this,—that for in- to be used, the word should be wholly, and either actually or possibly Latin; one that is introduced into the English as a complete and ready-made word. The least intermixture of an English element muddies the compound. A good word to illustrate this is ineffable. There is the Latin word ineffabilis (unspeakable), and there is no such English word as effable; except, of course, so far as it has been derived from its commoner compound. This may always happen; but a very little thought tells us that the secondary word is not always the oldest, i.e. as an English word.

The two most notable exceptions are insufferable and inability. Sufferable and ability are English—not Latin. Yet unsufferable and unability (spite of unable) sound harshly. The doctrine that explains the first of these hybrid terms is that, as sufferable—tolerable, in-sufferable has been suggested, as a sort of concurrent form, for in-tolerable. Inability may be explained in two ways. Though able is English, habilis is Latin. I prefer, however, looking to the coincidence of -ability, as in penetrability, &c., in its character of a derivational element, with ability as a whole word in English. Such is the explanation for the two most notable exceptions to the rule laid down.

How far does the rule apply? In the main it applies to words in the first instance only. A word, to begin with the negative in-, must be originally a Latin word; but when introduced into English, it may, to a certain extent, be treated as an English root. The adverbial affix -ly is English; yet we may say in-constant-ly and in-cessant-ly. The affix -ness is in the same predicament: yet it may easily be used too freely. To words like submissiveness, he would be an over-nice purist who objected. Yet, unless the pure notion of abstraction were to be expressed for some metaphysical purpose, most of us would prefer the approximate abstract penetrability to the more (logically) correct penetrableness. In fact, there are so many cases where the true Latin forms in -tude, -ism, and -ity, are so near in meaning to the English form in -ness, that hybridism may be avoided with a gain on the side of purity and no great loss on that of logic. If -ness, however, be used, in and not un-, is the right prefix. In like manner the participial forms in -ate are better than the true English participles in -ated, and inanimate better than inanimated: for which latter word, even independent of the shade of difference in its import, un-animated is the better form.

We have now taken due cognizance of the statement, that in order to be preceded by in- a word must be Latin. How far must Latin words not be preceded by un-? Naturalis is Latin, conscious is Latin, and congruous is Latin. Nevertheless, while we say in-congruous, we say un-conscious, and un-natural; not to mention the fact of such a word as impolite being exceptionable. Concerning these it may be said that certain words, though of Latin origin, are so thoroughly Anglicized as to comport themselves in composition as English. I doubt, however, whether the explanation does not lie deeper. There are several compounds in which the Latin language favoured in- less than certain combinations of non (not), and minime (in the least degree). Conscious was, certainly, one of these; non-conscious, non-naturalis (in the Latin stages of the language), minime politus being common. The rationale of these is a point of Latin philology. It is indicated, however, here for the sake of showing that in the laying down a rule the main exceptions have not been either overlooked or kept back.

En. prep. [A.S.]

1. Word preceding the name of any object material, or immaterial, by which another object is inclosed.

His [Dryden's] Essay on Dramatic Poetry, published in 1668, was reprinted sixteen years afterwards, and it is curious to observe the changes which Dryden made in the expression. . . . The Anglicism of terminating the sentence with a preposition is rejected. Thus, 'I cannot think so contemptibly of the age I live in,' is exchanged for 'the age in which I live.'—Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. vii. § 37.

2. On. Obsolete.

And in his necks

Her proud foot setting.

Spenser, Faerie Queen, v. 4. 40.

All who in vain thins

Built their fond hopes of glory.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 18.

In. that. Because.

Some things they do in that they are men; in that they are wise men and christian men, some times; some things in that they are men misled, and blinded with error. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

In as much. Since; seeing that.

These things are done voluntarily by us, which other creatures do naturally, in as much as we might stay our doing of them if we would.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

En. adv.

1. Within some place; not out: (as, 'Come in'—enter).

2. Engaged for any affair.

We know the worst can come; 'tis thought upon: We cannot shift being in, we must go on. Shaksp.

These pragmatical flies value themselves for being in at every thing, and are found at last to be just good for nothing. Sir R. J. K. Strange.

3. Placed in some state.

Who loses and who wins; who's in, who's out.

Shakspere, King Lear, v. 3.

Must never patriot then declaim at sin,

Unless, good man, he has been fairly in!

Pope, Epilogue to the Satires, dialogue ii.

4. Noting immediate entrance.

Go to thy fellows; bid them cover the table, wryne in the meat, and we will come in to dinner.—Shakspere, Merchant of Venice, iii. 5.

He's too big to go in there: what shall I do? Let me see't: I'll in, I'll in; follow your friend's counsel, I'll in.—Id., Measure for Measure, iii. 3.

5. Into any place; closely.

Next fill the hole with its own earth again,

And trample with thy feet, and tread it in.

Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 313.

With a second in.

In the said cavity lies loose the shell of some sort of bivalve larger than could be introduced in at those holes.—Woodward.

6. Close; home.

The posture of left-handed fencers is so different from that of the right-handed, that you run upon their swords if you push forward; and they are in with you, if you offer to fall back without keeping your guard.—Titter.

Used substantively, as, 'He knows all the ins and outs of the place.'

Breed in and in. Breed from the same family.

Play in and out. Play fast and loose.

How infamous is the false, fraudulent, and unaccountable person; especially if he be arrived at that consummate and robust degree of dishonesty as to play in and out, and show tricks with oaths, the sacredst bonds which the conscience of man can be bound with.—South, Sermons.

Inability. s. [for the preference of in-, to un-, see In-.] Want of ability or power.

If no natural nor casual inability cross their desires, they always delighting to injure themselves with actions most beneficial to others, cannot but gather great experience, and through experience the more wisdom.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Inabstinence. s. Want of power to abstain.

Phases direct of which a monstrous crew
Be there shall appear, that that may'st know
What misery the inaccessibility of Eve
Shall bring on man. Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 401.

Inaccessibly. adv. Without abuse.

A state of mortality shall always want that infinite wisdom, and purity of intention which resideth in the deity, and which makes power to consist in inaccessibly only there, as in its proper sphere. Lord North, Light in the Way to Paradise, p. 91: 1082.

Inaccessibility. s. State of being, character of that which is, inaccessible.

That side which flanks on the sea and haven needs no art to fortify it, nature having supplied that with the inaccessibility of the precipice. Antler, Remains, l. 417.

Inaccessible. adj. Incapable of being reached or approached.

What'er you are,
That in this desert inaccessible,
Under the shade of melancholy boughs,
Lose and neglect the creeping hours of time.

This part, which is no noble, is not altogether inaccessible; and that an easy way may be found to it, 'tis to consider nature and to copy her. Dryden.

Inaccuracy. s. Want of exactness or accuracy.

There are two small inaccuracies in this sentence. Bishop Hurd, on Addison's Spectator, no. 512.

Inaccurate. adj. Not exact; not accurate.

The expression is plainly inaccurate. Bishop Hurd, on Addison's Spectator, no. 315.

Inaction. s. Forbearance, or cessation, from action.

The times and amusements past are not more like a dream to me than those which are present: I lie in a refreshing kind of inaction. Pope.

Formulas of the worst kind succeed to perfect inaction. Bishop Berkeley, Maxims, § 58.

Inactive. adj. Other than active; not busy or diligent; idle; indolent; sluggish; unfavourable to activity.

Not the vain visions of inactive schools,
Not fancy's maxims, nor opinion's rules,
Ever formed the man, whose generous warmth Extends

To enrich his country. Shenstone.

His [Rowe's] plays are musical and pleasing poems; but inactive and unmoving tragedies. J. Walton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Others are . . . doomed to lose four months in inactive obscurity. Johnson, Rambler, no. 124.

Inactivity. s. Idleness; rest; sluggishness.

Virtue, conceal'd within our breast,
Is inactive at best. Swift.

Inactuate. n. a. Put into action.

The plastic in them is too highly awakened to inactuate only an aerial body. Glanville, On the Pre-existence of Souls, p. 125.

Inactuation. s. Operation. Rare.

They [the creatures] were then constituted in the inactuation and express of their nobler and most perfect powers. Glanville, On the Pre-existence of Souls, p. 115.

Inadequate. adj. Not adequate or equal to the purpose; defective; falling below the due proportion.

Remorse for vice
Not paid, or paid inadequate in price,
What farther means can reason now direct?

Dryden.
Inadequate ideas are such, which are but a partial or incomplete representation of those archetypes to which they are referred. Locke.

Inadequation. s. Want of exact correspondence. Rare.

The difference only arising from inadequation of languages. Citation in Fuller's Moderation of the Church of England, p. 418.

Inadmissible. adj. Incapable of being allowed or admitted.

It must always be remembered, that bishop Leath's version is designed for the learned: in one for vulgar use 'norse' for 'chosen vine,' 'ties' for 'aven oak,' &c. would be clearly inadmissible. Archbishop Newcome, Essay on the English Translations of the Bible, p. 303.

Inadvertence. s. Carelessness; negligence; inattention.

Many persons have lain under great and heavy penalties, which have taken their first rise only from some inadvertence or indiscretion. Dr. M. More, Government of the Tongue.

Inadvertency. s. Same as Inadvertence.

There is a difference between them, as between inadvertency and deliberation, between surprise and set purpose. South, Sermons.

From an habitual heedless inadvertency, men are so intent upon the present, that they mind nothing else. Sir R. L. Estlin.

The productions of a great genius, with many lapses and inadvertencies, are infinitely preferable to the works of an inferior kind of author, which are scrupulously exact. Addison.

I languish in a condition too horrible to be described, and which in a land of humanity, and what is much more, Christianity, seems a strange punishment for a little inadvertency and indiscretion. Fielking, Adventures of Joseph Andrews.

Sudden fits of inadvertency will surprise vigilance, slight attentions will reduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning. Johnson, Preface to Dictionary.

Inadvertent. adj. Not attending to things as they occur; negligent; careless.

But he was always inadvertent. Lamb, Letter to Wordsworth.

Inadvertently. adv. Carelessly; negligently.

Worthy persons, if inadvertently drawn into a deviation, will endeavour instantly to recover their lost ground. Richardson, Clarissa.

Inadvertisement. s. Inadvertence. Rare.

Constant objects lose their hints, and deal an inadvertisement, upon us. Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, iii. 10.

Inaidable. adj. Not to be assisted. Rare.

Labouring art can never answer nature from her inaidable estate.

Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, ii. 1.

Inalienable. adj. Incapable of being alienated, or granted to another.

This grant or concession was made originally upon condition that the said lands should be inalienable. Historical Description of the Kingdom of Marath, p. 88: 1701.

Inalimental. adj. Affording no nourishment or aliment.

Dulcoration importeth a degree to nourishment; and the making of things inalimental to become alimental, may be an experiment of great profit for making new victual. Bacon.

Inalterable. adj. Incapable of being altered; unalterable.

The heavens . . . being made of an incorruptible and inalterable quintessence. Milnes, Apology, p. 75.

Inamissible. adj. [Lat. amitto = lose; pass. part. amissus; strictly a + mitto = send away.] Incapable of being lost.

These advantages are inamissible. Hammond.

Fixed in an inamissible happiness. Glanville, Pre-existence of Souls, p. 68.

Inambrash. See Enambrash.

Inamorato. s. [Italian, inamorato.] One in love. See Enamorato, and Enamorato.

Perfum'd inamorato! Marston, Scourge of Villany, iii. 10: 1299.

All pretty fellows are also excluded to a man, as well as all inamorato. Toller, no. 27.

We are both worshippers and inamorato of this mother of the gods, antiquity. Bishop Warburton, Letters to Hurd, let. 199.

Inamovable. adj. Incapable of being removed.

No portion of Hugh-le-Grand's character was concealed . . . from any one among the three parties who concurred in the covenant whereby they rendered him the perpetual tutor of the restored monarch nominally second in rank to the king, but really the inamovable protector of the monarchy. Sir F. Polgrave, History of England and of Normandy, vol. i. p. 173.

Inane. adj. [Lat. inanis.] Empty; void.

We sometimes speak of place in the great inane, beyond the confines of the world. Locke.

Inanimate. n. a. [The in- not negative.] Animate; quicken. Obsolete.

There's a kind of world remaining still;
Though she, which did inanimate and fill
The world, be gone, yet in this last long night
Her ghost doth walk, that is, a glimmering light.

This child of mine, inanimate by your crinkles
acceptation. Id., Heretics, Epistle Dedicatory.

Youth is their critical day, that judges them, that denounces them, that inanimates and informs them. Ibid., p. 338.

Inanimate. adj. [The in- negative.] Void of life; without animation.

The spirits of animate bodies are all in some degree kindled; but inanimate bodies have spirits no whit influenced. Bacon.

All the ideas of sensible qualities are not inherent in the inanimate bodies; but are the effects of their motion upon our nerves. Bentley.

From roofs when Verrio's colours fall,
And leave inanimate the naked wall.

Still in thy song should vanquish'd France appear. Pope, Windsor Forest.

Inanimate. adj. Deprived of animation; inanimate.

The golden goddess, present at the prayer,
Well knew he meant th' inanimate fair,
And gave the sign of granting. Dryden.

Only require the constant influence of a principle different from that which governs the inanimate part of the universe. Cheyne, Philosophical Principles.

Inanimation. s. Animation. Rare.

We may well consider the body, before the soul came, before inanimation, to be without sin. Donne, Devotions, p. 581.

Inanition. s. Emptiness of body; want of fullness in the vessels of the animal.

Repletion and inanition may both do harm in two contrary extremes. Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 2: 6.

Infinity. s.

1. Emptiness; void space.

This opinion excludes all such infinity, and admit no vacuities, but as little does as nobody infinity can come to, but will be bigger than they, and must touch the corporal parts which those vacuities divide. Sir K. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of Bodies.

2. Vanity.

Theseopperies are the chief of the effect. . . . Their infinity gives them weight and credit.

Florio, Translation of Montaigne, p. 42: 1613.

Inappetence. s. Want of appetite.

Some squamish and disordered person takes a long walk to the physician's lodge to beg some remedy for his inappetence. Boyle, Against Customary Swearing, p. 100.

Inappetency. s. Same as Inappetence.

So that out of mere laziness and inappetency I have thrown it [the treatise] by as unripe fruit, and suffered it to be as if it never had been. Cheyne, On Health and Long Life. (Ord M.S.)

Inapplicability. s. State of being inapplicable.

(For example see next entry.)

Inapplicable. adj. Incapable of, unfit for, being applied.

This method is clearly inapplicable. . . . The inapplicability of this method has already been explained. J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. v. ch. iii.

Inappreciable. adj. Incapable of being appreciated, valued, measured, or ascertained.

After a few approximations the difference becomes inappreciable. Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries.

Inapprehensible. adj. Incapable of being (mentally) apprehended.

Those celestial songs to others inapprehensible, but not to those who were not defiled with women.

Milton, Apology for Sundry Manners.

Inapprehensive. adj. Slow in apprehending.

By firing delicious every day men become senseless of the evils of mankind, inapprehensive of the troubles of their brethren, unconcerned in the changes of the world, and the cries of the poor, the hunger of the fatherless, and the thirst of widows. Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 200: 1623.

Inappropriate. adj. Not appropriate; unfit; irrelevant.

It may be aggravated by inappropriate remedies. Dr. P. M. Latham, Lectures on Subjects connected with Clinical Medicine.

Inaptitude. s. Unfitness.

Herby one may give a strong conjecture of the aptness or inaptitude of one's capacity to that study. Hoswell, Letters, l. 9: 1619.

Inaque. adj. [Lat. agua = water.] Embodied in water. Rare.

For as much as he is joined to the bread but sacramentally, there followeth no inanimation thereof, no more than the Holy Ghost is inaque, that is to say, made water, being sacramentally joined to the water in baptism. Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 304.

Inaqua. s. State of being inaque. Rare.

The second reason is almost as fondly involved, allying from inanimation to inaqua. Bishop Gardiner, Reply to Archbishop Cranmer, p. 302.

Inarch. v. a. See extract.

Inarching is a method of grafting which is commonly called grafting by approach. This method of grafting is used when the stock and the tree may be joined: take the branch you would inarch, and, having fitted it to that part of the stock where you intend to join it, pare away the rind and wood on one side about three inches in length: after the same manner cut the stock or branch in the place where the craft is to be united, so that they may join equally together that the sap may meet. — Miller.

Inarching. verb. abs. See Inarch.

Inarticulate. adj. Not uttered with distinctness like that of the syllables of human speech.

Observe what inarticulate sounds resemble any of the particular letters. — Bishop Wilkins, Mathematical Magick.

By the harmony of words we elevate the mind to a sense of devotion; as our solemn music, which is inarticulate poetry, does in churches. — Dryden.
During the month which followed the death of Mary the King [William III.] was incapable of exertion. Even to the address of the two Houses of Parliament he replied only by a few inarticulate sounds. — Maccarty, History of England, ch. xxi.

Inarticulation. s. Confusion of sounds; indistinctness in pronouncing.

The verses seemed to be obscure; but then it was by the ambiguity of the expression, and not by the inarticulation of the words. — Lord Chesterfield.

Inartificial. adj.

1. Contrary to art.
I have ranked this among the effects; and it may be thought inartificial to make it the cause also. — Dr. H. More, Deny of Christian Piety.

2. Not made by art; plain; simple; artless; rude.

It was the inartificial process of the experiment, and not the artfulness of any commentary upon it, which they have had in veneration. — Bishop Sprat, History of the Royal Society, p. vi.

Inattention. s. Disregard; negligence; neglect; heedlessness.

We see a strange inattention to this most important prospect. — Kogers.

Inattentive. adj. Heedless; careless; negligent; regardless.

If we indulge the frequent roving of passions, we shall procure an unsteady and inattentive habit. — Watts.

Inaudible. adj. Incapable of being heard; void of sound.

Let's take the instant by the forward top;
For we are old, and on our quick'st tread
Th' inaudible and noiseless foot of time
Stands, ere we can effect them. — Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, v. 3.

Inaugural. adj. Connected with an inauguration.

The inaugural address was sufficiently imperious in tone and matter. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. vii. ch. ii.

Inaugurate. v. a. [Lat. inauguratus, pass. part. of inaugurare; inauguratio, -ouis.] Consecrate; invest with a new office by solemn rites; begin with good omens; begin.

Those beginnings of years were very propitious unto him, as if kings did choose remarkable days to inaugurate their favours, that they may appear acts as well of the times as of the will. — Sir H. Wotton, Life of the Duke of Buckingham.
He had taken with him Alfred, his youngest son, to be there inaugurated. — Milton, History of England, b. v.

Inaugurate. adj. Invested with office.

Edmond
At London caus'd himself inaugurate to be.

The new state, to which Christ was inaugurate at his resurrection. — Hammond, Works, iv. 529.

Inauguration. s. Investiture by solemn rites.
The royal office was solemnly sworn at his inauguration, to observe these things inviolable. — Hawell, Vocal Forest.
At his regal inauguration his old father resigned the kingdom to him. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inauguratory. adj. Respecting inauguration.
After so many inauguratory congratulations, nuptial hymns, and funeral dirges, he must be highly favoured by nature, or by fortune, who says any thing not said before. — Johnson, Life of Dryden.
The chief magistrate resident in the university had commonly the title of Lord Rector; but being addressed only as Mr. Rector in an inauguratory speech by the present chancellor, he has fallen from his former dignity of style. — Id., Journey St. Andrews. (Ord MS.)

Inauration. s. [Lat. aurum = gold.] Act of gilding or covering with gold.

The Romans had the art of gilding after our manner; but some sort of their inauration, or gilding, must have been much dearer than ours. — Archeology, Tables of Ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Inauspicate. adj. Ill omened.

Though it bore an inauspicate face, it proved of a friendly event. — Sir G. Buck, History of Richard III. p. 43.

Inauspicious. adj. Ill omened; unlucky; unfortunate.

Oh here
I will set up my everlasting rest;
And shake the sides of inauspicious stars
From this world-wearied flesh.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, v. 3.
With inauspicious bore a wretched swim
Pursu'd the fairest nymph of all the plain;
She plung'd him hopeless in a deep despair.

Dryden, Inspiring Love.

Inauthoritative. adj. Wanting authority.
All such illegal destructive acts, tho' attempted in his name, are inauthoritative, and do neither bind any man's conscience, nor tie any man's hands, from using those remedies which the laws of God and nature, as well as the common and statute-laws of the land, do allow to be used against all evil-disposed persons. — Samuel Johnson (the divine, and theological-geographer), John the Apostle, p. 181. (Ord MS.)

Inbasing. s. Inherence; inseparableness.

Let us call to mind this saying of Porphyrius, That God's providence hath not left mankind without an universal cleansing, and that the same cannot be done but by one of the beginners, that is to say, by one of the true persons or inbasings of God's essence. — Tractate of the Christian Religion, 100. (Ord MS.)
When we say the bowl is round, the boy is witty, these are proper inherent modes; for they have a sort of inbasings in the substance itself, and do not arise from the addition of any other substance to it. — Watts.

Inborn. adj. Innate; implanted by nature.
These not inborn, but inborn dilemmas,
Caskets of souls.
Led by sense of good,
I sought my useful food. — Dryden.
All passions being inborn with us, we are almost equally judges of them. — Id.
Some Carolina, to Heaven's dictates true,
Thy inborn worth with conscious eyes shall see,
And slight th' imperial dross for thee. — Addison.

Inbreathed. adj. Inspired; infused by inspiration. Rare.

Blest pair of youths, plodgers of Heaven's joy,
Sister-born harmonious sisters, Voice and Verse,
Wed your divine sounds, and mixt power employ,
Dead things with inbreathed sense now to pierce.

Milton, Ode, At a Solus Musick.

Inbred. adj. Produced within; hatched or generated within.

That other inbred cause of melancholy, is our temperance, in whole or part, which we receive from our parents. — Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 60.
The inbred delight or pleasure in secular vanities. — Dr. Jackson, Works, iii. 542.
My inbred enemy
Forth issu'd.
But he unprov'd contents their idle threat;
And inbred worth doth boasting valour slight.

Dryden.

Inbreed. v. a. Produce; raise.

It is inbred, and an impressed belief in all, that our souls have a divine original. — Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xxiii.
These abilities . . . are of power, beside the office of a pulpit, to inbreed and cherish in a great people the seeds of virtue and publick civility. — Milton, Reasons of Church Government urged against Prelacy, b. ii.
To inbreed in us this generous and christianly reverence due of another. — Ibid. b. ii.

Incége, Incélander, Incamp, Incase, Incavern, Incertain. See Encage, &c.

Incalculable. adj. Beyond calculation; not to be reckoned.

[This is a very modern word; 'his loss is incalculable,' the advantages are incalculable.] — Todd.

Incalescence. s. [Lat. incalresco = begin to grow hot; inchoative form of calio = be warm or hot.] State of growing warm; warmth; incipient heat.

Averroes restrained his hilarity, making no more thereof than Seneca commendeth, and was allowable in Calo; that is, a sober incalescence, and regulated exultation from wise. — Sir T. Browne.

Incalescent. s. Same as Incalescence.

The oil preserves the ends of the bones from incalescent, which they, being solid bodies, would necessarily contract from a swift motion. — Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Incandescence. s. [Lat. incandeo = grow, or become, white from heat; incandescere = begin to grow white from heat; pres. part. incandescens, -entis.] White heat.

By the term incandescence, or ignition, is meant that glow, or emission of light, from bodies, which appears when their heat is increased to a high degree of intensity, about the 650° of Fahrenheit's scale; and which, when it first begins, is weak and obscure, and of a red colour, but increases in brightness as the heat becomes stronger, until, in the most violent intensity of heat which we can produce, it becomes so bright and dazzling a whiteness, that the eye cannot bear it. — Black, Chemistry, l. p. 207. (Ord MS.)

Incandescant. adj. Glowing at a white heat.

The metal is hammered out when incandescant. — Encyclopædia of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Incantation. s. [Lat. canto = sing, the origin of the French chanter, whence Enchantment.] Charm uttered by singing; enchantment.

The great wonders of witches, their carrying in the air, and transforming themselves into other bodies, are reported to be wrought, not by incantations or ceremonies, but by mortifying themselves all over, and move a man to think that these fables are the effects of imagination; for ornaments, if laid on any thing thick, by stopping of the pores, shut in the vapours, and send them to the head extremely. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Incantatory. adj. Dealing by enchantment; magical.

Fortune-tellers, jugglers, geomancers, and the like incantatory impostors, daily delude them. — Sir T. Browne.

Incanting. part. adj. Enchanting, as it were; delightful. Rare.

Incanting voices, . . . poetry, mirth, and wine, raising the spirit commonly to admiration. — Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 300.

Incapability. s. Natural inability; legal disqualification.

You have nothing to urge but a kind of incapability in yourself to the service. — Sir J. Suckling.

Incapable. adj.

1. Wanting adequate power, physical or mental.
Incapable and shallow innocents!
You cannot guess who caused your father's death.

Shakespeare, Richard III. ii. 2.

2. Unable; not equal to anything: (with of).

Is not your father grown incapable of reasonable affairs? Is he not stupid With age? — Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

3. Disqualified by law.
Their lands are almost entirely taken from them, and they are rendered incapable of purchasing any more. — Nesbit.

Incapacious. adj.

1. Narrow; of small content.
Souls that are made little and incapacious cannot embrace their thoughts to take in any great compass of times or things. — Bacon.

2. Wanting power to contain or comprehend.

Buzzing them [questions of speculation] into popular ears and capacities, incapacious of them, unable to comprehend them. — Bishop Mountain, Appeal to Conscience, p. 80: 1625.

Incapacitate. v. a. Disable; weaken; disqualify.

Monstrosity could not incapacitate from warring. — Archeology.

It absolutely incapacitated them from holding rank, office, function, or property. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xi. ch. vii.

Incapacitation. s. Disqualification.

The power of incapacitation is a legislative power. — Bacon, Speech in Parliament at 1771.

Incapacity. s. [Fr. incapacité.] Want of capacity; inability; want of natural power; want of power of body; want of comprehensiveness of mind.

It chiefly proceedeth from natural incapacity, and mental indisposition. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Admonition he imputes either to envy, or else ignorance and incapacity of estimating his worth. — Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Incarcerate. v. a. [Lat. carcere = prison.] Imprison; confine.

Contagion may be propagated by bodies that easily incarcerate the infected air; as woollen clothes. — Maresq.

Incarcerate. adj. Imprisoned; confined.

When they no longer be incarcerated
In this dark dungeon.

Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, l. 2, 20.

Incarceration. s. Imprisonment; confinement.

A state of incarceration for former delinquents.
—Gillette, On the Prevalence of Souls, p. 30.

Incarne. v. a. [Lat. incarno; from caro, carnis = flesh.] Cover with flesh. Obsolete.

The flesh will soon arise in that cut of the bone, and make exfoliation of what is necessary, and incarnate it. — Wicman, Surgery.

(For another example see under Incarnative.)

Incarne. v. n. Bred flesh. Obsolete.

The slough came off, and the ulcer happily incarnated. — Wicman, Surgery.

Incaradine. v. a. [Fr. incarnadine; Italian, incarnadino = pale red.] Dye red.

Will all great Neptune's ocean wash this blood Clean from my hand? No, this my hand will rather

The multitudinous sea incarnadine,
Making the green one red.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 2.

One shall enquire three eyes, another shall upstart thy teeth, a third thy white and small Hand shall besnow, a fourth incarnadine
Thy rusie cheek.

Carver, Poems, p. 96.

Incaradine. adj. Of a red colour.

Her breast deep purple, and a scarlet back,
Her wings and train of feathers (mixed blue)
Of orient azure and incarnadine.

Sylvester, Translation of Du Bartas, 4b.
(Orl MS.)

Such whose white satin upper coat of skin,
Cut upon velvet rich incarnadine,
Has yet a body (and of flesh) within.

Lorance, Lucania, p. 129.

Incaruate. v. a. [Lat. incarnatus, pass. part. of incarno.] Clothe with flesh; embody with flesh.

He was not yet born incarnate. — Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 83.

I, who erst contended
With gods to sit the highest, am now constrain'd
Into a beast, and mix with bestial slime,
This essence to incarnate and imbrute.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 163.

If quick conceit on true discrimination, and the happy faculty of incarnating the idea of his part, are properties essential in the almost undiminished composition of a great and perfect actor, these and many more will be found in Mr. Dowton. — Cumberland, Life of Hamlet.

Incaruate. v. n. Form flesh; heal.

When Dr. James and I first viewed it (the wound), he was in a hopeful condition, and in very good temper, and began to incarnate. — Proceedings of the Royal Society, Birch, ii. 253. (Orl MS.)

Incaruate. adj.

1. Clothed with flesh; embodied in flesh.

Undoubtedly even the nature of God itself, in the person of the Son, is incarnate, and hath taken to itself flesh. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. ? Possessed.

But he's possessed,

Incarnate with a thousand imps.

Swift.

3. Deep red colour.

Yellow, pale, redde, blue, whyte, graye, and incarnate. — Quedens of Love, 1596.

For repairing, with some additions, of the rich incarnate velvet bed, being for the reception of his body, [1680]. — Parliamentary History, vol. x.
p. 300.

Incarnation. s.

1. Act of assuming body.

We must beware we exclude not the nature of God from incarnation, and so make the Son of God incarnate not to be very God. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Upon the Annunciation, or our Lady-day, meditate on the incarnation of our blest Saviour. — Jeremy Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

2. State of breeding flesh.

The pulsation under the cicatrix proceeded from the too lax incarnation of the wound. — Wicman, Surgery.

3. Colour of flesh.

The other sort of flower was of a deep incarnation, not unlike the killiflowers of Spain. — History of Peru, p. 250.

Incarnative. s. Medicine that generates flesh. Obsolete.

Such are these caustick plasters, preparatory to the incarnative, the knife, and the lance. — Hammond, Works, iv. 484.

I detested the abscess, and incarnated by the common incarnative. — Wicman, Surgery.

Incatination. s. [Lat. catina = chain.]

Enchaining.

How much more nobly would a philosopher thus employed spend his time, than by sitting at home, carelessly intent upon adding one star more to his catalogue, or one monster more to his collection still, if possible, more triflingly sedulous in the catalogue of fables, or the scripture of a cherrystone. — Giddens, Citizen of the World, let. 108.
(Orl MS.)

Incatious. adj. Unwary; negligent; heedless.

His rhetorical expressions may easily captivate any incautious reader. — Kel, Apollon Burnt.

Incatelousness. s. Want of habits of caution. Rare.

By this means is the passion strengthened, and the person whom it respects weakened, this by incatellousness and credulity, that by restraint and suppression. — Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, 144. (Orl MS.)

Inced. v. a. [Lat. incendo; pass. part. incensum.] Inflame. Obsolete.

Oh! there's a fine incenda his lustful blood.

Marton, Scourge of Villany, ii. 6; 139.

With the heat, brought with them, they incend
the brain beyond measure. — Barton, Last-day of Melancholy, p. 207.

Incediarism. s. Wilful firing of buildings, crops, or the like.

Incediarism is sometimes an act of partial insanity —
Monomaniacal incendiarism of Esquimaux pyromania.
As in the foregoing disorder, persons are sometimes impelled to the commission of this act by an irresistible impulse, which their will was incapable of overcoming. Most of these cases have occurred in girls and young women, who were either pregnant, disordered in the uterine functions. — Cupland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Although as incendiarism there is no proof of such a phenomenon as the spontaneous combustion of a living body, it must be admitted that by the action of the particles of organic or inorganic matter combustion may take place independently of the approach or contact of an ignited substance. . . . We have yet much to learn respecting the cause of this spontaneous ignition of bodies. . . . Towards the latter part of the last century several fires occurred in the Russian navy, as well as in the warehouses on shore, which were at first attributed to incendiarism, but were subsequently discovered to be owing to the spontaneous inflammation of masses of hemp and flax impregnated with oil. Experiments were made on the subject by the Imperial Academy of Sciences, and it was shown to the satisfaction of the Russian Admiralty, that such materials, when heated together, and allowed to remain for some time undisturbed, a full access of air, would spontaneously ignite. The great fire in Plymouth Dockyard in 1810 was supposed to have arisen from a similar cause, although there was a strong suspicion that it was the act of an incendiary. — Dr. A. S. Taylor, Medical Jurisprudence.

Incediary. s.

1. One who sets houses or towns on fire in malice or for robbery.

Fire too frequently involves in the common calumny persons unknown to the incendiary. — *Sir W.
Blackstone, Commentary on the Laws of England.*
(See also Incendiarism.)

2. One who inflames factions or promotes quarrels.

Incediaries of figure and distinction, who are the inventors and publishers of gross falsehoods, cannot be regarded but with the utmost detestation.
— Johnson.

Several incendiarists of Greece drove them out as incendiarists, and pests of common weals. — Bentley.

3. Simply, an exciter; whatever stirs up.
Rare.

To these two above-named causes, or incendiaries, of this rage, I may very well annex time, place, &c.
— Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 606.

Incediary. adj. Inflaming faction; promoting quarrel.

With this menace the incendiary informer left De Felice, in order to carry his threats into effect. — History of Duelling, p. 146; 1770.

Incense. s. [Lat. incensum = a thing burnt; Fr. encens.] Perfumes exhaled by fire in honour of some god or goddess.

Upon such sacrifices, my Cordelia,
The gods themselves throw incense.

Shakespeare, King Lear, v. 3.

Nunn the rites of strict religion knew;
On exhalant mid the incense due.

Prior.

Incense. v. a. Perfume with incense.
The prayers of the saints, incensed by his [Christ's] mediation and merits. — Barrow, Works, 100.

Incense. v. a. Enkindle to rage; inflame with anger; enrage; provoke; irritate to anger; heat; fire; make furious; exasperate.

The world, too sneaky with the gods,
Incense them to send destruction.

Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, i. 3.

Foul idolatries and other fables,
Heap'd to the popular sense, will so incense
God as to leave them.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 337.

How could my pious son thy pow'r incense?
Or what, alas! is vanquish'd Troy's offence?
— Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, l. 317.

Incensment. s. Rage; heat; fury.

His incensment at this moment is so implacable, that satisfaction can be none but by pang of death.
— Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Incension. s. Act of kindling; state of being on fire.

Soul loath its wilfulness by deceiving; and subtle or windy spirits are taken off by incension or evaporation. — Barrow.

Incensive. adj. Having the power of incens- ing; having a tendency to incense, kindle, inflame, excite.

To be extremely hated, and inhumanely persecuted, without any fault committed, or just occasion offered, is greatly incensive of human passions.
— Barrow, Works, iii. 15.

Incensor. s. Kindler of anger; inflamer of passions. Rare.

Many priests were impetuous and importunate
incensors of the race. — Sir J. Haycraft.

Incitative. s. That which kindles, provokes, encourages; incitement; motive; encouragement; spur, whether to good or ill:
(with to).

Generosity of opinions, to our natural constitution, is one great incitative to their reception. — Glancille, Sceptic's See, 11th ed.

It encourages speculative persons, with all the incen- citives of place, profit, and preferment. — Addison, Freeholder.

The wealth and prosperity of the southern provinces,
the hope of plunder, was of itself sufficient incitative to the lower adventures; to the nobler there was the chivalrous passion for war and enterprise; while the easier mode of obtaining pardon for sins, without the bone and toilsome, and perilous and costly journey to the Holy Land, brought the superstitions of all ranks in throngs under the conspicuous banners. — Milman, History of Latin Chris- tianity.

In the sixteenth century Queen Catherine was an obstacle to the establishment of the kingdom, an incitative to unreasonable hopes. — Froude, History of England, &c.

Incitative. adj. Inciting; encouraging:
(with to).

Competency is the most incitative to industry:
too little makes men desperate, and too much careless. — Dr. J. More, Deeds of Christian Piety.

Incipient. s. [Lat. incipio, -onis.] Begunning.

The incipient of putrefaction hath in it a maturation. — Bacon.

Many incipients are but, as Epicurus termeth them, 'tentamina,' that is, imperfect offers and assays, which vanish, and come to no substance, without iteration. — Id.

Incipient. adj. Noting beginning.

An incipient and desitive proposition, as, the firm vanish as the sun rises; but the firm have not yet begun to vanish, therefore the sun is not yet risen.
— Locke.

Incipient. s. [Latin.]

1. Beginner; one who is in his rudiments.

2. Academical term, denoting that the person is admitted to a degree which is not completed.

Incipient or regent masters in the universities, candidate. — Habot.

In the year 1574, Mr. Hooker's grace was given him for incipient of arts: Dr. Herbert Westphaling, a man of noted learning, was then vice-chancellor;
and, the act following, he was completed master. —
L. Walton, Life of Hooker.

There were only ten incipients in arts, and three in theology and jurisprudence. — T. Burton, History of English Poetry, i. 449.

Incertain. adj. Uncertain. Barbarous.

The matter is incertain. — Habot.

Lawless and incertain thoughts.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

Willing misery

Outlives incertain pomp.

Id., Timon of Athens, iv. 3.

INCERTAINLY INC

With words confused incertain tales they told.
Fairfax, Translation of Tasso.
Incertainly, adv. In an uncertain manner;
doubtfully. Barbarous.
Answer incertainly and ambiguously. Hulnot.
Incertainly, s. Uncertainty. Barbarous.
The certain lizard
Of all incertainities.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iii. 2.
Showing the corruptions, incertainities, and disagreements of those volumes. Milton, Animadversions upon a Defence of the Humble Remonstrances.
Incertainly, s. Uncertainty; doubtfulness.
Under this incertainly, let us see what the count advanced more distinctly concerning the Persons in the Deity. Bishop Lexington, Moravian com-parry, p. 9.
Differences arose upon the sense and interpretation of these laws. Thus we were brought back to our old incertitude.—Burke, Vindication of Natural Society, c.
Incassant, adj. [Lat. cessans, -antis; pres.
part. of cesso—cease.] Unceasing; unin-termitted; continual; uninterrupted.
The incassant weeping of my wife,
Fore'd me to seek delays.
Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, i. 1.
If, by prayer
Incassant could hope to change the will
Of him who all things can, I would not cesso
To weary him with my incassant cries.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 307.
Incassantly, adv. In an incessant manner;
without intermission; continually.
With his hands most filthy incassant.
Above the water were on high extent,
And fain'd to wash themselves incassantly.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.
Who reads
Incassantly, and to his reading brings not
A spirit and judgement equal or superior.
Milton, Paradise Regain'd, iv. 323.
The Christians, who carried their religion through so many persecutions, were incassantly comforting one another with the example and history of our Saviour and his apostles.—Liddon.
Incassable, adj. Unceasing; continual.
Rare.
The incassable blows which still do wound our ears.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iii. 4.
Inccest, s. [Fr. inceste; Lat. incestum.] Unnatural and forbidden conjunction of persons within degrees prohibited.
It's not a kind of incest to take life
From thine own sister's shame?
Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.
They call incest an unlawful weddling of a man with a woman, nam'd the honour of blood and affinitie. For incestus signifieth the marriage circle, which the bride did wear, to shew that the marriage was just and lawful.—Translation of Baltha-zar's Sermon, p. 236.
He who entered in the first act, a young man like Pericles, prince of Tyre, must not be in danger in the fifth act of committing incest with his daughter.
—Dryden, Translation of Inflexion's Act of Pointing.
[The etymology, which has been assigned to the Latin word, is more simple, viz. in and cestus. And the Latin word, as well as the Italian, means also any forbidden union between the sexes. See Baldelli's Life of Giovanni, note, p. 161. "Per incesto li Brevicis non intendere soltanto la culpa che maiechi li consumaimes letto, ma ogni illegittimo commercio."—Totti.]
Inccestuous, adj. Guilty of incest; guilty of unnatural copulation.
Hide thee, thou bloody hand,
Thou perjur'd, and thou simular man of virtue,
Thou art inccestuous.
Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 2.
We may easily guess with what impudence the world would have heard an inccestuous Herod discussing of chastity.—South, Sermons.
Ere you reach to this inccestuous love,
You must divine and human rights remove.
Dryden.
Inch, s. [A.S. ince; Lat. uncia.]
1. Measure of length supposed equal to three grains of barley laid end to end; the twelfth part of a foot.
A foot is the sixth part of the stature of man, a span one eighth of it, and a thumb's breadth or inch one seventh-second.—Hollier.
The sun should never miss, in all his race,
Of time one minute, or one inch of space.
Sir R. Blackmore.
2. Proverbial name for a small quantity.
The plebeians have not your fellow tribunes;
They'll give him death by inch.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 4.

INCI

As in lasting, so in length is man,
Contracted to an inch, who was a span. Donne.
Is it so desirable a condition to consume by inches,
and lose one's blood by drops?—Collier.
The commoners were growing by degrees into power and property, pained ground upon the patricians inch by inch.—Swift.
3. A nice point of time.
Beldame, I think we watch'd you at an inch.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. i. 4.

Inch, v. a.
1. Drive by inches.
Valiant they say, but very popular;
He gets too far into the soldiers' graces,
And inches out my master. Dryden, Cleomenes.
2. Deal out by inches; give sparingly.
The rest are commonly too sparing, in the inching out of the possibility of our assurance by nice distinctions.—Bishop Hall, Kermans, p. 267.

Inch, v. n. Advance or retire a little at a time.
Now Turnus doubts, and yet disdains to yield,
But with slow paces measures back the field,
And inches to the walls.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, ix. 1064.

Inchardable, adj. Uncharitable. Barbarous.
You bawling, blasphemous, inchardable dog!
Shakespeare, Tempest, i. 1.

Inchastity, s. Want or loss of chastity.
Barbarous.
On those women, who pretend that poverty pro-voketh to inchastity.—Jordan, Poems, § 2.

Inchmeal, s. Piece an inch long; (construction often adverbial). See Piecemeal.
All the infections that the sun sucks up
From bogs, fens, flats, on Prospero fall, and make him
By inchmeal a disease. Shakespeare, Tempest, ii. 2.

Inchoate, v. a. [Lat. inchoatus, pass. part. of inchoo.] Begin; commence.
Plato mentions that the great soul of this world does at least inchoate, and rudely delineate, the fa-brick of our body at first. Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, Notes, p. 383: 1617.
The higher congruity of life being yet but imperfectly inchoate.—Glanville, On the Pre-existence of Souls, p. 130.

Inchoate, adj. Begun; entered upon.
Oh, that all the saints of God, in a comfortable grace of their inchoate blessedness, could sing for joy.—Bishop Hall, Christ's Meditations, § 8.
The proportion of the imperfect, inchoate, very moderate state of the Christian in this life.—Hammond, Works, iv. 585.

It was just that the State should refuse to cancel any of the equitable or inchoate rights, which could be shown to have arisen under the Act of 1701, without the consent of parties. Gladstone, The State in its Relations with the Church, b. ii. ch. ix.

Inchoately, adv. In an inchoate or incipient degree.
Whether as fully just by thy gracious imputation, or as inchoately just by thy gracious inspiration.—
Bishop Hall, Works, ii. 205.

Inchoation, s. Beginning.
It discerneth four of kinds of causes; forces, frauds, crimes, various of malignant, and the inchoations or middle acts towards crimes capital, not actually perpetrated. Bacon.
The setting on foot some of those arts in those parts would be looked upon as the first inchoation of them, which yet would be but their reviving. Sir M. Hale, Originall of Mankind.
There is another life in which those divine inchoations shall be completed.—Glanville, Sermons,
p. 291.

Inchoative, adj. Inceptive; noting inchoation or beginning.
These acts of our intellect seem to be some inchoative or imperfect rays.—W. Montague, Divine Knays, pt. I. p. 387: 1648.

Incid, v. a. [Lat. incido, from in + cedo = cut.] Make an incision; cut.
Incid, v. n. Act in the way of incision.
Medicines are said to incide which consist of pointed and sharp particles; as acids, and most salts, by which the particles of other bodies are divided from one another: thus expectorating medicines are said to incide or cut the phlegm. Quincy.
The menses are promoted by all saponaceous substances, which incide the mucus in the first passages.—Arbuthnot.
'Cut the phlegm' is a common expression.

Incidence, s. [Lat. incido, from in + cedo = fall.] See Extracts.
The direction with which one body strikes upon another, and the angle made by that line, and the plane struck upon, is called the angle of incidence.

INCI

In the occurrences of two moving bodies, their incidence is said to be perpendicular or oblique, as their direction or line of motion make a straight line or an oblique angle at the point of contact.—
Quincy.
In mirrors there is the like arch of incidence, from the object to the glass, and from the glass to the eye.—Bacon.
In equal incidences there is a considerable inequality of refractions, whether it be that some of the incident rays are refracted more and others less constantly, or one and the same ray by refraction disturbed. Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.
The permanent whiteness argues, that in like incidence of the rays there is no such separation of the emerging rays.—Ibid.

Incideny, s. Same as Incidence.
What incideny thou dost guess of harm declare,
Is creeping towards me.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 2.

He enjoys his happy state most when he communicates it, and receives a more vigorous joy from the reflection than from the direct incideny of his happiness.—Norris.

Incident, adj. [Lat. incident, -entis; Fr.
incident.] 1. Falling on anything.
The shaft of the candlestick had four bowles, with six branches proceeding from it. And that the incident light it gave to the table and the altar might be the more conveniently reflected, it was necessary it should be higher than them both.—Grege, Cos-mographie Sacra, iv. ch. viii. (Ord MS.)

2. Casual; fortuitous; occasional; happening accidentally; issuing in beside the main design; happening beside expectation.
As the ordinary course of common affairs is disposed of by general laws, so likewise men's incident necessities and utilities should be with special equity considered. Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity.
In a complex proposition the predicate or subject is sometimes made complex by the pronouns who, which, whose, whom, &c. which make another proposition; as, every man, who is pious, shall be saved; Julius, whose surname was Cæsar, overcame Pompey; bodies, which are transparent, have many pores. Here the whole proposition is called the primary or chief, and the additional proposition is called an incident proposition.—Watts.

3. Happening; apt to happen.
Constancy is such a firmness of friendship as overlooks all those failures of kindness, that through passion, inches at to human nature, a man may be guilty of. South, Sermons.

4. Liable.
A contented and cheerful submission to the will of God in the saddest condition to which human nature is incident.—Archbishop Tillotson, v. 314.
(Ord MS.)

Incident, s. Something happening beside the main design; casually.
His wisdom will fall into it as an incident to the point of lawfulness. Bacon, Advancement touching a Holy War.
No person, no incident in the play, but must be of use to carry on the main design. Dryden, Translation of D'Avenant's Act of Binding.
In the Italian republics, the celebrated party division of Guelfs and Ghiblins was derived from the conflict between the Emperor and the Pope; afterwards other party distinctions, as that of the Neri and Bianchi at Florence, were founded on incidents peculiar to each State.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion,
ch. viii.

Incidental, adj. Incident; casual; happening by chance; not intended; not deliberate; not necessary to the chief purpose.
The satisfaction you received from those incidental discourses which we have wandered into.—
Milton.
By some religious duties scarce appear to be regarded at all, and by others only as an incidental business, to be done when they have nothing else to do. Rogers.

Incidental, s. Accident.
To say the truth, either in the case of death or life, almost every body and every thing is a cause or object for humanity, even prosperity itself, and health itself; so many weak pitiful incidental attend on them.—Pope.

Incidentally, adv. In an incidental manner; beside the main design; occasionally.
These general rules are but occasionally and incidentally mentioned in Scripture, rather to manifest unto us a former, than to lay upon us a new obligation. Bishop Sanderson.
I treat either purposely or incidentally of colour.
—Dogbe.

Incidentally. adv. Occasionally; by the way; incidentally? (the latter being the commoner word).

It was incidentally moved amongst the judges what should be done for the king himself, who was attacked; but resolved that the crown takes away defects.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Incinerate. v. a. [Lat. cinis, -eris, pl. cineres = ashes.] Reduce to ashes: (in the first extract, though there is no name of the object incinerated, the verb is active rather than neuter).

By baking, without melting, the heat indurates, then maketh fragile; lastly, it doth incinerate and calcinate.—Bacon.

That power which is requisite to raise a body now putrefied and incinerated.—Bartholin, Sermons, p. 1847.

These drops are soon incinerated and calcined into such salts which produce coughs.—Harvey, Discourse on Consumption.

Incinerate. adj. Reduced to ashes.

Fire burneth wood, making it first luminous, then black and brittle, and lastly broken and incinerate.—Bacon.

Incineration. s. Act of burning anything to ashes; state of anything incinerated.

The phoenix kind,
Of whose incineration,
There riseth a new creation.

Those quarrels are of all the most obstinate, which arise out of the incineration of a former state.—Sir H. Wotton, Remains, p. 470.

I observed in the flat salt of urine, brought by decomposition to be very white, a taste not unlike common salt, and very different from the caustic saline taste of other salts made by incineration.—Hogel.

Incipient. adj. [Lat. incipiens, -entis, pres. part. of incipio = begin.] Commencing.

Certainly in any sense, a second or third fluxion seems an obscure mystery. The incipient celebrity of an incipient celebrity, the nascent argument of a nascent argument, i.e. of a thing which hath no nascentness, &c.—Bishop Berkeley, Analogy, § 4.

Incircumscribable. adj. Not to be bound, confined, or circumscribed.

When thou speakest of God, thou must consider a thing that in nature is single, without composition, without conversion; that is invisible, immortal, incircumscribable, incomprehensible.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 348.

Incircumscription. s. Absence of circumscription, limit, or definite boundary.

As God preserves man by his mercy, so his mercy hath all its operations upon man, and returns to its own centre and incircumscription and infinity unless it issues forth upon us.—Jeremy Taylor, Miracles of Divine Mercy, (Ord MS.).

Incircumspect. adj. Wanting circumspection.

Our fashions of eating make us unready to labour incircumspect, inconsiderate, heady, rash.—Tyndal, Exposition of St. Matthew, vi.

Incircumspection. s. Want of caution, heed, or circumspection.

An unexpected way of delusion, whereby he more easily led away the incircumspection of their belief.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Incise. v. a. [Fr. inciser; Lat. incisus, pass. part. of incido = cut in.] Lucide. Obsolete.

If Truth's hand Incise the story of our land,
Posterity shall see a fair Structure.—Carew, Poems, p. 79.

Nor had his love to any (had not stone
And stocks discover'd it) been ever known;
Which, (for on them he us'd his plants 'incise,')
By chance presented it to Sylvia's eyes.—Shakespeare, Translation from St. Asaph's.

Incised. adj. Cut; made by cutting: (as, 'an incised wound').

I brought the incised lips together.—Herman, Surgery.

Incision. s.

1. Cut; wound made with a sharp instrument.

Let us make incision for your love,
To prove whose blood is reddish, his or mine.—Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, II. 1.

The reception of one is as different from the admission of the other, as when the earth falls open under the incisions of the plough, and when it gapes to drink in the dew of heaven, or the refreshments of a shower.—South, Sermons.

Used adjectively.

A small incision knife is more handy than a larger for opening the bag.—Sharp, Surgery.

2. In Medicine. Cutting as of phlegm. See Incide.

Absterion is a securing off, or incision of viscous humours, and making them fluid, and cutting between them and the part; as in vitreous water, which curdles linen.—Bacon.

Incisive. adj. Having the quality of cutting or dividing; sharp; trenchant.

The colour of many corpuscles will cohere by being precipitated together, and be destroyed by the effusion of very piercing and incisive liquors.—Hogel.

Incisor. s. Cutting tooth.

The incisors of the upper jaw are larger and broader than those of the lower.—De Meuse, On the Teeth.

No marvellous animal is devoid of incisors in the upper jaw, like the ordinary ruminants of the placental series.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Incisure. s. Cut; aperture; incision.

In some creatures it is wide, in some narrow, in some with a deep incisure up into the head, for the better catching and holding of prey, and communicating of hard food.—Jerham.

Incitation. s. Incitement; incentive; motive; impulse; act of inciting; power of inciting.

After that Dionise, by their incitation, had expelled Plato out of Sicily, they abandoned their limits and severity.—Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, fol. 129.

Dr. Ridley defines magnetical attraction to be a natural incitation and disposition conforming unto cohesivity, an union of one magnetical body unto another.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The multitude of objects do proportionally multiply both the possibilities and incitations.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Incite. v. a. [Lat. incito; Fr. inciter.] Stir up; push forward in a purpose; animate; spur; urge on.

Antiochus, when he incited Persians to join in war, set before him the greatness of the Re- paring it to a fire, that took and spread from kingdom to kingdom.—Bacon.

Nature and common reason, in all difficulties, where prudence or courage are required, do rather incite us to fly for assistance to a single person than a multitude.—Sieff.

Incitement. s. Motive; incentive; impulse; inciting cause.

A narrow it were, if a man of great capacity, having such incitements to make him desirous of all furtherances unto his cause, could espy in the whole scripture of God nothing which might breed at the least a probable opinion of likelihood, that it authority was the incite way inclinable.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Let his act speak him; and this shield, Let down from n, that to his youth will yield Such copy of incitement.—R. Jonson, Jacques at Court.

Hartlib seems sent hither by some good providence, to be the incitement of great good to this island.—Milton.

But if thou must reform the stubborn times, Avenging on the son the father's crimes, And from the long records of distant age Derive incitements to renew thy race, Say from what period then has Jove design'd To date his vengeance?—Pope, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad of Statius.

Inciter. s. One who, or that which, incites.

They held it as an inciter.—Filliam, Rindres, II. 34.

All this which I have depicted to thee, are inciters and rousers of my mind.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, in 6.

Incivility. s.

1. Want of courtesy; rudeness.

He does offend against that reverence which is due to the common apprehensions of mankind, whether true or not, which is the greatest incivility.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Act of rudeness: (in this sense it has a plural.)

Abstain from dissolute laughter, uncivil jests, loud talking and jervine, which, in civil account, are called incivilities and incivilities.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of holy Living.

Inclination. s. [Lat. inclinationis, -onis, from inclamo = call out with the idea of blame.] Blame.

What the kind of label is in all the bright both of his state and superstition, homing his solemn day with his richest devotion, steps forth a prophet of God, and interrupts that glorious service, with a loud inclination of judgement.—Bishop Hall, Jeroboam, (Ord MS.).

No less in their inclination at the insulting frumps, than zealous of their own safety and reputation, do these idolatrous prophets now read their threats with inclination.—Id., Jewish with the Banister, (Ord MS.).

Inclavated. adj. [Lat. clavatus; clavus = nail, peg, club.] Sic; fast fixed.

(teeth) are more firmly inclavated, and inclined into the jaw bones, by triple or quadruple roots.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 81: 1000.

Inclavency. s. Unmercifulness; cruelty; severity; harshness; roughness; want of clemency.

And though by tempests of the prize bereft,

In heaven's inclavency some ease we find;
Our foes we vanquish'd by our valour lost,
And only yielded to the seas and wind.—Dryden, Anna Mirabilis, xxx.

Inclément. adj. Unmerciful; un pitying; void of tenderness; harsh.

Teach us further by what means to slum
The inclément seasons, rain, ice, hail, and snow.—Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 1002.

Naked, defenceless, on a barren land;

Propitious to my wants, a vest supply,
To guard the wretched from the inclément sky.—Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, vi. 212.

Inclinable. adj.

1. Having a propension of will; favourably disposed; willing; tending by disposition.

A marvel it were, if a man of capacity could espy in the whole scripture nothing which might breed a probable opinion, that divine authority was the same way inclinable.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

With to.

The gall and bitterness of certain men's writings, who spared him little, made him, for their sakes, the less inclinable to that truth which he himself should have honoured.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Desire,

Inclinable now grown to touch or taste,

Solicited her long eye.—Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 712.

2. Having a tendency.

If such a crust naturally fell, then it was more likely and inclinable to fall this thousand years than the last; but if the crust was always gradually weaker and nearer to falling, that it, that it had not ended eternally.—Leathly.

Inclination. s.

1. Tendency towards any point: (with to).

The two rays, being equally refracted, have the same inclination to one another after refraction which they had before; that is, the inclination of half a degree answering to the sun's diameter.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

2. Natural upness.

Though most of the thick woods are crumbled up since the promontory has been cultivated, the still many spots of it which shew the natural inclination of the soil lends that way.—Addison.

3. Propension of mind; favourable disposition; incipient desire: (with to).

The king was wonderfully disquieted, when he found that the prince was totally alienated from all thoughts of or inclination to the warlike.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

A mere inclination to a thing is not properly a willing of that thing; and yet, in matters of duty, men frequently reckon it for such: for otherwise how should they so often plead and rest in the honest and well inclined disposition of their minds, when they are justly charged with an actual non-performance of the law?—South, Sermons.

4. Love; affection; regard: (in this sense it admits for).

We have had few knowing painters, because of the little inclination which princes have for painting.—Dryden.

5. Disposition of mind.

Report the features of Octavia, her years,

Her inclination.—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, II. 5.

6. Fancy.

This was the character of Monsieur Huet, who was a great inclination of mine, tho' he pass'd for a humorous man.—Sir W. Temple, I. 438. (Ord MS.).

7. Flexion; act of bowing.

There was a pleasant arbor, not by art

But of the trees own inclination made.—Spenser, Faerie Queene.

To sit, doth not (here) signify an inclination or flexion, any determinate location or position, of the body.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. vi.

8. Tendency of the magnetical needle, to the east or west.

It was found to be this very inclination to the axis of the earth; and proportionally, though not equally, answering to the degrees of latitude.—Gregory, Posthuma, p. 282; 1650.

9. In Pharmacy. Act by which a clear liquor is poured off from some faeces or sediment by merely stooping the vessel; decantation.

Inclinatoryly, adv. Obliquely; with inclination to one side or the other: with some deviation from north and south.

Whether they be refrigerated inclinatoryly, or somewhat equinoctially, that is, toward the eastern or western points, they discover some verticity.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.

Inclinatory, adj.

1. Having a quality of inclining to one or other.

If that inclinatory virtue be destroyed by a touch from the contrary pole, that end which before was elevated will then decline.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errours.

2. Applied to the magnetical needle.

This needle, touched with the stone, and directing towards the north and south, the mariners, as the mathematical philosophers, call their directory needle; not only for the reason intimated, but to distinguish it also from the other, called the inclinatory needle.—Gregory, Posthuma, p. 241.

Incline, v. n. [Lat. inclino; Fr. incliner.]

1. Bend; lean; tend towards any part: (generally with to or towards).

Her house inclined unto death, and her path into the dead.—Proverbs, ii. 14.
Still to this place
My heart inclined, still hither turn my eyes;
Hither my feet unbidden lead their way. Rome.

2. Bend the body; bow.

The winged warrior low inclined
At his Creator's feet with reverence due,
Paisley, Translation of Jerusalem
Isaiah, ix. 60.
Adam bow'd low; he, kindly, from his state
inclined not, but his coming thus declared.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 240.

3. Be favourably disposed to; feel desire beginning.

Both his majesty
inclined to it or no? He seems indifferent;
Or rather swaying more upon our part.
Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 1.
Their hearts inclined to follow Abimelech.—Judges, ix. 3.

Incline, v. a.

1. Give a tendency or direction to any place or state.

The timely dew of sleep,
Now falling with soft slumberous weight, inclines
Our eyelids. Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 614.
A towering structure to the palace join'd;
To this his steps the thoughtful prince inclined.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, l. 637.
Thus far both armies to Belinda yield;
Now to the baron fate inclines the field.
Id., Rape of the Lock, canto iii.

2. Turn towards anything, as desirous or attentive.

Incline our hearts to keep this law.—Book of Common Prayer, Communion Service.
But they hearkened not, nor inclined their ear.—Jeremiah, vii. 24.
But that from us might should ascend to heaven
So prevalent, as to concern the mind
Of God high-blessed, or to inclined his will,
Hard to belief may seem, yet this will prayer.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 143.

9. Bend.

An embracing vine,
Whose boughs hanging down seem'd to entice
All passers-by to taste their luscious wine,
And did themselves into their hands inclined,
As freely offering to be gathered.

With due respect my lady inclined. Dryden.
As to some being of superior kind.

Incluse, See Encluse.

Incluse, v. a. [Lat. includo, pass. part. inclusus; claudo = shut.]

1. Enclose; shut in: (as, 'The shell includes a pearl').

2. Comprise; comprehend.

This desire being recommended to her majesty, it liked her to include the same within one intire lease.—Bacon.
Instead of enquiring whether he be a man of virtue, the question is only whether he be a whig or tory; under which terms all good and ill qualities are included.—Swift.

Inclusion, s. Act of including.

The Dutch should have obliged themselves to make no peace without the inclusion of their allies.—Sir W. Temple, Letter to the Duke of Ormond, Works, vol. i. (Ord MS.)

Inclusive, adj.

1. Enclosing; encircling.
(1.) would that the inclusive verge
Of golden metal, that must round my brow,
Were red-hot steel, to sear me to the brain.
Shakespeare, Richard III. iv. 1.

2. Comprehended in any sum or number: (as, 'From Wednesday to Saturday inclusive'—both Wednesday and Saturday taken into the number).

I'll search where every virtue dwells,
From courts inclusive down to cells. Swift.

Inclusively, adv. In an inclusive manner.
Thus much shall serve for the several periods or growth of the common law, until the time of Edward I. inclusively.—Sir M. Hale.

Incluser, Inocach. See Encluser, &c.

Incoercible, adj. [Lat. coerceo = compel.] I capable of being compelled.

The same author, for the production of this effect, accuses something of a wild and incoercible nature latent in that charcoal.—James, Health Preserver, (Ord MS.)

Incoexistence, s. Quality of not existing together; non-association of existence.

Another more incurable part of ignorance, which sets us more remote from a certain knowledge of the coexistence or incoexistence of different ideas in the same subject, is, that there is no discoverable connection between any secondary quality and those primary qualities it depends on.—Locke.

Incoffin. See Encoffin.

Incogn, s. adj. and adv. [contraction of Incognito.] Unknown; private.

Some words are hitherto but fairly split, and therefore only in their way to perfection; as incogn, and plénip; but in a short time, it is to be hoped, they will be further docked to inc, and plen.—Tatler, no. 230.

No, no, let me alone. I'll go incogn; leave my chariot at some distance; proceed prudently, and take care of myself.—Colman the elder, The Jealous Wife, iv. 1.

There were odd whispers of her parentage. Every potentate was, in turn, entitled to the gratitude of mankind for the creation of this marvel. Now, it was an emperor; now, it was a king. A cruel duke then put in his claim; and then an archduke. To-day, she was married; to-morrow, she was single. To-day her husband was a prince incogn; to-morrow, a drum-major well known. Even her name was a mystery.—H. Disraeli, The Young Duke, b. iii. ch. iii.

Incoignable, adj. Unthought of.

The most flagitious, incoignable fact.—Dean King, Sermon on the 6th of November, 1694, p. 31.

Incoignancy, s. Want of thought.

It cannot argue any want of judgement in the author, but mere incoignancy only.—Ferrand, Love Melancholy, p. 112; 1650.

Which action, done out of a sudden incoignancy, might pass for but a weakness.—South, Sermons, vii. 211.

Incoignant, adj. [Lat. incogitans.] Thoughtless; inconsiderate.

His first example saith, 'It is a just law that every one shall severally enjoy his estate in lands or otherwise.' Does this law attain to no good end? The law will bludge at this most incoignant woodcock.—Milton, Colasterion.

Men are careless and incoignant, and slip into the pit of destruction before they are aware.—Goodman, Winter Evening Conference, pt. ii.

Incoignantly, adv. In an incoignant manner; without consideration.

Some . . . do not imprudently or incoignantly refer the prayers and fasting to the valediction of Paul and Barnabas.—Kantabull, A valediction upon some different Texts in all the Books of the New Testament, p. 140.

did not incoignantly speak of irregularities, as if they might sometimes be but seeming ones.—Boyle, Free Enquiry, p. 247. (Ord MS.)

Men almost as often speak incoignantly, as they think silently.—Harriot, Sermon on St. James, iii. 2.

Incoignative, adj. Wanting the power of thought.

Purely material beings, as clippings of our beards, and sensible, thinking, perceiving beings, such as we find ourselves, we will call cogitative and incoignative beings.—Locke.

Incoignativity, s. Incapability 'of being thought.

God may superadd a faculty of thinking to incoignativity.—Wollaston.

Incoignito, adv. In a state of concealment.

'Twas long ago
Since gods came down incoignito. Prior, The Laidle.
The prince royal of Prussia came thither incoignito.—Tatler, no. 17.
He designs to stay there incoignito a few days.—Bishop Berkeley, Letter to T. Prior: 1733.

Incoignable, adj. Incapable of cognition.
As by a recent intelligence, the space between the two coexistent points is incoignable; and as their coexistence cannot be otherwise conceived, it follows that at first they cannot be known as co-existent.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Incoherence, s.

1. Want of cohesion; looseness of material parts.

If plaster be beaten into an impalpable powder, when poured out it will circulate a liquor, by reason that the smallness and incoherence of the parts do both unke them easy to be put into motion, and makes the pores they intercept so small, that they interrupt not the unity or continuity of the mass.—Boyle.

2. Want of connection; incongruity; inconsequence of argument; want of dependence of one part upon another.

I find that laying the intermediate ideas naked in their due order, shews the incoherence of the arguments better than syllogisms.—Locke.
Incoherence in matter, and suppositions without proofs, but handsomely together, are apt to pass for strongly reason.—Id.

Incoherent, adj.

1. Wanting cohesion; loose; not fixed to each other.

Had the strata of stone become solid, but in matter whereof they consist continued lax and incoherent, they had consequently been as pervious as those of marble or gravel.—Woodward.

2. Inconsequential; inconsistent; having no dependence of one part upon another.

We have instances of perception whilst we are asleep, and retain the memory of them; but how extravagant and incoherent are they, and how little conformable to the perfection of a rational being!—Locke.

Incoherently, adv. In an incoherent manner; inconsistently; inconsequentially.

The character of Eurycleus is the imitation of a person confounded with fears, speaking irrationally and incoherently.—Beattie, Notes on the Odyssey.

Incoiden. See Encoiden.

Incoignity, s. [Fr. incolumité; Lat. incolumitas; incolumis = safe.] Safety. Rare.

The parliament is necessary to assert and preserve the national rights of a people, with the incolumity and welfare of a country.—Howell.

Incombining, part. pref. Averse to combination.

To sow the sorrow of man's nativity with seed of two incombining and incombining dispositions.—Milton, Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, l. 30.

Incombustibility, s. Incapability of combustion.

The stone in the Apennines is remarkable for its shining quality, and the amount has for its incombustibility. Rap.

Incombustible, adj. Incapable of combustion; not consumable by fire.

It agrees in this common quality ascribed unto both, of being incombustible, and not consumable by fire.—Bishop Wilkins.

Incombustible cloth is a tissue of the fibrous mineral called amianthum or asbestos.—Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

Income, s. That which comes in: (common in its second sense).

1. Admission; introduction; incoming.

He that walks up unto that light, and improves that strength, which God had already communicated unto him, shall have more abundant incomes of light and strength from God.—Bishop East, Discourse of Truth, § 17.

Those were divine flames, the joys and incomes of the Holy Ghost.—Glavinella, Sermons, iii. p. 170.

Even among the devouter Turks and Heathens we may find as notorious instances of those incomes and enlargements, as in any of our modern histories of Christian experience.—Dr. J. Scott, Works, ii. p. 129; 1718.

2. Revenue.

Thou who repositest at the plenty of thy neighbour, and the gratuity of his incomes, consider what are frequently the dismal consequences of all this.—South, Sermons.

No fields afford
So large an income to the village lord.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 284.

First element of a compound; as in income-tax—tax levied upon a person's annual income.

Incœming. part. pref. Coming in: (as, 'an incœming, opposed to an 'outgoing tenant').

Incœmmensurability. s. State of one thing with respect to another, when they cannot be compared by any common measure.

Mr. W. Warner made an inverted logarithmic table, whereas Briggs's table fills his margin with numbers, encumbering by unites, and overgaining them with logarithms, which, because of incœmmensurability, must needs be either abundant or deficient.—Autogr. Anecdotes, ii. 579.

Incœmmensurable. adj. Not reducible to any common measure; not to be measured together, so as to allow the proportion of one thing to another to be stated.

Our disputations about vacuum or space, incœmmensurable quantities, the infinite divisibility of matter, and eternal duration, will lead us to see the weakness of our nature.—Watts.

Incœmmensurate. adj. Not admitting one common measure.

The diagonal line and side of a quadrato, which, to our apprehension, are incœmmensurate, are yet commensurate to the infinite comprehension of the divine intellect.—Dr. H. More.

Incœmixture. s. State of being unmixed.

In what parity and incœmixture the languages of that people stood, which were casually discovered in the heart of Spain, between the mountains of Castile, no longer ago than in the time of Duke TAlava, we have not met with a good account farther than that their words were Basquish or Cantabrian.—Sir T. Browne, Miscellanea, p. 135.

Incœmodate. r. a. Incœmode. Rare.

Neither know I whether is more hard to manage of the two; a dejected estate, or prosperous; whether we may be more incœmodated with a rusty horse, or with a tired one.—Bishop Hall, Of Contentation, § 2.

Incœmode. r. a. Put to trouble or inconvenience; embarrass.

Temporal pressures and adversities . . . may sometimes incœmode the man, yet can never reach the spirit; and, though they break theasket, can never come at the jewel.—South, Sermons, vi. 131.

Incœmodation. s. Inconvenience.

What incœmodation is that, after the brisk native heat of the sun in the day-time, to have the variety of the more mild beams of the moon.—Annotations on Glauville, p. 115: 1652.

Incœmodement. s. Inconvenience. Rare.

I persisted in my ordinary course of living and business, though with severe incœmodement.—Cheyne, English Malady, p. 315: 1753.

Incœmodious. adj. Inconvenient; troublesome.

Things of general benefit, for in this world what is so perfect that no inconvenience doth ever follow it? may by some accident be incœmodious to a few.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Men's intentions in speaking are to be understood, without frequent explanations and incœmodious interruptions.—Locke.

Incœmodiously. adv. In an inconvenient manner; inconveniently; not at ease.

I told how myself had stood so incœmodiously by means of the great press, as I heard it not well.—Harington, Brief View of the Church of England, p. 180: 1653.

Incœmodiousness. s. Attribute suggested by inconvenient; inconvenience.

Diseases, disorders, and the incœmodiousness of external nature, are inconsistent with happiness.—Bishop Burnet.

Incœmodity. s. Inconvenience; trouble.

Declare your opinion, what incœmodity you have conceived to be in the common law, which I would have thought must free from all such dislike.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

If iron can be incorporated with flint or stone, without over great charge, or other incœmodity, the obscure doth make the compound still profitable.—Bacon.

By considering the region and the winds, one might so cast the rooms, which shall most need fire, that he should little fear the incœmodity of monk.—Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

Incœmunicability. s. Incapability of being communicated.

The incœmunicability of this place with many out of his church.—Hales, Golden Remains, p. 181.

Incœmunicable. adj.

1. Incapable of being communicated; not to be made the common right, property, or quality of more than one.

Light without darkness is the incœmunicable claim of him that dwells in light inaccessible.—Glauville.

It was agreed on both sides, that there was one supreme excellency, which was incœmunicable to any creature.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

2. Not to be expressed; not to be told.

Neither did he treat them with these peculiarities of favour in the extraordinary discoveries of the gospel only, but also of these incœmunicable revelations of the divine love, in reference to their own personal interest in it.—South, Sermons.

Incœmunicableness. s. Attribute suggested by Incœmunicable.

As by honouring him, we acknowledge him God, so by the incœmunicableness of honour we acknowledge him one God.—Made, Apology of the latter Times, p. 33.

Incœmunicably. adv. In an incœmunicable manner.

To annihilate is both in reason, and by the consent of divines, as incœmunicably the effect of a power divine, and above nature, as is creation itself.—Hickewell, Apology.

Incœmunicability. part. pref. Not imparted.

Excellencies, so far as we know, incœmunicated to any creature.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Idolatry, ch. ii.

Incœmunicating. part. pref. Having no intercourse with each other.

The judgements and administrations of common justice are preserved from that confusion that would ensue, if the administration was by several incœmunicating hands, or by provincial establishments.—Sir M. Hale, Common Law.

Incœmûtable. adj. Incapable of commutation.

Such attributes are essentially incœmûtable.—Cuthworth, Intellectual System. (Oral MR.)

Incœmûtability. s. Incapability of commutation; unchangeableness. Rare.

This order, by its own incœmûtability, keeps all things mutable within their several ranks and conditions, which otherwise would run into confusion.—Translation of Boehme, p. 187: Oct. 1671.

Incœmpacted. part. pref. Not joined; not cohering.

Salt, say they, is the basis of solidity and permanency in compound bodies, without which the other four elements might be variously blended, but would remain incœmpacted.—Bogle.

Incœmparable. adj. Excellent beyond comparison or competition.

My heart would not suffer me to omit any occasion, whereby I might make the incœmparable Pamela see how much extraordinary devotion I bore to her service.—Sir P. Sidney.

If I could leave this argument of your incœmparable beauty, I might turn to one which would equally oppress me with its greatness.—Dryden.

Incœmparably. adv. In an incœmparable manner.

1. Beyond comparison; without competition.

A founder it had, whom I think incœmparably the wisest man that ever the French church did enjoy, since the hour it enjoyed him.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Excellently; in the highest degree.

There are the heads of Antoninus Pius, the Faustinas, and Marcus Aurelius, all incœmparably well cut.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Incœmpared. part. pref. Unmatched; peerless. Rare.

That Mautian poet's incœmpared spirit, Whose pirland now is set in highest place.—Spenser, Sonnet to Sir E. Walsingham.

Incœmpass. s. See Encompass.

Incœmpassion. s. Want of compassion or pity.

We are full of incœmpassion: . . . we have little fellow-feeling of their griefs.—Bishop Sanderson, Sermons, p. 148: 1681.

Incœmpassionate. adj. Void of pity, tenderness, or compassion.

Perhaps the sea to my afflicted state Will prove than her less incœmpassionate.—Sherburne, Poems, Lydia: 1651.

Incœmpassionateness. s. Attribute suggested by Incœmpassionate; want of tenderness or pity.

The incœmpassionateness of other great men which were merciless, cruel, and hard-hearted.—Granger, Commentary on Ecclesiastes, p. 16: 1621.

Incœmpatibility. s. Incapacity of one thing with another.

He overcame that natural incœmpatibility, which hath been noted between the vulgar and the sovereign favour.—Sir H. Wotton.

Incœmpatible. adj. Inconsistent with something else; incapable of subsisting or being possessed together with something else.

Fortune and love have ever been so incœmpatible, that it is no wonder, madam, if having had so much of the one for you, I have ever found so little of the other for myself.—Sir J. Suckling.

We know those colours which have a friendship with each other, and those which are incœmpatible, by mixing together those colours of which we would make trial.—Dryden.

You say that your half-pay was given you by way of pension. I will not dwell upon the singularity of untine in your own person two sorts of provision, which in their own nature, and in all military and parliamentary views, are incœmpatible.—Junius, Letters, let. vii.

With with.

Keene I have proved to be incœmpatible with mere bodies, even those of the most compound and elaborate texture.—Deating.

Incœmpetency. s. Inability; want of adequate ability, qualification, or competency.

Our not being able to discern the motion of a shadow of a dial-plate, or that of the index upon a clock, ought to make us sensible of the incœmpetency of our eyes to discern some motions of natural bodies incomparably slower than these.—Bogle.

Nothing can justify the willfulness that supply, in those who have the power to give it, except some inherent incœmpetency; and that there is no such inherent incœmpetency in the essential character of governors, their early practice bears sufficient witness.—Gloucester, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. ii.

Incœmpetent. adj. Not competent, suitable, adequate, or proportionate.

Richard III. had a resolution, out of hatred to his brother, to disable the other of his issues, upon false and incœmpetent pretences, the of attainer, the other of illegitimation.—R.

Lymen, with equal advantages of parts, are not the most incœmpetent judges of sacred things.—Dryden.

Incœmpetibility. s. Incapacity.

See Competible.

The reason of the stress rests not upon the incœmpetibility of excess of one influence above another, either in intensification or extension; but the incœmpetibility of any multitude to be infinite.—Sir M. Hale.

The incœmpetibility of true faith with carnal desires.—Hammond, Works, iv. 604.

Incœmpetible. See Competible: (with with).

May not the outward expressions of love in many good Christians be greater to some other object than to God? Or is this incœmpetible with the sincerity of the love of God?—Hammond.

With to.

The repugnancy of infinitude is equally incœmpetible to continued or successive motion, and depends upon the impossibility of things successive with infinitude.—Sir M. Hale.

Incœmplète. adj. Imperfect; unfinished.

It pleaseth him in mercy to account himself incœmplète and manned without us.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

In incœmplète ideas we are apt to impose on ourselves, and a trouble with others, especially when they have particular and familiar names.—Locke.

Incœmpleteness. s. Attribute suggested by incomplete; imperfection; unfinished state.

He supplies what her incœmpleteness went seeking.—Milton, Doctrina and Discipline of Theology, to the parliament.

The incœmpleteness of our seraphic lover's happiness, in his fruitions, proceeds not from their want of satisfactoriness, but of an entire possession.—Bogle.

Incœmplèx. adj. Complicated: (opposed to simple).

Otherwise it is unintelligible, how any incœmplèx thing (as they speak) can be the complete or humble object of belief.—Burrow, Works, ii. 33.

Incœmpliance. s.

1. Intractableness; impracticableness; contradictions temper.

Self-conceit produces peevishness and incœmpliance of humour in things lawful and indifferant.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Refusal of compliance.

Consider the vast disproportion between the weak inconveniences that can attend our incompliance with men, and the eternal displeasure of an offended God.—Rogers.

Incomplying. part. pref. Stubborn.

It hinders us from arming ourselves with that obstinate resolution of mind, that stubborn incomplying virtue, which is requisite to preserve a man undivided and blameless.—Bishop Atterbury, Sermons, sermon xlii. (Ord MS.)

Incomposed. part. pref. Disturbed; disordered; discomposed. Rare.

Some what incomposed they are in their trimming, and extraordinary tender of their young ones.—Horrell.

Thus Satan; and him thus the anarchy old,
With flattering speech and charms incompos'd,
Answer'd.

In the middle droops
The strong laborious ox, of honest front,
Which incompos'd he slinketh.

Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

Impossibility. s. Quality of being not possible but by the negation or destruction of something; inconsistency with something.

The manifold impossibilities and lubricities of matter cannot have the same fitness in any modification.—Dr. H. More.

Though the repugnancy of infinity be equally incompatible to continued or successive motion, and depends upon the impossibility of the very nature of things successive or extensive with infinity, yet that impossibility is more conspicuous in discrete quantity, that ariseth from individuals already actually distinguished.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Impossible. adj. Not possible together; not possible but by the negation of something else.

Your being the servants of men is not inconsistent with your service of God, nor that servitude impossible with Christian liberty.—Jeremy Taylor, Ductor Instructus. (Ord MS.)

That strange kind of omnipotency which some have attributed to understanding, lies not in a power of conceiving things wholly impossible, or hugging ideas of absolute non-entities, but in a kind of African copulation of such species of things together, which in nature seem wholly impossible, as the schools speak, or have no congruity at all in the order of the universe.—Bishop Stillingfleet, Origins Sacre, b. iii. (Ord MS.)

Imcomprehensibility. s. Incapability of being (mentally) comprehended.

The constant, universal sense of all antiquity unanimously confesses an imcomprehensibility in many of the articles of the Christian faith.—South, Sermons, li. 217.

The plea of difficulty, and even imcomprehensibility, may be urged.—White, Sermons, notes, p. 2.

Imcomprehensible. adj.

1. Incapable of being (mentally) comprehended; not to be fully understood.

His precepts tend to the improving and perfecting the most valuable part of us, and amazing imcomprehensibility rewards as an eternal weight of glory.

Hammond.

Stars that seem to roll
Spaces imcomprehensible.

One thing more is imcomprehensible in this matter.—Locke.

The laws of vegetation and propagation are the arbitrary pleasure of God, and may vary in manners imcomprehensible to our imaginations.—Hentley.

2. Not to be contained (generally). Obsolete.

Presence every where is the sequel of an infinite and imcomprehensible substance; for what can be every where but that which can nowhere be comprehended?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Imcomprehensibleness. s. Attribute suggested by Imcomprehensible.

I might argue from God's imcomprehensibleness: if we could believe nothing but what we have ideas of, it would be impossible for us to believe God is imcomprehensible.—Watts

Imcomprehensibly. adv. In an incomprehensible manner.

We cannot but be assured that the God of whom and from whom are all things is imcomprehensibly infinite.—Locke.

Imcomprehension. s. Want of comprehension.

These mazes and imcomprehensions.—Bacon, Advancement of Learning, b. ii.

Imcomprehensiveness. adj. Wanting comprehension.

A most imcomprehensiveness and inaccurate title: for this edition, the last and the best, contains the three first as well as the three last books.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iv. 4.

Incompressible. adj. Incapable of being compressed.

Hardness is the reason why water is incompressible, when the air lodged in it is exhausted.—Cheyne.

Incompressibility. s. Incapability of being compressed.

The incompressibility of water is not absolute.—Rees, Cyclopædia, Water.

Inconceivable. adj. Not to be concealed, hid, or kept secret.

The inconceivable imperfections of ourselves will hourly prompt us our corruption, and loudly tell us we are sons of earth.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inconceivability. adj. Incapable of being conceived by the mind.

Such are Christ's promises, divine inconceivable promises; a bliss to be enjoyed to all eternity, and that by way of return for a weak obedience of some few years.—Hammond.

It is inconceivable to me, that a spiritual substance should represent an extended figure.—Locke.

How two others can be diffused through all space, one of which acts upon the other, and by consequence is reverted upon without retarding, shattering, dispersing, and confounding one another's motions, is inconceivable.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Inconceivableness. s. Attribute suggested by inconceivable; quality or state of being inconceivable.

If any of these ways of attaining salvation seem to some men inconceivable, this very inconceivableness is thought by others a proper character to set out all for mystery.—Brechet, Stat and Summe of Rules, p. 6.

When once this method is known, there is no difficulty or inconceivableness in it, as can reasonably make a wise and considerate man call in question the truth of a well attested revelation, merely upon that account.—Clarke, Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion.

Inconceivably. adv. In an inconceivable manner; degree beyond human conception.

Does that man take a rational course to preserve himself, who refuses the endurance of those lesser troubles, to secure himself from a condition inconceivably more miserable?—South, Sermons.

Inconceivably. adj. Inconceivable. Rare.

It is inconceivable how any such man, that hath stood the shock of an eternal duration without corruption, should after be corrupted.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Inconfinity. s. [Lat. confinus = near.] Unaptness; unsuitableness; disproportion. Rare.

Such is the inconfinity and insignificance of Grotius's interpreting of the six seals; which is quite otherwise in Mede.—Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 191: 1020.

Inconcludent. adj. Giving no (logical) conclusion. Rare.

The depositions of witnesses themselves, as being false, various, contradictory, single, inconcludent.—Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Inconcluding. part. pref. Inconclusive.

Those which in after ages first denied it: the creation of the world made use of very frivolous and inconcluding arguments, and finding their new opinion upon weak foundations.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. 1.

Inconclusiveness. adj. Not enforcing any determination of the mind; not exhibiting cogent evidence.

The lines in which Lucretius [B. 5. 223.] proposes this objection, are as unphilosophical and inconclusive, as they are highly pathetic and poetical.—J. Warton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Inconclusiveness. s. Attribute suggested by inconclusive; want of rational cogency.

A man, unskilful in syllogism, at first hearing, could perceive the weakness and inconclusiveness of a long, artificial, and plausible discourse, whereas with some others, better skilled in syllogism, have been misled.—Locke.

Inconcoct. adj. Unripened; immature; not fully digested.

While the body, to be converted and altered, is too strong for the efficient that should convert it, it is all that while crude and inconcoct; and the process is to be called crudity and inconcoction.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Inconcocted. part. pref. Imperfectly digested.

I understand, remember, and reason better in my ripper years than when I was a child, and had my organs partly less digested and inconcocted.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Inconcoction. s. State of being indigested; unripeness; immaturity.

The middle action, which produceth such imperfect bodies, is itself called inconcoction, or inconcoction, which is a kind of putrefaction.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History. (See also Inconcoct.)

Inconcocting. part. pref. Not concurring.

They derive effects not only from inconcocting causes, but things devoid of all efficiency.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inconcoctness. adj. [Lat. concoctio, pass. part. concoctus = shaken.] Incapable of being shaken.

Peace communitated in immutable, inconcoctness, and indelible detestation.—Bishop Reynolds, Works, p. 1107.

Incondite. adj. [Lat. inconditus.] Irregular; rude; unpolished.

They . . . use inarticulate, incondite voices, speeches, obsolete gestures, &c.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 166.

Now sportive youth
Carol incondite rhymes with sallow notes,
And quaver inharmonious.

J. Philips, Cyder, b. ii.

Inconditional. adj. Unconditional.

From that which is but true in a qualified sense, an inconditional and absolute verity is inferred.—Sir T. Browne.

Inconditionate. adj. Unconditional; absolute. Rare.

They ascribe to God, in relation to every man, an eternal, unchangeable, and inconditionate degree of election or reprobation.—Boyle.

Two lecturers they found obstinately inconformable to the king's directions.—Heylin, Life of Archbishop Laud, p. 100: 1071.

Inconformity. s.

1. Incompliance with the practice of others.

We have thought their opinion to be, that utter inconformity with the church of Rome was not an extremity whereunto we should be drawn for a time, but the very mediocrity itself, wherein they meant we should ever continue.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Refusal to join in the established religion.

Mr. Buckley is sent to the high commission for inconformity.—Archbishop Laud to King Charles I.

Inconfused. part. pref. Not confused; distinct. Rare.

All the various diversity of articulate sounds of the voice of man, or birds, will enter into a small cranny inconfused.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History, ii. 192.

Inconfusion. s. Distinctness. Rare.

The cause of the confusion in sounds, and the inconfusion in species visible, is, for that the sight worketh in right lines, and so there can be no coincidence in the eye; but sounds that move in oblique and acute lines, must needs encounter and disturb the one the other.—Bacon.

Incongruence. s. Unsuitableness; want of adaptation.

Humility is but relative, and depends upon the congruity, or incongruence of the component particles of the liquor to the pores of the bodies it touches.—Boyle.

Incongruent. adj. Unsuitable; unfit; inconsistent.

It will be not incongruent to our matter, to shew what profile may be taken by the diligent reading of ancient poets.—Sir T. Blyot, The Governour, fol. 12.

As Christ's spirit and grace gives such power to go beyond the precepts; so it is not incongruent that it should so modify sins in his members to make them venial and not killing.—Shelford, Learned Discourses, p. 130.

Incongruity. s.

1. Unsuitableness of one thing to another.

The fathers make use of this acknowledgment of the incongruity of images to the Deity, from thence to prove the incongruity of the worship of them.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

2. Inconsistency; inconsequence; absurdity; impropriety.

To avoid absurdities and incongruities, is the same law established for both arts: the painter is not to paint a cloud at the bottom of a picture, nor the poet to place what is proper to the end in the beginning of a poem.—Drake.

3. Disagreement of parts; want of symmetry.

She, whom after what form suffer we see,
Is discerned and rude incongruity;
Nude, she is dead, who's dead.

Donne.

Incongruous. adj. Unsuitable; not fitting; inconsistent; absurd.

When heathens condemned the worship of God,
As incongruous to a divine nature, and a disparagement to the Deity.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

Incongruously. adv. In an incongruous manner; improperly; unfitly.

Having little to solve the irregularity of the construction, but by saying, that Luke varied his form of speech; that is, in plain terms, he writ incongruously; when, in truth, he is acknowledged by all expositors too knowing in the Greek to commit such a solecism. Sir N. Knatchbull, Annotations upon some difficult Texts in all the Books of the New Testament, p. 54.

Incongruently. adv. Without any connexion or dependence. Rare.

Others ascribe hereto, as a cause, what perhaps but casually or incongruently succeeds.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Incongruence. s. Want of connexion or just relation.

Neither need we any better or other proof of the incongruence of this vow with holy orders, than that of their own Dominicus & Nolo.—Bishop Hall, Honour of the married Clergy, p. 10.

Incongruous. adj. Unreasonable.

An incongruous are these common people, and so little feeling have they of God, or their own souls' good.—Spencer, View of the State of Ireland.

Inconsequence. s. Inconclusiveness; want of just inference.

This he bestows the name of many fallacies upon; and runs on with showing the inconsequence of it, as though he did in earnest believe it were an important answer.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

Inconsequent. adj. Without just conclusion; without regular inference.

The ground he assumes is unground, and his illation from thence deduced inconsequent.—Halewell, Apology.

Men rest not in false apprehensions, without absurd and inconsequent deductions from fallacious foundations, and misapprehended mediums, erecting conclusions no way inferrible from their premises.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inconsequential. adj. Not leading to (logical) consequences.

The action is unnatural, and the moral inconsequential.—Johnson, Lives of the Poets, Somerville, (Ord. 18).

She has sense and ambition; but it is still the sense and ambition of a woman, that is, inconsequential.—Lord Chesterfield.

Inconsiderable. adj. Unworthy of consideration or notice; unimportant.

I am an inconsiderable fellow, and know nothing.—Sir J. Denham, The Rhymer, iii. 1.

If we were under any real fear of the papists, it would be hard to think us so stupid not to be equally apprehensive with others, since we are likely to be the greatest sufferers; but we look upon them to be altogether as inconsiderable as the women and children.—Swift.

Inconsiderableness. s. Attribute suggested by Inconsiderable; small importance.

To those who are thoroughly convinced of the inconsiderableness of this short dying life, in comparison of that eternal state which remains for us in another life, the consideration of a future happiness is the most powerful motive.—Archbishop Tillotson.

From the consideration of our own smallness and inconsiderableness, in respect of the greatness and splendour of heavenly bodies, let us with the holy psalmist raise up our hearts.—Rap, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Inconsideracy. s. Inconsiderateness.

This is the common effect of the inconsideracy of youth.—Lord Chesterfield.

Inconsiderate. adj. Wanting consideration.

1. Careless; thoughtless; negligent; inattentive; inadvertent; (used both of men and things).

When thy inconsiderate hand
Plunges ope this casement with my trembling name,
Then think this name alive, and that thou thus
In it offend at my revulsa.

Donne.

It is a very unhappy token of our corruption, that there should be any so inconsiderate among us as to sacrifice morality to politics.—Addison, Freholder.

2. Wanting due regard; (with of before the object).

He who laid down his life for the redemption of the transgressors which were under the first Testament, cannot be so inconsiderate of our frailties.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Inconsiderately. adv. In an inconsiderate manner; negligently; thoughtlessly; inattentively.

The king, transported with just wrath inconsiderately fighting and precipitating the charge, before his whole numbers came up, was slain in the pursuit.—Lucan.

Inconsiderateness. s. Attribute suggested by Inconsiderate; carelessness; thoughtlessness; negligence; want of thought; in-advertence; inattention.

If men do know and believe that there is such a being as God, not to demean ourselves towards him, as becomes our relation to him, is great stupidity and inconsiderateness.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Inconsideration. s. Want of consideration or thought; inattention; inadvertence.

Let thy merciful providence so govern all in this sickness, that I never fall into utter darkness, ignorance of Thee, or inconsideration of myself.—Donne, Devotions, p. 363: 1623.

I am moved to reflect upon two principal inconsiderations; the singularity of some, and the irreverence of almost all.—Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 141.

St. Gregory reckons uncleanliness to be the parent of blindness of mind, inconsideration, precipitancy or giddiness in actions, and self-love.—Jeremy Taylor.

Inconsistency. s. Such opposition as that one proposition infers the negation of the other; argument or narrative where one part destroys the other; self-contradiction; incompatibility.

There is a perfect inconsistency between that which is of debt, and that which is of free gift.—South, Sermons.

Mutability of temper, and inconsistency with ourselves, is the greatest weakness of human nature.—Addison.

If a man would register all his opinions upon love, politics, religion, and learning, what a bundle of inconsistencies and contradictions would appear at last.—Swift.

Inconsistent. adj.

1. Incompatible; not suitable; incongruous: (with with).

Finding no kind of compliance, but sharp provocations, against the demands, as inconsistent with conscience, justice, or religion, the conference broke off.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Compositions of this nature, when thus restrained, shew that wisdom and virtue are far from being inconsistent with politeness and good humour.—Addison, Freholder.

2. Contrary, so that one infers the negation or destruction of the other.

The idea of an infinite space or duration is very obscure and confused, because it is made up of two parts very different, if not inconsistent.—Locke.

Inconsistently. adv. In an inconsistent manner; absurdly; incongruously; with self-contradiction.

A melancholy kind of madness . . . made him speak distractedly and inconsistently.—J. Spenser, Vanity of vulgar Prophecies, p. 109: 1603.

Inconsolable. adj. Incapable of being comforted; sorrowful beyond susceptibility or comfort.

Her women will repent to me that she is inconsolable, by reason of my unkindness.—Addison.

They take pleasure in an obstinate grief, in rendering themselves inconsolable.—Piddie, Sermons.

Inconspicuous. adj. Indiscernible; not perceptible by the sight.

When an excellent experimenter had taken pains in accurately filling up a tube of mercury, we found that yet there remained store of inconspicuous bubbles.—Huyghs.

Inconstancy. s.

1. Unsteadiness; want of steady adherence; mutability of temper or affection.

I have suffered more for their sakes, more than the villainous inconstancy of man is able to bear.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 5.

He made the mark
For all the people's hate, the princess' curse,
And his son's rage, or the old king's inconstancy.

Resolution on the schemes of life which offer to our choice, and inconstancy in pursuing them, are the greatest causes of all our unhappiness.—Addison, Spectator.

2. Diversity; dissimilitude.

As much inconstancy and confusion is there in their mixtures or combinations; for it is rare to find any of them pure and unmixt.—Woodward, Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth.

Inconstant. adj.

1. Not firm in resolution; not steady in affection; various of inclination; wanting perseverance.

It is so naturally inconstant, that I marvel his soul finds not some way to kill his body.—Sir P. Sidney.

2. Changeable; mutable; variable.

(I swear not by the moon, th' inconstant moon,
That monthly changes in her circled orb,
Lest that thy love prove likewise variable.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 2.

Incorporeity. s. Immateriality; distinctness from body.

Still new mist be casts before our eyes.

And now derides our proud incorporeity.

Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, iii. 1. 3.

Incommunicable attributes of the Deity appeared to agree thereto; such as infinity, immutability, in-divinability, incorporately.—Bishop Horkley, Siris, § 270.

The first stumbling-block to the ancient philosophers, and what no one could get over, was, to conceive an incorruptible, any thing entirely void of matter.—Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 394.

INCORRECT. adj.

1. Not nicely finished; not exact; inaccurate; full of faults.

The piece you think is incorrect: why take it; I'm all submission; what you'd have it, make it.
—Pope, Epistle to Arbuthnot.

2. Not duly regulated; not corrected into proper obedience. Obsolete.

'Tis unmanly grief;
It shows a will more incorrect to heaven;
A heart unfortified, or mind impatient;
An understanding simple and unchool'd.
—Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 2.

INCORRECTION. *s. Want of correction.

The unbridled swing or incorrection of ill nature makes one odious.—Archdeacon Arnsay, The Tablet, p. 9: 1691.

INCORRECTLY. *adv. In an incorrect manner; inaccurately; not exactly.

And if they had not had the Gospel in their hands, they would have wrote as loosely and incorrectly as the philosophers before them.—Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 18.

INCORRECTNESS. *s. Attribute suggested by incorrect; inaccuracy; want of exactness.

Many of these petty incorrectnesses are not, however, to be imputed to Froissant.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, diss. iii. p. lviii.

INCORRIGIBLE. *adj. [Lat. corriga = correct.] Bad beyond correction, amendment, or improvement.

a. Of persons.

Provok'd by those incorrigible fools,
I left declaiming in pedantick schools.
—Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

The most violent party-men are such as have discovered least sense of religion or morality; and when such are laid aside as shall be found incorrigible, it will be no difficulty to reconcile the rest.—Swift.

b. Of things.

The loss is many times irrecoverable, and the inconvenience incorrigible.—Dr. H. More, Divine Dialogues.

What are their thoughts of things, but variety of incorrigible error?—Sir B. L. Enticang.

INCORRIGIBILITY. *s. Depravity beyond amendment.

To see so plainly, to feel so thoroughly, the trouble, the blindness, the folly, the imbecility, the ingratitude, the incorrigibility, the strange perverseness, pertinaciousness, malice, and cruelty of mankind in so many instances... would it not astound a mind so pure?—Barrow, Works, i. 474.

INCORRIGIBLENESS. *s. Attribute suggested by incorrigible; hopeless depravity; badness beyond all means of amendment.

What we call penitence becomes a sad attestation of our *incorrigible*ness.—Dr. H. More, Beauty of Christian Piety.

I could not have chiding used, much less blows, till obstinacy and *incorrigible*ness make it absolutely necessary.—Locke.

INCORRIGIBLY. *adv. In an incorrigible manner; to a degree of depravity beyond all means of amendment.

Some men appear incorrigibly mad;
They cleanliness and company renounce.
—Lord Bacon, Common.

INCORRUPT. *adj.

1. Free from foulness or depravation.

The first church of the apostles was most pure and incorrupt; but the papists have clearly varied from the usage and example of that church.—Archbishop Cranmer, The Service of the Sacraments, fol. 116: 1550.

But, that first
Distemper'd all things, and, of incorrupt, Corrupted.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 52.

2. Pure of manners; honest; good: (particularly applied to a mind above the power of bribes).

Where the multitude is incorrupt and religious, all things are done justly, and without compulsion.—Sir W. Raleigh, Arts of Empire, ch. xvi.

INCORRUPTIBILITY. *s. Insusceptibility of corruption; incapacity of decay.

Philo, in his book of the world's incorruptibility, allegorizes the virtues of a Greek tragic poet.—Hakewill, Apology.

A transfiguration of our faith in the resurrection of bodies, and a symbol of future incorruptibility.—Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 64.

INCORRUPTIBLE. *adj. Not capable of corruption; not admitting decay.

In such abundance lies our choice,
As leaves a greater store of fruit untouched,
Still hanging incorruptible.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 629.

Our bodies shall be changed into incorruptible and immortal substances, our souls be entertained with the most ravishing objects, and both continue happy throughout all eternity.—Archbishop Wake.

INCORRUPTION. *s. Incapacity of corruption.

So also is the resurrection of the dead: it is sown in corruption, it is raised in incorruption.—1 Corinthians, xv. 42.

INCORRUPTNESS. *s. Attribute suggested by incorrupt.

Purity of mind, integrity, and incorruptness of manners, is preferable to fine parts and subtle speculations.—Woodward.

INCORRUPTIVE. *adj. Free from decay or corruption.

The wrath of incorruptive praise.

—Akenside, Pleasures of Imagination, b. i.

INCOURAGE. *v. See Encourage.

INCRESSATE. *v. a. [Lat. crassus = thick.] Thicken. Rare.

If the cork be too light to sink under the surface, the body of water may be attenuated with spirits of wine; if too heavy, it may be incrassated with salt.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Acids dissolve or attenuate, alkalies precipitate or incrassate.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Acids, such as are austere, as unripe fruits, produce too great a stricture of the fibres, incrassate and coagulate the fluids; from whence pains and rheumatism.—Arbuthnot.

INCRESSATE. *v. n. Become thick or fat. Rare.

Their spirits fattened and incrassated within them.—Hammond, Works, iv. 631.

INCRESSATE. *adj. Fattened; filled. Rare.

Standings were so gross within them, being fattened and incrassated with magical phantasies.—Hammond, Works, iv. 637.

INCRESSATION. *s. Act, state of thickening. Rare.

Nothing doth congregate but water; for the determination of quicksilver is fixation, that of milk coagulation, and that of oil incrassation.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

INCRESSATIVE. *adj. Having the quality of thickening: (used substantively). Rare.

The two latter indicate restrictions to stretch, and incrassatives to thicken the blood.—Harvey.

INCRESSO. *v. n. [N.F. increuire; Lat. creo = grow, pass. part. creatus.] Grow more in number, or greater in bulk; advance in quantity or value, or in any quality capable of being more or less.

Hear, therefore, O Israel, and observe to do it; that it may be well with thee, and that ye may increure mightily.—Isaiah, lv. 3.

From fifty to threescore he loses not much in fancy, and judgement, the effect of observation, still increure.—Dryden.

Henry, in knots, involv'd his Emma's name
Upon this tree; and, as the tender mark,
Grew with the year, and widen'd with the bark;
Venus had heard the virgin's soft address,
That as the wound the passion might increure.
—Prior, Henry and Emma.

INCRESSO. *v. a. Make more or greater.

Hyd thee from this slaughter-house
Lest thou increure the number of the dead.
—Shakespeare, Richard III., iv. 1.

I will increase them with men like a flock.—Ezekiel, xxxvi. 37.

It serves to increure that treasure, or to preserve it.—Sir W. Temple.

INCRESSO. *s.

1. Augmentation; state of growing more or greater.

For three years he liv'd with large incrass
In arms of honour, and caten in peace.
—Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, l. 607.

Hail, birds triumphant! born in happier days,
Immortal heirs of universal praise!
Whose honours with incrass of ages grow,
As streams roll down, enlarging as they flow.
—Pope, Essay on Criticism.

2. Increment; that which is added to the original stock.

Take thou no usury of him nor incrass.—Leviticus, xxv. 36.

3. Produce.

It shall be counted to the Levites as the incrass of the threshing-floor, and as the incrass of the wine-press.—Agabus, xviii. 30.

As flood-sims, spread waters o'er thy field,
And a most just and glad incrass 'twill yield.
—Sir J. Dabham, Of Justice.

Those grains which grow produced an incrass beyond expectation.—Jeffrey, Husbandry.

4. Generation.

Into her womb convey sterility;
Dry up in her the organs of incrass,
And from her derogate body never spring
A babe to honour her. —Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 4.

5. Progeny.

All the incrass of thy house shall die in the flower of their age. —1 Samuel, ii. 33.

6. The state of waxing, or growing full orb'd: (of the moon).

Reeds, hair, nails, hedges, and herbs, will grow soonest, if set or cut in the incrass of the moon.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

INCRESSFUL. *adj. Abundant of produce.

To cheer the ploughman with incrassful crop.
—Shakespeare, Rape of Lucrece.

INCRESSER. *s. One who, that which, increases.

A lover and incrass of his people.
—Boissard and Fletcher, Valentinian.

Though melancholy persons love to be dark and alone, yet darkness is a great incrass of the humours.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 261.

INCRESSITE. *adj. Not created: (so explained in the previous edition. It is probable, however, that the in- is inclusive rather than negative).

Bright effluence of bright essence incrass.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 6.

The Alcoran was not the incrass word of God.—L. Addison, Life of Mahomet, p. 18.

INCRESSD. *adj. Not created. Rare.

...the desire is infinite, nothing but the absolute and incrassd infinite can adequately fill it.—Chapue.

INCREDIBILITY. *s. Quality of surpassing belief.

For objects of incredibility, none are so removed from all appearance of truth as those of Coma's Andreus.—Dryden.

INCREDIBLE. *adj. [Lat. incredibilis.] Surpassing belief; not to be credited.

The ship Argo, that there might want no incredible thing in this fable, spoke to them.—Sir B. L. Enticang.

Presenting things impossible to view,
They wander through incredible to true. —Grove.

INCREDIBLENESS. *s. Attribute suggested by incredible; quality of being incredible.

The very strangeness, or *incredible*ness, of the story.—Cambden, Of Credulity and Incredible Things natural, civil, and divine, p. 150: 1608.

INCREDIBLY. *adv. In an incredible manner.

The arts are incredibly improved.—Blackwell, Apology, p. 215.

INCREDULITY. *s. [Fr. incrédulité.] Quality of not believing; hardness of belief.

Let not the incrass of their trouble thee that speak against thee. —2 Kings, xv. 3.

He was more large in the description of Paradise, to take away all scruple from the incrass of future ages.—Sir W. Raleigh.

INCREDULOUS. *adj. Hard of belief; refusing credit.

I am not altogether incrass but there may be such candles as are made of salamander's wool, being a kind of mineral which whiteneth in the furnace, and consumeth not.—Bacon.

INCRESSABLE. *adj. [? accent. Lat. cremum burn.] Not consumable by fire. Rare.

If from the sk' of the salamander the noble pieces are compound.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

INCREMENT. *s. [Lat. incrementum.]

1. Act of growing greater.

Divers conceptions are concerning the Nile's incrass or inundation.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

2. Increase; matter added.

This stratum is expanded at top, serving as the squamary that furnisheth matter for the formation and incrass of animal and vegetable bodies.—Windward.

3. Produce.

The orchard loves to have
With winter wind before the guns crop
Their feeble heads: the hosen'd roots then drink
Large incrass, earnest of happy years.
—J. Philips, Cyder, b. ii.

Incrépation. s. [Lat. increpation, -onis; increpo - ch. de, rail; crepo - make a noise.] Reprehension; scolding.

His answer was a kind of soft increpation to them, and a strong instruction to all times. - IV. Montaigne, French Essays, pt. i. p. 311; 1649.

Here we have David's increpation of David. - Bishop Richardson, Choice Observations and Explanations upon the Old Testament, p. 226.

Whoever shall in the sincerity of his heart acquit himself as to all the foregoing duties, and thereby prepare and adorn himself to meet and converse with his Saviour at this divine feast, shall never be accused with the thunder of that dreadful increpation from him, 'Friend, how camest thou in hither, not having a wedding-garment?' - South, Sermons, II. 247.

The admonitions, fraternal or paternal, of his fellow Christians, or of the governors of the church; then, more publick reprehensions and increpations. - Hammond.

Incréché. See Encreoch.

Incréclatè. part. pref. [Lat. crucio = torment; crux = cross.] Free from torture or torment. Rare.

This ignorance gave him a kind of innocence, whereby might have passed away his life incrécclatè without the sense of so fatal misfortune. - Felltham, Resolves, 31. (Ord MS.)

Incréclatè. adj. [Lat. incrémentus; crux = blood.] Unbloody; without bloodshed.

He musters out as many places as he can find, that make any mention of liturgy, oblation, holy victim, incrécclatè. - Herriot, Saint and Sinners at Endor, p. 408; 1674.

Incrést. v. a. Cover with an additional coat adhering to the internal matter.

Some rivers bring forth spurs, and other mineral matter, so as to cover and incrécclatè the stones. - Woodward.

Save but our army; and let Jove incrécclatè Swords, pikes, and guns, with everlasting rust.

Pope, Imitations of Horace, II. ii. sat. 1.

The shield was purchased by Woodward, who incrécclatè it with a new rust. - Arbuthnot and Pope.

Incréscute. v. a. [Lat. incrémentatus, pass. part. of incrécclatè; incrécclatio, -onis.] Incrust.

The finer part of the wood will be turned into air, and the coarser stick baked and incrécclatè upon the sides of the vessel. - Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Any of these sun-like bodies in the centres of the several vortices, are so incrécclatè and weakened as to be carried about in the vortex of the true sun. Chapin.

Incrécclatè. s. Adherent covering; something superinduced.

Having such a prodigious stock of marble, their churches are laid over with such a rich variety of incrécclatè as cannot be found in any other part. - Adelphi, Travels in Italy.

Incrécclatè. v. n. [Lat. incrécclatus, pass. part. of incrécclatè; incrécclatè, -onis.] Sit upon eggs.

Some species, as, for example, the shark and pike, are predatory and voracious; some, as the angler and the skate, are crafty; some, as the sword-fish and stickleback, are combative; some, as the carp and barbel, are peaceful, timid browsers; many fishes are social, especially at the season of incubation; a few are monogamous and gregarious; still fewer nidificate and incrécclatè their own. - Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. viii.

Incrécclatè. s. Act of sitting upon eggs to hatch them.

Whether that vitality was by incrécclatè, or how else, is only known to God. - Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

Birds have eyes enough at first conceived in them to serve them, allowing such a proportion for every year as will serve for one or two *incrécclatè*s. - Ray, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

When the whole tribe of birds by incrécclatè produces their young, it is a wonderful devotion, that some few families should do it in a more novercal way. - Derham.

As the white of an egg by incrécclatè, so can the serum by the action of the fibres be attenuated. - Arbuthnot.

During the first days of incubation... a small portion of the water contained in the egg evaporates. - Cree, Dictionary of Arts, Manufactures, and Mines.

2. In Medicine. Period during which a disease, contracted by infection, contagion, or any endemic influence, lies latent in the system before showing itself by its characteristic symptoms: (chiefly applied to smallpox, and similar eruptive diseases). (For example see under Incubative.)

Incubative. adj. Having the nature of, constituted by, incubation.

The incubation of measles arises from a specific contagion, the latent period of which has been the occasion of some differences of opinion, owing chiefly to the circumstance that some authors restrict the incubative stage to the period of apyrexia, whilst others extend it so far as to include the whole period of initiatory catarrhal fever. . . . If the stage of incubation be . . . considered to occupy the whole time that elapses prior to eruption its extreme duration may be stated to be eighteen days. - Croft, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. i. ch. xvii.

Incubature. s. Incubation. Rare.

If you go on and describe it, [the Manucollata,] as Carian, Herminides, Scalliger, and others have done, that it is a bird which lives in the air, without ever coming near the earth till it falls down dead upon it, that its food is the dew of heaven, and the incubature of the female on the back of the male, their ideas will be enlarged according to the degrees of information; but no fecundity of the mind can make them perceive one single property, farther than they are instructed. - Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 153.

Incubus. s. [Lat.; pl. incubi.]

1. Pretended fairy or demon.

A legendary fable, that Luther was begotten by an incubus. - Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy, p. 136.

Stories . . . of incubi. - Dr. H. More, Pre-existence of Souls.

Belial, the dissolute spirit that fell, The sensuallist, and, after Amosad, The fleshliest incubus.

Milton, Paradise Regained, II. 152.

The devils who appeared in the female form were generally called incubi; those who appeared like men incubi, though this distinction was not always preserved. - Lecky, Ethics and Influence of Rationalism in Europe, ch. i.

With the English plural.

That old fabulous fury, which they say some of the fathers had from the Jews, of devils being incubi, and that in their courtships to women they gratified them with these inventions, which might help their degrading beauty. - Jerry Taylor, Artificial Hamlet, p. 124.

2. Night-mare.

The incubus is an inflation of the membranes of the stomach, which hinders the motion of the diaphragm, lungs, and pulse, with a sense of a weight oppressing the breast. - Sir J. Floyer.

Such as are troubled with incubi, or wit-bridden, as we call it. - Barlow, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 91.

A man fettered and spell-bound by an incubus, is less helpless than I was. - Sir E. B. Lytton, Pelham.

3. Dead-weight.

Debt and misery is the incubus which weighs most heavily on the agricultural resources of Turkey, &c. - Forley, Resources of Turkey.

Incubitate. v. a. [Lat. incubito tread or stamp on.] Impress by frequent admonitions; enforce by constant repetition.

The apostles of Christ the Lord . . . very often incubitate, that men are justified before God by faith. - Bishop Woolton, Christian Manual, E. vii. b. 1576.

Manifest truth may deserve sometimes to be incubitated, because we are too apt to forget it. - Bishop Atterbury.

How continually incubitate morality and piety to the gods. - Brown, On the Olympe.

Incubitation. s. Act of impressing by frequent admonition; admonitory repetition.

Industry in action being as importunity in speech, by continual incubitation forcing a yielding beyond the strength of reason. - Feller, History of the Holy War, p. 151.

Often incubitation of warning necessarily implies a danger. - Bishop Hall, Regimini, p. 5.

Incubitable. adj. Unblamable; not reprehensible.

Ignorance, so far as it may be resolved into natural inability, is as to men, at least incubitable, and consequently not the object of scorn, but pity. - South, Sermons.

It was an innocent and incubitable piece of ignorance. - Killingbeck, Sermons, p. 140.

Incubipableness. s. Attribute suggested by Incubable; unblamableness.

Since the incubipableness of their merely natural inability relates to them the shame of owning it, let them not at least voluntarily surcharge themselves with such imperfections, as want that excuse and extenuation. - W. Montaigne, French Essays, pt. ii. p. 129; 1654.

Incubipably. adv. In an incubipable manner; unblamably; without blame.

As to errors or infirmities, the frailty of man's condition has inevitably, and therefore incubipably, exposed him. - South, Sermons.

Incult. adj. [Lat. incultus, pass. part. of colo - cultivate, till.] Uncultivated; untitled. Rare.

Germany then, with Tacitus, was incult and horrid; now full of magnificent cities. - Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 332.

Her forests huge, Incult, robust, and tall, by Nature's hand Planted of old. - Thomson, Seasons, Autumn.

Incultivated. adj. Uncultivated. Rare.

The soil, though incultivated, so full of vigour, that it produces without seed. - Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Parts of Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 380.

Incultivation. s. Want or neglect of cultivation.

Inhabited by wild beasts, and in that state of incultivation which nature in her luxuriant fancies loves to form, the wilderness was of no value to its proprietors. - Berington, History of Abbeville, p. 104.

Inculture. s. Want or neglect of cultivation.

The inculture of the world would perish it into a wilderness, should not the activities of commerce make it an universal city. - Felltham, Resolves, II. 48.

Incumbency. s.

1. Act or state of lying upon another.

We find them more fragile, and not so well qualified to support great incumbencies and weights. - Evelyn, H. i. ch. iii. sect. 17.

2. Imposition as a duty.

The duties of a man, of a friend, of a husband, of a father; and all the incumbencies of a family. - Johnson, Letter to Sir G. H. Parnell, p. 284.

3. State of keeping a benefice.

These fines are only to be paid to the bishop, during his incumbency in the same see. - Stief.

Incumbent. adj. [Lat. incumbens, -entis, from cumbo - lie down.]

1. Resting upon; lying upon.

Then with expanded wings he steers his flight Aloft, incumbent on the dusky air, That felt unusual weight. - Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 225.

The ascending parcels of air, having now little more than the weight of the incumbent water to surmount, were able both so to expand themselves as to fill up that part of the pipe which they pervaded, and, by pressing every way against the sides of it, to lift upwards with them what water they found above them. - Boyle.

With wings expanded wide ourselves we'll rear, And fly incumbent on the dusky air. - Dryden.

Here the rebel giants lie; And when to move the incumbent load they try, Ascending vapours on the day prevail. - Johnson.

Yon is her Plume's destined prey, Intemperate man; and, for his daily doings, She draws a close incumbent of cloud of death. - Thomson, Seasons, Summer.

2. Imposed as a duty.

All men, truly zealous, will perform those good works that are incumbent on all Christians. - Bishop Spald, Sermons.

There is a double duty incumbent upon us in the exercise of our powers. - Sir R. F. Eden.

Thus, if we think and act, we shall show ourselves duly mindful not only of the advantages we receive from them, but of the obligations also which are incumbent upon us. - Bishop Atterbury.

Incumbent. s. One who is in present possession of a benefice.

In many places the whole ecclesiastical dues are in his hands, and the incumbent lieth at the mercy of his patron. - Stief.

Incumber. See Encumber.

Incur. v. a. [Lat. incurro, from curro = run.]

1. Become liable to a punishment or reprehension.

I have incurred displeasure from inferiors for giving way to the faults of others. - Sir J. Haycard.

They, not obeying, Incur'd (what could they less!) the penalty; And, manifold in sin, deserv'd to fall. - Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 11.

So judge thou still, presumptuous till the wrath, Which that incur'd by flying, meet thy flight, Seem'd, and scourge that wisdom back to hell. - Idid, iv. 912.

They had a full persuasion that not to do it were to desert God, and consequently to incur damnation. - South, Sermons.

2. Occur; press on the senses: (with to or into). Obsolete.

The motions of the minute parts of bodies are invisible, and incur not to the eye; but yet they are to be deplored by experience.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.
The mind of man, even in spirituals, acts with corporeal dependence; and so is he helped or hindered in its operations, according to the different quality of external objects that incur into the senses.—South, Sermons.

Incurability. s. Incapability of being cured; utter insusceptibility of remedy.

We'll instantly open a door to the manner of a proper and improper consumption, together with the reason of the incurability of the former, and facile cure of the other.—Harvey, Discourse of Consumption.

Incurable. adj. Incapable of being cured; not to be removed by medicine; irremediable; hopeless.

Pause not; for the present time's so sick
That present medicine must be ministered,
Or overthrow incurable misuses.—Shakespeare, King John, v. 1.

Stop the rage betime,
Before the wound do grow incurable;
For being green, there is great hope of help.
Id., Henry VI. Part II. iii. 1.

A scirrhus is not absolutely incurable, because it has been known that fresh pasture has cured it in cattle.—Arbuthnot.

If idiots and lunatics cannot be found, incurables may be taken into the hospital.—Swift.

Incurableness. s. Attribute suggested by incurable; state not admitting of any cure.

This incurableness in every sickness . . . is indeed the very soul of the sickness, whereby it liveth, though the patient dieth.—Fotherby, Atheismist.

Incurably. adv. In an incurable manner; without remedy.

We cannot know it is or is not, being incurably ignorant.—Locke.

Incuriosity. s.

1. Want of curiosity.
That you may not charge me with incuriosity.
Sir H. Wotton, Letters: 1611.

His incuriosity or indifference, when truth was offered to be laid before him as a private man, and by one who, he knew, had the repute of exercising every spiritual power necessary to inform it, shews him [Pilate] in a light much less excusable.—Bishop Warburton, Sermons, i. p. 1.

As long as books, either from the difficulty of their style, or from the general incuriosity of the people, found but few readers, it was evident that authors must rely upon the patronage of public bodies, or of rich and titled individuals. Blackie, History of Civilization in England.

2. Negligence.

Thinking all things become a good man; even his gestures and little incuriosities.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 195: 1651.

Incurious. adj. Negligent; inattentive.

Can we think that the Providence, which is so precisely curious as to mark and observe the falling of sparrows, should be so supremely incurious as to slight and neglect the falling of kingdoms? Fotherby, Atheismist, p. 270: 1622.

The Creator did not bestow so much skill upon his creatures, to be looked upon with a careless incurious eye.—Derham.

He seldom at the Park appear'd;
Yet, not incurious, was inclin'd
To know the converse of mankind.—Swift.

Incuriously. adv. In an incurious manner; without nice examination; without inquisitiveness.

It is enough for me to rest in the hope that I shall once see them; in the mean time, let me be learnedly ignorant, and incuriously devout, silently blessing the power and wisdom of my infinite Creator, who knows how to honour himself by all these glorious and unrevoked subordinations.—Bishop Hall, Invisible World, i. § 7.

In such an age publick money will be easily granted, and publick accounts rarely or incuriously inspected.—Lord Holbrooke, Dissertation on Patents, let. 18.

Indeficient. adj. Not failing; perfect; complete.

Faith heightened into vision, hope satisfied in possession, love completed in fruition, peace consummated in immutable, inconceivable, and indeficient delectation: In these four things seem to consist the endowments of glorified souls, so far as we can here frame any judgement of the glory to come.—Bishop Reynolds, Works, p. 1107.

Indefinite. adj. [Lat. indefinitus.]

1. Not defined, determined, limited, settled.
Tragedy and picture are more narrowly circumscribed by place and time than the epic poem: the time of this last is left indefinite.—Dryden, Translation of Virgil's Art of Painting.

2. Large beyond the comprehension of man, though not absolutely without limits.
Though it is not infinite, it may be indefinite; though it is not boundless in itself, it may be so to human comprehension.—Spectator.

Used substantively.
Though a position should be wholly rejected, yet that negative is more pregnant of direction than an indefinite; as ashes are more generative than dust.—Bacon, Essays.

Indefinitely. adv. In an indefinite manner.

1. Without any settled or determinate limitation.

We observe that custom, whereunto St. Paul alludeth, and whereof the fathers of the church in their writings make often mention, to show indefinitely what was done; but not universally to bind for ever all prayers unto one only fashion of utterance.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

We conceive no more than the letter beareth, that is, four times, or indefinitely more than three.—Sir T. Browne.

A duty to which all are indefinitely obliged, upon some occasions, by the express command of God.—Bishop Sanderson.

Indented, part. adj. Having indentations.

About his neck
A green and gilded snake had wreath'd itself,
Who with her head, nimble in threats, approach'd
The opening of his mouth; but suddenly,
Seeing Orlando, it unlik'd itself,
And with indented slides did slip away
Into a bush. — Shakespeare, As you like it, iv. 3.

The serpent then, not with indented wave,
Proned on the ground, as sinners; but on his rear
Circular base of rising folds, that tower'd
Fold above fold, a surging maze!

Trent, who, like some earth-born giant, spreads
His thirty arms along the indented meads.

The margins on each side do not terminate in a straight line, but are indented. — Woodward.

Indentment, s. Indenture. Obsolete.

Indespensible, adj. Incapable of being despoised.

The cardinal calls that doctrine which makes princes indespensible by the pope, 'a breeder of schisms, a gate that makes way for all heresies to enter.' — Bishop Stillington, Sermons on Novembers, 1673. (Ord MS.)

Indeprehensible, adj. Incapable of being found out.

Calling the second a case perplexed and indeprehensible. — Bishop Morley, A Discharge of the five Imputations against the Bishop of Durham, p. 174: 1653.

Indeprivable, adj. Incapable of being taken away.

If [the sovereign good] should not be transient, nor derived from the will of others, nor in their power to take away; but be durable, self-derived, and (if I may use the expression) indeprivable. — Horris, Dialogue concerning Happiness, pt. i.

Indescribable, adj. Incapable of being described.

This magnificent peak . . . formed one of those scenes of Eastern travel which leave an indelible impression on the imagination, and bring back in after years indescrivable feelings of pleasure and repose. — Lagard, Sincere and Babylon, ch. i.

Indesert, s. Want of merit. Rare.

Universal contempt is a share, not infallible, sign of an universal indesert. — Phillips, Theatrum Poeticum, pref.: 1673.

Those who were once looked on as his equals, are apt to think the name of his merit a reflection on their own indesert. — Addison, Spectator.

Indesinent, adj. [Lat. desino — end; pres. part. desinens, — entis.] Unpleasant. Rare.

The last kind of activity, and the perceptivity resulting from it, is much more noble, more indesinent, and indefasible, than the first. — A. Baxter, Enquiry into the Nature of the human Soul, i. 351.

Indesimently, adv. In an indesinent manner; without cessation. Rare.

They continue a month indesimently. — Ray, Wisdom of God manifest in the Works of the Creation.

Indestructibility, s. Incapability of being destroyed.

It is, therefore, natural, that the physical doctrine of indestructibility applied to force as well as to matter, should be essentially a creation of the present century, notwithstanding a few allusions made to it by some earlier thinkers, all of whom, however, grasped vaguely, and without general purpose, indestructibility. — History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. vi.

Indestructible, adj. Incapable of being destroyed.

Glass is so compact and firm a body, that it is indestructible by art or nature. — Boyle.

Indeterminable, adj. Incapable of being determined, fixed, defined, or settled.

There is not only obscurity in the end, but beginning of the world; that, as its period is inscrutable, so is its nativity indeterminable. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indeterminate, adj. Unfixed; not defined; indefinite.

The rays of the same colour were by turns transmitted at one thickness, and reflected at another thickness, for an indeterminate number of successions. — Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Indeterminately, adv. In an indeterminate manner; indefinitely.

His perspicacity discerned the loneliness to respect the north, when ours beheld it indeterminately. — Sir T. Browne.

The depth of the hold is indeterminately expressed in the description. — Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Indeterminateness, s. Attribute suggested by Indeterminateness.

The very nature of language, the want of adequate expressions to denote the endless shades of colour, and the indeterminateness of those which are applied to various tints, create some difficulties in this part of the subject. — Lawrence, Lectures, p. 279. (Ord MS.)

Indetermination, s. Want of determination; want of fixed or stated direction.

By continents I understand all things, which may be done, and may not be done, may happen, or may not happen, by reason of the indetermination or accidental concurrence of the cause. — Archibald Burnhall, Answer to Hobbes.

Indetermined, adj. Unsettled; unfixed.

We should not amuse ourselves with floating words of indetermined signification, which we can use in several senses to serve a turn. — Locke.

Indevote, adj. [Fr. indévo.] Coldly devoted; little affected.

Mr. Wotton tells me he has disposed of all the Tabule, and Mr. Morlock says the same, and you will have your money by Dr. Mills or me; but they give no good account of the other little book. There are no many of the same arguments, and so indevote an age. But you must have a little patience. — Butley, Letters, p. 191.

Indevoted, part. pref. Wanting devotion; not attached; disaffected. Rare.

It grieved him to find persons of the best condition, and who loved both king and church, exceedingly indevoted to him [Land]. — Lord Clarendon, Life, i. 64.

Mr. Cowley's connexions with some persons indevoted to the excellent chancellor, kept him at a distance from a man so congenial to himself. — Bishop Hall, Dialogues.

Indevotion, s. Want of devotion; irreligion.

That that was licentiousness grows ambition; and that comes to indevotion, and spiritual coldness. — Donne, Devotions, p. 611: 1624.

Look on your indevotion, that heathen, restless behaviour in the house of God. — Hammond, Works, iv. 514.

Let us make the church the scene of our penitence, as of our faults; deprecate our former indevotion, and, by an exemplary reverence, redress the want of piety. — Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Indevout. adj. [Fr. indévot.] Not devout; not religious; irreligious.

They are only fair prayers, that must stay us from being carried away with the violent assaults of discontentment; under which a praying soul can no more miscarry than an indevout soul can enjoy safety.—Bishop Hall, Of Contentation, § 25.

A swathed, careless, indevout spirit.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermon, 363.
He prays much, yet curses more: whilst he is meek, but indevout.—Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.

Index. s. [Lat.]

1. Discoverer; pointer out; indicator: (pl. indexes).
a. Figuratively.

That which was once the index to point out all virtues, does now mark out the vices of the world where most of them reside.—Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.

Every common dauber writes rascal and villain under his pictures, because the pictures themselves have neither character nor resemblance. But the works of a master require no index.—Letter of Junius, let. xii.

b. Physically or mechanically. As part of any organ or instrument.

They have no more inward self-consciousness of what they do or suffer, than the index of a watch, of the hole it points to. Health.

c. In Anatomy. Forefinger: (used adjectivally in the extract).

The Fingers, however, offer an anomaly, in the fore-hand, by the stunted phalanges of the index digit.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

2. Of a book; table of reference: (more usually applied to an alphabetical list of words or subjects at the end of a volume; more rarely to the table of contents).

If a book has no index, or good table of contents, 'tis very useful to make one as you are reading it; and in your index to take notice only of parts new to you.—Watts.

Juan was taught from out the best edition, Expurgated by learned men, who place, Judiciously, from out the schoolboy's vision, The grosser parts; but fearful to deface, Too much their modest hand for this omission, And pitying only his mutilated case, They only add them all in an appendix, Which saves, in fact, the trouble of an index.
Byron, Don Juan, l. 44.

3. In Algebra (pl. indices). Figure, or letter, denoting a number, written on the right side of another figure or letter, with a similar import, showing how many times the latter is multiplied; indicator of the power of a sign of number.

Indexterity. s. Want of dexterity; want of readiness; want of handiness; clumsiness; awkwardness.

The indexterity of our consumption-curers demonstrates their dimness in beholding its causes.—Harvey, Discourse of Consumption.

Indiaman. s. Ship for the trade with (East) India.

No place is so propitious to the formation either of close friendships or of deadly enmities as an Indiaman. There are very few people who do not find a voyage which lasts several months insupportably dull.—Moranville, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Indicant. s. That which indicates.

A physician, in order to a case, considers first the nature, causes, and symptoms of the disease, as the prime indicants of what he is to do; next the patient, season, and other concomitants; and then the means.—Grew, Compendium Naturæ, p. 68. (Ord. MS.)

Indicate. v. a.

1. Show; point out.

Mentioned in a manner that seems to indicate some connexion between them.—Maitland, Note on Russell's Life of Johnson.

2. In Medicine. Point out a remedy.

The nature of the disease is to indicate the remedy.—Barke.

Indication. s.

1. Mark; token; sign; note; symptom.

The frequent stops they make in the most convenient places, are a plain indication of their weakness.—Addison.

We think that our successes are a plain indication of the divine favour towards us.—Bishop Stretton.

2. In Medicine.

Indications is of four kinds: vital, preservative, curative, and palliative, as it directs what is to be done to continue life, cutting off the cause of an approaching distemper, curing it whilst it is actually present, or lessening its effects, or taking off some of its symptoms before it can be wholly removed.—Quincy.

3. Discovery made; intelligence given.

If a person, that had a fair estate in reversion, should be assured by some skilful physician, that he would inevitably fall into a disease that would totally deprive him of his understanding and memory; if, I say, upon a certain belief of this indication, the man should appear overjoyed at the news, would not that show him conclude that the distemper had seized him?—Bentley.

4. Explanation; display.

These be the things that govern nature principally, and without which you cannot make any true analysis, and indication of the proceedings of nature.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Indicative. adj.

1. Showing; informing; pointing out.

The first sight of a fiery sword was but an indicative sign, an hieroglyphic and obscure image of a war.—J. Spencer, Discourse concerning Prophecy, p. 204.

Ridicule, with ever-pointing hand Conscious of every shift, of every shift Indicative, his inmost plot betrays.

2. In Grammar. Mood so called, in which case it often stands alone as a substantive: (we may say either, 'I am is in the indicative mood,' or, 'I am is the indicative of the copular verb').

Indict. v. a. Charge any before a grand court of justice by a written accusation.

I was (unluckily warrior as I am) Arraigning his unkindness with my soul; But now I find I had abused the witness, And he's indicted falsely. Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 4. (For another example see under Indictment.)

Indiction. s.

1. Declaration; proclamation.

After a legation 'ad res repetendas,' and a refusal, and a denunciation, and indiction of a war, the war is left at large.—Bacon.

There is a solemn mourning, and there is a private and domestic; the solemn is by public indiction of authority.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 104.

2. In Chronology. See extract.

The indiction, instituted by Constantine the Great, is properly a cycle of tributes, orderly disposed, for fifteen years, and by it accounts of that kind were kept. Afterwards, in memory of the great victory obtained by Constantine over Maxentius, 8 Cal. Oct. 312, by which an entire freedom was given to Christianity, the council of Nice, for the honour of Constantine, ordained that the accounts of years should be no longer kept by the Olympiads, which till that time had been done; but that, instead thereof, the indiction should be made use of, by which to reckon and date their years, which hath since A.D. 313, Jan. 1.—Johnson.
The emperor Justinian made a law, that no writing should pass without the date of the indictions.—Gregory, Pastoralus, p. 140.

Indictive. adj. Proclaimed; declared.

In all the funerals of note, especially in the public or indictive, the corpse was first brought with a vast train of followers, into the forum.—Kennet, Roman Antiquities, ii. 5.

Indictment. s. Accusation laid against any one before a court of justice.

Read the indictment.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iii. 2.

The surgeon having declared, that by law he was liable to be indicted for the thief's escape, as it was out of his house: he was a little comforted however by Mr. Barnabas's opinion, (that as the corpse was by night the indictment would not lie).—Felding, Adventures of Joseph Andrews.

She was styled accordingly, in the indictment, 'Mary, daughter and heir of James the Fifth, late King of Scots, otherwise called Mary queen of Scots, daughter of France.' We read even that some lawyers would have had her tried by a jury of the county of Stafford, rather than by the special commission; which Elizabeth noticed as a strange indignity. The commission, however, was perfectly legal under the recent statute.—Hallam, Constitutional History of England, ch. iii. vol. i.

A motion in arrest of judgment was instantly made, on the ground that a Latin word endorsed on the back of the indictment was incorrectly spelt. The objection was undoubtedly frivolous.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xv.

1. Neutrality; freedom from motives on either side; impartiality; negligence; want of affection, interest, or sympathy.

Indifference cannot but be criminal, when it is conversant about objects which are so far from being of an indifferent nature, that they are of the highest importance.—Addison.

A place which we must pass through, not only with the indifference of strangers, but with the vigilance of those who travel through the country of an enemy.—Rogers.

Indifference, clad in wisdom's guise, All fortitude of mind supplies; For how can slony hearts such, In those who never play fast?

Swift, On the Death of Dr. Swift.
The people of England should be frightened with the French king and the pretender once a year: the want of observing this necessary precept, has produced great indifference in the vulgar.—Arbuthnot.

2. State in which no moral or physical reason preponderates; state in which there is no difference.

The choice is left to our discretion, except a principal bond of some higher duty remove the indifference that such things have in themselves: their indifference is removed, if we take away our own liberty.—Hunter, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Indifference. s. Indifference.

Read the book with indifference and judgement, and thou canst not but greatly commend it.—Archbishop Whigg.

In choice of committees it is better to chuse indifferent persons, than to make an indifference by putting in those that are strong on both sides.—Bacon, Essays.

A perfect indifference in the mind, not determinable by its last judgement, would be as great an imperfection as the want of indifference to act, or not to act till determined by the will.—Locke.

He will let you know he has got a clasp with as much indifference as he would a piece of publick news. Swift.

And if it do not always fulfil the conception of a just indifference, the very cases where it deviates from the rule demonstrate its validity; they testify to the original truth that the state is just, by the strong inherent sense which they arouse in the mass of men, not only of impolicy, but of actual wrong sustained, and of resentment thereupon.—Glendon, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. ii.

Indifferent. adj.

1. Neutral; not determined to either side.

Both his majesty Incline to it or no? He seems indifferent.
Shakespeare, Henry V., i. 1.
Being indifferent, we should receive and embrace opinions according as evidence gives the attestation of truth.—Locke.

Let guilt or fear Disturb man's rest; Cato knows neither of them: Indifferent in his choice to sleep or die.

2. Unconcerned; inattentive; regardless.

One thing was all to you, and your fondness made you indifferent to every thing else.—Sir W. Temple.
It was a law of Solon, that any person who, in the civil commotions of the republic, remained neuter, or an indifferent spectator of the contending parties, should be condemned to perpetual banishment.—Addison, Freethinker.

But how indifferent to soever man may be to eternal happiness, yet surely to eternal misery, 'twill be indifferent.—Rogers.

3. Without such difference as to render one thing preferable for its own sake to another.

The nature of things indifferent is neither to be commanded nor forbidden, but left free and arbitrary.—Hunter, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Customs, which of themselves are indifferent in other kingdoms, become exceeding evil in this realm, by reason of the inconveniences which followed thereupon.—Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

Though at first it was free, and in my choice whether or no I should publish these discourses; yet the publication being once resolved, the dedication was not so indifferent.—South, Sermons.

This I mention only as my conjecture, it being indifferent to the matter which way the learned shall determine.—Locke.

4. Impartial; disinterested.

Metcal was partial to none, but indifferent to all; a master for the whole, and a father to every one.—Archam.

I am a most poor woman and a stranger, Born out of your dominions; having here No judge indifferent, and no more assurance Of equal friendship and proceeding.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII., ii. 4.

There can hardly be an indifferent trial had between the king and the subject, or between party and party, by reason of this general kindred and consanguinity.—Sir J. Davies.

Passable; having mediocrity; of a middling state; neither good nor worst.

Who would excel, when few can make a test,
Belov'd indifferent writing and the best? Dryden.
This has oblig'd me to publish an indifferent collection of poems, for fear of being thought the author of a worse. Prior.

There is not one of these subjects that would not sell a very indifferent paper, could I think of gratifying the publick by such mean and base methods.
Addison.

Used substantively.

What difficulties there are, which as yet withhold our ascent till we be further and better satisfied, I hope no indifferent amongst them will scorn or refuse to hear. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy, b. ii.
p. 1. (Ord. M8.)

Used adverbially.

I am myself indifferent honest; but yet I could accuse me of such things, that it were better that my mother had not born me.—Shakspeare, Hamlet,
iii. 1.

This will raise a great scum on it, and leave your wine indifferent clear.—Mortimer.

Indifferentism. s. System of indifference:

(generally applied to religious creeds and philosophical speculations).
Yet even in this respect Latin owes its vitality, and almost its Latinity, to Christian writers. Augustine and Jerome . . . have a kind of dexterous management, a vigorous mastery, and a copiousness of language, unrivalled in their days. Sulpicius Severus surpasses in style any later historical work; Salvian is better than the Panegyrista. . . . Heathenism, or indifferentism, strangely enough, kept up the Pagan supremacy in poetry alone. Claudian, and even the few lines of Meropides, stand higher in purity, as in the life of poetry, than all the Christian hexameters.—Wilson, History of Latin
Christianity, b. xiv. ch. iii.

Indifferently. adv. In an indifferent manner.

1. Without distinction; without preference.

Whiteness is a mean between a tawny and a black; and so with equal facility to be tinged with any of them.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Though a church-of-England man thinks every species of government equally lawful, he does not think them equally expedient, or for every country
indifferently.—Swift.

2. Equally; impartially.

That they may truly and indifferently minister justice.—Book of Common Prayer.

3. In a neutral state; without wish or aver- sion.

Not honour in one eye, and death i' the other,
And I will look on both indifferently.—Shakspeare, Julius Caesar, i. 2.

4. Not well; tolerably; passably; mid- dlingly.

A noyle will draw indifferently well, and carry great burthens.—Cervus.

I hope it may indifferently entertain your lordship at an unbenighted hour.—Rover.

An hundred and fifty of their beads, sown together, kept me but very indifferently from the floor.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

Indigence. s. Want; penury; poverty.

For 'gain that indigence, that brings me low,
Makes me myself, and him above to know. Dryden.

Indigence. s. Same as Indigence.

The chiefest tie and bond of all human society is neither reason, nor speech, nor indigence; but religion and piety.—Euthyphro, Athenianist, p. 38; 1622.

Such indigence as, by the curse of God and restraint of his blessings, [were] on the fruits of their land.—Dr. E. Povey, On Isaac, p. 64.

Where there is happiness, there must not be indigence, or want of any due comforts of life.—Dr. T.
Harriet, Treatise of the Earth.

Athenians worshipp'd God with temples and sacrifices, as if he needed habitation and sustenance; and that the heathens had such a mean apprehension about the indigence of their gods, appears from Aristophanes and Lucian.—Bentley.

Indigene. s. Native. Rare.

The alaternus, which we have lately received from the hottest parts of Lausania, thrives with us, as if it were an indigene.—Recluse.

Indigenous. adj. [Fr. indigène; Lat. indigena.]

Native to a country; originally produced or born in a region.

Negroes were all transported from Africa, and are not indigenous or proper natives of America.—Sir
Brown.

It is wonderful to observe one creature, that is,
mankind, indigenous to no many different climates.
—Arbuthnot.

Indigent. adj. [Lat. indigena, -entis = want- ing, lacking, standing in need.]

1. Poor; needy; necessitous.

Charity consists in relieving the indigent.—Addison.

2. In want; wanting; (with off).

Rejoice, O Albion, sever'd from the world
By nature's wise indulgence; indigent
Of nothing from without. J. Phillips, Cyder, b. ii.

3. Void; empty; (with off).

Such bodies have the tangible parts indigent of moisture.—Barrow, Natural and Experimental History.

Indigent. adj. Same as Indigent. Rare.

To make of monsters and things indigent
Such cherubims as your sweet self resemble.
Shakspeare, Sonnets, cxiv.

Indigested. adj.

1. Not separated into distinct orders; not regularly disposed.

This mass, or indigested matter, or chaos, created in the beginning, was without the proper form, which it afterwards acquired.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

Before the sun and this terrestrial ball,
One was the face of nature, if a face;
Rather a rude and indigested.
Dryden, Translation from Ovid.

2. Not formed or shaped.

Hence, heap of wrath, foul indigested lump;
As crooked in thy manners as thy shape.
Shakspeare, Henry VI. Part II. v. 1.

3. Not well considered and methodised.

By irksome deformities, through endless and useless effusions, indigested prayers, they often times disgrace the worship of Christian duty towards God.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

The political creed of the high-principled men sets the protestant succession upon a firmer foundation than all the indigested schemes of those who profess revolution principles.—Swift.

4. Not concocted in the stomach.

All dreams, as in old Galen I have read,
Are from reptation and complexion bred;
From rising fumes of indigested food.
Dryden, The Cuck and the Fox, 110.

5. Not purified or sublimed by heat.

That it [the air] be not too gross, nor too pen-etrative; . . . not indigested, for want of sun; not un-cavertised, for want of a wind.—Sir H. Walton, Elements of Architecture, p. 1.

6. Not brought to suppuration.

His wound was indigested and inflamed.—Wiseman.

Indigestible. adj.

1. Incapable of digestion by the stomach.

Eyes are the most nourishing and easiest of all animal food, and most indigestible; no body can digest the same quantity of them as of other food.—Johnston, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

2. Not capable of being received.

Who but a boy, fond of the florid and the descriptive, could have paired forth such a torrent of indigestible smiles? T. Walton, An Enquiry into the Authenticity of the Poems attributed to Th
Rochley, p. 79.

Indigestion. s. Incapability of, difficulty in,

digesting food; dyspepsia.
Those things which, being in nature or art, are want to pass for the carriages of light, have in them sometimes, at least in respect of our sight, some kind of darkness and opacity. The candle hath her smoke, the fire her smoke and blackness of indigestion, the moon her spots, and the very sun itself his eclipses.—Bishop Hall, Recluse, p. 37.

The fumes of indigestion may induce men to thought, as well as to diseases of danger and pain.—Sir W. Temple.

Indigite. r. s. [Lat. indigitatus, pass. part.

of indigito; digitus = finger.] Point out;
show by the fingers.

Antiquity expressed numbers by the fingers: the deprecating this finger, which in the left hand implied but six, in the right hand indigitatus six hundred.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

As though there were a seminality of urine, we foolishly conceive we behold therein the anatomy of every particle, and can thereby indigitate their affections. Ibid.

We are not to indigitate the parts transmitted.—Harvey.

Indigitation. s. Act of pointing out or showing, as by the finger.

Which things I conceive no obscure indigitation of providence.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

Indign. adj. [Fr. indigne; Lat. indignus.]

1. Unworthy; undeserving? Rare.

She herself was of his grave indigne.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, iv. 1, 30.

Where there is a kingdom that is altogether unable or indigne to govern, it is just for another nation, in civil policy, to subdue them.—Baron,
Advertisement touching a holy War.

2. Bringing indignity; disgraceful. Rare.

And all indigo and base diversities

Make head against my estimation.
Shakspeare, Othello, i. 3.

Indignance. s. Indignation; Obsolete.

With great indignance he that merit forsook.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, iii. 11, 13.

Indignant. adj. [Lat. indignans, -antis.]

Angry? raging; inflamed at once with anger and disdain.
He scour'd with many a stroke the indignant
waves.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 311.

The lustful monster fled, pursued by the valorous and indignant Martin.—Arbuthnot and Pope.

What race that hour did Albion's soul possess,
Let chiefs machine, and let lovers guess!
He strikes indignant, and with haughty cries
To single fight the fairy prince delays.
Tickell.

Indignation. s.

1. Anger mingled with contempt or disgust.
Suspend your indignation against my brother till I bring better testimony of his intent.—Shak-epeare, King Lear, i. 2.

From those officers, warm with indignation at the insolence of that vile rabble, came words of great contempt.—Lord Charnock.

But keep the swelling indignation down, Lowell.
And let your cooler reason now prevail.

2. Anger of a superior.

There was great indignation against Israel.—
2 Kings, iii. 27.

3. Effect of anger.

If heav'n's have any grievous plague in store,
Let them hurl down their indignation
On thee, thou troubler of the world.
Shakspeare, Richard III. i. 3.

Indignity. r. s.

1. Treat disdainfully. Rare.

Where that discourteous dame with scornful pride,
And false entreaty him indignified,
That from heart it hardly could sustain.—Spenser, Faerie Queen, vi. 1, 30.

2. Treat unbecomingly. Rare.

Therefore in closure of a thankful mind,
I deem it best to hold eternally
Their bounteous deeds and noble favours shrin'd,
Than by discourse them to indignify.
Spenser, Colin Clout.

Indignity. s. Contumely; contemptuous injury; violation of right, accompanied with insult.

Bishops and prelates could not but have bleeding hearts to behold a person of so great place and worth constrained to endure so foul indignities.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Man he made, and for him built
Magnificent this world, and earth his seat,
His lord pronounce'd; and, O indignity!
Subjected to his servile arm-and-wings,
And flaming ministers, to watch and tend
Their earthly charge.—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 122.

He does not see how that mighty passion for the church can well consist with those indignities and contempt men bestow on the clergy.—Swift.

Indignly. adv. In an indigne manner; un- worthily; not according to desert. Rare.

O Saviour, didst thou take flesh for our redemption to be thus indignly used, thus mangled, thus tormented.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the Old and New Testaments, The Crucifixion.

Indigo. s. [Lat. indicum, as being produced

in India.] Plant, of the genus Heliotropium, and the natural order Leguminosae, so called, the leaves of which yield a blue dye; the dye itself.

Indigo [is] a plant, by the Americans called anil.
In the middle of the flower is the style, which afterwards becomes a jointed pod, containing one cylindrical seed in one partition, from which indigo is made, which is used in dyeing for a blue colour.—Milner.

Indignatory. adj. Not dilatory or slow. Rare.

Since you have firm'd . . . new orders . . . you would be pleased in like manner to give them a new form of indignatory execution.—Cervantes, Supplement to Candide, p. 165; 1654.

Indifference. s. Want, absence of diligence;

slowness; carelessness. Rare.
It is not as great an indifferency, that an excellent conceit and capacity, by the indifference of an idiotous, should be disgraced.—H. Jonson, Discor-dies.

He that is bound to use all diligence to subdue his corruptions, at least to suppress them; if he do not so, this indifference of his hath stage of his conscience.—Hammond, Works, i. 191.

Indigent. adj. Not diligent; careless.

Rare.

Neither art, they [wisdom and knowledge] so casual . . . as to fall upon the indigent and unwelcome. — Fitzhugh, Sermon on Ecclesiastes, ii. 11.

Indigently, adv. In an indigent manner. Rare.

I had spent some years, not altogether indigently, under the rules of such masters as the place afforded. — Bishop Hall, Specialties of his Life.

Indiscernible, adj. Incapable of being diminished.

Have they not been bold of late to check the common law, to slight and brave the indiscernible majesty of our highest court, the lawgiving and sacred parliament? — Milton, Of Reformation in England, b. ii.

Indirect, adj.

1. Not straight or rectilinear; not tending otherwise than obliquely or consequentially to a purpose: (as, 'An indirect accusation').

2. Figuratively, with a bad sense. Wrong; improper; unfair; dishonest.

The tender prince
Would fain have come with me to meet your grace;
... by his mother who performs with-held.

By what an indirect and treacherous course
Is this of hers? — Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 1.

Those things which they do know they may upon sundry indirect considerations, let pass; and although themselves do not err, yet may they deceive others. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

O pity and shame! that they who to live well
Entered so fair, should turn aside, to tread
Paths indirect. — Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 629.

Indirect dealing will be discovered one time or other, and then he loses his reputation. — Archbishop Tillotson.

Indirection, s. Oblique means; dishonest practice. Obsolete.

And thus do we, of wisdom and of reach,
With windlasses, and with essays of bias,
By indirections find directions out. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 1.

I had rather coin my heart than wring
From the hard hands of peasants their vile trash,
By any indirection. — Id., Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

Most of the indirection and artifice, which is used among men, does not proceed so much from a degeneracy in nature, as an affliction of appearing men of consequence by such practices. — Talfer,
no. 191.

Indirectly, adv.

1. In an indirect manner; not in a right line; obliquely; not in express terms.

Still she suppresses the name, which continues his doubts and hopes; and at last she indirectly mentions it. — Brown.

2. Figuratively, with a bad sense. Unfairly; not rightly.

He bids you then resign
Your crown and kingdom indirectly held. — Shakespeare, Henry V. ii. 4.

He that takes any thing from his neighbour, which was justly forfeited, to satisfy his own revenge or avarice, is tied to repentance, but not to restitution: because I took the forfeiture indirectly, I am answerable to God for my unkindness, unjust, or uncharitable circumstances. — Jeremy Taylor.

Indirectness, s. Attribute suggested by Indirect; obliquity; unfairness; dishonesty; fraudulent art.

The unlikeness of this doctrine of purgatory have, methinks, used a worse kind of indirectness in their exposure of it. — W. Mountague, Devout Essays, pt.
ii. p. 132: 1674.

Indiscernible, adj. Incapable of being discerned.

Speculation, which, to my dark soul,
Deprived of reason, is as indiscernible
As colours to my body, wanting sight. — Sir J. Denham, The Sophy, iv. 1.

A motion that was almost instantaneous, and so indiscernible. — South, Sermons, vii. 17.

Indiscernibleness, s. Attribute suggested by Indiscernible; incapability of discernment.

I should have shew'd you also the indiscernible-ness, to the eye of man, of the different states, till God by his promissive sentence have made the mo-ration. — Hammond, Works, iv. 491.

Indiscernibly, adv. In an indiscernible manner.

Much guile often lurks indiscernibly under the simplest appearances. — Lively Oracles, p. 21.

Indiscernability, s. Incapability of dis-cernition, or being pulled to pieces.

To such a being (God) belongs spirituality, which implies indiscernability; and who but a madman can imagine the Divine essence discernible into parts? — Annotations on Glanville, &c., p. 181: 1682.

Indiscrutable, adj. [see Indiscrutable.]
Incapable of being pulled to pieces, destroyed.

A soul . . . is a spirit, and therefore of an indivisible that is an indiscrutable essence. — Dr. H. More, Immutability of the Soul, p. 113.

The nature of the soul, which is immortal and indiscrutable. — Glanville, Pre-existence of Souls,
p. 35.

Indiscrutableness, s. Attribute suggested by Indiscrutable; quality or state of being indiscrutable.

He must understand the term of an indiscrutable-ness not arising from thinner and thinner parts of matter, as he imagines air to be more hardly discrutable than earth or water. — Annotations on Glanville, &c., pp. 221, 222.

Indiscrutable, adj. [Lat. dis = different ways + carpo = crop, pull; pass. part. dis-crutus. In composition the a becomes e, hence -carpo = carpo. This gives Indiscrutable.] Not to be separated; incapable of being broken or destroyed by dissolution of parts.

We have no way of determining by experience what is the certain bulk of the living being each man calls himself; and yet, till it be determined that it is larger in bulk than the solid elementary particles of matter, which there is no ground to think any natural power can dissolve, there is no sort of reason to think death to be the dissolution of it, of the living being, even though it should not be absolutely indiscrutable. — Bishop Butler, Analogy of Religion, natural and revealed, to the Constitution and Course of Nature, pt. i. ch. 1.

Indiscrutable, adj. Incapable of improvement by discipline.

Necessity renders men of phlegmatick and dull natures stupid and indiscrutable. — Sir M. Hale, Discourse touching Preconition for the Poor, pref.

Indiscrutable, adj. Incapable of being discrutable.

Nothing can be to us a law, which is by us indiscrutable. — Combe, Sermons, ii. 103.

Indiscrutable, s. State of being hidden.
Rare.

The ground of this assertion was the magnifying esteem of the ancients, arising from the indiscrutable of its head. — Sir T. Brown.

Indiscreet, adj. Imprudent; incautious;
inconsiderate; injudicious.

Why then
Are mortal men so fond and indiscreet,
So evil gold to seek unto their aid;
And having not complain, and having it upbraid?
— Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Used substantially.

If thou be among the indiscreet, observe the time; but be continually among men of understanding. — Ecclesiastes, xlvii. 12.

Indiscreetly, adv. In an indiscreet manner; without prudence; without consideration; without judgement.

Job on justice hath aspersions flung,
And spoken indiscreetly with his tongue.

Let a great personage undertake an action passionately, let him manage it indiscreetly, and he shall have enough to flatter him. — Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of holy Living.

Indiscreet, adj. [Lat. dis = different ways;
conveying the notion of distinction + cerno = see, discern; pass. part. discretus; dis-cretio, -onis.] Not separated or distinguished.

A chaos, in which the terrestrial elements were all in an indiscreet mass of confused matter. —
Macaulay, On Antiquities, p. 132.

Indiscretion, s. Imprudence; rashness;
inconsideration.

Indiscretion sometimes serves us well,
When our deep plots do fail. — Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 2.

His offences did proceed rather from negligence, rashness, or other indiscretion, than from any malicious thought. — Sir J. Hayward.

Some papers have been obtained from us by the importunity and dupery by the indiscretion of friends, although restrained by promise. — Sieff.

Indiscrutable, adj. Undistinguishable; not marked with any note of distinction.

Could ever any man wish, in good estate,
The use of all things indiscrutable?
— Bishop Hall, Satires, v. 3.

Indiscriminately, adv. In an indiscriminate manner; without distinction.

Others use defamatory discourse purely for love of talk, whose speech, like a flowing current, bears away indiscriminately whatever lies in its way. —
Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Liquors, strong of acid salts, destroy the blueness of the infusion of our wood; and liquors indiscriminately, that abound with sulphurous salts, restore it. — Hogb.

Indiscriminating, part. pres. Making no distinction.

We should be cautious of asserting in general and indiscriminating terms. — Warton.

Indiscrimation, s. Want of discrimination.

The like indiscrimation may obtain in higher orders. — Bishop Horley, Sermons: 1790.

Indiscussed, part. pres. Not discussed;
not examined. Rare.

Reasons light in themselves, or indiscussed in me.
— Dante, Letter to Sir H. G. Poena, p. 279.

Indiscussibility, s. Incapability of being discussed with.

Contrary to all their notions, about the eternity and indiscussibility of the natural law. — Skellton, Deum Revolut, dial. 3.

The numerous and highly important discoveries which have been made and confirmed by observers in almost every European state, by means of the greatly improved microscopes at their command, have placed the value, the indiscussibility, of that instrument to the anatomist, beyond the necessity of vindication. — Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. iii.

Indiscussible, adj.

1. Incapable of being discussed with.
The indiscussible dictation of the divine light. —
Dr. H. More, Conjectura Cabalistica, p. 212.

2. Not to be allowed even by special dispensation (in the ecclesiastical sense).

Zanchinus . . . absolutely condemns this marriage as incestuous and indiscussible. — Bishop Hall, Caus of Conscience, add.

Indiscussableness, s. Attribute suggested by Indiscussible; state of not being to be spared; necessity.

Though the necessity and indiscussableness of all the great and moral obligations of natural religion, and also the certainty of a future state of rewards and punishments, be thus in general deducible even demonstrably, by a chain of clear and undeniable reasoning, yet . . . very few are able, in reality and effect, to discover these things clearly and plainly for themselves. — Clarke, Evidences of Natural and Revealed Religion.

Indiscussably, adv. In an indiscussable manner; without dispensation; without remission; necessarily.

Every one must look upon himself as indiscus-sably obliged to the practice of duty. — Addison, Freeholder.

Indispersed, part. pres. Not dispersed.
Rare.

Indispersed is this bright majesty,
Yet every where outshining in infinity.
— Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, iii. 2, 35.

Indispose, r. a. Affect with indisposition.

1. Make unfit; (with for).

Nothing can be reckoned good or bad to us in this life, any farther than it prepares or indisposes us for the enjoyments of another. — Bishop Atterbury.

2. Disincline; make averse; (with to).

It has a strange efficacy to indispose the heart to religion. — South, Sermons.

Indisposed, part. adj. Affected with indisposition.

The soul is not now hindered in its actions by the disposition of indisposed organs. — Glanville.

Though it weakened, yet it made him rather indisposed than sick, and did no ways disable him from studying. — J. Walton.

With towards.

The king was sufficiently indisposed towards the person or the principles of Calvin's disciples. —
Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Indisposedness, s. Attribute suggested by Indisposed; state of unfitness or disinclination; disordered state. Rare.

A sensible indisposedness of heart. — Bishop Hall, Soliloquies, lxviii.

The quantity we take in, more than agreeth with nature, whose burden appears by too much dulness, drowsiness, or indisposedness of head or stomach. — *Whitlock, Observations on the present
Manners of the English*, p. 500: 1084.

It is not any innate harshness in piety that renders the first essays of it unpleasant; that is owing only to the indisposition of our own hearts.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Indisposition. s.

1. Disorder of health; tendency to sickness; slight disease.

The king did complain of a continual infirmity of body, yet rather as an indisposition in health than any set sickness.—Sir J. Heywood.

I have known a great fleet lose great occasions, by an indisposition of the admiral, while he was neither well enough to exercise, nor ill enough to leave the command.—Sir W. Temple.

His life seems to have been prolonged beyond its natural term, under these indispositions which hung upon the latter part of it.—Addison, Freetholder.

The queen [of James II.] was with child. Before the end of October 1688 the great news began to be whispered. It was observed that her majesty had absented herself from some public ceremonies, on the plea of indisposition.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. viii.

2. Disinclination; dislike: (with to or towards).

The indisposition of the church of Rome to reform herself, must be no stay unto us from performing our duty to God.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The mind, by every degree of affected unbelief, contracts more and more of a general indisposition towards believing.—Bishop Atterbury.

Indisputable. adj.

Incapable of being disputed; incontrovertible; incontestable.

There is no maxim in politics more indisputable than that a nation should have many honours to reward for those who do national services.—Addison.

The apostle asserts a clear indisputable conclusion, which could admit of no question.—Rogers.

Indisputably. adv.

In an indisputable manner.

1. Without controversy; certainly; evidently.

The thing itself is questionable, nor is it indisputably certain what death she died.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indisputably. adv.

Without opposition.

They questioned a duty that had been indisputably granted to so many preceding kings.—Howell, Local Porrait.

Indissolubility. s.

Incapability of being dissolved.

1. Resistance to a dissolving power; firmness; stabileness.

What hoops hold this mass of matter in so close a pressure together, from whence steel has its firmness, and the parts of a diamond their hardness and indissolubility.—Locke.

Indissolubility. s.

Perpetuity of obligation.

To give this contract its most essential quality, namely, indissolubility.—Bishop Warburton, Sermon.

Indissoluble. adj.

[Lat. solutus = loosen; pass. part. solutus: this from the latter; indissoluble from the former.] Incapable of being dissolved.

1. Resisting all separation of its parts; firm; stable.

When common gold and lead are mingled, the lead may be severed almost unaltered; yet if, instead of the gold, a tincture of the red elixir be mingled with the saturn, their union will be so indissoluble, that there is no possible way of separating the diffused elixir from the fixed lead.—Boyle.

Indissolubly. adv.

In an indissoluble manner; in a manner resisting all separation.

On they move, nor obvious hill, Nor strait-nine vale, nor wood, nor dream divide Their perfect ranks.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 69.

The remaining ashes, by a further degree of fire, may be indissolubly united into glass.—Boyle.

They willingly unite Indissolubly firm; from Dublin south To northern Oradea.—J. Phillips, Cyclo.

Indissoluble. adj.

Incapable of being dissolved; indissoluble (q. v.).

1. Not separable as to its parts.

Metals, corroded with a little acid, turn into rust, which is an earth tasteless and indissoluble in water; and this earth, imbibed with more acid, becomes a metallic salt.—Sir I. Newton.

Indissolubly. adv.

Subsisting for ever; not to be loosed.

O invincible, indissoluble, and divine power.—Sir P. Heywood, Present State of the Greek and Armenian Churches, p. 330.

The union between these two natures is only by intimate indissoluble relation one to the other.—South, Sermons, vii. 21.

Indissolubly. adv.

Obligatory; not to be broken; binding for ever.

Deposition and degradation are without hope of any remission, and therefore the law styles them an indissoluble bond; but a censured a dissolvable bond.—Agiliff, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Indistinctness. s.

Condition of objects not separated by any notable distance. Rare.

The soul thus existing after death, and separated from the body, though of a nature spiritual, is really and truly in some place; if not by way of circumscription, as proper bodies are, yet by way of determination and indistinctness; so that it is true to say, this is really and truly present here, and not elsewhere.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. v.

Indistinct. adj.

1. Not plainly marked; confused.

That which is now a horse, even with a thought, The rack distills, and makes it indistinct.—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, iv. 12.

She warbled in her throat, And tun'd her voice to many a merry note; But indistinct, and neither sweet nor clear.—Drayton, The Flower and the Leaf, 110.

When we speak of the infinite divisibility of matter, we keep a very clear and distinct idea of division and divisibility; but when we come to partition small for our senses, our ideas of these little bodies become obscure and indistinct.—Wallis.

Indistinctly. adv.

2. Not exactly discerning.

We throw out our eyes for brave Othello, Ev'n till we make the main and the aerial blue An indistinct regard.—Shakespeare, Othello, ii. 1.

Indistinctible. adj.

Incapable of being distinguished or separated.

A favourite old romance is founded on the indistinctible likeness of two of Charlemagne's knights, Amys and Amelion.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. liv.

Indistinctness. s.

Absence of distinction.

Indistinctly. adv.

1. Confusion; uncertainty.

The indistinctness of many of the same name, or the misapplication of the net of one unto another, hath made some doubt.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indistinctly. adv.

Omission of discrimination; indiscriminate.

An indistinctness of all persons or equality of all orders, is far from being agreeable to the will of God.—Bishop Sprat.

Indistinctly. adv.

In an indistinct manner.

1. Confusedly; uncertainly; without definiteness or discrimination.

In its sides it was bounded distinctly, but on its ends confusedly and indistinctly, the light there vanishing by degrees.—Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Indistinctness. s.

Without being distinguished.

Making trial thereof, both the liquors soaked indistinctly through the bowl.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indistinctness. s.

Attribute suggested by indistinct; confusion; uncertainty; obscurity.

There is unevenness or indistinctness in the style of these pieces, concerning the origin and form of the earth.—Dr. T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Old age makes the cornea and coat of the crystalline humour grow stiffer; so that the light, for want of a sufficient refraction, will not converge to the bottom of the eye, but beyond it, and by consequence paint in the bottom of the eye a confused picture; and according to the indistinctness of this picture, the object will appear confused.—Sir I. Newton.

Indistinguishable. adj.

Incapable of being distinguished.

Do I curse thee?—Why no, you ruinous butt; you whomsoever indistinguishable cur.—Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, v. 1.

Indisturbance. s.

Calmness; freedom from disturbance. Rare.

The notion of sitting impleth rest, quietness, and indisturbance.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. vi.

What is called by the Stoicks apathe, and by the Scepticks indisturbance, seems all but to mean great tranquillity of mind.—Sir W. Temple.

Indite. inditer. See Endite &c.

Individable. adj.

Indivisible. Rare.

Individable, or poem unlimited.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, ii. 2.

Individed. adj.

Undivided. Rare.

St. Cyril, in his first book against Julian, thinks there was a representation of the blessed, individed Trinity.—Bishop Patrick, Paraphrase and Commentary on the Old Testament, Genesis, xviii. 2.

Individual. adj.

[Fr. individu, individual; Lat. individuum.]

Individual. s.

1. Separate from others of the same species; single; numerically one.

Must the whole man, amazing thee, Wit I return To the cold marble, or contracted urn? And never shall those particles agree, That were in life this individual be?—Prior, Solomon, b. iii.

It would be wise in them, as individual and private mortals, to look back a little upon the storms they have raised, as well as those they have escaped.—Swift.

The object of any particular idea is called an individual; so Peter is an individual man, London an individual city.—Wallis.

Individual. s.

2. Undivided; not to be parted or disjoined.

Amerson, My individual companion.—Holman, Mornings of the Arts, ii. 6: 1019.

Long eternity shall greet our bliss With an individual kiss.—Milton, Eden, On Time, 11.

To rise thee being, I lent Out of my side to thee, nearest my heart, Substantial life, to have thee by my side Henceforth an individual soldier dear.—Id., Paradise Lost, iv. 453.

Under his great vigorous reign abide United, as one individual soul, For ever happy.—Id., ibid. v. 600.

Individual. s.

Single person or thing.

Neither is it enough to consult, secundum genera, what the kind and character of the person should be; for the most judgment is shown in the choice of individuals.—Bacon.

They present us with images more perfect than the life in any individual.—Drayton, Translation of the Second Book of Paradise Lost.

Know, all the good that individuals find, Or God or Nature meant to mercy mankind, Or Bona's whole pleasure, all the joys of sense, Lie in three words: health, power, and competence.—Pope, Essay on Man, iv. 77.

We see each circumstance of art and individual of nature summoned together by the extent and formality of his imagination.—Id., Poetical Essay on the Mind.

The question occurs whether Natural History can be applied to individual substances? And the answer to this question is, that it can be applied, if these are such things as individuals, since the resemblances and differences with which natural history has to do are the resemblances and differences of individuals. What is an individual? It certainly is not that which is so simple that it cannot be divided. Individual animals are composed of many parts. But if we examine, we shall find that our idea of an individual is, that it is a whole composed of parts, which are not similar to the whole, and have not an independent existence, while the whole has an independent existence and a definite form. What then is the mineralogical individual? At first, while minerals were studied for their use, the most precious of the substances which they contained was looked upon as the characteristic of the mineral. The smallest trace of silver made a mineral an ore of silver. Thus forms and properties were disregarded, and substance was considered as identical with mineral. And hence Daubenton refused to recognize species in the mineral kingdom.

He proposed to call sorts what we call species. In this way of considering minerals, there are no individuals. But still this is not satisfactory; for if we take a well-formed and distinct crystal, this clearly is an individual. It may be objected, that the crystal is divisible according to the theory of crystallography into smaller solids; that these small solids are really the simple objects; and that actual crystals are formed by combinations of these molecules according to certain laws. But, as we have already said, an individual is such, not because it cannot be divided, but because it cannot be divided into parts similar to the whole.

As to the division of the form into its component laws, this is an abstract proceeding, foreign to natural history. Therefore there is so far nothing to prevent a crystal from being an individual.—Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas, vol. II. p. 148: ed. 1858.

(See also under Individuality.)

Individuality. s. Separate or distinct existence.

He would tell his instructor, that all men were not singular; that individuality could hardly be predicated of any man; for it is commonly said that a man is not the same he was, and that mad men are beside themselves.—Arbuthnot.

What is an individual? . . . As applied to a man, or to any one of the higher animals, which are all sharply-defined and independent, the word individual has a clear meaning. . . . But when we extend our range of observation to the organic world at large, we find that difficulties . . . meet us everywhere under every variety of form. Each uniaxial plant may perhaps fairly be regarded as a distinct individual. . . . What, however, are we to say of a multiaxial plant? It is, indeed, usual to speak of a tree with its many branches and shoots as singular, but strong reasons may be urged for considering it as plural. . . . Shall we regard all the growing axes, s. s. resulting from slips and grafts and buds, as parts of one individual, or as distinct individuals? If a strawberry-plant sends out runners carrying buds at their ends, which strike root and grow into independent plants, that separate from the original one by decay of the runners, must we not say that they possess separate individualities, and yet if we do this, are we not at a loss to say when their separate individualities were established, unless we admit that each bud was from the beginning an individual? . . . The animal kingdom presents still greater difficulties. When, from sundry points on the body of a common polype, there bud out young polyps which, after acquiring mouths and tentacles and closing up the communications between their stomachs and the stomach of the parent, finally separate from the parent; we may with propriety regard them as distinct individuals. But when, in the allied compound hydrea, we find that these young polypes continue permanently connected with the parent; . . . it is no longer so clear that these little ones furnished with mouths and tentacles, are severally to be regarded as distinct individuals. We cannot deny a certain individuality to the polypodum. And on discovering that some of the buds . . . are transformed into colonies in which organs are developed . . . we have still clearer proof that the individuality of the members are partially merged in the individuality of the group. Other organisms belonging to the same order, display still more decidedly this transition from simple individualities to a complex individuality. . . . To meet these difficulties, it has been proposed that the whole product of a single fertilized germ shall be regarded as a single individual: whether such whole product be organized into one mass, or whether it be organized into many masses, that are partially or completely separate. . . . It seems a questionable use of language to say that the embryos or masses of Anacharis Alismarum, which, within these few years, have grown up in our rivers, canals, and ponds, are all parts of one individual; and yet as this plant does not seed in England, these countless masses, having arisen by discontinuous development, must be so regarded, if we accept the above definition. . . . There is, indeed, . . . no definition of individuality that is unobjectionable, still we can do so to make the best practicable compromise. As applied either to an animal or an inanimate object, the word individual ordinarily denotes union among the parts of the object and separateness from other objects. The fundamental element in the conception of individuality, we cannot with propriety ignore in the biological application of the word. That which we call an individual plant or animal, must, therefore, be some concrete whole, and not a discrete whole. If, however, we say that each concrete living whole is to be regarded as an individual, we are still met by the question—What constitutes a concrete living whole? A young organism arising by internal or external germination from a parent organism, passes gradually from a state in which it is an indistinguishable part of the parent organism, to a state in which it is a separate organism of like structure with the parent. At what stage does it become an individual? And if its individuality be conceded only when it completely separates from the parent, must we deny individuality to all organisms thus produced, which permanently retain their connections with their parents? . . . To answer such questions, we must revert to the definition of Life. The distinction between individual in its biological sense, and individual in its more general sense, must consist in the manifestation of life, properly so called. . . . Hence a biological individual is any concrete whole having a structure which enables it, when placed in appropriate conditions, to continually adjust its internal relations to external relations, so as to maintain the equilibrium of its relations.—Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology, § 82-74.

Individualize. v. a. Invest with the character of individuality.

Notwithstanding the peculiarities which individualize and distinguish the humour of Addison, some difference of opinion has arisen among critics of acknowledged celebrity, with regard to its nature and resources.—Drake, Essays Illustrations of the Taster, (Ord MS.).

There was a noble prodigality in these (Coleridge's) outpourings, a generous disclaim of self, . . . which might remind the listener of the first days of poetry before it became individualized by the press, when the Homeric rhapsodist wandered through new-born cities and scattered hovels, . . . when copyright did not ascertain the reciter's property, nor marble at once perpetuate and shroud chillness on his face.—Tufourd, Memoirs of C. Lamb.

Individually. adv.

1. With separate or distinct existence; numerically.

How should that subsist solitarily by itself, which hath no substance, but individually the very same whereby others subsist with it?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Not separately; incommunicably.

I dare not pronounce him conscious, that I an attribute individually proper to the Godhead, and incommunicable to any created substance.—Makewell, Apology.

Individualize. v. a. Individualize.

Life is individualized into infinite numbers that have their distinct senses and pleasure.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

No man is capable of translating poetry, who, besides a genius to that art, is not a master both of his author's language and of his own; nor must we understand the language only of the poet, but his particular turn of thoughts and expression, which are the characters that distinguish and individuate him from all other writers.—Dryden.

Individuate. adj. Undivided.

(O Thou, the third in that eternal trine, In individuate unity divine! The Spectator, II. 311: 1751.

Individuation. s. That which makes an individual.

A philosophical empire, when individuation shall be royalty!—Holiday & Roman, p. 63: Oxford, 1661.

It will be a very difficult point to cut the rather . . . how this numerical difference in the brain can produce effects of so vast a difference from the same vapour as to be the sole point of individuation between Alexander the Great, Jack of Leyden, and Monsieur des Caries. Swift, Tale of a Tub, § 9.

What is the principle of individuation? Or what is it that makes any one thing the same as it was before?—Baile.

Schelling defines life as the tendency to individuation.—Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology, pt. III. ch. III. p. 353: ed. 1855.

Individuator. s. One who individuates.

He is composed of the same individual matter, for it hath the same distinguishing and individuating, to wit, the same form or soul.—Sir K. Digby, Observations on Browne's Religio Medici. (Ord MS.)

Indivinity. s. Want of divine power. Obsolete.

How openly did the oracle betray his indivinity unto Cressus, who being ruined by his amphibology, and expostulating with him, received no higher answer than the excuse of his impotency!—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indivisibility. s. Incapable of division.

A pestle and mortar will as soon bring any particle of matter to indivisibility as the acutest thought of a mathematician.—Locke.

Indivisible. adj. Incapable of being divided into parts; minute to the last degree of division.

By atom, no body will imagine we intend to express a perfect indivisible, but only the least sort of natural bodies. Sir K. Digby.

Here is but one indivisible point of time observed, but one action performed; yet the eye cannot comprehend at once the whole object.—Dryden, Translation of Despreaux's Art of Painting.

Indivisible. s. Particle incapable of division.

If quantity consists of indivisibles or atoms, it will follow that a seminum is all one with an unsemie.—Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, notes, p. 378.

Indivisibly. adv. In an indivisible manner; so as to be incapable of division.

Their act of allowance to the Greek church implies a fair independency of these two, which some of their clamorous clients appear to have indivisibly coupled.—Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy, p. 11.

Indivision. s. Undivided, non-divided, state or condition of anything.

I will take leave to maintain the indivision of the church of England, in the dogmatical point of faith.—Bishop Hall.

Indocible. adj. Incapable of, or unfit for, being, taught; unteachable; insusceptible of instruction. Rare.

Contracted and clung together with sensual delights, now he becomes utterly indocible.—Bishop Hall, Occasional Meditations, 100.

They are ignorant and indocible as any fool.—Griffiths, Fear of God and the King, p. 72.

Indocibleness. s. Attribute suggested by Indocible. Rare.

Out of peevishness and indocibleness of disposition.—Jeremy Taylor, Liberty of Prophesying, sect. II. p. 2. (Ord MS.)

Indocile. adj. [Lat. docilis = teachable; doreo = teach; docilitas, -atia.] Difficult, or slow, to be instructed. Rare.

Illeg and more indocile beasts shall be taught to labour.—Sir W. Kelly, Advice to Martin, p. 25: 1658.

These certainly are the fools in the text, indocile, intractable fools, whose stupidity can baffle all arguments, and be proof against demonstration itself.—Beatty, Sermons, I.

Indocility. s. Slowness to receive, resistance to, instruction.

To have left us in their miserable darkness and indocility.—Bishop Hall, St. Paul's Comfort. The stiffness and indocility of the Pharisees.—H. Montague, Deont. Essays, prof. to the court.

I have no doubt that the admirable action of Robinson Crusoe would have been not only much less amusing, but, to most readers less apparently natural, if Friday and the other savages had been represented with the indocility and other qualities which really belong to such beings as the Brazilian cannibals; and if the hero himself had been represented with that half-barbaric apathetic despondency, and carelessness about all comforts demanding steady exertion, which are the really natural results of a life of utter solitude: and if he had been described as almost losing the use of his own language, instead of remembering the Spanish.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Rhetoric, pt. I. ch. II. § 2.

Indoctrinate. v. a. Instruct; tincture with any doctrine, science, or opinion.

Under a master that discoursed excellently, and took much delight in indoctrinating his young unexperienced favourite, Buckingham had obtained a quick conception of speaking very gracefully and pertinently.—Lord Clarendon.

They that never went beyond the common belief, in which their easy understandings were at first indoctrinated, are strongly assured of the truth of their receptations.—Glanville.

Indoctrination. s. Instruction; communication of doctrine; information.

Although postulates are very accommodable unto junior indoctrinations, yet are these authorities not to be embraced beyond the minority of our intellectuals.—Sir T. Browne.

Indolence. s.

1. Freedom from pain (the etymological rather than the usual meaning).

I have ease, if it may not rather be called indolence.—Bishop Hough.

2. Laziness; want of energy.

The Spanish nation, raised from their ancient indolence and ignorance, seem now to improve trade.—Lord Brougham.

Indolency. s. Same as Indolence.

Let Epicurus give indolency as an attribute to his gods, and place in it the happiness of the best: the divinity which we worship has given us not only a precept against it, but his own example to the contrary.—Dryden.

Indolent. adj. [Lat. in- negative + doleo = grieve, suffer pain; pres. part. dolens, -entis.]

1. In Medicine. Free from pain: (as, 'an indolent tumour.' Less accurately used for such as are slow to change).

2. Careless; lazy; inattentive; listless.

III fits a chief who mighty nations guides . . . To waste long nights in indolent repose.—Pope, Translation of Homer's Iliad, II. 27.

Indolently. adv. In an indolent manner.

While I'd'd by sound, and undisturb'd by wit, Calm and serene you indolently sit.—Adrian.

Indomitable. adj. [Fr. indomptable; Lat. indomitus; domo = tame; pass. part. domitus.] Untamable.

It is so fierce and indomitable.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 383.

Indomite. adj. Untamed; wild; savage. Rare.

No tiger so fierce, no owl so ravening, no whale so monstrous, no not any creature, so indomitable, but that it was subject to man's dominion, while man was subject to his Lord and Maker.—Bulkeley, Treatise of Paradise, p. 122: 1817.

Indoor. adj. Domestic.

"I am for in-door nature myself," said Lord Eskdale. "Do you know I don't like the way Man-moth is going on. He never gets out of that villa of his. He should change his air more. Tell him!"—B. Disraeli, Coningsby, b. viii. ch. vii.

Indorse. See Endorse.

Indraught. s.

1. An opening in the land into which the sea flows.

Rivers and floods there could be none, when there were no indraughts, bays, or gulphs, to receive a flood.—Sir W. Raleigh.

2. Inlet; passage inwards.

Navigable rivers are indraughts to attain wealth.—Bacon.

Indri. s. [?] Lemur of the genus Lichanotus, so called.

In the short-tailed indri, the atlas has a short hypophysis, but no neural spine; the transverse process is moderately long and broad, and is perforated lengthwise and vertically by the vertebral artery, which afterwards pierces the neural arch.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrata.

Indubious. adj. Not doubtful; not suspecting; certain. Rare.

Hence appears the vulgar vanity of reposeing an indubious confidence in those antipastidial spirits.—Bacon.

Indubitable. adj. Undoubted; unquestionable; evident; certain in appearance; clear; plain.

The invention of them is notwithstanding a very presumptuous invasion of the indubitable rights of God.—Dr. M. Moore, Antideluvian History, ch. ii.

When general observations are drawn from so many particulars as to become certain and indubitable, these are jewels of knowledge.—Watts, The province of the Mind.

Indubitably. adv. In an indubitable manner; undoubtedly; unquestionably.

If we transport these proportions from indubitable visible objects, there will indubitably result from after a graceful and harmonious contentment.—Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

The patriarchs were indubitably invested with both these authorities.—Bishop Speed.
I appeal to all sober judges, whether our souls may be only a mere echo from clashing atoms; or rather indubitably must proceed from a spiritual substance.—Beattie.

Indubitate. adj. Unquestioned; certain; apparent; evident.

If he stood upon his own title of the house of Lancaster, he knew it was condemned by parliament, and touched directly to the dissolution of the line of York, held then the indubitate heirs of the crown.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VI.

I have been tempted to wonder how, among the jealousies of state and court, Edward Atheling could subsist, being then the apparent and indubitate heir of the Saxon line.—Sir H. Wotton.

Induce. v. a.

1. Influence to anything; persuade: (of persons).

The self same argument in this kind, which doth but induce the vulgar sort to light, may constrain the wiser to yield.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Let not the covetous desire of crowning rich induce you to ruin your reputation, but rather satisfy yourself with a moderate fortune; and let your thoughts be wholly taken up with acquiring to yourself a glorious name.—Dryden.

2. Produce by persuasion or influence: (of things).

Let the vanity of the times be restrained, which the neighbourhood of other nations have induced, and we strive hence to exceed our pattern.—Bacon, Advice to a Friend.

3. Cause extrinsically; produce; effect.

Now this induces a contraction in the nerves, placed in the mouth of the stomach, which is a great cause of appetite.—Bacon.

This induces a general change of opinion, concerning the person or party like to be obeyed by the greatest or strongest part of the people.—Sir W. Temple.

Acidity, as it is not the natural state of the animal fluids, but induced by aliment, is to be cured by aliment with the contrary qualities.—Arbutnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

4. Adduce. Obsolete.

To exprobrate their stupidity, he induced the providence of stocks: now, if the bird had been Vol. I.

unknown, the illustration had been obscure, and the exprobration not so proper.—Sir T. Browne.

The poet may be seen inducing his personages in the first time, where he discovers their humours, interests, and designs.—Pope.

5. Bring on; superinduce; effect gradually.

Schism is marked out by the apostle as a kind of petrifying erume, which induces that induration to which the fearful expectation of wrath is consequent.—Dr. H. Moore, Deity of Christian Pledg.

Inducement. s. Motive to anything; that which allures or persuades to anything.

Many inducements, besides Scripture, may lead me to that, which if Scripture be against, they are of no value, yet otherwise are strongly effectual to persuade.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

That word's not to!

Then mark th' inducement!

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. ii. 4.
My inducement of hither,

Was not at present here to find my son.

Milton, Sonnet on Ananias, 1415.

If a minority could prevail over the majority, those who were in favour of a proposition would vote against it, or would abstain from voting, in order to insure a minority to their side of the question. Besides, there would be no inducement to discuss a question, if, by converting a person to your opinion, you did not strengthen your side in the division when the votes came to be counted.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. vii.

Inducer. s. One who induces; persuader.

How can he be a meto persuader or inducer of the people to widowhood, which hath himself been often married?—Martin, Treatise on the Marriage of Priests, c. iii. b. 154.

As if he were the great impeller and inducer of men to sin.—South, Sermons, viii. 52.

Inducible. adj.

1. Capable of being induced, brought on, or caused.

The satisfaction of prosperity, issuing from sense, is subject to all the changes inducible from the restless commotions of outward causes affecting and altering the sense.—Burner, Works, iii. 10.

2. Capable of being arrived at by induction.

Many things in philosophy [are] confirmable by sense, yet not inducible by reason.—Sir T. Browne, Religio Medici.

Induct. v. a.

1. Introduce; bring in.

The ceremonies in the gathering were first inducted by the Vestians.—C. Scudery, Travels.

2. Put into actual possession of a benefice.

If a person thus instituted, though not inducted, takes a second benefice, it shall make the first void.—Aplice, Paragon Juris Canonici.

Figuratively.

On Wednesday morning Jacobina was inducted into the comforts of the hearth of mine host; and her four little kittens moved hard by, from the seignure of a basket lined with flannel.—Sir K. B. Lytton, Enoch Arden, b. i. ch. ii.

Induction. s.

1. Introduction; entrance; anciently profane, and also something introductory to a play.

This is well known to be true, of them, that have any leisure to read Holy Scripture; who, remembering themselves by this my little induction, will leave to neglect history.—Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, fol. 26a. b.

These promises are fair, the parties sure,

And our induction full of prosperous hope.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. iii. 1.

Inductions are out of date, and a prodrome in verse is as stale as a black velvet cloak.—Battemont and Fletcher, Wives and Wives, prod.

This is but an induction; I will draw The curtains of the tragedy here after.

Mansinger, Guardian.

An induction to those succeeding evils, which pursued that inconsiderate marriage.—Sir G. Lewis, History of King Richard III. p. 118.

2. In Logic. Reasoning from the more particular to the more general, as opposed to deduction, which is reasoning from the more general to the more particular; an approximate translation of the Greek ἐπαγωγή (epi = on; agō = lead; Lat. duco, signifying the leading-on, or bringing-on, of particular examples or instances, each confirming, or helping to confirm, the inference suggested by the preceding).

Induction is when, from a several particular propositions, we infer one general; as the doctrine of the Socinians cannot be proved from the gospels, it cannot be proved from the Acts of the Apostles, it cannot be proved from the epistles, nor the book of Revelation; therefore it cannot be proved from the New Testament.—Watts, Logic.

The inquiry by induction is wonderful hard; for the things reported are full of fables, and new experiments can hardly be made but with extreme caution.—Bacon.

Mathematical things are only capable of clear demonstration; conclusions in natural philosophy are proved by induction of experiments, thence moral by moral arguments, and matters of fact by credible testimony.—Locke, Essay of Human Understanding.

Although the argument from experiments and observations by induction be no demonstration of general conclusions, yet it is the best way of arriving which the nature of things admits of, and may be looked upon as so much the stronger by how much the induction is more general, and if no exception occur from phenomena, the conclusion may be general.—Sir I. Newton, Optics.

We have found, that the mental process with which logic is conversant, the operation of investigating truths by means of evidence, is always, even when appearances point to a different theory of it, a process of induction. And we have particularised the various modes of induction, and obtained a clear view of the principles to which it must conform, in order to lead to results which can be relied on. The consideration of induction, however, does not end with the direct rules for its performance. Something must be said of those other operations of the mind, which are either necessary presupposed in all induction, or are instrumentally to the more difficult and complicated inductive processes.

Induction being merely the extension to a class of cases, of something which has been observed to be true in certain individual instances of the class; the first place among the operations assiduously to induction, is claimed by observation.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. iv. ch. i. § 1.

3. Formal act of giving possession to the person who has received institution of his church.

In dignifying possession is given by instalment; in rectories and vicarages, by induction.—Sir W. Blackstone.

Inductive. adj.

1. Leading; persuasive: (with to).

A British view,
Inductive mainly to the sin of Eve.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 518.

2. Capable of producing: (with of).

Arguments may take away infallible conclusion in these evidences of fact, yet they may be probable and inductive of credibility, though not of science.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

3. Proceeding not by demonstration, but induction. See under Induction.

Inductively. adv. In an inductive manner; by induction; by inference.

This I shall make appear inductively, by recounting the several ends and talents, to which, with any colour of reason, it may be designed.—South, Sermons, vii. 197.

Inductor. s. Person who inducts another into a benefice.

He puts the incumbent into possession of the church, who, when he has taken a bell, comes forth; and the inductor indorses a certificate of such his induction on the warrant of the archbishop, at a tested by those who were present.—Chrymman's Assistant, Directions, p. 312, n. 2nd edit.

Indue. See Endue.

Indulcate. v. a. [Lat. dulcis = sweet.] Sweeten. Rare.

From the secret sweetness that gratifies and indulcates all his spirits.—Felltham, On St. Luke, (ord MS.).

Indulge. v. a. [Lat. indulgeo; pres. part. indulgens, -entis.]

1. Give way to; not to restrain or oppose.

The lazy glutton safe at home will keep,
Indulge his sloth, and fatten with his sleep.
Dryden.

2. Favour; gratify with concession: (with with or in, according as the object of pleasure is physical or moral).

A mother was wont to indulge her daughters with dogs, squirrels, or birds; but then they must keep them well.—Locke.

To live like those that have their hope in another's life, implies that we indulge ourselves in the gratifications of this life very sparingly.—Bishop of Ailbury.

3. Grant not of right, but favour.

Ancient privileges, indulged by former kings to their people, must not, without high reason, be revoked by their successors.—Jeffrey, History, Rules and Evidence of Holy Living.

The virgin entering bright, indulged the day,
To the brown cave, and brush'd the stream away.
Dryden.

But since among mankind so few there are,
Who will conform to philosophick fire,
This much I will Indulge thee for thy ease,
And mingle something of our tipsy to please.
Depden, Translation of Juvenal.
Yet, yet a moment, one dim ray of light
Indulge, dread chaos and eternal night!

Pope, Ingeiad, iv. 1.

Indulge. v. n. Be favourable; give indulgence: (with in, rarely to.)

He must, by indulging to one sort of reprovable discourse himself, defeat his endeavours against the rest. — Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Yet in the midst of follies and vices, his courageous spirit, his true understanding, and his natural goodness of heart, had been conspicuous. Men said that the excesses to which he indulged were common between him and the whole race of gay young cavaliers, but that his sympathy with human suffering, and the generosity with which he made reparation to those whom his freaks had injured, were all his own. — Murray, History of England, ch. viii.

Indulgence. s.

1. Fondness; fond of kindness.

Restraint she will not brook;
And left to herself, if evil thence ensue,
She'd first his weak indulgence will abuse.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1184.

2. Forbearance; tenderness: (opposite of rigour).

They err, that through indulgence to others, or fondness to any sin in themselves, substitute for repentance any thing less. — Hammond, On Penance.

Some don't if equal pains or equal fire
The humbler muse of Comedy require;
But in known images of life, I see
The labour greater, as the indulgence less.

Pope, Imitations of Horace, b. ii. ep. i.

3. Favour granted; liberality.

If all those gracious indulgences are without any effect on us we must perish in our own folly. — Rogers.

4. Licence in the way of moral conduct.

The looseness and indulgences of this age . . . bear a proportion with the religion of the Ottomans. — Sir R. Temple, Entertainment of Solitude, p. 5: 1619.

"How that air'st whose indulgences to sin?"
I'll canvass thee.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. i. 3.

5. Papal dispensation, by which the period of penance undergone in purgatory was shortened. See extracts.

Indulgences, dispensations, pardons, bulls, The sport of winds.

In purgatory, indulgences, and supererogation, the assertions seem to be unimpaired in nothing but profit. — Dr. H. More, Jevity of Christian Piety.

The doctrine of indulgences, as it was before the council of Trent, and hath been since taught in the church of Rome, is big with gross errors. It depends on the fiction of purgatory; it supposes a superfluity of the satisfactions of the saints; which, being jumbled together (horror retrugus) with the merits and satisfaction of our Saviour, make up one treasury of the church; that the bishop of Rome keeps the key of it, as having the sole power of granting indulgences either by himself immediately, or by others commissioned from him. Lastly, it very absurdly extends the effect of the power of the keys, left by Christ in his church, to men in the other world. Bishop Hall, Corruption of the Church of Rome, in Answer to the Bishop of Meane's Queries.

Leo X. is deservedly infamous for his loose prostitution of indulgences. — Bishop Atterbury.

Indulgency. s. Indulgence.

The glories of our Isle,
Which yet like golden dew, unripe in beds,
Expect the warm indulgency of heaven.

Your majesty is still pleas'd, by the excellency of your nature, and by the indulgency of your judgment, to accept honest zeal for discretion. — Sir H. Wotton, Remains, p. 524.

Indulgent. adj.

1. Kind; gentle; liberal.

God has done all for us that the most indulgent Creator could do for the work of his hands. — Rogers.

2. Mild; favourable.

Henceforth such in thy behalf shall be
Th' indulgent censure of posterity.

Waller.

3. Gratifying; favouring; giving way to: (with of).

The feeble old, indulgent of their ease.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, v. 303.

Indulgentia. adj. Relating to the indulgences of the Romish church.

God are fitted with rare indulgentia privileges. — Dreving, Saul and Samuel at Nadab, ch. x.

Indulgently. adv. In an indulgent manner;

without severity; without censure; without self-reproach; with indulgence.

He that not only commits some act of sin, but lives indulgently in it, is never to be counted a regenerate man. — Hammond.

Ills? There are none; All-gracious, none from Thee!

Whose threats are mercies, whose injunctions guides,
Assisting, not restraining, reason's choice;
Whose sanctions, unavoidable results
From nature's course, indulgently reveal'd.

Young, Night Thoughts, ix.

Indulger. s. One who indulges.

If, as Saint Peter saith, the severest watchers of their nature have task hard enough, what shall be hoped of the indulgers of it? — W. Montague, Incent. Kanga, pt. i. p. 160: 1618.

Indulgent. s. [Italian.] Indulgence, ecclesiastical or commercial. Not English.

It was a tax laid upon the English a great many years ago, with their own consent, for the privilege of going to Aleppo. . . . This is a most scandalous indulgent. — Drummond, Travels through Germany, Italy, and Greece, p. 180: 1740.

Indurate. v. a. [Lat. induratus, pass. part. of induro — harden; indurationis; durus — hard.] Make hard.

Glass may be so indurated by fire, that it may scorn the force of the hammer. — Gayton, Notes on Don Quixote, 1554.

Indurate. v. n. Grow hard; harden.

Stones within the earth at first are but rude earth or clay; and so minerals come at first of juices concrete, which afterwards indurate. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

That plants and limaceous bodies may indurate under water, without approachment of air, we have experiments in coral-limes. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Indurate. v. a. Make hard.

Indurate. adj. Hardened.

Dried, seaward, indurate fish. — Barton, Anatomy of Mankind, p. 70.

Avoid at all times indurate, salt, and especially spice and whiny meat. — Ibid, p. 402.

After he had passed one year and a half in repentance, . . . then, lest he might be indurate, let him be admitted to the receiving of the body and blood of Christ. — Martin, Treatise on the Marriage of Priests, 1554.

Thine heart is full hard, indurate was the heart of Pharaoh. — For, Book of Martyrs, Examination of W. Thorpe.

Insensible, indurate, and intolerable unthankfulness of the sons of Adam. — Lee, Blame of Brightest Beauty, p. 15: 1614.

Indurate. part. adj. Callous; hardened.

A contracted indurated bladder is a circumstance sometimes attending on the stone, and indeed an extraordinary dangerous one. — Sharp, Surgery.

Love's and friendship's finely pointed dart
Fall blunted from each indurated heart.

Goldsmith, Traveller.

Figuratively. Impenitent; hard of heart; obdurate.

Induration. s.

1. State of growing hard; act of hardening.

This is a notable instance of conformation and induration, by burial under earth, in caves for a long time. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Obduracy; hardness of heart.

Religion is marked out by the apostle as a kind of petrifying cruse, which induces that induration to which the fearful expectation of wrath is consequent. — Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Industrial. adj. Relating to, or consisting in, the products of industry: (as, 'industrial exhibition').

Industrious. adj.

1. Diligent; laborious; assiduous: (opposed to slightful).

Friugal and industrious men are commonly friendly to the established government. — Sir W. Temple.

2. Laborious to a particular end: (opposed to remiss).

He himself being excellently learned, and industrious to seek out the truth of all things concerning the original of his own people, hath set down the testimony of the ancients truly. — Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Let our just censures
Attend the true event, and put us on Industrious soldiery. — Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 4.

His thoughts were low:
To vice industrious, but to nobler deeds
Tumorous and slothful.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 113.

3. Designed; done for the purpose.

The industrious perforation of the tendons of the second joints of fingers and toes, draw the tendons of the third joints through. — Dr. H. More, Dissectio Anatomica.

Observe carefully all the events which happen either by an occasional concurrence of various causes, or by the industrious application of knowledge. — Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

Industriously. adv. In an industrious manner.

And of myselfe industriously inclin'd.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 525.

Great Britain was never before united under one king, notwithstanding that the uniting had been industriously attempted both by war and peace. — Bacon.

Some friends to vice industriously defend
These innocent diversions, and pretend
That I the tricks of youth too roughly blame.

Dryden, Translation of Juvenal.

I am not under the necessity of declaring myself, and I industriously conceal my name, which wholly exempts me from any hopes and fears. — Swift.

Industry. s. [Fr. industrie; Lat. industria; adj. industrius.] Diligence; assiduity; habitual or actual laboriousness.

Industry hath not been so long thus used in the English tongue, as providence; wherefore, it is the more strange, and requirith the more plain exposition. It is a quality proceeding of witte and experience, by the which a man perceiveth quickly, inventeth freshly, and cometh quickly speedily. Wherefore they, that be called industrious, do make craftily and deeply understande in all affairs what is expedient, and by what means and wayes they may best employe them. — Sir T. Elyot, The Governour, fol. 72.

The sweat of industry would dry and die,
But for the end it works to.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iii. 6.

See the laborious bee
For little drops of honey flow
And there with humble sweets content her industry.

Corii, i.

Providence would only initiate mankind into the useful knowledge of her treasures, leaving the rest to employ our industry, that we might not live like idle idlers. — Dr. H. More.

Indweller. s. Inhabitant.

Too true that lands indwellers since have found.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, vii. 65.

Unusable of any mortal indweller. — Bishop Hall, Complutarium on the Old and New Testaments, b. iv.

An house ready to fall on the head of the indweller. — Id., Occasional Meditations, § 110.

Indwelling. part. pres. Dwelling, residing in, or occupying, anything permanently.

Every passion, every vice, had its especial demon; lust, impety, blasphemy, vain-glory, pride, were not the man himself, but a foreign power working within him. The slightest act, sometimes no act at all, surrendered the soul to the irresistible indwelling agent. In Gregory's Dialogues a woman eats a lettuce without smaking the sigh of the cross; she is possessed by a devil, who had been swallowed in the unconsidered lettuce. — Gilman, History of Latin Christianity, b. iii. ch. vi.

Inebriate. v. a. [Lat. inbriv, pres. part. inbrivans, antis; pass. part. inbrivatus; inbrivatio, -onis; inbriv — drunken.] Intoxicate; make drunk.

Wine suggest inbrivatio less than wine pure: sops in wine, quantity for quantity, inbrivate more than wine of itself. — Bacon.

Fish, entering far in and meeting with the fresh water, as if inbrivated, turn up their bellies and are taken. — Sandys.

Inebriate. v. n. Grow drunk; be intoxicated.

At Constantinople, fish that come from the Euxine sea into the fresh water do inbrivate and turn up their bellies, so as you may take them with your hand. — Bacon.

Thy brains inbrivate me,
That thou thy nakedness shalt boldly show.
G. Sandys, Paraphrase of the Book of Lamentations, ch. iv.

Inebriation. s. Drunkenness; intoxication.

That cornelians and bloodstones may be of virtue, experience will make us grant; but not that an anæsthetic prevents inbrivation. — Sir T. Browne.

They did not preserve him from inducent quarrelsomeness in university. — Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Italian's Constitutional History, pt. i.

Inebriety. s. Drunkenness.

It is generally the result of continued and habitual inbrivatio. — Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, ii. ii.

inedited. pprt. pref. Not edited, published, or put forth.

An inedited copy of queen Seaburg's.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, vol. ii. add.

ineffable. adj. [Fr. ineffable; Lat. ineffabilis; from for = speak.] Unspeakable; unutterable; not to be expressed.

To whom the Son, with calm aspect and clear, lightning divine, ineffable, serene, glade answer.—Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 733.

Reflect upon a clear, unblotted, acquitted conscience, and feed upon the ineffable comforts of the memorial of a conquered temptation.—South, Sermons.

ineffably. adv. In an ineffable manner; so as not to be expressed.

No dyd the divinity ineffably put itself into the visible monument.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 371.

He all his Father full express'd ineffably into his face reveal'd.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 730.

ineffective. adj. Productive of no effect; inefficient; useless.

As the body, without blood, is a dead and lifeless trunk; so is the word of God, without the spirit, a dead and ineffective letter.—Jeremy Taylor.

He that assures himself he never errs, will always err; and his presumptions will render all attempts to inform him ineffective.—Gilleville.

ineffectual. adj. Unable to produce its proper effect; weak; wanting power.

The publick reading of the Apocrypha they condemn as a thing effectual unto evil: the bare reading even of Scriptures themselves they mislike, as a thing ineffectual to do good.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The death of Patroclus, joined to the offer of Agamemnon, which of itself had proved ineffectual.—Pope.

(For another example see under Inefficiency.)

ineffectually. adv. In an ineffectual manner.

In thirteen days' time there were above 1000 great shot spent ineffectually on the brave loyalists, who held out against the numbers of Manchester's whole army.—Aschmole, History of Berke, i. 284.

ineffectualness. s. Attribute suggested by Ineffectual; inefficiency; want of power to perform the proper effect.

St. James speaks of the ineffectualness of some men's devotion. Ye ask and receive not, because ye ask amiss.—Archbishop Wake.

ineffectious. adj. Unable to produce a desired effect; weak; feeble.

Is not that better than always to have the rod in hand, and by frequent use, misapply and render ineffectious this useful remedy?—Locke.

Ineffectious rather denotes an actual failure; and ineffectious an habitual impotence to any effect.—Johnson.

inefficiency. s. Want of power; want of effect.

The inefficiency was soon proved, like that of many similar medicines.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, i. vi.

inefficiency. s. Want of power; inactivity.

Venice owes its security to its neutrality and inefficiency.—Lord Chesterfield.

ineffectively. adv. Ineffectively.

He is as insipid in his pleasures, as ineffectively in every thing else.—Lord Chesterfield.

inelegance. s. Absence of beauty; want of elegance.

She was conspicuous from the notorious inelegance of her hair.—Theodore Monk, Jack Bragg.

1. Not becoming; not beautiful.

What order, so contriv'd as not to mix Tastes not well join'd, inelegant, but bring Taste after taste, upheld with kindest change.—Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 334.

2. Wanting ornament of language.

Modern critics, having never read Homer but in low and inelegant translations, impute the mean-ness of the translation to the poet.—Broom, On the Odyssey.

inelegantly. adv. In an inelegant manner.

1. Not becomingly; not beautifully.

The pediments of the southern transept is pin-naled, not inelegantly, with a flourish'd cross.—T. Warton, History of the Parish of Kidlington, p. 8.

2. Coarsely; without ornament of language.

Nor will he, if he have the least taste or applica-tion, talk inelegantly.—Lord Chesterfield.

In an invention to rime, while he is not inelegantly illustrating the plausibility of an easy associa-tion of consonant syllables, he artfully inter-mixes the sweetness of satire.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iv. 60.

1. Incapable of being elected: (as, 'an inelegant candidate').

2. Not desirable for a choice: (as, 'an inelegant partner').

ineloquent. adj. Not eloquent, persuasive, or oratorical.

Nor are thy lips ungraceful, sire of men, Nor tongue ineloquent.—Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 218.

ineluctable. adj. [Lat. luctor; pret. part. luctatus = wrestle, struggle, contend.] Not to be struggled against, avoided, or overcome.

As if the damnation of all sinners now were ineluctable and eternal.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. v.

ineludible. adj. Not to be defeated.

Most pressing reasons, and ineludible demonstra-tions.—Gilleville, Presence of Souls, p. 14.

inept. adj. [Lat. inceptus.]

1. Trifling; foolish.

The works of nature being neither useless nor inept, must be guided by some principle of know-ledge.—Dr. H. More.

After their various unsuccessful ways, Their fruitless labour, and inept essays, No cause of these appearances they'll find, But power exerted by th' Eternal Mind.—Sir R. Blackmore.

2. Unfit for any purpose; useless.

When the upper and vegetative stratum was once washed off by rains, the hills would have become barren, the strata below yielding only mere sterile matter, such as was wholly inept and improper for the formation of vegetables.—Woodward.

ineptitude. s. Unfitness.

The grating and rubbing of axes against the sockets, wherein they are placed, will cause some ineptitude or resistency to rotation of the cylinder.—Lishop Wilkins.

An omnipotent agent works infallibly and irre-sistibly, no ineptitude or stumblingness of the in-strument being ever able to hinder him.—Rap, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

There is an ineptitude to motion from too great laxity, and an ineptitude to motion from too great tension.—Arbuthnot.

ineptly. adv. In an inept manner; triflingly; foolishly; unfitly.

Some of them are made foolishly or ineptly.—Dr. H. More.

All things were at first disposed by an omni-scient intellect, that cannot contrive ineptly.—Gilleville.

ineptness. s. Attribute suggested by Inept; unfitness.

The feebleness and miserable ineptness of in-fancy.—Dr. H. More, Presence of Souls, pref. 1647.

inequal. adj. Unequal.

Welcome all toils the inequal fates decree, While toils endure thy faithful charge to thee.—Shadwell, Judgment of Hercules.

1. Difference of comparative quantity.

There is so great an inequality in the length of our legs and arms, as makes it impossible for us to walk on all four.—Rap.

2. Unevenness; interchange of higher and lower parts.

The country is cut into so many hills and inequalities as renders it defensible.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

If there were no inequalities in the surface of the earth, nor in the seasons of the year, we should lose a considerable share of the vegetable kingdom.—Bentley.

3. Disproportion to any office or purpose; state of not being adequate; inadequacy.

The great inequality of all things to the appetites of a rational soul appears from this, that in all worldly things a man finds not half the pleasure in the actual possession that he proposed in the expec-tation.—South, Sermons.

4. Change of state; unlikeness of a thing to itself; difference of tempo; or quality.

In some places, by the nature of the earth, and by the situation of woods and hills, the air is more unequal than in others; and inequality of air is ever an enemy to health.—Bacon.

5. Difference of rank or station.

If so small inequality between man and man make in them mutually a commendable virtue, who re-specting superiors as superiors, can neither speak nor stand before them without fear.—Hooker, Ec-clesiastical Polity.

inequitable. adj. Not equitable; unjust.

The way of process men take in this affair is so inequitable, as certainly presages the partiality of the sentence.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety, p. 64.

ineradicable. adj. Incapable of being era-dicated.

The bad seed thus sown was ineradicable.—Sir R. B. Lutton, Paul Clifford.

inerrability. s. Incapability of, exemption from, error; infallibility. Rare.

Those hideous novelties of the inerrability of a man of sin.—Bishop Hall, De senectute, p. 102.

I cannot allow their wisdom such a completeness and inerrability as to exclude myself from judging.—Rikon Basilike.

inerrable. adj. Exempt from error. Rare.

We have conviction from reason, or decision from the inerrable and requisite conditions of sense.—St. T. Brown.

inerrableness. s. Attribute suggested by Inerrable; exemption from error. Rare.

Infallibility and inerrableness is assumed and in-closed by the Romish church, without any inerrable ground to build it on.—Huamant, On Fundamen-tals.

inerringly. adv. Without error; without mistake; without deviation. Rare.

That divers humors at a distance, without copy, should draw the same picture, is more conceivably than that matter should frame itself so inerringly according to the idea of its kind.—Gilleville.

inert. adj. [Lat. inertis.] Dull; slug-gish; motionless.

Body above, inert and brute you'll find; The cause of all things is by you assigned.—Sir R. Blackmore.

inertia. s. [Lat.]

1. Sluggishness; dullness.

2. In Mechanics. Resistance to be over-come before a body in a state of rest is put into motion.

We can push a light boat rapidly through the water; but we may go on increasing its freight, till we are hardly able to stir it. This property of mat-ter, then, by which it resists the reception of motion, or rather by which it resists and requires an ade-quate force in order that any motion may result, is called its inertness, or inertia. That matter has such a property, is a conception flowing from that idea of a reaction equal and opposite to the action, which the conception of all force involves. By what laws this inertia depends on the magnitude, form, and material of the body, must be the subject of our consideration hereafter. But that matter has this inertia, in virtue of which, as the matter is greater, the velocity which the same effort can communicate to it is less, is a principle inseparable from the notion of matter itself. Hermann says that Kepler first introduced this most significant inertia.

Whether it is to be found in earlier writers I know not; Kepler certainly does use it familiarly in those attempts to assign physical reasons for the motions of the planets which were among the main occasions of the discovery of the true laws of mechanics. He assumes the slowness of the motions of the planets to increase, (other causes remaining the same,) as the inertia increases; and though, even in this as-sumption, there is an error involved, (if we adopt that interpretation of the term inertia) to which subsequent researches led, the introduction of such a word was one step in determining and expressing these laws of motion which depend on the funda-mental principle of the equality of action and reac-tion.—Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas.

Respectabilities, though they will vote, will not fight. Possession always is nine points in law; but in lawsuits of this kind, one may say, it is nine ty-and-nine points. Men do what they were wont to do; and have immense pre-occupation and inertia; they obey him who has the symbols that elicit obedience.—Carlyle, History of the French Revolution.

inertly. adv. In an inert manner; slug-gishly; dully.

Ye powers, whose mystic's restored I sing, To whom Time bears me on his rapid wing, Suspend a while your force inertly strong.—Pope, Dunciad, iv. 5.

inertness. s. Attribute suggested by Inert; want of motion.

A state of silence and inertness.—Gilleville, On the Presence of Souls, p. 125.

125

Into a state of more stupor and in ines.—Thid. p. 127.

Inescapable. v. a. [Lat. escap = food.] Lay a bait for; allure. Rare.

Many such pranks are played by our Jesuits, sometimes in their own habits, sometimes in others. . . . to inescapable and beguile young women.—Barton, Anthony of Melancholy, p. 100.

Inescapation. s. Act of baiting. Rare.

How in the true fortune and inescapation, in overcoming all the devilish allurements and inescapation of flesh and blood.—Hallwell, Excellency of Moral Virtue, p. 107; 1632.

Inestimable. adj. Incapable of being estimated; too valuable to be rated; transcending all price.

I thought I saw a thousand fearful wrecks, A thousand men that fishes know'd upon; Wedges of gold, great anchors, heaps of pearl, Inestimable stones, unvalued jewels.

And still this prize, the inestimable prize, Exposed through crystal to the gazing eyes, And beauteous by the diamond's circling rays, On that rapacious hand for ever blaze!

Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iv. Inestimably. adv. In an inestimable manner; so as not to be sufficiently rated.

Things inestimably excellent.—Dr. H. More, St. p of the Soul, iii. 3. 7. Heavenly and instructive volumes, inestimably overvaluing any the earth affords.—Hogge, Style of Holy Scripture, p. 87.

Inevidence. s. Obscurity; uncertainty. Rare.

Charge them, says St. Paul, that they trust not in uncertain riches, that is, in the obscurity or inevidence of riches. —Barrow, Works, i. 1419.

Inevitable. adj. Not plain; obscure. Rare.

Our scholars make a distinction of a certainty, evident and inevitable. —Bishop Hall, Romanus, p. 257. The habit of faith in divinity is an argument of things unseen, and a stable ascent unto things inevitable, upon authority of the divine revelation.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors. The object of faith is inevitable. —Bishop Barlow, Romanus, p. 164.

Faith is the evidence of things not seen; by which words I conceive we may understand an undoubting ascent to those things which are of themselves inevitable. —Bishop Compton, Sermon, vol. ii, serm. 8.

Inevitability. s. Impossibility to be avoided; certainty.

By liberty, I do understand neither a liberty from sin, misery, servitude, nor violence, but from necessity, or rather necessitation; that is, an universal immunity from all inevitability and determination to one. —Archbishop Beaufort, Answer to Hobbes. The overthrow is described to be given as it were by a double blow and a twofold weapon, to show the certainty and inevitability of it.—Shelford, Learned Discourses, p. 289; 1655.

Inevitable. adj. [Lat. evito = avoid.] Unavoidable; not to be escaped.

I had a pass with him; . . . he gives me the stork with such a mortal motion, that it is inevitable. —Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Fate inevitable. Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 197. Since my inevitable death you know, You safely unavailing pity show.

Dryden, Aurengzebe. Inevitableness. s. Attribute suggested by inevitable; certainty; inevitability.

The inevitableness of the account we are to make, and the uncertainty of the time we shall be called to it.—Bishop Prideaux, Ecclesiologia, p. 100.

Inevitably. adv. In an inevitable manner; without possibility of escape.

How inevitably does an immoderate laughter end in a sigh! —South.

Inexorable. adj. Incapable of being excused; not to be palliated by apology.

It is a tenacity and a fully inexorable, to deliver up ourselves needlessly into another's power.—Sir R. L. Enticement.

As we are an island with ports and navigable seas, we should be inexorable if we did not make these blessings turn to account. —Addison, Freethinker. If learning be not encouraged under your administration, you are the most inexorable person alive.—Noriff.

A fallen woman is the more inexorable, as from the cradle, the sex is warned against the delusions of men.—Richardson, Clarissa.

Inexorableness. s. Attribute suggested by inexorable; enormity beyond forgiveness or palliation.

Their inexorableness is stated upon the supposition of this very thing, that they knew God, but for all that did not glorify him as God.—South, Sermon, ii. 261.

Inexcusable. adv. In an inexcusable manner; to a degree of guilt or folly beyond excuse.

Behold here wherein Eve, and after her Adam, did fail inexcusably. —Harmer, Translation of Beza, p. 35; 1587.

Inexcution. s. Omission, neglect, of execution. Rare.

They not only deferred to his counsels in publick assemblies, but he was moreover the umpire of domestic matters, and decided quarrels arising between husbands and wives, without there ever being any inexcution or complaint against his decisions and decrees. —Spence, Translation of Varilla's History of the House of Medici, p. 200; 1684.

Inexhalable. adj. Incapable of being exhaled, or exhaling; incapable of evaporating.

A new-laid egg will not so easily be boiled hard, because it contains a great stock of humid parts, which must be evaporated before the heat can bring the inexhalable parts into consistance. —Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inexhausted. adj. Unexhausted.

So wet that born into a tenebrous strain, An early, rich, and inexhausted vein. —Dryden. Let us consider the ample provision of waters, those inexhausted treasures of the ocean.—Bentley, Sermons, viii.

Inexhaustible. adj. Not to be exhausted, or all drawn away; not to be spent.

The stock that the mind has in its power, by varying the idea of space, is perfectly inexhaustible, and so it can multiply figures in infinitum. —Locke.

Inexhaustive. adj. Not to be all drawn off; inexhaustible.

Whose power, To life approaching, may perfume my lays With that fine oil, those aromatick gales, That inexhaustive flow continual round. —Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Inexistence. s. [from the negative particle.] Want of being; want of existence.

He calls up the heroes of former ages, from a state of inexistence to adorn and diversify his poem. —Romney, On the Odyssey.

Inexistence. s. [from the preposition.] State of existing; inherence.

Concerning these gifts, we must observe also, that there was no small difference amongst them, as to the manner of their inexistence in the persons who had them. —South, Sermons, iii. 415.

Inexistent. adj. [from the negative particle.] Not having being; not to be found in nature.

To express complexed significations they took a liberty to compound and piece together creatures of allowable forms into mixtures inexistent. —Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inexistent. adj. [from the preposition.] Existing in something else. Rare.

We doubt whether these heterogeneities be so much as inexistent in the concrete, whence they are obtained. —Bogge.

Inexorability. s. Incapability of being moved by entreaty; inexorable.

Your father's inexorability not only grieves but amazes me.—Johnson, Letter to Boswell's Life of Johnson.

Inexorable. adj. [Lat. inexorabilis; exoro = beg off; from oro = pray.] Incapable of being moved by entreaty.

You are more inhuman, more inexorable, Oh ten times more, than tigers of Hyrcania! —Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III., i. 4. Inexorable do. —H. Merchant of Venice, iv. 1.

The guests invited came, And with the rest the inexorable dame. —Dryden, Theodora and Honoria.

We can be deaf to the words of so sweet a charmer, and inexorable to all his invitations.—Rogers.

Inexorableness. s. Attribute suggested by inexorable; state of being inexorable.

The former aversion and inexorableness is taken away. —Chillingworth, Sermon on Romans, viii. 31.

Inexorably. adv. In an inexorable manner; so as not to be moved by entreaty.

The scourge Inexorably, and the torturing hour, Calls us to penance. —Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 60. Phoebe the god, in publick life severe, To virtue still inexorably firm. —Thomson, Seasons, Winter.

Inexpectation. s. State of having no expectation, either with hope or fear; want of forethought.

It is therefore fit we take heed of such things as are like multiplying glasses, and shew frogs either more numerous or bigger far, than they are. Such are inexpectations, unacquaintance, want of preparation. —Inexpectation: the sudden blow astonishes; but, foreseen, is either warded or avoided. A surprise alone is torture. —Fallham, Remorse, ii. 4.

Inexpected. part. pref. Unexpected.

Our greatest ill we least mistrust, my lord, And inexpected harms do hurt us most.

Kyd, Spanish Tragedy. If the suddenness of an inexpected evil have surprised his thoughts, and infected his cheeks with paleness: he had no sooner directed it in his conceit, than he gathers up himself, and insults over himself. —Bishop Hall, Characters, p. 34.

Inexpectedly. adv. In an unexpected manner; unexpectedly. Rare.

Such marvellous light opened itself inexpectedly to us.—Bishop Hall, Specialties of his Life.

Inexpediency. s. Want of expediency, fitness, propriety; unsuitableness to time or place; inconvenience.

It cometh superiors to look well to the expediency and inexpediency of what they enjoy in indifferent things. —Bishop Sanderson.

Inexpedient. adj. Inconvenient; unfit; improper; unsuitable to time or place.

It is not inexpedient if they should be known to come from a person altogether a stranger to civilised affairs. —Bogge.

We should be prepared not only with patience to bear, but to receive with thankfulness a rebuke, if God should see them to be inexpedient. —Bishop Sanderson.

Inexperience. s. Want of experience, or experimental knowledge.

The words at random Argue thine inexperience.

Prejudice and self-sufficiency naturally proceed from inexperience of the world, and ignorance of mankind. —Addison.

Inexperienced. part. pref. Not experienced.

They fright all inexperienced young men from any tolerable compliance in matters of religion. —Dr. H. More, Conjectura Cabbalistica, p. 227; 1653.

Inexpert. adj. Unskilled; unskilled.

It must be considered, . . . whether he be learned or ignorant; whether skilled in languages and arts, or whether inexpert in both. —Bishop Hall, Causes of Corruption.

Inexpiable. adj.

1. Incapable of being expiated or atoned for.

A papist writes it; and then it is well enough. For some of our writers to have said but as much, or scarce so much as these, in this matter and manner, in them is an inexpiable transgression. —Farmer, Activity's Triumph over Negligence, p. 223; 1619. It is such an inexpiable crime in poets, to tax vice generally. —H. Junius, Discourses.

2. Not to be mollified by atonement.

Love seeks to have love; My love how could'st thou hope, who took'st the way To raise in me inexpiable hate?

Milton, Samson Agonistes, 587.

Inexpiable. adv. In an inexpiable manner; to a degree beyond atonement.

Excursions are inexpiable bad, And 'tis much safer to leave out than add. —Lord Bacon, Bacon.

Inexpiable. adv. [Lat. expleo = fill out.] Unsatiably. Obsolete.

What were these horrid but flatterers, delators, and the inexpiable covetous? —G. Sandys, Travels.

Inexplicable. adj. Incapable of being explained; not to be made intelligible; not to be disentangled.

What could such apprehensions breed, as their nature is, inexplicable passions of mind, desires abhorring what they embrace, and embracing what they abhor? —Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Inexplicability. s. Incapability of being explained.

It does not allege a Platonic idea, or fictitious entity, which explains the vertebrate skeleton by absorbing into itself all the inexplicability. —Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology, ch. xv. § 259.

Inexplicably. adv. In an inexplicable manner; so as not to be explained.

The power of godliness is denied by wicked men. How then? What is their case? Surely inexplicably, unconquerably fearful. —Bishop Hall, The Flycatcher's Works, ii. 302.

Inexplorable, adj. Incapable of being explored.

It was the king's own immovable and inexplorable doom.—Sir G. Buck, History of Richard III., p. 82; 1460.

Inexpressible, adj. Incapability of being expressed; not to be pronounced or uttered; unutterable.

Thus when in orbs Of circuit inexpressible they stood,
Orb within orb, Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 251.

Nothing can so peculiarly gratify the noble dispositions of human nature, as for one man to see another so much himself as to sigh his griefs, and groan his pains, to sing his joys, and do and feel every thing by sympathy and secret inexpressible communications. South, Sermons.

Inexpressible, s. pl. Breaches. A supposed euphemism: polite slang.

Have you never observed, through my inexpressibles, a large promiscuity, which, as it was not at all painful, and very little troublesome, I had strangely neglected for many years?—Gibbon, Letter to Lord Sheffield, (Ord 318.)

Mr. Pelham, said this gentleman, who was dressed in a brown coat, white waistcoat, buff-coloured inexpressibles, with long stripes, and gaiters of the same hue and substance as the breeches. Mr. Pelham, pray be seated—excuse my rising: I'm like the bishop in the story, Mr. Pelham, too old to rise; and Mr. Briggs, grunted out a short, quick, querulous, "he-he-he," in which, of course, I replied to the best of my enchainatory powers.—Sir R. B. Lytton, Pelham, ch. xxxvi.

Inexpressible, adv. In an inexpressible manner; to a degree or in a manner not to be uttered; unutterably.

God will protect and reward all his faithful servants in a manner and measure inexpressibly abundant.—Hammond.

He began to play upon it: the sound was exceedingly sweet, and wrought into a variety of tunes that were inexpressibly melodious. Addison, Spectator.

Inexpressive, adj. Ineffable.

The inexpressive strain
Diffuses its enchantment.

As under, Pleasures of the Imagination, i. 124.

Inexpugnable, adj. [Lat. expugnare—fight out, thoroughly overcome.] Incapable of being conquered.

Fortified, as it were, with a trench and palisade, and with inexpugnable endowments.—Bacon, History of the Sopting, p. 36.

Where every city was a fortress, inexpugnable by the arts of war then known, a battle in the open field did not decide the fate of a league which included so many of the noblest cities of Italy. Milton, History of Latin Christianity, b. x. ch. iv.

Inextinguishable, adj. Incapable of being extinguished; unquenchable.

Pillars, statues, and other memorials, are a sort of shadow of an endless life, and show an inextinguishable desire which all men have of it. Gray.

Inextricable, adj. Incapable of being extricated or disentangled; not to be cleared; not to be set free from obscurity or perplexity.

He that should try inextricable knots, only to tangle the industry of those that should attempt to unloose them, would be thought not to have served his generation.—Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Policy.

Inextricable, s. Attribute suggested by Inextricable; state or quality of being inextricable.

There is no perplexity in thee, my God, no inextricable in thee.—Donne, Devotions, p. 122; 1625.

Inextricably, adv. In an inextricable manner; to a degree of perplexity not to be disentangled.

The mechanical atheist, though you grant him his laws of mechanism, is nevertheless inextricably puzzled and baffled with the first formation of animals.—Beattie.

Ineye, v. n. Inoculate; propagate trees by the insertion of a bud into a foreign stock.

Rare.

Ineyeing, verbal abs. In Gardening. Inoculation. Rare.

Let sage experience teach thee all the arts Of grafting and ineyeing. J. Philips, Cyder, b. i.

Infallibility, s. Incapability of being deceived; exemption from error.

Infallibility is the highest perfection of the knowing faculty, and consequently the firmest degree of assent.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Infallible, adj. Incapable of error; incapable of mistake; not to be misled or deceived; certain.

Every cause admitted not such infallible evidence of proof, as leaveth no possibility of doubt or scruple behind it.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

Infallibleness, s. Attribute suggested by Infallible.

Fancy, wherein there must either be vanity or infallibleness, and so either not to be respected, or not to be prevented.—Sir P. Sidney, Arcadia, b. i.

Infallibly, adv. In an infallible manner.

1. Without danger from deceit; with security from error.

We cannot be as God infallibly knowing good and evil.—Bishop Sandridge, Sermons.

2. Certainly.

Our blessed Lord has distinctly opened the scene of futurity to us, and directed us to such a conduct as will infallibly render us happy in it. Rapin.

Infame, v. a. Represent to disadvantage; defame; censure publicly; make infamous; brand. Rare.

Livia is infamed for the poisoning of her husband. Bacon.

Hitherto obscure'd, infam'd,
And thy fair fruit let name, as to no end Created. Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 707.

Infamous, adj.

1. Publicly branded with guilt; openly censured; of bad report.

Many there she found, which were accus'd His falsehood, and with foul infamous blood His cruel deeds and wicked ways did spoil.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, iii. 6. 13.
Those that be near, and those that be far from thee, shall mock thee which art infamous.—Eschylus, Agamemnon.

These are as some infamous lawd or whom Should praise a nation; what could hurt her more? R. Jonson.

After-times will dispute it, whether Holham were more infamous at Hull or at Tower-hill.—Eikon Basilike.

Persons infamous, or branded in any public court of judicature, are forbidden to be advocates.—Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England.

With for.

Over the dangerous deep secure the navy flies,
Glides by the Sirens' cliffs, a shelly coast,
Long infamous for ships and navies lost.

Dejean, Translation of the Eclogues, v. 1124.

2. Having a bad name; dangerous. Latinism.
And now he haunts the infamous woods and downs.

P. Fletcher, Pincelogue Elegiacs, i. 14.
Trace huge forests and unthoughted heaths,
Infamous hills, and sandy perilous wilds.

Milton, Comus, 423.

Infamy, s. [Lat. infamia.] Public reproach; notoriety of bad character.

Ye are taken up in the lips of talkers, and are the infamy of the people. Eschylus, Agamemnon, 3.

The noble side of want her proper limbs,
Her face defaced with scars of infamy.

Shakespeare, Richard III., iii. 7.
Wild and pernicious of unwholesome brand,
With most hideous characters of infamy, the name and memory to posterity.—Eikon Basilike.

Infancy, s.

1. First part of life: (usually extended by naturalists to seven years).

Dare we affirm it was ever his meaning, that unto their salvation, who even from their tender infancy never knew any other faith or religion than only Christian, no kind of teaching can be available, saying that which was so useful for the first universal conversion of Gentiles having Christianity?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

2. In Law. Minority: (extended by the English law to twenty-one years).

3. First age of anything; beginning; origin; commencement.

In Spain, our springs, like old men's children, be Dried and wither'd from their infancy. Dejean.

The difference between the riches of Roman citizens in the infancy and in the grandeur of Rome, will appear by comparing the first valuation of estates with the estates all rewards possessed.—Dr. Bartholomew, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Infamous, adj. [Lat. for=speak; sanctus=speakable.] So abominable as not to be expressed. Rare.

This infamous custom of swearing, I observe, reigns in England lately more than any where else; though a German, in highest puff of passions, swears a hundred thousand oaths.—Howell, Letters.

Infant, s. [Fr. enfant; Lat. infans, -antia.] 1. Child from the birth to the end of the seventh year.

It being a part of their virtuous education, serveth greatly both to nourish in them the fear of God, and to put in continual remembrance of that powerful grace, which openeth the mouths of infants to sound his praise. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Policy.

There shall be no more here an infant of days, nor a old man that hath not filled his days.—Ascham, Inv., 20.

2. In Law. Minor.

Male or female, till twenty-one years of age, is an infant, and so styled in law.—Sir W. Blackstone.

3. Title of a prince: (as the Spaniards use the word). See Child.

The infant [Arthur] bewailed . . . to her tale.

Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 8. 25.

The noble infant [Rinaldo] stood a signe Confused, speechless.

Virgil, Translation of Tasso, xvi. 31.

Infant, adj. Not mature; in a state of initial imperfection.

Within the infant rind of this small flower
Poison hath residence, and medicine power.

Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, ii. 3.

Infanta, s. [Spanish.] Princess descended from the royal blood of Spain.

Royal child, but a child in age,
Yet even already as a nation seen.

Sir R. Bunsen, Translation of Guarini's Pastor Fido, prod.

Infanticide, s. [Lat. from infanticidium.] Act of slaughtering infants.

The madness did not cease to rage till it terminated in infanticide, or in offering up to their granibols (instead of themselves) the children of their bowels.—Bishop Warburton, Divine Legation, ix. 2.

Infanticide, s. [Lat. from infanticida.] Slayer of infants.

Christians accounted those to be infanticides . . . who did but only expose their own infants.—Potter, Christianopolis, p. 52; 1690.

Infantile, adj. Pertaining to an infant.

The fly lies all the winter in these balls in its infantile state, and comes not to its maturity till the following spring. Dejean.

Infantine, adj. Childish; young; tender.

The sole comfort of his declining years, almost in infantile imbecility.—Burke, Speech on the Marriage Act.

It might have been hazardous to expose its tender and infantile form to barbarous critics.—Parnassus, Letter to Travia, p. 117.

Infante, v. a. Bring forth as an infant.

Rare.
Speech is nothing else but to fashion and articulate the voice natural, by addition of a vocal consonance, in the composing and enforcing, for the expressing of significant words, which explicate, and (as a man may say) do infante, and produce the conception of man.—Tim's Nomenclator, p. 699. (Ord 318.)

Infantlike, adj. Like an infant.

Your abilities are too infantlike for doing much alone.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, ii. 1.

Infantly, adj. Same as Infantlike.

He utters such single matter in so infantlike a voice.

Hammond and Fletcher, Queen of Corinth.

Infantry, s. [From Italian, infante=page; Fr. fantassin=footsoldier.] Footsoldiers of an army.

The principal strength of an army consisteth in the infantry or foot; and to make good infantry it requireth men bred in some free and plentiful manner. Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Infantry, s. [from infant.] Children.

It must needs pity any Christian heart to see the little infant which swarms up and down the alleys and lanes, with curses and ribaldry in their mouths, and other rude behaviour, as if they were intended to put off their humanity and degenerate into brutes.—Neatham, Discourse concerning Schools, (Ord 318.)

In the following there is probably an approach to a poor pun.

That small infantry

Warr'd on by cranes. Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 675.

Infurce, v. a. [Lat. infurcare; pass. part. infurcatus; infurcation, -onus.] Stuff; swell out.

By fury clannish into an horrible figure, his face infurc'd with maceour.—Sir P. Elgot, The Threeword, fol. 90. b.

Infurcation, s. Stuffing; constipation.

An hypochondriack consumption is occasioned by an infurcation and obstruction of the spleen.—Harvey.

Infashionable. adj. Unfashionable: (this last being the commoner word).

His hand
May be discolor'd, and transform'd from lace
To cork-work; his rich clothes be discomplext'd
With blood, beside the infashionable slashes.
Beaumont and Fletcher, The Coronation.

Infatuate. v. a. [Lat. fatuus - foolish.] Strike with folly; deprive of understanding.

He hath many other baits to inveigle and infatuate them farther yet. Barlow, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 157.

The judgment of God will be very visible in infatuating a people, ripe and prepared for destruction, into folly and madness, making the weak to contribute to the designs of the wicked; and suffering even those, out of a consciousness of their guilt, to grow more wicked. Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

The people are so universally infatuated with the notion, that if a cow falls sick, it is ten to one but an old woman is clapt up in prison for it. Addison, Travels in Italy.

Infatuate. adj. Stupefied.

May hypocrites,
(That stily sport one thing, another think,
But full as well), pluck'd with the relish weak,
Drink on unwear'd; till, by enchanting cups
Infatuate, they their wily thoughts disclose.
J. Phillips, Cyder, b. ii.

The carriage of our atheists or deists is amazing; no danger so infatuate, no phrensy so extravagant, as theirs. Hentley.

Infatuation. s. Act of striking with folly; deprivation of reason.

Where men give themselves over to the defence of wicked interests and false propositions, it is just with God to smite the greatest abilities with the greatest infatuations. South, Sermons.

Infatigating. s. [Lat. infatus - unlucky; ill-omened.] Act of making unlucky. Burton.

As the king did in some part remove the envy from himself, so he did not observe that he did withal bring a kind of malediction and infatigating upon the marriage, as an ill prognostick. Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Infatigable. adj. Impracticable; not to be done. Rare.

This is so difficult and infatigable, that it may well drive modesty to despair of science. Glauddle.

Infatigableness. s. Attribute suggested by infatigable; impracticability.

He began the work; and, being discomfited in point of the infatigableness, pursued his task, and perfected it. W. Montague, Decent Essays, pt. ii. p. 117: 125.

Infect. v. a. [Lat. infectus, pass. part. of inficio.]

1. Act upon by infection; affect with communicated qualities; taint; poison; pollute.

Thine eyes, sweet lady, have infected mine.
Shakespeare, Richard III. l. 2.
The nature of bad news infects the teller.
Id., Antony and Cleopatra, l. 2.

Every day
It would infect his speech, that if the king
Should without issue die, he'd carry it so
To make the sceptre his.
Id., Henry VIII. l. 2.

The love tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat.
Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 482.

2. Fill with something hurtfully contagious.

Infected be the air whereon they ride,
And damn'd all those that trust them!
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.

Infect. adj. Infected; polluted. Obsolete.

Infect with syncope. Bishop Fisher, Exposition of the Seven Penitential Psalms, p. 11.

Are you not she,
For whose infect persuasions, I could scarce
Kneel out my prayers?
Tenreiro, Revenge's Tragedy.

A blinded eye, a closed ear,
A hand with bristly infect.
Sir J. Harrington, Brief View of the State of the Church of England, p. 54.

Infected. part. adj. Tainted by infection; (third element of a compound in the extract).

One of those fantastical mind infected people, that children and musicians call lovers. Sir P. Sidney.

Infection. s. Contagion; mischief by communication; taint; poison.

The transmutation or emission of the thinner and more airy parts of bodies, as in odours and infections, is, of all the rest, the most corporeal; but withal there be a number of those emissions, both wholesome and unwholesome, that give us smell at all. Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Infectious. adj. Contagious; influencing by communicated qualities.

The most infectious pestilence upon three!
Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ll. 5.

Infectiously. adv. In an infectious manner; contagiously.

The will doles, that is inclinable
To what infectiously itself affects.
Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, ll. 2.

Infective. adj. Having the quality of acting by contagion.

True love, well considered, hath an infective power. Sir P. Sidney.

There is no sink in the world so infective as they are. Outred, Translation of Cato on Proverbs, fol. 100 b: 1280.

Command her, you grave heldman, that know better
My deadly resolutions; since I drew them
From the infectious fountain of your own.
Beaumont and Fletcher, Bloody Brother.

Infecund. adj. [? recent. Lat. fecundus - fruitful, prolific.] Unfruitful; infertile.

How safe and agreeable a conservatory the earth is to vegetables, is manifest from their rooting, drying, or being rendered infecund in the waters, or the air; but in the earth the vigour is long preserved. Boerhaave, Physico-Theology.

Infercity. s. Unhappiness; misery; calamity.

Whatever is the ignorance and infcity of the present state, we were made wise and happy. Glauddle.

Here is our great infercity, that, when single words signify complex ideas, one word can never distinctly manifest all the parts of a complex idea. Watts.

Infer. v. a. [Fr. inferer; Lat. infero.]

1. Bring on; induce.

Servus... fled away, afraid
Of villainy to be to her infer'd.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, vi. 8, 32.

You must infer some small detriment to the lungs. Harey.

2. In Logic. Deduce syllogistically, or as by a syllogism.

One would wonder how, from so differing premises, they should all infer the same conclusion. Dr. H. More, Inquiry of Christian Prop.

They have more opportunities than other men have of purchasing public esteem, by deserving well of mankind; and such opportunities always infer obligations. Bishop Atterbury.

To infer is nothing but, by virtue of one proposition laid down as true, to draw in another as true, i. e. to see or suppose such a connection of the two ideas of the inferred proposition. Locke.

3. Offer; produce. Obsolete.

Full well hath Clifford play'd the orator,
Infering arguments of mighty force.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III. ll. 2.

Inferable. adj. Capable of being inferred.

A sufficient argument... is inferable from these premises. Burke.

Hence it is inferable that such an organism will be divisible into similar halves by a vertical plane passing through its axis of motion. Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xii.

Inference. s. Conclusion drawn from previous arguments.

Though it may chance to be right in the conclusion, it is yet unjust and mistaken in the method of inference. Glauddle.

These inferences or conclusions are the effects of reasoning, and the three propositions, taken all together, are called syllogism or argument. Watts.

Induction being merely the extension to a class of cases of something which has been observed to be true in certain individual instances of the class; the first place among the operations subsidiary to induction is claimed by observation. ... The sole condition is, that what is supposed to have been observed shall really have been observed; that it be an observation, not an inference. For in almost every act of our perceiving qualities, observation and inference are intimately blended. What we are said to observe is usually a compound result, of which one-tenth may be observation, and the remaining nine-tenths inference. I affirm, for example, that I hear a man's voice. This would pass, in common language, for a direct perception. All, however, which is really perception, is that I hear a sound. That the sound is a voice, and that voice the voice of a man, are not perceptions but inferences. I affirm, again, that I saw my brother at a certain hour this morning. If any proposition concerning a matter of fact would commonly be said to be known by the direct testimony of the senses, this surely would be so. The truth, however, is far otherwise. I only saw a certain coloured surface; or rather I had the kind of visual sensations which are usually produced by a coloured surface; and from these marks, known to be such by previous experience, I concluded that I saw my brother. I might have had sensations precisely similar, when my brother was not there. I might have seen some other person so nearly resembling him in appearance, as, at the distance, and with the degree of attention which I bestowed, to be mistaken for him. I might have been asleep, and have dreamed that I saw him; or, in a state of nervous disorder, which brought his image before me in a waking hallucination. In all these modes, many have been led to believe that they saw persons well known to them, who were dead, or far distant. If any of these suppositions had been true, the affirmation that I saw my brother would have been erroneous. J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. iv. ch. l. § 1.

Inferential. adj. Having the nature of inference.

We know by observation (omitting the inferential proofs of an existence for thousands of ages anterior) that these phenomena have continued for five thousand years. J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. iii. ch. xix. § 2.

Inferentially. adv. In an inferential manner.

Subjective and partially accidental affections, ... and are often ascribed to them inferentially. J. S. Mill, System of Logic.

Inferible. adj. Capable of being inferred.

As simple mistakes commonly beset fallacies, so men from fallacious foundations, and unsupported mediums, erect conclusions no way inferible from their premises. Sir T. Browne.

Inferior. adj. [Lat. inferior.]

1. Lower.

a. Lower in station or rank of life: (correlative to superior).

Render me more equal, or perhaps
Superior, for inferior who is free?
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 824.

b. Lower in value or excellency.

The love of liberty with life is e'en,
And life itself the inferior gift of heav'n. Depledge.
I have added some original papers of my own, which, whether they are equal or inferior to my other poems, an author is the most improper judge of. Id.

2. Subordinate.

General and fundamental truths in philosophy, religion, and human life, conduct our thoughts into a thousand inferior and particular propositions. Watts.

Inferior. s. One in a lower rank or station than another.

A great person gets more by obliating his inferior than by obtaining him. South, Sermons.

Inferiority. s. Lower state of dignity or value.

The language, though not of equal dignity, yet as near approaching to it as our modern barbarism will allow; and therefore we are to rest contented with that only inferiority which is not possible to be remedied. Depledge.

Infernal. adj. Hellish; tartarean; detestable.

His gigantic limbs, with large embrace,
Infold nine acres of infernal space.
Depledge, Translation of the Ecceid, vi. 402.

The instruments or abettors in such infernal dealings. Addison, Spectator, no. 243.

Infernally. adv. In an infernal manner; in a detestable and infernal way.

All this I perceive is infernally false. Bishop Hacket, Life of Archbishop Williams, p. 211: 1682.

Inferrible. adj. Capable of being inferred.

That Sodom could not be far from Segor, which was seated upon the mountains near the side of the lake, seems inferrible from the sudden arrival of Lot, who, coming from Sodom at day-break, attained to Segor at sun-rising. Sir T. Browne, Marcellinus, p. 168.

Infertile. adj. Unfruitful; not productive; wanting fecundity; infecund.

Ignorance being of itself, like stiff clay, an infertile soil, when pride comes to sear and harden it, it grows perfectly impotent. Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Inferility. s. Unfruitfulness; want of fertility.

The same distemperature of the air that occasioned the plague, occasioned the inferility or barrenness of the soil, whereby the fruits of the earth became either very small, or very unwholesome. Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Inferst. v. a. Harass; disturb; plague.

They ceased not, in the mean while, to strengthen that part which in heart they favoured, and to infect by all means, under colour of other quarrels, their greatest adversaries in this cause.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Infect. adj. [Lat. infectus.] Mischievous; hurtful; dangerous. Obsolete.

He stay'd not 't' advise which way were best
His own essay, or how himself to mend,
But with fierce fury and with force infect,
Upon him ran. Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 4, 5.

Infection. s. Molestation; disturbance; annoyance.

Touching the infection of pirates, he hath been careful.—Baron, Speech in the Star-Chamber, 1617.

They should dwell in safety, free from the infection of enemies.—Bacon, Devisations, p. 102: 1623.

These bodily vexations and infections.—Mallett, Melancthon, p. 47: 1681.

Infectious. adj. Mischievous; hostile; dangerous. Rare.

The natural gravity and clownish malignity of the vulgar sort are, unto princes, as infectious as serpents.—Bacon.

Infection. s. Act of putting one in possession of a fee or estate held by a feudal tenure; condition of feudality.

Another military provision was conventional and by tenure, upon the infection of the tenant, and was usually called knight's service. Sir M. Hale, Common Law, p. 30.

I had composed a large collection of the infections of church-lands.—Johnston, Assurance of Abbey-Lands, p. 30.

Infidel. s. [Lat. infidelis; fidelis = faithful; fides = faith.] Unbeliever; pagan; one who rejects Christianity.

Exhorting her, if she did marry, yet not to join herself to an infidel, as she did times some widows christian had done, for the advancement of their estate in this world.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Infidel. adj. Unbelieving; characteristic of an unbeliever. Obsolete.

You have written what you dreamed in your sleep, rather than what you learned of any author catholic or infidel.—Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 362.

Their old infidel invaders.—Bishop Hard, On Chivalry and Honour.

The parliament [may be] no infidel. They 'declare the infidelity of that parliament.' Bold words these, indeed!—Bishop Horne, Letters on Infidelity.

Infidelity. s.

1. Want of faith.

The consideration of the divine omnipotence and infinite wisdom, and our own ignorance, are great instruments of silencing the murmurs of infidelity.—Jerry Taylor, Rule and Exercise of holy Living.

2. Disbelief in Christianity.

One would fancy that infidels would be exempt from that single fault, which seems to grow out of the imprudent fervours of religion; but so it is, that infidelity is propagated with as much fierceness and contention, as if the safety of mankind depended upon it.—Addison, Spectator.

3. Treachery; deceit; breach of contract or trust.

The infidelities on the one part between the two sexes, and the caprices on the other, the vanities and vexations attending even the most refined delights that make up this business of life, render it silly and uncomfortable. Spectator.

Infiltrate. v. n. Pass into anything as through a filter.

(For example see under next entry.)

Infiltration. s. Act of passing through a filter; liquid which has been infiltrated.

The water infiltrates through the porous rock... the infiltration quickly petrifies.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Infinite. adj. [Lat. infinitus.] Unbounded; boundless; unlimited; immense; having no boundaries or limits to its nature.

Impossible it is, that God should withdraw his presence from any thing because the very substance of God is infinite.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Infinitely. adv.

1. In an infinite manner; without limits; without bounds; immensely.

Nothing may be infinitely desired, but that good which indeed is infinite.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. In a great degree.

This is Antonio,
To whom I am so infinitely bound.

Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, v. 1.
The king saw that contrariwise it would follow, that England, though much less in territory, yet should have infinitely more soldiers of their native forces than those other nations have.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Infinitely the greater part of mankind have professed to act under a full persuasion of this great article.—Rogers.

Infiniteness. s. Attribute suggested by infinite; immensity; boundlessness; infinity.

The cunning of his flattery, the readiness of his tears, the infiniteness of his vows, were but among the weakest threads of his net. Sir P. Sidney.

Let us always bear about us such impressions of reverence, and fear of God, that we may humble ourselves before his infiniteness, and express that infinite distance between his infiniteness and our weakness.—Jerry Taylor.

Infinitesimal. adj. Infinitely divided.

The notion or idea of an infinitesimal quantity, as it is an object simply apprehended by the mind, hath been already considered.—Bishop Berkeley, Analyst, § 12.

The distance between them may be either infinite or infinitesimal, according to the measure used.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Infinitive. s. and adj. In Grammar. Mood so called.

In grammar, the infinitive affirms, or intimates the intention of affirming, which is one use of the indicative; but then it does not do it absolutely.—Clarke, Latin Grammar.

The mode is the manner of representing the being, action, or passion. When it is simply declared, or a question is asked concerning it, it is called the indicative mood. . . . When it is barely expressed, without any limitation of person or number, it is called the infinitive.—Bishop Lowth, A Short Introduction to English Grammar.

Infinitude. s.

1. Infinity; immensity.

Confusion heard his voice, and wild uproar
Stood still'd, stood vast in infinite confusion.

Though the redundancy of infinitude be equally incompatible to continued or successive motion, or continued quantity, and depends upon the impossibility of the very nature of things successive or extensive with infinitude; yet that incompatibility is more conspicuous in discrete quantity, that ariseth from parts actually distinguished.—Sir M. Hale.

2. Boundless number.

We see all the good sense of the age cut out, and minced into almost an infinitude of distinctions.—Addison, Spectator.

Infinity. s.

1. Immensity; boundlessness; unlimited quantities.

There cannot be more infinity than one; for one of them would limit the other.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

The better, the more desirable; that therefore must be desirable, wherein there is infinity of goodness; so that if any thing desirable may be infinite, that must needs be the best of all things that are desired: no good is infinite but only God, therefore he is our felicity and bliss.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Endless number.

Homer has concealed faults under an infinity of admirable beauties.—Brownie, Notes on the Odyssey.
The liver, being swelled, compresseth the stomach, stops the circulation of the juices, and produceth an infinity of bad symptoms.—Apollonius, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Infirm. adj. [Lat. infirmus.]

1. Weak; feeble; disabled of body.

Here stand I your slave:
A poor, infirm, weak, and despis'd old man.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 2.

2. Weak of mind; irresolute.

I am afraid to think what I have done;
Look on't again, I dare not. Infirm of purpose;
Give me the daggers. Shakespeare, Macbeth, ii. 2.
That on my head all might be visited,
Thy frailty and infirmity so forgiven;
To me committed, and by me expos'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 953.

3. Not stable; not solid.

He who fixes upon false principles tread upon infirm ground, and so sink; and he who fails in his deductions from right principles, stumbles upon firm ground and falls.—South, Sermons.

Infirm. v. a. Weaken; shake; enfeeble. Obsolete.

Some contrary spirits will object this as a sufficient reason to infirm all those points.—Sir W. Raleigh, Essays.

The spleen is unjustly introduced to invigorate the sinister side, which, being dilated, would rather infirm and debilitate it.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Infirmity. s. Lodgings for the sick.

These buildings to be for privy lodgings on both sides, and the end for privy galleries, whereof one should be for an infirmary, if any special person should be sick.—Bacon.

Infirmity. s.

1. Weakness of sex, age, or temper.

Which waits upon worn thine, with something seiz'd
His wish'd ability. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 1.

2. Failing; weakness; fault.

Many infirmities make it appear more requisite, that a wise man should keep the attention of his interest.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

How difficult it is to preserve a great name, when he that has acquired it is so obnoxious to such little weaknesses and infirmities as are no small diminution to it.—Addison.

3. Disease; malady.

General laws are like general rules of physick, according whereunto, as now, no wise man will desire himself to be cured, if there be joined with his disease some special accident, in regard that thereby others in the same infirmity, but without the like accident, may. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Infirmness. s. Attribute suggested by Infirmary; weakness; feebleness; infirmity.

Some experiments may discover the infirmness and insufficiency of the peripatetic doctrine.—Boyle.

Infix. v. a. Drive in; set; fasten.

And at the point two stings infix'd are,
Both deadly sharp, that sharpest steel exceeden far.

Spenser.

I never lov'd myself,
Till now, infix'd, I beheld myself,
Drawn in the flattering table of her eye.

Shakespeare, King John, ii. 2.

Immovable, infix'd, and frozen round.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 902.

The fatal dart a ready passage found,
And deep within her heart infix'd the wound.

Dryden.

Inflame. v. a. [Lat. inflammo; flamma = flame.]

1. Kindle; set on fire; make to burn.

Lave more clear, dedicated to a love more cold,
With the clearness lays a night of sorrow upon me,
And with the coldness inflames a world of fire within me. Sir P. Sidney.

Its waves of torrent fire inflam'd with rage.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 581.

2. Kindle any passion; provoke; irritate.

Their lust was inflam'd towards her.—Bunyan, 8.

3. Fire with passion.

Salon, with thoughts inflam'd of highest design,
Puts on swift wings. Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 650.
The accusations which he had inflam'd the public mind to madness were coolly withdrawn.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xv.

4. Exaggerate; aggravate.

A friend exaggerates a man's virtues, an enemy inflames his crimes.—Addison, Spectator.

Inflammations of air from meteors may have a powerful effect upon men.—Sir W. Temple.

2. State of being in flame.

The flame extendeth not beyond the inflammable effluence, but closely adheres unto the original of its inflammation. Sir T. Browne.

Some uris have had inscriptions on them, expressing that the lamps within them were burning when they were first buried; whereas the inflamenation of fat and viscous vapours doth presently vanish.—Bishop Wilkins, Dedicatory.

3. Act of exciting fervour of mind.

Prayer kindleth our desire to behold God by contemplation, and the mind, delighted with that contemplative sight of God, taketh every where new inflammations to pray the riches of the mysteries of heavenly wisdom, continually stirring up in us correspondent desires towards them.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Inflammatory. adj. Having the power of inflaming.

a. The mind or passions, as 'an inflammatory harangue.'

b. The body, as in Medicine.

The extremity of pain often creates a coldness in the extremities; such a sensation is very consistent with an inflammatory distemper.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.
An inflammatory fever hurried him out of this life in three days.—Pope, Letter to Swift.

Inflato. r. a. [Lat. inflatus, pass. part. of inflare = blow in.]

She therefore, upon second thought,
Infused, yet as it were by stealth,
Some small regard for state and wealth.

Swift, Conjunction and Tameless.

3. Sleep in any liquor with a gentle heat; macerate so as to extract the virtues of anything without boiling: (opposed to decoction).

Take violets, and infuse a good parcel of them in a quart of vinegar.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

4. Make an infusion with any ingredient; supply, tincture, or saturate with anything infused.

Drink, infused with flesh, will nourish faster and easier than meat and drink together.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

5. Fill; inspire.

Thou didst smile,
Infused with a fortitude from heav'n.

Shakespeare, Tempest, i. 2.

Infuse his breast with magnanimity,
And make him, naked, foil a man at arms.

Id., Henry VI., Part III., v. 4.

Infuse. s. Infusion. Obsolete.

Cruciate to shed into my barren spright
Some little drop of thy celestial dew,
That may my rhinies with sweet infuse endow.

Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Infuser. s. One who infuses.

The sole infuser of grace.—White, Sermons, p. 31: 1615.

Infusible. adj. [in - into.] Possible to be infused.

From whom the doctrines being infusible into all, it will be more necessary to forewarn all of the danger of them. Hammond.

Infusible. adj. [in - not.] Incapable of being fused or melted.

Vitrification is the last work of fire, and a fusion of the salt and earth, wherein the fusible salt draws the earth and infusible part into one continuum. Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Infusion. s.

1. Act of pouring in; instillation.

Our language has received innumerable elegancies and improvements from that infusion of Hebrewisms, which are derived to it out of the poetical passages in holy writ.—Addison.

2. Act of pouring into the mind; inspiration.

We participate Christ partly by imitation, as when those things which he did and suffered for us are imputed to us for righteousness; partly by habitual and real infusion, as when grace is habitually bestowed on earth, and afterwards more fully both our souls and bodies in glory. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

3. Suggestion; whisper.

They found it would be matter of great debate, and spend much time; during which they did not infuse their company, nor to be troubled with their infusions.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Here his folly and his wisdom age of his own growth, not the echo or infusion of other men.—Swift.

4. Act of steeping anything in moisture without boiling.

Repeat the infusion of thy body oftener.—Bacon.

6257

5. Liqueur made by infusion.

To have the infusion strong in those bodies which have finer spirits, repeat the infusion of the body often.—Bacon.

Infusible. adj. Having the power of infusion, or of being infused.

Still let my song a nobler note assume,
And sing the infusible force of Spring on man;
When heaven and earth, as if contending, vie
To raise his being, and serene his soul.

—Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Infusoria. s. pl. Animalcules (generally microscopic) found in water wherein vegetable matters have been steeped or infused, and, by the earlier naturalists, supposed to have been engendered thereby.

A purplish blue variety owes its colour to a trace of iodine; a red variety to oxyd of iron, and another to Infusoria.—Deane, System of Mineralogy.

Ing. s. [A.S.] Common pasture or meadow. Bill for dividing and inclosing certain open common fields, Ing, common pastures, and other commonable lands, within the manors or manor and township of Henbury, in the county of Lincoln. —Journals of the House of Commons, xxiv. 151: 1773.

Ingannation. s. [Italian, ingannare.] Cheat; fraud; deception; juggle; delusion; imposture; trick; slight. Rare.

Whoever shall reason their reasons, either from the root of deceit in themselves, or inability to resist such trivial ingannations from others, are within the line of vulgarity.—Sir T. Browne.

Ingate. s. Entrance; ingress.

One noble person . . . stoppeth the ingate of all that evil which is looked for, and holdeth in all those which are at his beck. —Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Ingathering. s. Act of getting in the harvest.

Thou shalt keep the feast of ingathering, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field.—Leviticus, xiii. 16.

Ingeminate. s. a. [Lat. ingeminare; pass. part., -utus; ingeminatio, -onis; geminus.] double, twin. Ingemino, &c., are often applied to sounds, i. e. repeated by, or as by, an echo.] Double; repeat.

She got ingeminate
The last of sounds, and what she hears relates.

—Saunders, Translation of Ovid, b. iii.

They ingeminated a doleful requiem to their brother's carcass.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 118.

Which song she takes occasion to ingeminate, in the second chorus, upon the sight of a work of Neptune's. —H. Johnson, Mætopæa.

He would often ingeminate the word Peace, never. —Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Ingeminate. adj. Redoubled.

It is an ingeminate expression of helping us in our labours. —Jeremy Taylor, Discourse on extempore Prayer, § 14.

Ingeminatio. s. Repetition; reduplication.

To make it more effectual by ingeminatio, he saith, Abba, Father.—Walsall, Life of Christ, b. 4. b.: 162.

That sacred ingeminatio, Amen, Amen.—Featley, Dippers Dips, p. 160.

Happiness is the language of all; and (that which adds to the contentment) it is happiness with an echo of ingeminatio.—Haldsworth, Inauguration Sermon at Cambridge, p. 2.

Ingenger. See Engender.

Ingengerability. s. Incapability of being generated.

It is impossible that Oad (the Son) could resemble (God) the Father in the point of his ingengerability (if I may, in the penury of words to express that inexpressible mystery, use that barbarous, and to English ears strange word), except he were born twice, once without mother, and again without father.—Christian Religion's Appeal, lib. ii. p. 56. (Ord MS.)

Ingengerable. adj. Incapable of being generated. Rare.

Divers naturalists esteem the air, as well as other elements, to be ingengerable and incorruptible.—Boyle.

Ingengerate. v. a. Beget; produce.

Natural ceremony both to express and ingengerate, or encrease, this lowliness of disposition.—Macle, Macropædia, xli.

Those noble habits are ingengerated in the soul.

as religion, gratitude, obedience, and tranquillity.—Sir M. Hale, Originibus of Manhood.

Virtues are ingengerated in our souls, by due submission of this will to the Divine Will.—Spiritual Conflict, pt. i. p. 51: 1632.

Ingengerate. adj. Inborn; innate; inbred.

These virtues were rather forged and affected things to serve his ambition than true qualities ingengerated in his judgement or nature.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

In divers children their ingengerate and seminal powers lie deep, and are of slow disclosure.—W. Walton, Essay on the Education of Children.

Ingengerated. part. adj. [in = not.] Unbegotten. Rare.

Yet shall we demonstrate the same, from persons presumed as far from us in condition as time; that is, our first and ingengerated forefathers.—Sir T. Browne.

Ingengerosity. s. Ingenuity. Rare.

They labour with matter taken out of the mine of their own ingengerosity, with much sweat and toil. —Advertisement from Paradoxes, 35. (Ord MS.)

Whose cunning or ingengerosity no art or known specific can possibly reach to by imitation.—Cudworth, Intellectual System, 68. (Ord MS.)

Ingenuous. adj. [Lat. ingenium.] mother-wit, natural or inborn talent, wit or genius generally.]

1. Witty; inventive; possessed of genius.

'Tis a peevish boy,
Bold, quick, ingenious, forward, capable.

—Shakespeare, Richard III., iii. 2.

Our ingenious friend Cowley not only has employed much eloquence to persuade that truth in his poetry, but has in one of his poems given a noble example of it.—Boyle.

The more ingenious men are, the more they are apt to trouble themselves.—Sir W. Temple.

2. Mental; intellectual. Obsolete.

The king is mad: how stiff is my vile sense,
That I stand up, and have ingenious feeling
Of my huge sorrows! better I were distracted.

—Shakespeare, King Lear, iv. 6.

Ingenuously. adv. In an ingenious manner; wittily; subtly.

I will not pretend to judge by common fears, or the shew of men too ingenuously politic.—Sir W. Temple.

Ingenuousness. s. Attribute suggested by Ingenuous; ingenuity (in its restricted sense).

The greater appearance of ingenuousness there is in the practice I am disapproving, the more dangerous it is.—Boyle.

Ingenuite. adj. [Lat. ingenitus.] Innate; inborn; native; ingenerate. Rare.

Aristotle affirms the mind to be at first a mere mass of ideas; and that notions are not ingenuite, and imprinted by the finger of Nature, but by the latter and more languid impressions of sense, being only the reports of observation, and the result of so many repeated experiments. —South, Sermons.

Ingenuity. s.

1. Openness; fairness; candour; freedom from dissimulation.

My courtesy I to the planets give;
My truth, to them who at the court do live;
Mine ingenuity and openness

To Jesuits; to buffoons my pensiveness. —Donne.
I know not whether it be more shame or wonder, that men can so put off ingenuity, and the native greatness of their kind, as to descend to so base, so ignominious a vice.—Jr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

If a child, when questioned for any thing, directly confess, you must commend his ingenuity, and pardon the fault, be it what it will.—Locke.

2. Liberality.

Two things we find recorded in Scripture concerning Moses, his education; that he was brought up in the court of Egypt, and that he was skilled in all the learning of the Egyptians; and these two will abundantly prove the ingenuity of his education.—Bishop Middleton, Origines Sacre, b. ii. ch. ii. (Ord MS.)

3. Wit; invention; genius; subtlety; acuteness.

These are but the tridities of wit, and become not the genius of manly ingenuity.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Such wits have neither parts nor wit, ingenuity of discourse, nor fluency of conversation, to entertain or delight any one.—South, Sermons.

Ingenuity. adj.

1. Freeborn; not of servile extraction.

2. Open; fair; candid; generous; noble.

Many speeches there are of Job's, whereby his wisdom and other virtues may appear: but the glory of an ingenuous mind be both purchased by these words only. Behold I will lay mine hand upon my mouth; I have spoken once, yet will I not therefore maintain argument; yea twice, howbeit for that cause further I will not proceed.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Infuse into their young breasts such an ingenuous and noble colour, as would not fail to make many of them renowned. —Milton, Tractate on Education.

If an ingenuous detestation of falsehood be but carefully and early instilled, that is the true and genuine method to obviate dissimulation.—Locke.

Ingenuy. s. Genius; wit. Obsolete.

Whatever of the production of his ingenuy comes into foreign parts, is highly valued. —Boyle.

Ingést. v. a. [Lat. gero.] bear, carry; pass. part. gestus; ingestio, -onis.] Throw into the stomach.

Nor will we affirm that iron, ingested, receiveth in the belly of the ostridge no alteration.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Ingestion. s. Act of throwing into the stomach.

It has got room enough to grow into its full dimension, which is performed by the daily ingestio of milk and other food, that's in a short time after digested into blood.—Harey.

Inglorious. adj. [Lat. inglorius.]

1. Void of honour; mean; without glory.

It was never held inglorious or derogatory for a king to be guided by his great council, nor dishonourable for subjects to yield and bow to their king. —Howell.

Yet though our army brought not conquest home,
I did not from the light inglorious come. —Drake.

2. Regardless of glory; insensible to the charms of glory; unambitious.

Great Julius, whom now all the world admires,
The more he grew in years, the more inflamed
With glory, wept that he had liv'd so long.
Inglorious. —Milton, Paradise Regained, iii. 39.
My next desire is, void of care and strife,
To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life.

—Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 688.

Ingluvial. adj. [Lat. ingluvius.] crop of a bird.] Connected with the crop.

In the tiger-beetle and the carnivorous carabide, there is a small gizzard, preceded by the usual ingluvial dilatation of the oesophagus, and followed by a long chyliferous stomach, the external surface of which is beset with ascending follicles. —Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anat. &c., vol. xvii.

Ingorge. See Engorge.

Ingot. s. [see Metal.] Mass or wedge of gold or silver cast in a mould; mass of unwrought metal.

If thou art rich, thou'rt poor;
For like an ass, whose back's with ingots bound,
Thou'rt best with heavy riches but a journey,
And death unlooseth thee.

—Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, iii. 1.

Within the circle arms and tripods lie,
Ingots of gold and silver heap'd on high,
And vases embossed of the Tyrian dye.

—Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, v. 146.

Every one of his pieces is an ingot of gold, intrinsically and solidly valuable. —Prior.

How beautiful are roubles! how charming chests Containing ingots, heaps of dollars, coins
(Not of old victors, all whose heads and crests
Weigh not the thin ore where 't' ere visage shines,
But) of fine unclasp'd gold, where dully rests
Some likeness, which the glittering circle confines,
Of modern, reigning, sterling, stupid stamp!—
Yes! ready money is Aladdin's lamp.

—Byron, Don Juan, xii. 12.

Ingraft. Ingain. Ingapple. See Engraft, &c.

Ingrate. adj. [Fr. ingrat; Lat. ingratus.]

1. Ungrateful; unthankful.

That we have been familiar,
Ingrate forgetfulness shall poison, rather Than pity note how much.

—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 2.

And you degenerate, you ingrate revolve.

—Id., King John, v. 2.

No man could be so impudently ingrate.

—Younger Brother's Apology, p. 55: 1635.

2. Unpleasing to the sense.

The cause of that which is unpleasing or ingrate to the hearing, may receive light by that which is pleasing and grateful to the sight.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

How ingrate mowet it [scent-stilla] may seem at first, yet by use it becomes sufficiently pleasant. —Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 118.

Ingrate. s. One who is ungrateful for benefits conferred.

So will fall
He and his childless progeny: whose fault?
Whose but his own? Ingrate; he had of me
All he could have: I made him just and right,
Sufficient to have stood, though free to fall.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 35.

Ingrateful, adj. Wanting gratitude: (Ungrateful the commoner and better word).

1. Unthankful.

Is this the love, is this the recompence
Of mine to thee, ingrateful Eve?

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1163.

Ingrateful and treacherous guests to their best friends and entertainers.—Id. Observations on the Articles of Peace between the Earl of Ormond and the Irish.

He proved extremely false and ingrateful to me.—
Bishop Atterbury, vol. iv. let. 64.

He found that city which he had saved so ingrateful.—Hakewell, Apology, p. 413.

2. Unpleasing.

He was never suspected . . . in the least degree to dissemble his own opinions or thoughts, how ingrateful soever it often proved.—Lord Clarendon,
Life, i. 68.

Ingratefully, adv. Ungratefully; without gratitude. Rare.

Sir Robert Curw, her near kinsman, and whose family and himself she (Queen Elizabeth) had raised from the degree of a mean gentleman to high honour in title and place, most ingratefully did catch at her last breath, to carry it to the rising sun then in Scotland.—Sir A. Weldon, Court of King James,
p. 2.

Ingrately, adv. Ungratefully. Rare.

Nor may we smother or forget, ingrately,
The heaven of silver that was sent but lately
From Ferdinandus, &c.

Sylvestor, Du Bartas, p. 135: 1621.

Ingratiate, v. a. [Lat. gratia grace, favour.]

1. Put in favour; recommend to kindness.

They will be fit helms for such hatchets; . . . to hannet them, and ingratiate themselves.—Bishop
Richardson, Choice Observations upon the Old Testament, p. 265: 1653.

Their manners make them see armies in the air,
and give them their word, the more to ingratiate themselves with them, that they signify nothing less than future slaughter and desolation.—Addison.

2. Recommend; render easy.

What difficulty would it not ingratiate to us?—
Hammond, Works, iv. 561.

When once we come to feel the good effects of those duties in our natures, how fast our lusts do decline, our dispositions mend, and all our graces improve: in the use of them, the sense of this will multiply colour and ingratiate them to us.—Scott,
Christian Life, i. 3.

Ingratiate, verb. abs. Recommendation;
act of putting in favour.

These have been far from receiving the rewards of such ingratiations with the people.—Eikon Basilike, Which had been a very great inducement and in-gratiation to women of greatest quality.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 173.

Ingratitudes, s. Retribution of evil for good;
unthankfulness.

Ingratitude! thou marble-hearted fiend,
More hideous, when thou show'st thee in a child,
Than the sea-monster. Shakespeare, King Lear, i. 1.

Ingratitude is abhorred both by God and man, and vengeance attends those that repay evil for good.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

In the plural. Rare.

Time hath, my lord, a wallet at his back,
Wherein he puts alms for oblivion,
A great-sid'd monster of ingratitude.
Shakespeare, Twelfth and Cressida, iii. 3.

Ingrave, v. a. [from grave—tomb.] Bury;
inter.

Thy corps, as in the custom old,
With thy forefathers doth not lie ingrav'd.
Gauegar, Epigrams, sign. C. 5: 1613.

Ingravidate, v. a. Impregnate; make proliferous.

They may be so pregnant and ingravided with lustful thoughts, that they may as it were die in travail, because they cannot be delivered.—Father,
Holy State, p. 25.

Ingroat. See Engroat.

Ingrédient, s. [Lat. ingredior, pres. part.
ingrediens, -entis, pret. part. ingressus; ingressio, -onis, from in + gradior—step in, enter, form a part of anything.] Component part of a body that consists of different materials.

The ointment is made of divers ingrédients, whereof the hardest to come by is the moss upon the skull of a dead man unburied.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

I have often wondered, that learning is not thought a proper ingrédient in the education of a woman of quality or fortune.—Addison, Guardian.

Water is the chief ingrédient in all the animal fluids and solids.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Spleen is a bad ingrédient into any other distemper.—Sir W. Temple.

Ingrédient, adj. Entering into.

Put with us, and so in every nation, many considerations ought to be ingrédient into the constitution of a capital law.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Instruction, (Ord MS.)

God himself is the only infallible judge in a case of this nature, of all the circumstances ingrédient to the definition of good or evil.—Greve, Cosmology
Sacra, p. 189. (Ord MS.)

Ingress, s. [see Ingrédient] Entrance; power of entrance; intramission.

All putrefactions come from the ambient body;
either by ingress of the substance of the ambient body into the body putrefied; or else by excretion of the body putrefied by the body ambient.—Bacon,
Natural and Experimental History.

Those air bladders, by a sudden subsidence, meet again by the ingress and egress of the air.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Ingression, s. Act of entering; entrance.

The fire would strain the pores of the glass too suddenly, and break it all in pieces to get ingression.
—Sir K. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of India.

Inguinal, adj. [Lat. inguen—groin.] Belonging to the groin.

The plague seems to be a particular disease, characterised with eruptions in buboes, by the inflammation and suppuration of the axillary, inguinal, and other glands.—Arbuthnot.

Inguif. See Engulf.

Ingurgitate, v. a. [Lat. gurgies, -ilis = whirlpool, swallow, throat.]

1. Swallow down.

Ingurgitating sometimes whole half glasses.—
Charlton, Poems, p. 112.

2. Plunge into; engulf.

If a man do but once set his appetite upon it, [pleasure,] let him ingurgitate himself never so deep into it, yet shall he never be able to fill his desire with it.—Eucher, Almond, p. 200: 1622.

Ingurgitate, v. n. Drink largely; swill.

Nothing pesters the body and mind sooner, than to be still left to eat and ingurgitate beyond all measure, as many do.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 235.

Ingurgitation, s. Act of intemperate swallowing.

Inconveniences always do happen by ingurgitation and excessive feedings.—Sir T. Elgot, The Gentleman, fol. 91.

Too much abstinence turns vice, and too much in-gurgitation is one of the seven, and at once destroys both nature and grace.—Bishop Hall, Of Contemtation, p. 13.

So it is written of Epicurus, that after his dis-ease was judged deserv'd, he dream'd his stomach and wines with a large draught and ingurgitation of wines; whereupon the epigram was made: 'Hinc Styxianus hinc haurit aquas,' he was not sober enough to taste any of the Stygian water.—Bacon, Of the Advancement of Learning, vol. i. p. 124. (Ord MS.)

Ingustable, adj. [Lat. gusto—taste.] Not perceptible by the taste.

As for their taste, if the camelion's nutriment be air, neither can the tongue be an instrument thereof; for the body of the element is: gustabile, void of all sapidity, and without any action of the tongue, is, by the rough artery, or wizen, conducted into the lungs.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Inhabitable, s. Unkillfulness.

Whatever evil blind ignorance, . . . inhabitable, un-wieldiness, and confusion of thoughts beget, wisdom prevents.—Erasmus, &c.

Inhabit, v. a. Dwell in; hold as a dweller.

They shall build houses and inhabit them.—Isaiah,
lxv. 21.

She shall be inhabited of devils.—Barnes, iv. 35.
Not all are partakers of that grace, who rely Christ
inhabited whom he saveth.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Inhabit, v. n. Dwell; live.

Learn what creatures there inhabit.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 353.

They say, wild beasts inhabit here;
But grief and wrong secure my fear.—Walker.

Inhabitable, adj. [from in + on.] Capable of affording habitation.

All which live
In the inhabitable world.
The fixed stars are all of them suns, with systems of inhabitable planets moving about them.—Locke.

Inhabitable, adj. [from in + not.] Incapable of inhabitants; not habitable;
uninhabitable. Obsolete.

The frozen Poles of the Alps.
Or any other ground inhabitable.
Shakespeare, Richard II. i. 1.

Inhabitation, s. Residence of dwellers.

So the ruins yet resting in the wild moors testify
a former inhabitation.—Cave, Survey of Cornwall.
No promise of inhabitation; neither track of beast, nor foot of man. We have searched all this rocky desert.—Beaumont and Fletcher, Sea-T, page.

Inhabitant, s. Dweller; one who lives or resides in a place.

In this place they report that they saw inhabitants, which were very fair and fat people.—Abbot.

If the fervour of the sun were the sole cause of blackness in any kind of negroes, it were also reasonable that inhabitants of the same latitude, subjected into the same vicinity of the sun, should also partake of the same hue.—Sir T. Browne.

For his supposed love a third
Lays essay hold upon a bird,
And stands amaz'd to find his dear
A wild inhabitant of the air.

What happier natures shrink at with affright,
The hard inhabitant commands is right.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 225.

Inhabitation, s.

1. Abode; place of dwelling.

Noise call you it, or universal groan,
As if the whole inhabitation perish'd?
Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1511.

2. Act of inhabiting, or planting with dwellings; state of being inhabited.

By knowing this place we shall the better judge of the beginning of nations, and of the world's inhabitation.—Sir W. Raleigh.

The inhabitation of the Holy Ghost maketh a temple, as we are informed by the Apostle: 'What, know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you?'—Bishop Pearson,
Exposition of the Creed, art. viii.

3. Number of inhabitants.

We shall rather admire how the earth contained its inhabitants than doubt it.—Sir T. Browne,
Vulgar Errors.

Inhabitor, s. One who inhabits; dweller.

We to the inhabitants of the earth.—Revelation,
viii. 13.

The same name is given unto the islanders, or midland inhabitants of this island.—Sir T. Browne,
Vulgar Errors.

They thought to understand, that there is not only some inhabitor in this divine house, but also some ruler.—Dehman.

Inhabitrice, s. Female inhabitant.

O inhabitant of the fortress, in the margin, inhabitrice.—Jeremiah, x. 17.

Thou inhabitant of Saphir [in the margin, inhabitrice.]—Micah, i. 11.

The church here called the inhabitants of the garden.—Bishop Richardson, Choice Observations upon the Old Testament, p. 350: 1653.

Inhalation, s. Act of drawing in breath or air.

Our inhalation from the circumambient air is very considerable.—Macenzie, On Health, 286.
(Ord MS.)

Inhale, v. a. Draw in with air; inspire; [opposed to exhale.]

Martin was walking forth to inhale the fresh breaze of the evening.—Arbuthnot and Pope.

There sits the shepherd on the grassy turf,
Inhaling healthful the descending sun.
Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Inhaler, s. In Medicine. Apparatus or machine for breathing or drawing vapour into the lungs.

Inharmonious, adj. Unmusical; not sweet of sound.

Catulus, though his Notes be rough, and his numbers inharmonious, I could yet amuse me for the softness and decency, but must decline for the loose-ness of his thoughts.—Ritton.

The identity of sound may appear a little inharmonious, and shock the ear.—Brown.

Inhearse, v. a. Enclose in a hearse. Rare.
See where he lies, inhearsed in the arms
Of the most bloody nurse of his bones.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. iv. 5.

Inhere, v. n. Exist in something else.

For, nor in nothing, nor in things Extreme, and scattering bright, can inhere
—Hamlet, Hamlet, p. 17.

They do but inhere in their subject which supports them; their being in a dependence on a subject.
Sir K. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of Justice.

Inherence, s. Existence in something else.

so as to be inseparable from it; conjunction.

The gift of tongues, after its first infusion by the Spirit, might be in a man by habitual inherence, as a standing principle or power residing in the soul, and enabling it, upon any occasion, to express itself in several languages.—South, Sermons, iii. 415.

Inherency. s. Synonym Inherence.

The immensity and inherency of this power in Jesus is evident in this, that he was able to communicate it to whom he pleased.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. ii.

It is that I am pleased with beholding his gayety, and the gay man in his greatest bravery is only pleased because I am pleased with the sight; so borrowing his little and imaginary complacency from the delight that I have, not from any inherency of his own possession.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, xviii.

Inherent. adj.

- Existing in something else, so as to be inseparable from it.

I will not do't,
Lest I succumb to honour mine own truth;
And by my body's action teach my mind
A most inherent baseness.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 2.

- Naturally conjoined; innate; inborn.

I mean not the authority which is annexed to your office. I speak of that only which is inborn and inherited to your person.—Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, dedication.

The power of drawing iron is one of the ideas of a hard-soul; and a power to be so drawn is a part of the complex one of iron; which powers pass for inherent qualities.—Locke.

They will be sure to decide in favour of themselves, and talk much of their inherent right.—Swift.

Inherently. adv. In an inherent manner.

They may assert, that matter hath inherently and essentially such an internal energy.—Bentley, Sermons, vii.

Inherit. v. a. [N.Fr. usheriter; Lat. heres—heir.]

- Receive or possess by inheritance.

Prince Harry is valiant for the cold blood he did naturally inherit of his father he hath, like him, steel land, manured with excellent good store of fertile herit.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II., iv. 4.

The son can receive from his father good things, without empire, that was vested in him for the good of others; and therefore the son cannot claim or inherit it, by a title, which is founded wholly on his own private good.—Locke.

Unwilling to sell an estate he had some prospect of inheriting, he formed delays.—Addison.

- Possess; obtain possession of.

This, or else nothing, will inherit her.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, act i. scene ii.

Inheritable. adj. Transmissible by inheritance; obtainable by succession.

A kind of inheritable estate accrued unto them.—Caracul.

By the ancient laws of the realm, they were not inheritable to him by descent.—Sir J. Haywood.

Was the power the same, and from the same original in Moses as it was in David? And was it inheritable in one and not in the other?—Locke.

Inheritance. s.

- Patrimony; hereditary possession.

When the son dies, let the inheritance descend unto the daughter.—Shakespeare, Henry V., i. 2.

Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house?—Genesis, xxi. 14.

Claim our just inheritance of old.—Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 38.

- Reception of possession by hereditary right.

Men are not proprietors of what they have merely for themselves, their children have a title to part of it, which comes to be wholly theirs, when death has put an end to their parents' use of it; and thus we call inheritance.—Locke.

- Possession.

You will rather show our general lords
How you can brow, then spend a fawn upon them,
For the inheritance of their loves, and safeguard
Of what that want might ruin.—Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 2.

Inheritor. s. One who inherits; heir.

You, like a lute, out of whose loins
Are pleas'd to breed out your inheritors.—Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, iv. 3.

The very conveyances of his lands will hardly lie in this; and must the inheritor himself have no more?—J. H. Hamlet, v. 1.

Marriage, without consent of parents they do not make valid, but they must let it in the inheritance; for the children of such marriages are not admitted to inherit above a third part of their parents' inheritance.—Baron's New Atlantic.

Inheritor. s. Female inheritor; heiress.

He had given artificially some hopes to marry Anne, inheritor to the duchy of Bretagne.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Pope Martin had recognised the title of Joanna II., the inheritor of the name, the throne, the licentiousness, and the misfortunes of Joanna I., to the throne of Naples.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xii. ch. x.

Inheritor. s. Inheritor.

No female
Should be inheritor in Salique land.—Shakespeare, Henry V., i. 2.

The foul inheritor of the drugs of wrath.—Rennet, Psyche, ix. 53.

Inhesion. s. Inherence; state of existing in something else.

Neither was this [the gift of prophecy and foretelling future events] in the soul by constant inhesion and habitual abode; but, as we may not usually express it, only by sudden pictures, by transient immissions, and representations of the ideas of things future to the imagination. In a word, it was in the mind not as an inhabitant, but as a guest.—South, Sermons, iii. 410.

And for a like reason, activity and perceptivity, by which powers alone we discover that there is a substance different from matter, and which is the necessary subject of their inhesion, must be in the mind.—A. Baxter, Enquiry into the Nature of the human Soul, i. 324.

Inhesion. s. [Lat. hio—gape; hincus, hincis, -onis, -gaping.] Gaping after; great desire. Rare.

An inhesion after obscure lusts.—Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy, p. 25.

Inhibit. v. a.

- Restrain; hinder; repress; check. Rare.

Holding of the breath doth help somewhat to cease the hiccup; and vinegar put to the nostrils, or cankered, doth it also, for that it is astringent, and inhibits the motion of the spirits.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The stars and planets being whirled about with great velocity, would suddenly did nothing inhibit it, be shattered in pieces.—Rap, Vision of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Their motions also are excited and inhibited, are moderated and managed by the objects without them.—Bentley, Sermons, ii.

- Prohibit; forbid.

All men were inhibited by proclamation, at the dissolution, so much as to mention a parliament.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.
Buryal may not be inhibited or denied to any one.—Ayliffe.

Inhibition. s.

- Restraint; hindrance.

This licentiousness of senses proceeds from an inhibition of spirits, the way being stopped up by which they should come.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 25.

- Prohibition; embargo.

He might be judged to have imposed an envious inhibition on it, because himself has not stock enough to maintain the trade.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

- In Law. See extract.

Inhibition is a writ to inhibit or forbid a judge from farther proceeding in the cause depending before him. Inhibition is most commonly a writ issuing out of a higher court Christian to a lower and inferior, upon an appeal; and prohibition out of the king's court to a court Christian, or to an inferior temporal court.—Covent.

The decrees and inhibitions of my lord's ordinary of London.—Roll, Yeth a Court of the King's Bench, fol. 19. b. 1545.

No inhibition shall be granted out of any court belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury, at the instance of any party, unless it be subscribed by an advocate practising in the said court.—Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, 94.

Inhibitory. adj. Having the nature, power, or operation of an inhibition; having a tendency to inhibit.

I would not have you consider these criticisms as inhibitory.—Laub, Letter to Cideridge.

Inhold. v. a. Have inherent; contain in itself. Rare.

It is disputed, whether this light first created be the same which the sun inholds and casts forth, or whether it had continuance any longer than till the sun's creation.—Sir W. Raleigh.

Inhoop. v. a. Confine in an inclosure. Rare.

His quails ever
Beat mine inhoop'd at odds.—Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, ii. 3.

Inhospitable. adj. Affording no hospitality, kindness, or entertainment to strangers.

All places also
Inhospitable appear, and desolate;
Nor knowing us, nor known.—Milton, Paradise Lost, xl. 305.

Since tow'd from shores to shores, from lands to lands,
Inhospitable rocks, and barren sands.—Dryden, Translation of the Æneid.

Inhospitably. adv. In an inhospitable manner; unkindly to strangers.

Of guests, he makes them slaves
Inhospitably, and kills their infant wakes.—Milton, Paradise Lost, xli. 167.

Inhospitableness. s. Attribute suggested by inhospitable; inhospitality.

Those rude heaps have had the dust of his feet shaken against them for their inhospitableness.—Levy, Sermons, p. 79: 1624.

Inhospitality. s. Want of hospitality; want of courtesy to strangers.

Their inhospitality is punishment enough to itself: they have lost the honour and happiness of being host to their God.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the Old and New Testaments, Birth of Christ.

Inhuman. adj. Barbarous; savage; cruel; unfeeling.

A just war may be prosecuted after a very unjust manner; 16 perfidious branches of our world, by inhuman cruelties, and by assassinations.—Bishop Atterbury.

The more these praises were enlarged, the more inhuman was the punishment, and the sufferer more innocent.—Swift.

Princes and peers attend! while we impart
To you the thoughts of an inhuman heart.—Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, vii. 240.

Inhumane. adj. See extract.

There is now no distinction between inhuman and inhumane. Formerly it was inhuman, with the accent on the last syllable. Todd.

Inhumanely. adv. Uncharitably.

No Jew, no Turk, would use a Christian
So inhumanly as this Puritan.—Milton, Satire, ii. 134.

Inhumanity. s. Cruelty; savageness; barbarity.

Love which lover hurts is inhumanity.—Sir P. Sidney.

The rudeness of those who must make up their want of justice with inhumanity and impudence.—Eden, Enchiridion.

Each social feeling fell,
And joyless inhumanity prevails,
And petrifies the heart.—Thomson, Seasons, Spring.

Inhumanly. adv. In an inhuman manner; savagely; cruelly; barbarously.

I, who have established the whole system of all true politeness and refinement in conversation, think myself most inhumanly treated by my countrymen.—Swift.

Inhumation. s. [Lat. humus—ground, soil, mould.] Burying; sepulture.

The soldiers prize that which is the proper possession of the dead, a good name, and hope to be famous after their inhumation.—Wit of choice, Apology for Learning, p. 191: 1633.

It [Robb's] bones is probably not funeral; for some years ago, a skeleton, which is without tumulus, was examined to a considerable depth by digging, and no marks of inhumation appeared.—T. Walton, History of the Parish of Kildington, p. 61.

Inhume. v. a. Bury; inter.

We took notice of an old-consecrated tomb, which inhum'd a harmless shepherd.—Sir T. H. North, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 124.

Weeping they hear the mangled heaps of slain,
Inhume the natives in their native plain.—Pope, Translation of the Odyssey.

Like a dutiful son, [he] left the remains of his mother to be inhum'd at the expense of the parish.—Mary, St. George's, vol. iii. ch. ix.

Inimaginable. adj. Incapable of being imagined; (Unimaginable commoner).

In this sense two prime causes are inimaginable; and for all things to depend on one, and to be more independent beings than one, is a clear contradiction.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. i.

Inimical. adj. [Lat. inimicus.] Unfriendly; unkind; hurtful; hostile; adverse.

Associations in defence of the existing power of the sovereign, are not in their spirit, inimical to the constitution.—Brand, Essay on Political Associations, p. 170.

Inimitability. s. Incapability of being imitated or copied.

Truths might have an eternal existence in some understanding; or rather they are the same with that understanding itself, considered as variously representative, according to the various modes of imitability or participation.—Norris.

Imitable, adj. Incapable of being imitated or copied.

[He] on his lyre tuned such harmonious lays,
That the birds perch'd upon the tender sprays,
Mad at his music, strain themselves so much
To imitate the imitable touch,
Breaking their hearts.

And imitate the imitable face.
Virgil copied the ancient sculptors in that ra-mable description of military fury in the temple of Janus.—Achilles, Dialogues on the Usefulness of ancient Medals.

Imitably, adv. In an imitable manner;
to a degree of excellence above imitation.

This terribly adorn'd the figures shine,
Imitably wrought with skill divine. Pope.

Iniquitous, adj. Unjust; wicked.

But while we can loudly pronounce Mary's execution to have been so wholly iniquitous and unwarranted as it has been represented, it may be admitted that a more generous nature than that of Elizabeth would not have exacted the law's full penalty.—Hallam, Constitutional History of England, vol. i. ch. iii.

Iniquity, s.

1. Injustice; unrighteousness.

There is a greater or less probability of an happy issue to a tedious war, according to the righteou-ness or iniquity of the cause for which it was commenced.—Bishop Sandridge.

2. Wickedness; crime.

Want of the knowledge of God is the cause of all iniquity amongst men.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Till God at last
Weary'd with their iniquities, withdrew
His presence from among them.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 107.

Iniquous, adj. Unjust. Rare.

Be not steadily mistaken in the equality of sinner commutatively iniquous in the value of transgressions; but weigh them in the scales of heaven;
and by the weights of righteous reason.—*Sir T.
Browne, Christian Meditations, iii. 12.*

Whatever is done through unequal affection is iniquous, wicked, and wrong.—Lord Shaftesbury, Enquiry concerning Virtue.

Inisle. See Enisle.

Initial, adj. [see Initiation.] Placed at the beginning; incipient.

a. Simply.

In the editions, which had no more than the initial letters of names, he was made by keys to hurt the inoffensive. Pope.

b. Opposed to final and medial.

Moderate labour of the body conduces to the preservation of health, and cures many initial diseases;
but the toil of the mind destroys health, and generates maladies. Haller.

The schools have used a middle term to express this affection, and have called it the initial fear of God. Rogers.

Throughout each organic sub-kingdom, there is a certain general though irregular relation between the initial and the final bulks. Richard Spencer, Inductions of Biology.

Initial, s. First letter of a name or word.

If we have sinn'd in perine down a name,
All civil, well bred authors do the same.
Survey the columns of our daily writers -
You'll find that some initials are great fighters.
How fierce the shock, how fatal is the jar,
When Knight W. meets Lieutenant H.
With four stout seconds, just of their own gizzard,
Cross Captain X. and rough old General Izzard!
Letter to letter struggle the dire alarms,
Till half the Alphabet is up in arms.
Nor with less lustre have Initials shone,
To smite the gentler animals of Crim. Con.
Where the dispensers of the public list
Soft venia give; a letter and a dash -
Where Vice reduced in size shrinks to a falling,
And loses half her cross as by curtailing.
Faux pas are told in such a modest way -
The affair of Colonel B - with Mrs. A -
You must forgive them for what is there, say,
Which such a plant Vowel must not grant
To such a very pressing Consonant?

Lamb, Prologue to Mr. H—.

Initially, adv. In an initial manner; with the character of a beginning.

Our Lord did initially and in part exercise those functions upon earth.—Barrow, vol. ii. serm. 31.

Initiate, v. a.

1. Enter; instruct in the rudiments of an art; place in a new state; put into a new society.

Providence would only initiate mankind into the useful knowledge of her treasures, leaving the rest to employ our industry.—Dr. H. More, Antidote against Atheism.

To initiate his pupil in any part of learning, an ordinary skill in the governor is enough.—Locke, Thoughts on Education.

He was initiated into half a dozen clubs before he was one and twenty.—Spectator.

No sooner was a convert initiated, but by an easy
figure, he became a new man.—Addison.

Recognizing the fact that even in the developed fish with its complex locomotive apparatus, this law of the transverse strain holds in a qualified way, we shall understand how much more it must hold in any form that may be supposed to initiate the vertebrate type. . . . And if there exists in this median portion a tissue that keeps its place with any constancy, we may expect that the differential conditions produced in it by the transverse strain, will initiate a differentiation.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology.

2. Commence; set afoot.

Many secret designs only initiated then, and not executed till long after.—*Lord Clarendon, Life,
iii. 551.*

Initiate, v. n. Do the first part; perform the first rite.

The king himself initiates to the pow'r,
Scatters with quiv'ring hand the sacred flour,
And the stream sprinkles.

Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, iii. 561.

Initiate, adj. Newly admitted; fresh, like a novice; unpractised.

My strange and self-abuse
Is the initiate fear, that wants hard use : . . .
We are yet but young in deed.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 4.

To rise in science, as in bliss,
Initiate in the secrets of the skies!
Young, Night Thoughts, night vi.

Initiation, s. Reception, admission, or entrance of a new comer into any art or state.

The ground of initiating or entering men into Christian life, is more summarily comprised in the form of baptism, the ceremony of this initiation instituted by Christ. Hammond.

Science is the first thing that is taught upon our initiation into sacred mysteries. Browne, Notion of the Gospels.

Initiation was reckoned a new and uncouth word in 1655, according to Heylin.—Todd.

Initiative, s. First active procedure in any enterprise; (as, 'He took the initiative,' i.e. gave the example, led the way, took the first step).

Initiatory, adj. Introductory.

He hath gotten to himself some insight in things ordinarily hidden, and controverted, by experience, by reading some initiatory treatises in the law.—
G. Herbert, Country Parson, ch. xviii.

It being the initiatory rite of their religion.
Dr. A. Young, On Idolatrous Corruptions in Religion, l. 16.

Initiatory, s. Introductory rite.

Baptism is a constant initiatory of the proselyte.
*L. Addison, Account of the present State of the Jews,
p. 67.*

Initio, s. [Lat. initio, -onis; from in + itin- going, from eo, ire = go; hence initium = beginning; initialis = entered on anything;

initialis = having the character of an entrance or beginning.] Beginning. Rare.

Here I note the action of my lord's friendship with Montjoy.—Sir R. Norton, Fragmenta Republice, Lord Essex.

Inject, v. a. [Lat. injectus, pass. part. of injicio, from in + jacio = cast; injection,
-ionis.]

1. Throw in; dart in.

Good thoughts are injected into us by the Holy Spirit. Archop Hall, Romaine, p. 117.
Angels inject thoughts into our minds, and know our cogitations. Glaucippe.

2. Throw up; cast up.

Though held in open field, they yet surround
The town with walls, and mound inject on mound.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey.

3. In Medicine. Throw up an injection.

Injection, s.

1. Act of casting up.

Those good injections must be received, embraced, delighted in, and followed home in a constant and habitual practice.—Bishop Hall, Romaine, p. 117.
If we be watchful presently to abhor and reject these injections of Satan, and to cast back into his face these his fiery darts which he shoots into our souls; they are not our sins, though they are our troubles.—Bishop Hopkins, Exposition of the Lord's Prayer, p. 130.

This salt powdered was, by the repeated injection of well kindled charcoal, made to flash like melted nitre.—Boyle.

2. In Medicine.

a. Fluid forced by instruments into any part of the body for therapeutic purposes.

Cases of this kind are best treated by injections.—
Winona, Surgery.

b. Art of filling the vessels with wax, or other suitable matter, to show their shapes and ramifications; i.e. for anatomical purposes.

Ruysh, famous for his skill in injections.—Hatton, Introduction to the Education of Europe in the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries.

Enjoin. See Enjoin.

Injudicious, adj. Void of judgment; without judgment; (used both of persons and things).

A philosopher would either think me in jest, or very injudicious, if I took the earth for a body regular in itself, if compared with the rest of the universe. T. Burnet, The cures of the Earth.

A sharp wit may find something in the wisest man, whereby to expose him to the contempt of injudicious people.—Technicum Tidulum.

Injudiciously, adv. In an injudicious manner; with ill judgment; not wisely.

Seneca injudiciously condemns this description,
—Brown.

Injudiciousness, s. Attribute suggested by injudicious; want of judgment.

In the sisterhood of fancy, Musick, my justly chastise a birthright, she and Painting being but younger sisters to Poetry, a binary of sisters, whether rich or poor, that stoop not to inferior souls, whose dulness dreads their delight in this second, and injudiciousness blinds their wonder or liking of the third. Whitlock, The creations on the great Manners of the English, p. 480.

Injunction, s. [Lat. jungo join; pass. part.
junctus; junctio, -onis.]

1. Command; order; precept.

The institution of God's law is described as being established by solemn injunction. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

My duty cannot suffer
To obey in all your daughter's hard commands;
Though the injunction be to bar my doors,
And let this tyrannous night take hold upon you.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 4.
For, still they knew, and ought to have still re-member'd.

The high injunction, not to taste that fruit,

Whoever tempted. Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 12.

The ceremonies of the church are necessary as the injunctions of lawful authority, the practice of the primitive church, and the general rules of decency.
—South, Sermons.

2. In Law. See extract.

Injunction is an interlocutory decree out of the chancery, sometimes to give possession unto the plaintiff for want of appearance in the defendants, sometimes to the king's ordinary court, and sometimes to the court-christian, to stay proceeding.—
Carr.

Injure, v. a. [see Injury.] Inflict an injury; harm; damage; annoy.

a. Physically.

Let heat should injure us, his timely care
Hath unobsought provided.
Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 1057.

b. Morally.

They injure by chance in a crowd, and without a design, then hate always whom they have once injured. Sir W. Temple.

Forgiveness to the injur'd does belong;
But they never pardon who commit the wrong.

Dryden, Conquest of Granada, Part II. l. 2.

Injurer, s. One who injures.

All deeds are well turn'd back upon their authors;

And 'gainst an injurer, the revenge is just.

H. Jonson.

The upright judge will countenance right, and discountenance wrong, wherever be the injurer or the sufferer.—Bishop Atterbury.

Injurious, adj.

1. Unjust; invasive of another's rights.

Till the injurious Roman did extol.

This tribute from us, we were free.

Shakespeare, Cymbeline, iii. 1.

Injurious strength would oppose the weak excuse.

By offering terms the weaker must refuse. Dryden.

2. Guilty of wrong or injury.
Yet beauty, though injurious, hath strange power,
After offence retreating, to regain
Love once possess'd. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1063.

3. Miscellaneous; unjustly hurtful.
Our repentance is not real, because we have not done what we can to undo our faults, or at least to hinder the injurious consequences of it from proceeding. Archbishop Tillotson.

4. Detractory; contumelious; reproachful;
wrongful.

A prison, indeed injurious, because a prison, but also well testifying affection, because in all respects as commensurate as a prison can be. Sir P. Sidney.
It is natural for a man, by directing his prayers to an image, to suppose the being he prays to represented by that image; which how injurious, how contumelious must it be to the glorious nature of God? South, Sermons.

If injurious appellations were of any advantage to a cause, what appellations would those deserve who endeavor to sow the seeds of sedition? Swift.

Injuriously. adv. In an injurious manner;
wrongfully; hurtfully; with injustice; with contumely.

One ought not to expect the vindication of his character, when it is injuriously attacked. Pope and Gay.

Injuriousness. s. Attribute suggested by injurious; quality of being injurious.

Some misadventures might escape, rather through undue misapprehension of state, than any propensity either to injuriousness or oppression. Eikon Basilike.

Injury. s. [Lat. injuria = act committed against anyone contrary to law, from jus,
juris.]

1. Hurt without justice.
The places were acquired by just title of victory, and therefore in keeping of them no injury was offered. Sir J. Hayward.
Riot ascends above their loftiest towers,
And injury and outrage. Milton, Paradise Lost, i. 439.

2. Mischief; detriment.
Many times we do injury to a cause, by dwelling upon trifling arguments. Watts, Logic.

3. Annoyance.
Great injuries mice and rats do in the fields. Mortimer.

4. Contumelious language; reproachful appellation. Gullicism.
Casting off the respects fit to be continued between great kings, he fell to bitter invectives against the French king; and spoke all the injuries he could devise of Charles. Bacon.

Injustice. s. Iniquity; wrong.
Cunning men can be guilty of a thousand injustices without being discovered, or at least without being punished. Swift.

Ink. s. [Fr. encre; Italian, inchostro.] Fluid employed in writing and printing.

Mean boldly my ink for while she looks upon you, your blackness will shine. Sir P. Sidney.

I could hardly restrain them from throwing the ink bottle at one another's heads. Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Ink. v. a. Black or daub with ink: (as,
'ink one's fingers).

Inkhorn. s. [supposing the spelling to be right, and the derivation to be from horn, the -h is sounded as a true aspirate. See,
however, extract from Todd.] Portable case for the instruments of writing.

Bid him bring his pen and inkhorn to the jail;
we are now to examine those wretches. Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, iii. 5.

One man among them was clothed with linen,
with a writer's inkhorn by his side. Exodus, ix. 3.

What is more frequent than to say a silver ink-horn? Grew.

Words ending in ence, ence, are derived from the Latin encre, a secret place to put anything in.
Hence comes ink-ence, i. e. a little vessel into which we put ink, for which we commonly write ink-horn, as Bishop Wilson has very justly observed. Tricoma, English Grammar, p. 212: 1722. (From Todd.)

Used adjectively. Affected; pedantic; pompous.

Such are your inkhorn terms. Rale, Yett at Course at Old Kempshe Pore, fol. 33 b. 1513.

I would wish that such usual words as English be acquainted with might still remain in their form and sound, so far forth as the Hebrew will bear;
inkhorn terms to be avoided. Bishop Cox, To Archbishop Parker, Strype's Parker, p. 206.

Used adjectively. Affected; pedantic; pom-
pous.

For that we will suffer such a price, ...
To be disgraced by an inkhorn mate,
We, and our wives, and children, all will fight.
Shakespeare, Henry VI., Part I. iii. 1.

Todd states that Bishop Hall has used inkhornisms.

Ink. s. [?] Kind of narrow fillet; tape.
Inkies, cardinals' cambricks, lawns; why he saves them over as they were gold and goddesses. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

I wish'd his quivering carter from his knee:
He wist not when the heumen string I drew,
Now mine I quickly doff of inkle blue.
Gay, Shepherd's Week, Thursday.

Inking. s. Hint; whisper; intimation.

He had a little inking, that it was a special friend of his that kyld the dove. Archbishop Cranmer, Answer to Bishop Gardiner, p. 108.

Our business is not unknown to the senate; they have had inking this fortnight what we intend to do, which now we'll show them in deeds. Shakespear, Coriolanus, i. 1.

We in Europe, notwithstanding all the remote discoveries and invasions of this last age, never heard of any of the best inking or glimpse of this island. Bacon, New Atlantis.

They had some inking of secret messages between the marquis of Newcastle and young Holman.
Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Aboard a Corinthian vessel he got an inking
among the ship's crew of a conspiracy. *Sir R.
L'Estrange*.

Inknot. See Enknot.

Inky. adj.
1. Consisting of ink.

England bound in with the triumphant sea,
Whose rocky shore beats back the envious siege
Of watery Neptune, is bound in with shame,
With inky blots, and rotten parchment bonds.
Shakespeare, Richard II. ii. 1.

2. Dark as ink.
'Tis not alone my inky cloak, good mother,
Nor customary suits of solemn black,
That can denote me truly. Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 2.

The liquor presently began to grow pretty clear and transparent, losing its inky blackness. Bayle, Experiments and Conclusions touching Colours.

Inlace; inland. See Enlace, &c.

Inland. adj.
1. Interior; lying remote from the sea.

In this wide inland sea, that heigh by name
The idle lake, my wandering ship I row.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Goodly laws, like little inland seas, will carry even ships upon their waters. Id., View of the State of Ireland.

A substitute shines brightly as a king,
Until a king be by, and then his state
Empties itself as doth an inland brook
Into the main of waters. Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, v. 1.

This person did publish a pamphlet printed in England for a special exercise of inland duty. Swift.

2. Civilised: (opposed to upland, the old expression for rustic). Obsolete.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so remote a dwelling. I have been told so of many; but, indeed, an old religious monk of mine taught me to speak, who was, in his youth an inland man. Shakespeare, As you like it,
iii. 2.

Used adverbially: (as, 'The scenery is holider further inland').

Inland. s. Interior or midland parts.

Out of these small beginnings, gotten near to the mountains, did they spread themselves into the inland. Spenser.

They of these marches shall defend
Our inland from the pillaging borderers. Shakespeare, Henry V. i. 2.

The maritime parts of countries were inhabited before the inland; that is, farther from the sea.
Warton, Dissertation of Imagined Intelligence, ch.
vi.

Men pursue some few principles which they have chanced upon, and care not to innovate, which draws unknown inconveniences.—Bacon.

Former things
Are set aside like obliterated lines;
And every moment alters what is done,
And innovates some act till then unknown.

Dryden.

2. Change by introducing novelties.

The most frequent malady among such as proceed from themselves; as first, when religion and God's service is neglected, innovated, or altered.—*Barton,
Anatomy of Mankind*, to the reader.

To introduce that for reformation which cannot appear to be restored, but may seem to be innovated.
1623

—Thorndike, Of the Forbearance of the Penalties which a due Reformation requires, p. 18.

From his attorneys upon the civil power, he proceeds to innovate God's worship.—South, Sermons.

Innovate. v. n. Introduce novelties.

Time . . . innovates greatly, but quietly, and by degrees warms to be perceived.—Bacon, Essays, of Innovations.

It is a matter of great concernment towards the edification of the church, to obey our superiors, not to innovate in publick forms of worship.—Jerry Taylor, Discourse on extempore Prayer, § 27.

Innovation. s. Change by the introduction of novelty.

The love of things ancient doth argue slowness; but levity and want of experience maketh apt unto innovations.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Great changes may be made in a government, yet the form continue; but large intervals of time must pass between every such innovation, enough to make it of a piece with the constitution.—Swift.

Innovators. s.

1. Introducer of novelties.

I attach thee as a temerarious innovator, A foe to th' public weal.

He that will not apply new remedies must expect new evils; for time is the greatest innovator; and if time of course alter things to the worst, and wisdom and counsel shall not alter them to the better, what shall be the end?—Bacon, Essays.

2. One who makes changes by introducing novelties.

He counsels them to detest and prosecute all innovators of divine worship.—South, Sermons.

Innoxious. adj.

1. Free from mischievous effects.

Innoxious flames are often seen on the hair of men's heads and horses' manes.—Sir K. Dylen.
We may safely use purgatives, they being benign, and of innocuous qualities.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Sent by the better equies of the night,
Innoxious cleansing on the horse's mane,
The meteor sits.—Timson, Seasons, Autumn.

2. Pure from crimes; harmless; doing no harm.

Another sort of these (spirits) there are which frequent foreign houses; which the Italians call foliots, most part innocuous.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 17.

Stranger to civil and religious rage,
The good man walk'd innocuous through his rage.

Pope, Epistle to Arbuthnot.

Innoxiously. adv. In an innoxious manner; harmlessly; without harm done; without harm suffered.

Animals that can innocuously digest those poisons become antitoxal to the poison digested.—Sir Z. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Innuendo. s. [Italian, innuendo, from Lat. innuendū, gerund of innuo; pres. part. innuens—nod, notify or suggest by a nod, intimate.] Indirect hint.

As if the commandments that require obedience and forbid murder were to be indicted for a libelous innuendo upon all the great men that come to be concerned.—Sir R. L. Estlin.

Mercury, though employed on a quite contrary errand, owns it a marriage by an innuendo.—Dryden.

Pursue your trade of scandal picking,
Your hints that Stella is no chicken;
Your innuendoes, when you tell us,
That Stella loves to talk with B. flows.

Swift, Stella's Birthday.

Innuent. adj. Significant. Rare.

He may apply his mind to heraldry, antiquity, innuents of impresses, emblems.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 222.

Innumerable. s. Incapability of being numbered.

He rejected this innumerable of causes.—Fletcher, Alchemaster, p. 217: 1622.

Innumerable. adj. Incapable of being numbered.

You have sent innumerable substances To furnish Rome, and to prepare the ways You have for dignity.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 25.
Cover me, ye plums,
Ye cedars! with innumerable tongues,
Hide me, where I may never see them more.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1088.

In lines which appear of an equal length, one may be longer than the other by innumerable parts.—Locke.

Innumeros. adj. Too many to be counted.

'Tis said of some places yet, some little cheering,
In this close dungeon of innumeros hours.

Milton, Comus, 315.

Innumeros mischiefs then to mischiefs adds.

Dr. H. More, None of the Soul, iii. 4, 32.
Keep back those innumeros concupiscences, and corrupt imaginations violently succeeding each other.—Spiritual Conflict, pt. ii. p. 58: 1651.

Innutrition. s. [The n double in sound as well as spelling.] Want of nutrition.

From the morphological differentiations caused by sickness of nutrition which the whole plant feels, we pass now to those which are thus caused in some of its parts and not in others. Among such are the contrast between flowering axes, and the axes that bear leaves only. It has already been shown that the belief expressed by Wolff in a direct connexion between fructification and innutrition, is justified inductively by many facts of many kinds. Deductively too, we saw reason to conclude that such a relation would be established by survival of the fittest; seeing that it would profit a species for its members to begin sending off migrating germs from the ends of those axes which innutrition prevented from further apogonetic multiplication. Once more, when considering the nature of the phenocenic axis, we found support for this belief in the fact that the components of a flower exhibit a reversion to that type from which the phenocenic type has probably arisen—a reversion which the laws of embryology would lead us to look for where innutrition had arrested development. Hence, then, we may properly count those deviations of structure which constitute inflorescence, as among the morphological differentiations produced by local innutrition.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xii. § 240.

Inobedience. s. Disobedience.

Disobedience to this call of Christ.—Bishop Hall, Sermons, p. 8: 1623.

Inobservance. s. Want of observance; disobedience; heedlessness; negligence; disregard.

The breach and inobservance of certain wholesome and politic laws.—Bacon.

A dull and stupid inobservance of such examples of divine justice . . . stands often arraigned in Scripture as a very great sin.—J. Spencer, Discourse concerning Prodigia, p. 326.

Sluggishness, and inobservance of God's seasons and opportunities.—Hammond, Works, iv. 574.

Indelicacy commonly proceed from negligence, or drowsy inobservance and carelessness.—Bartholomew, Exposition on the Creed.

Inobservation. s. Want of observation.

These writers are in all this guilty of the most shameful inobservation.—Shuckford, On the Creation, p. 115.

Inoculate. v. n. [Lat. oculus—eye.] Propagate any plant, by inserting its bud into another stock; practise inoculation; In-eye (for which it is the Latin equivalent).

Nor are the ways alike in all
How to engrave, how to inoculate.

May, Translation of the Georgics.
Now is the season for the budding of the cranes: trees inoculate therefore at the commencement of this month.—Evelyn.

But various are the ways to change the state,
To plant, to bud, to graft, to inoculate.
Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 102.

Inoculate. v. a.

1. Yield a bud to another stock.

Virtue cannot so inoculate our old stock, but we shall relish of it.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, iii. 1.

Oh, for that Palestine vine, late inoculated with a precious bud of our royal stem!—Bishop Hall, Works, ii. 288.

The end of love is to have two made one
In will, and in affection, that the minds
Be first inoculated, not the bodies.

H. Jonson, New Ian.

Thy stock is too much out of date,
For tender plants to inoculate.

Cleaveland.

2. Infect with the small pox by inoculation.

The child once burnt dreads the fire; he runs away from the surgeon by whom he was inoculated.—Reid.

Inoculation. s.

1. In Horticulture. Act of inserting the eye of a bud into another stock; Ineyeing.

Inoculation is practised upon all sorts of stone-fruit, and upon oranges and jasmynes. Choose a smooth part of the stock; then with your knife make a horizontal cut across the rim of the stock, and from the middle of that cut make a slit downwards, about two inches in length in the form of a T; but be careful not to cut too deep, lest you wound the stock; then having cut off the leaf from the bud, leaving the foot-stalk remaining, make a cross cut about half an inch below the eye, and with your knife slit off the bud, with part of the wood to it. This done, with your knife pull off that part of the wood which was taken with the bud, observing whether the eye of the bud be left to it or not; for all these buds which lose their eyes in stripping, are good for nothing; then raising the bark of the stock, thrust the bud therein, placing it smooth between the rim and the wood of the stock; and so having exactly fitted the bud to the stock, tie them closely round, taking care not to bind round the eye of the bud.—Milner.

In the stem of obolium they all met and came to be inserted all upon one stock, most of them by inoculation.—Howell.

2. In Medicine. Creation of a disease by the intentional introduction into the system of some morbid poison; especially for the purposes of prophylaxis, as in the inoculation for the small pox.

It is evident, by inoculation, that the smallest quantity of the matter, mixed with the blood, produces the disease.—A. Reithus.

Inoculator. s. One who inoculates.

a. In Horticulture.

b. In Medicine.

Had John a Gadsden been now living, he would have been at the head of the inoculator.—Freind, History of Physics.

Inodiate. v. a. [Lat. odium—hatred.] Make hateful. Rare.

He infects them [enemies] . . . partly to give the world fresh demonstrations of his hatred of sin, and partly to inodiate and inhibit sin to the classed sinner.—South, Sermons, vi. 224.

Inodiating. part. adj. Having a tendency to render hateful. Rare.

The ancients members of her communion, who have all along owned and contended for a strict conformity to her rules and sanctions, as the surest course to establish her, have been of late represented, or rather reprobated, under the inodiating character of high churchmen.—South, Indication to Archbishop Marsh.

Inodorate. adj. Having no scent.

Whites are more inodorate than flowers of the same kind coloured.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Inodorous. adj. Wanting scent; not affecting the nose.

The white of an egg is a viscous, inactive, insipid, inodorous liquor.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Foods.

A great number of bodies are inodorous; and of the rest, the majority cannot be perceived to have any smell, unless held quite close to the nostrils. Things that are almost scentless at low temperatures will become strongly scented at high ones; and things that have strong scents become for a time relatively scentless if continuously smelt at.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Inoffensive. adj.

1. Giving no scandal; giving no provocation.

A stranger, inoffensive, unprovoking.—Fletcher, Good.
However inoffensive we may be in other parts of our conduct, if we are found wanting in this trial of our love, we shall be deserved by God as traitors.—Keble.

2. Giving no unkindness; causing no terror.

Should infants have taken offence at any thing, mixing pleasant and agreeable appearances with it must be used, till it be grown inoffensive to them.—Locke.

3. Harmless; hurtless; innocent.

The deists, and other santon or enthusiasts, being in the crowd, express their zeal by turning round so long together, and with such softness, as will hardly be credited, which by custom is made inoffensive.—Sir T. H. Clark, Relation of some Hard Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 326.

For drink the emper
She crushes, inoffensive must.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 314.

With whet'er gall thou wilt thyself to write,
Thy inoffensive satures never bite.

Dryden, MacFlecknoe, 192.

4. Unembarrassed; without stop or obstruction. Latinism.

From hence a passage broad,
Smooth, easy, inoffensive, down to hell.

Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 304.

No have I seen a river gently glide
In a smooth course, and inoffensive tide;
But if with dams its current we restrain,
It tears down all, and tears along the plain.

Addison, Translation from Ovid.

Inoffensively. adv. In an inoffensive manner; without appearance of harm; without harm.

Though were she [Poetry] a more unworthy mistress, I think she might be inoffensively served with the broken measures of our twelve o'clock hours, which hourly service she only claimed and found of me for that short while of my attendance.—Bishop Hall, Postscript to his Satires.

This vulgar air... appears to be an excellent balsam, containing the virtues of most other balsams, which it easily imparts to water, and by that means readily and inoffensively insinuates them into the habit of the body.—Bishop Berkeley, Niria, § 10.

Inoffensiveness. s. Attribute suggested by Inoffensive; harmlessness; freedom from appearance of harm.

What is the ground of this pretended inoffensiveness?—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 130.

Inofficious. adj. Not civil; not attentive to the accommodation of others.

Up, thou tame river, wake;
And from thy liquid limbs this slumber shake:
Thou drown'st thyself in inofficious sleep.

R. Johnson, Part of the King's Entertainment.

Inoperation. s. Production of effects; agency; influence.

Here is not a cold and feeble prevention, but an effectual inoperation, yea, a powerful evan.—Bishop Hall, Honour of married Clergy, p. 74.

A true temper of a quiet and peaceable estate of the soul upon good grounds can never be attained without the inoperation of that Holy Spirit, from whom every good gift, and every perfect giving proceedeth.—Bishop Hall, Of Contemplation, § 25.

Inoperative. adj. Wanting operation or action.

The process by which 'mouse' was changed into 'mice,' and 'spoke' into 'spokes,' are now inoperative.—Dr. R. G. Latham, The English Language.

Inopinate. adj. [Recent doubtful.]—Lat. inopinatus; inopinatus. Unexpected.

An ancient philosopher, named Diogenes, had collected together how many ruins had happened in diverse countries by reason of the inopinate multitude of beasts.—Time's Store-house, 78, 2. (Ord MS.)
Casual and inopinate cases, as wounds, poisons, burnings, plagues, and other popular harms.—Ibid., 760, 2. (Ord MS.)

Inopportune. adj. Unsensational; inconvenient.

No visit could have been more inopportune.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Inopportune. adv. Unreasonably; inconveniently.

That holy exercise may not be done inopportune.—Thomas, Poems, Letter to Sir H. G., p. 250.

You have taken me, said he, rather inopportune to-day.—Dialogues on the Amusements of Clergy-men, p. 206.

Inordinacy. s. Irregularity; disorder.

Inordinacy and immorality of mind.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 145.

O powerful God, on those of us who are yet unregenerate, bestow thy restraining grace, which may curb and stop our natural inordinacy.—Hammond, Works, iv. 488.

They become very sinful by the excess, which were not so in their nature: that inordinacy sets them in opposition to God's designation.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Inordinate. adj. Irregular; disorderly; deviating from right.

These people were wisely brought to allegiance; but being straight left unto their own inordinate life, they forgot what before they were taught.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Thence raise

At least distempered, discontented thoughts;

Vain hopes, vain aims, inordinate desires,

Blown up with high conceits, engendering pride.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 504.

From inordinate love and vain fear comes all unquietness of spirit.—Jeremy Taylor, Guide to Devotion.

Inordinately. adv. Irregularly; not rightly.

As soon as a man desires any thing inordinately, he is presently disquieted in himself.—Jeremy Taylor.

Inordinateness. s. Attribute suggested by Inordinate; want of regularity (especially on the side of excess); intemperance of any kind.

Out of pusillanimity or inordinateness a man prostitute himself to these unworthy conditions and actions of sinful pleasure, that misbecome a man, a Christian.—Bishop Hall, Fall of Pride.

These good things which we abuse to sin by the inordinateness of our minds.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Happiness, p. 34.

Inordination. s. Want of subordination and regularity; deviation from right. Obsolete.

This is inordination of soul.—Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 185.

Schoolmen and casuists, having too much philosophy to clear a lie from that intrinsic inordin-

tion and deviation from right reason, inherent in the nature of it, hold that a lie was absolutely and universally sinful.—South, Sermons.

Inorganic. adj. Void of organs or parts concerned in vital functions; destitute of, not characterised by, organization. Chiefly applied to the Animal and Vegetable Kingdom, as opposed to the Mineral. Organic in Chemistry denotes the doctrine of those combinations which are produced by animals and vegetables, as opposed to minerals and the results of the chemist's laboratory. These constitute the Inorganic division of the science.

(For example see Mineral.)

Inorganical. adj. Destitute of organization.

Whether it be organical or inorganical.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 26.

Many of these mushroom seeds are like those inorganical creatures bred upon the banks of Nilus, which perished quickly, after they were bred, for want of fit organs.—Archbishop Lincoln, Schism Guarded, p. 354.

We come to the lowest and the most inorganical parts of matter.—Locke.

Inosculation. v. n. [Lat. osculation]; pref. part. of oscular; oscularum - kiss; os - mouth.] Unite by mouths, or ducts, i. e. as by a kiss; (it generally applies to a complex system of intercommunications, the complexity being denoted by in - in and in; the construction is reflective or reciprocal, rather than truly neuter.)

This fifth conjugation of nerves is branched by inosculation with nerves.—Achard, Physico-Theology.

Inosculation. v. a. Insert by inosculation.

It is an opinion, received by many, that the sap circulates in plants as the blood in animals; that it ascends through capillary arteries in the trunk, into which are inosculation other vessels of the bark answering to veins.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 34.

Inosculation. s. Union by mouths, or ducts, or intercommunications.

The almost infinite ramifications and inosculation of all the several sorts of vessels may easily be detected by glasses.—Kap.

Inosculation. v. a. Insert by inosculation.

It is an opinion, received by many, that the sap circulates in plants as the blood in animals; that it ascends through capillary arteries in the trunk, into which are inosculation other vessels of the bark answering to veins.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 34.

Inosculation. s. Union by mouths, or ducts, or intercommunications.

The almost infinite ramifications and inosculation of all the several sorts of vessels may easily be detected by glasses.—Kap.

Inquest. s. [N. Fr. inquire.—see Inquire.] 1. Judicial inquiry or examination.

What confusion of face shall we be under, when that grand inquest begins; when an account of our opportunities of doing good, and a particular of our use or misuse of them, is given in?—Bishop Atterbury.

2. Inquiry; search; study.

This is the laborious and vexatious inquest that the soul must make after science.—South.

In Law. See extract.

The inquest of jurors, or by jury, is the most usual trial of all causes, both civil and criminal; for in civil causes, after proof is made on either side, so much as each party thinks good for himself, if the doubt be in the fact, it is referred to the discretion of twelve indifferent men, impelled by the sheriff; and as they bring in their verdict so judgement passes; for the judge saith, the jury finds the fact; thus, then is the law thus, and so we judge.—Cowell.

Inquiet. v. a. Disquiet; trouble; disturb; (spelt with e). Rare.

Conscience confoundeth the reason, it croaketh the will, and inquieteth the soul.—Bishop Fisher, Examination of the Seven penitential Psalms.

Inquietation. s. Disturbance; annoyance. Obsolete.

How many seemly personages, by outrage in riot, gaming, and excess of apparayle, be enticed to theft and robbery, and sometime to murder; to the inquietation of good men, and finally to their own destruction.—Sir T. Eggot, The Governour, fol. 101, b.

Inquietude. s. Disturbed state; want of quiet; attack on the quiet.

Having had such experience of his fidelity and observance abroad, he found himself engaged in honour to support him at home from any further inquietude.—Sir H. Wallon.

With far less of inquietude

Than courtiers at a banquet would.

Byron, Mazeppa.

Inquisite. v. a. [Lat. inquisitus; pass. part. of inquirere.] Pollute; corrupt. Rare.

An old opinion it was, that the fish feeding upon serpents, that venomous food so inquisite their oval conceptions, that they sometimes came forth in serpentine shapes.—Sir T. Browne.

Inquisition. s. Corruption; pollution. Rare.

Their causes and axioms are so full of imagination, and so infected with the old received theories, as they are mere inquisitions of experience, and cannot be true.—Bacon.

An exception from the inquisitions of youth.—W. Montague, Discourse of Knowledge, pt. i. pref. (See also, under Inconcoct.)

Inquirable. adj. Capable of being inquired into.

There be many more things inquirable by you.—Bacon.

The second thing inquirable, is, who it was that brought him forth; and that was Scholastic, the priest.—Turner, Sermons, p. 3; 1061.

Inquire. v. n. [Lat. inquirere; in + quero = ask; pres. part. inquirens, -entis; pass. part. inquisitus (whence Fr. inquire, and English inquest); inquisitio, -onis.]

1. Ask questions; exert curiosity on any occasion.

a. With of before the person asked.

Herald... inquired of them diligently.—Matthew, ii. 7.

Under their erstful shade, known sate,
Revolving war's events and various fate,
His left young Phyllis kept, fix'd to his side,
And oft of winds inquir'd, and of the tide
Origen, Translation of the Æneid, x. 235.

b. With after or for before an object of search.

Inquire for our Soul of Tarsus.—Acts, ix. 11.
They are more in danger to go out of the way who are marching under a guide that will mislead them, than he that is likely to be prevailed on to inquire after the right way.—Locke.

c. With about, when fuller intelligence is desired.

To those who inquired about me, my lover would answer, that I was an old dependent upon his family.—Swift.

2. Make examination: (with into). In the second extract it is a Latinism, translating 'Filius ante diem patrius inquirat in annos.' It may deserve our best skill to inquire into those rules, by which we may guide our judgement.—South, Sermons.

The sleep-lulling poison for the son inquires; The son inquires into his father's years.

Dryden, Translation from Ovid.

Inquire. v. a.

1. Ask about; seek out: (as, 'He inquired the way'.)

2. Call; name. Obsolete.

Canute had his portion from the rood,
The which he call'd Canutus, for his hire,
Now Canutus, which Kent we commonly inquire.
Spenser, Faerie Queene.

Inquiring. adj. Inquiring into; wishing to know. Rare.

As in a garden, roses, of hives above,
Inquiring, curious.—Shenstone, Economy, pt. ii.

Inquirer. s. One who inquires; searcher; examiner; curious and inquisitive person; questioner.

This is a question only of inquirers, not disputers, who neither affirm nor deny, but examine.—Locke.

Inquiry. s.

1. Interrogation; search by question.

The men which were sent from Cornelius had made inquiry for Simon's house, and stood before the gate.—Acts, x. 17.

2. Examination; search.

This exactness is absolutely necessary in inquiries after philosophical knowledge, and in controversies about truth.—Locke.

Inquisition. s.

1. Judicial inquiry.

When he maketh inquisition for blood, he remembereth them: he forgetteth not the cry of the humble.—Psalm, ix. 12.

Though it may be impossible to recollect every fact, yet you are so far to exercise an inquisition upon yourself, as, by observing lesser particulars, you may the better discover what the corruption of your nature ways you to.—Jeremy Taylor.

By your good leave,

These men will be your judges: we must stand

• The inquisition of their railway

On our condition. Southey.

2. Examination; discussion.

We were willing to make a quidnunc or precedent of an exact inquisition.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

It is the part of a discreet and wise patient not to leave this inquisition only to the physician.—Fotherby, Aethiopic, p. 234.

An inquisition and collation of several means.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 37.

3. In Law. Manner of proceeding in matters criminal, by the office of the judge.

4. Court established in certain Roman Catholic countries for the detection of heresy; (generally as a proper name with the definite article, i.e. the Inquisition).

Now we are upon the subject of torture, it is impossible to forget that depth of Satan, the Inquisition; for Satanical it is by the conjunction of three qualities; indefatigable diligence, profound subtlety, and inhuman cruelty.—Trapp, Popery Stated, &c. pt. ii. § 12.

Inquisitorial. adj. Busy in inquiry.

If the amendment of manners be aimed at, look into Italy and Spain, whether those places be one scruple the better, the honest, the wiser, the chaster, after all the inquisitorial rigor that hath been executed upon books.—Milton, Arcopagitica, 384. (Ord MS.)

By these and other means, no less politic and inquisitorial, popery has found out the art of making men miserable in spite of their senses.—Stearns, Sermons, xxviii.

Inquisitive. adj. Curious; busy in search; active to pry into anything.

My boy at eighteen years became inquisitive After his brother.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, i. 1. This idleness, together with fear of imminent mischief, have been the cause that the Irish were ever the most inquisitive people after news of any nation in the world.—Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

He is not inquisitive into the reasonableness of indifferent and innocent commands.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of Holy Living.

It can be no duty to write his heart upon his forehead, and to give all the inquisitive and malicious world a survey of those thoughts, which is the prerogative of God only to know.—South, Sermons.

The whole neighbourhood grew inquisitive after my name and character.—Addison, Spectator. A wise man is not inquisitive about things impertinent.—Brown.

Inquisitiveness. s. Attribute suggested by Inquisitive; curiosity; diligence to pry into things hidden.

Though he thought inquisitiveness an uncomely guest, he could not but ask who she was.—Sir F. Smith.

Heights that scorn our prospect, and depths in which reason will never touch the bottom, yet surely the pleasure arising from hence is great and noble; for as much as they afford perpetual matter to the inquisitiveness of human reason, and we are large enough for it to take its full scope and range in.—South, Sermons.

Providence, delivering great conclusions to us, designed to excite our curiosity and inquisitiveness after the methods by which things were brought to pass.—Brown.

Curiosity in children nature has provided, to remove that ignorance they were born with; which, without this busy inquisitiveness, will make them dull.—Locke.

Inquisitor. s.

1. One who examines judicially.

In these particulars I have played myself the inquisitor, and that nothing contrary to religion or manners, but rather medicinal.—Bacon, Essays. Mines, the strict inquisitor, appears.

And lives and crimes with his assessors hears.—Dryden.

2. One who is over curious and inquisitive: (in the extract it translates persecutor, as found in a well-known Latin quotation).

Inquisitors are taskers.—Felltham, Rhetoric, ii. 31.

3. Officer in the Roman Catholic courts of inquisition, or the Inquisition.

The inquisitors in Spain charged all honest women and matrons, that had been solicited by their ghastly fathers unto adultery, to confess the same before them.—Fulke, Against Allen, p. 232: 1564.

Inquisitorial. adj. With the severity of an inquisitor.

Liberal and inquisitorial abuse.—Archdeacon Macbarnes.

He conferred on it a kind of inquisitorial and censorial power even over the laity, and directed it to inquire into all matters of conscience.—Hume, History of England, vol. iii. p. 238. (Ord MS.)

Inquisitorial. adj. With the prying severity of an inquisitor: (Inquisitorial commoner).

Under whom inquisitorial and tyrannical dunce, no free and splendid wit can ever flourish.—Milton, Reason of Church Government urged against Prebacy, b. ii.

Insa, Inregister. See Enraill, &c. Inroad. s. Incursion; sudden and desultory invasion.

Many hot inroads

They make in Italy.

Shakespeare, Antony and Cleopatra, i. 4. From Scotland we have had in former times some alarms, and inroads into the northern parts of this kingdom.—Bacon.

By proof we feel Our power sufficient to disturb his heaven, And with perpetual inroads to alarm, Though inaccessible his fatal throne.

The loss of Shrewsbury exposed all North Wales to the daily inroads of the enemy.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

The country open lay without defence; For poets frequent inroads there had made.

Dryden. All Englishmen who valued liberty and law, saw with uneasiness the deep inroad which the prerogative had made into the province of the legislature.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. ii.

Insafe. See Ensafe.

Insafty. s. Want of safety; hazard; insecurity. Rare.

Apprehending the insafty and danger of an intermarriage with the blood royal.—Sir R. Naunton, Fragmenta Regalia.

Insalubrity. s. Unwholesomeness.

To make us more sure of the insalubrity of this place.—Girgory, Posthumus, p. 6: 1620. Socrates shows the cause of the insalubrity of a passage between two mountains in Armenia.—T. Warton, History of English Poetry, iii. 62.

Insaune. s. j. [Lat. insanus.]

1. Mad.

As most men perceive the faults of others without being aware of their own, so insaune people easily detect the nonsense of other madmen, without being able to discover, or even to be made sensible of, the incorrect associations of their own ideas.—Haslam, On Madness and Melancholy, ch. vii.

2. Making mad.

Were such things here as we do speak about? Or have we eaten of the insane root, That takes the reason prisoner?—Shakespeare, Macbeth, i. 3.

Insaunate. v. a. Make mad. Rare.

The conceit only is able to kill, like a mad dog's biting, that not only wounds the body but insaunate the soul.—Felltham, Rhetoric, ii. 5. (Ord MS.) Both not the distemper of the body insaunate the soul?—Ibid., 64. (Ord MS.)

Insafty. v. a. Make mad; madden. Rare.

There may be at present some very respectable men at the head of these maniacs, who would insafty them with some degree of prudence, and keep them only half mad if they could.—Sydney Smith.

Insafty. s. Want of sound mind; madness. In Medicine and Psychology it is the usual generic term for those mental diseases of which mania, monomania, dementia, &c., are species.

There is a partial insafty, and a total insafty.—Sir M. Hale.

All power of fancy over reason is a degree of insafty.—Johnson, Rhetoric, ch. xliii.

Insaftory. adj. [Lat. sapor - savour, flavour, taste.] Insipid. Rare.

However ingrate or insaftory it seems at first, it becomes grate and delicious enough by custom.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 311.

Insaftability. s. Incapability of being satisfied.

Exposure for increase of possession deludes the soul; and we sink into the gulfs of insaftability, only because we do not sufficiently consider, that all need is very soon supplied, and all real danger of its invasion easily precluded.—Rambler. (Ord MS.)

Insaftable. adj. Incapable of being satisfied; greedy so as not to be satisfied.

The sight is of all the other senses the most comprehensive and insaftable.—South, Sermons, x. 361.

Insaftableness. s. Attribute suggested by Insaftable; greediness not to be appeased.

Both pleasures and profits, if way be given to them, have too much power to delude the mind, and to work it to a kind of insaftableness.—Bishop Hall, On Contentation, § 23.

Some men's hydropic insaftableness had led up to third the more, by how much more they drank.—Eikon Basilike.

Insaftably. adv. In an insaftable manner; with greediness not to be appeased.

They were extremely ambitious, and insaftably covetous; and therefore no impression, from argument or miracles, could reach them.—South, Sermons.

Insaftate. adj. Greedy so as not-to be satisfied.

My mother went with child Of that insaftate Edward.

Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 3.

Insatiate to pursue Vain war with heaven, Too oft his side.

And hellish discord, and insatiate thirst Of others' rights, our quiet discompos'd.—J. Phillips.

Insaftatiely. adv. In an insatiate manner; insatiably.

He [Mahomet] was so insaftatiely blididous, that he is not ashamed to countenance his incontinency by a law.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 321.

Insaftiety. s. State of being unsatiated.

A confirmation of this insaftiety, and consequently unprofitableness by a cause the reverse: "When goods increase, they are increased that eat them."—Granger, Commentary on Ecclesiastes, p. 123: 1621.

Insaftisfaction. s. Want; unsatisfied state. Obsolete.

It is a profound contemplation in nature, to consider of the emptiness or insaftisfaction of several bodies, and of their appetite to take in others.—Bacon, Natrkal and Experimental History.

Insafturable. adj. Incapable of being saturated, glutted, or filled.

Enemies to all dignity, whose hatred is insafturable, whose malice is enkindled, whose indignation is implacable against this settled and prosperous estate of the church.—Tranker, Fabric of the Church, p. 115: 1604.

Insaftience. s. Want of science in the sense of information or knowledge.

Whole armies, at first dismayed at the sight of an eclipse, as a prodigy, have by a favourable interpretation of that prodigy, by help of their insaftience of the natural cause, been animated to that height of courage, as they have defeated their adversaries.—Christian Religion's Appeal to the Bar of Reason, p. 3. (Ord MS.)

Insaftence. See Ensaftence.

Inscribe. v. a. [Lat. scribo - write, pass. part. scriptus; inscriptio, -onis. Under the first three headings the in- means simply in; in the fourth it seems to mean within.]

1. Write on anything.

In all you writ to Rome, or else To foreign princes, 'Ego et rex meus' Was still inscribed.—Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2. Constant principles are in themselves highly reasonable, and deducible by a strong process of reasoning to be most true; and consequently the high exercise of ratiocination ought, since their truth, though there were no such originally inscribed in the mind.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

Ye weeping loved the stream with myrtle side, And break your bows as when Adonis died; And with your golden darts, now useless grown, Inscribe a verse on this relenting stone.

Pope, Pastorals, Winter.

2. Mark anything with writing: (as, 'I inscribed the stone with my name').

3. Dedicate informally.

One ode, which pleased me in the reading, I have attempted to translate in Pindarick verse: 'is that which is inscribed to the present earl of Rochester.—Dryden.

4. Draw a figure within another.

In the circle inscribe a square.—Notes to Creech's Translation of Mandrin.

Inscriber. s. One who inscribes.

I should then hope to be taught from such learning and knowledge what all those elementary characters, and lineal diagrams, meant to express, which Kiercher has passed by unnoticed, as though making no part of the inscriber's intention.—Pownall, On Antiquities, p. 24.

Inscription. s.

1. Something written or engraved.

This variety of praise in time to come, Those long inscriptions crowded on the tomb.

Dryden.

2. Title; heading.

Joabertus by the same title led our expectation, whereby we reaped no advantage, it answering scarce at all the promise of the inscription.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

3. In Law.

[An] inscription [is] an obligation made in writing, whereby the accuser binds himself to undergo the same punishment, if he shall not prove the crime which he objects to the party accused, in his accusatory libel, as the defendant himself ought to suffer, if the same be proved.—Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

4. Informal dedication of a book.

Inscriptive. adj. Having the nature or character of, or bearing, an inscription.

Inscriptio nonnumquam in a faneled abbey.—Pur-suits of Literature.

Inscrûl. See Enscroll.

Inscrutability. s. [Lat. scrutor, pret. part. scrutatus = search out.] Incapability of being discovered, or traced out.

His theological conceptions were always, I confess, to me, who yet affect some insight into the human character, one of the inscrutabilities of mystery.—Walsfield, Memoirs, p. 130.

Inscrutable. adj. Incapable of being searched out; not to be traced out by inquiry or study.

O just unseen, inscrutable, invisible,
As a nose on a man's face, or weather-rock on a steep.

Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, ii. 1.
This king had a large heart, inscrutable for good, and was wholly bent to make his kingdom and people happy.—Bacon.

Inscûp. v. a. [Lat. sculpô, pass. part. sculptus; insculpiô, -onis; sculptura.] Engrave; cut. Rare.

The third vessel was made of lead, and thereupon was inscûp'd this poetry.—Translation of the Gesta Romanorum.

A coin that bears the figure of an angel
Stamped in gold; but that's inscûp'd upon.
Shakespeare, Merchant of Venice, ii. 7.

Inscûption. s. Inscription. Obsolete.

What is it to have
A flatterine, false, inscûption on a tomb,
And in men's hearts reproach?

Turner, Revenge's Tragedy.

Inscûpture. s. Anything engraved. Rare.

Enscûp'd upon the very hem of thy swan;
And on the gravestone this inscûpture, which
With wax I brought away.

Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, v. 3.
It was usual to wear rings on either hand; but when precious gems and rich inscûptures were added, the custom of wearing them was translated unto the left.—Sir T. Browne.

Inscûm, Inscûrch. See Enscam, &c.

Insect. s. [Lat. insectus, pass. part. from in + seco = cut; insepar, in Greek, whence entomology, has the same derivation, i.e. in + toph = cutting.] Class of animals so called, forming a division of the annulose or articulated subkingdom, the name being taken from two conspicuous segments of the body, the first dividing the head from the thorax, the second the thorax from the abdomen (well shown in the wasp).

Insecta may be considered together as one great tribe of animals: they are called insecta from a separation in the middle of their bodies, whereby they are cut into two parts which are joined together by a small ligature, as we see in wasps and common flies.—Locke.

Beast, bird, insect, or worm, durst enter none.
Milton, Paradise Lost, li. 704.

Used adjectivally in the not uncommon sense of short-lived or ephemeral.

In ancient times the sacred plough employ'd
The kings, and awful fathers of mankind;
And some with whom compar'd, your insect tribes
Are but the beings of a summer's day. Thomson.

Insected. adj. Having the segments of an insect.

We can hardly endure the sting of that small insected animal, [the bee].—Huvel, Familiar Letters, li. 6.

Insectile. [? accent.] adj. Having the nature of insects.

Insectile animals, for want of blood, run all out into legs.—Bacon.

Insectile. s. Insectile animal. Rare.

The ant, and silk-worm, and many such insectile.
—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 264.

Insectivorous. adj. [Lat. vor = devour.]

Feeding on insects.

No approach to torpidity with loss of animal temperature has been determined to take place in any bird. The insectivorous kinds migrate—swifts and swallows, &c., to and fro between England and Africa; and migration is performed by numerous other birds in relation to localities furnishing the food most appropriate for the nourishment of their newly-hatched young. Experiments have failed to induce torpidity in birds through artificial cold.—Owen, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Insectôloger. s. [Lat. insecta + Gr. lôgus.]

Entomologist. Barbarous.

The insect itself is, according to modern insectôlogers, of the ichneumon-fly kind.—Latham, Physico-Theology.

Insecûre. adj. [Lat. securus, from cura = care; the etymological meaning is less safety than the sense of safety, i.e. the freedom from care which safety ensures. See Secure.]

1. Not secure; not confident of safety.

He is liable to a great many inconveniences every moment of his life, and is continually insecure not only of the good things of this life, but even of life itself.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Not safe.

Am I going to build on precarious and insecure foundations?—Bishop Hurd.

Insecûrely. adv. In an insecure manner; without certainty.

When I say insecure, I mean it in the sense in which the word should always be understood at courts, that is insecurely.—Lord Chesterfield.

Insecûrity. s.

1. Want of security or confidence.

It may easily be perceived with what insecûrity of truth we ascribe effects, depending upon the natural period of time, unto arbitrary calculations, and such as vary at pleasure.—Sir T. Browne.

2. Want of safety; danger; hazard.

The unreasonableness and presumption, the danger and desperate insecûrity of those that have not so much as a thought, all their lives long, to advance so far as attrition and contrition, sorrow, and resolution of amendment.—Hammond.

Insecûtion. s. [Lat. insecûor = follow, follow up; pret. part. secutus; insecutio, -onis.] Pursuit. Obsolete.

Not the king's own horse got more before the wheel
Of his rich chariot, that might still the suggestion feel
With the extreme hairs of his tail.

Chapman, Translation of the Iliad.

Insecûate. adj. Stupid; wanting thought; wanting sensibility.

Ye be reprobrate; obdurate, insecûate creatures.—Hammond.

So fond are mortal men,
As their own ruin on themselves invite,
Insecûate left, or to sense reprobate,
And with blindness internal struck.

Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1682.
Every fresh war was the result of His special interference: it was not caused by the meddling folly or insecûate ambition of statesmen, but it was the immediate work of the Deity, who was thus made responsible for all the devastations, the murders, and other crimes more horrible still, which war produces.—Jacobs, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. v.

Insensibility. s. Want of sensibility, sensation, or sense; inability to perceive.

Insensibility of slow motions may be thus accounted for: motion cannot be perceived without perception of the parts of space which it left, and those which it next acquires.—Glaucille.

Insensible. adj.

1. Imperceptible; not discoverable by the senses.

What is that word honour? air; a trim reckoning.
Who hath it? he that died a Wednesday. Doth he feel it? no. Doth he hear it? no. Is it insensible then? yes, to the dead; but will it live with the living? no. Why? destruction will not suffer it.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I., v. 1.

Two small and almost insensible pricks were found upon Cleopatra's arm.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The dense and bright light of the circle will obscure the rare and weak light of these dark colours round about it, and render them almost insensible.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

2. Slowly gradual; so that no progress is perceived.

They fall away,
And languish with insensible decay. Dryden.

3. Void of feeling, either mental or corporal.

I then was passing to my former state
Insensible, and forthwith to dissolve.
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 289.

4. Void of emotion or affection: (with of or to).

You grow insensible to the convenience of riches, the delights of honour and praise.—Sir H. Temple.
You render mankind insensible to their beauties, and have destroyed the empire of love.—Argens.

Old men are not so insensible of beauty, as it may be, you young ladies think.—Id., Letters, p. 73, ed. Malhe.

5. Void of sense or meaning.

If it make the indictment insensible or uncertain, it shall be quashed.—Sir M. Hale, History of the Pleas of the Crown, pt. ii. ch. xxi.

Insensibleness. s. Attribute suggested by insensible; insensibility.

Thou, that art the great physician in heaven,
first cure our insensibleness.—Bishop Hall, Select Thoughts, § 51.

Insensitiveness. adj. Wanting sensation.

This faculty is that which constitutes the difference between sensitive and insensitive creatures.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Insentient. adj. [Lat. sentio; sentientia, -entis feel, think.] Not having perception.

The dissimilitude between the sensation of our minds, and the qualities and attributes of an insentient inert substance.—Rand.

Inséparability. s. Incapability or insusceptibility of separation or division.

The parts of pure space are immovable, which follows from their inséparability, motion being nothing but change of distance between any two things; but this cannot be between parts that are inseparable.—Locke.

Inséparable. adj. Incapable of being separated or disjoined; united so as not to be parted.

Ancient times figure both the incorporation and inséparable conjunction of counsel with kings, and the wise and politic use of counsel by kings.

Bacon.

Care and toil came into the world with sin, and remain ever since inséparable from it.—South.

Together out they fly,
Inséparable now the truth and lie.

And this or that unmix'd no mortal e'er shall find.
Pope.

Inséparableness. s. Attribute suggested by inséparable.

Jones stood upon a point of law of the inséparableness of the prerogative from the person of the king.—Bishop Burnet, History of his own Time, an. 1681.

Inséparably. adv. In an inseparable manner; with indissoluble union.

Browning of metals is, when the baser metal is so incorporated with the more rich as it cannot be separated; as silver should be inséparably incorporated with gold.—Bacon.

Inséparate. adj. Not separated; closely united.

We inséparate and inséparable.—Thomson, Hark, Gilbert & Gurney.

Inséparatè. adj. Same as inséparable.

A debility of the limbs, and spots upon the skin, in this distemper being inséparatè symptoms, it is evident the word must be derived from thence.—Leigh, Natural History of Lancashire, &c. p. 61: 1708.

Inséparatèly. adv. In an inseparable manner; inseparably.

Here saint Cyril declar'd the dignity of Christ's flesh being inséparatèly annex'd unto his divinity.

—Archbishop Ceram, Defence of the Sacraments, fol. 101, b.

That ye live inséparatèly, according to God's ordinances.
Howland, On the State of Matrimony.

Insért. v. a. [Lat. insero, pres. part. inserens, -entis; insertio, -onis.] Place in or amongst other things.

These words were very weakly insérted, where they are so liable to misconstruction.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

With the worthy gentleman's name I will insért it at length in one of my papers.—Id., son.

It is the editor's interest to insért what the author's judgment had rejected.—Swift.

Poetry and oratory omit things not essential, and insért little beautiful digressions, in order to please every thing in the most affecting light.—Watts.

Insértion. s.

1. Act of placing anything in or amongst other matter.

The great disadvantage our historians labour under is too tedious an interruption, by the insértion of records in their narration. Edmon, Dissertation on reading the Charters.

An insértion, commonly called the twisting of the guts, is either a circumvolution or insertion of one part of the gut within the other.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

2. Thing inserted.

He softens the relation by such insertions, before he describes the event.—Brownie.

Insertivient adj. [Lat. servio, pres. part. serviens, -entis = he subservient to.] Conducive; of use to an end.

The providence of God, which disposeth of no part in vain, where there is no digression to be made, makes not any parts insertivient to that intention.—Sir T. Brownie.

Inshade, Inshéiter, Inshéllod, Inship, Inshrine. See Inshade, Enshield, &c.

Inside, s.

1. Interior part; part within: (opposed to outside).

Show the inside of your purse to the outside of his hand, and ill more ado.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, iv. 3.

Here are the outsidés of the one, the insides of the other, and there's the moiety I promised you.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

With the accent on the second syllable.

At length, by so much importunity prest, Take Courage, at once the inside of my breast.
Lady M. W. Montague.

2. Inside passenger.

So down thy hill, romantic Ashbourne, glides The Dearly dilly with its six insides.
Poetry of the Antijacobin.

Inside, adv. Within.

Now then, ladies and gentlemen, walk inside, walk inside.—Itinerant Showman.

Insidiate, v. a. Lie in ambush for. Rare.
One brother killed the life of another; the husband then killed his wife; the wife slain her husband.—Illegion, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 34: 1635.
A huntsman with his bow and arrows did use to insidiate the wild beasts of the wilderness, and shoot them from the coverts and thickets.—Ibid., p. 38.

Death . . . insidiates all things.—Epitaph on Weever the Antiquary.

Insidiator, s. [Lat.] One who lies in wait.

Kings are most exposed to dangers . . . having usually many enemies ill-willers, many disaffected malecontents, many both open enemies, and close insidiators.—Barrow, Sermons, 2.

Insidious, adj. [Lat. insidius = ambush.] Sly; circumventive; diligent to entrap; treacherous.

Since men mark all our steps, and watch our haltings; let a scene of their insidious vigilance excite us to behave ourselves, that they may find a conviction of the mighty power of Christianity towards regulating the passions.—Bishop Atterbury.

They wing their course, And dart on distant coasts, if some sharp rock, Or shoal insidious, breaks not their career.
Thomson.

Insidiously, adv. In an insidious manner; with malicious artifice.

The castle of Cadmus was taken by Pheidias the Lacedæmonian, insidiously and in violation of league.—Bacon.

Insiduousness, s. Attribute suggested by insidious; state or quality of being insidious.

He hath little of the serpent, none of its lurking insiduousness.—Barrow, Works, l. 30.

Insight, s. Introspection; deep view; knowledge of the interior parts; thorough skill in anything.

Hardly shepherd, such as thy merits, may he live insight justly to grant thee reward.—Sir P. Sidney.

Now will be the right season of forming them to be able writers, when they shall be thus fraught with an universal insight into things.—Milton, Tractate on Education.

The use of a little insight in those parts of knowledge, which are not a man's proper business, is to accustom our minds to all sorts of ideas.—Locke.

A garden gives us a great insight into the convenience and wisdom of Providence, and suggests innumerable subjects of meditation.—Spectator.

Insigne, adj. [Lat. insignis.] Illustrious. Rare.

Your commendable and insigne enterprise deserves great recompense, and is worthy, by us, to be highly rewarded.—Time's Store-house, p. 1743. (Ord MS.)

Insignia, s. pl. [Lat.; neuter plural of insignis.] Distinguishing marks of office or honour.

They are also decorated with the blue ribbon of the French Order of the Holy Ghost, and the insignia of the Burgundian Golden Fleece.—Swinnerton, Travels through Spain, let. xxxix.

The insignia of the [Roman] consuls were the same with those of the king, except the crown; namely, the toga, pretexts, sella curulis, the sceptre or ivory staff (scipio eburneus), and twelve lictors with the fasces and securæ.—Adams, Roman Antiquities.

His watch was a present to him from the king of Sicily, whose arms and insignia are graven on the inner case.—Pope, Letter to Swift, (Ord MS.)

People not very well grounded in the principles of public morality find a set of maxims in office ready made for them, which they assume as naturally, and inevitably, as any of the insignia or instruments of the situation.—Harris, Observations on a late State of the Nation: 1769.

Insiguificance, s. Unimportance; triviality.

My annals are in mouldy mildews wrought, With easy insiguificance of thought.
Garth.

Insiguificance, s.

1. Want of meaning; meaningless phraseology.

To give an account of all the insiguificances and verbal notions of this philosophy, would be to transcribe it.—Glauville.

2. Unimportance; littleness.

As I was ruminating on that I had seen, I could not forbear reflecting on the insiguificance of human art, when set in comparison with the designs of Providence.—Adams, Guardian.

Insiguificant, adj.

1. Meaningless.

Till you can weight and gravity explain, Those words are insiguificant and vain.
Sir R. Blackmore.

2. Unimportant; wanting weight; ineffectual.

Calumny robs the publick of all that benefit that it may justly claim from the worth and virtue of particular persons, by rendering their virtue utterly insiguificant.—South, Sermons.

Used substantively.

If we are the insiguificants that others call us, where is the triumph in deceiving us?—Tutler, no. 216. (Ord MS.)

Insiguificantly, adv. In an insignificant manner.

1. Without meaning.

Birds are taught to use articulate words, yet they understand not their import, but use them insiguificantly, as the organ or pipe renders the tune, which it understands not.—Sir M. Hale.

2. Without importance or effect.

Insiguificative, adj. Not betokening by an external sign.

The ordinary sort of the unmeaning eyes are not indeed utterly insiguificative: for they show their owners to be persons without any habitual views or virtues.—Philosophical Letters upon Physiognomy, p. 230: 1751.

Insincère, adj.

1. Not what one appears; not hearty; dissembling; unfaithful: (of persons).

2. Not sound; corrupted: (of things).

O why, Penelope, this causeless fear, To render sleep's soft blessings insincere? Alike devote to morrow's dire extreme, The day's reflection, and the midnight dream!
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, iv. 1639.

Insincèrement, adv. In an insincere manner; unfaithfully; without sincerity.

Dealing in the case so insincèrement and calumniously.—Bishop Montagu, Appeal to Great, p. 24.
This the remark very insincèrement passed over.—(Strike, Evidences of natural and revealed Religion, pref.)

Insincerity, s. Dissimulation; want of truth or fidelity.

If men should always act under a mask, and in disguise, that indeed betrays design and insincerity.—Brownie, Notes on the Odyssey.

Insinew. See Ensinew.

Insinuant, adj. Having the power to gain a favour.

Men not so quick perhaps of conceit as slow to passions, and commonly less inventive than judicious, however prove very plausible, insinuant, and fortunate men.—Sir H. Wotton.

Insinuate, v. a. [Lat. sinuo = run in folds or windings (sinus = fold, winding, bosom, bay of the sea); pass. part. sinuatus; pres. part. sinuans, -antis; insinuat, sinis.] The idea suggested is that of entrance by a winding, imperceptible, movement, as that of a snake.]

1. Introduce gently.

The water easily insinuates itself into and placidly distends the vessels of vegetables.—Woodsward.

2. Push gently into favour or regard: (commonly with the reciprocal pronoun).

There is no particular evil which hath not some appearance of goodness, whereby to insinuate itself.—Hunter, Ecclesiastical Policy.

At the inst of Mrs he insinuated himself into the very good grace of the duke of Buckingham.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

3. Attract; draw; win.

Dame Helen Branch, by whose godly and virtuous life virgins are insinuated to virtue, wives to faithfulness, and widows to Christian contemplation.—J. P., book thus entitled: 1694.

4. Hint; impart indirectly.

And all the fictions hardy pursue Do but insinuate what's true.
Swift.

5. Instil; infuse gently.

All the art of rhetoric, besides order and clearness, are for nothing else but to insinuate wrong ideas, move the passions, and thereby mislead the judgement.—Locke.

Insinuate, s. n. Wheedle; gain on the affections, or confidence, by gentle degrees; steal into imperceptibly; be conveyed insensibly.

Pedestrian mimes insinuate into the humors and consistent parts of the body.—Hagery.

Insinuating, part. adj. Gaining on the affections, or confidence, in a stealthy manner; stealing imperceptibly.

I love no colours; and without all colour Of base insinuating flattery, I pluck this white rose with Plantagenet.
Shakespeare, Henry 1. Part 1. ii. 4.

Cleave the serpent sly Insinuating, of his fatal guile Gave proof unheeded.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 317.

Insinuation, s.

1. Stealthy introduction of anything.

By a soft insinuation mix'd With earth's large mass.
Crashaw, Poems, On the Spring, p. 106.

2. Power of pleasing or stealing upon the affections.

When the industry of one man hath settled the work, a new man by insinuation or misinformation may not supplant him without a just cause.—Bacon.

He had a natural insinuation and address, which made him acceptable in the best company.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

3. Suggestion (unfavourable).

The Scots, naturally an irascible and high-spirited people, and who, of all nations, can least bear the most distant insinuation of contempt, were not of a temper to admit all the pretensions of such assuming guests.—Robertson, History of Scotland, vol. i. p. 237. (Ord MS.)

One of their faction chanced to question the legality of their convention, as it was not summoned by the king's writ. This insinuation was answered by the solicitor-general, who observed that if it was not a legal parliament, they who had taken the oath entered by that parliament were guilty of high treason.—Sandlett, History of England, vol. i. 22. (Ord MS.)

4. In Law. See extract.

The insinuation or registering of wills is the publication of wills as the act of court.—Ayliffe, Paragon Juris Civis, 385. (Ord MS.)

Any popular or insinuativeness carriage of himself.—Bacon, Observations on a Libel in 1582.

Crafty, insinuativeness, plausible men can shroud and palliate their revengeful purposes under pretexts of love.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xxvii.

It is a strange insinuativeness power which example and custom have upon us.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Insinuator, s. One who, or that which, insinuates.

From whence, but from these insinuators, come our causeless passions?—Defoe, Life and Adventures of Robinson Crusoe, pref.

Insipid, adj. [Lat. sepidus = having (sapor) flavour.]

1. Wanting taste; wanting power of affecting the organs of gust.

Such earths yield, by distillation, a liquor very far from being inodorous or insipid.—Boyle.
Our fathers much admired their suaves sweet, And often call'd for sugar with their meat;

Insipid taste, old friend, to them that Paris know,
Wherewithal, shallot, and the rank parlick grew.
King, Art of Cookery.
The liver minds his own affair . . .
Still lays some useful bile aside,
To lunge the chyle's insipid tide.
Prior, Alma, canto 1.

2. Wanting spirit; wanting pathos; flat; dull; heavy.

The gods have made your noble mind for me,
And her insipid soul for Ptolemy;
A heavy lump of earth without desire,
A heap of ashes that o'erlays your fire.

Some short excursions of a broken vow
He made indeed, but flat insipid stuff.
Id., Don Sebastian.

Insipidity. s.

1. Want of taste; flavour; unsavouriness.

2. Want of life or spirit.

Dryden's lines shine strongly through the insipidity of Tate's. — Pope.
The exaltation of some minds, or rather, as I should suspect, their insipidity and want of feeling or observation, may make them insensible to these light things. — Gray, Letter to West.

Insipidity. adv. In an insipid manner; dully; without spirit.

One great reason why many children abandon themselves wholly to silly sports, and trifle away all their time insipidly, is because they have found their curiosity balked. — Locke.

Insipidness. s. Attribute suggested by insipid.

Spiritless prayers with so much insipidness, vain repetitions, vulgar flattery. — Bishop Gauden, Hierarchical, p. 10: 1623.

Insipient. adj. [Lat. sapiens, -entis wise.] Unwise.

There are very learned men who distinguished and put a great difference between the insipid man and the fool. — Clarendon, Tracts, (Ord MS.)

Insist. v. n. [Lat. sisto = stop, stay; from sto = stand.]

1. Stand or rest upon. Rare.

The first trade the wine-press, and we must insist in the same steps, or we shall never partake of this blessed resurrection. — Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, iii. 213. (Ord MS.)

The comb being double, the cells on each side the partition are so ordered, that the angles on one side insist upon the centres of the bottom of the cells on the other side. — Ray.

2. Take a stand; not recede from terms or assertions; persist in; persevere.

Upon such larger terms, and so absolute, Our conditions shall insist upon,
Our peace shall stand firm as rocky mountains.

All other things do constantly obey the law imposed on them, insist in the course defined to them. — Barrow, Works, ii. 12.

3. Dwell upon in discourse.

Were there no other act of hostility but that which we have hitherto insisted on, the interpreting of her supplies were irreparably injurious to her. — Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Insistent. adj. Resting upon anything. Rare.

The breadth of the substruction [must] be at least double to the insistent wall. — Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

The heavens themselves, the planets, and the centre, (Observe degree, priority, and place,
Insisture, course, proportion, season, form,
Office and custom, in all line of order.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, i. 3.

Insistency. s. [Lat. sitis = thirst; sitio = be thirsty; pres. part. sitians, -entis.] Exemption from thirst. Rare.

What is more admirable than the fitness of every creature for the use we make of him? The docility of an elephant, and the insistency of a camel for travelling in deserts. — Gray.

Insition. s. [Lat. insitio, onis -graft.] Insertion, or graft of one branch into another.

Without the use of these we could have nothing of culture or civility: no tillage, grafting, or insition. — Ray.

Insure. See Ensnare.

Insobriety. s. Drunkenness; want of sobriety.

He whose conscience upbraids him with all professions towards God, and insobriety towards himself, yet if he can but answer, that he is just to his neighbour, he thinks he has quit wrong. — Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety, p. 121.

Insoluble. adj.

1. Averse from conversation.

If this austere insolvability life,
Change not your offer made in heat of blood.

Shakespeare, Love's Labour's Lost, v. 2.

2. Incapable of connection or union.

The lowest ledge or row [must] be merely of stone, . . . closely laid, without mortar, which is a general caution for all parts in building that are contiguous to board or timber, because lime and wood are insoluble. — Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

Insolation. s.

1. Exposure to the sun.

We use these towers for insolation, refrigeration, conversation, and for the view of divers meteors. — Bayne.

If it have not a sufficient insolation it looketh pale, and attains not its laudable colour: if it be sunned too long, it suffereth a torrefaction. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

2. In Medicine. Sunstroke.

One case of consequential madness is an effect of insolation, or what the French call "coup de soleil." An instance of which I lately met with in a sailor, who became raving and in a moment, while the sun-beams darted perpendicularly on his head. — Balfie, On Madness.

Insolence. s. Pride exerted in contemptuous and overbearing treatment of others; petulant contempt.

I do wonder
His insolence can break to be commended
Under Cominius.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, i. 1.

Insolence. r. a. Insult; treat with contempt. Rare.

The bishops, who were first faulty, insolenced and assaulted. — Eden, Humilike.

Insolency. s. Same as insolence.

They could not restrain the insolency of O'Neal, who, finding none now to withstand him, made himself lord of those few people that remained. — Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

The troubles of ambition, and the insolencies of traitors, and the violence of rebels. — Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 19: 1654.

Publick judgments are the banks and shores upon which God breaks the insolency of sinners, and stays their proud waves. — Archbishop Tillotson.

Insolent. adj. [Lat. insolens, -entis.]

1. Unconstrained.

If one chance to derive any word from the Latin, which is insolent to their ears, . . . they forthwith make a jest of it. — Puffe, Introduction to Græzian's Greek Vocabulary, p. 166.

2. Contemptuous of others; haughty; overbearing.

We have not pillaged those rich provinces which we rescued; victory itself hath not made us insolent masters. — Bishop Atterbury.

Insolently. adv. In an insolent manner; with contempt of others; haughtily; rudely.

She . . . by a king and conqueror made so great, into her own self-praise most insolently broke.

Dryden, Polydorus, song ii.
Briant, naturally of a haughty temper, treated him very insolently, more like a criminal than a prisoner of war. — Addison.

Insolidity. s. Want of solidity; weakness.

A demonstration of the insolidity of this exception against Mr. Mede. — Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 201: 1630.

Insolubility. s. Incapability of solution, or being dissolved.

The insolubility of these salts, when the urine is below a certain temperature is an easy test. — Frout, On the Urine.

Insoluble. adj.

1. Not to be cleared; not to be resolved.

Admit this, and what shall the Scripture be but a snare and a torment to weak consciences, filling them with infinite scrupulosity, doubts, and extreme despair? — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Not to be dissolved or separated.

Stony matter may grow in any part of a human body; for when any thing insoluble sticks in any part of the body, it gathers a crust about it. — Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Insolvable. adj. [See Indissoluble and Indissoluble.]

1. Not to be solved; not to be cleared; inextricable; admitting no solution or explanation.

Spend a few thoughts on the puzzling inquiries concerning vacuums, the doctrine of infinities, indivisibles, and incommensurables, wherein there appear some insolvable difficulties. — Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

2. Not to be loosed.

To guard with bands
Insoluble these gifts.

Pope, Translation of Homer's Odyssey.

Insolvency. s. Inability to pay debts.

Even the dear delight
Of sculpture, paint, intellus, books, and coins,
Thy sacred, sacrosanct pulchre! shall connect
With filth and beggary, no absolute to link
With black insolvency. — Shendun, Economy, pt. ii.

Insolvent. adj. Unable to pay debts.

By public declaration he proclaimed himself insolvent of those vast sums he had taken upon credit. — Barth.

A farmer accused his curate for forbidding him of oven, and the emperor shot the offender; but demanding reparation of the necropolis for so many brave fellows, and finding him insolvent, compounded the matter by taking his life. — Addison.

Insolvent tenant of incumber'd space. — Smart.

Insolvent. s. Person unable to pay his debts.

An insolvent is a man that cannot pay his debts. — Watts.

Insomuch. conj. So that; to such a degree that; inasmuch.

It hath ever been the use of the conqueror to despise the language of the conquered; and to force him to learn his; so did the Romans always use, inasmuch that there is no nation but is sprinkled with their language. — Spenser.

To make ground fertile, ashes excel; inasmuch as the countries about Etna have amended made them for the mischief the eruptions do. — Barrow, Natural and Experimental History.

Simonides was an excellent poet, inasmuch that he made his fortune by it. — Sir R. L. Estange.

They made the ground uneven about their nest, inasmuch that the state did not beat upon it, but left a free passage underneath. — Addison, Guardian.

Inspect. v. a. [Lat. inspicio = look in; pass. part. inspectus.] Look into by way of examination.

Inspect. v. n. Act as inspector.

Return, ye days, when endless pleasure
I found in reading, or in leisure!
When calm around the common room
I puff'd my daily pipe's perfume;
Ere for a stomach, and inspect;
At annual bottling, corks selected.

T. Warton, Progress of Discontent.

Inspect. s. Inspection. Rare.

Not so the man of philosophick eye
And inspect sage. — Thomson, Seasons, Autumn.

Inspection. s.

1. Close examination; narrow and close survey.

With narrow search, and with inspection deep,
Consider every creature.

Our religion is a religion that does to be understood; that offers itself to the search of the inquisitive, to the inspection of the severest and the most awakened reason; for being secure of her substantial truth and purity, she knows that for her to be seen and looked into, is to be embraced and admired, as there needs no greater argument for men to love the light than to see it. — South, Sermons.

2. Superintendence; presiding care.

We may safely conceal our good deeds, when they run no hazard of being diverted to improper ends, for want of our own inspection. — Bishop Athelney.

We should apply ourselves, to study the perfections of God, and to preserve lively and vigorous impressions of his perpetual presence with us, and inspecting over us. — Id.

The divine inspection into the affairs of the world, doubtless necessarily follow from the nature and being of God; and he that denies this, doth implicitly deny his existence. — Bentley.

Inspector. s.

1. Examiner.

With their new light our bold inspectors press,
Like Chalm, to show their father's nakedness.
Sir J. Spelman, Progress of Learning.

2. Superintendent. Often with a special application, as 'Police inspector,' &c.

Young men may travel under a wise inspector or tutor to different parts, that they may bring home useful knowledge. — Watts.

Insperion. s. [Lat. inspergo, from in + spargo = sprinkle.] Sprinkling upon.

We stain the heart with so many heinous and vicious insperations. — Jeremy Taylor, Sermons, p. 15: 1651.
Some light insperations of truth to make them appetitions, possible, and laudable. — Brief Description of Faintness, p. 17: 1600.

Inspeiximus. s. [Lat. first person plural past tense of inspicio = look into.] See second extract.

This word is specified, by the names of 'astra' and 'mensura vin.' in an inspiration charter of Henry the Third to Tarent-abbey in Dorsetshire.—T. Walton, History of the Parish of Kiddington, p. 60.
Inspiration [is] the first word of ancient charters confirming a grant already made by a former king or benefactor, and of letters patent; an exemplification: it implies, 'We have inspected it.'—Johnson.

Inspiration. v. a. Place in an orb or sphere.
I will inspire her
In regions high and starry.
Not rubies of the rock such red inspiration.
U. Sandys, Paraphrase of Lamentations, ch. iv.
Where those immortal shapes
Of bright aerial spirits live inspired,
In regions mild of calm and serene air.
Milton, Comus, 188.
(See also Enspiration.)

Inspirable. adj. That may be drawn in with the breath; which may be infused.
To these inspirable hurts, we may enumerate those they sustain from their expiration of ful-gurous storms.—Marney.

Inspiration. s.
1. Act of drawing in the breath.
In any inflammation of the diaphragm, the symptoms are a violent fever, and a most exquisite pain increased upon inspiration, by which it is distinguished from a pleurisy, in which the greatest pain is in expiration.—Arbuthnot.
2. Act of breathing into anything; infusion of ideas into the mind by a superior power.
I never spoke with her in all my life.
How can she thus then call us by our names,
Unless it be by inspiration!
Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, ii. 2.
What the translation wrote, the late success
Declares was inspiration, and not guess.
Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning.
Inspiration is when an overpowering impression of any proposition is made upon the mind by God himself, that gives a confidence and indubitable evidence of the truth and divinity of it; so were the prophecy and the apostles inspired.—Watts.

Inspire. v. a. [Lat. spirare—breathe; pnss.
part. spiratus; inspiratio, -onis.] Draw in the breath; blow, as a gentle wind: (opposed to expire).
Her yellow locks, crisped like golden wires,
About her shoulders were loosely shed.
And, when the wind camest thou did inspire,
They waved like a penon wide dispread.
Spenser, Faerie Queen, ii. 3, 30.

Inspire. v. a.
1. Breathe into; infuse by so breathing.
He knew not his Maker, and he that inspired into him an active soul, and breathed in a living spirit.
—William of Salmasius, xv. 11.
Descend, ye blue, descend and sing,
The breathing instruments inspire.
Pope, Ode on St. Cecilia's Day.
2. Introduce into the mind; impress upon the fancy.
I have been troubled in my sleep this night;
But dawning day now comfort hath inspired.
Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, ii. 2.
So lovely seemed
That landscape; and of pure now purer air
Meets his approach and to the heart inspires
Vernal delight.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 152.
3. Animate by supernatural infusion.
The letters are often read to the young religious,
to inspire them with sentiments of virtue.—Addison.
4. Draw in with the breath.
By means of sulphurous coal smokes the lungs are stifled and oppressed, whereby they are forced to inspire and expire the air with difficulty, in comparison of the facility of inspiring and expiring the air in the country.—Harvey.
His faithful breath inspiring as he glides;
Now like a chain around her neck he rides.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 403.

Inspired. part. adj. Divinely animated.
Nor the inspired
Chastellan spring might with this Paradise
Of Eden strive.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 273.

Inspirer. s. One who inspires.
To the infinite God, the omnipotent creator and preserver of the world, the most glorious redeemer, sanctifier, and inspirer of mankind, be all honour.—
Dehane.

Inspiring. part. adj.
1. Breathing in.
If the inspiring and expiring organ of any animal be stopped, it suddenly yields to nature, and dies.—
J. Walton.
2. Inspiring.

Inspirer. v. a. Animate.
The reformed clergy, alarmed at so meretricious a display.

proposal, appointed a public fast, and inspiring
the people to resistance, forced the royal commissioner to fly from Paul, where he had arrived in the hope of effecting a peaceful adjustment of the claims of the rival parties.—Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. I. ch. viii.
(See also Enspire.)

Inspissate. v. a. [Lat. spissus—thick.]
Thicken; make thick.
Sugar doth inspissate the spirits of the wine, and maketh them not so easy to resolve into vapour.—
Bacon.
This oil, further inspissated by evaporation, turns into balsam.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Inspissate. adj. Thick. Rare.
The gum or inspissate juice of a plant.—Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 253.

Inspissation. s. Act of making any liquid thick.
The effect is wrought by the inspissation of the air.—Bacon.
Recent urine will crystallize by inspissation, and afford a salt neither acid nor alkaline.—*Arbuthnot,
On the Nature and Choice of Aliments*.

Instability. s. Inconstancy; fickleness; mutability of opinion or conduct.
Instability of temper ought to be checked, when it disposes men to wander from one scheme of government to another; such a fickleness cannot but be fatal to our country.—Addison, Freeholder.

Instable. adj. Inconstant; changing.
In this instable and uncertain age, you have with that steadiness of mind and clearness of judgment stuck to the truth and purity of the protestant religion, as discerning the vast difference betwixt it and popery.—Dr. H. More, Expulsion of the Jews from Churches, dedication to Lord Roberts: 1639.

Instableness. s. Attribute suggested by Instable; fickleness; mutability.
There cannot be two more pregnant instances of the lubricity and instableness of mankind, than the decay of these two ancient nations. Howell, Essential Letters, ii. 57.
The very faculty of reason (as we find it too true by late experience) is subject to the same instableness.—Ibid. iv. 19.

Install. v. a. [see Stall.] Advance to any rank or office by placing in the seat or stall proper to that condition; generally that of an ecclesiastical dignitary.
She reigns a goddess now among the saints,
That whilom was the saint of shepherds light,
And is installed now in heaven's height. Spenser.
Crommer is returned with welcome,
Installed archbishop of Canterbury.
Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2.
The king chose him master of the horse, after this he was installed of the most noble order. *Sir
H. Walton*.

Installation. s. Act of giving visible possession of a rank or office, by placing in the proper seat.
Upon the election the bishop gives a mandate for his installation.—Lytell, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Installation. s.
1. Act of installing.
It is not easy
To make lord William Hastings of my mind
For the installation of this noble duke
In the seat royal. Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 1.
Would I could here
These fine invisible fiddlers to play to me
At my installation.
Hammond and Fletcher, Prophets, ii. 3.
The time of his installation into his priesthood.—
Hammond, Works, iv. 326.

2. Seat in which one is installed.
Search Windsor-castle, elves . . .
The several chairs of order look you secure
With juice of balm and every precious flower;
Each fair installation, east and several crest
With loyal blazon evermore be blest!
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, v. 5.

3. Part payment: (as, 'He paid by instalments').
Instance. s. [Lat. instantia; insto—stand on, take a place; pres. part. instans,
-antis.]
1. Instigation; solicitation; motive; influence; pressing argument. Obsolete.
She dwells so securely upon her honour, that folly dares not present itself. Now, could I come to her with any direction in my hand, my desires had instance and argument to commend themselves.—
Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 2.
The instances that second marriage move
Are base respects of thrift, but none of love.
Id., Hamlet, iii. 2.

2. Prosecution or process of a suit.
The instance of a cause is said to be that judicial process which is made from the contestation of a suit even to the time of pronouncing sentence in the cause, or till the end of three years.—Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

3. Example; document.
Yet both this accident
So far exceed all instance, all discourse,
That I am ready to distrust mine eyes.
Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iv. 3.
In furnaces of copper and brass, where vitriol is often cast in, there riseth suddenly a fly, which sometimes moveth on the walls of the furnace; sometimes in the fire below; and doth presently as soon as it is out of the furnace, which is a noble instance, and worthy to be weighed.—Bacon.
We find in history instances of persons, who, after their prisons had been dung open, have chosen rather to languish in their dungeons.—Addison.

4. State of anything.
These seem as if, in the time of Edward the First, they were drawn up into the form of a law in the first instance.—Sir M. Hale.

5. Occasion; act.
The performances required on our part, are no other than what natural reason has endeavoured to recommend, even in the most severe and difficult instances of duty.—Rogers.
A soul supreme in each hard instance try'd,
Above all pain, all anger, and all pride.
Pope, Epistle to the Earl of Oxford.
If instances had lived as free from sin as it is possible for human nature, it is because she is always watching and guarding against all instances of pride.—Law, Serious Call.

Instance. v. a. Give or offer an example.
We need not instance men; the very unreasonable part of the creation, even the creature itself, travelleth under the yoke of this year.—*Gregory,
Pastorals*, 38. (Ord. M.N.).

Various facts prove that the arousing of a thought or feeling, always involves the arousing of a certain resistance: instance the fact that where the association of mental states has not been frequent, a sensible effort is needed to call up the one after the other; instance the fact that during nervous prostration there is a comparative inability to think;
—the ideas will not follow one another with the habitual rapidity; instance the converse fact that at times of unusual energy, natural or artificial, the friction of thought becomes relatively small, and more numerous, more remote, or more difficult connections of ideas are formed. Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology.

With in.
As to false citations, that the world may see how little he is to be trusted, I shall instance in two or three about which he makes the loudest clamour.—
Archbishop Tillotson.
In tragedy and satire, this age and the last have excelled the ancients; and I would instance in Shakespeare of the former, in Dorset of the latter sort.—Dryden, Translation of Juvenal, dedication.

Instanced. part. adj. Given as an example or instance.
That worthy divine did not hesitantly observe the great difference betwixt these instanced degrees.—
Bishop Hall, Coma of Comenius, iv. 5.

Instancy. s. Importunity; urgency; solicitation.
Christian men should much better frame themselves to these heavenly precepts which our Lord and Saviour with so great instancy gave us concerning peace and unity, if we did condescend to have the ancient councils renewed.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Instant. adj.
1. Pressing; urgent; importunate; earnest.
And they were instant with loud voices, requiring that he might be crucified.—Luke, xxiii. 23.
Rejoicing in hope; patient in tribulation; continuing instant in prayer.—Romans, xii. 12.
2. Immediate; without any time intervening; present.
Our good old friend bestow
Your needful counsel to our business,
Which craves the instant use.
Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 1.
The instant stroke of death denounc'd to-day,
Remov'd far off. Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 210.
Nor native country thou, nor friend shalt see;
Nor war hast thou to wage, nor joy to come;
Impending death is thine, and instant doom. Prior.

3. Quick; making no delay.
Instant without delay they took alarm.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 526.

4. Used adverbially.
a. At once.
Grieved that a visitant so long should wait
Unmark'd, unhonour'd, at a monarch's gate;

Instant he flew with hospitable haste,
And the new friend with courteous air embrac'd.
Pope, Translation of the Odyssey, l. 137.

h. Belonging to the present or current month.
On the twentieth instant it is my intention to erect a lion's head.—Addison, Guardian.

instant, s.
1. Point in time so short as to be considered present, i.e. the instant or present moment.
There is scarce an instant between their flourishing and their not being.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.
Her nimble body yet in time must move,
And not in instants through all places stride;
But she is high and far, beneath, above,
In point of time, which thought cannot divide.
Sir J. Davies.

Instant in such a part of duration wherein we perceive no succession.—Locke.

At any instant of time the moving atom is but in one single point of the line; therefore all but that one point is either future or past, and no other parts are co-existent or contemporary with it.—Bentley, Sermons.

2. Particular time.

I can at any unreasonable instant of the night appoint her to look out at her lady's chamber window.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, ii. 2.

Instantaneity, s. Unpremeditated production.

[They] have no sort of claim to be called verses, beside their instantaneity.—Shenstone.

Instantaneous, adj. Done in an instant; acting at once without any perceptible succession; acting with the utmost speed; done with the utmost speed.

This manner of the beginning or ceasing of the deluge doth not at all agree with the instantaneous actions of creation and annihilation.—Z. Barne, Theory of the Earth.
The rapid radiance instantaneous strikes
Th' illum'd mountain.—Thomson.

Instantaneously, adv. In an instantaneous manner; in an indivisible point of time.

What I had heard of the raining of fœces came to my thoughts, there being reason to conclude that those came from the clouds, or were instantaneously generated.—Bertram.

Instantaneous, adj. Instantaneous. Obsolete.

Reaching forth itself largely in very quick and instantaneous motions to all those things which are capable of it [light].—Bishop Hall, De moribus, p. 13.

Instantly, adv. [Lat.] Instantly; at once. Colloquial.

Instantly, adv. In an instant manner.

1. With urgent importunity.

And when they came to Jesus, they besought him instantly, saying that he was worthy for whom he should do this.—Luke, vi. 1.

Unto which promise our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come.—Acts, xxvi. 7.

2. Immediately; without any perceptible intervention of time.

In a great while, the sense and affects of any one part of the body instantly make a transgression throughout the whole body.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Sleep, which instantly fell on me, call'd
By Nature, as in aid.
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 438.

As several winds arise,
Just so their natures alter instantly.
Mary, Translation from Virgil.

Instate, v. a.

1. Place in a certain rank or condition.

This kind of conquest does only instatate the victor in these rights, which the conquered prince had.—Sir M. Hale.

Had this glistering monster been born to thy poverty, he could not have been so bold; nor, perhaps, had thy birth instatated thee in the same greatness, would'st thou have been better.—South, Sermons.

The first . . . should derive a blessing to his posterity, . . . and prevail at last to have them also accepted as holy, and instatated in the favour of God.—Bishop Atterbury.

2. Invest. Obsolete.

For his possessions,
Although by confiscation they are ours,
We do instatate and widow you without.
Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, v. 1.

Instatement, s. Establishment.

We thence became completely justified, having not only a just title to what justification doth import, but a real instatement therein.—Barrow, ii. 425. (Ord 118.)

Instaurate, v. a. Reform; repair; supply with improvement.

It is far more easy to instaurate the positive assertions of others, than to instaurate better in their room.—Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 230: 1000.

Instauration, s. Restoration; reparation; renewal.

They took instauration of what was deficient for institution. Selden, Illustrations of Drayton, Polydion, song xi.

Instaurator, s. Restorer; repairer; renewer; fresh or second founder.

They pretend to be the great instaurators of his empire, and beginners of the blessed millennium.—Dr. H. More, Mystery of Godliness, p. 203: 1000.

Instead, prep. [see Instead.]

1. In room of; in place of: (with of).

They, instead of fruit,
Chew'd bitter ashes. Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 505.

Vary the form of speech, and instead of the word church, make it a question in politics, whether the monument be in danger.—Swift.

2. Equal to: (with of).

This very consideration to a wise man is instead of a thousand arguments, to satisfy him, that, in these times, no such thing was believed.—Archbishop Tillotson.

Instead, adv. In place of something else; by way of substitution.

He in derision sets
Upon their tongues a various spirit, to raise Quite out their native language, and instead
To sow a jangling noise of tongues unknown.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xii. 58.

Insteep, v. a.

1. Soak; macerate in moisture.

Suffolk first died, and York all lanced over,
Came to him where in gore he lay insteep'd.
Shakespeare, Henry V. iv. 6.

2. Lying under water.

The water'd rocks, and congregated sands,
Traitors insteep'd to clog the milflow wheel.
Shakespeare, Othello, ii. 1.

Instep, s. Upper part of the foot where it joins to the leg.

The caliga was a military shoe with a very thick sole, tied above the instep with leather thongs.—Archibald, Tables of Ancient Coins, Wright, and Meunier.

Instigate, v. a. [Lat. instigator, pass. part. of instigare—urge forward.] Urge to ill; provoke or incite to a crime.

If a servant instigates a stranger to kill his master, this being murder in the stranger as principal, of course the servant is accessory only to the crime of murder, though he would have been guilty, as principal, of petty treason. Sir W. Blackstone.

Instigation, s. Incitement to a crime; encouragement; impulse to ill.

Why, what need we
Commune with you of this? But rather follow
Our fore-fell instigation.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 1.

It was partly by the instigation of some factions, malevolent to that late principal stroke amongst them. Bacon.

Shall any man that wilfully procures the cutting of whole armies to pieces set up for an innocent? As if the lives that were taken away by his instigation were not to be charged upon his account.—Sir R. E. Estcourt.

We have an abridgement of all the baseness and villainy that both the corruption of nature and the instigation of the devil could bring the sons of men to.—South, Sermons.

Instigator, s. Inciter to ill.

That sea of blood is enough to drown in eternal misery the malicious author or instigator of its effusion. Eikon Basilike.

Either the eagerness of acquiring or the revenge of missing dignities, have been the great instigators of ecclesiastical feuds. Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

Instil, v. a. [Lat. stilla—I drop; stilla—a drop.]

1. Infuse by drops.

He from the well of life three drops instill'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 116.

2. Insinuate anything imperceptibly into the mind; infuse.

Though assemblies be had indeed for religion's sake, hurtful nevertheless they may easily prove, as well in regard of their fitness to serve the turn of hearticks, and such as privily will suggest adventure to instil their poison into men's minds.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Those heathens do, in a particular manner instil the principle into their children of hating their country, which is far otherwise now-a-days.—Swift.

Instillation, s.

1. Act of pouring in by drops.

2. Thing infused.

They imbibe the cup of life by instillation.—Johnson, Rambler.

Instiller, s. One who infills.

Never was there such a instiller as was played in my mind, nor so artful an instiller of loose principles as my tutor. Skelton, Icknam Raveled, dial. vii.

Instinct, adj. Moved; animated.

Forth rush'd with whirlwind sound
The chariot of paternal deity,
Flashing thick flames, wheel within wheel undrawn,
Hiss'd instinct with spirit, but convey'd,
By four cherubim shapes.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 719.

Coffee-house wits, instinct by me, can correct an author's style, and display his minutest errors, without understanding a syllable of his quator or his language! Swift, Battle of the Books.

It was a noble performance, instinct with sound principle; full of broad and striking flows of policy; abounding in unanimous appeals to justice; and bold assertions of right, in one passage touching and pathetic; the description of a Catholic soldier's feelings on reviewing some field where he had shared the dangers of the light, yet instinct to think that he could never taste the glories of command. Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen during the Reign of George III. For.

Instinct, s. Desire or aversion acting in the mind without the intervention of reason or deliberation; the power determining the will of brutes.

Thou knowest I am as valiant as Hercules; but beware instinct; the lion will not touch the prince; instinct is a great matter. I was a coward on instinct; I shall think the better of myself and thee, during my life; I for a valiant lion, and thee for a true prince.—Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part I. ii. 3.

But providence or instinct of nature seems,
Or reason, though disturb'd and scarce consulted,
To have guided me aright.
Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1315.

Nature first pointed out my Portus to me,
And easily taught me by her secret ways
To love thy person, ere I knew thy merit;
Till what was instinct grew up into friendship.
Addison, Cato.

Then vainly the philosopher avers
That reason guides our deed, and instinct theirs.
How can we justify different causes frame,
When the effects entirely are the same?
Instinct and reason how shall we divide?
Pope, Solomon, b. 1.

Reason, however able, ead at best,
Cares not for service, or bid service when press'd,
Stays till we call, and then not often near;
But honest instinct comes a volunteer.
Pope, Essay on Man, iii. 85.

There are many instincts which man, as well as animals, performs by the guidance of nature, without seeing or seeking the reason why he does so; as, the acts by which he balances himself in standing or moving, and those by which he judges of the form and position of the objects around him. These actions have their reason in the principles of geometry and mechanics; but of such reasons he who thus acts is unaware; he works blindly, under the impulse of an unknown principle which we call instinct. When man's speculative nature seeks and finds the reasons why he should act thus or thus;—why he should stretch out his arm to prevent his falling, or assign a certain position to an object in consequence of the angles under which it is seen; he may perform the same actions as before, but they are then done by the aid of a different faculty, which, for the sake of distinction, we may call instinct. Instinct is a purely active principle; it is seen in its own nature; it has no power of looking inwards; it asks no questions; it has no tendency to discover reasons or rules; it is the opposite of insight. Art is not identical with instinct; on the contrary, there are broad differences. Instinct is stationary; Art is progressive. Instinct is mute; it acts, but gives no rules for acting; Art can speak, she can lay down rules, but though Art is thus separated from instinct, she is not essentially combated with insight. She can see what is to be done, she needs not to see why it is done. She may by down rules, but it is not her business to give reasons. When man makes that his employment, he enters upon the domain of Science.—Wheatell, History of Scientific Ideas, ch. viii.

Instinct, v. a. Impress as an animating power.
God would never have instincted the appetition of pleasure, and the faculties of enjoyment if so strongly in man, if he had not meant that in decency he should make use of them.—Fildham, Recluse.
What native unextinguishable beauty must be impressed and instincted through the whole, which the defilement of so many parts by a bad printer and a worse editor could not hinder from shining forth.—Bentley, Preface to Milton.

Instinctive. s. Instinct. Obsolete.
This natural instinct of creatures.—Sir T. Eliot, The Governor, fol. 149.

Instinctive. adv. Acting without the application of choice or reason; rising in the mind without apparent cause.

By quick instinctive motion up I sprung,
As thitherward endeavouring.

It will be natural that Ulysses's mind should forebode; and it appears that the instinctive presence was a favourite opinion of Homer's.—Broome, Notes on the Odyssey.

Instinctively. adv. In an instinctive manner; by instinct; by the prompting of nature.

The very rats
Instinctively had quit it. Shakespeare, Tempest, l. 2.

Instinctive. s. Instigation. Rare.

Charity and probability would induce us to think that whosoever is morally honest, is so out of conscience in obedience to the commands of God, and the instinctive of nature, so framed and qualified by God himself, hath then out of minister, lower, or less noble ends; and therefore I hold it to be most true, that as true religion cannot be without morality, so more can morality than is right be without religion.—Pellham, Recollections. (Ord MS.)

Institute. v. a.

1. Fix; establish; appoint; enact; settle; prescribe.

God then instituted a law natural to be observed by creatures; and therefore, according to the manner of laws, the institution thereof is described as being established by solemn injunction. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Theocracy of the Jews was instituted by God himself. Sir W. Temple.

To institute a court and a country party without materials would be a very new system in politics. Swift.

2. Educate; instruct; form by instruction.

If children were only instituted, knowledge would incessantly insinuate itself. Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.

3. Invest with the spiritual part of a benefice.

No bishop shall institute any to a benefice, who hath been ordained by any other bishop, except he first show unto him his letters of orders.—Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, xxxi.

Institute. s.

1. Established law; settled order.
Such is the subject of the institute,
And universal body of the law.

This law, though custom now directs the course,
As nature's institute, is yet in force
Unchanged, although dissolved. Dryden.

2. Precept; maxim; principle.

Thou art pale in mildly studies grown,
To make the Stoic institute thy own.

Dryden, Translation of Persius, v. 84.

3. Organized establishment conducted by a society; (as, 'the Institute of Civil Engineers').

Institution. s.

1. Act of establishing; establishment; settlement.

The institution of God's Law is described as being established by solemn injunction.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

It became him by whom all things are, to be the way of salvation to all, that the institution and restitution of the world might be both wrought with one hand.—Ibid.

This unlimited power placed fundamentally in the body of a people, is what legislators have endeavoured, in their several schemes or institutions of government, to deposit in such hands as would preserve the people.—Swift.

2. Positive law.

The precepts by which men are taught what to do are called institutions; so Quintilian inserted his book. In institutions of morality, and Lactantius wrote Institutiones, that is, commentaries on the precepts and laws of Christianity. But it hath in this peculiarity of signification, that the word institution does signify properly rules and precepts of manners, properly the measures of practice, or rules teaching us what we are obliged to do; so, that institution does not directly signify a commandment, but it supposes the persons obliged, only it supposes the manner and measure of obedience.—Jeremy Taylor, Dilectus Dubitans, l. 421. (Ord MS.)

They quarrel sometimes with the execution of laws, and sometimes with the institution.—Sir W. Temple.

The holiness of the first fruits and the lump is an holiness merely of institution, outward and nominal.

whereas the holiness of the roset is an holiness of nature, inherent and real.—Bishop Atterbury.
The law and institution, founded by Moses was to establish religion, and to make mercy and peace known to the whole earth.—Forbes.

3. Education.

After baptism, when it is in infancy received, succeeds instruction and institution in the nature and several branches of that vow, which was made at the font, in a short intelligible manner.—Hammond, On Fundamentals.

It is a necessary piece of providence in the institution of our children, to train them up to somewhat in their youth, that may honestly entertain them in their age.—Sir R. L'Estrange.

His learning was not the effect of precept or institution.—Hendry.

4. Act of investing a clerk presented to a rectory or vicarage with the spiritual part of his benefice.

No person shall hereafter be received into the ministry, nor either by institution or collation admitted to any ecclesiastical living, nor suffered to preach, &c. except he be licensed either by the archbishop, or the bishop of the diocese where he is to be placed.—Constitutions and Canons Ecclesiastical, xxxi.

Institutional. adj. Relating to institutions.

He began with a series of institutional changes.—R. Edwards, The Polish Captivity.

Institutionary. adj. Elemental; containing the first doctrines, or principles of doctrine.

That it was not out of fashion Aristotle declared in his politics, amongst the institutionary rules of youth. Sir T. Browne.

Institutionist. s. Writer of institutes, or elemental instructions.

Green said the institutionists would persuade us to be an effect of an over-hot stomach.—Harey, Discourse of Assumptions.

Institutional. adj. Able to establish.

The law in Leviticus only professes a special reason of charity before an institutional decree.—Milton, On the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce. (Ord MS.)

These words seem institutional, or collative of power. Barron, On the Pope's Supremacy.

Institutioner. s.

1. Establisher; one who settles.

It might have succeeded a little better, if it had passed the institution of the civil months of the sun to have ordered them alternately odd and even.—Holker, Discourse concerning Time.

2. Instructor; educator.

The two great aims which every institutioner of youth should mainly and intentionally drive at.—Walker.

Instop. v. a. Close up; stop.

With boiling pitch another near at hand
(From friendly Sweden brought) the swains instops.
Dryden, Annus Mirabilis, calvii.

Instruct. v. a.

1. Teach; form by precept; inform authoritatively; educate; institute; direct.

Out of heaven he made thee to hear his voice, that he might instruct thee.—Deuteronomy, iv. 36.

With in.

They that were instructed in the songs of the Lord were two hundred fourscore and eight. 1 Chronicles, xxi. 7.

2. Model; form. Rare.

They speak do the words of a cause, after the preceptor has prepared and instructed the same for a hearing before the judge.—Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Participle instruct.

Warmed, instruct, and mangled.—Bishop Fisher, On the Seven Ecclesiastical Poets, p. 2.

Instructible. adj. Capable of receiving instruction. Rare.

A king of incomparable clemency, and whose heart is instructible for wisdom and goodness.—Bacon, Submission to the House of Lords.

Instruction. s.

1. Act of teaching; information.

It lies on you to speak,
Not by your own instruction, nor by any matter
Which your heart prompts you to.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 2.

We are beholden to judicious writers of all ages, for those discoveries and discourses they have left behind them for our instruction.—Locke.

Now (to pursue this analogy) when the materials are all ready to the builder's hand, the blocks ready dug and brought, his work resembles one of the two kinds of discovery just mentioned, viz. that to which we have assigned the name of instruction; but if his materials are to be entirely, or in part, provided by himself,—if he himself is forced to dig fresh blocks from the quarry,—this corresponds to the other kind of discovery.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Logic, b. iv. ch. ii. § 1.

2. Precepts conveying knowledge.

Will ye not receive instruction to hearken to receive my words.—Jeremiah, xxi. 13.
On every thorn delightful wisdom grows,
In every stream a sweet instruction flows;
But some untaught o'erwhelm the whirling mill,
In spite of sacred leisure, blockheads still. Young.

3. Authoritative information; mandate.

See this dispatch'd with all the haste thou canst;
Aton I'll give thee more instruction.
Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, act. 1.

Instructional. adj. Conveying knowledge.

With a variety of instructional expressions by speech, man alone is endowed. Holker.

I would not laugh but to instruct; or if my mirth comes to be instructional, it shall never cease to be innocent.—Addison.

Instructionally. adv. In an instructive manner; so as to teach; by instruction.

Describing instructionally to exemplify the duty and nature of clarity.—Burrow, Works, l. 263.
Egle made him sing both merrily and instructionally.—Arbuthnot and Pope, Martinus Scriblerus.

Instructionness. s. Attribute suggested by Instruction; power of instructing.

The benefit, and the instructionness of history, and of the lives of worthy persons, is no less universally than deservedly acknowledged to be very great.—Situation of Paradise, p. 30: 1683.

The pregnant instructionness of the scripture.—Boyle, Considerations on the Style of Holy Scripture, p. 130.

Instructor. s. One who instructs.

Though you have ten thousand instructors in Christ.—1 Corinthians, iv. 15.

After the flood arise to Chaldaea full;
The father of the faithful there did dwell,
Who both their parent and instructor was.

Sir J. Deane, Progress of Learning.

O then, who future things cannot represent
As present, heavenly instructor!

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 870.

Several instructors were disposed among this little helpless people.—Addison.

Instructress. s. Female instructor.

Knowledge also as a perfect instructress and mistress.—Sir T. Eliot, The Governor, fol. 146. b.

To hear the sweet instructress tell,
How life its noblest use may find,
How well for freedom be resign'd. Akenside.

Perhaps, in the revolutions of the world, Iona may be sometime again the instructress of the western regions.—Johnson, Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Instrument. s.

1. Tool used for any work or purpose.

If he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer.—Numbers, xxv. 16.
What artificial frame, what instrument,
Did one superior genius e'er invent;
Which to the mutes was preferred?

Sir E. Blackmore.

Used adjectively, or as the first element of a compound.

Box is useful for turners and instrument makers.
—Mortimer.

2. Frame constructed so as to yield harmonious sounds.

He that strikes an instrument without skill, may cause notwithstanding a very pleasant sound, if the string whereon he strikes it eludes to be capable of harmony.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

She taketh most delight
In music, instruments and poetry.

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, l. 1.

In solitary groves he makes his moan, . . .
But sighs when songs and instruments he hears.

Dryden.

3. Writing containing any contract or order.

He called Edna his wife, and took paper, and did write an instrument of covenants, and sealed it.—Tobit, vii. 14.

4. Agent.

If, haply, you my father do suspect,
An instrument of this your calling back,
Lay not your blame on me.

5. That by means of which something is done.

The gods would not have delivered a soul into the body which hath arms and legs, only instruments of doing; but that it was intended the mind should employ them.—Sir P. Sidney.

All voluntary self-denials and austerities which Christianity commends become necessary, not simply for themselves, but as instruments towards a higher end.—Dr. H. More, Discourse of Christian Piety.
Reputation is the smallest sacrifice those can make us, who have been the instruments of our ruin.—Scott.

There is one thing to be considered concerning reason, whether syllogism be the proper instrument of it, and the unskillful way of exercising this faculty.—Locke.

6. One who acts only to serve the purposes of another.

He scarcely knew what was done in his own chamber, but as it pleased her instruments to frame themselves.—Sir P. Sidney.
The bold are but the instruments of the wise. They undertake the dangers they advise.—Dryden.

Instrumental adj.

1. Conducive as means to some end; organic.

All second and instrumental causes, without that operative faculty which God gave them, would become altogether silent, virtuous, and dead.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.
Prayer, which is instrumental to every thing, hath a particular promise in this thing.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercise of holy Living.

I discern some excellent final causes of conjunction of body and soul; but the instrumental I know not, nor what invisible bands and fetters unite them together.—Bentley.

2. Acting to some end; contributing to some purpose; helpful: (used of persons and things).

The presbyterian merit is of little weight, when they allege themselves instrumental towards the restoration.—Swift.

3. In Music. Consisting in, produced by, instruments, as opposed to voices.

They which, under pretence of the law ceremonial abrogated, require the abrogation of instrumental music, approving nevertheless the use of vocal melody to remain, must show some reason, wherefore the one should be thought a legal ceremony and not the other.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Off in bands,

While they keep watch, or nightly bounding walk,
With heavenly touch of instrumental sounds
In full harmonious number join'd, their voices
Divide the night, and lift our thoughts to heaven.

Sweet voices, mix'd with instrumental sounds,
Ascend the vaulted roof, the vaulted roof rebounds.—Dryden.

Instrumentality s. Subordinate agency; agency of anything as means to an end.

Those natural and involuntary actions are not done by deliberation and formal command, yet they are done by the virtue, energy, and influx of the soul, and the instrumentality of the spirits.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Morality.
From that liability to abuse with which State power is charged, no human instrumentality is exempt.—Titcomb, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. iv.

And so in military matters, the discovery of gunpowder developed the science of attack and defence in a new instrumentality. Again, it is said that when Napoleon began his career of victories, the enemy's generals pronounced that his battles were fought against rule, and that he ought not to conquer.—Seymour, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. i, sec. iii.

Instrumentally adv. In an instrumental manner.

1. In the nature of an instrument; as means to an end.

Habitual preparation for the sacrament consists in a standing, permanent habit, or principle of holiness, wrought chiefly by God's spirit, and instrumentally by his word, in the heart or soul of a man.—South, Sermons.

2. With instruments of music.

The earlier fathers of the church . . . condemned musical devotion when instrumentally accompanied.—Mason, Essays historical and critical on English Church Music, p. 27.

Instrumentalness s. Attribute suggested by instrumental; usefulness as means to an end. Rare.

The instrumentalness of riches to works of charity, has rendered it very political, in every Christian commonwealth, by laws to settle and secure propriety.—Hammond.

Instyle. See Enstyle.

Insatiability s. [Lat. avaritia = sweet; saturitas = sweetness.] Unpleasantness.

(For example see insatiable.)

Insubordination s. State of disorder; want of discipline.

The insubordination of the demoralized army was beyond the influence of even the most popular of the generals.—Arnold, History of Rome.

VOL. I.

Insubstantial adj. Unsubstantial. Rare.

Like the baseless fabric of this vision,
The cloud-capt towers, the gorgeous palaces,
The solemn temples, the great globe itself,
Yea, all which it inherit, shall dissolve;
And, like this insubstantial pageant faded,
Leave not a rack behind.—Shakespeare, Tempest, iv. 1.

Insuccation s. [Lat. succus = juice.] Soaking. Rare.

An concerning the medicating and insuccation of seeds, I am no great favourer of it.—Evelyn, b. i. ch. i. § 5.

Insuccess s. Want of success. Rare.

The insuccess of an affair, how it alters quite the mind that fancied loud trumpet makes.—Kellthorn, Remorse, 78. (Ord MS.)

Insulé. See Ensure.

Insufferable adj.

1. Intolerable; insupportable; intense beyond endurance.

The one is oppressed with constant heat, the other with insufferable cold.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Eyes that confound him born for kingly ways,
So here, they flash'd insufferable day.—Dryden.
Though great light be insufferable to our eyes, yet the highest degree of darkness does not at all discompose them; because that causing no disorderly motion, leaves that curious organ undisturbed.—Locke.

2. Detestable; contemptible; disgusting beyond endurance.

A multitude of scribbled, who daily peester the world with their insufferable stuff, should be discouraged from a writing any more.—Dryden.

Insufferably adv. To a degree beyond endurance.

Those heavenly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly with their blaze,
Insufferably bright.—Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 1082.

There is no person remarkably ungrateful, who was not also insufferably proud.—South, Sermons.

Insufficiency s. Same as Insufficiency.

We will give you sleepy drinks, that your senses, unintelligent of our insufficiency, may, though they cannot perceive us, as little accuse us.—Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, i. 1.

Insufficiency s. Inadequateness to any end or purpose; want of requisite value or power: (used of things and persons).

The minister's aptness or insufficiency, otherwise than by reading to instruct the flock, standeth in this place as a stranger, with whom our form of common prayer hath nothing to do.—Hosker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The insufficiency of the light of nature is, by the light of scripture, so fully supplied, that further light than this hath added, there doth not need unto that end.—Hooker.
His experience had discovered their defect and insufficiency, I did certainly conclude them to be infallible.—Bishop Wilkins.

Consider the plea made use of to this purpose, and shew the insufficiency and weakness of them.—Bishop Atterbury.

Insufficient adj. Inadequate to any need, use, or purpose; wanting abilities; incapable; unfit.

The bishop to whom they shall be presented may justly reject them as incapable and insufficient.—Spence, View of the State of Ireland.

We are weak, dependant creatures, insufficient to our own happiness, full of wants which of ourselves we cannot relieve, exposed to a numerous train of evils which we know not how to divert.—Rogers.
Fasting kills by the bad state, not by the insufficient quantity of fluids.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

Insufflation s. [Lat. sufflatio, -onis = blowing, from sufflo = blow upon; pass. part. sufflatus.] Act of breathing upon.

Imposition of hands is a custom of parents in blessing their children, but taken up by the apostles instead of that divine insufflation which Christ used.—Hammond, On Fundamental Principles.

St. Basil, expressly comparing the divine insufflation upon Adam with that of Christ (1st John, x. 22) upon the Apostles, tells us that Jesus the same Son of God by whom God gave the insufflation, then indeed together with the soul, but now into the soul.—Bishop Hall, Works, iii. 1123.

Insuitable adj. Unsuitable. Rare.

Many other rites of the Jewish worship seemed to him unsuitable to the Divine nature.—Bishop Burnet, Life of Lord Rochester, p. 73.

Insular adj. [Lat. insularis, from insula = island.] Belonging to an island.

7 Z

Such is the system of insular subordination, which, having little variety, cannot afford much delight in the view.—Johann, Journey to the Western Islands of Scotland.

Insular s. Islander. Rare.

It is much to be lamented, that our insulars, who act and think so much for themselves, should yet, from excessiveness of air and diet, grow stupid or dead sooner than other people, who, by virtue of oblique air, water-drinking, and light food, prowever their faculties to extreme old age.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 100.

Insularity s. Condition of an island; island character.

The insularity of Britain was first shown by Agricola, who sent his fleet round it.—Pinkerton, Geography.

Insularity adj. Insular. Rare.

Drum, being surrounded with the sea, is hardly to be invaded, having many other insularity advantages.—Howell.

Insulate v. a.

1. Make, convert into, separate as, an island.

The Eden here forms two branches, and insulates the ground.—Pennant, Tour in Scotland.

2. In Electricity. Limit, the electric force to a certain part by the interposition of insulators.

Insulated adj. Not contiguous on any side; not connected.

An administration, composed of insulated individuals.—Burke, On the present and future of the French Revolution, p. 170.
Prudence would dictate this in the case of separate insulated men.—Id., Reflections on the Revolution in France.

Insulation s.

1. Separation, as that of the occupants of an island.

2. In Electricity. Limitation, and consequent concentration of the electric force by means of insulators.

Insulator s. In Electricity. Electric; non-conductor.

The electric . . . are sometimes called insulators.—Brande, Manual of Chemistry, p. 150.
(For fuller extract, see Electricity.)

Insulse adj. [Lat. insulsus foolish.] Dull; insipid; heavy; stupid. Rare.

An insulse and frigid affectation.—Milton, Apology for Smectonius.

Rabbinical scholars, not well attending, . . . gave us this insulse rule out of their Talmud.—Ibid.

Insulosity s. Stupidity. Rare.

They could not give reasons, not invalid, to justify the counsel of God and fate from the insulosity of mortal tongues.—Milton, On the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce, clviii. (Ord MS.)

Insult v. a. [Lat. insultare = leap upon.] Trample upon; treat with insolence or contempt.

It pleas'd the king his master very lately
To strike at me upon his misconstruction;
When he conjured, and that time his displeasure,
Tript me behind; being down, insulted, rail'd,
And put upon him such a deal of man,
That worthied him, got praises of the king
For him attempting who was self-slandred.—Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

Insult v. n. Behave with insolent triumph.

There shall the spectator see some insulting with joy, others fretting with melancholy.—B. Jonson, Discoveries.

Too many insult in this just punishment, who have deserved more.—Bishop Hall, Occasional Meditations, § 92.

Especially when they sing at ease in full content,
Insulting over the toil they underwent,
Yet still they find a future task remain,
To turn the mill.

Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, ii. 250.

The poet makes his hero, after he was slayed by the death of Hector, and the honour he did his friend by insulting over his murderer, to be moved by the tears of King Priam.—Pope.

Insult s.

1. Act of leaping upon anything.

Terrible balls of flame bursting forth near the foundations with frequent insultra, and burning divers times the workmen, rendered the place inaccessible.—Whitby, Paraphrase on the New Testament, general preface, p. xxviii.

With the accent on the second syllable.

The bull's insult at four she may sustain,
But after ten from nuptial rites refrain.—Dryden, Translation of the Georgics, iii. 39.

2. Act or speech of insolence or contempt.

The ruthless sneer that insulted to grief.

Shakespeare.

Take the sentence seriously, because galleries are an insult on the unfortunate.—Brownie, Notes on the Oldways.

Insultation. s. Insulting or injurious treatment. Rare.

Continual care checks the spirit; continual labour checks the body, and continual insultation both.—Felltham, Reader, i. 14.

Harl and want of iron, insultations, scars, and extremities of ill usage of all kinds.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 124.

The perfidiousness of friends, the fraud of flatterers, and the impudent insultations of the basest of the people.—Bishop Prædicator, Eucharistia, p. 183.

Insultor. s. One who treats another with insolent triumph.

Paying what ransom the insultor willeth.
Shakespeare, Venus and Adonis.

A despised martyr insulting over his murderers, wearing his torments.—Whitlock, Observations on the present Manners of the English, p. 333.

Ev'n man, the merciless insultor man,
Man, who rejoices in our sex's weakness,
Shall pity thee.—Rosce, Jane Shore.

Insulting. part. adj. Conveying an insult: (as, 'insulting language').

Insulting. s. Act of speech of contempt or insolence.

Grievous reproaches and scornful insultings over him in his afflictions.—Barrow, Works, i. 291.

Insultingly. adv. In an insulting manner; with contemptuous triumph.

Insultingly, he made your love his boast,
Gave me my life, and told me what it cost.—Dryden.

Insultive. v. a. [Lat. insulto—take.] Take in. In dressing the roots, he is sparing as possible of the fibres, which are as it were the central veins, which insure and convey the nourishment to the whole tree.—Kelley, Terra.

Insuperable. adj. [Lat. super—overcome; super—above.] Invincible; insurmountable; not to be conquered; not to be overcome.

This appears to be an insuperable objection, because of the evidence that sense seems to give it.—Sir K. Dugby, Treatise on the Nature of Ideas.

Much might be done, would we but endeavour; nothing is insuperable to pains and patience.—Rog, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

And middle natures how they long to join,
But never pass the insuperable line.
Pope, Essay on Man, i. 227.

Insuperably. adv. In an insuperable manner; invincibly; insurmountably.

Between the grain and the vein of a diamond there is this difference, that the former furthers, the latter, being so insuperably hard, hinders the splitting of it.—Greer, Mugum.

Insupportable. adj. Intolerable; insufferable; not to be endured.

A discourse put upon a man in company is insupportable: it is heightened according to the greatness, and multiplied according to the number of persons that hear.—South, Sermons.

The thought of being nothing after death is a burden insupportable to a virtuous man.—Dryden.

Samuel's terrors now became insupportable.—Marsden, History of England, ch. xlii.

Insupportableness. s. Attribute suggested by insupportable; insufferableness; state of being beyond endurance.

Then tell she to as pitiful a declaration of the insupportableness of her desires, that David's ears prevailed his eyes with tears to give testimony how much they suffered for her suffering.—Sir P. Sidney.

Insuppressible. adj. Not to be concealed or suppressed; kept down, or kept in the background.

Such an example have we in Addison; which, though hitherto suppressed yet, when once known, is insuppressible, of a nature too rare, too striking to be forgotten.—Young, Conjectures on Original Composition.

Insuppressive. adj. Not to be kept under; suppressed, kept down, or in the background. Barbarous.

Do not stain
The even virtue of our enterprise,
Nor this insuppressive motto of our spirits.
Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

An insuppressive spring will toss him up,
In spite of fortune's load.—Young, Night Thoughts, vii.

Insurable. Insure. Insurer. See Insurance, &c.

Insurgent. s. [Lat. surgo—rise, pres. part. 1274

surgens, -entis.] One who rises in open rebellion against the established government of his country.

On the part of his imperial majesty, the insurgents were not treated with lenity.—Guthrie's Grammar of Geography, The Netherlands.

Insurmountable. adj. Insuperable; unconquerable.

This difficulty is insurmountable, till I can make simplicity and vary it the same.—Locke.

Hope thinks nothing difficult; despair tells us, that difficulty is insurmountable.—Watts.

If we attempt to think of mechanical force as in itself different from our impression of it, there arises the insurmountable difficulty that there is no remaining species of impression to represent it.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Insurrection. s. Scilicet rising; rebellious commotion.

Between the action of a dreadful thing
And the first motion, all the interim is Like a phantasm, or a hideous dream:
The genius and the mortal instruments
Are then in council; and the state of man,
Like to a little kingdom, suffers then
The nature of an insurrection.—Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, ii. 1.

This city of old time hath made insurrection against kings, and that rebellion and sedition have been made therein.—Essex, iv. 19.

There shall be a great insurrection upon the that fear the Lord.—2 Esdras, xvi. 76.

Insurrections of base people are commonly more furious in their beginnings.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

The trade of Rome had like to have suffered another great stroke by an insurrection in Egypt.—Arbuthnot.

Insurrectionary. adj. Suitable to an insurrection.

Churches, play-houses, coffee-houses, all alike are destined to be melted, and equalised, and blended into one common rubbish; and well sifted, and lividated, to crystallize into true democratic explosive insurrectionary nitre.—Burke, Letter to a Noble Lord.

Insusceptible. adj. Not susceptible; not capable.

I find in the bosom of your last harsh and stiff matter from Scotland, and I believe insusceptible of any further concoction, unless it be with much time, and consequent omnia.—Sir H. Walton, to Lady Walton, letter dated 1658.

Insurrection. s. [Lat. insurreo—whisper.] Act of whispering into something. Rare.

The other party insinuates their Roman principles by whispers and private insurrections.—Laguna Liguor, pref. A. 4. b. 1653.

Intact. adj. [Lat. intactus.] Untouched.

As long as they are preserved intact, and as long as they are fearlessly and frequently employed, there will always be ample protection against those encroachments on the part of government which cannot be too jealously watched, and to which even the freest country is liable.—Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. i. ch. vii.

Intagliated. adj. Engraven; stamped on.

In the marble grounds towards Barton, lying on a bed of stone, has been found a species of marble, a stony stone, very beautiful, deeply intagliated or engraved like a seal, and striated from the prominent pentagonal edges above, to a centre in the bottom.—T. Walton, History of the Parish of Kidlington, p. 25.

Intaglio. s. [Italian.] Anything that has figures engraved on it so as to rise above the ground.

We meet with the figures which Juvenal describes on antique intaglios and medals.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Intail. See Entail.

Intangible. adj. Incapable of being touched.

Being extremely solid, as well as invisible, [a fenced portable castle], a man should be still in danger of knocking his head against every wall and pillar, unless it were also intangible, as some of the Peripateticks affirm.—Bishop Wilkins, Discovery of a New World, pt. ii. p. 148.

Intangible. s. See Entangle.

Intastable. adj. Incapable of being tasted. Barbarous.

Something which is invisible, intastable, and intangible, as existing only in the fancy, may produce a pleasure superior to that of sense.—Græve.

Integer. s. [Lat.] Whole of anything; whole number.

'As' not only signified a piece of money, but any integer, from whence is derived the word 'ass,' or unit.—Arbuthnot, Tables of ancient Coins, Weights, and Measures.

Integral. adj. [Lat. entire; Fr. entier.]

1. Whole: (applied to a thing considered as comprising all its constituent parts).

A local motion keepeth bodies integral, and their parts together.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Uninjured; complete; not defective.

No wonder if one remain speechless, though of integral principles, who, from an infant, should be bred up amongst mutes, and have no teaching.—Hobbes.

3. Not fractional; not broken into fractions.

Integral and integral is applied by the schoolmen to those parts which are necessary to the integrity of the whole; in which sense they stand contradistinguished from the essential parts... arms and legs are integral... body and soul essential parts. Integral calculus in the new analysis is the counterpart to the differential.—Rees, Cyclopædia.

Integral. s. Whole made up of parts.

Physicians, by the help of anatomical dissections, have searched into those various meanders of the veins, arteries, nerves, and integrals of the human body.—Sir M. Hale.

Consider the infinite complications and combinations of several concurrences to the constitution and operation of almost every integral in nature.—Id.

A mathematical whole is better called integral, when the several parts, which make up the whole, are distinct, and each may subsist apart.—Watts.

Integrality. s. Wholeness; completeness.

Such as in their integrality support nature.—Whitaker, Blood of the Grape.

Integrally. adv. In an integral manner; wholly; completely.

They are integrally, or in their parts, helpful or hurtful.—Whitaker, Blood of the Grape.

It is the peculiarity of the human mind, that it cannot take an object in, which is submitted to it, simply and integrally.—J. H. Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrine, ch. ii. § 1.

Integument. adj. Contributing to make up a whole.

Not compounded like bodies of integral parts.—L. Addison, Account of the present State of the Jews, p. 18: 1675.

A true natural aristocracy is not a separate interest in the state, or separable from it. It is an essential integral part of any large people rightly constituted.—Burke.

(For another example see under Integral.)

Integrate. v. a. Form one whole; contain all the parts of.

Two distinct substances, the soul and the body, go to compound and integrate the man.—South, Sermons, ii. 14.

All the several branches of it are required to integrate or make up the Gospel spirit.—Hammond, Works, iv. 501.

All the particular doctrines which integrate Christianity.—Chillingworth, Religion of Protestants a safe Way to Salvation, § 154.

Integration. s. Act of making whole. See Summation.

Integrity. s.

1. Honesty; incorrupt mind; purity of manners; uncorruptedness.

Macduff, this noble passion,
Child of integrity, hath from my soul
Wiped the black scruples, reconciled my thoughts
To thy good truth and honour.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

Whoever has examined both parties cannot go far towards the extremes of either, without violence to his integrity or understanding.—Swift.

The libertine, instead of attempting to corrupt his integrity, will conceal and disguise his own vice.—Rogers.

2. Purity; genuine unadulterated state.

Language continued long in its purity and integrity.—Sir M. Hale.

3. Entireness; unbroken whole.

Take away this transformation, and there is no chaos, nor can it affect the integrity of the action.—Brownie.

Integument. s. That which covers or envelopes another.

I make no question but all kinds of wits and capacities may be found under all tinctures and integuments.—Sir H. Walton, Reliquie Wottonianæ, p. 79.

He could not move live without his freeze-cast than without his skin: it is not indeed so properly his coat, as what the anatomists call one of the integuments of the body.—Addison.

If, with Cuvier, we compare and class them [animals] according to the structure of the skeleton, or, with Blainville, according to the nature of their outward integuments, the agreements and differences which are observable in these respects are not only of much greater importance in themselves, but are marks of agreements and differences in many other important particulars of the structure and mode of life of the animals.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. iv. ch. ii. § 4.

Intellect. s. [Lat. intellectus, pass. part. of intelligo—understand; substantives, intellectus, intelligibilis, gen, intelligentia; adjective, intelligibilis.] Intelligent mind; power of understanding.

All heart they live, all head, all eye, all ear,
All intellect, all sense.

Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 350.

All those arts, rarities, and inventions, which vulgar minds gaze at, and the ingenious pursue, are but the reliques of an intellect deflected with sin and time.—South, Sermons.

Intellection. s. Act of understanding.

Simple apprehension denotes the soul's naked intellection of an object, without either composition or deduction.—Glauville, Novus Scientifus.

They will say 'tis not the bulk or substance of the animal spirit, but its motion and agility, that produces intellection and sense.—B. Hall, Sermons.

The distinction between ideas of mere sensation and those of intellection, between what the mind comprehends, and what it conceives without comprehending, is the point of divergence between the two schools of psychology which still exist in the world.—Hutton, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth Centuries, pt. iv. ch. iii. § 113.

Intellective. adj.

1. Having power to understand.

Because the intellective soul is not of necessity serving to any other faculty or power, therefore is she as lady, mistress, and queen, over all the other powers, faculties, or virtues of the soul.—Brinkell, Discourse of Civil Life, p. 16; 1603.

In the section of bodies, we find many, of all sensible creatures, to have the fullest brain for its proportion, and that it was so provided by the Supreme Wisdom for the lodging of the intellective faculties.—Sir H. Walton, Reliquie Waltonianae, p. 81.

If a man as intellective be created, then either he means the whole man, or only that by which he is intellective.—Glauville.

2. To be perceived by the intellect; not the senses.

Instead of beginning with arts most easy, find those he such as are most obvious to the sense; they present their young untrammelled powers with the most intellective abstractions of logic and metaphysics.—Wilson, Treatise on Education.

Intellectual. adj.

1. Relating to the understanding; belonging to the mind; transacted by the understanding.

Religion teaches us to present to God our bodies as well as our souls: if the body serves the soul in actions natural and civil, and intellectual, it must not be eased in the only offices of religion.—Jeremy Taylor.

2. Mental; comprising the faculty of understanding; belonging to the mind.

Locke is to teach us the right use of our reason or intellectual powers.—Watts.

3. Ideal; perceived by the intellect, not the senses.

In a dark vision's intellectual scene,
Beneath a lower for sorrow made,
The melancholy Cowley lay.

A train of phantoms in wild order rose,
And, join'd, this intellectual scene compose.
Pope, Temple of Fame.

4. Having the power of understanding.

Aristotles and Plato term the Maker of the world an intellectual worker.—Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual being,
These thoughts that wander through eternity,
To perish rather, swallow'd up and lost?

Milton, Paradise Lost, li. 146.

5. Proposed as the object not of the senses but intellect: (as, 'undworth names his book 'The Intellectual System of the Universe').

Intellectual. s. Intellect; understanding; mental powers or faculties. Rare.

Her husband . . .
Whose higher intellectual more I shun.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 482.

I have not consulted the repute of my intellects in bringing their weakness into such discerning presence.—Glauville.

The fancies of most, like the index of a clock, are moved but by the inward springs of the corporeal machine; which, even on the most sublimed intellectual, is dangerously influential.—Id., Novus Scientifus.

Intellectualism. s. System of doctrines connected with the intellect, or understanding.

All these modes of teaching will resolve themselves into the mere culture of the understanding. We do injustice by terming it intellectualism. The higher faculties must wither, and that soon, beneath its influence wherever it is introduced and prevails.—Channing, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. x.

Intellectualist. s. One who overrates the human understanding.

Upon these intellectualists, which are notwithstanding commonly taken for the most sublime and divine philosophers, Heraclitus gave a just censure.—Bacon, Advancement of Learning, b. i.

Intellectuality. s. State of intellectual power.

Sense signifies little in this place, he being no better than a cosmopolite atheist, i. e. he made a certain plausibly or spematically nature, devoid of all animality or consciousness, intellectuality, to be the highest principle in the universe.—Hallstead, Metaphysics, p. 81; 1881.

Intelligence. s. [Lat. intelligo—understand; pass. part. intellectus.]

1. Commerce of information; notice; mutual communication; account of things distant or secret.

Intelligence, which cometh of intelligentia, is the perceiving of that which is first conceived by understanding called intellectus. Also intelligence is now used for an elegant word, where there fare mutual treaties of appointments, either by letters or messages, specially concerning warres, or like other great affairs, between princes or noble men.—Sir Thomas Elphinstone, The Governance, fol. 201; 1580.

It was perceived there had not been in the catholicks so much foresight as to provide that true intelligence might pass between them of what was done.—Hobbes, Ecclesiastical Polity.

He furnished his employed men liberally with money, to draw on and reward intelligence; giving them also in charge to advertise continually what they found.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Let all the passages
Be well secured, that no intelligence
May pass between the prince and them.

Sir J. Inham, The Sophy.

2. Commerce of acquaintance; terms on which men live one with another.

Faction followers are worst to be liked, which follow not upon affection to him with whom they range themselves; whereupon commonly ensueth that ill intelligence that we see between great personages.—Bacon.

He lived rather in a fair intelligence than any friendship with the favourites.—Lord Clarendon.

3. Spirit; disembodied mind.

How fully hast thou satisfied me, pure
Intelligence of heaven!

Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 190.

There are divers ranks of created beings intermediate between the glorious God and man, as the glorious angels and created intelligences.—Sir M. Hale.

Satan, appearing like a cherub to Uriel, the intelligence of the sun circumscribed him even in his own province.—Dryden.

4. Understanding; skill.

Heaps of huge towers, up hoarded hideously,
They think to be chief praise of poetry;
And thereby wanting due intelligence,
Have marr'd the face of goodly poesy.

Spenser.

Intelligenceer. s. One who sends or conveys news; one who gives notice of private or distant transactions; one who carries messages between parties.

His eyes, being his diligent intelligence, could carry unto him no other news but discomfortable.—Sir P. Sidney.

How deep you were within the books of heaven?

To us, th' imagin'd voice of heav'n itself;

The very opener and intelligence
Between the grace and sanctities of heav'n,
And our dull workings.

Shakespeare, Henry IV. Part II. iv. 2.

If they had instructions to that purpose, they might be the best intelligence to the king of the true state of his whole kingdom.—Bacon.

They have new-catchers and intelligence, who make them acquainted with the conversation of the whole kingdom.—Spectator.

Intelligenceer. adj. Conveying information; giving notice of private or distant transactions.

A mankind with her, out o' door:
A most intelligenceer lady!

Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, ii. 2.

He [an apparitor] is a cunning hunter, uncoupling his intelligence bounds under bedders, in thickets, and corn-fields, who follow the chase forty-suburbs.—Sir T. Drury, Characters, sig. 1. 3.

The address . . . gave cause of suspicion to the Earl of Richmond's intelligence friends, that the king had a purpose to marry the lady Elizabeth.—Sir G. Buck, History of King Richard III., p. 127.

That said intelligence tyrant, that mischiefs the world with his mischiefs of cheer.—Milton, Of Reformation in England, b. ii.

Intelligent. adj.

1. Knowing; instructed; skillful.

It is not only in order of nature for him to govern that is the more intelligent, as Aristotle would have it; but there is no less required for government, courage to protect, and above all industry.—Tacitus.

With of.

Intelligent of senses, they set forth
Their very caravan.—Milton, Paradise Lost, vii. 127.

2. Giving information: (with of).

Servants, who seem no less,
Which are to France the spies and speculations
Intelligent of our state.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 1.

Intelligential. adj.

1. Consisting of unbodyed mind.

Food alike of these pure
Intellectual substances require,
As doth your rational.

Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 387.

2. Intellectual; exercising understanding.

In at his mouth
The devil enter'd; and his brutal sense,
His heart or head possessing, soon inspir'd
With act intelligent.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 190.

Intelligibility. s.

1. Capability to be understood.

This while it added to intelligibility, would take from passively its feeling draw, and certainly leave it sufficient gravity.—Mason, Essay historical and critical on English Church Music, p. 221.

2. Power of understanding; intellection.

The soul's nature consists in intelligibility.—Glauville.

Intelligible. adj. Capable of being understood.

We shall give satisfaction to the mind, to show it a fair and intelligible account of the deluge.—T. Burnet, Theory of the Earth.

Something must be lost in all translations, but the sense will remain, which would of course be named, when it is scarce intelligible.—Dryden.

Intelligible. s. Capable of being understood.

The means of derivation, and immediate union of these intelligible objects to the understanding, are various; sometimes divine and supernatural, as by immediate irradiation or revelation; sometimes artificial and instituted, as by discourse and instituted signs, and thus intelligible are conveyed from one man to another by words or writing.—Sir M. Hale, Originum of Manhood, (bnd MS.)

Intelligibleness. s. Attribute suggested by Intelligible; possibility to be understood; perspicuity.

It is in our ideas that both the rightness of our knowledge, and the propriety of intelligibleness of our speaking, consists.—Locke.

Intelligibly. adv. In an intelligible manner; so as to be understood; clearly; plainly.

The genuine sense, intelligibly told,
Shews a translator both discreet and bold.

Lord Bacon, Common.

To write of metals and minerals intelligibly, is a task very difficult than to write of animals.—Woodward, Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth.

Intemerate. adj. [Lat. intemeratus.] Undetiled; unpolluted.

The entire and intemerate comeliness of virtues.—Parthenia Sacra, Tr. A. iii. b; 1633.

Intemperate. part. pres. Same as Intemerate.

The primities of their intemperate youth.—Audacious on Glauville, dv. p. 290; 1682.

Intemerateness. s. Attribute suggested by Intemerate. Rare.

They shall ever keep the sincerity and intemerateness of the fountain whence they are derived.—Donne, Poems, Letter to Sir H. G., p. 291.

Intemperament. s. Bad constitution. Rare.

 The quantity of life is to be estimated not merely from the duration, but also from the intenseness of living. Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 109.

2. Vehemence; ardency.
 The imagination of the Hebrew [words] meant some intenseness in the act. Sir N. Knatchbull, Annotations upon some difficult Texts in all the Books of the New Testament, p. 135.

3. Great attention; earnestness.
 Some may affirm this, who do not take the trouble to reflect on the state of their mind while sleeping, because of their intenseness on their waking thoughts and business, or otherwise. A. Baxter, Enquiry into the Nature of the human Soul, li. 117.

Intension. s. Act of forcing or straining anything; (opposed to remission or relaxation).

Sounds will be carried further with the wind than against it; and likewise do rise and fall with the intention or remission of the wind.—Baron, Natural and Experimental History.

Faith differs from hope in the extension of its object, and in the intention of desire.—Jeremy Taylor, Rules and Knowledge of holy Living.

Intensity. s. Excess.

The number engaged in crimes, instead of turning them into laudable acts, only augments the quantity and the intensity of the guilt.—Burke.

We cannot measure secondary qualities in the same manner in which we measure primary qualities, by a mere addition of parts. There is this leading and remarkable difference, that while both classes of qualities are susceptible of changes of magnitude, primary qualities increase by addition of extension, secondary, by augmentation of intensity. A space is doubled when another equal space is placed by its side; one weight joined to another makes up the sum of the two. But when one degree of warmth is combined with another, or one shade of red colour with another, we cannot in like manner talk of the sum. The component parts do not evidently retain their separate existence; we cannot separate a strong green colour into two weaker ones, as we can separate a large force into two smaller. The increase is absorbed into the previous amount, and is no longer in evidence as a part of the whole. And this is the difference which has given birth to the two words extended and intense. That is extended which has 'partes extra partes,' parts outside of parts; that is intense which becomes stronger by some indirect and unperceptible increase of agency, like the stretching of the internal springs of a machine, as the term intensity implies. Extended magnitudes can at will be resolved into the parts of which they were originally composed, or any other which the nature of their extension admits; their proportion is apparent; they are directly and at once subject to the relations of number. Intensive magnitudes cannot be resolved into smaller magnitudes; we can see that they differ, but we cannot tell in what proportion; we have no direct measure of their quantity. How many times hotter than blood is boiling water? The answer cannot be given by the act of our feelings of heat alone.—Whewell, Novum Organum renovatum.

To raise its body through a given space, its muscles have to be contracted with twice the intensity, at a double cost of matter expended.—Herbert Spencer, Inductions of Biology.

Intensive. adj.

1. Stretched or increased with respect to itself; which may admit increase of degree.

As his perfection is infinitely greater than the perfection of a man, so it is infinitely greater than the perfection of an angel; and were it not infinitely greater than the perfection of an angel, it could not be infinitely greater than the perfection of a man, because the intensive distance between the perfection of an angel and of a man is but finite.—Sir J. Hale.

2. Intent; unremitting.

Tired with that assiduous attendance and intensive circumspection which a long fortune did require, he was not unwilling to bestow upon another some part of the pains.—Sir H. Walton.

Intensively. adv. In an intensive manner; by increase of degree.

God and the good angels are more free than we are, that is, intensively in the degree of freedom, but not extensively in the latitude of the object; according to a liberty of exercise, but not of specification.—Archbishop Bramhall, Answer to Hobbes.

Intent. adj. Anxiously diligent; fixed with close application.

a. With to.

Distractions in England made most men intent to their own safety.—Eikon Basilike.

b. With on or upon.

When we use but those means which God hath laid before us, it is a good sign that we are rather intent upon God's glory than our own convenience.—Jeremy Taylor.

The general himself had been more intent upon his command.—Lord Clarendon.

They are their worth and dance

Intent. Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 780.

Of action eager, and intent on thought.

The chiefs your honourable danger sought. Dryden.

Were men as intent upon this as on things of lower concernment, there are none so enslaved to the necessities of life, who might not find many vacancies that might be husbanded to this advantage of their knowledge.—Locke.

Whilst they are intent on one particular part of their theme, they lend all their thoughts to prove or disprove some proposition that relates to that part, without attention to the consequences that may affect another.—Watts.

Intent. s. Design; purpose; drift; view formed; meaning; compass.

Although the Scripture of God be stored with infinite variety of matter in all kinds, although it abound with all sorts of laws, yet the principal intent of Scripture is to deliver the laws of duties, supernatural.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

This fury fit for her intent she chose;

One who delights in wars, and human woes.

• Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 433.

Of darkness visible so much he lent,

As half to shew, half veil the deep intent.

• Pope, Dunciad, iv. 3.

To all intents and purposes. In all senses, whatever be meant or designed.

There is an incurable blindness caused by a resolution not to see; and, to all intents and purposes, he who will not open his eyes is for the present as blind as he that cannot. South, Sermons.

He was miserable to all intents and purposes.—

Sir R. L'Estrange.

Intention. s.

1. Eagerness of desire; closeness of attention; deep thought; vehemence or ardour of mind.

Effectual prayer is joined with a vehement intention of the inferior powers of the soul, which cannot therein long continue without pain; it hath been therefore thought good, by turns, to interpose still somewhat for the higher part of the mind and the understanding to work upon.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

In persons possessed with other notions of religion, the understanding cannot quit these but by great examination; which cannot be done without some labour and intention of the mind, and the thoughts dwelling a considerable time upon the survey and discussion of each particular. South, Sermons.

Intention is when the mind with great earnestness, and of choice, fixes its view on any idea, considers it on every side, and will not be called off by the ordinary solicitation of other ideas.—Locke.

2. Design; purpose.

I wish others the same intention, and greater success.—Sir W. Temple.

Most part of chemical distempers proceed from heat of the fibres; in which case the principal intention is to restore the tone of the solid parts.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

The operations of agents about intention and remission; but essences are not capable of such variation. Locke.

Intentional. adj. Designed; done by design.

The glory of God is the end which every intelligent being is bound to consult, by a direct and intentional service. Rogers.

Intentionally. adv. In an intentional manner.

I find in myself that this inward principle doth exert many of its actions intentionally and purposely. Sir M. Hale.

Whenever I am wishing to write to you, I shall conclude you are intentionally doing so to me.—Bishop Atterbury, to Pope.

Intentionary. adj. Attentive. Rare.

We give no ear, no serious and intentionary hearkening to it; it never comes to be a meditation of the heart.—Charadon, Tracts. (Ord MS.)

Intensive. adj. Diligently applied; busily attentive.

Where the object is fine and accurate, it conducteth much to have the sense intensive and erect.—Baron, Natural and Experimental History.

The naked relation, at least the intensive consideration of that, is able still, and at this disadvantage of time, to rend the hearts of pious contemplators. Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Intensively. adv. In an intensive manner; with application; closely; attentively. Rare.

Let us wait reverently and intensively upon this Bethesda of God, that when the angel shall descend and move the water, our souls may be healed. Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the Old and New Testaments, b. iv.

Intentiveness. s. Attribute suggested by Intensive; state of being intensive; diligent employment or application.

The spirit of man, in our perversion through this life, could as little trust flesh and blood, in point of counsel, for an intensive upon the progression therein, as a traveller to be advised by his host, whether he should march on, or stay and lodge in his house.—W. Montague, Discant Essays, pt. ii. p. 221.

Intently. adv. In an intent manner; earnestly.

If we insist passionately or so intently on the truth of our belief, as not to proceed to any vigorous pursuit of all just, sober, and godly living.—Hammond, On Fundamentals.

The odd paintings of an Indian screen may please a little; but when you fix your eye intently upon them, they appear as disproportioned that they give a painful eye pain.—Bishop Atterbury.

The Chin medal sent him with a volume open, and reading intently.—Pope.

Inténtness. s. Attribute suggested by Intent; anxious application.

When after such a course, either of extreme solitude or inténtness upon business on the one hand, or of safety and freedom of conversation on the other, the frame of a man's spirit comes to be loose and unfixed, and took off from its usual guard; then let him know that the evil hour is preparing for him, and be for that. South, Sermons, vi. 262.

He is more disengaged from his inténtness on affairs.—Swift.

Inter. Element in composition from the Lat. inter—between, among. The French form is entre; which, in English, becomes enter, as in entertain. That the two forms may be confounded with one another is what we expect from the confusion between in and in. The principle, however, which regulates their use is the same in both cases. When a word is introduced ready-made we take one form; when we put the parts together in English we take another. Thus we say Entertain and Inter-meddle. But, though the principle is the same, the application of it is different. As compared with in, the French en prevails, being used before even words of English origin. As compared with entre the Latin inter prevails, being used before both French and English words, as inter-marry, inter-leave.

In respect to its import, inter, though it may signify both among and between, generally signifies the latter; with which power it is often prefixed to a word already suggestive of mutual action; being in such cases more or less unnecessary.

Inter. v. a. [Fr. enterrer; Lat. terra—earth. Enterr, etymologically, is the better spelling.] Bury.

The evil that men do lives after them;

The good is oft interred with their bones.

Shakspeare, Julius Cæsar, iii. 2.

The ashes, in an old record of the convent, are said to have been interred between the very wall and the altar where they were taken up.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

The best way is to inter them as you furrow pease.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Interact. s. In the Drama, Interval between the acts, usually filled up by music.

Play, in good company, is only play and not gaming, not deep, and consequently not dangerous nor dishonourable; it is only the interact of other amusements. Lord Chesterfield.

Interamnián. adj. [Lat. amnis—river.] Lying between rivers. Rare.

The passing of a river could not be reckoned an extraordinary occurrence, especially when the person spoken of lived in an interamnián country; and in a part of it which was close bounded by two streams, the Tiber and the Euphrates.—Brugard, Mythology, iii. 420.

Interbastation. s. [bast—in the sense given by sempstresses.] Patchwork. Obsolete.

A metaphor, taken from interbastation, patching or piecing, sewing or clapping close together.—South, Portrait of Old Age, p. 181; 1666.

Interbring. v. a. Convey between two places or persons. Rare.

Best pair of swans, oh! may you interbring Daily new joys. Donne, Poems. (Ord MS.)

Intercalar. adj. [see Kalendur.] Same as Intercalary.

Towards the latter end of February, is the bissextile or intercalary day.—Holder, Discourse concerning Time.

Intercalary. adj. Inserted out of the common order to preserve the equation of time, as the twenty-ninth of February in a leap year is an intercalary day.

The intercalary days, according to the method of the Egyptians, were never accounted any part of the month or year, but only an appendix to them.—Whalley, Rational Illustration of the Book of Common Prayer, ch. v. § 26.

Chamaetris. Ought there not, in these circumstances, to be among our intercalary days sun-broches, a feast of reason?—Curlye, History of the French Revolution.

But whatever modifications these dermal and intercalary apices present above, the same are usually repeated below.—Owen, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, lect. iii.

Intercalate. v. a. Insert an extraordinary day.

In strict law he might urge several pleas (essouin), illness, a pilgrimage, or absence from the realm on the king's service; for each of these the delay of a specified term would be allowed him; and they might be intercalated so as to protract the suit indefinitely. — C. H. Pomeroy, The early and middle Ages of England, ch. xxxiii.

Intercalation. s. Insertion of days out of the ordinary reckoning.

In sixty-three years there may be lost almost eighteen days, omitting the intercalation of one day every fourth year, allowed for this quadrant, or six supernumeraries.—Sir T. Browne.

Intercède. v. n. [Fr. interceder; Lat. intercedo; cessio, -onis.]

1. Pass between.

He supposed that a vast period interceded between that origination and the ages wherein he lived. — Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

These superfluous reflect the greatest quantity of light, which have the greatest refracting power, and which intercede mediums that differ most in their refractive densities. — Sir I. Newton.

2. Mediate; act between two parties with a view of reconciling differences: (with with).

Then the glad Son Presenting, thus to intercede began.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 20.
Nor was our blessed Saviour only our propitiation to die for us, and procure our atonement, but he is still our advocate, continually interceding with his father in behalf of all true penitents. — Calanap.

I may restore myself into the good graces of my fair critics, and your lordship may take credit with them on my promise of amendment. — Dryden.

Origin denies that any prayer is to be made to them, although it be only to intercede with God for us, but only the Son of God. — Bishop Stillingfleet.

Intercéso. s. Intercession.

The acts of the soul are checked immediately in itself, without the intercession of any organ, whereas sensitive faculties work. — Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, 40s. (Ord MS.)

Intercédings. verbal abs. Intercession.

Besides these offerings, and intercedings, there was something more required of the priest; as that is, blessing. — Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. ii.

Intercépt. v. a. [Lat. interceptus; pass. part. of intercipio; in + capio — take; interceptio, -onis.]

1. Stop and seize in the way.

The better course should be by planting of envious about him, which, whenever he shall look forth, or be drawn out, shall be always ready to intercept his going or coming. — Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

If we hope for things which are at too great a distance from us, it is possible that we may be intercepted by death in our progress towards them. — Addison, Spectator.

2. Cut short; check.

Though they cannot answer my distress, Yet in some sort they're better than the tribunes; For that they will not intercept my tale.

Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, iii. 1.
Since death's near, and runs with so much force, We must meet first, and intercept his course.

3. Cut off; preclude.

On barbed steeds they rode in proud array, Thick as the collage of the bees in May, When swarming o'er the dusky fields they fly, New to the flow'rs, and intercept the sky.

Dryden, The Flower and the Leaf, 217.

Which voyaging from Troy the victors bore, While storm's vindictive intercept the shore. — Pope.

Intercépter. s. One who, or that which, intercepts; opponent.

That defence thou hadst, betake thee to't: of what nature the wrongs are thou hadst done him, I know not; but thy interceptor, full of despatch, bloody as the hunter, attends thee at the orchard end. — Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, iii. 4.

Intercéption. s. Stoppage in course; hindrance; obstruction.

The pillars, standing at a competent distance from the outmost wall, will, by interception of the night, somewhat diminish the breadth. — Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

The word in Matthew doth not only signify suspension, but also suffocation, strangulation, or interception of breath. — Sir T. Browne.

Intercéssion. s. Mediation; interposition; agency between two parties; agency in the cause of another, generally in his favour, sometimes against him.

Loving, and therefore constant, he used still the intercession of diligence and faith, ever hoping because he would not put himself into that hell to be hopeless. — Sir P. Sidney.

He maketh intercession to God against Israel. — Romans, xi. 2.

Your intercession now is needless grown;

Retire, and let me speak with her alone.

Dryden, Aurengzebr.

Intercéssionate. v. n. Entreat. Obsecrate. They never ceased extensively to intercessionate God for his recovery. — Nash, Terrors of the Night, 1391.

Intercéssor. s. Mediator; agent between two parties to procure reconciliation.

Behold the heavens! thither thine eyesight bend; Thy looks, sighs, tears, for intercessors send.

Keats.

On man's behalf,

Patron or intercessor, none appear'd.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 218.

When we shall hear our eternal doom from our intercessor, it will convince us that a denial of Christ is more than transitory words. — South, &c

Intercéssory. adj. Interceding.

The Lord's Prayer has an intercessory petition for our enemies. — Barbery, On Modern Evangelism p. 39: 1720.

Interchain. v. a. Chain; link together.

Two bosoms interchain'd with an oath;

So then two bosoms, and a single truth.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, ii. 3.

Interchange. v. a.

1. Put each in the place of the other; give and take mutually; exchange.

They had left but one piece of one ship, whereon they kept themselves in all truth, having interchanged their cares, while either cared for other, each comforting and counselling how to labour for the better, and to abide the worst. — Sir P. Sidney.

I shall interchange

My wained state for Henry's royal crown.

Shakespeare, Henry VI, part III, iv. 7.

But the service rendered by Leslie is quite independent of the accuracy of his opinion, as to the manner in which light and heat are interchanged. — Buckle, History of Civilization in England, vol. ii. ch. vi.

2. Succeed alternately.

His faithful friend and brother Euarchus came so mightily to his succour, that, with some interchanging changes of fortune, they beat of a just war the best child, peace. — Sir P. Sidney.

Interchange. s.

1. Commerce; permutation of commodities.

Those have an interchange or trade with Eleus. — Hesiod.

2. Alternate succession.

With what delights could I have walk'd these round.

If I could joy in night, sweet interchange

Of hill, and valley, rivers, woods, and plains!

Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 111.

The original measures of time, by help of the lights in the instrument, are perceptible to us by the interchange of light and darkness, and succession of seasons. — Hobbes.

Removes and interchanges would often happen in the first years after the flood. — T. Barne, Theory of the Earth.

3. Mutual donation and reception.

Let Diomedes bear him, And bring us Cressid hither, Good Diomedes, Furnish you fairly for this interchange.

Shakespeare, Troilus and Cressida, iii. 3.

Farwell: the leisure, and the fearful time,

Cuts off the ceremonious vows of love,

And ample interchange of sweet discourse.

Id., Richard III, v. 3.

After no end an obligation, owned by so free an acknowledgement, could any thing be expected but a continual interchange of kindnesses? — South, Sermons.

Interchangeable. adj. Capable of being interchanged.

1. Given and taken mutually.

So many testimonies, interchangeable warrants, and counterwarrants, running through the hands and resting in the power of so many several persons, is sufficient to argue and convince all manner of falsehood. — Bacon, Office of Attention.

2. Following each other in alternate succession.

Just under the line they may seem to have two winters and two summers; but these also they have four interchangeable seasons, which is enough whereby to measure. — Hobbes.

All along the history of the Old Testament we find the interchangeable providence of God, towards the people of Israel, always suited to their manners. — Archbishop Tillotson.

Interchangeableness. s. Attribute suggested by interchangeable.

Continued with as much interchangeableness of success. — Fuller, History of the Holy War, p. 128.

Nothing but its interchangeableness with cash can restore the credit of paper. — Huskisson, On Currency, p. 144.

Interchangeably. adv. In an interchangeable manner; alternately; in a manner whereby each gives and receives.

In these two times the east and west churches did interchangeably both confront the Jews and contend with them. — Huskisson, Ecclesiastical Policy.

These articles were signed by our plenipotentiaries, and those of Holland; but not by the French, although it ought to have been done interchangeably; and the ministers here prevailed on the queen to execute a ratification of articles, which only one part had signed. — Swift.

Interchangement. s. Exchange; mutual transference. Rare.

A contract of eternal bond of love, Confirm'd by mutual joinder of your hands, Attested by the holy class of lips, Strengthen'd by interchangement of your rings.

Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, v. 1.

Intérendent. adj. [Lat. caulus — falling.] Falling; occurring casually (casus — fall) in an interval.

'Tis found, by sad experience, that nature rouses herself up to make a crisis, not only upon improper, and as physicians call them, intérendent days, such as the third, fifth, ninth, &c., or upon those they call empty or medicinal days, which seldom afford any crisis, and much seldomer a good one, but also when there appear not any signs of action, or at least of due action, and by these unreasonable attempts weaken the patient, and encrease the malady, or perhaps make it speedily mortal. — Boyle, Free Enquiry, p. 226. (Ord MS.)

Intérendient. s. Interfering power; something that causes a stoppage.

They command repellents, but not with unchastity, unless as intérendient upon the parts above, lest the matter should thereby be impacted in the part. — Wiseman.

Intérendion. s. [Lat. caedo — cut; pass. part. caesus.] Interruption.

By cessation of oracles we may understand their intérendion, not abscission, or consummate desolation. — Sir T. Browne.

Some sudden intérendions of the light of the sun. — J. Spenser, Discourse concerning Prodiges, p. 234.

In a larger and better sense, after these intérendions, the throne of David was continued. — Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. vi.

Intérelude. v. n. [Lat. claudo — shut; pass. clausus; in composition, -cludo and -clausus.] Shut from a place or course by something intervening; intercept. Rare.

The voice is sometimes intéreluded by a hoarseness, or viscous phlegm cleaving to the aspera arteria. — Hall.

Laying siege against their cities, intéreluding their ways and passages, and cutting off from them all commerce with other places or nations. — Poore, On Homer, p. 23.

Intérelusion. s. Obstruction; interception.

Intérelumination. s. Space between the pillars.

The distance or intérelumination may be near four of his own diameter, because the materials commonly laid over this pillar were rather of wood than stone. — Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

The new pillars are nearly equal in bulk to the old ones; and the intérelumination remains much the same. — Bishop Lenth, Life of Walsingham, § 6.

Intérelôme. v. n. Interpose; interfere. Rare. They must give me leave to note with what affection and resolution, notwithstanding the pope's intérelôme to make himself a party in the quarrel, the bishops did adhere to their own sovereignty. — Proceedings against Garret, &c. b. 1: 104.

Intérelommon. adj. Common. Rare.

What a prodigious mixture was here of religious! true with false, Jewish with paganish, divine with devilish; this high priest of Israel intérelommon with every of them. — Bishop Hall, Destruction of Israel. (Ord MS.)

Intercommunion. v. n. Rare.

1. Feed at the same table.

Wine is to be forborne in consumptions, for that the spirits of the wine do prey upon the rascid juice of the body, and intercommunion with the spirits of the body, and so rob them of their nourishment. — Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Use commons promiscuously.

Bonds of several adjoining parishes do promiscuously intercommunion together, per carum de vicinis. — Bount, Ancient Tenures, p. 143.
Common because of vicinage, or neighbourhood, is where the inhabitants of two townships, which lie contiguous to each other, have usually intercommunion with one another. — Sir W. Blackstone.

Intercommunion. s. Joint communicants. Rare.

They are intercommunions by suffiance with God, children, and servants. — Gataker.

Intercommune. v. n. Communicate.

Each of our senses is peculiarly adapted to its own sensible, though they all very strangely intercommune one with another. — Translation of Phalaris, Morals, ii. 175. (Orel MS.)

Intercommunication. s. Communication.

In all the foregoing modifications of the reptilian heart, the venous blood from the general system and the arterialized blood from the lungs are transmitted by distinct articular reservoirs into the ventricle, where, through the spongy character of the receptacle, and the free intercommunication between the basal spaces into which the auricles open and from which the arteries proceed, the blood is transmitted, in a more or less mixed state, to the lungs and to the general system. — Quoy, Anatomy of Vertebrates.

Intercommunity. s.

1. Mutual communication or community.

Probably it is from this era, that we are to date that remarkable intercommunity and exchange of each other's compositions, which we discover to have taken place at some early period between the French and English minstrels. — Bishop Percy, Essay on the Ancient English Minstrelsy, § 4.

It admits of no tolerance, no intercommunity of various sentiments, not the least difference of opinion. — Bishop Leitch, To Warburton, p. 13.

2. Mutual freedom or exercise of religion.

Admitting each other's pretensions, there must needs be amongst them perfect harmony and intercommunity; there being no room for any other disputes but whose goal was most powerful. Such was the root and foundation of this community of religion in the ancient world, so much envied by our modern infidels; the effect of their absurdities, as they were religious; and of their imperfections, as they were societies. — Bishop Warburton, Alliance of Church and State, p. 139: 1st edit.

Intercostal. adj. [Lat. costa = rib.] Placed between the ribs.

The diaphragm seems the principal instrument of ordinary respiration, although to restrained respiration the intercostal muscles may concur. — Boyle.

By the assistance of the inward intercostal muscles, in deep respirations, we take large gulps of air. — Dr. H. More.

Intercourse. s.

1. Commerce; exchange.

This sweet intercourse of looks, and smiles; for smiles from reason flow, To brute deny'd, and are of love the food. — Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 278.

2. Communication.

The choice of the place required many circumstances, as the situation near the sea, for the commodiousness of an intercourse with England. — Boyes.

What an honour is it that God should admit us into such a participation of himself? That he should give us minds capable of such an intercourse with the Supreme Mind! — Bishop Atterbury.

Intercurr. v. n. [Lat. curr = run.] Intervene; come in the mean time; happen.

So that there intercurr no sin in the acting thereof. — Melton, Translation of Don Quixote, iv. 8.

When the nodes of parties intercurr, I do believe, although I'm a simple man, a sinner, that there is no kind of enchantment. — Don, iv. 10.

Interference. s. Intervention; occurrence.

To be sagacious in such interferences is not superstition, but wary and pious discretion; and to content such hints were to be deaf unto the speaking hand of God. — Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, i. 29.

Consider what fluidity sulphure is capable of, without the interference of a liquor. — Boyle.

Interferent. adj.

1. Running between.
If into a phial, filled with good spirit of nitre, you cast a piece of iron, the liquor, whose parts moved placidly before, moving with particles in the iron, altering the motion of its parts, and perhaps that of some very subtle interferent matter, those active parts presently begin to penetrate, and scatter abroad particles of the iron. — Boyle.

2. Occurring; intervening.

Making his representation of intercurrent passages between them. — Barrow, Works, i. 284.

Those household cares, and other intercurrent troubles which his condition then brought with it. — Bishop Fell, Life of Hammond, § 1.

Interdeal. s. [entered also as Enterdale, but (inadvertently) without a reference to this as the better form.] Traffic; intercourse. Obsolete.

The Gaulish speech is the very British, which is yet retained of the Welshmen and Britons of France; though the alteration of the trading and interdealt with other nations has greatly altered the dialect. — Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Interdependency. s. Mutual dependence.

But I would allude to the power which the appreciation of the correlative and interdependency of the several parts of each organic machine gives us to interpret the nature of the whole from the observation of a part. — Quoy, Lectures on Comparative Anatomy, introductory lecture.

Interdict. v. n. [Lat. dico = say; pass. part. dictus; dictin, -onis.] Forbid; prohibit; specially from the enjoyment of communion with the church.

An archbishop may not only excommunicate and interdict his suffragans, but his vicar-general may do the same. — Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Interdict. s.

1. Prohibition; prohibitive decree.

Amongst his other fundamental laws, he did ordain the interdicts and prohibitions touching entrance of strangers. — Bacon.

Had he liv'd to see her happy change, He would have cancell'd that harsh interdict, And join'd our hands himself. — Defton, Don Sebastian.

2. Papal prohibition to the clergy to celebrate the holy offices.

Nant carried himself meritoriously against the pope, in the time of the interdict, which held up his credit among the patriots. — Sir H. Hallam.

Philip Augustus, who had himself so lately complained of the insolence of the pope in interdicting his realm, communicating his person, absolving his subjects from their fealty, was now religiously moved to execute the fatal sentence of deposition against his rival. — Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. ix. ch. v.

Interdiction. s.

1. Prohibition; forbidding decree.

Sternly he pronounc'd The rigid interdiction, which resounds Yet dreadful in mine ear. — Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 374.

Interlocation. s. [Lat. locatio, -onis; locus = place.] Interplacing; interposition.

The plainest and the most intelligible rehearsal of the psalms they savour not, because it is done by interlocation, and with a mutual return of sentences from side to side. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Interlocution. s. [Lat. locutio, -onis; loquor = speak; pres. part. locutus.]

1. Dialogue; interchange of speech.

The plainest and the most intelligible rehearsal of the psalms they savour not, because it is done by interlocation, and with a mutual return of sentences from side to side. Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

A good continued speech, without a good speech of interlocution, shews slowness. Bacon, Essays, of Discourses.

2. Preparatory proceeding in law; intermediate act before final decision.

These things are called accidental, because some new incident in judicature may emerge upon them, on which the judges ought to proceed by interlocution.—Agli, Parergon Juris Civis.

Interlocutor. s. Dialogist; one who takes part in a dialogue.

Six persons, who were all, save one, interlocutors in the dialogue.—Sir J. Heyrick, Metamorphosis of Ajax, 1590.

The interlocutors in that dialogue make it their business to cast scorn.—Gregory, Notes on Scripture, p. 168.

The interlocutors in this dialogue are Socrates, and one Meno an Athenian, his acquaintance.—Bentley, Dissertation on Phalaris.

Some unwise readers shall find fault with my having made the interlocutors complain with one another.—Hogge.

Interlocutory. adj.

1. Consisting of dialogue.

When the minister by exhortation raiseth them up, and the people by protestation of their readiness declare he speaketh not in vain unto them: these interlocutory forms of speech, what are they else but most effectual, partly testifications, and partly inflammations of all piety?—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Preparatory to decision.

The chancellor's decree is either interlocutory or final.—Sir W. Blackstone.

Interlope. v. n. Run between parties and intercept the advantage that one should gain from the other; traffic without a proper licence; forestall; anticipate irregularly.

The patron is desired to leave off this interloping trade, or admit the knights of the industry to their share.—Tatler.

Interloper. s. One who runs into business to which he has no right.

Some interloper may perhaps underhand fall upon the work at a lower rate.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience, l. 5.

With af. Rare.

The king... resolved not only to recover his intercepted right, but to punish the interloper of his destined spouse.—Milton, History of England, b. v.

Interloping. part. adj. Acting as an interloper.

I believe it is no small interloping to this gentleman's astrology, as well as his bookkeeping, to find their piece, which they sent out in a tolerable print and paper, immediately seized on by three or four interloping printers in Gib-street.—Swift, Answer to Rochester. (Ord MS.)

Interlude. s. [Lat. ludo—I play; ludus—a play.]

1. Something played at the intervals of a dramatic representation, pageant, or festivity.

When there is a queen, and ladies of honour attending her, there must sometimes be masques, and revells, and interludes. Shakspeare, Advice to a Friend.

The enemies of Socrates hired Aristophanes to persecute him on the stage, and, by the insinuations of those interludes, conveyed a hatred of him into the people.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Devious are but interludes, which fancy makes; When monarch reason sleeps, this mimic wakes. Dryden, The Cuck and the Fox, 325.

2. Name applied to a particular form of the early English dramas, intermediate, in point of time, to the miracle and mystery plays of the middle ages and the Elizabethan drama, as consisting in tragedies, comedies, historical plays, and the like. See extracts.

John Heywood's dramatic productions almost form a class by themselves; as they are neither miracle-plays nor moral-plays, but what may be properly and strictly called interludes, a species of writing of which he has a claim to be considered the inventor, although the term interlude was applied generally to theatrical productions in the reign of Edward IV.—Collier, History of Dramatic Poetry, ii. 135.

Mr. Collier appears to consider the interludes of John Heywood, the earliest of which must have been written before 1521, as first exhibiting the moral play in a state of transition to the regular tragedy and comedy. A notion of the nature of these compositions may be collected from the plot of one of them, 'A Merry Play between the Pardoner and the Friar, the Curate and neighbour Brattle,' printed in 1573. Here... we have a dramatic fable, or incident, at least, conducted not by allegorical personifications, but by characters of real life, which is the essential difference that distinguishes the true tragedy or comedy from the mere moral. Heywood's interludes, however, of which there are two or three more of the same description with this (besides others partaking more of the allegorical character), are all only single acts, or more than the mere rudiments or embryo of the regular comedy. The earliest English comedy, properly so called, that has yet been discovered, is commonly considered to be that of Ralph Roster-bonder. This... comedy carry it back to about the same date with the earliest of Heywood's interludes; and it certainly was produced while that writer was still alive, and in the height of his popularity. It may be observed that Wilson calls Chaucer's play an interlude, which would therefore seem to have been at this time the common name of any dramatic composition, asinde it appears to have been for nearly a century preceding. The author himself, however, in his prologue, announces it as a comedy, or interlude, and as an imitation of the classical models of Phœbus and Terence. Craik, History of English Literature and of the English Language, vol. i. pp. 44-7.

Interlude. s. Actor in an interlude. Obsolete.

Is't not a fine sight to see all our children made interluders! B. Jonson, Staple of News.

Interlucency. s. [Lat. lucē—wash.] Water interposed; interposition of a flood. Rare.

Those parts of Asia and America, which are now disjoined by the interlucency of the sea, might have been formerly contiguous.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Interlunar. adj. [Lat. lunaris: from luna—moon.] Belonging to the time when the moon, about to change, is invisible.

The sun to me is dark, And silent as the moon, When she descends the night, Hid in her vacant interlunar cave. Milton, Samson Agonized, 86.

Interlunary. adj. Same as interlunar.

We hold the two Egyptian days in every month, the interlunary and plenilunary exemptions.—Sir T. Browne.

Interlunary. adj. Same as interlunar.

The sun to me is dark, And silent as the moon, When she descends the night, Hid in her vacant interlunar cave. Milton, Samson Agonized, 86.

Interlunary. adj. Same as interlunar.

Interlunary. adj. Same as interlunar.

Intermarriage. s. Marriage between two families, where each takes one and gives another.

Because the alliances and intermarriages, among so small a people, might obstruct justice, they have a foreigner for judge of St. Marino.—Alidino, Travels in Italy.

Intermarry. v. n. Marry some of each family with the other.

About the middle of the fourth century, from the building of Rome, it was declared lawful for nobles and plebeians to intermarry. Swift.

Intermède. c. a. Intermix; mingle. Obsolete.

Many other adventures are intermeddled;... as the love of Britannia, the overthrow of Marinell, the misery of Florimell, &c.—Spenser, Letter Prefatory to his Faerie Queene.

To intermeddle retirement with society, so as one may give sweetness to the other, and both to us! Bishop Hall, Heures upon Earth.

Some keep precisely the order of the book, others intermeddle psalms in metre, a Bishop, Meditations of the Church of England against Noe's History of the Puritans, p. 153: 1733.

Intermède. c. n. Interpose officiously.

The practice of Spain hath been by war, and by conditions of treaty, to intermeddle with foreign states, and declare themselves protectors general of Catholics.—Bacon.

There were no ladies, who disposed themselves to intermeddle in business. Lord Clarendon.

A love of labour for its own sake, a restless and insatiable longing to dictate, to intermeddle, to make his power felt, a profound scorn and distrust of his fellow-creatures, made him (Frederic) unwilling to ask counsel, to confide important secrets, to delegate ample powers. Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Frederic the Great.

Intermeddler. s. One who intermeddles; busybody.

There's hardly a greater pest to government and families, than officious tale-bearers, and busy intermeddlers.—Sir R. B. Edgeworth.

Our allies and our stock-jobbers direct her majesty not to change her secretary or treasurer, who, for the reason that these officious intermeddlers demanded their continuance, ought never to have been admitted into the least trust.—Swift.

Intermediacy. s. Interposition; intervention.

In birds the auditory nerve is affected by only the intermediacy of the eardrum. Berham.

Intermedial. adj. Intervening; lying between; intervening.

The love of God makes a man temperate in the midst of feasts, and is active enough without any intermedial appetites.—Jeremy Taylor.

Intermediat. adj. [Lat. medius—middle.] Intervening; interposed; holding the middle place or degree between two extremes.

Do not the most refrangible rays excite the shortest vibrations for making a sensation of a deep violet, the least refrangible the largest for making a sensation of deep red, and the several intermediate shades of rays, vibrations of several intermediate degrees, to make sensations of the several intermediate colours? Sir I. Newton, Opticks.

Intermediat. v. n. Intervene; interpose.

Intermediating. part. adj. Intervening.

The tyranny of his, the sun's, fierce beams reigning here, is contradicted by those intermediating accidents, which conspire to the felicity of other regions.—Sir H. Sherre, in Lord Bolingbroke's Miscellaneous, p. 11.

Intermediat. s. Act of one who intermeddles.

All the vital functions and sensations are all performed by the spirit, by the intermediat only of motions, vibrations, and tremors. Chapman, Philosophical Essays, &c. &c. &c. (Ord MS.)

There can be argument, there can only when they are so circumstanced as not to be directly comparable, if it follows that their relative magnitudes, if determined at all, must be determined by the intermediat of magnitudes to which they are comparable. H. Spencer, Principles of Psychology.

Intermediations. adj. Intermediate. Rare.

The juncture of them being in their opinion so close, that there was nothing intermediat, or that could possibly be thrust in between them.—Coleridge, Intellectual System, 206. (Ord MS.)

Intermediat. s. Medium.

It seemed necessary that I should account for my apparent tardiness to comply with the obliging request of a lady, and of a lady who employed you as her intermediat.—Corcoran, Correspondence, p. 256. (Ord MS.)

The life of this wretched world is always intermél with such bitterness. Minister Fisher, Exposition of the Seven Penitential Psalms.

Intermél. v. n. Intermiddle. Obsolete.

To... boldly intermél!

With holy things. Merton, Memoirs of Villany: 1394.

Interment. s. [inter—bury.] Burial; sepulture.

Here in England the interments of the dead were anciently farre out of all towns or cities. Warner, Lives of Federal Monarchs of Great Britain, Ireland, and Islands adjacent.

In the noble church of the Grey Friars in London, four queens, besides upwards of six hundred persons of quality, were buried. These interments imported considerable sums of money into the mendicant societies. T. Warton, History of English Poetry, i. 204.

Interment. c. a. ? Mention among other things; include; comprehend; ? mentioned incidentally; ? mentioned as one who was mixed up with, or intangled in, anything. Rare.

There is scarce any grievance or complaint come before us in this place, wherein we do not find him interment. Richard the Grimbold, Speech in the House of Commons, against Archbishop Laud.

Intermigration. s. Act of removing from one place to another, so that each of two parties removing takes the place of the other. Rare.

Men have a strange variety in colour, stature, and humour; and all arising from the climate, though the continent be but one, as to point of access, natural intercourse, and possibility of intermigrations.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Interminable. adj. [Lat. in+terminus—boundary.] Immense; admitting no boundary.

O radiant luminary of light interminable!

An interminable warfare by Satan both in soul and body.—Bishop Hall, Compliments on the Old and New Testaments, b. vi.

Nine acres were obtained from the Woods and Forests; mounds were thrown up, shrubs thrown in; the paths embanked the serpent; the nine acres seemed interminable. All was surrounded by a paling eight feet high, that no one might pierce the mystery of the preparations. B. Barret, The Young Duke, b. i. ch. viii.

Interminable. s. Incapable of being confined, or defined, by any boundary; endless; having no term or termination.

As if they would confine the interminable, And bid him to his own precept, Who made our laws to bind us, not himself. Milton, Samson Agonized, 307.

Interminableness. s. Attribute suggested by interminable; state of being interminable; endlessness.

The interminableness of those torments, which after this life shall incessantly vex the impious.—Archbishop of Canterbury, &c. &c. &c. 1652.

Interminate. adj. Unbounded; unlimited. Rare.

Within a thicket I reposed; when round I ruffled up tall leaves in heaps, and found, Let fall from heaven, a steep interminate.

Chapman, Translation of Homer's Odyssey.

It is enough for us to confine our sight, with this dark veil and interminate horizon. Bishop Gualtero, Sacrament and Life of Bishop Brainerd, p. 115: 1660.

Interminate. c. a. [Lat. inter+minare—threats; minor threaten, pret. part, minatus.] Threaten; menace. Rare.

Enough, enough of these interminate judgments, woe-worth, if I would follow the steps of the prophets, I might strike your hearts with just horror. Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 163.

Intermination. s. Menace; threat. Rare.

The terrors of the law were the intermination of curses upon all those that ever broke any of the least commandments.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Reason of Holy Living, ch. v. 3.

The threats and interminations of the Gospel those terrors of the Lord, as it calls, my dear those British creatures who will not be attracted. Dr. H. More, Essay of Christian Piety.

Intermingle. c. a. Mingle; mix; put some things amongst other.

INTERMINGLE INTERPRELATION

taken out of the law and propheta.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Intermingle. v. n. Be mixed or incorporated.

They will not admit any good part to intermingle with them.—Shakespeare, Much Ado about Nothing, v. 2.

Party and faction will intermingle.—Swift.

Intermission. s.

1. Cessation for a time; pause; intermediate stop.

Came a rocking post,
Deliver'd letters, spits of intermission,
Which presently they read.

Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 4.
I count intermission almost the same thing as change; for that that hath been intermitted is after a sort new.—Bacon.

The water ascends gently, and by intermissions; but it falls continually, and with force.—Bishop Wilkins, Theatrum.

The passages work on, in the hottest part of the day, without intermission.—Locker.

From the day on which the court was called a second time to the chief direction of affairs, parliamentary corruption continued to be practised, with scarcely any intermission, by a long succession of statesmen, till the close of the American war.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xiv.

2. Intervening time.

But, gentle heaven,
Cut short all intermission; 'tween to part,
Bring thou this fiend of Scotland and myself.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

3. State of being intermitted.

Words borrowed of antiquity have the authority of years, and out of their intermission do win to themselves a kind of grace-like newness.—H. Johnson.

4. Space between the paroxysms of a fever, or any fits of pain; rest; pause of sorrow.
Rest or intermission now I find.

Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 802.
The malignant, or malignant form of epidemic fever, is in almost all cases the remittent. . . . The mere fact of intermission shows that the constitutional power . . . is superior to the power of the disease, and gains periodically the mastery over it. . . . The progress of intermitting fevers is subject to great variation. Some run their course rapidly; some extend to months, or even years. The former are called acute, the latter chronic,agues.—Gregory, Theory or Practice of Medicine, pt. i. ch. vi.

Intermissive. adj. Coming by fits; not continual.

I reduced Ireland, after so many intermissive wars, to a perfect passive obedience.—Howell, England's Tears.

As though there were any ferocity in nature, or justifiableness imaginable in professions, whose subject is under no intermission but constant way of mutation, this season is commonly termed the physicians' vacation. Sir W. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Intermit. v. n. [Lat. mitto = send; pass. part. missus; misso, -missa.] Forbear anything for a time; interrupt.

If nature should intermit her course, and leave altogether, though it were but for a-while, the observation of her own laws.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

His misled, lascivious son,
Edward the Second, intermitted so
The course of glory.
Daniel, Civil Wars of York and Lancaster.

Intermit. v. n. Cease for a time; be interrupted; grow mild between the fits or paroxysms: (applied to fevers).

The bell toll toll for him that thinks it doth; and though it intermit again, yet from that minute, which that occasion wrought upon him, he is united to God.—Donne, Devotions, p. 415.

Our fever for fully never intermits. Young, Conjectures on fabulous, let. 2.

Let me know the exact time when your courts intermit.—Johnson, Letter to Boswell.

Intermittent. adj. Coming by fits. In Medicine, specially applied to diseases with periodical character of the ague.

Next to those durable pains, short intermittent or swift recurrent pains do precipitate patients into consumptions.—Harvey.

Used substantively.

Endemic, or endemic, fevers assume two very different forms or characters, viz. the intermittent and the remittent. . . . Intermittents are readily distinguished from every other form of idiopathic fever, by their occurrence in paroxysms, each of which may be considered as an epitome of a febrile disease, exhibiting in the course of about eight hours all the stages of fever—its rise, progress, crisis, and termination in the recovery of health. This circumstance has contributed to give to intermittent fever a large share of the attention of pathologists. . . . The symptoms which occur in the paroxysm of an intermittent fever divide themselves in the first place into the two great classes of regular and superadded. The former admit of an obvious subdivision into three stages: the cold, the hot, and the sweating, in the course of which the different functions of the body undergo very remarkable changes. . . . After a certain interval, the train of symptoms now described is renewed, and the period of recurrence gives what is called the type of fever. From very early times, three primary types of intermittent have been observed—the quotidian, the tertian, and the quartan, in which the febrile paroxysm completes its revolution in the respective periods of twenty-four, forty-eight, and seventy-two hours. Of these the most common is the tertian, and this, therefore, is always considered as the primary type of fever. Several irregular types of intermittent fever have been noticed by authors, such as the double tertian, the semitercian, and the double quartan, but they are not of frequent occurrence. The double quartan may be taken as a specimen. In this variety of acute paroxysms occur two successive days, followed by one of intermission; the paroxysms of the first and fourth day corresponding in the character and the severity of the symptoms, as well as in the hour of attack; and so of the second and fifth, though varying in each of these points from the two others.—Dr. Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. i. ch. xi.

INTE

Intermitting. part. adj. Intermittent.

(For example see Intermission, 4.)

Intermittingly. adv. In an intermitting manner; at intervals; not long together.

These grains or notes, willingly left in that eye, keep the sight of it from being laid wide open towards the object, suffering it to look up but intermittingly.—W. Montague, Decent Essays, pt. ii. p. 113: 165 L.

Intermix. v. a. Mingle; join; put some things among others.

Her persuasions she intermixed with tears, affirming that she would depart from him.—Sir J. Hayward.

Reveal
To Adam what shall come in future days,
As I shall thee enlighten: intermix
My covenant in the woman's seed re-new'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 113.

In yonder spring of roses, intermix'd
With myrtle, find what to redress till noon.
Ibid. ix. 218.

I doubt not to perform the part of a just historian to my royal master, without intermixing with it any thing of the poet.—Dryden.

Intermixture. s.

1. Mass formed by mingling bodies.

The analytical preparations of gold or mercury leave persons much unsatisfied whether the substances they produce be truly the hypothetical principles, or only some intermixtures of the divided bodies with those employed. Boyle.

2. Something additional mingled in a mass.

In this height of impety there wanted not an intermixture of levity and folly.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Intermundane. adj. [Lat. mundus = world.]

Subsisting between worlds, or between orb and orb.

The vast distances between these great bodies are called intermundane spaces; in which, though there may be some fluid, yet it is so thin and subtle, that it is as much as nothing.—Locke.

Intermutual. adj. Mutual; interchanged:

(the inter. expletive).

A solemn oath religiously they take,
By intermutual vows protesting there,
This never to reveal, nor to forsake
So good a cause.
Daniel, Civil Wars of York and Lancaster.

Intermutually. adv. Mutually. Rare.

What find we but ourselves intermutually transposed each into others.—Pellham, Resolves, 60. (Ord MS.)

Intermutualness. s. Attribute suggested by intermutual.

The best chastity of all I hold to be matrimonial chastity: when pairs keep themselves in a moderate intermutualness, each constant to the other.—Pellham, Resolves, 85. (Ord MS.)

Intern. adj. Inward; not foreign.

The midland towns are most flourishing, which shows that her riches are intern and domestic.—Howell.

Internally. adj. [Lat. internus.]

1. Inward; not external.

That ye shall be as gods, since I as man,
Internal man, is true proportion meet.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 710.

Myself, my conscience, and internal peace.
Id., Samson Agonistes, 1334.

INTE

2. Intrinsic; not depending on external accidents; real.

We are to provide things honest; to consider not only the internal rectitude of our actions in the sight of God, but whether they will be free from all mark or suspicion of evil.—Rogers.

Internally. adv. Inwardly; mentally; intellectually.

We are symbolically in the sacrament, and by faith and the spirit of God internally united to Christ.—Jeremy Taylor.

International. adj. Connected with the intercourse of nations.

He may acquire some knowledge of general jurisprudence, and of the positive law of the country . . . he may observe international relations, the changes and interests of foreign states, and the commerce of the world.—Sir G. C. Lewis, On the Influence of Authority in Matters of Opinion, ch. viii.

Internecious. adj. [Lat. nec, necis = death.]

Endeavouring mutual destruction.

The Egyptians worshipp'd dogs, and for their faith made interecious war.

Is not this the real death-grapple of war and interecious duel, Greek meeting Greek; wherein men, had they even no interest in it, might look with interest unspeakable?—Carlyle, History of the French Revolution, pt. i. b. iii. ch. iv.

Dominic died August 6th, 1221. He was taken ill at Venice, recovered with difficulty to Bologna, where he expired with saintly resignation. His canonization followed rapidly on his death. Gregory IX., who in his interecious war with the Emperor Frederick II. had found the advantage of these faithful, restless, uncorruptible allies [the Dominicans] in the realm, in the camp, almost in the palace of his adversary, was not the man to pause or to hesitate in his grateful acknowledgements or prodigal reward.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. ix. ch. ix.

Internecion. s. Mutual destruction; massacre; slaughter.

That natural propensity of self-love, and natural principle of self-preservation, will necessarily break out into wars and internecion.—Sir M. Hale, Origin of Mankind.

Internotion. s. Connection. Obsolete.

So admirable an internotion, that even the worst parts of the chain draw some good after them.—W. Montague, Decent Essays, pt. ii. p. 54.

Internode. s. [Lat. nodus = knot.] In Botany. That part of a plant which lies between the knots or nodes connected with the branch or leaf.

It is a familiar fact that luxuriant shoots have relatively long internodes; and, conversely, that a shoot dwarfed from lack of sap, has its nodes closely clustered.—Herbert Spencer, Principles of Biology, ch. xii.

Internuncio. s. [see Nuncio.] Messenger between two parties.

They only are the inter-nuncios, or the go-betweens, of this trim-devised mummery.—Milton, Animal Creation upon a Defence of the Humble Petition, &c.

Interparley. s. Parley between two parties.

The Turks in the mean time, whilst this truce of peace was in hand, gathered together great stores both of men and munition at Belgrade wherewith to arm a great convey of victuals, which they had thought during this interparley for peace to have put in.—Knutson, History of the Turks. (Ord MS.)

Interpell. v. a. [Lat. interpellare.] Interrupt.

Hop both her end, and Faith both her reward! This being true, why should my tongue or pen presume to interpell that silence, when Nothing can more adorn it than the seat That she is in, or make it more complete?

B. Jonson, Underwoods.
No more now, for I am interpell'd by many business.—Howell, Familiar Letters, i. 6. 1.

Spelt with -ea-.

Here one of us began to interpell
Old Mincus: Theron, that young larkin light,
He pray'd this word sure for to reveal
What way. Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, iii. 31.

Interpellation. s.

1. Interruption.

If so I chance to break that golden twist
You spin, by rule interpellation.
Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, ii. 44.

That they should not be troublesome to the symbol by any interpellative interpellations.—Hale, Letter from the Spirit of Lord, p. 34.

2. Earnest address; intercession.

One that hath lived innocently, or made joy in heaven at his timely and effective repentance, and in whose behalf the holy Jesus hath interceded prosperously, and for whose interest the Spirit makes interpellations with groans and sighs unutterable.—Jeremy Taylor, Rule and Exercises of Holy Dying, ch. ii. § 4.

8. Summons: call upon.

In all extrajudicial acts one citation, monition, or extrajudicial interpellation is sufficient.—Asiatic, Paterson Juris Consultae.

Interpenetrate. v. a. Mutually, deeply, penetrate; penetrate so as to effect, really or approximately, a union.

It interpenetrates my granite mass.

Shelley, Prometheus Unbound.

Interpenetration. s. Mutual penetration.

The Grown-Arabic philosophy worked into the system of the schools in two different modes:—1. The introduction of works of Aristotle, either unknown or now communicated in a more perfect form. 2. The Arabic philosophy, which had now grown to its height under the Almohade caliphs in the East, Almuizar, Haroun al Rawad, Motakem, and under the Ommeides in Spain. . . . Averroes had an endless race of successors. Profound, it might seem almost impenetrable darkness, covered the slow silent interpenetration of both these influences into the Christian schools.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xiv. ch. iii.

Interplead. v. n. In Law. Discuss a point incidental to the principal cause.

(For example see next entry.)

Interpleader. s. Discussion of an incidental point.

Interpleader is allowed that the defendant may not be charged to two severally, where no default is in him. . . . If two or more persons claim the same thing by different or separate interests, another person not knowing to which of the claimants he ought . . . to render a debt or duty . . . may exhibit a bill of interpleader against them, . . . and pray that they may interplead.—Jacob, Law Dictionary.

Interpledge. v. a. Give and take as a mutual pledge. Rare.

In all distress of various courts and war,
We interpledge and bind each other's heart.

Sir W. Barreant, Gondibert.

Interpoint. v. a. Distinguish by stops between words and sentences. Rare.

Her heart commands, her words should pass out first,
And then her sighs should interpoint her words.

Daniel, Civil Wars of York and Lancaster, ii. 82.

Interpolate. v. a. [Lat. interpolatus, pass. part. of interpolo—dress or furbish up; renew; interrupt.]

1. Foist anything into a place to which it does not belong.

How strangely lenient is mangled and interpolated you may see by the vast difference of all copies and editions Greek and Latin.—Bishop Hurd, Remarks, p. 115.

They were interpolated and corrupted.—Hammer, View of Antiquity, p. 419: 1677.

3. Hindrance; stop; let; obstruction.

Bloody England into England gone,
Overbearing interruption, spite of France.
Shakespeare, King John, lib. 4.

4. Intermission.

This way of thinking on what we read will be a rub only in the beginning; when custom has made it familiar, it will be despatched without resting or interruption in the course of our reading. —Locke.

Amidst the interruptions of his sorrow, seeing his penitent overwhelmed with grief, he was only able to bid her be comforted. —Addison, Spectator.

Interseam. v. a. Seam in the intervals.

Rare.

Her face, like silver Luna in her shrine,
All tainted through with bright vermilion stains,
Like lilies dyed in Hecuba's choicest wine,
Powdered and interseamed with azure veins.
R. Greene, Poems.

Intersect. v. a. [Lat. seco = cut; pass. part. sectus; sectio, -onis.] Cut; divide each other mutually.

Perfect and viviparous quadrupeds so stand in their position of proneness, that the opposite joints of neighbour legs consist in the same plane; and a line descending from their navel intersects at right angles the axis of the earth. —Sir T. Browne.

Intersect. v. n. Meet and cross each other.

The genital suture usually begins at that point where these lines intersect. —Wiseman, Surgery.

Interséction. s. Point where lines cross each other.

They did spout over interchangeably from side to side in forms of arches, without any interséction or meeting aloft, because the pipes were not opposite. —Sir H. Wotton, Elements of Architecture.

Ships would move in one and the same surface, and consequently must needs encounter, when they either advance towards one another in direct lines, or meet in the interséction of cross ones. —Hentley.

Intersert. v. a. [Lat. sero = sow as seeds, string as beads; pass. part. sertus; sertio, -onis.] Put in between other things.

If I may intersert a short speculation, the depth of the sea is determined in Pliny to be fifteen furlongs. —Brerewood.

Intersérion. s. Insertion or thing inserted.

These two intersérions were clear explications of the apostle's old form, God the father, ruler of all, which contained an acknowledgement of the unity. —Hammond.

Interspace. s. Intervening space.

This was his practice, to gather up more at the interspace of leisure, than others do at their study. —Bishop Hacket, Life of Archbishop Williams, p. 27: 1003.

Interspéro. v. a. [Lat. spargo = sprinkle; pass. part. sparsus; in composition, -spersus.] Scatter here and there among other things.

The possibility of a body's moving into a void space beyond the utmost bounds of body, as well as into a void space interspersed amongst bodies, will always remain clear. —Locke.

It is the editor's interest to insert what the author's judgement had rejected; and care is taken to intersperse these additions, so that scarce any book can be bought without purchasing something unworthy of the author. —Swift.

Interspersion. s. Act of scattering here and there.

For want of the interspersion of now and then an epycene or a lyric ode. —Watts, Improvement of the Mind.

Intestellar. adj. [Lat. stella = star.] Intervening between the stars.

The intestellar sky hath so much affinity with the star, that there is a rotation of that as well as of the star. —Bacon.

Intestice. s.

1. Space between one thing and another.

The sun shining through a large prison upon a comb placed immediately behind the prison, his light, which passed through the intestices of the teeth, fell upon a white paper: the breadth of the teeth were equal to their intestices, and seven teeth together with their intestices took up an inch. —Sir I. Newton.

2. Time between one act and another.

I will point out the intestices of time which ought to be between one citation and another. —Ayliffe, Parergon Juris Canonici.

Intestictive. adj. Distinguishing.

Whether the notes of parenthesis be used; and what care is taken of the intestictive points, &c. —Wallis, Letter to Dr. Smith, Aubrey's Anecdotes, l. 78.

Intestitial. adj. Containing interstices.

In oiled papers, the intestitial division being actuated by the accession of oil, becomes more transparent. —Sir T. Browne.

Intestitium. s. [Lat., plural in a, the word being but imperfectly Anglicized.] Interstice.

The intestitia are duly filled up by the preacher, to prevent too long a pause, under which, the spirit would soon faint, and grow languid. —Swift, On the Mechanical Operation of the Spirit, sect. 1.

There is a various intertexture of theosophical and philosophical truths. —Dr. H. More, Conjecturae Cabalisticæ, p. 105: 1023.

There is an intertexture of prosperity and adversity in the fortunes of virtuous men, [which] tends more to their improvement, than a more regular and constant providence would do. —Goodman, Winter Evening's Conference, pt. ii.

Intertropical. adj. Between the tropics.

Another important branch of the physical history of the globe belongs to zoology; I mean the nature, origin, and progress of the banks, reefs, and sands of coral, and even the islands, which are perpetually arising and accumulating on the intertropical seas. —Linnæus, Lectures, lect. ii. (Ord MS.)

Intertwine. v. a. Unite by twisting one in another.

There [let] our secret thoughts unseem,
Like nets be wov'n'd and intertwined,
Wherein we catch each other's mind.
Carew, Poems, p. 29.

Under some concourse of shades,
Whom breathing arises thick intertwin'd might shield,
From dews and damps of night his shelter'd head.
Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 404.

Intertwine. v. a. Intertwine.

A wall of brown stone, wrought on the outside with various kinds of serpents intertwined.—Townsend,

Interval. s. [Lat. intercillum.]

1. Space between places; interspace; vacuity; space unoccupied; void place; vacancy;
vacant space.

With any obstacle, let all the light be now stopped which passes through any one interval of the teeth, so that the range of colours which comes from thence may be taken away, and you will see the light of the rest of the ranges to be expanded into the place of the range taken away, and there to be coloured.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

2. Time passing between two assignable points.

The century and a half following was a very busy period, the intervals between every war being so short.—Swift.

3. Remission of a delirium or distemper.

Though he had a long illness, considering the great heat with which it raged, yet his intervals of sense being few and short, left but little room for the offices of devotion.—Bishop Abernethy.

Intervene. v. a. Intervene with veins.

Intervene. part. adj. Intervened with veins. Rhetorical.

From his side two rivers flow'd,
The one winding, the other straight, and left between,
Fair champagne, with less rivers intervin'd.
Milton, Paradise Regained, iii. 253.

Intervene. v. n. [Lat. venio = come; pres.
part. veniens, -entis; pass. part. ventus;
ventus, -onis.]

1. Come between things or persons.

Venus intervenit attended by Cupid.—T. Warton,
History of English Poetry, ii. 233.

2. Make intervals.

While so near each other thus all day
Our task we chase, what wonder, if so near,
Looks intervenit, and smiles?
Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 220.

3. Cross unexpectedly.

Even the danger of an action, and the possibilities of miscarriage, and every cross accident that can intervenit, to be either a mercy on God's part, or a fault on ours.—Jeremy Taylor.

Intervene. s. [? accent.] Interview; intervention; interference. Rare.

They had some sharper and some milder differences, which might easily happen in such an inter-venit of grandees, both vehement on the parts which they swayed.—Sir H. Wotton, Life of the Duke of Buckingham.

Intervénient. adj. Interposing; interposed; passing between.

There he intervénient in the rise of eight, in tones, two hemis or half notes.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Many arts were used to discuss new affection; all which notwithstanding, for I omit times intervénient, there is conveyed to Mr. Villiers an intimation of the king's pleasure to be sworn his servant.
—Sir H. Wotton.

Intervention. s. Interposition; state of being interposed; agency between persons, or between antecedents and consequents.

In the dispensation of God's mercies to the world,
some things he does by himself, others by the intervention of natural means, and by the mediation of such instruments as he has appointed.—*Sir R.
L. Estren*

God will judge the world in righteousness by the intervention of the man Christ Jesus, who is the Mediator as well as the judge of the world.—Bishop Atterbury.

Let us decide our quarrels at home, without the intervention of any foreign power.—*Sir H.
Temple*.

Sound is shut out by the intervention of that lax membrane, and not suffered to pass into the inward ear.—Haller.

Intervénue. s. [see Venue.] Interposition;
state of being placed between. Rare.

This crown had now had five weak princes, with-his master's money.—Life of Fennel, p. 8: 108.

Interview. s. Mutual sight; sight of each other: (usually applied to a formal, appointed, or important meeting or conference).

The day will come when the passions of former enmity being allayed, we shall with ten times redoubled tokens of reconciled love show ourselves each towards other the same, which Joseph and the brethren of Joseph were at the time of their interview in Egypt.—Houder, Ecclesiastical History.

Intervolve. v. a. [Lat. volvō = roll.] Involve one within another.

Mystical dance! which gender starry spheres
Of planets, and of fix'd, in all her wheels
Remembers nearest; masses intricate,
Eccentric, intervolv'd, yet regular,
Then most, when most irregular they seem.
Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 620.

Intervolve. v. a. pret. intervolve; past part.
-volved (less correctly -volved or -weaved).

Mix one with another in a regular texture;
intertwine.

Come on, come on; and, where you go,
So intervolve the curious knot,
As ev'n the observer scarce may know
Which lines are Pleasure's, and which not.
R. Johnson, Masques.

Prayer . . . is of a soft and sociable nature, and it can incorporate and sink into our business like water into ashes, and never increase the bulk of them: it can mix and intervolve itself with all our cares, without any hindrance unto them; nay, it is a great strength and improvement unto them.—
John, Golden Remains, p. 141.

I sat me down to watch upon a bank
With ivy canopy'd, and intervolve
With flaunting honeysuckle. Milton, Comus, 515.

Can say here nature ends and art begins;
But mixt like the elements, and born like twins,
So intervolv'd, so like, so much the same;
None this more nature, that more art can name.
Sir J. Ingham, On Mr. John Fletcher's Works.

It appeared a vast ocean planted with islands, that were covered with fruits and flowers, and in-tervolv'd with a thousand little shining seas that ran among them.—Addison.

Intervolving. verbal abs. Intertexture.

What intervolvings or intertextures can knit the minister and the magistrate in their several functions!—Milton, Of Reformation in England,

Intervish. v. a. Wish mutually in respect to each other. Rare.

The union of all stoppages, summer's gall,
What tyrants and their subjects intervish,
Fall on that man! Doune, Poems, p. 31.

Intervorking. verbal abs. Act of working anything into anything else, as in embroidery.

(For example see extract under *Intervew-
ing*.)

Intervoven. part. adj. Worked in as part of a tissue: (in the extract it is a Latinism, or rather a mere translation of the line, 'Purpurea intexti tollunt' aulæa Britanni').

The proud theatre disclose the scene,
Which intextura Britons seem to raise,
And show the triumph which their shame displays.
Drayton, Translation of the Georgics, iii. 38.

Intervolve. v. a. Weave, twist, or plait.

Intervolved. part. adj. Woven in a wreath.

Say, happy youth, crown'd with a heavenly ray
Of the first flame, and intervolved bay,
Inform my soul. Lovell, Lucinda Posthuma, p. 67.

Intestable. adj. Disqualified in respect to the power to make a will. Rare.

A person communicatèd is rendered infamous and intestable both actively and passively.—Ayliff,
Paragon Juria Cænicæ.

Intestacy. s. Dying without a will; state resulting therefrom.

Such was the condition of our affairs that arose out of my uncle's intestacy.—Theodore Hook, Gilbert Gurney.

Intestate. adj. [Lat. testis = witness; testis = witness.] Wanting a will; dying without a will: (the presence of a witness being of paramount importance in the validity of a will).

Why should calamity be full of words? . . .
Widely attorneys to their client was,
Wily succeders of intestate joys,
Pung-breathing orators of miseries.

Present punishment pursues his man,
Who's surfeited and swell'd, the peacock saw,
He bears into the bath; a whence want of breath,
Repletions, apoplex, intestate death.

Stephen, Translation of Juvenal, sat. l. 214.

Intestinal. adj. Belonging to, connected with, constituted by, the intestines.

The months of the lactada are opened by the intestinal tube, affecting a straight instead of a spiral cylinder.—Arbuthnot.

Redi also enlarged our knowledge of intestinal animals. Hallam, Introduction to the Literature of Europe during the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries, pt. iv. ch. viii. § 18.

Intestine. adj.

1. Internal; inward; not external.

Of these inward and intestinal enemies to prayer,
there are our past sins to wound us, our present cares to distract us, our distemp'ered passions to disorder us, and a whole swarm of loose and floating imaginings to molest us.—Drayton.

Intestine war no more our passions wage,
Ev'n giddy fictions bear away their rage. Pope.

2. Contained in the body.
Intestine stone, and ulcer, colic pangs,
And moon-struck madness.

Milton, Paradise Lost, xi. 484.
A wooden jack, which had almost lost, by disuse, the art to roast,
A sudden alteration feels,
Increased by new intestinal winds.

Swift, Baelia and Philemon.

3. Domestic, not foreign.

Since the mortal and intestinal jars
Twist thy seditious countrymen and us,
It hath in solemn synods been decreed,
T' admit no traffic to our adverse towns.

Shakespeare, Comedy of Errors, i. 1.
But God, or nature, while they thus contend,
To these intestinal disorders put an end.

Drayton, Translation from Ovid.
She saw her sons with purple deaths expire,
A dreadful series of intestinal wars,
Inglorious triumphs, and dishonour'd scars.

Pope, Windsor Forest.

Intestine. s. [Lat. intestinus.] Gut; bowel (often plural).

The intestines or guts may be inflamed by an acid substance taken inwardly.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

The word is of no great age in our language.
Bishop Reynolds, in his Treatise on the Passions, 1650, uses the Latin Intestinus for intestinal (climp. xv.).—Todd.

Intestine. s. Close familiarity.

It is in our power to outline our friendships and intestines to men of virtue.—Rogers.

Intimate. adj. [Lat. intimus = inmost.]

1. Inmost; inward; intestine.

That what I motion'd was of God; I knew,
From intimate impulse. Milton, Samson Agonistes, 221.

Fear being so intimate to our nature, it is the strongest bond of laws.—Archbishop Tillotson.

2. Near; not kept at a distance.

Moses was with him in the retirements of the Mount, received from his private instructions; and when the multitude were thundered away from any approach, he was honoured with his intimate and immediate admission.—South, Sermons.

3. Familiar; closely acquainted.

United by this sympathetic bond,
You grow familiar, intimate, and fond.

Lord Beaconsfield.

Intimate. s. Familiar friend; one who is trusted with our inmost or inward thoughts.

The desan was to entertain his reason with a more equal converse, assign him an intimate whose intellect as much corresponded with his as did the outward form.—Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Intimate. v. a.

1. Partake of mutually; share together as friends. Obsolete.

So both conspiring ran to intimate.
Each other's griefs with woe affectionate.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, vi. 4. 12.

2. Hint; point out indirectly, or not very plainly.

Alexander Van Nuchten tells us, that by a way he intimates, may be made a mercury of copper, not of the silver colour of other mercuries, but green.—Boyle.

The name of simple ideas and substances, with the abstract ideas in the mind, intimate some real existence, from which was derived their original pattern.—Locke.

"In the Divinity that sits within us;
The Heav'n itself that points out an immortal;
And intimates eternity to man." Addison, Edin. v. 1.

Intimation. s. Hint; obscure or indirect declaration or direction.

Let him strictly observe the first stirrings and intimations? the first hints and whispers of good and evil that pass in his heart.—South, Sermons.

Besides the more solid parts of learning, there are several little intimations to be met with on medals.—Addison.

Intime. adj. [accent doubtful.] Inward; being within the mass; not being external, or on the surface; internal. Rare.

As to the composition or dissolution of mixed bodies, which is the chief work of elements, and requires an intime application of the agents, without the principle and excess over earth.—Sir K. Diph, Treatise on the Nature of Bodies.

Intimidate. v. a. [Lat. timidus = cowardly.] Make fearful; daunt; make timid.

At that tribunal stands the writing tribe,
Which nothing can intimidate, or bribe;
Time is the judge.—Young.

Guilt, once harbour'd in the conscious breast,
Intimidates the brave, degrades the great.
—Johnson, Fanny.

Intimidation. s. Act, or series of acts, of one who acts upon another through his fears.

One party is acted on by bribery, the other by intimidation.—The Times Newspaper, Oct. 3, 1863.

Intire; Intitle. See Entire, &c.

Intro. prep. Noting entrance.

a. With regard to place: (opposed to out of).

Aerial substances, which pass into the capillary tubes, must irritate them into greater contraction.—Archibald, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

b. Of one thing into another.

To give life to that which has yet no being, is to frame a living creature, fashion the parts, and having fitted them together, to put into them a living soul.—Locke.

c. Penetration beyond the outside, or some action which reaches beyond the superficial or open part.

To look into letters already opened or dropt is held an ungenerous act.—Boyle.

d. Inclusion real or figurative.

They have denominated some herbs solar and some lunar, and such like toys put into great words.—Bacon.

e. New state to which anything is brought by the agency of a cause.

Compound bodies may be resolved into other substances than such as they are divided into by the fire.—Boyle.

A man must sin himself into a love of other men's sins; for a bare notion of this black art will not carry him so far.—South, Sermons.

Turn thou art born to some peculiar fate,
When the mad people rise against the state,
To look them into duty; and command
An awful silence with the lifted hand.
—Dryden, Translation of Persius.

In hollow bottoms, if any fortunate chance to rise, they naturally spread themselves into lakes, before they can find any issue.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

A man may wine and drink himself into intemperance; but it is impossible he should think himself into it.—Beattie.

Intolerable. adj. [Lat. intolerabilis, from tolero = bear, put up with; pres. part. tolerans, -antis; pass. part. toleratus.] Incapable of being borne, endured, or suffered.

If we bring into one day's thoughts the evil of many, certain and ungratified, what will be and what will never be, our head will be as intolerable as it is unreasonable.—Jeremy Taylor.

His awful presence did the crowd surprise,
Nor durst the rash spectator meet his eyes;
Knew that confus'd him born for kindly way,
No there, they flash'd intolerable day.
—Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, iii. 74.

Some men are quickly weary of one thing; the same study long continued in is as intolerable to them as the appearing long in the same clothes is to a court lady.—Boyle.

From Param's top th' Almighty rode,
Intolerable day proclaim'd the God.
—Broom.

Intolerably. adv. In an intolerable manner; to a degree beyond endurance.

She is intolerably cruel,
And shrewd, and forward.
—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, i. 2.

He [Rowe] has added some lines, intolerably flowery and unnatural.—J. Warburton, Essay on the Writings and Genius of Pope.

Intolerance. s. Want of toleration; want of patience and candour to bear the opinions of others.

And you, my lord, is it you of all men living, that stand forth to accuse another of intolerance of opinions?—Bishop Lenth, Letter to Bishop Warburton, p. 62.

These few restrictions, I hope, are no great stretches of intolerance, no very violent exertions of despotism.—Barke, Reflections on the Revolution in France.

Intolerant. adj.

1. Not enduring; not able to endure.

Too great moisture affects human bodies with one class of diseases, and too great dryness with another; the powers of human bodies being limited and intolerant of excesses.—Arbuthnot.

2. Not favourable to toleration.

Why, then, am I branded as an intolerant wretch?—Bishop Lenth, Letter to Bishop Warburton, p. 62.

Intolerant. s. One who is not favourable to toleration.

You might as well have concluded, that I was a Jew, or a Mahometan, as an intolerant and a persecutor.—Bishop Lenth, Letter to Bishop Warburton, p. 62.

Intolerated. part. pref. Not endured; denied toleration.

I would have all intolerance intolerated in its turn.—Lord Chesterfield.

Intolerant. s. Want of toleration: (Intolerance commoner).

This noise against the Jew bill proceeds from that narrow, unchristian spirit of intolerance in religious, and inhospitality in civil matters, which all wise governments should oppose.—Lord Chesterfield.

Intomb. See Entomb.

Intone. v. a. ? Thunder out; ? intone.

See Intonation.

a. As after a partial, though great and adorable accomplishment of the divine economy, our Saviour once, upon a famous and well-known hour, pronounced et cetera, "It is finished;" so, then, the great et cetera shall be intoned by the general voice of the whole host of heaven.—Harris, On Isaiah liii. p. 262; 1733.

Intonation. s. [three origins may be given to this word and its congeners; the Greek and Latin trōnē and tonus, French ton, and the Latin ton-, in tono = thunder. The French and Greek origin require, the Latin tonus, as Anglicized into tone, tolerates, the prefix en-. Intone, however, is the common spelling; yet En-tonation, from which it can scarcely be separated, is no English word.] Utterance with tone.

Whether poetry or prose were in question, one slow and uniform intonation, consisting of notes of equal or nearly equal length, was exclusively adopted.—Mason, Essay on English Church Music, p. 28.

These were all sung, not merely in simple intonation or chant, but in this mode of figurate descent.—Ibid. p. 30.

In persons of [a nervous] temperament, the heart's sounds are apt to be of higher intonation. . . . In proportion as they are more highly intoned, they acquire a greater audible extent.—Dr. P. M. Latham, Lectures on Subjects connected with Clinical Medicine, comprising Diseases of the Heart, lect. 1.

Intone. v. n. [see Intonation.] Make a slow protracted noise; perform any religious service with intonation.

And suddenly, sweetly, my heart beat stronger
And thicker, until I heard no longer
The snowy-sanded dilettante,
Delicate-hand priest intone.—Tennyson, Maud, viii.

Intone. v. a. Deliver as an intonation.

No swells each wind-pipe, nor intones to us
Harmonick twang.—Pope, Dunciad, li. 252.

Intoned. part. adj. Delivered as, characterized by, an intonation.

His [Abelard's] was not either the richly intoned voice swelling through the harmony of the choir, or the tender orison of the humble and weeping penitent.—William, History of Latin Christianity, b. viii. ch. v.

Intort. v. a. [Lat. tortus = twisted.] Wreath; wring. Rare.

The brain is a congeries of glands, that separate the finer parts of the blood, called animal spirits; and a gland is nothing but a canal variously intorted and wound up together.—Arbuthnot.

Intoxicate. v. a. [Lat. toxicum = poison.] Inebriate; make drunk.

The more a man drinketh of the world, the more it intoxicates; and as doth profit rather in the powers of understanding than in the virtues of the will and affections.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

As with new wine intoxicated both,
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
Divinity within them breeding wings,
Wherewith to scorn the earth.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, ix. 1009.

My early mistress, now my ancient nurse,
That strong Ciceronian liquor seems to infuse,
Wherewith thou didst intoxicate my youth.
—Sir J. Denham, Progress of Learning, preface.

Others, after having done fine things, yet spoil them by endeavouring to make them better; and are so intoxicated with an earnest desire of being above all others, that they suffer themselves to be deceived.—Dryden, Translation of Dufrenoy's Art of Painting.

Intoxicate. adj. Intoxicated.

Our inward eyes be nothing bright,
While in this muddy world inebriate
They lie, and with blind passions be intoxicate.
—Dr. H. More, Sleep of the Soul, iii. 10.

Deep vers'd in books, and shallow in himself,
Crude or intoxicate, collecting toys
—Milton, Paradise Regained, iv. 327.

Intoxication. s. Inebriation; ebriety; act of making drunk; state of being drunk.

That kind, being in unity with him, did so begin in hatred towards him, as to drink of the lees and dregs of Perkin's intoxication, who was every where else detested.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Whosoever thus proceed, but from that besetting intoxication which vernal madness brings upon the mind.—South, Sermons.

Intractability. s. [Lat. tracto = treat, q. v.] Incapability of being treated, dealt with, managed, or governed; ungovernableness.

The other concurring to the propensities, the wrong-headedness, the intractability of those with whom it has to deal.—Paley, View of the Evidences of the Christian Religion, pt. i. ch. ii.

Intractable. adj. Incapable of treatment.

1. Ungovernable; violent; stubborn; obstinate.

To love them who love us is so natural a passion, that even the most intractable tempers obey its force.—Boyle.

2. Unmanageable; furious.

By what means serpents, and other noxious and more intractable kinds, as well as the more innocent and useful, got together.—Hawtrey, Essay towards a Natural History of the Earth.

Intrance. See Entrance.

Intranquillity. s. Unquietness; want of rest.

Jaculations were used for amusement, and alloy in constant toison, and to relieve that intranquillity which makes men impatient of lying in their beds.—Sir W. Temple.

He lived not far from Westminster-abbey, within hearing of the choir, which perhaps did not a little contribute to his intranquillity.—Political Death of Tom Whig, Esq. pt. i. p. 170.

Intransient. adj. Not transient or passing away; permanent.

An unchangeable, an intransient, indefeasible priesthood.—Killingbeck, Sermons, p. 33.

Intransitive. adj. In Grammar applied to verbs, not connected with the name of the object upon which the action implied takes effect.

The occasion of such difference is from a question of grammar, whether the verb be in signification intransitive or transitive.—Locke, Commentary on Horace, p. 37.

A verb intransitive is that which signifies an action, not conceived as having an effect upon any object; as, curro, I run.—Clarke, Latin Grammar.

Intransitively. adv. According to the nature of an intransitive verb.

Yet again it [the verb] is manifestly, in the same form, used intransitively.—Locke, Commentary on Horace, p. 38.

The difference between verbs absolutely neuter, and intransitively active, is not always clear.—Bishop Lenth, A short Introduction to English Grammar.

Intransmutability. s. Incapability of being transmuted.

INTR

This fixedness and intransmutability of principles secures the universe from dissolution by the prevailing of one element over another, and turning it into its own nature.—Ray, On the Dissolution of the World, ch. v. sect. 4. (Ord. M.)

Intransmutable. adj. Incapable of being transmuted.

Some of the most experienced chemists do affirm quicksilver to be intransmutable, and therefore call it liquor eternum.—Ray, On the Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Intrans. adj. [Lat. intrans, -antis, pres. part. of intro = enter.] Entering.

A new oath was arbitrarily imposed on intrans, by which they were to observe the articles of Faith, and submit to the liturgy and canons.—Hume, History of England, ch. liii. (Ord. M.)

Intrap, Intreasure, Intreat. See Entrap, &c.

Intréach. v. n. [from Fr. trencher = cut.] Invade; encroach; cut off part of what belongs to another: (with on or upon).

Durst he, who does but for my pleasure live, Intréach on love, my great prerogative.—Dryden, Aurengzebe.

We are not to intréach upon truth in any conversation, but least of all with children.—Lodge.

Intréach. v. a. Cut into.

It was this very word intréach it.
Shakespeare, All's well that ends well, i. 1.
Those who care not whose living faces they intréach with their petulant styles.—B. Jonson, Volpone, dedication.

His face
Deep scars of thunder had intréach'd, and carv'd Set on his faded cheek.—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 600.

Intréach. v. n. [from English trench.] Fortify with a trench: (as, 'The allies were intréach'd in their camp').

The English, in their suburbs close intréach'd.
Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part I. l. 4.

Spelt with e.
Matilda hurried the Pope back, through by-roads, to the Apennines; and again intréach'd him in her impregnable fortress at Canosa.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. vii. ch. iii.

Intrénobant. adj. Not cutting: (in the extract (immaculately) not cut).

As easy may'th than the intrénobant air
With thy keen sword impress, as make me bleed.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, v. 7.

Intrénobant. s. Fortification with a trench.

Dominating both of these intrénobants, . . . is a heavy battery of eight Lancaster and ten-inch naval guns.—W. H. Russell, The Crimean War, ch. lxxviii.

Intrépide. adj. [Fr. intrepide; Lat. intrepidus = trembling.] Fearless; daring; bold; brave.

Arayo
Calm and intrepid by the very throat
Of audacious war, on Teniers' dreadful field.—Thomson.

Intrepidity. s. Fearlessness; courage; boldness.

I could not sufficiently wonder at the intrepidity of these diminutive mortals, who durst venture to walk upon my body, without trembling.—Swift, Gulliver's Travels.

Intrepidly. adv. In an intrepid manner; fearlessly; boldly; daringly.

He takes the gloom for the scene; he launches forward intrepidly, like one to whom no place is new.—Pope.

Intricable. adj. Entangling. Rare.

They shall remain captive, and entangled in the amorous intricable net.—Shelton, Translation of Don Quixote, iii. 7.

Intricacy. s. State of being entangled; perplexity; involution; complication of facts or notions.

The part of Ulysses in Homer's Odysses is much admired by Aristotle, as perplexing that fable with very agreeable plots and intricacies, by the many adventures in his voyage, and the subtilty of his behaviour.—Addison.

Intricate. adj. [Lat. in-tricatus and extricatus, from tricare = meshes.] Entangled; perplexed; involved; complicated; obscure.

Much of that we are to speak may seem to a number perhaps tedious, perhaps obscure, dark, and intricate.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

His stile was fit to convey the most intricate business to the understanding with the utmost clearness.—Addison.

INTR

Intricate. v. a. Perplex; darken.

Alterations of circumstances have so intricated, or rather obscured, the truth of our pedigrees, that it will be no little hard labour to deduce them.—Candlish.

However the matter may be intricated by passing through many, perhaps unknown, hands.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience, l. 4.

Manifest, intricated, and distracted divisions amongst men touching Free Will.—Bishop Montague, A speech to the House of Commons, p. 74.

Thus shall your wisdom restore me both to the freedom of my thoughts, and of my life; otherwise so intricated that I know not how to unfold it.—Sir H. Wotton, Reliquie Wottonianae, p. 261: 1628.

The more I strive to unwind
Myself from this meander, I the more Therein am intricated.
Heywood and Browne, Lancashire Witches.

That will be to intricate the business.—Lord Chief Justice Pemberton, Trial of Lord Grey: 1682.

Intrication. s. Attribute suggested by Intricate; intricacy.

He found such intrication, that he could see no way to lead him out of the maze.—Sir P. Sidney.

Intrigue. s. [Fr.]

1. Plot; private transaction in which many parties are engaged: (usually an affair of love).

A young fellow long made love, with much artifice and intrigue, to a rich widow.—Addison, Guardian.

The hero of a comedy is represented victorious in all his intrigues.—Swift.

Chemistry divided, for a time, with wine and love, with the stage and the gaming table, with the intrigue of a courtier and the intrigue of a demagogue, the attention of the sickle Buckingham.—Macaulay, History of England, vol. i. ch. iii.

2. Intricacy; complication. Rare.

Though this vicinity of ourselves to ourselves cannot give us the full prospect of all the intrigues of our nature, yet we have much more advantage to know ourselves, than to know other things without us.—Sir J. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

3. Complication or perplexity of a fable or poem; artful involution of a feigned transaction.

If you go beyond one consequence, there are so many certain but indistinguishable fallibilities, so many intrigues of fancy in the disputes, and so much unpleasure in the hearer, that it is ten to one they either do not understand one another, or do not understand the articles, and so it is in law.—Jeremy Taylor, Doctor Dubitantium. (Ord. M.)

As causes are the beginning of the action, the opposite designs against that of the hero are the middle of it, and form that difficulty or intrigue which makes up the greatest part of the poem.—Pope.

Intrigue. v. n. Carry on, set in action, an intrigue.

Russia has never ceased to intrigue in these quarters.—S. Edwards, The Polish Captivity.

Intrigue. v. a. Perplex. Rare.

Great discursers were apt to intrigue affairs, dispute the prince's resolutions, and stir up the people.—L. Addison, Description of Western Barbary, pref.: 1671.

How doth it [sin] perplex and intrigue the whole course of your lives, and entangle ye in a labyrinth of knavish tricks and collusions.—Scott, Christiana lff. l. 4.

Intriguer. s. One who busies himself in private transactions; one who forms plots; one who pursues women.

I desire that intriguers will not make a pimp of my lion, and convey their thoughts to one another.—Addison.

That club of intriguers who assemble at the Feuillants, and whose cabinet meets at Madame Stahl's, and makes and directs all the ministers, is the real executive government of France.—Burke, Thoughts on French Affairs: 1791.

Intriguing. part. adj. Plotting; caballing.

The intriguing and determined genius of Cromwell was forced to bow down with it.—Brand, Essay on Political Associations, p. 127.

Intrinsic. adj.

1. Inward; internal; real; true.

Intrinsic goodness consists in accordance, and sin in contrariety to the secret will of God, as well as to his revealed.—Hammond, On Fundamentals.

2. Not depending on accident; fixed in the nature of the thing.

His name, like gold, the more 'tis tried,
The more shall its intrinsic worth proclaim.—Prior.

Intrinsic. adj. [Lat. intrinsecus.]

1. Internal; solid; natural; not accidental; not merely apparent.

INTR {INTRINSICABLE IS PRODUCE

There are sins of a contagious nature, apt to diffuse their venom to others; as there are other sins, whose evil is intrinsecal to the owner.—Bishop Hall, Cases of Conscience.

These measure the laws of God not by the intrinsecal goodness and equity of them, but by the reluctance and opposition which they find in their own hearts against them.—Archbishop Tillotson.

The near and intrinsecal, and convincing argument of the being of God, is from human nature itself.—Bentley.

2. Intimate; closely familiar. Obsolete.

He falls into intrinsecal society with Sir John Graham, . . . who dissuaded him from marriage.—Sir H. Wotton.

Far off to us, to thee near; yes, intrinsecal.—Bishop Hall, Contemplations on the Old and New Testaments, b. iv.

Intrinsically. adv.

1. Internally; naturally; really?

Alto is a thing absolutely and intrinsically evil.—South, Sermons.

Every one of his pieces is an ingot of gold, intrinsically and solidly valuable.—Prior.

2. Within; at the inside.

In his countenance was open attention, but the less he showed without, the more it wrought intrinsically.—Sir H. Wotton.

If once bereaved of motion, matter cannot of itself acquire it again; nor till it be thrust by some other body from without, or intrinsically moved by an immaterial self-active substance that can pervade it.—Bentley.

Intrinsicate. adj. Perplexed; entangled.

Such smiling rages as these,
Like rats, off bite the body cords in twain,
Two intrinsicate tangles.—Shakespeare, King Lear, ii. 2.

Come, mortal wretch,
With thy sharp teeth this knot intrinsicate
Of life at once untie.—Id., Antony and Cleopatra, v. 2.

There are certainly punctilios, or (as I may more nakedly impute them) certain intrinsicate strokes and words, to which your activity is not yet amounted.—B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Introduce. v. a. [Lat. duco = lead; pass. part. ductus; ductio, -onis.]

1. Conduct or usher into a place, or to a person.

Mathematicians of advanced speculations may have other ways to introduce into their minds ideas of infinity.—Lodge.

2. Bring something into notice or practice.

This vulgar error whosoever is able to reclaim, he shall introduce a new way of cure, preserving by theory as well as practice.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

An author who should introduce a sort of words upon the stage, would meet with small applause.—Browne.

3. Produce; give occasion to.

Whosoever introduces lights in children, deserves the care and attention of their governors.—Lodge, Thoughts on Education.

4. Bring into writing or discourse by proper preparatives.

If he will introduce himself by preface, we cannot help it.—Lager's Trial.

Introducer. s. One who introduces; one who conducts another to a place or person; one who brings anything into practice or notice.

The beginning of the earl of Essex I must attribute to my lord of Leicester; but not as an introducer or supporter, but as a teacher.—Sir H. Wotton.

It is commonly charged upon the army, that the best view of drinking to excess had been lately, from their example, restored among us; but whoever the introducers were, they have succeeded to a miracle.—Swift.

Introduction. s.

1. Act of conducting or ushering to any place or person; state of being ushered or conducted; act of bringing any new thing into notice or practice; introducing.

The archbishop of Canterbury had pursued the introduction of the liturgy and the canons into Scotland with great vehemence.—Lord Clarendon.

2. Preface or part of a book containing preliminary matter.

Introductive. adj. Serving as an introduction.

The truths of Christ crucified, in the Christian's philosophy, and a good life is the Christian's logic; that great instrumental introductive act, that must guide the mind into the flower.—South, Sermons.

Introducer. s. "One who introduces; introducer. Latinism, or rhetoric.

No formality was necessary in addressing Madam Prime, and therefore Levenus went next morning without an introducer. — Johnson, Rambler, no. 182.

Introductory. adj. Serving as an introduction.

This introductory discourse itself is to be but an essay, not a book. — Dryden.

Intromission. s. [Lat. mitto = send; pres. part. mittens, -entis; pass. part. missus.]

1. Act of sending in.

All the reason that I could ever hear alleged by the chief factors for a general intromission of all sects and persuasions into our communion, is, that those who separate from us are still and obstinate, and will not submit to the rules of our church, and that therefore they should be taken away. — South, Sermons.

2. Admission.

The soft yielding Ether gives admission: So gentle Venus to Mercurius darts Descent, and thence an easy intromission. — Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, III. 3, 38.

It is worthy inquiry, whether the intromission of venial sins, without which no man lives, does hinder the fruit of the indulgence; for if it does, all the cost is lost. — Jeremy Taylor, Dissuasive against Popery, II. § 4.

Intromit. v. a. [see Intromission.]

1. Send in; let in; admit.

This bird (the bird) has been often observed, by means of his crooked bill intromitted into the anus, to inject salt water, as with a syringe, into his own bowels. — Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 212.

2. Allow to enter; be the medium by which anything enters.

It intromits more cares and scruples than it can relieve. — Jeremy Taylor, Dissuasive against Popery, II. § 2.

Intromittent. adj. In Zoology. Applied to the male organ of the lower animals.

The intromittent organ which exists in the great majority of the class is also double in most of these, as in serpents and many lizards. — Owen, Lectures on the Comparative Anatomy of Vertebrate Animals, introd. lect.

Introspection. s. Act of receiving internally. Rare.

We're but the love of Christ to us ever suffered to come into our hearts, as species to the eye by introspection; had we but come to the least taste and relish of it; what would we not do to recompense, and answer, and entertain that love! — Hammond, Works, II. 565.

Introspection. s. [Lat. root of spec = view; in-specio, pass. part. -spectus; -spectio, -onis.] Internal view.

The actions of the mind or imagination itself, by way of reflection or introspection of themselves, are discernible by man. — Sir M. Hale, Origin of Morals.

I was forced to make an introspection into my own mind, and into that idea of beauty which I have formed in my own imagination. — Dryden.

Introsome. v. a. [Lat. sumo = take.] Suck in.

How they creak, then introsome their proper food. — Erengy, IV. § 21.

Introspection. s. Taking up internally.

The parts of the body are either animate or inanimate; either such as participate of the life of the whole, and are nourished by the introspection of animal and aliment, &c. — Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 100.

Introversent. adj. [Lat. veniens, -entis; pres. part. of venio = come.] Entering; coming in.

Secure my condition which is not exhausted and obscured, from the commixture of introversent nations, either by commerce or conquest. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Introversion. s. [Lat. verto = turn; pass. part. of versus; versio, -onis = turning.] Act of introverting.

It is the privilege of a thinking being to withdraw from the objects that solicit his senses, and turn his thoughts inward on himself. For my own part, I often mitigate the pain arising from the little misfortune and disappointments that beset human life, by this introversion of my faculties, when in I convert my own soul as the image of her Creator, and receive great consolation from beholding those perfections which testify her divine original, and lead me to some knowledge of her everlasting archetype. — Hervey, Characters, no. 80. (Ord MS.)

Introvers. v. a. "Turn inwards.

Every smelterer in anatomy knows, that a woman is but an introversed man. — Martianus Scribnerus, Anatomia Mirabilis. (Ord MS.)

Introversed. part. adj. Turned in.

His awkward smile, his introversed toes, bent knees, round shoulders. — Cowper, Task, II. 16.

Intrude. v. a. [Lat. trudo = thrust; pass. part. trusus.]

1. Come in uninvited by a kind of violence; enter without invitation or permission.

Thy years want wit, thy wit wants edge And manners, to intrude where I am grac'd. — Shakespeare, Titus Andronicus, II. 3.

The Jewish religion was yet in possession; and therefore that this might so enter, as not to intrude, it was to bring its warrant from the same hand of omnipotence. — South, Sermons.

With an or upon.

Some thoughts rise and intrude upon us, while we slum them; others fly from us, when we would hold them. — Watts.

2. Encroach; force in uncalled or unpermitted: (with into).

Let no man bewile you of your reward in a voluntary humility and worshipping of angels, intruding into those things which he hath not seen, vainly puffed up by his fleshly mind. — Colossians, II. 18.

Intrude. v. a.

1. Force without right or welcome: (commonly with the reciprocal pronoun).

Not to intrude one's self into the mysteries of government, which the prince keeps secret, is represented by the winds shut up in a bull hide, which the companions of Ulysses would needs be so foolish as to pry into. — Pope.

2. Force in; cast in.

If it a clyster should be intruded up by force, it cannot so quickly penetrate to the superior parts. — Greenhill, Art of Embalming, p. 273.

Intruder. s. One who forces himself into company or affairs without right or welcome.

They were but intruders upon the possession, during the minority of the heir: they knew those lands were the rightful inheritance of that young lady. — Sir J. Davies, Discourse on the State of Ireland.

3. The whole fraternity of writers rise up in arms against every new intruder into the world of fame. — Addison, Freeholder.

Intruding. verbal abs. Intrusion.

This is the medicine against our daily imperfections and intrudings of lesser crimes and sudden emigration of passions. — Jeremy Taylor, Worthy Communion, 200. (Ord MS.)

Intrusion. s. [Lat. intrusio, -onis, from trudo, trusus.]

1. Act of thrusting or forcing any thing or person into any place or state.

Many excellent strains have been justified off by the intrusion of poetical fictions. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

The separation of the parts of one body, upon the intrusion of another, and the change from rest to motion upon impulse, and the like, seem to have some connection. — Locke.

2. Encroachment upon any person or place; unwelcome entrance; entrance without invitation or permission.

I think myself in better plight for a lender than you are, the which hath something emboldened me to this unseasoned intrusion: for they say, if money go before, all ways do lie open. — Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, II. 2.

How's this, my son? Why this intrusion? Were not my orders that I should be private? — Addison, Cato.

I may close after so long an intrusion upon your meditations. — Archbishop Wake, Preparation for Death.

3. Voluntary and uncalled-for undertaking of anything.

It will be said, I handle an art no way suitable either to my employment or fortune, and so stand intruded with intrusions and impertinency. — Sir H. Walton.

Intrusive. adj. Intruding upon; entering without welcome.

Let me shake off the intrusive cares of day, And my meddling senses all aside. — Thompson, Seasons, Winter.

Intrust. See Entrust.

Intuition. s. [Lat. intueor = look at, view, contemplate, see at once; preterite part. intuitus; intuitio, -onis.]

1. Mental perception of anything; immediate knowledge.

At our rate of judging, St. Paul had passed for a most malicious persecutor; whereas God saw he did it ignorantly in unbelief, and upon that intuition had mercy on him. — Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

The truth of these propositions we know by a bare simple intuition of the ideas, and such propositions are called self-evident. — Locke.

2. Knowledge not obtained by deduction of reason, but instantaneously accompanying the ideas which are its object.

All knowledge of causes is deductive; for we know none by simple intuition, but through the mediation of their effects; for the causality itself is insensible. — Claude.

Discourse was then almost as quick as intuition. — South, Sermons.

He their single virtues did survey, By intuition in his own large breast. — Dryden.

Intuitive. adj. Seen at once by the mind without the intervention of argument or testimony; known as a matter of direct consciousness.

Faith, beginning here with a weak apprehension of things not seen, endeth with the intuitive vision of God in the world to come. — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

The rule of ghostly or immaterial natures, as spirits and angels, is their intuitive intellectual judgement, concerning the amiable beauty and high goodness of that object, which, with inspeakable joy and delight, doth set them on work. — Ald.

The soul receives

Discursive or intuitive. — Milton, Paradise Lost, v. 487.

Immediate perception of the agreement or disagreement of two ideas, is when, by comparing them together in our minds, we see their agreement or disagreement; this therefore is called intuitive knowledge. — Locke.

Lofly flights of thought, and almost intuitive perception of abstract notions, or exalted discoveries of mathematical theorems, we sometimes see existent in one person. — Beaumont.

Intuitively. adv. In an intuitive manner; without deduction of reason; by immediate perception.

That our love is sound and sincere, that it cometh from a pure heart, and a good conscience, and a faith unfeigned, who can pronounce, saving only the searcher of all men's hearts, who alone intuitively doth know in this kind who are his? — Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

God Almighty, who sees all things intuitively, does not want logical help. — Baker, On Learning.

Intumescence. s. [Lat. tumescere = swell; tumescere = begin to swell, show signs of swelling; pres. part. tumescens, -entis; intumescens = swelling.] Swell; tumour; act or state of swelling.

This subterranean heat causes a great rarefaction and intumescence of the water of the abyss, putting it into very great commotions, and occasions an earthquake. — Woodward.

Intumescency. s. Same as Intumescence.

According to the temper of the terrene parts at the bottom, as they are more hard or easily moved, they variously begin, continue, or end their intumescency. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Intumulated. adj. [Lat. tumulus = mound.] Unburied. Rhetorical.

His joy intumulated in the grave. — Rena, Thule or Virtue's History, 1528.

Inturgescence. s. [Lat. turgere = swell; turgere = begin to swell; pres. part. turgescens, -entis.] Swelling; act or state of swelling.

Not by attenuation of the upper part of the inturgescence caused first at the bottom, and carrying the upper part of it before them. — Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Intuse. s. [Lat. tundo = beat, or pound; pass. part. tusus.] Bruise.

The flesh therewith she supplied and did steep, To slake all pain and soke the swelling bruise; And, after having searcht the intuse deeps, She with her scarf did bind the wound. — Spenser, Faerie Queene

Intusception. s. [Lat.] Taking up of one part of a tube (as a perspective glass) into another: (common in Medicine, as applied to the intestine).

In a third case intusception will be observed. . . . The intuscepted portion . . . sloughs off. . . . A distinction has been made between progressive and retrograde inflammation.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. iv. ch. x.

Entwine. See Entwine.

Entusiasm. s. [Lat. unguis = anoint; pres. part. unguens, -entis; pass. part. unctus; unctio, -onis.] Act of anointing or anointing.

Irrigations, entusiasm, odors, premeditated for the head.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 406.

The wise Author of Nature hath placed on the ramp two glands, which the bird catches hold upon with her bill, and squeezes out an oily liniment, fit for the entusiasm of the feathers, and causing their filaments to cohere.—Ray.

Entendant. adj. Overflowing. Rhetorical.

A torrent, in the summer temperate and shallow, but in the spring and winter entendant and raging.—Hagwood, Hierarchy of Angels, p. 531: 1635.

Days, and nights, and hours,
Thy voice, hydropic Fancy, calls aloud
For costly draughts, entendant bowls of joy.
Shenstone, Economy, pt. I.

Inundate. v. a. [Lat. unda = water; inundo = deluge; pres. part. inundans, -antis; pass. part. inundatus; inundatio, -onis.] Overflow a place with water; flood.

This word has been reprinted as one of the affected introductions of modern writers into our language. This is not the case; for we find inundatus used in the sense of 'overwhelmed,' nearly two centuries since, in the vocabulary of Cockeram.—Todd.

Inundation. s.

1. Overflow of waters; flood; deluge.

The same inundation was not past forty foot in most places; so that some few wild inhabitants of the woods escaped.—Bacon.
Your care about your banks infers a fear
Of threatening floods, and inundations near.
Dryden.

No swelling inundation hides the grounds,
But crystal currents glide within their bounds.
Gay.

2. Swamping, in the sense of overwhelming.
Many good towns, through that inundation of the Irish, were utterly wasted.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

Inunderstanding. adj. or part. pref. Wanting the faculties of the mind; void of understanding. Rare.

Many of the bounds of the field, divers of the plants of the earth, are of a more durable constitution, and outlive the sons of men. And can we think that such material and mortal, that such inunderstanding souls, should by God and Nature be furnished with bodies of so long permutation, and that our spirits should be joined unto flesh so subject to corruption, so suddenly dissolvable, were it not that they lived but once, and so enjoyed that life for a longer season, and then went soul and body to the same destruction, never to be restored to the same subjection?—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the Creed, art. xi.

Inurbanity. s. [Lat. urbanus = having the manners of one belonging to the urbs, i. e. city.] Want of politeness, courtesy, good manners, urbanity.

Plautus abounds in pleasanties that were the delight of his own and of the following age, but which at the distance of one hundred and fifty years Horace scruples not to censure for their inurbanity.—Dr. Bentley, On Laughter and Ludicrous Composition, Works, vi. 250. (Ord MS.)

Inure. See Enure.

Inurn. v. a. Place in, or as in, a (sepulchral) urn.

The apophthegm
Wherein we saw thee quickly inurn'd,
Hath op'd its ponderous and marble jaws
To cast thee up again. Shakespeare, Hamlet, i. 4.
Amidst the tears of Trojan dames inurn'd,
And by his loyal daughters truly mourn'd.
Dryden.

Inustation. s. [Lat. usitatus = frequently used; usitatio, -onis.] State of being unused; want of use. Rare.

The manners of the male have not vanished by inustation.—Foley, Natural Theology, ch. xiii.

Inutile. adj. [Fr. inutile; Lat. inutilis.] Useless; unprofitable.

To refer to heat and cold is a compendious and inutile speculation.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Inutility. s. Uselessness; unprofitableness.

Vol. I.

You see the inutility of foreign travel.—Bishop Hurd.

Inveterable. adj. Unutterable. Rare.

All prodigious things,
Abominable, inveterable, and worse
Than fables yet have frigid'd, or fear conceiv'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 825.

The planets . . . they invoked with inveterable invocations.—Bishop Patrick, Paraphrases and Commentaries on the Old Testament, Genesis xii. 8.

Invade. v. a. [Lat. invasio = go; pass. part. invasus; invasio, -onis.]

1. Attack a country; make a hostile entrance.

Should he invade any part of their country, he would soon see that nation up in arms.—Knollys, History of the Turks.

With dangerous expedition [they] invade

Heaven, whose high walls fear no assault.
Milton, Paradise Lost, ii. 342.

Encouraged with success, he invades the province of philosophy.—Dryden.

In vain did nature's wise command
Divide the waters from the land,
If daring ships, and men profane,
Invade th' inviolable main.

Id., Translations from Horace, B. I. ode iii.

Thy race in times to come
Shall spread the conquests of imperial Rome;
Rome, whose ascending towers shall heav'n invade,
Involving earth and ocean in her shade.

Id., Translation of the Æneid, vi. 1063.

2. Attack; assail; assault.

There shall be tradition among men, and invading one another; they shall not regard their kings.—2 Esdras, xv. 16.

Thou think'st 'tis much, that this contentious storm

Invades us to the skin; so 'tis to thee:
But where the greater malady is fix'd,
The lesser is scarce felt.

Shakespeare, King Lear, iii. 4.

With joy like ours, the Thracian youth invades
Orpheus, returning from th' Elysian shades;
Embrace the hero, and his stay implore;
Make it their public suit, he would no more Desert them so.

Walker, To my Lord Admiral. (Ord MS.)

3. Violate by the first act of hostility; attack, not defend.

Your foes are such, as they, not you, have made;
And virtue may revolt, though not invaded.—Dryden.

4. Go into. Latinism.

That same his sea-marks made

And nam'd it Albion; but later day
Finding in it fit ports for fisher's trade,
Gan more the same frequent and farther to invade.
Spenser, Faerie Queene, ii. 10, 6.

Invader. s. One who invades.

a. As an enemy with an army attacking the possessions of another.

The breath of Scotland the Spaniards could not endure; neither durst they, as invaders, land in Ireland.—Bacon.

The country about Attica was the most barren of any in Greece, through which means it happened that the natives were never expelled by the fury of invaders.—Strabo.

b. As an assailant, encroacher, or intruder generally.

The substance was formerly comprised in that uncompounded style, but afterwards prudently enlarged for the repelling and preventing heretical invaders.—Allammond.

Invalentidary. adj. [Lat. valetudo; -inis = health.] Wanting health; infirm. Rare.

Whether usually the most studious, laborious ministers be not the most invalentidary and infirm?—Papers between the Commissioners for Review of the Library, p. 127: 1661.

Invaid. adj. [Lat. validus = strong.] Weak; of no weight or cogency.

But this I urge,
Admitting motion in the heavens, to show
Invaid that which thou dost doubt it mov'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 114.

Invalid. s. Person in ill-health: (as, 'a confirmed invalid').

Invailate. v. a. Weaken; deprive of force or efficacy.

To invailate such a consequence, some things might be speciously enough alluded.—Baile.

Tell a man, passionately in love, that he is invailate, bring a score of witnesses of the falsehood of his mistress; and 'tis ten to one but three kind words of hers shall invailate all their testimonies.—Locke.

Invailidation. s. Act of weakening.

Magna Charta . . . the inviolable monument of

8 B

English freedom, so long the boast and glory of this nation, would have been as once an instrument of our servitude and a monument of our folly. If this principle were true: the thirty-four confirmations would have been only as many repetitions of their absurdity; so many new links in the chain, and so many invalidations of their right.—Burke, Speech on Libels: 1771.

Invalidity. s. Weakness; want of bodily strength; want of moral or argumentative cogency.

He ordered, that none who could work should be idle; and that none who could not work, by age, sickness, or invalidity, should want.—Sir R. Temple.

Invainable. adj. Incapable (from its great worth) of being valued; precious above estimation; inestimable.

The faith produced by terror would not be so free an act as it ought, to which are annexed all the glorious and invainable privileges of believing.—Bishop Atterbury.

Invainably. adv. In an invainable manner; inestimably.

That invainably precious blood of the Son of God.

—Bishop Hall, Works, i. 457.

Invariable. adj. Incapable of being varied; unchangeable; constant.

Being not able to deviate by days, months, or years, they thought best to determine these alterations by some known and invariable signs, and such did they conceive the rising and setting of the fixed stars.—Sir T. Browne.

The rule of good and evil would not appear uniform and invariable, but different, according to men's different complexions and inclinations.—Bishop Atterbury.

Invariableness. s. Attribute suggested by invariable; immutability; constancy.

From the dignity of their intellect arises the invariableness of their wills.—W. Montague, Decont Emage, pt. ii. p. 32: 1654.

These nominatives . . . emphatically represent and express the everlasting verity and invariableness of God.—Blackwell, Sacred Classics defended and illustrated, i. 102.

Invariably. adv. In an invariable manner; unchangeably; constantly.

He who steers his course invariably by this rule, takes the surest way to make all men praise him.—Bishop Atterbury.

Invaried. adv. Unvaried. Rare.

Change of the particles, or the lower invaried words, that add to the signification of nouns and verbs.—Blackwell, Sacred Classics defended and illustrated, i. 156.

Invasion. s.

1. Hostile entrance upon the rights or possessions of another; hostile encroachment.

We made an invasion upon the south of the Cheretikes.—1 Samuel, xii. 14.

Reason finds a secret grief and remorse from every invasion that sin makes upon innocence, and that must render the first entrance and admission of sin uneasy.—South, Sermons.

2. Attack of a disease.

What demonstrates the plague to be endemic to Egypt, is its invasion and going off at certain seasons.—Arbuthnot.

Invasive. adj. Entering hostilely upon other men's possessions; not defensive.

I must come closer to my purpose, and not make more invasive wars abroad, when, like Hannibal, I am called back to the defence of my country.—Dryden.

Let other monarchs, with invasive hands,
Lament their people, and extend their lands;
By snatching nations hated and obey'd,
Lords of the deserts that their words had made.

Arbuthnot.

Invectio. s. [Lat. veho = bear, carry; pass. part. actus; obectio, -onis.] Reproachful accusation; railing; invective.

Many men wish Luther to have used a more temperate style sometimes, especially against princes and temporal estates; and he himself did openly acknowledge his fault therein, especially his immoderate invectio against King Henry the 8th.—Fiske, Answer to P. Frarise, p. 23: 1662.

Invective. s. Censure in speech or writing; reproachful accusation.

If we take notice, in the general signification of the word, for an invective, 'tis almost as old as verse.—Dryden, Translations of General, dedication.

So deep rate thieves, all hopes of their lives,
Breathes out invectives 'gainst the officers.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part III., i. 4.

Casting off respect, he fell to bitter invectives

against the French king.—Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Whilst we condemn others, we may indeed be in the wrong; and then all the invections we make at their supposed errors, fall back with a rebounded force upon our own real ones.—Dr. A. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

His invection was unparagoned and hard to be endured, although he was a less eminent master of sarcasm than his son, and rather overwhelmed his antagonist with the burst of words and vehement indignation, than wounded him by the edge of ridicule, or tortured him with the gall of bitter scorn, or fixed his arrow in the wound by the barb of epigram.—Lord Brougham, Historical Sketches of Statesmen of the Reign of George III., Lord Chatham.

Invective. adj. Satirical; abusive.

Let him rail on; let his invective muse
Have four and twenty letters to abuse.

Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel, ll. 447.

Invective. adv. Satirically; abusively.

Thus most invectively he pierce through
The body of the country, city, court,
Yea, and of this our life; swearing that we
Are mere usurpers, tyrants.

Shakespeare, As you like it, ll. 1.

Invective. v. a. [Lat. invecho; see Invectio.] Utter censure or reproach: (with against.)

I cannot blame him for invecting so sharply
Against the vices of the clergy in his age.—Dryden.
He invectives severely against the folly of parties,
In retaining scoundrels to retail their lies.—Dr. Butcher.

Invectiver. s. One who inveighs; vehement railer.

He temper'd and extravagant invectives against Papists, made by men whose persons wanting authority as much as their speeches do reason, do nothing else but set an edge upon our adversaries' sword; whilst the light behaviour, and bad example of the invectiver's life infuseth courage to their hearts, and addeth strength unto their arms.—Johnson, Works,
iii. 790.

One of these invectivers against mercury, in seven weeks, could not cure one small herpes in the face.
—Wiseana.

Invective, Inveit, Invenem. See Enveigle, &c.

Invent. v. a. [Lat. inventus, pass. part. of invenio—come upon, put upon, find out, discover; venio, -onis.]

1. Discover; find out; excogitate; produce something not made before.

The substance of the services of God, so far forth as it hath in it any thing more than the law of reason doth teach, may not be invented of men, but must be received from God himself.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

This ship, by help of a screw, invented by Archimedes, was launched into the water.—Arbuthnot.

2. Forge; contrive falsely; fabricate.

I never did such things as these men have maliciously invented against me.—History of Sumner,
i. 43.

Here is a strange figure invented against the plain sense of the words.—Bishop Stillingfleet.

3. Feign; make by the imagination.

I would invent as bitter searching terms,
With full as many signs of deadly hate,
As I can find Envy in her loathsome cave.

Shakespeare, Henry VI. Part II. iii. 2.

Hercules's meeting with Pleasure and Virtue was invented by Prodicus, who lived before Socrates, and in the first drawings of philosophy.—Addison, Spec- tator.

4. Light on; meet with. Obsolete.

Far off he wonders what them makes so glad:
Or Cæsus's merry fruits they did invent,
Or Cybele's frantick rites have made them mad.
—Spenser, Faerie Queen.

Inventer. s. One who invents; deviser of something not known before. See Inventor.

As a translator, he was just; as an inventer, he was rich.—Gurth.

Inventful. adj. Full of invention.

The genius of the French government appears powerful only in destruction, and inventful only in oppression.—Gifford, Resolutions in France: 1797.

Inventible. adj. Capable of being invented; discoverable; capable of being found out.

Rare.

When first I gave my thoughts to make guns shoot often, I thought there had been but one only exquisite way inventible.—Marquis of Worcester, Century of Inventions, &c.

Invention. s.

1. Excogitation; act or power of producing something new.

O for a muse of fire, that would ascend
The brightest heaven of invention!

Shakespeare, Henry V. I. chorus.

Reason is of two parts, invention and judgment.—
Judgment is most perfect in an assembly. Invention is most perfect in one man. In one man, judgment wants the strength which is in a multitude of counselors. In a multitude of counselors, inven- tion is none at all.—Harrington, Political Apho- risms, nos. 111-17, p. 522.

Invention is a kind of muse, which, being possessed of the other advantages common to her sisters, and being warmed by the fire of Apollo, is raised higher than the rest.—Dryden.

The chief excellences of Virgil is judgment, of Homer is invention.—Pope.

2. Thing invented.

The garden, a place not fairer in natural ornaments than artificial inventions.—Sir P. Sidney.

Th' invention all admir'd; and each how he
To be th' inventor wou'd, so easy it seem'd Once found, which yet unfound most would have thought

Impossible. Milton, Paradise Lost, vl. 408.

3. Discovery: (etymologically, a thing in- vented or found out is a thing discovered.
Practically, however, the distinction is clear, and the confusion reprehensible.
The properties of the magnet were dis- covered, the electric telegraph was invented.
Invention, even with logical and mathematical formulae, implies construction: dis- covery, well-directed observation.)

Nature hath provided several glandules to separate spittle from the blood, and no less than four pair of channels to convey it into the mouth, which are of a late invention, and called ductus salivales.
—Erg, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

4. Forgery; fiction.

We hear our bloody cousins are bestowed
In England and in Ireland; not confounding
Their cruel paricide, filling their hearers
With strange invention.

Shakespeare, Macbeth, iii. 1.

If thou canst accuse,
Do it without invention suddenly.
Id., Henry VI. Part I. iii. 1.

Inventive. adj.

1. Quick at contrivance; ready at expedients.

Those have the inventive heads for all purposes and roundest tongues in all matters.—Achan,
Schoolmaster.

The inventive god, who never fails his part,
Inspires the wit, when once he warms the heart.

Dryden.

2. Having the power of excogitation or fiction.

As he had an inventive brain, so there never lived any man that believed better thereof, and of himself.
—Sir W. Raleigh.

Reason, reasonableness, wit, inventive art,
No nature but immortal can impart.

Sir J. Denham, Of Old Age, pt. iv.

Inventiveness. s. Attribute suggested by inventive.

Thus the knowledge that clear and appropriate ideas are regulable for discovery, although it does not lead to any very precise precepts, or supercede the value of natural sagacity and inventiveness, may still be of use to us in our pursuit after truth.—
Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas.

Inventor. s.

1. Finder out of something new.

We have the statue of your Columbus, that discovered the West India, also the inventor of ships:
your monk that was the inventor of ordnance, and of gunpowder.—Bacon.

Why are these positions charged upon me as their sole author and inventor, and the reader led into a belief that they were never before maintained by any person of virtue?—Bishop Atterbury.

2. Contriver; framer: (in an ill sense).

In this upshot, purposes mistook,
Fall'n on th' inventors' head.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, v. 2.

Inventorially. adv. In manner of an inventory.

To divide him inventorially would dim the arithmetick of memory.—Shakespeare, Hamlet, &c.

Inventorise. v. a. Make an inventory.

He sat down, and began inventorising, examining,
and noting, and was soon lost in business.—Smilia,
Wingham, ch. viii.

Inventory. s. Account or catalogue of movables, i. e. things found (inventis) in any place.

I found.

Forsooth, an inventory, thus importing,
The several parcels of his plate.

Shakespeare, Henry VIII. iii. 2.

In Paris the daughters of five are reckoned in the inventory of their goods and chattels; and it is usual, when a man sells a bale of silk, to com half a dozen women into the bargain.—Addison, Spec- tator.

What sort of completeness, or what value, would a Greek lexicon possess, a Scott and Liddell, from whose pages all the words condemned by Phrynchus and the other Greek purists, and, so far as style is concerned, many of them justly condemned, had been dismissed? The lexicographer is making an inventory; that is his business; he may think of this article which he inserts in his catalogue, that it had better be consigned to the lumber-room with all speed, or of the other, that it only met its deserts when it was so consigned long ago; but his task is to make his inventory complete.—Archbishop Trench, On certain Deficiencies in English Dic- tionaries.

Inventory. v. a. Register; place in a catalogue. Rare.

I will give out diverse schedules of my beauty: it shall be inventoried, and every particle and utensil labelled.—Shakespeare, Twelfth Night, I. 5.

Inventress. s. Female inventor.

Cervilla came,

Inventress of the vocal frame:
The sweet enthusiast, from her sacred store,
Enlarg'd the former narrow bounds.

Dryden, Alexander's Feast.

Inventrice. s. Same as inventress. Rare.

Purveyors hath been the inventrices of all good crafts.—Remedy for Scdition, F. II. b. 1630.

Inverse. adj. Inverted; reciprocal: (opposed to direct.)

Every part of matter tends to every part of matter with a force, which is always in a direct proportion of the quantity of matter, and an inverse duplicate proportion of the distance.—Gurth.

In Arithmetic: (as, in 'the Rule of Three Inverse').

In Logic. The terms of a proposition with their places changed.

Inversion. s. Change of order or time, so that the last is first, and the first last;
change of place, so that each takes the room of the other.

If he speaks truth, it is upon a subtle inversion of the precept of God, to do good that evil may come of it.—Sir T. Browne.

But just the inversion of an act of parliament;
your lordship first sign'd it, and then it was pass'd amongst the lords and commons.—Dryden.

In Logic. Change of place of, the terms of a proposition.

Invert. v. a. [Lat. invertio; verto = turn;
pres. part. vertens, -entis; inversio, -onis.]

1. Turn upside down; place in contrary method or order to that which was before.

With fate inverted, shall I humbly woo?
And some proud prince, in wild Numidia born,
Pray to accept me, and forget my scorn! Waller.

2. Turn into another channel.

Bolyman charged him bitterly with inverting his treasures to his own private use, and having secret intelligence with his enemies.—Kauley, History of
the Turks.

Invertebrata. See Vertebrata.

Invertebrate. s. and adj. Wanting a backbone. Applied in Zoology to animals like the Cuttle-fish, Wasp, Star-fish, and the Mollusca, Annulosa, and Radiata, as opposed to the Vertebrata.

Invertedly. adv. In inverted order.

Placing the forepart of the eye to the hole of the window of a darkened room, we have a pretty land-ship of the objects abroad, invertedly painted on the paper, on the back of the eye.—Darwin, Physico- Theology.

Invent. v. a. [Lat. vestio = clothe; pres.
part. vestiens, -entis; vestis = garment.]

1. Clothe: (with in or with.)

How long a day soever Thou make that day in the grave, yet there is no day between that and the resurrection. Then we shall all be invented, re-apparelled, in our own bodies.—Donne, Devotions,
p. 258: 1625.

Thus with mackintosh I invent my woe.
Sandys, Paraphrase of the Book of Job, p. 25.

Thou with a mantle didst invest
The rising world of waters.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iii. 10.

Let thy eyes shine forth in their full lustre;
Invest them with thy loved smiles, put on Thy choicest looks.

Sir J. Denham, The Sophy.

2. Place, by means of some ceremonial connected with dress, in possession of a rank or office.

When we sanctify or hallow churches, that which we do is only to testify that we make places of public resort, that we invest God himself with them, and that we sever them from common uses.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

After the death of the other archbishop he was invested in that high dignity, and settled in his palace at Lambeth.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Great Rebellion.

The practice of all ages, and all countries, hath been to do honour to those who are invested with public authority.—Bishop Atterbury.

3. Adorn; grace.

Honour must
Not, unaccompanied, invest him only;
But signs of nobleness, like stars, shall shine,
On all that deserves.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, l. 4.

4. Confer; give.

If there can be found such an inequality between man and man, as there is between man and beast, or between soul and body, it investeth a right of government.—Bacon.

5. Enclose; surround so as to intercept succours or provisions: (as, 'the enemy invested the town').

6. Put on.

Alas for pittance, that no fire a crew,
As like cannot be seen from east to west,
Cannot find one this rivule to invest.

Spenser, Faerie Queen, iv. 5, 18.

Investient. adj. Covering; clothing. Rare. The shells served as plumes or mantles to this sand, which, when consolidated and freed from its investient shell, is of the same shape as the cavity of the shell.—Hutton, &c.

Investigable. adj. Capable of being investigated.

Finally, in such sort they are investigable, that the knowledge of them is general; the world hath always been acquainted with them.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

In doing evil, we prefer a less good before a greater, the greatness whereof is by reason investigable, and may be known.—Hind.

Investigate. v. a. [Lat. investigare—footstep.] Search out; find out by rational disquisition.

Investigate the variety of motions and figures made by the organs for articulation.—Moller, On Speech.

Investigation. s. Tracking as a dog on a scent; search; examination.

Your travels I hear much of: my own shall never more be idly a stranger land, but a diligent investigation of my own territories.—Pope, Letter to Swift.

Investigative. adj. Curious and deliberate in making inquiry.

When money was in his pocket, he was more deliberate and investigative.—Lynde, Anecdotes of the English Language.

Investigator. s. One who investigates.

This occult piece of history... I leave to the curiosity and conjectures of some more laborious investigator.—T. Norton, History of English Poetry.

If a man begins (as is so plainly a frequent mode of proceeding) by hastily adopting, or strongly leaning to, some opinion which suits his inclination, or which is sanctioned by some authority that he blindly venerates, and then studies with the utmost diligence, not as an investigator of truth, but as an advocate labouring to prove his point, his talents and his resources, whatever effect they may produce in making converts to his notions, will avail nothing in enlightening his own judgment, and securing him from error.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Rhetoric.

Investiture. s.

1. Right of giving possession of any manor, office, or benefice.

He had refused to yield up to the Pope the investiture of bishoprics, and collation of ecclesiastical dignities, within his dominions.—Sir W. Raleigh, Essays.

2. Act of giving possession.

The redemption is sealed in heaven, and shall in due time be manifested to thine investiture which God hath prepared for all his.—Bishop Hall, Remains, p. 130.

In January, 1681, Bacon had reached the zenith of his fortunes... He had been created Baron Verulam. He had subsequently been raised to the higher dignity of Viscount St. Albans. His patent was drawn in the most flattering terms, and the Prince of Wales signed it as a witness. The ceremony of investiture was performed with great state at Theobalds, and Buckingham descended to be one of the chief actors.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Bacon.

About the beginning of the fifteenth century, the marquise of Brandenburg was bestowed by the Emperor Sigismund on the noble family of Hohenzollern. In the sixteenth century that family embraced the Lutheran doctrine. It obtained from the King of Poland, early in the seventeenth century, the investiture of the Duchy of Prussia.—Ibid., Life of Frederic the Great.

Investive. adj. Encircling; enclosing.

The horrid fire, all moribund, did choke
The scorched wretches with investive smoke.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 820.

Investment. s.

1. Dress; clothes; garment; habit; vestment. Obsolete.

Ophelia, do not believe his vows; for they are brokers.

Not of that die which their investments show.

Shakespeare, Hamlet, l. 3.

You my lord archbishop,
Whose see is by a civil peace maintain'd,
Whose board the silver hand of peace hath touch'd,
Whose learning and good letters peace hath tutor'd,
Whose white investments figure innocence,
The dove, and every bird of peace;
Wherefore do you so ill translate yourself,
Out of the speech of peace, that bears such grace,
Into the harsh and boisterous tongue of war?

Id., Henry IV. Part II. iv. 1.

2. Putting out a capital (i.e. establishing a vested interest in it) for the purpose of obtaining interest for it.

If the prime cost of the respective investments, or parcels of goods, were truly valued and stated by judicious and disinterested persons, a judgment might from thence be made somewhat nearer the truth than the random guesses here taken notice of.—Davenant, Discourses, ii. 345. (Ord MS.)

No popular was the new investment that on the day on which the books were opened three hundred thousand pounds were subscribed: ... in ten days, to the delight of all the friends of the government, it was announced that the list was full.—Macaulay, History of England, ch. xx.

Inveteracy. s. [Lat. inveteratio, -onis = growing or becoming old in anything, from vetus, vetus = old.]

1. Long continuance of anything bad; obstinacy confirmed by time.

The inveteracy of the people's prejudices compelled their rulers to make use of all means for reducing them.—Addison.

2. In Medicine. Long continuance of a disease.

Inveterate. adj.

1. Old; long established.

The custom of Christianity was then, and had been a long time, not to wear inveterate, and therefore that undoubtedly they did offend who presumed to violate such a custom by not observing that thing; the very inveterate observation whereof was a law, sufficient to bind all men to observe it, unless they could show some higher law, some law of Scripture to the contrary.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

It is an inveterate and received opinion, that cantarides, applied to any part of the body, touch the bladder and exacerbate it.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

2. Obstinate by long continuance.

It is not every sinful violation of conscience that can quench the spirit; but it must be a long inveterate course and custom of sinning, that at length produces and ends in such a cursed effect.—South, Sermons.

In a well-instituted state the executive power will never let abuses grow inveterate, or multiply so far that it will be hard to find remedies.—Swift.

Inveterate. v. a. Fix and settle by long continuance.

The vulgar conceived, that now there was an end given, and a consummation to superstitious practices, and to an ancient tacit expectation, which had by tradition been infused and inveterate into men's minds.—Bacon.

Inveterate. part. adj. Inveterate. Rare.

Let not atheism lay the fault of their sins upon human nature, which have their prevalence from long custom and inveterate habit.—Bentley.

Inveterateness. s. Attribute suggested by inveterate; long continuance of anything bad; obstinacy confirmed by time.

As time hath rendered him more perfect in the art, so hath the inveterateness of his malice made him more ready in the execution.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Neither the inveterateness of the mischief, nor the prevalence of the fashion, shall be any excuse for those who will not take care about the meaning of their words.—Locke.

Invidea. adj. [Lat. invidia = envy.]

1. Envious; malignant.

I shall open to thee the interior secrets of this mysterious art, without imposture or invidious ruse.—Evelyn.

2. Likely to incur or to bring hatred: (this is the more usual sense).

Not to be further tedious, or rather invidious, these are a few causes which have contributed to the ruin of our morals.—Swift.

Joseph, a beloved child of Israel, became invidious to his elder brethren, for no other reason but his superior beauty and excellence of body and mind, inasmuch that they could not bear his growing virtue and let him live.—Addison, Tatler, no. 255. (Ord MS.)

Invigorate. v. a. Endue with vigour; strengthen; animate; enforce.

The spleen is introduced to invigorate the sinister side, which, diluted, would rather ladrum and debilitate.—Sir T. Browne.

I have lived when the prince, instead of invigorating the laws, assumed a power of dispensing with them.—Addison.

The right use of reason... will be a method of invigorating and properly directing all the powers of the mind.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Logic, introduction.

Invigoration. s. Act of invigorating; state of being invigorated.

I find in myself an appetitive faculty, which is always in the very height of activity and invigoration.—Norris.

Invillaged. See Envillaged.

Invincibility. s. Quality of being invincible.

Thus a happy victory may be gained over invincibility itself.—Burton.

Invincible. adj. [Lat. vincere = conquer.] Incapable of being conquered; insuperable; unconquerable; not to be subdued.

Should he invade their country, he would soon see that invincible nation with their united forces up in arms.—Arnold.

That mistake, which is the consequence of invincible error, scarce deserves the name of wrong judgment.—Locke.

If an atheist had had the making of himself, he would have framed a constitution that could have kept pace with his insatiable lust, been invincible by intemperance, and have held out a thousand years in a perpetual debauch.—Bentley.

Invincibleness. s. Unconquerableness; insuperableness.

Inviolability. s. State or quality of being inviolable.

Having excluded all probability of the event of a systematic abuse of royal power, or a dangerous exorbitance of prerogative, our constitution exempts her kings from the degrading necessity of being accountable to the subject; she invests them with the high attribute of political impeccability, she declares, that wrong, in his public capacity, a king of Great Britain cannot do; and thus unites the most perfect security of the subject's liberty with the most absolute inviolability of the sacred person of the sovereign.—Bishop Hurd, Sermon on the Thirtieth of January, 1783.

The declarations respecting the inviolability of church property are indebted for the greater part of their apparent force to this ambiguity.—J. S. Mill, System of Logic, pt. v. ch. vii.

Invulnerable. adj.

1. Not to be profaned; not to be injured.

Thou, be sure, shalt give account
To him who sent us, whose charge is to keep
This place invulnerable, and these from harm.
Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 841.

Invulnerable powers! woe'd with dread...

Be all of you adjured.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, ll. 207.

This birthright, when our author pleases, must and must not be sacred and invulnerable.—Locke.

2. Not to be broken.

The prophet David thinks, that the very meeting of men (and her, and their accompanying one another to the house of God, should make the bond of their love invulnerable, and tie them in a league of invulnerable amity.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

3. Insusceptible of hurt or wound.

The invulnerable mind!
In cubick phalanx firm advance'd entire.
Milton, Paradise Lost, vi. 308.

Involute. adj. Unhurt; uninjured; unprofaned; unpolluted; unbroken.

His fortune of arms was still involute.—Bacon, History of Henry VIII.

But let involute truth be always dear To thee; even before friendship, truth prefer.

In all the changes of his doubtful state, His truth, like Heaven's, was kept involute.—Dryden.

Invovous. adj. [Lat. via = way.] Impassable; untrodden. Rare.

If nothing can oppugn love, And virtue invovous ways can prove, What may none's confide to do, That brings both love and virtue too?—Buller, Hudibras.

Invovousness. s. Attribute suggested by Invovous. Rare.

Which is called . . . invovousness and emptiness; . . . where all is dark and unpassable, as perviousness is the contrary.—Dr. Ward, Translation of More's Preface to his Philosophical Works: 1710.

Invirility. s. [Lat. vir = man; virilis = manly.] Absence of manhood; departure from manly character.

It savours of effeminacy and womanish invirility.—Pyne, Unconsciousness of Love-Locks, p. 48: 1828.

Inviscous. v. a. [Lat. viscus = birdlime.] Lime; entangle in glutinous matter. Rare.

The camelion's food being flies, it hath in the tongue a mucous and sticky extremity, whereby, upon a sudden emission, it inviscates and entangleth those insects.—Sir T. Browne.

Inviscerate. v. a. [Lat. viscera = bowels.] Broed; nourish. Rare.

Inviscerating this disposition in our hearts . . . to love one another.—W. Montague, Devout Essays, pt. I. p. 267: 1648.

Invivibility. s. State of being invisible; imperceptibility to sight.

They may be demonstrated to be innumerable, substituting their smallness for the reason of their invivibility.—Ray.

Invivable. adj. Not visible; not perceptible by the sight; not to be seen.

He was invivable but hurt me so; And none invivable but spirits can go.—Sir P. Sidney.

It seems easier to make one's self invivable to others, than to make another's thoughts visible to me, which are not visible to himself.—Locke.

Used substantively.

Lodge immaterials in thy head; ascend unto invivibles; all thy spirit with spirituals, with the mysteries of faith, the magnificence of religion, and thy lift with the honour of God.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Nurture, pt. III. sect. xiv. (Ord MS.)

Invivibly. adv. In an invisible manner; imperceptibly to the sight.

[Age] by degrees invivibly doth creep, Nor do we seem to die, but fall asleep.—Sir J. Denham, Of Old Age, pt. II.

Invision. s. Absence of vision. Rare.

This is agreeable unto the determination of Aristotle, who computed the time of their invision or invision by that of their gestation.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors, p. 174. (Ord MS.)

Invitation. s.

1. Act of inviting, bidding, or calling to anything with ceremony and civility.

That other answer'd with a lowly look, And soon the gracious invitation took.—Dryden.

2. Allurement.

She gives the leer of invitation.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, I. 3.

Invitatory. adj. Using invitation; containing invitation.

In the Latin service it [the 15th] is called the invitatory psalm; it being always sung with a strong and loud voice, to awaken those people into the church, who were in the cemetery, or churchyard, or any other adjacent parts, waiting for the beginning of prayer.—Whalley, On the Common Prayer, III. § 5.

Invitatory. s. Hymn of invitation to prayer.

Responds, invitatoria, and such like things as did break the continual course of the reading of the Scripture.—Concerning the Service of the Church, Common Prayer.

Invite. v. a. [Lat. invito; Fr. inviter.]

1. Id.; ask to any place, particularly to one's own house, with intreaty and complaisance.

If thou be invited of a mighty man, withdraw thyself.—Ecclesiasticus, xlii. § 1.

When much company is invited, then be as sparing as possible of your coals.—Swift, Advice to Servants.

2. Allure; persuade; induce by hope or pleasure.

A war upon the Turks is more worthy than upon any other Gentiles, though facility and hope of success might invite some other choice.—Bacon.

Sluggish grooves, that may sleep invite, And after toilsome days a soft repose at night.—Dryden.

Invite. v. n. Ask or call to anything pleasing.

All things invite To peaceful counsels. Milton, Paradise Lost, II. 278.

Invitement. s. Invitation. Rare.

He never makes a general invitement, but against the publishing of a new suit; marry, then, you shall have more drawn to his lodging than come to the launching of some three ships.—B. Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

Inviter. s. One who invites.

Honour was the aim of the guests, and interest was the scope of the inviter.—Southbridge, Sermons.

Inviting. verbal abs. Invitation.

He hath sent me an earnest inviting.—Shakespeare, Timon of Athens, III. 6.

Invitingly. adv. In an inviting manner;

in such a manner as invites or allures.

If he can but dress up a temptation to look invitingly, the business is done.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety, p. 165.

Invitingness. s. Attribute suggested by inviting.

Elegant flowers of speech, to which the nature and resemblance of things, as well as human fancies, have an aptitude and invitingness.—Jeremy Taylor, Artificial Handicraft, p. 168.

Invocate. v. a. Invoke.

Poor key-cold figure of a holy king! Be't lawful, that I invocate thy ghost, To hear the lamentations of poor Anne?—Shakespeare, Richard III. I. 2.

The church of Rome, in her public and allowed officers, prays to dead men and women, who are, or whom they suppose to be, beatified; and these they invocate as protectors.—Jeremy Taylor, Dissuasion from Popery, ch. II. § 9.

If I begin to be thy god, Go to his temple, invocate his aid With solemnest devotion.—Milton, Samson Agonistes, 1115.

Invocation. s.

1. Act of invoking, or of calling upon in prayer.

Is not the name of prayer usual to signify even all the service that ever we do unto God? And that for no other cause, as I suppose, but to shew that there is in religion no acceptable duty, which devout invocation of the name of God doth not either presuppose or infer.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Form of call so made.

My invocation is Honest and fair, and in his mistress' name.—Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, II. 1.

The whole poem is a prayer to fortune, and the invocation is divided between the two deities.—Addison, Travels in Italy.

Invooce. s. [Fr. envoyées = things sent; it would be more correct, in the way of etymology, to spell it with e.] Catalogue of articles with price.

The man who first saw that it was possible to found an European empire on the ruins of the Mogul monarchy was Duplex. His restless, capacious, and inventive mind had formed this scheme, at a time when the ablest servants of the English Company were busied only about invooce and bills of lading.—Maccarty, Critical and Historical Essays, Lord Clive.

Invooke. v. a. [Lat. voco = call; pres. part. vocans, -antis; vocatio, -onis.] Call upon; pray to.

The power I will invooke dwells in her eyes.—Sir P. Sidney.

One peculiar nation to select From all the rest, of whom he invooke'd.—Milton, Paradise Lost, XII. 111.

The skilful hand, Striking the Thracian harp, invooke Apollo, To make his hero and himself immortal.—Prior, Translation of the First Hymn of Callimachus.

Invovuntarily. adv. In an involuntary manner; not by choice; not spontaneously.

They are not the work of the soul itself, but invovuntarily obtruded upon it.—A. Baxter, Enquiry into the Nature of the human Soul, II. 183.

Invovuntariness. s. Attribute suggested by involuntary; want of choice or will.

There is not an absolute invovuntariness in this engagement, but a mixed one.—Bishop Hall, Causes of Conscience, I. 2.

Invovuntary. adj.

1. Not having the power of choice.

The gathering number, as it moves along, Involves a vast invovuntary throng, Who gently drawn, and struggling less and less, Roll in her vortex, and her power obey.—Pope, Dunciad, IV. 81.

2. Not chosen; not done willingly.

The forbearance of that action, consequent to such command of the mind, is called invovuntary; and whatsoever action is performed without such a thought of the mind, is called invovuntary.—Locke.

But why, ah tell me, ah too dear! Steals down my cheek th' invovuntary tear?—Pope, Imitations of Horace, B. IV. ode I.

Invovolution. s.

1. Act of involving or inwrapping; state of being entangled; complication.

Leave never an angle or invovolution in it.—Hammond, Works, IV. 508.

All things are mixed, and causes blended by mutual invovolutions.—Glassville, Scenopsis Scientifica.

2. That which is wrapped round anything.

Great concretions are raised of the invovolution of membranous covering called the invovolution, sometimes found about the heads of children upon their birth; and is therefore preserved with great care, not only as medical in disease, but effectual in success, concerning the infant and others; which is surely no more than continued superposition.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

3. In Arithmetic. Multiplication of a quantity, any given number of times, by itself: (opposed to Evolution, or the division of a number to find its root).

Involve. v. a. [Lat. involvere, from volvo = roll; pres. part. volvens, -entis; pass. part. volutus; volutio, -onis.]

1. Inwrap; cover with anything circumfluent.

The floods my soul involve'd below, The swallowing deep bring'd me round.—Sandys, Sacred Songs, p. 20.

Leave a sing'd bottom all involve'd With stench and smoke.—Milton, Paradise Lost, I. 230.

No man could miss his way to heaven for want of light; and yet so vain are they as to think they oblige the world by involveing it in darkness.—Dr. H. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

2. Entwist; join.

He knows his end with mine involve'd.—Milton, Paradise Lost, II. 807.

3. Imply; comprise.

We cannot demonstrate these things so as to shew that the contrary necessarily involvees a contradiction.—Archbishop Tillotson.

4. Take in; catch; conjoin.

The gathering number, as it moves along Involvees a vast involuntary throng.—Pope, Dunciad, IV. 81.

5. Entangle.

This reference of the name to a thing whereof we have no idea, is so far from helping at all, that it only serves the more to involve us in difficulties.—Locke.

As obscure and imperfect ideas often involve our reason, so do dubious words puzzle men's reason.—Id.

6. Complicate; make intricate.

Some involve'd their many folds.—Milton, Paradise Lost, VII. 463.

Syllogism is of necessary use, even to the lovers of truth, to shew them the fallacies that are often concealed in florid, witty, or involved discourses.—Locke.

7. Blend; mingle together confusedly.

Earth with hell to mingle and involve.—Milton, Paradise Lost, II. 384.

8. In Arithmetic. Multiply any quantity by itself any given number of times.

Invovement. s. Involved condition.

Yes, Emily, a worthy, an honourable man; but for the suddenness of his death—'tis fit I prepare you for the shock—he has left me in invovements, which, in a few hours, may inclose me in a prison.—G. Colman the younger, The Poor Gentleman, v. 2.

Invovedness. s. Attribute suggested by involved; state of being involved.

The invovedness of all men in the guilt of swearing.—Boyle, Against Customary Swearing, p. 13.

Invovulnerable. adj. [Lat. quibus, -eris = wound.] Incapable of being wounded; secure from wound.

IN VU

Our cannon's malice vainly shall be spent
Against th' invulnerable clouds of heav'n.
Shakspere, King John, II. 1.
Nor vainly hope
To be invulnerable in those bright arms,
That mortal dint none can resist.
Milton, Paradise Lost, II. 811.

Vanessa, though by Pallas taught,
By love invulnerable thought,
Searching in looks for wisdom's aid,
Was in the very search betray'd.
Swift, Cadogan and Vanessa.

Invulnerableness. s. Attribute suggested by invulnerable; state of being invulnerable.

We wrestle not only against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, against the rulers of the darkness of this world, against spiritual wickedness in high places; which needs must be most dangerous unto us. 1. For their wariness that grapple with us; 2. For their invulnerableness, they being spirits; whereas we are flesh and blood.
—Bishop Prideaux, Euchologia, p. 62: 1658.

Inward. adv. [A.S. inweard; weard denoting direction.] Towards the internal parts; within.

Looking inward we are stricken dumb; looking upward we speak and prevail.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

He stretches out his arm in sign of peace, with his breast bending inward.—Dryden, Translation of Dufrenoy's Art of Painting.

Inward. adj.

1. Internal; placed not on the outside, but within.

He could not rest, but did his stout heart eat,
And waste his inward gall with deep despit.
Spenser, Faerie Queen.

To each inward part
With gentle penetration though unseen
Shoots invisible virtue.
Milton, Paradise Lost, III. 284.

Sickness, contributing no less than old age to the shaking down this enfolding of the body, may discover the inward structure more plainly.—Bope.

The term activity applies more to outward than to inward vitality. Gladden, The State in its Relations with the Church, ch. iv.

2. Reflecting; deeply thinking.

With outward smiles their flattery I receiv'd;
Ow'd my sick mind by their discourse reliev'd;
But bent and inward to myself again,
Perplex'd these matters I revolv'd in vain.
Prior, Solomon, b. 1.

3. Intimate; domestic; familiar.

Though the lord of the liberty do pain himself
All he may to yield equal justice unto all, yet can there not but great narrow lurk in so inward and absolute a privilege.—Spenser, View of the State of Ireland.

All my inward friends abhorred me.—Job, xix. 19.

4. Seated in the mind.

Princes have but their titles for their glories,
An outward honour for an inward toil;
And for unfelt imaginations
They often feel a world of restless cares.
Shakspere, Richard III. I. 4.

Inward. s. [from the adjective.] Intimate; near acquaintance. Rare.

Sir, I was an inward of his; a fly fellow was the duke; and I know the cause of his withdrawing.—Shakspere, Measure for Measure, III. 2.

Inwardly. adj. Internally.

That which inwardly each man should be, the church outwardly ought to testify.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Inwardness. s. Attribute suggested by inward.

1. Intimacy; familiarity.

You know my inwardness and love
Is very much unto the prince and Claudio.
Shakspere, Much Ado about Nothing, IV. 1.
His nephew is fallen into some trouble, by reason of his familiarity and inwardness with Sir R. Colton.—Bourchier, Letter to Archbishop Usker, p. 418: 1620.

2. Internal state.

Some cannot arrive to the inwardness
Of things, nor penetrate the crusty fence
Of constipated matter.
Dr. H. More, Song of the Soul, I. 1, 28.

Inwards. adv. [A.S. inweardes.] Same as inward.

The parts of living creatures that be more inwards, nourish more than the outward flesh.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The medicines which go to these magical ointments are so strong, that if they were used inwards they would kill; and therefore they work potently, though outwards.—Id.

Shine inwards, and the soul through all her powers Irradiate.
Milton, Paradise Lost, III. 61.

IPEC

Inwards. s. pl. [from, A.S. inweardes = bowels.] Anything within, generally the bowels or intestines. Obsolete, or, sounded inwards, slang.

Then sacrificing, laid
The inwards, and their fat, with incense strew'd
On the clef wood, and all due rites perform'd.
Milton, Paradise Lost, XI. 438.

They esteem them most profitable, because of the great quantity of fat upon their inwards.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Inweave, Inweod, Inwrip, Inweathe, Inwreight. See Enweave, &c.

Iodine. s. [Gr. io = violet.] A coined word, the -ine belonging to the artificial language of chemistry, and indicating the class to which the substance denoted by it belongs; i.e. the class containing chlorine, bromine, and fluorine. The vapour of iodine is of a violet-blue colour. In Chemistry. Elementary substance so called, chiefly obtained from sea-water by means of certain sea-weeds. See Kelp.

Among the earliest measures proposed in recent times is the internal administration of burnt sponge, and the instances of success from this remedy are so numerous as might at first incline the student to believe that the object of his research is found. The mode of its operation is not at all known. By some the virtues of the remedy are made to reside in the alkali or in the charcoal which it contains, and later theorists have imagined that iodine is its active principle. These speculations led to the introduction of different preparations of iodine in the treatment of bronchocoele; and experience has now fully demonstrated that this substance is possessed of considerable medicinal virtue. It appears to excite the absorbent system in a peculiar manner, and is fairly entitled to the general character of a deobstruent. Its employment, however, is not altogether harmless. It sometimes disorders the health, and occasions general emaciation. It is of course in the removal of morbid growths and indolent tumours that its power is chiefly displayed. In gleet it may be given both internally and externally.—Girgory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. v. ch. v.

Derivatives, as iodic, iodide, iodate, ioduret, &c., and the compounds hydriodate, &c., are numerous.

Ionian. adj. [Gr. ionikos = relating to Ionia.] In Architecture. Applied to one of the four Greek orders, the Doric, Corinthian, and Composite being the other three; often stands alone as a substantive.

In the Ionian order the column differs widely from that of the Doric, not only in the form of its capital, and in having a base, but in the contour of its shaft, and the mode of fluting, it being more slender and not tapering so suddenly. The base is generally composed of two tort, or convex rings, with a concave moulding, the scotia, between them; for as the Doric character demands plane surfaces and lines, so does the Ionian require curved mouldings and contours, as harmonising with the curved forms of the volutes of the capitals.—Knight, English Encyclopedia.

When this prospect vanished, he [Æschines] retired to Rhodes, where he opened a school of oratory, which produced a long series of valuable sophists, and is considered as the origin of a new style of eloquence, technically called the Asiatic which stood in relation to the Attic not unlike that of the composite capital to the Ionian volute, and was destined to prevail in the east wherever the Greek language was spoken, down to the fall of the Roman empire.—Bishop Thirlwall, History of Greece, ch. iv.

Iota. s. [Gr.] See Jot.

It is no less than a direct affront to our Creator and Governor, in a branch of that law, that he has given us as a transcript of his own holiness, and enforces by the penalty of eternal death threatened to the transgressors of the least iota of it.—Barrow, Sermons, vol. I. serm. 1.

Not have all the self-reflections or abstractions of the most exalted minds, from any combinations or alterations of ideas, been able, amidst their other prodigious discoveries, to add a single iota to one of these.—Ellis, Knowledge of Divine Things, p. 115.

You will have the goodness then to put no stuffing of any description in my coat; you will not pinch me an iota tighter across the waist than is natural to that part of my body; and you will please, in your infinite mercy, to leave me as much after the fashion in which God made me, as you possibly can.—Sir E. J. Bulwer, Pelham, ch. xlv.

Ipecacuanha. s. [Brazilian.] Plant so called, Cephaelis ipecacuanha, of the natural order Rubiaceæ; medicinal preparation of the same (other plants, e.g. Ionidium of the natural order Violacæ), have been named as the true ipecacuanha, which, indeed, they nearly approach in their characteristic ænetic properties.

Ipecacuanha is a small irregularly contorted root, rough, dense, and firm. One sort is of a dusky greyish colour on the surface, and of a paler grey when broken, brought from Peru; the other sort is a small root, resembling the former. The grey ought to be preferred, because the brown is apt to operate more roughly.—Sir J. Mill, Materia Medica.

The violent operation of ipecacuanha lies in its vein, but the saline extract is a gentle purge and diuretic by the stimulus of its salts.—Bishop Berkeley, Siris, § 84.

Irascibility. s. Propensity to anger.

The irascibility of this class of tyrants is generally exerted upon petty occasions.—Johnson, Rambler, no. 112.

Irascible. adj.

1. Having a tendency, prone to, anger; easily enraged.

The Cardinal Legates, Alba and Palatrina, discouraged by their reception in England, did not venture to appear before the more highly and irascible Philip of France with the Pope's imperious mandate; they assumed that the truce for a year, enjoyed by the Pope, would gain obsequious observance.—Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. xi. ch. viii.

2. Partaking of the nature of anger; characterised by anger.

The irascible passions follow the temper of the heart, and the concupiscence distinctions the cradle of the liver.—Sir T. Browne.

I know more than one instance of irascible passions subdued by a vegetable diet.—Arbuthnot, On the Nature and Choice of Aliments.

We are born in the country surrounded with blessings and pleasures, without any occasion of exerting our irascible faculties.—Digby, Letter to Pope.

Ire. s. [Lat. ira; irascor = begin to be, be, angry; pret. part. iratus = angered.] Anger; rage; passionate hatred.

She lik'd not his design;
Pain would be free, but dreaded pain's ire.
Sir P. Sidney.

For this the avenging Power employs his darts,
And empties all his quiver in our hearts;
Thus will persist, relentless in his ire,
Till the fair slave be render'd to her sire.
Dryden, Translation of the First Book of the Iliad, 143.

Ireful. adj. Angry; raging; furious.

There learn'd this maid of arms the ireful guise.
Fairfax.

In midst of all the dome misfortune sat,
And gloomy discontent and fell debate,
And madmen laughing in his ireful mood.
Dryden, Palamon and Arcite, II. 280.

Irefully. adv. In an ireful manner; with ire.

[He] irefully enrag'd would needs to open arms.
Drayton, Polyolbon, song IV.

Irenical. adj. [Gr. irênê = peace.] Pacific; desirous of peace.

How meek his temper was, his many irenical traits do show.—Preface to Bishop Hall's Remains, sign. b.: 1600.

Iridesceence. s. Play of colours.

(For example see next entry.)

Iridescent. adj. Having a play of colours; prismatic.

Anthracite is . . . bright, and often submetallic; iron-black, and frequently iridescent. . . . This accounts for its iridescence.—Dana, System of Mineralogy.

Iridium. s. [see Iris: from its play of colours; the final -um shows it belongs to the same class as Palladium, Aurum, &c.; i.e. the class of metals.] In Chemistry. Elementary substance so called.

Iridium occurs with platinum in the province of Choco, in South America, and in the Ural mountains. It was first distinguished by Dr. Wollaston, who discovered that the specimens were an alloy of iridium and osmium.—Dana, System of Mineralogy.

Iris. s. [Lat. = rainbow.]

1. Rainbow itself, or parts of it.

Beside the solar iris, which God shewed unto Noah, there is another, lunar, which efficient is the moon.—Sir T. Browne.

When both bows appeared more distinct, I measured the breadth of the solar iris, 2 gr. 10'; and the breadth of the red, yellow, and green in the exterior iris, was to the breadth of the same colour in the interior, 310a.—Sir I. Newton, On Opticks.

Figuratively.
The tawny and iris colors of minerals are owing to a thin surface film, proceeding from different sources, either from a change in the surface of the mineral or foreign incrustation.—Dana, System of Mineralogy.

In the spring a fuller crimson comes upon the robin's breast.
In the spring the wanton lapwing gets himself another crest;
In the spring a livelier iris changes on the burnished dove;
In the spring a young man's fancy lightly turns to thoughts of love.

Transeau, Lockley Hall.

2. In Anatomy. Circle round the pupil of the eye.

The iris sometimes contracts adhesions . . . whereby the motions of that membrane are lost and blindness, to a greater or less degree, produced.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. v. ch. xi.

3. In Botany. Plants so called of the genus Iris; the native ones being the flower-de-luce, or corn-flag, Iris pseud-acorus, and the glendowes (Iris foetidissima).
Iris all huc, roses, and jessamine.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 608.

Irish. s. [P] Old game so called.

The inconstancy of Irishilly represents the changeableness of humane occurrences, since it ever stands so flake that one malignant throw can quite ruin a never so well built game.—Hall, Horse Valuers: 1846.

Irishism. s. Mode of speaking used by the Irish; Hibernicism: (euphemism for bull, in the sense of blunder).

'I will be there as soon as you.' 'I will,' instead of 'I shall,' is a Scotchism. (Hence.) And an Irishism too.—Reed, Note on Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors.

Irishry. s. District occupied by Irishmen; population of Irishmen.

I knew that among the Irishry it was not yet clean taken away.—Brydget, Discourse of Civil Life, p. 157: 1806.

Iritis. s. In Medicine. Inflammation of the iris.

The latter stages of iritis are attended with severe pain, aggravated towards night.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. v. ch. xi.

Irish. v. a. [A.S. arg = bud.] Annoy; vex; make impatient.

But when these pelling poets in their rimms
Shall faint, or jest, or paint our wicked works,
And cause the people know and curse our crimes,
This ugly faultless tyrant likes but irish.

Mirror for Magistrates, p. 346.

It irish me to hear one thing so often.—Milnes.
Come, shall we go and kill us venison?
And yet it irish me, the poor dappled fool
Should, in their own confines, with forked heads
Have their round haunches gored.

Shakespeare, As you like it, ii. 1.

It irish his heart he cannot be reveng'd.
Id., Henry VI. Part I. 1. 4.
This word is used only impersonally, it irish me; Mihl pona est, it gives me pain, or, I am weary of it. Thus the authors of the Accidence say, Tudet, it *irish*eth.—Johnson.

Irksome. adj.

1. Wearysome; tedious; troublesome; toilsome; tiresome; unpleasing.

I know she is an irksome bawling scold.
Shakespeare, Twelfth of the Shrews, 1. 2.
Since that thou canst talk of love so well,
Thy company, which erst was irksome to me,
I will endure.
Id., As you like it, iii. 5.

There is nothing so irksome as general discourses, especially when they turn chiefly upon words.—Addison, Spectator.

Frequent appeals from hence have been very irksome to that illustrious body.—Swift.

2. Weary; tired. Obsolete.

The people then embracing titles new,
Irksome of present, and longing for change,
Amused soon, because they love to range.
Mirror for Magistrates, p. 352.

Irksomely. adv. In an irksome manner; wearily; tediously.

Our doctrine forens not error and unwillingness irksomely to keep it.—Milton, Doctrines and Discipline of Divines, 1. 13.

Neither irksomely hating, nor fondly loving, himself.—Burrows, Works, 1. 4.

Irksomeness. s. Attribute suggested by Irksome; tediousness; wearisomeness.

As Castillo describes it, the beginning, middle, and of love, is nought else but sorrow, vexation, torment, irksomeness.—Barton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 531.

Thus was he driven to shift and change his desire from one thing to another, finding wild content in never a great of them; but, after some small experience, great irksomeness in them all.—Fotherby, Atheismastis, p. 210.

The irksomeness of that truth, which they brought, was so unpleasant to them, that every where they call it a burden.—Milton, Reason of Church Government urged against Popery, b. ii.

Iron. s. [A.S.] Metal so called; instrument made thereof; often with a qualifying term prefixed, as, marking iron, box iron, smoothing iron, flat iron. When used, the laundress's iron, and the irons used as chains, shackles, manacles, or gyves, are the objects to which it most frequently applies. In this sense it is common in the plural. Figuratively it may mean sword, or any piercing instrument made of iron.

If he smite him with an instrument of iron, so that he die, he is a murderer.—Numbers, xxxv. 16.
Canst thou fill his skin with barbed irons, or his head with fish-spears?—Job, xli. 7.

His feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron.—Isaiah, cv. 16.

Iron of a dolt, doublets that laughmen would bury with those that wore them, these base slaves, Ere yet the fight be done, pack up.

Shakespeare, Coriolanus, 1. 5.

Put in their hands thy bruising irons of wrath,
That they may crush down with a heavy fall
The usurping helmets of our adversaries.

Id., Richard III., v. 3.

For this your locks in paper dance bound?
For this with tort'ring irons wreath'd around?

Pope, Rape of the Lock, canto iv.

Iron. adj.

1. Made of iron.

Get me an iron crow, and bring it straight
Unto my cell. Shakespeare, Romeo and Juliet, v. 2.

First element of a compound.

A piece of stone of a dark iron grey colour, but in some parts of a ferruginous colour.—Woodward, On Fossils.

2. Used metaphorically. Harsh; stern.

Pouring forth their blood in British woe,
That any iron eyes, to see it, would arise.

Spenser, Faerie Queen.

But O and virgin, that thy power
Hid hid the soul of Orpheus sing
Such notes as, warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears from Pluto's cheek,
And made hell grant what love did seek.

Milton, Il Penseroso, 103.

Iron. v. a.

1. Smooth with an iron: (as, 'The linen was ironed').

2. Shackle with irons.

These men were, by the orders of the British government, seized, imprisoned, ironed, starved almost to death, in order to extort money from the Princesses.—Macaulay, Critical and Historical Essays, Warren Hastings.

Ironclad. s. and adj. Vessel defended by iron-plates.

In estimating the performance of our ironclads, it should not be forgotten that they represent conditions of service without any precedent in former times. For protection's sake it is now necessary to clothe our men-of-war in ponderous iron armour, and for power's sake it is indispensable to equip them with guns of enormous calibre. These weights, it was thought, might prove incompatible with the buoyancy, swiftness, and seaworthiness expected from a fighting ship in days gone by, and, indeed, it was very recently believed that a good ironclad must be a bad seaboat. These impressions, however, will be materially qualified by the reports now published. A squadron comprising nine of our ironclads, selected so as to include almost all the varieties of the fleet, has successfully kept the sea for a month during the autumnal equinox, and the ships have shown good weatherly qualities and high rates of speed.—Times Newspaper, Nov. 7, 1868.

Ironical. adj. The same as ironical, the latter being commoner.

Most Socratic lady!
Or, if you will, ironical!
Ben Jonson, New Inn.
I had better leisure to contemplate that ironical smile of Juvenal.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 11.

Ironical. adj. Expressing one thing and meaning another; speaking by contraries. Heracles the philosopher, out of a serious meditation of men's lives, fell a weeping; and with continual tears bewailed their misery, madness, and folly. Democritus on the other side burst out a laughing, their whole life to him seemed so ridiculous; and he was so far carried with this ironical passion, that the citizens of Abdera took him to be mad.—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, to the reader.

The whole court shall take itself absurd
By our ironical confederacy.

Ben Jonson, Cynthia's Revels.

I take all your ironical civilities in a literal sense, and shall expect them to be literally performed.—Swift.

Ironing. verb. abs. Act of one who irons (especially linen).

Ironish. adj. Approaching the character of iron. Rare.

Some of the Royal Society did thrust a probe or little stick into a chink of the coffin, which bringing out some moisture with it, found it of an ironish taste.—A. Wood, Athenæ Oxonienses. (Ord M8.)

Ironist. s. One who speaks by contraries.

A poet, or orator, . . . would have no more to do but to send to the ironist for his sarcasms.—Arbuthnot and Pope, Martinus Scribblerus.

Socrates took the name of ironist from the continual humour, and ridicule, which runs through his moral discourses.—Bishop Hurd.

Ironmonger. s. Dealer in tools, instruments, or implements of iron.

Ironmould. s. Mark or spot on linen, occasioned by the rust of iron.

Fine linen, being once stained with black ink, though it be washed never so, will retain an ironmould ever after.—Junius, Sin Stigmatised, p. 378: 1835.

We have seen arms, the ironmould that stained our religion, and out out order and laws.—Spencer, Rights of the People, p. 37: 1800.

Ironside. s. and adj. Having a side of, or really, approximately, or figuratively, as hard as iron: (Edmund Ironside was an Anglo-Saxon king so named; the Ironsides was the name given to Cromwell's regiment).

Irony. adj. Made of iron; partaking of iron. Rare.

The force they are under is real, and that of their fate but imaginary; it is not strange if the irony chains have more solidity than the contemplative.—Hammam, On Fundamentalism.

Some springs of Hungary, highly impregnated with vitriolick salts, dissolve the body of one metal, suppose iron, put into the spring; and deposit in lieu of the iron particles carried off, copper particles.—Woodward, On Fossils.

Irony. s. [Gr. ironia.] See extract from Whately.

He speaks it by an ironic or skorne.—Bishop Gardiner, On the Sacrament, fol. 22: 1551.

So grave a body, upon so solemn an occasion, should not deal in irony, or explain their meaning by contraries.—Swift.

Aristotle mentions, though very briefly, these two modes of rousing the feelings, the latter under the name of ironia, which in his time was commonly employed to signify, not according to the modern use of 'Irony,' saying 'the contrary to what is meant,' but, what later writers usually express by litotes, i.e. saying less than is meant. The two methods may often be both used on the same occasion, beginning with the calm, and proceeding to the impassioned, afterwards, when the feelings of the hearers are already wrought up to a certain pitch. Universally, indeed, it is a fault carefully to be avoided, to express feelings more vehemently than that the audience can go along with the speaker; who would, in that case, as Cicero observes, seem like one raving among the mute, or intoxicated in the midst of the sober. And accordingly, except where from extraneous causes the audience are already in an excited state, we must carry them forward gradually, and allow time for the fire to kindle. The kind which would heighten a strong flame, would, if applied too soon, extinguish the first faint spark. The speech of Antony over Caesar's corpse, which has been already mentioned, affords an admirable example of that combination of the two methods which has just been spoken of.—Archbishop Whately, Elements of Rhetoric, pt. ii. ch. ii. § 6.

Irony. adj. Angry; passionate. Obsolete.

This Naman Irony,
So fit, and so irony. Shelton, Poems, p. 174.

Irradiance. s. Emission of rays or beams of light upon any object; beams of light emitted. Rare.

Love not the heavenly Spirits? Or do they mix
Irradiance virtual, or immediate touch?
Milton, Paradise Lost, viii. 618.

Irradiance. s. Same as Irradiance. Rare.
The principal affection is its translucency; the irradiancy and sparkling, found in many roms, is not derivable in this.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

Irradiate, v. a. [Lat. radius = ray.]

1. Adorn with light emitted upon it; brighten.

When he thus perceives that these opacous bodies do not hinder the eye from judging light to have an equal plenary diffusion through the whole place it irradiates, he can have no difficulty to allow air, that in dissipation, to be every where mingled with light.—Sir E. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of Bodies.

It is not a converting but a crowning grace; such an one as irradiates and puts a circle of glory about the head of him upon whom it descends.—South, Sermons, li. 274.

2. Enlighten intellectually; illumine; illuminate.

Reason . . . illumined and contempered with the soul, and not only extrinsically irradiating it.—Bishop Reynolds, On the Passions, ch. xvi.

Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers irradiate; there plant eyes: all minds from hence Purge and disperse.—Milton, Paradise Lost, li. 51. (God . . . is lodged in our very essence, and is as a soul within the soul, to irradiate its understanding, rectify its will, purify its passions, and enliven all the powers of man.—Spectator, no. 571.)

3. Animate by heat or light.

Ethereal or solar heat must digest, influence, irradiate, and put those more simple parts of matter into motion.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

No weeping orphan saw his father's stores Our shrines irradiate, or imbrize the floors.—Pope, Elina to Abolard.

Irradiate, v. n. Shine upon.

Day was the state of the hemisphere, on which light irradiated; and night was the state of the opposite hemisphere, on which rested the shadow projected by the body of the earth.—Bishop Horne, Letters on Infidelity, let. x.

Irradiate, adj. Decorated with shining ornaments. Rhetorical.

The peacock spreads his rainbow train, with eyes Of sapphire bright, irradiate each with gold.—Mason, English Garden, b. iv.

Irradiation, s.

1. Act of emitting beams of light.

The generation of bodies is not effected by irradiation, or answerably unto the propagation of light; but herein a transmutation is made materially from suno parts, and locally from every one.—Sir T. Browne, Vulgar Errors.

2. Illumination; intellectual light.

The means of immediate union of these intelligible objects to the understanding, are sometimes divine and supernatural, as by immediate irradiation or revelation.—Sir M. Hale, Origination of Mankind.

Irrational, adj.

1. Void of reason; void of understanding; wanting the discursive faculty.

Thus began Outrage from lifeless things; but discord first, Daughter of sin, among the irrational Death introduced.—Milton, Paradise Lost, x. 706.

2. Absurd; contrary to reason.

Since the brain is only a part transmittent, and that humours off are precipitated to the lungs before they arrive to the brain, no kind of benefit can be effected from no irrational an application.—Harvey, Discourse of Consumption.

I shall quietly submit, not wishing no irrational a thing as that everybody should be deceived.—Pope.

Irrationality, s. Want of reason.

Who is it here that appeals to the frivolousness and irrationality of our dreams?—Baxter, On the Soul, li. 187: 1737.

Irrationally, adv. In an irrational manner; without reason; absurdly.

The obtuse Jew, that he might more easily avoid the truth of the second, hath most irrationally denied the first.—Bishop Pearson, Exposition of the C. xxi. art. iii.

He had foolishly and irrationally bartered away eternity for a trifle.—South, Sermons, viii. 151.

Irreclaimable, adj. Incapable of being reclaimed.

When length of days made virtuous habits heretical and immutable, vicious, inveterate and irreclaimable.—Sir T. Browne, Christian Morals, li. i.

If we may judge by proportion, the angels in heaven, who rejoice at the conversion of one sinner, do also mourn and lament for the irreclaimable wickedness of so many millions as are in the world.—Norris, On the Resurrection, p. 24.

As for obstinate, irreclaimable, professed enemies, we must expect their columns will continue.—Adrian, Freesholder.

Irreconcilable, adj. Incapable of being reconciled.

1. Not to be recalled to kindness; not to be appeased.

Wage eternal war, Irreconcilable to our grand foe.—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 121.

A weak unequal faction may animate a government; but when it grows equal in strength, and irreconcilable by animosity, it cannot end without some crisis.—Sir W. Temple.

There are no factions, though irreconcilable to one another, that are not united in their affection to you.—Dryden.

2. Not to be made consistent: (with with, more rarely to).

As she was strictly virtuous herself, so she always put the best construction upon the words and actions of her neighbours, except where they were irreconcilable to the rules of honesty and decency.—Arbuthnot, History of John Bull.

Irreconcilableness, s. Incapable of being reconciled.

What must it be to live in this disagreement with everything, this irreconcilableness and opposition to the order and government of nature?—Lord Shaftesbury.

Irreconcilably, adv. In an irreconcilable manner.

The five great points controverted betwixt the two families . . . are irreconcilably.—Sir T. Herbert, Relation of some Years' Travels into Africa and the Great Asia, p. 123.

They were a sort of attributes, with which it was a matter of religion to salute them on all occasions, and which it was an irreverence to omit. — Pope.

2. State of being disregarded.

The concurrence of the houses of peers in the Curia can be imputed to no one thing more than to the irreverence and scorn the judges were justly in, who had been always looked upon there as the oracles of the law. — Clarendon.

Irreverend. adj. Irreverent. Rare.

In irreverent and irrelative behaviour towards myself and some of mine. — Sir C. Cornwallis, Supplement to Cato's, p. 101: 1698.

The bread of the sacrament, being dedicated to a holy and peculiar service, is thereby separated from that irreverent and profane handling, that common bread is exposed unto. — Spenser, Religious Error, p. 19: 1690.

Irreverently. adv. Not paying due homage or reverence; not expressing or conceiving due veneration or respect.

An our fear excludeth not that boldness which becometh mist, so, if our familiarity with God do not savour of fear, it draweth too near that irreverent confidence wherewith true humility can never stand. — Hucker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

Knowledge man sought for, and covered it from the vulgar sort as jewels of inestimable price, fawring the irreverent construction of the ignorant and irreligious. — Sir W. Raleigh.

If an irreverent expression or thought too wanton are crept into my verses, through my inadvertency, let their authors be answerable for them. — Dryden.

Irreverently. adv. In an irreverent manner; without due respect or veneration.

'Tis but an ill essay of reverence and godly fear to use the gospel irreverently. — Dr. H. More, Government of the Tongue.

Irreversible. adj. Incapable of being reversed, recalled, or undone; not to be changed.

It is irreversible, it cannot be revoked. — South, Sermons, vii. 332.

The sins of his chamber and his closet shall be produced before men and angels, and an eternal irreversible sentence be pronounced. — Rogers.

Irreversibility. s. Attribute suggested by Irreversible; state of being irreversible.

A precedent of the irreversibility of oaths. — Blackburn, History of the Bible, b. v. ch. ii.

Irreversibly. adv. In an irreversible manner; without change.

The title of fundamentals, being ordinarily confined to the doctrines of faith, hath occasioned that great wound in the church, as which so many minds of well-meaning have stumbled, and fallen irreversibly, by conceiving heaven a reward of true opinions. — Hammond, On Fundamentals.

Irrevocable. adj. Incapable of being revoked or recalled; not to be brought back; not to be reversed.

Firm and irrevocable is my doom, Which I have past upon her.

Shakespeare, As you like it, l. 3.
That which is past is gone and irrevocable, therefore they do but trifle that labour in past matters. — Bacon, Essays.

By her irrevocable fate,
War shall the country waste and change the state.

Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 119.
The other victor flame a moment stood;
Then fell, and lifeless left the extinguish'd wood;

For ever lost, the irrevocable light
Forsook the black'ning embers, and sunk to night.

Id. Palamon and Arcite, iii. 234.
Each merced account bears eternal weight,
And each irrevocable word is fate.

Pope, Translation of the Thebais of Statius.

Irrevocably. adv. In an irrevocable manner; without recall.

If air were kept out four or five minutes, the fire would be irrevocably extinguished. — Boyle.

Irrevolvable. adj. [Lat. volubilis, from volvo = roll.] Incapable of being revolved. Rare.

Proceeding the dateless and irrevolvable circle of eternity. — Milton, Of Reformation in England, b. ii.

Irrigate. v. a. [Lat. irrigatus; pass. part. of irrigo; irrigatio, -onis; adjective, irriguus.] *Wet; moisten; water.

It hath certain glands, . . . which by their viscous moisture do irrigate, and as it were oil, the pipe; that it takes off the hardness that otherwise would be found, and adds much sweetness and pleasantness to the muscle. — Smith, Portrait of Old Age, p. 113.

The heart, which is one of the principal parts of the body, doth continually irrigate, nourish, keep hot, and supply all the members. — Key, Wisdom of God manifested in the Works of the Creation.

Irrigation. s. Act of watering; state of being watered; moistening.

Help of ground is by watering and irrigation. — Bacon.

Fomentations, irrigations, . . . prescribed for the head. — Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 402.

In April, and the spring time, his lordship (Lord Bacon) would, when it rained, take his coach (open) to receive the benefit of irrigation, which, he was wont to say, was very wholesome, because of the nitre in the air. — Aubrey, A New Decade, li. 235.

Used metaphorically.

That every of us fructify in some proportion answerable to our irrigation. — Hammond, Works, iv. 374.

I wish it may also flow in spiritual blessings; and doubt not but that, by the irrigation rather than inundation of this flood; they shall encrease in them. — Harrington, Brief View of the State of the Church of England, p. 208.

Irrigulous. adj.

1. Watery; watered. The flowery lap Of some irrigulous valley spread her store.

Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 234.
Whether to spread
Broad as a lake, or, as a river pen,
By fringed banks, weave its irrigulous way
Through lawn and shade alternate.

Momus, English Garden, l. 122.

2. Falling as dews. Latinism.

Dry'd an immeasurable bowl, and thought
To exalt his spirit by irrigulous sleep.
Imprudent! him death's iron sleep oppress.

J. Philips, Cyber, b. ii.

Irrision. s. [Lat. ridere = laugh; pass. part. of risus; substantives, risus, risio, -onis.] Act of laughing at another; act of mocking. Rare.

They are printed deeper than can be blotted out with all their artificial and forced irrigulous. — Butcher, Athenianist, p. 126: 1622.

By way of sarcasm and irrisio. — Gregory, Description of the Glorious Trinity, p. 6.

Hann, by his indurated and unnatural irrisio, and exposing of his father, lurches his curse. — Woodward.

Irritability. s. Capability of being irritated.

a. Mentally, or morally.

b. Physically: (applied to certain tissues, both animal and vegetable, in respect to their action under a stimulus.)

Irritability [is] a power or property of organised bodies of being acted upon by stimuli, so as to give rise to movements, manifested chiefly by muscular or fibrous tissues. This very important and generally diffused property of animal bodies was first investigated by Dr. Galvani. He applied the term 'irritability' to all the sensible and insensible movements of animals. . . . Haller and his disciples, with Fontana, Meissner, Bichat and others, considered irritability to be, vis generis, inherent in the muscular fibre, altogether independent of nervous influence. . . . On the other hand, Whist, Monro, Unger, Prochaska, Legallès, &c. regarded the nervous power as the principle upon which all muscular contractions depend, and consequently irritability to be communicated to the muscles by the nerves. . . . Very recently Virchow has published his own views on this subject. According to him, irritability is a property and criterion of every living cell and cell-derivate, and does not belong merely to nervous or muscular tissues. Every cell can be impelled to certain actions by influences which may operate upon it, either from other parts or elements of the same organism, or from bodies entirely foreign. The irritating power may reach the cells through nerves, through vessels, or through adjoining parts. Every irritation produces in the cellular elements some mechanical or chemical change, which changes in a counter-working against its irritative cause, a reaction against an action working from without. — Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Irritable. adj. Easily provoked.

He was irritable and resentful. — Johnson, Lives of the Poets, Pope. (Ord MS.)

Used substantively.

The wise will determine from the gravity of the case, the irritable, from their sensibility to oppression. — Burke.

Irritate. adj. [from Lat. irritus = frustrate, the; being short; in -not; ratus = ratified.] Rendering void. Rare; barbarous.

The states elected Henry duke of Anjou for their king, with this clause irritate; that if he did violate any part of his oath, the people should own him no allegiance. — Sir J. Hayward, Answer to Duclan, ch. v. 1603.

Irritant. adj. Producing irritation. See next entry.

Irritant. s. That which produces irritation: (in Medicine, applied to the classification of poisons which are irritant, narcotic, and the like).

Many of the Ranunculaceae are irritant poisons. . . . Clostridia is one of the best known irritants of this class. — Lindley, Vegetable Kingdom.

Irritate. v. a. [Lat. irritatus, pass. part. of irrito; pres. part. irritans, -antis; irritable, -onis.]

1. Provoked; vexed; exasperated.

The earl, speaking to the irrelative in impetuous language, did not irritate the people. — Bacon, History of the Reign of Henry VII.

Land's power at court could not qualify him to go through with that difficult reformation, whilst he had a superior in the church, who, having the reins in his hand, could alacken them, and was thought to be the more revenge to irritate his choleric disposition.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

2. Fret; put into motion or disorder by any irregular or unaccustomed contact; stimulate; velleitate.

Cold maketh the spirits vigorous, and irritabell them.—Bacon.

3. Heighten; agitate; enforce.

Air, if very cold, irritate the flame, and maketh it burn more fiercely, as fire scorseth in frosty weather.—Bacon.

Irritate. adj. Heightened. Rare.

When they are collected, the heat becomes more violent and irritate, and thereby expelleth sweat.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

Irritate. v. a. Render null or void. Obsolete.

If any thing should come to pass otherwise than it doth, yet God's foreknowledge could not be irritated by it, for then he did not know that it should come to pass as it doth.—Archbishop Bramhall, Works, p. 727.

Irritating. part. adj. Causing irritation.

(For example see Irritability.)

Irritation. s. Provocation; exasperation; stimulation.

Violent affections and irritations of the nerves I any part of the body is caused by something acrimonious.—Arbuthnot.

Next to inflammation, the morbid condition to which the term irritation has been applied is the most important both to the pathologist and to the rational physician. Notwithstanding this, the term has been vaguely employed; and the existence of the morbid states, which it has been used to designate, has been as loosely inferred. The varying characters, also, of irritation with the tissue or part primarily or chiefly affected, and with lesions of adjoining or of functionally associated parts, and the superaddition of other morbid changes, more particularly of increased exhalation, secretion, and inflammatory action, have given rise to much perplexity, in respect not only of the meaning attached to the word, but also of attempts of ascertaining its existence, seat, and extent. Hitherto irritation, as a primary morbid condition, has been inferred more frequently from the absence during disease of more manifest alterations, than from any positive proof of its presence; and to it have been referred by many, those disorders and maladies which could not be imputed to any more palpable lesion.—Copland, Dictionary of Practical Medicine.

Irritative. adj. Having a tendency to irritate.

(For example see Irritability.)

Irritatory. adj. Causing irritation.

The other peradventure is sufficiently grounded for principles of faith, yet is weak by reason either of some passion, or of some irritatory and troublesome humour in his behaviour.—Hales, Golden Remains, p. 45.

Nothing hinders wounds from cleaving more than concourse of humour to the diseased part, and keeping thence irritatory about the orifice of the wound.—Ibid. p. 285.

Erration. s. [Lat. ros, roris = dew.] Bedewing. Rare.

If during the discharge the erration should be interrupted, the portion of eggs then excluded will be barren, while the rest will be found to have been fructified.—Translation of Spallanzani's Dissertations. (Ord MS.)

Erraption. s. [Lat. rumpo = break; pret. rups; pass. part. ruptus; raptio, -onis.]

1. Act of forcing an entrance.

How doth the water rage with his inundations, irruptions, flinging down towns, cities, villages, bridges, bridle shipwrecks!—Burton, Anatomy of Melancholy, p. 4.

2. Inroad; burst of invaders into any place.

Five or six weeks before his lord's fatal irruption into the city.—Sir H. Wotton, Remains, p. 180.

The famous wall of China, built against the irruptions of the Tartars, was begun above a hundred years before the Incarnation.—Sir T. Brown, Miscellaneous, p. 180.

Notwithstanding the irruptions of the barbarous nations, one can scarce imagine how so plentiful a soil should become so miserably unpopulated.—Adelphi Travels in Italy.

Erraptive. adj. Bursting forth; rushing down or in.

Concord fears his soul afright,
And storms of wrath and indignation dread
Seem ready to displace erraptive on his head.
Whitehouse, Poems, Ode to Justice: 1791.

2126

2a. See Be.

He that is of God, heareth God's words.—John, viii. 47.

Be not afraid of them, for they cannot do evil; neither also is it in them to do good.—Jeremiah, x. 8.

My thought, whose murder yet is but fantastical,
Shakes so my single state of man, that function
Is smother'd in surmise; and nothing is,
But what is not.—Shakespeare, Macbeth, l. 3.

In an elliptical form.

There's some among you have beheld me fighting.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, iii. 1.

Isagogical. adj. [Gr. isagwgnic, from is = into, and agw = lead.] Introductory; belonging to an introduction.

I will make further relation
Of this isagogical collation. Skelton, Poems, p. 163.

Bealiger was bold to call him Merodac; but he resembled of that in his canons isagogical.—Gregory, Pontifical, p. 247: 1650.

Ischiatic. adj. In Anatomy. Same as Sciatic.

Ischuria. s. [Gr. ischuria, from isch = restrain + ur = urine; a medical term sometimes Anglicized into ischury.] Retention of urine.

Ischuria renalis is . . . a disease in which the functions of the kidney are suspended, and the urine is retained in the blood.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. iv. ch. xli.

Isinglass. s. [German, blase = bladder.] Swimming bladder of the sturgeon; gelatinous and semi-transparent, whence its (catachrestic) connection with glass. The true meaning of the word is the (swimming) bladder of the Acipenser huso.

The cure of putrefaction requires an increscentine diet, as all visceral broths, harkhorn, ivory, and isinglass.—Sir J. Floyer.

Some make it clear by reiterated fermentations, and others by additions, as isinglass.—Mortimer, Husbandry.

Isinglass is a tough, firm, and light substance, of a whitish colour, and in some degree transparent, much resembling glue. The fish from which isinglass is prepared, is one of the cartilaginous kind: it grows to eighteen and twenty feet in length, and greatly resembles the sturgeon. It is frequent in the Danube, the Boristhenes, the Volga, and the larger rivers of Europe. From the intestines of this fish the isinglass is prepared by boiling.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

Used adjectively. In Mineralogy. See extract and Mica.

Isinglass stone [is] a fossil which is one of the purest and simplest of the natural bodies. The masses are of a brownish or reddish colour; but when the plates are separated, they are perfectly colourless, and more bright and polished than the finest glass. It is found in Moscow, Persia, the island of Cyprus, in the Alps and Apennines, and the mountains of Germany.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

Islam, Islamism. s. Mahometanism.

States have their respective policies, on which they move forward, and which are the conditions of their well-being. Thus it is sometimes said that the true policy of the American Union, or the law of its prosperity, is not the enlargement of its territory, but the cultivation of its internal resources. Thus Russia is said to be weak in attack, strong in defence, and to grow, not by the sword, but by diplomacy. Thus Islamism is said to be the form or life of the Ottoman, and Protestantism of the British empire; and the admission of European ideas into the one, or of Catholic ideas into the other, to be the destruction of the respective conditions of their power.—J. H. Newman, Essay on the Development of Christian Doctrines.

Island. s. Tract of land surrounded by water.

He will carry this island home in his pocket, and give it his son for an apple. . . . And sowing the kernels of it in the sea, bring forth more islands.—Shakespeare, Tempest, l. 1.

Within a lone recess there lies a bay:
An island shades it from the rolling sea.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, l. 229.

Island of bliss and the subject seas. Thomson.

Islander. s. Inhabitant of a country surrounded by water.

We, as all islanders, are lunares, or the moon's men. Camden.

Your dinner, and the generous islanders
'By you invited, do attend your presence.
Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 3.

There are many bitter sayings against islanders in general, representing them as fierce, treacherous, and uncharitable: those who live on the continent have such frequent intercourse with men of different religions and languages, that they become more kind than those who are the inhabitants of an island.—Addison, Freeholder.

Isle. s.

1. Island; country surrounded by water.

The instalment of this noble duke
In the seat royal of this famous isle,
Shakespeare, Richard III. iii. 2.

These royal fish
Betwixt a nation and two whales I write:
Sea staid with gore I sing, advent'rous toll,
And how these monsters did disarm an isle.
Waller.

2. Long walk in a church or public building.

O'er the twilight grove and dusky cave,
Long sounding isles and intermin'd groves,
Black Melancholy sits. Pope, Epics to Abolard.

Islet. s. Little island.

They . . . agreed to convey themselves and their substance into the uttermost bowen of the Adriatic gulf, and there possessed certain desolate islets, by tradition, about twenty in number.—Sir H. Wotton, Remains, p. 251.

Iso- Prefix in Composition, from Greek isos = equal. Common in scientific language, some of the compounds into which it enters being taken from the Greek direct; some coined out of Greek elements for the occasion.

Isochrome. adj. [Gr. χρῶμα = skin, complexion, colour.] Having the same, or equivalent, colours.

The two curves or lines . . . are called isochromatic.—Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Isochronal. adj. Same as Isochronous.

The isochronal velocities describing the particles of MN.—Bishop Berkeley, Analyst, § 41.

Isochronism. s. Equality in point of time: (applied chiefly in Mechanics).

The isochronism of the common pendulum is imperfect, but that of the cycloidal pendulum is theoretically perfect. Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Isochronous. adj. [Gr. χρῶμα = time.] Having equal times.

The tribrach and iambic are isochronous.—Seale, Greek Metres.

Isoclinical. adj. See extract.

Isoclinical lines [are] those which pass through places where the magnetic dip or inclination is the same. Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Isognonic. adj. [Gr. γωνία = angle.] See extract.

Isognonic lines in torrendal magnetism [are] lines passing through all places at the surface of the earth, at which the horizontal magnetic needle makes the same angle with the meridian, or at which the declination is the same. Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Isolate. v. a. [Lat. solus = alone; the word is condemned by Todd, and it is doubtless exceptionable, owing to a confusion with insulate, from Lat. insula (Italian, isola) = island.] Detach; separate.

The immediate results of the late war and peace, as we learn from the Emperor Napoleon, have been to break up old alliances, and isolate every European community.—Times Newspaper, Nov. 12, 1860.

Isolated. part. adj. Detached; separate.

Short, isolated sentences were the mode in which ancient wisdom delighted to convey its precepts for the regulation of human conduct.—Bishop Warburton, Doctrine of Grace, prof.

Isolation. s. Isolated condition.

Prior Abelard was a Breton. . . . In him were concentrated the characteristics of that race . . . the individuality, which delighted in isolation from the rest of mankind. . . . the quietude and fertility which were speedily fostered into passion for disputation. Milman, History of Latin Christianity, b. viii. ch. v.

Isopartite. adj. [Gr. μῆρος = part.] See extract.

Compounds which contain the same elements in the same ratio, yet exhibit distinct chemical qualities, are said to be isopartite.—Brande and Cox, Dictionary of Science, Literature, and Art.

Isomerism. s. In Compounds. Condition of isomeric compounds.

Silicon, too, is allotropic; while its oxide, silica, which is an indispensable constituent of many lower organisms, exhibits the analogue of allotropism—isomerism. And even of the iron which plays an active part in higher organisms, and a passive part in some lower ones, it may be said that though not known to be itself allotropic, yet isomerism series than compounds of it that are found in living bodies.—Herbert Spencer, Data of Biology, ch. i. § 1.

Isomereous. adj. In Botany. See extract.

Symmetrical flowers may be either dimerous, tetramerous, or pentamerous throughout; and when the organs are equal in all the circles, the flowers are isomereous; we have isomereous dimerous flowers in Clematis and Syringa; isomereous pentamerous flowers in Cranium, &c. but, generally speaking, one of the other of the whorls exhibits partial suppression.—Henry, Elementary Course of Botany, p. vi.

Isomorphism. s. [Gr. isomorphos = form.] In Chemistry. See extract.

We will not quit the subject, however, without noticing the much more promising aspect which it has assumed by the detection of such groups as are referred to in the last article; or in other words, by Mitscherlich's discovery of isomorphism. According to that discovery, there are various elements which may take the place of each other in crystalline bodies, either without any alteration of the crystalline form, or at most with only a slight alteration of its dimensions. Such a group of elements we have in the earths lime and magnesia, the protoxides of iron and manganese; for the carbonates of all these bases occur crystallized in forms of the rhombohedral system, the characteristic angle being nearly the same in all. Now lime and magnesia, by the discovery of modern chemistry, are really oxides of metals; and therefore all these carbonates have a similar chemical constitution, while they have also a similar crystalline form.—Whewell, History of Scientific Ideas.

Isopolity. s. [Gr. isopolis = polity.] Equality of political rights.

The constitution of a provincial city of the empire, in the days when the republic still possessed virtue and principle, was of this description, at all events from the period of the Social, Marius, or Italian war, when the cities of Italy wanted isopolity, or at least isopolity from Rome.—Kemble, The Saxons in England, v. ii. ch. vii.

Isosceles. s. [Gr. isos = leg.] Triangular figure of which two sides are equal: (commonly adjectival, as, 'isosceles triangle').

Isotermal. s. [Gr. isothermos = warm.] In Physical Geography. Having equal degrees of heat.

From the want of uniformity of the surface of the globe, the isothermal lines, i.e. lines passing through spots which have an equal annual temperature, by no means correspond to parallels of latitude; the distribution of land and sea, and the alternation of plains and mountains, deflecting such lines to the north and south, sometimes to an excessive extent.—Henry, Elementary Course of Botany.

Issuable. adj. So as to bring to issue or decision.

If a prisoner shall stand as contumacious in contempt, and shall not put in an issuable plea, guilty or not guilty of the charge given against him, whereby he may come to a fair trial; that, as by an implicit confession may be taken 'pro confesso'.—Narrative of the Trial of King Charles I. Jan. 25, 1649, p. 4. Military and Trinity terms, from the making up of the issues therein, are usually called issuable terms.—Sir W. Blackstone.

Issue. s. [Fr.]

1. Act of passing out; exit; egress; passage out.

Let us examine what bodies touch a movable whilst in motion, as the only means to find an issue out of this difficulty.—Sir A. Digby, Treatise on the Nature of Bodies.

We might have easily prevented those great returns of money to France; and if it be true the French are so impoverished, in what condition must they have been if that issue of wealth had been stopped.—Swift.

2. Event; consequence.

Spirits are not finely touch'd, But to fine issues.
Shakespeare, Measure for Measure, l. 1.

To do a thing, where I the issue doubted, Whereof the execution did dry out Against the non-performance, 'twas a fear Which oft infects the wisest.
Id., Winter's Tale, l. 2.

But let the issue correspondent prove To good beginnings of each enterprise. Fairfax.
If things were cast upon this issue, that God should never prevent sin till man deserved it, the best would sin, and sin for ever.—South, Sermons.

3. Termination; conclusion.

He hath preserved Argulus alive, under pretence of having him publicly executed after three wars, of which they hope for a soon and prosperous issue.—Sir P. Sidney.

What issue of my love remain'd for me! How wild a passion works within my breast! With what prodigious flames am I possess'd!
Dryden.

When, in the year 1700, some bold men in the government proposed that the streets of Madrid should be cleaned, so daring a suggestion excited general anger. Not only the vulgar, but even those who were called educated, were loud in their censure. The medical profession, as the guardians of the public health, were desired, by the government, to give their opinion. This they had no difficulty in doing. They had no doubt that the dirt ought to remain. To remove it was a new experiment; and of new experiments it was impossible to foresee the issue. Their fathers having lived in the midst of it, why should not they do the same? Their fathers were wise men, and must have had good reasons for their conduct.—Buckle, History of Civilization in England.

4. Sequel deduced from premises.

I am to pray you not to strain my speech To grosser issues, nor to larger reach, Than to suspicion.
Shakespeare, Othello, iii. 3.

5. Progeny; offspring.

(Of nation miserable! Since that the trust of issue of thy throne, By his own interdiction stands accurst.
Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 3.

This old peaceful prince, as I have heard, Was blow'd with no male issue to succeed.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 74.

The frequent productions of monsters, in all the species of animals, and strange issues of human birth, carry with them difficulties, not possible to consist with this hypothesis.—Locke.

6. Fontanel; vent made in a muscle for the discharge of humours.

This tumour in his left arm was caused by strict binding of his issue.—Wicam.

7. Morbid discharge from the body.

A woman, which was diseased with an issue of blood twelve years, came behind him.—Matthew, ix. 20.

8. In Law. See extract.

Issue hath divers applications in the common law: sometimes used for the children begotten between a man and his wife; sometimes for profits growing from an amercement, fine, or expenses of suit; sometimes for profits of lands or tenements; sometimes for that point of matter depending in suit, whereupon the parties join and put their cause to the trial of the jury. Issue is either general or special; general issue is such that whereby it is referred to the jury to bring in their verdict, whether the defendant have done any such thing as the plaintiff layeth to his charge. The special issue then must be that, where special matter being alleged by the defendant for his defence, both the parties join thereupon and so grow rather to a demurrer, if it be quæstio juris, or to trial by the jury, if it be quæstio facti.—Covent.

Issue. v. n. [N.Fr. issir; Ital. uscire, from Lat. exire = go out.]

1. Come out; pass out of any place.

Ere Pallas issu'd from the thunderer's head, Dulness o'er all possess'd her ancient right.
Pope, Dunciad, l. 8.

With out.

Waters issu'd out from under the threshold of the house.—Revelation, xlii. 1.
From the uttermost end of the head branches there issueth out a gummy juice.—Sir W. Raleigh, History of the World.

2. Make an eruption; break out.

Three of master Ford's brothers watch the door with pistols, that none should issue out, otherwise you might all away.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, iv. 2.

Haste, arm your Ardenns, issue to the plain; With high to friend, assault the Trojan train.
Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vii. 601.

3. Proceed as an offspring; be produced from.

Of thy sons that shall issue from thee, which thou shalt begot, shall they take away.—2 Kings, ix. 14.

Issue. v. a.

1. Send out; send forth.

A weak degree of heat is not able either to digest the parts or to issue the spirits.—Bacon, Natural and Experimental History.

The commissioners should issue money out to no other use.—Sir W. Temple.

2. Send out judicially or authoritatively: (with out or forth).

If the council issu'd out any order against them, or if the king sent a proclamation for their repair to their houses, some nobleman published a protestation.—Lord Clarendon, History of the Grand Rebellion.

Deep in a rocky cave he makes abode, A mansion proper for a morning god; Here he gives audience, issu'd out decrees To rivers, his dependent deities.
Dryden.

They constantly wait'd in court to make a due return of what they have done, and to receive such other commands as the judge shall issue forth.—Ayliffe, Paragon Juris Canonici.

Issueless. adj. Having no offspring; wanting descendants.

I have done sin; For which the Heav'n's taking angry note, Have left me issueless.
Shakespeare, Winter's Tale, v. 1.

Carow, by virtue of this entail, succeeded to Hugh's portion, as dying issueless.—Carow, Survey of Cornwall.

Issuing. verbal abs. Act of passing or going out.

By some others affected, and interpreted as issuing forth or sales of zeal.—Whitlock, Observations on the present Manners of the English, p. 300.

Isthmus. s. [Lat.] Neck of land joining a peninsula to a continent.

There is a castle strongly wated on a high rock, which joineth by an isthmus to the land, and is impregnable fortified.—G. Sandys, Travels.
O life, that nothing's younger brother! Thou wast built isthmus, that dost proudly rise 'Till but two elements, Yet can't stand two winds, nor wind sustain; But broken and o'erwhelm'd the ocean poets gain.
Cowley.

Plac'd on this isthmus of a middle state, A being darkly wise, and rudely great.
Pope, Essay on Man, ii. 3.

It. pron. [A.S. hit. Observe the initial h:

this shows its connexion with he, of which it is simply the neuter gender, and as such, in strict lexicography, a word that has no claim to a separate and independent entry. The Anglo-Saxon inflexion was he, hæc, hit = he, she (hæc provincially), it, in the nominative; and his, hirr, his = his, her, its, in the possessive, or genitive, case. As a sign of gender, the t is the -t in what and that. The irregular character of the present genitive its, which scarcely became thoroughly prevalent before the time of Charles II., is now manifest. It has its sign of case superadded to its sign of gender; just as if we said whats for whose.]

1. Pronoun of the third person, as applied to objects without sex, i.e. to things, or to persons treated as things.

Nothing can give that to another which it hath not itself.—Archbishop Bramhall, Answer to Hobbes.

A mind so furnished, what reason has it to acquiesce in its conclusions?—Locke.

The glory which encompassed them covered the place, and darted its rays with so much strength, that the whole fabric began to melt.—Addison, Freethinker.

2. Used absolutely for the state of a person or affair.

Now is it with our general?—Even so As with a man by his own aims impudenc'd, And with his clarity slain.
Shakespeare, Coriolanus, v. 5.

It's come to pass, That tractable obedience is a slave To each uncessant will. Id., Henry VIII. l. 2.
The design, it seems, is to avoid the dreadful imputation of pedantry.—Swift.

3. After neuter or intransitive verbs (as an expletive), to which it gives the appearance of being active or transitive.

If Abraham brought all with him, it is not probable that he meant to walk back again for his pleasure.—Sir W. Raleigh.

The Lacedæmonians, at the straits of Thermopylæ, when their arms failed them, fought it out with their nails and teeth.—Dryden.
I have often seen people lavish it profusely in tricking up their children, and yet starve their minds.—Locke.

This mole courses it not on the ground, like the rat or mouse, but lives under the earth.—Addison, Spectator.

Whether the charmer win it, or waint it, If fully grown romantic, I must print it.
Pope, Moral Essays, ii. 15.

4. Applied familiarly, ludicrously, or rudely to persons.

Let us after him, Whom care is gone before to bid us welcome; It is a precious kinman. Shakespeare, Macbeth, l. 4.
Thou with a self-complacent jutting air, It smiled, it smirk'd, it wrigg'd to the chair.
Churchill, Rosciad.

5. For its. Ludicrous.

Do, child, go to thy grandam, child: Give grandam kingdom, and thy grandam will Give it a plum.
Shakespeare, King John, ii. 1.

6. With the i omitted.

Who was't came by!—
'Tis two or three, my lord, that bring you word Macduff is fled to England.
—Shakespeare, Macbeth, iv. 1.
City.

'Tis I, that made thy widows,
—Id., Coriolanus, iv. 4.

Italianate. v. a. Make Italian; render conformable to Italian custom or fashion.
Rare.

Another chop in with English italianated, and apply the Italian phrase to our English speak-—Wilm., Arts of Rhetorick, B. 3. 1583.
Our Englishmen italianated have more in reverence the Triumphs of Petrarche than the Genes of Moyses.—Ascham, Scho. Master, 1590.

Italianated. part. adj. Conformed to Italian fashion. Rare.

Our italianated mountebanks seek to salve it.—
—Ivan King, Negmas on the 5th of November, p. 31: 1608.

Itallo. adj. and Itallo. s. Terms applied in Printing to letters in a cursive, as opposed to the ordinary, or Roman, form.

Italicise. v. a. Distinguish a word by printing it in the Italic character.

In page 17 of his pamphlet the doctor has printed, but not italicized, another inaccuracy.—Dr. Parr, On Dr. Combe's Statement, p. 74.

Itch. s. [A.S. giccha.]

1. In Medicine. Disease so called: (for the insect, or Handworm, connected with it, see extract from Gregory).

The Lord will smite thee ... with the scab and with the itch, whereof thou canst not be healed.—
—Deuteronomy, xxvii. 27.

As if divinity had catch'd

The itch, on purpose, to be scratch'd.
—Butler, Hudibras.

Used adjectively.

A notion very early prevailed that this disease was connected with the presence of animalcules. ... The itch insect was first accurately described by Bonomo in 1683, and is now called the Acarus scabiei.—Gregory, Theory and Practice of Medicine, pt. v. ch. vi.

2. Constant teasing desire.

He had still pedicure in his head, and an itch of being thought a divine king.—Dryden.
At half mankind when generous Maundy ravens,
All know 'tis virtue; for he thinks them knaves:
When universal honour Umbra pays,
All see 'tis vice, and itch of vulgar praise.
—Pope, Moral Essays, l. 57.

Itch. v. n.

1. Have a tickling sensation in the skin.

My right eye itches; some good luck is near;
Perhaps my Amargillis may appear.
—Dryden.

2. Long; have continual desire or tendency.

Master Shallow, you have yourself been a great fighter, though now a man of peace.—Mr. Page, though now I be old, and of peace, if I see highway out, my finger itches to smite one.—Shakespeare, Merry Wives of Windsor, ii. 3.

itching. part. adj. Tingling after the manner of the itch.

Cassius, you yourself
Are much condemn'd to have an itching palm,
To sell and mart your offices for gold.
—Shakespeare, Julius Caesar, iv. 3.

The itching ears, being an epidemic disease, give fair opportunity to every mountebank.—Dr. II. More, Decay of Christian Piety.

itching. verbal gbs.

1. Irritation like that produced by tickling.

A troublesome itching of the part was occasioned by want of transpiration.—Wiseman, Surgery.

1300

2. Teasing desire.

All fools have still an itching to deride,
And vain would be upon the laughing side.
—Pope, Essay on Criticism, l. 22.

itchy. adj.

1. Infected with the itch.

This man, that is alone a king in his desire,
By no proud ignorant lord is basely overaw'd,
Nor his false praise affects, who, grossly being claw'd Stands like an itchy moyle.
—Drayton, Polyolbion, song xiii.

2. Having a constant teasing desire; prurient.

The hydropick drunkard, and night-scutting thief,
The itchy lecher, and self-tickling proud.
—Donne, Poems, p. 318.

item. adv. [Lat.] Also; furthermore: (used in making lists or inventories, where it is applied to each additional article).

Item, also hath no teeth.—I care not for that neither, because I love cruels.—Shakespeare, Two Gentlemen of Verona, iii. 2.

item. s. Article, or detail, note thereof; particular memorandum.

I could have looked on him without the help of admiration, though the catalogue of his endowments had been tailed by his side, and I to peruse him by it.—Shakespeare, Cymbeline, l. 6.

All these items added together form a vast sum of discontent.—Murray, Stuart House, vol. i. ch. xviii.

item. v. a. Note as an item.

I have always taken your part before my lady.—
You have so, and I have item'd it in my memory.—
—Astley, The Drummer.

iterable. adj. Capable of being repeated.

Rare.

Others may wonder how the curiosity of elder times, having this opportunity of his [Apollo's] answers, omitted natural questions; or how the old magicians discovered no more philosophy; and, if they had the assistance of spirits, could not content with the bare assertions of things, without the knowledge of their causes: whereby they had made their acts iterable by silver hanks, and a standing part of philosophy.—Sir T. Browne, Miscellanies, p. 178.

iterant. adj. Repeating. Rare.

Waters being near, make a current echo; but being farther off, they make an iterant echo.—
—Baron, Natural and Experimental History.

iterate. v. a. [Lat. itero; pres. part. iterans, antis; pass. part. iteratus; adverb, iterum (generally this is translated again, a second time); its proper meaning, though not always found, even in the best writers, conveys the notion of immediate succession rather than mere repetition; Consul iterum—consul two years running.] Reiterate, though pleonastic, is the commoner word.

1. Repeat; utter again; inculcate by frequent mention.

We covet to make the psalms especially familiar unto all; this is the very cause why we iterate the psalms oftener than any other part of Scripture besides; the cause wherefore we inure the people together with their minister, and not the minister alone to read them, as other parts of Scripture he doth.—Hooker, Ecclesiastical Polity.

2. Do over again.

Ashes burnt, and well reverberated by fire, after the salt thereto hath been drawn out by iterated decoctions.—Sir T. Browne.

Nor Eve to iterate
Her former trespass fear'd, the more to sooth
Him with her lov'd society.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 1003.

Itinerant. adj. Journeying; travelling, locomotive.

(For example see Justice in Eyre).

Often used substantively.

itself. [its + self, with the one s omitted, as my-self, or it-self, as himself.] Reflective form of it.

iteration. s. Repetition; recited over again.

My husband!—Ay, 'twas he that told me first.

An honest man he is, and hates the slime
That sticks on filthy deeds.—My husband!—
What needs this iteration, woman?
I say, thy husband.
—Shakespeare, Othello, v. 2.

It is an admission which ... may sometimes prove useful to a young preacher, that he should ask himself, at the beginning, and in the course, of his composition, 'For what purpose am I going to preach? Wherein would any one be a loser if I were to keep silence? ... Let me not be satisfied with the thousandth iteration of common-places, on the ground that it is all very true, and that it is the fault of the congregation if they do not believe and practise it; for all this is equally the case whether I preach or not; and if all I say is what they not only knew before, but had heard in the same trite and general statements a hundred times before, I might as well hold my peace.—A. Robertson Whately, Elements of Rhetoric, pt. iii. ch. iii. § 2.

ivied. adj. Overgrown with ivy.

Repeated objects of his view,
The gloomy battlements, and ivied spires;
That crown the solitary dome, arise.
—T. Warton, Pleasures of Melancholy.

ivory. s. [Fr. ivoire; Lat. ebur.]

1. See extract from Hail.

Two gates the silent house of sleep adorn,
Of polish'd ivory this, that of transparent horn:
True visions through transparent horn arise,
Through polish'd ivory pass deluding lies.
—Dryden, Translation of the Æneid, vi. 1238.

Ivory is a hard, solid, and firm substance, of a fine white colour: it is the dense exertion of the elephant, who carries on each side of his jaws a tooth of six or seven feet in length; the two sometimes weighing three hundred and thirty pounds: these ivory tusks are hollow from the base to a certain height, and the cavity is filled with a compact medullary substance.—Sir J. Hill, Materia Medica.

2. A substance like the true ivory, supplied from the seeds of certain plants.
See extract.

Nuts suitable for turning are afforded by the seeds of Alnus funifera (Coccoloba nuts) and Phytolophus macrocarpa (vegetable ivory).—Huxley, Elementary Course of Botany, p. 304.

Slung for teeth.

Take Sancho Panza's head, ... yet leave the close-cropped bullet skull, the swarthy tint, the priming tear, the penthouse ears and twinkling little eyes of the immortal governor of Barataria.—J. A. Sala, Dutch Pictures, The Shadow of a young Dutch Painter.

Used adjectively.

From their ivory port the cherubin

Forth issu'd.
—Milton, Paradise Lost, iv. 778.

Draw Erato with a sweet and lowly countenance bearing a heart with an ivory key.—Pearson, On Drawing.

ivy. s. [A.S. ifig.] Native plant so called, of the natural order Arniaceæ.

Direct the clasping ivy where to climb.

—Milton, Paradise Lost, l. 217.

It [ivy] is a parasitical plant, sending forth roots or fibres from its branches, by which it is fastened to either trees, walls, or plants which are near it, and from thence receives a great share of its nourishment.—Miller.

Used adjectively.

A belt of straw, and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs.
—Markus.
